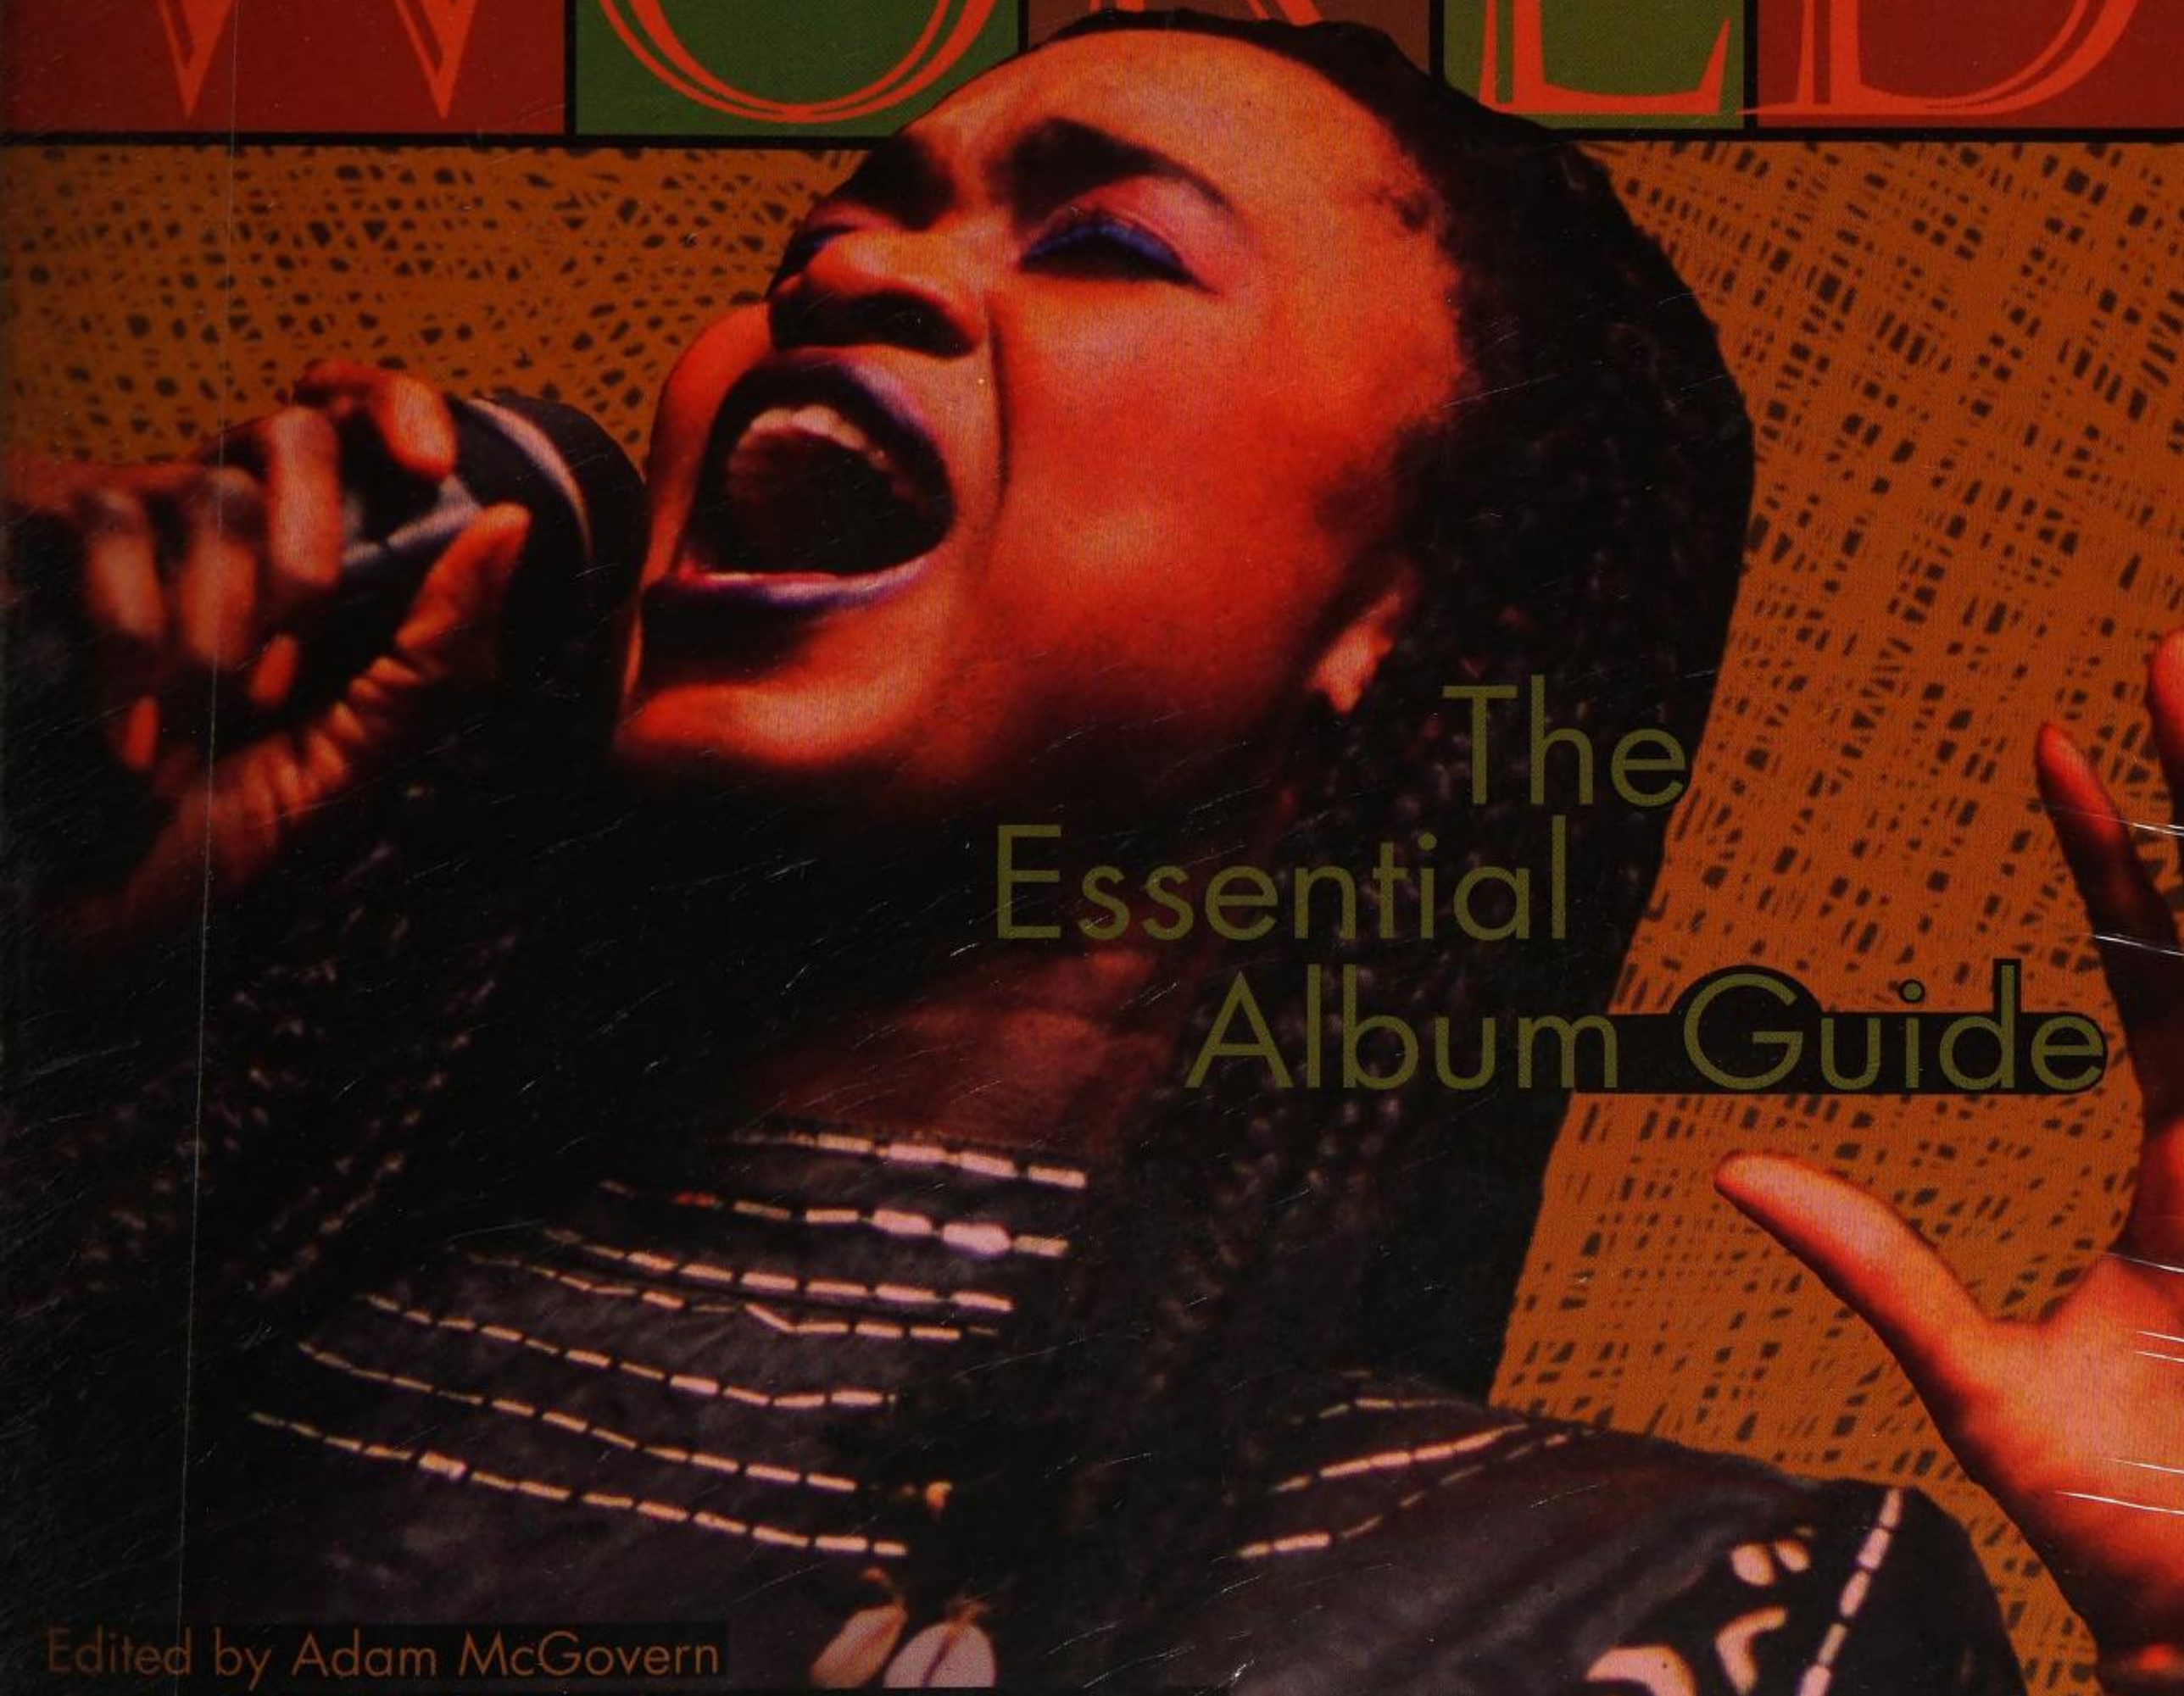
LATIN CELTIC NATIVE AMERICAN CARIBBEAN AFRICAN ASIAN MIDDLE EASTERN

musicHound

WORLD



The Essential Album Guide

Edited by Adam McGovern
Photographs by Jack & Linda Vartoogian
Forewords by Angélique Kidjo & David Byrne

musicHound WORLD

musicHound WORLD

The Essential Album Guide

Edited by Adam McGovern

Photographs by Jack & Linda Vartoogian

Forewords by Angélique Kidjo & David Byrne

WILLIAMSBURG REGIONAL LIBRARY
7770 CROAKER ROAD
WILLIAMSBURG, VIRGINIA 23188

JAN – – 2004

VISIBLE INK PRESS

DETROIT • SAN FRANCISCO • LONDON • BOSTON • WOODBRIDGE, CT

musicHound® WORLD
The Essential Album Guide

Copyright © 2000 Visible Ink Press®
A Cunning Canine Production®

Since this page cannot legibly accommodate all copyright notices, the credits constitute an extension of the copyright notice.

No part of this book may be reproduced in any form without permission in writing from the publisher, except by a reviewer who wishes to quote brief passages in connection with a review written for inclusion in a magazine or newspaper.

MusicHound World is a creative work fully protected by all applicable copyright laws, as well as by misappropriation, trade secret, unfair competition, and other applicable laws. The editors of this work have added value to the underlying factual information herein through one or more of the following: unique and original selection, coordination, expression, arrangement, and classification of the information.

All rights to this publication will be vigorously defended.

Published by Visible Ink Press
a division of Gale Group, Inc.
27500 Drake Rd.
Farmington Hills, MI 48331-3535

Gale Group is a trademark used herein under license.

Visible Ink Press, MusicHound, the MusicHound logo, and A Cunning Canine Production are registered trademarks of Gale Group, Inc.

Most Visible Ink Press books are available at special quantity discounts when purchased in bulk by corporations, organizations, or groups. Customized printings, special imprints, messages, and excerpts can be produced to meet your needs. For more information, contact Special Markets Manager, Gale Group, 27500 Drake Rd., Farmington Hills, MI 48331-3535. Or call 1-800-776-6265.

Cover photo of Oumou Sangare © Jack Vartoogian

Library of Congress Catalog Card Number: 99-66755

ISBN 1-57859-039-6

Printed in the United States of America

All rights reserved

10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

musicHound CONTENTS

list of sidebars . . . . . vii
foreword: i hate world music (by david byrne) . . . . . ix foreword: world music: the real alternative (by angélique kidjo) . . . . xi introduction: the world in tune (by adam mcgovern) . . . . . xiii musicHound owner's manual . . . . . xv organizations . . . . . xvii credits . . . . . xix
acknowledgments . . . . . xxix

a–z guide to world music acts / 1

compilation albums / 839

books and magazines / 927

web sites / 933

record labels / 941

concert venues / 949

radio stations / 953

five-bone album index / 957

band member index / 965 country index / 993

contributor index / 1001

series index / 1011

Appalachia 109
The Bagpipe 7
Chris Blackwell 733
Bollywood 121
Border Music: Tex-Mex 135
The Bouzouki 23
Brazil: Bahia 467
Brazil: The Northeast 479
Brazil: Samba 493
Brazil: Tropicalismo 505
Cajun Music 147
Calypso 519
Cape Breton Music 159
Celtic Music in Brief 167
Chinese Classical Music 185
The Didgeridoo 33
Ethno-Techno 195
Flutes Worldwide 45
Frame Drums Worldwide 59
Gamelan 207
Hammered Dulcimers Worldwide 71
Harps Worldwide 81
India, North and South 557
Indian/Jazz Fusion 567
Indian Percussion 579
Irish Step Dancing 215
Jamaican Music 1: Rastafarianism 609
Jamaican Music 2: Nyahbingi 617
Jamaican Music 3: Mento 627
Jamaican Music 4: Deejay Style 639
Jamaican Music 5: Ska 649
Jamaican Music 6: Rocksteady 661
Jamaican Music 7: Reggae 673
Jamaican Music 8: Dub 687
Jamaican Music 9: Dancehall 699
Jamaican Music 10: Ragga 709
Jamaican Music 11: Sonia Pottinger 721
Japan: The Taiko Tradition 225
Klezmer 239
The Kora and West African Griot 425
Lutes Worldwide 97
Music as Healing 255
Native American Pop 265
Newfoundland Music 279
Turlough O'Carolan 745
David Parsons 753
Polkas Worldwide 293
Post-Soca 543
Pygmies 303
Scandinavian Folk and Beyond 317

Sean-Nós Singing 327
Cecil Sharp. 767
Shibuya: The Japanese Underground. 339
The Sitar 587
Slack-Key Guitar 353
Soca 531
The Tabla 599
The Talking Drum 441
Tuvan Throat-Singing. 369
Vodou 385
West African Drumming and the Soul of Rock 'n' Roll 457
Jim Wilson 777
WOMAD. 799
World Music in Film. 399
Zydeco 411

I HATE WORLD MUSIC

I hate the term "world music." That's probably why I have been singled out to write about it. OK, I'm not stupid, I realize that it commonly refers to non-Western music of any and all sorts . . . popular music, traditional music, classical music, and any other categories that might be lying around. It ranges from the most blatantly commercial (in their terms) Hindi film music to the ultra-cosmopolitan art-pop of Brazil; from a former state-run folkloric choir with arrangements done by classically trained composers to norteño songs glorifying drug dealers.

This means, of course, that the term "world music" itself is inherently Euro-, even Anglocentric. The term means, to many people, anything that is not sung in English . . . or doesn't fit into the Anglo-Western pop universe this year. Next year, who knows. That's a lot of stuff. Hence the thickness of this book. In the Victorian tradition of the great dictionary makers, bizarre museum builders, and object categorizers, we are now attempting to classify all of that which we might define as music . . . from all over the world. Whew.

So, we find ourselves talking about 99 percent of the music on this planet: virtually all existing music—classical, traditional, commercial, experimental, and alternative pop—if it's not in English. That means Balinese gamelan (classical AND traditional), metal salsa (yes, it exists, and it's great!), Turkish transvestite pop singers, German techno with "exotic" samples, African guitar-pop bands, African field recordings, and Japanese formula-pop crap . . . and on and on. Virtually everything, like I said. Except English-language pop, folk, and dance music . . . although there is even some overlap there, but gimme a break; let's eliminate something!

So here we go, let's talk about . . . music.

Music is not necessarily all good. As in, not all good for you and not all made with integrity. In the first sense it can, and has, inspired a lot of wars, bloodshed, and mayhem . . . and personal psychological damage as well.

As ridiculous as they often sound, the conservative critics of rock and roll, and now of techno and rave, are not far off the mark, for music truly is, at its best, plenty subversive and dangerous. Hearing the right piece of music at the right time of your life can inspire radical change, destructive personal behavior, and fascist politics. Sometimes all at the same time. Even joy is dangerous at the right—or wrong—time. Certainly joy and ecstasy are dangerous politically, but they can be confusing personally as well.

On the other hand, music can inspire love, religious ecstasy, cathartic release, social bonding, and a glimpse of another dimension. A sense of another form of time . . . another kind of space . . . and another, better, universe. It heals a broken heart, explains and sympathizes, offers a shoulder to cry on and a friend when no one else understands.

But enough about me.

There is some terrific music being made all over the world. One would hope so . . . it would be strange to imagine, as many multinational corporations seem to, that Western pop holds the copyright on musical creativity. No, the fact is, more is probably going on outside the Western pop tradition than inside it. So much incredible noise is happening that we'll never exhaust it. For example, there are guitar bands in Africa that can be, if you let them, as inspiring and transporting as any kind of rock, pop, soul, funk, or disco you grew up with. But you must have an inkling of that, or you wouldn't be reading this. You must already have heard something that made you realize there is so much great stuff out there, that to restrict yourself to only English-language pop is like deciding to eat the same meal for the rest of your life. The "no-surprise surprise," as the Holiday Inn chain claims, which is reassuring, I guess, but lacks some kick. Sure, sometimes you just wanna watch TV and fall asleep . . .

x i hate world music

. . . But there are other times when you want to be transported to somewhere special, with someone or by yourself, and get your mind around some stuff it never encountered before, feel feelings that you don't completely understand, and stay there for a while. Look around. Fall in love.

That's why you've picked up this book.

This interest in music not like that made in our own little villages (Dumbarton, Scotland, and Arbutus, Maryland, in my case) is not cultural tourism, because once you've let something in, let it grab hold of you, you're forever changed. Of course, you can listen and remain unaffected, unmoved—like a tourist. Your loss.

But in fact, after listening to some of this music for a while, it probably won't seem "exotic" anymore, even if you still don't understand all the words. Thinking of things as exotic is only cool when it's your sister, co-worker, or wife—it's nice to exoticize that which has become overly familiar. But in other circumstances viewing people and cultures as exotic is a distancing effect that too often allows for exploitation and racism. Maybe it's naive, but I would love to believe that once one grows to love some aspect of a culture, its music for instance, one can never again think of those people as less than oneself. I would like to imagine that if I am deeply moved by a song originating from some place other than my own hometown, then I have in some way shared an experience with the people of that culture. I can identify in some small way. Not that I will ever experience music exactly the same as those who make it. I'm not Hank Williams, or even Hank Jr., but I can still love his music and be moved by it. Doesn't mean I gotta live like him. Or get as fucked up as he did—or as much as the late, great flamenco singer Camarón de la Isla, for that matter. That's what art does; it communicates the vibe, the feeling, the attitude . . . and we don't have to go through all the shit the artist did to get it. On the other hand, I know plenty of racists who love "soul" music, rap, and R&B . . . so dream on, Dave.

The "authenticity" issue is such a weird can of worms. Westerners get obsessed with it. They agonize over which is the "true" music, the real deal. It always comes up. I myself would like to question the authenticity of some of the new-age ethno-fusion shit that's out there, but I also know that to rule out everything I personally abhor would be to rule out the possibility of a future miracle. I don't have to listen to all of it, but I don't feel a need to prohibit it either. Everybody knows the world has two types of music. My kind, and everyone else's. And even my kind ain't always so great.

What is considered authentic today was probably some kind of bastard fusion a few years ago. I don't think the Police would ever qualify as an "authentic" reggae band . . . but does it matter? An all-Japanese salsa orchestra's record was #1 on the salsa charts in the U.S.—did the salseros care? No, most loved the songs and were frankly amazed. So, in my humble opinion, we can make no rules as far as music goes. Fela Kuti, the great Nigerian musical mastermind, was as influenced by Miles and Coltrane as he was by African grooves. . . . OK, maybe that one seems natural. But check this: Mr. Juju himself, King Sunny Adé, namechecks country & western crooner Jim Reeves as an influence. True. Rumor has it that the famous Balinese monkey chant was coordinated and choreographed by a German! The first South African pop record I bought was all tunes with American car race themes—Indy 500 and the like. Sound effects too. So let's forget about this authenticity bugaboo. I'm sorry I even brought it up. If one is transported by the music, then knowing that the creators had open ears can only add to the enjoyment.

Maybe that's where this book comes in. I myself find that knowing a little more about the artist who wrote or recorded one of my favorite songs only intensifies the listening and dancing experience. And often a little information such as that provided here can help a fan sniff out some other sounds of interest nearby. Not by following a load of hype and marketing muscle, but by venturing further down a path of musical pleasure.

David Byrne's exploration of world musics with Talking Heads and as a solo artist gave many Americans their first taste of styles from outside the U.S. Byrne helped popularize African, Latin, and other sounds in his own work, and then went on to be a major patron of his inspirations, forming the prominent and influential Luaka Bop world-music label and helping to launch the Stateside careers of Zap Mama, Tom Zé, Margareth Menezes, Cornershop, and many more. He is one of this country's most important advocates of world music—whether he hates it or not.

WORLD MUSIC: THE REAL ALTERNATIVE

by angélique kidjo

By definition, one would think every music made in the world is "world" music. It's not! But then, I wouldn't want people to think that world music is the music of the "rest" of the world, apart from England and America, or even that it's Third World music.

Whatever its meaning, this new label (for a genre that's not new: Miriam Makeba is a perfect example of a world-music artist from the '60s who succeeded in the '60s) promotes a huge variety of sounds. From griots to high-tech sound designers, all these musics prove you can be different; you don't have to be "mainstream" to express yourself and touch people all over the world.

The core of the genre is, I guess, traditional music, because that's what creates the differences between every culture and influences the style of the artists. But tradition is not an end. Critics generally want a musician from a foreign country to stick to a pure tradition; he has to be "authentic." That's not considering him as an artist but as an animal in a zoo. You would not ask Bono from U2 to sing just Irish folk music!

The most thrilling part of world music, beyond the instruments and the techniques—which MusicHound World presents in detail—is the personality of the artists themselves. While reading the entries you'll discover that Cesaria Evora, for example, sings in a particular language with a special kind of music, but first of all she is Cesaria: a unique human being whose voice carries an emotion that can cross any frontier.

Believe me, music in the world is so rich. When I travel in my own country, every village has its own rhythms, its own songs; imagine what it means when you're talking about so many countries and five continents. So I hope this book will help you not to get lost and to have a better idea of the diversity that is just waiting to be heard. You will find the "old school"—for instance, E.T. Mensah, the king of highlife music, who used to make me dance as a little girl—and you have the new generation like Talvin Singh. But there's so much more: imagine, in the same book you can find Antonio Carlos Jobim, Nustrat Fateh Ali Khan, and Bob Marley!

I've got one wish: I hope 10 years from now that this book, quite thick already, will double, triple in size with thousands of new artists who will emerge from every country of the world, letting us discover sounds and emotions no one could have imagined.

Angélique Kidjo is perhaps the reigning queen of world music, breaking barriers in her own art and all across the pop market. Her unique synthesis of the traditional sounds of her native Benin with state-of-the-art technology and an up-to-date spectrum of other styles has made her one of the best-regarded performers in world music—and all music. She is known to U.S. listeners for high-profile crossovers like her recent appearances on the Lilith Fair tour, and has made inroads virtually unprecedented for an African artist in America. In Kidjo world music finds one of its most eloquent ambassadors.

THE WORLD IN TUNE

by adam mcgovern

A popular Western commercial jingle of the Cold War years went, "I'd like to teach the world to sing/In perfect harmony." Since then, at a faster and faster pace, the world has been singing back—and the book you're holding arrives at a time when more people than ever are realizing and welcoming the fact that it takes two to teach.

Most of us can clearly remember when it wasn't so. What is now known loosely as world music was once (and still is) the multiple sound of many "old" worlds streaming amongst each other and into the "new" one, as waves of immigration and eras of colonization shaped the modern era. The voluntary and compulsory immigrants to the Americas took their music with them as a companion and comfort in an often inhospitable new land—and as their descendants moved into a later, general American society (or hoped to, or tried), this music frequently became an unwelcome reminder of even harder times. The drive for upward mobility in both the privileged and struggling classes made "world" music, music rooted in distant cultural soils, a discarded symbol of rudiments rather than a prized example of essence.

Today our ears are opening back up. As people of all backgrounds in the former colonial powers weary of strife, and ancient hostilities rage through the former colonies of both market empires and totalitarian spheres, there is a growing impulse to bolster cultural pride while encouraging cultural sharing.

MusicHound World aims to provide a roadmap to this common ground. It is first and foremost a story book, telling tales of lives you'll both recognize and marvel at, introducing legends you've never heard of and revealing the down-to-earth people at their core. It is a series of history lessons that enliven the present day, a travelogue to a world you live in but may not know. Most of all, MusicHound World is an open book: although it's a tool for expanding horizons while it shrinks distances, the directions it sets you on are all your own.

That's the value of this unwieldy but refreshingly un-limitable thing called world music. The proliferation of unfamiliar and unclassifiable sounds under that umbrella make it the truest of "alternative" musics—and unlike either the "alternative" or "classic" styles of our mainstream marketplace, in world music too many different things are going on for any rules to ever set in. True, in one way it's still a term that shuts out—"world" music can mean every music that's not by "us." But in another way it's a catch-all that allows the kind of unregimented music-loving that so many Americans yearn for in an era of rigid radio formats and Top-40 sameness. As David Byrne points out in his foreword, the "world music" menu takes in each country's pop, folkloric, classical, and other traditions—and in how many other books will you find all of those together nowadays?

One of the few generalizations that can be made about world music is that it takes primary inspiration from sounds that stretch back to the dawn of humanity, while often pressing forward into others never before imagined; as such it is, above all, music about eternal beginnings.

World music is a for-the-ages form being spread by up-to-the-minute technology—and yet world music is a form that suggests that if our technology didn't exist it might not be necessary to invent it: consider the synthesizer-like tone of the Australian Aboriginal didgeridoo, or (without even any instrument!) the miraculous "throat-singing" of Central Asian Tuva. Millennia before the stereo and the satellite dish, entertainment was communal and had to be homegrown. These are qualities that many have never stopped valuing; from the African campfire drum circle to the Canadian Celtic "kitchen party," world music has always offered do-it-yourself spectacle that engages all the senses—a built-in appeal of the "world" genre that is right in time for our modern multimedia appetites.

As traditional cultures embrace the future and younger societies dig for their roots, the two meet halfway on the world-music turntable. With this many sounds, the world may never sing in perfect harmony. But with this much to choose from, the contrast can be music to our ears.

So how do you use MusicHound World? Here's what you'll find in the entries, and what we intend to accomplish with each point:

• Of course there's the headline listing of artists' and bands' names and birth information, and band members (with years of service and instruments played). In this book you'll also find information on where artists are currently based and what countries all band members are from—the sometimes wide range among band members' cultures, and the distance between where individual artists come from and where they've gotten to, can tell a lot about how small the world is becoming and how far its musicians' styles are expanding. MusicHound World also lists each artist's or band's genre(s)—not to box and label their creativity, but to give the reader a frame of reference and a touchstone for investigating like-minded artists.

• Then there's the introductory paragraph, which will give you not only biographical information but also a sense of the artist's or band's sound and their stature and significance in the world-music—and overall music—pantheon. Next come the "buyer's guide" sections:

• what to buy: The album or albums that we feel are essential purchases for consuming this act. It may be a greatest hits set, or it may be a particular album that captures the essence of the artist in question. In any event, this is where you should start—and don't think it wasn't hard to make these choices when eyeballing the catalogs of Fela Kuti, Celia Cruz, Fairport Convention, or some of the other world-music titans. Note that for acts with a limited catalog, what's available may take the place of what to buy and the other sections.

• what to buy next: In other words, once you're hooked, these will be the most rewarding next purchases.

• what to avoid: This category could include albums the world would be better off without, or it may designate work that newcomers to the particular artist are better off saving for later. Checking the bone ratings (about which, more below)—and of course the writer's comments—usually makes it clear whether we're saying "avoid this forever, and cover your ears if anybody plays it in your vicinity," or merely indicating that it's "for completists."

• the rest: Everything else that's available for this act, beyond the most notably good, bad, and rare, rated with the Hound's trusty bone scale. Note that for some artists with sizable catalogs, we've condensed this section down to best of the rest.

• worth searching for: An out-of-print gem. A bootleg. A guest appearance on another artist's album or a film soundtrack. Work in other media (books, film, academia). Something that may require some looking but will reward you for the effort. You'll see a bit more of this section in MusicHound World than in many of the other books in the series, since our subject matter is so far-flung. World-music albums can go in and out of print with some rapidity, but every day more is becoming available and staying that way. This book's entries are still geared toward making it easy for you to find albums rather than lose your sanity; the series' focus is on recordings on CD, in print, and available in the USA—we just don't want you to miss any other treasures.

• ⏮: The crucial influences on this act's music.

• ⏭: The acts that have been influenced by this artist or group. Used only where applicable; it's a little early for Anoushka Shankar or Ricky Martin to have influenced anybody.

Speaking of not wanting you to miss any good music, in this book we've expanded the series' usual list of compilation albums to a whole section of reviews. Collections like these are still the best way for listeners in America to enjoy certain international stars, not to mention the only way to hear the great (and often anonymous) traditional musicians of many cultures. The Compilations section is organized alphabetically by region ("Africa" at the beginning, "International" at the end); albums under each heading are organized alphabetically by title (country or countries covered are handily listed right beneath the titles).

Now, you ask, what's with those bones? It's simple—𓃰𓃰𓃰𓃰𓃰 is nirvana (not Nirvana), a woof! is dog food. Keep in mind that the bone ratings don't pertain just to the act's own catalog, but to its worth in the whole music realm. Therefore a lesser act's what to buy choice might rate no more than 𓃰𓃰𓃰; some even rate 𓃰𓃰, a not-so-subtle sign that you might want to think twice about that act. Note that for recent releases that were not available to be reviewed before press time, "N/A" will appear instead of a bone rating.

As with any opinions, all of what you're about to read is subjective and personal. There's no such thing as bad publicity, and nothing is more boring than a critic with whom you always agree (especially if you make sure to go out and buy everything he or she hates!). Ultimately, though, we think the Hound will point you in the right direction, and if you buy the 𓃰𓃰𓃰𓃰𓃰 and 𓃰𓃰𓃰𓃰 choices, you'll have an album collection to howl about. But if you've got a bone to pick, the Hound wants to hear about it—and promises not to bite (but maybe bark a little bit). If you think we're wagging our tails in the wrong direction or lifting our leg at something that doesn't deserve it, let us know. If you think an act has been capriciously excluded—or charitably included—tell us. Your comments and suggestions will serve the greater MusicHound audience and future projects, so don't be shy.

MusicHound World acknowledges the many organizations that have opened the world's musical borders. After this book introduces you to the artists the international scene has to offer, you can experience them all the better through the following groups, which are among the leading ones Stateside and worldwide that present performances, publish CD/cassette catalogs, provide educational offerings and research resources, and otherwise promote the enjoyment and understanding of world music. And don't forget to check out the books, magazines, Web sites, record labels, concert venues, and radio stations in the Resources section at the back of the book.

Midem Americas
25 Park Ave, 24th Fl.
New York, NY 10017 USA
Tel: (212) 370-7470
Fax: (212) 370-7471
Web site: www.midem.com

North American Folk Music and Dance Alliance
Washington, DC 20036 USA
Tel: (202) 835-FOLK (3655)
Fax: (202) 835-3656
e-mail: fa@folk.org
Web site: www.folk.org

WOMAD (World of Music, Arts & Dance), USA
PO Box 9750
Seattle, WA 98109 USA
Fax: (206) 281-7799
e-mail: info@onereel.org
Web sites: www.onereel.org www.womadusa.com

WOMAD, England
Millside
Mill Lane, Box, Nr Corsham
Wiltshire SN13 8PN
UK
Tel: 44 1225 744494
Fax: 44 1225 743481
e-mail: womad@realworld.on.net
Web site: realworld.on.net/womad

WOMEX (The Worldwide Music Expo)
Carmerstr. 11
D-10623 Berlin Germany
e-mail: info@womex.de Web site: www.womex.de

World Music Institute
New York, NY 10001-6936 USA
Tel: (212) 545-7536
e-mail: WMI@HearTheWorld.org
Web site: www.HearTheWorld.org

Editor

Adam McGovern has written on every genre of music imaginable—and some inconceivable, which is what he likes best. He has plied this trade for Smug, COVER, B-Side, Raygun, Yahoo! Internet Life, Rock & Rap Confidential, the AlterWorld and Total TV Web sites, and a host of other outlets with similarly lax background checks. A childhood with more relocations than Dr. Richard Kimble gave him a lifelong taste for the rootless variety of world music. He was not raised by wolves as is widely believed, though his parents considered it regularly and still wonder if it's not too late. McGovern has published some of the earliest mainstream features in this country on major world artists like Angélique Kidjo, Zap Mama, and Boukman Eksperyans, as well as the groundbreaking Africa Fête tour. The panoramic cultural view needed for a volume on world music has been fortified by his writings on all other artforms, and his curation of international art exhibits in New York City, not to mention his effortless ability to sit back and be a Russian-German-Romanian-Irish Jew. McGovern comes to the MusicHound World project from baptisms by Rock and Lounge in the same series. He lives in New Jersey with his partner, Lynn, until their cat Mishka gets tired of them.

Series Editor

Gary Graff is an award-winning music journalist and series editor of the MusicHound album guides. A native of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, his work is published regularly by Reuters, Guitar World, ICE, the San Francisco Chronicle, the Cleveland Plain Dealer, the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, Michigan's Oakland Press, SW Radio Networks, Country Song Roundup, and other publications. A regular contributor to the Web site Mr. Showbiz/Wall of Sound, his weekly "Rock 'n' Roll Insider" report airs on Detroit rock station WRIF-FM (101.1). He also appears on public TV station WTVS's Backstage Pass program and is a founding board member of the Music Critics Organization and co-producer of the annual Detroit Music Awards. He lives in the Detroit suburbs with his wife, daughter, and two stepsons.

Managing Editor

Judy Galens is a senior editor at Visible Ink Press. She edited books on such disparate subjects as baseball, inventing, weather, and food festivals before hitting her stride with the MusicHound series. She lives in the Detroit area with her husband and their son, Graham, who enjoys kicking back to the sounds of Virginia Rodrigues, the Klezmatics, and the Buena Vista Social Club.

Associate Managing Editor

Dean Dauphinais is an obsessive-compulsive senior editor at Visible Ink Press and the managing editor of several MusicHound titles. Although he considers himself a neophyte when it comes to world music, Antonio Carlos Jobim and Djavan are two of his favorite artists. Dauphinais lives la vida loca in suburban Detroit and thinks his wife, Kathy, and two sons, Sam and Josh, are out of this world.

Photo Editors

Jack and Linda Vartoogian's planet-ranging photographic, music, and dance interests couldn't find a more appropriate platform than MusicHound World. Even after 35 years of living in New York City, where all things performance arrive sooner or later (and where they are staff photographers for the World Music Institute), the Vartoogians continue to search for the best of the musical, the theatrical, or the choreographed—the farther from home the better. A glance at the range of periodicals to which they regularly contribute suggests some of the breadth of their interests: the New York Times, the Village Voice, Time, New York, the Oxford American, Pulse!, Living Blues, JazzTimes, Jazziz, and Dance Magazine, to name only a few. As for books, there is Jack's Afropop! (Chartwell Books, 1995) as well as Jack and Linda's The Living World of Dance (Smithmark, 1997) and How to Look at Dance with Walter Terry (Morrow, 1982). Last but far from least, they have contributed to dozens of other music and dance books, including almost every MusicHound volume in print. Jack and Linda may be reached by e-mail at jack@frontrowphotos.com or linda@frontrowphotos.com. At their Web site (www.frontrowphotos.com), soon to be operational as this book goes to print, interested readers may travel through the Vartoogian's virtual world of images on their own.

Copy Editors
Barbara Cohen, Diane L. Dupuis, Christina Fuoco, Stacy Meyn, Pamela Shelton, Devra Sladics

Publisher
Martin Connors

MusicHound Staff
Michelle Banks, Christa Brelin, Jim Craddock, Jeff Hermann, Justin Karr, Diane Maniaci, Brad Morgan, Matt Nowinski, Carol Schwartz, Christine Tomassini

Proofreading
Jane Hoehner, Terri Schell

Art Direction
Tracey Rowens, Michelle DiMercurio, Cindy Baldwin

Graphic Services
Randy Bassett, Robert Duncan, Pam Reed, Barbara Yarrow

Permissions
Sarah Chesney

Production
Mary Beth Trimper, Dorothy Maki, Evi Seoud, Rita Wimberley

Technology Wizards
Jeffrey Muhr, Wayne Fong

Typesetting Virtuoso
Marco Di Vita of the Graphix Group

Marketing & Promotion
PJ Butland, Marilou Carlin, Kim Marich, Lauri Taylor, Betsy Rovegno

MusicHound Development
Julia Furtaw

Contributors
Karen Ashbrook plays hammered dulcimer, Irish flute, and pennywhistle. She has several recordings on the Maggie's Music label; a music book from Mel Bay Publications; and an instructional book/tape set for Irish music on dulcimer from Oak Publications. Her Irish book has become a classic tutorial of the dulcimer literature in America. Karen performs and records with the Celtic women's trio Ceoltoiri, and also plays Jewish and contra dance music. Her private lessons in Silver Spring, Maryland, and week-long classes at Common Ground, Augusta Arts Center, and other camps around the country are very popular.

Robert Baird is music editor of Stereophile Magazine in Santa Fe, New Mexico, and a contributor to MusicHound Country and MusicHound Folk.

Andrew BeDell lives in bucolic Mahwah, New Jersey, and is a freelance writer and editor who specializes in music and popular culture. For many years he edited muckraking columnist Jack Anderson while writing his own syndicated column about TV (trying hard not to confuse fact with fiction). Most recently he worked as a feature writer and pop music reviewer for the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Ari Bendersky is an editor with JAMTV and the Rolling Stone Network. When he's not busy chasing down music news scoops, he can generally be found scarfing sushi, listening to the Grateful Dead, or ironically dodging city traffic on his mountain bike.

PJ Birosik (musikintl@aol.com) is owner of Musik International (the leading full-service marketing and promotion company for alternative forms of music since 1977); reviews music, video, and books for 28 publications; is the recipient of two gold records for promotion; is listed in Who's Who in Entertainment; is a member of NARAS and AFIM; and is a past Board of Directors member for Los Angeles Women in Music.

Philip Booth is a freelance writer, musician, and DJ (WUSF-FM) based in Tampa, Florida. He has written for Option, Billboard, Spin, Salon, Down Beat, Jazziz, Guitar World, JazzTimes, and a variety of daily and weekly newspapers. Booth gets his world-beat fix at Reggae Sunsplash, the New Orleans Jazz and Heritage Festival, and Skipper's Smokehouse and the Tropical Heatwave festival in Tampa.

Hank Bordowitz has written about music and 'temporary culture for over two decades now. For a dozen years, he wrote the "Cosmopolitan" column in Jazziz, covering the noise of the world. These days, he programs the world-music channel for Music Choice digital cable radio, as well as contributing articles and reviews to dozens of magazines ranging from Playboy to Brutarian. He also authored the tome Bad Moon Rising: The Unauthorized History of Creedence Clearwater Revival.

Iris Brooks specializes in cultural reporting. Her musical adventures include folk drumming with untouchables on the roof of a mud hut in Benares, India; a pennywhistle serenade for penguins in Antarctica; and a "sound safari" concert with the birds of Zimbabwe while paddling down the Zambezi River. She has served as editor for EAR magazine, the New York Philharmonic, and the Lincoln Center Festival. Over 100 of her music and arts articles have appeared in a variety of magazines.

Ken Burke is a singer/songwriter who has contributed to several MusicHound volumes in addition to serving up reviews and features for the likes of Blues Access, Blues Suede News, Original Cool, Little Rhino Gazette, Texas Jamboree, and Outer Shell. Only one year after its debut, sales figures for Burke's album Arizona Songs have reached double digits!

Salvatore Caputo is a freelance music writer living in Tempe, Arizona, with his wife and three kids. His interest in world music was sparked primarily by his immigrant father's Italian record collection, and a college ethnomusicology course in which he learned to love and play Indonesian gamelan.

Heidi Cerrigione is a traditional musician and freelance writer from Ellington, Connecticut. She plays autoharp, hammered dulcimer, and mountain dulcimer and performs with her husband, John, as the duo Cabin Fever; with a contra dance band called Heart's Ease; and with Doofus, a non-contra band with no discernible agenda. She contributes regularly to the Autoharp Clearinghouse Magazine and typesets music for various publications. She recently published her first book, 30 Old Time Songs and Tunes for Autoharp and Mountain Dulcimer, co-written with her partner in Doofus, Neal Walters.

Thor Christensen is the pop music critic for the Dallas Morning News and has written for Spin, Billboard, and other music publications. He blows a lame blues harmonica.

Martin Connors has contributed to a variety of MusicHound and VideoHound books, and he is especially fond of Celtic music and that country/folk/alternative/guitar-strumming/high-lonesome sound emanating from a lot of places, but especially Texas. He is thankful for the Ark in Ann Arbor, Michigan; his access to Canadian radio and television; and great record stores on land and on the Web.

Cary Darling is an entertainment editor at the Orange County Register, where he writes a weekly world and dance music column.

Jim DeRogatis is the pop music critic at the Chicago Sun-Times and the author of Kaleidoscope Eyes: Psychedelic Rock from the '60s to the '90s and a forthcoming biography of the late rock critic Lester Bangs.

Kerry Dexter is a freelance writer/editor, photographer, and television and radio producer. Her work has appeared in Dirty Linen, Bluegrass Unlimited, Crossroads, Tapestry, and other print and electronic media. She is based in Florida.

Josh Freedom du Lac was born on Haight Street three years and two full seasons after the Summer of Love and has grown to hate patchouli oil, drum-n-space music, questions about his middle name, and one-dimensional wines. The co-editor of MusicHound R&B and a budding cork dork, du Lac has been the pop music critic for the Sacramento Bee since 1994—incidentally, a great year for California Cabernet Sauvignon.

Daniel Durchholz is co-editor of MusicHound Rock and writes for numerous magazines, newspapers, and Web publications. He lives in St. Louis with his wife and four children.

Michael Eldridge teaches literature and culture "behind the redwood curtain" at Humboldt State University in Arcata, California—where a crack local steelband and a nearby village named Trinidad don't quite compensate for the fact that classes start before Labor Day, making it virtually impossible to attend Brooklyn Carnival.

Bill Ellis is music writer for the Memphis Commercial Appeal daily newspaper. He has a master's degree in classical guitar performance from the University of Cincinnati—College Conservatory of Music, and is a professional acoustic blues guitarist with several recordings; his latest is The Full Catastrophe. Bill also performs with his father, banjo player and former Bill Monroe sideman Tony Ellis. Bill spent over five years in Japan teaching English, writing for the Japan Times, and playing gigs. He has traveled extensively as a musician and tourist, including visits to Indonesia, Egypt, New Zealand, a USIA tour of Central America, and a recent month-long stay in Morocco for his newspaper.

Banning Eyre has been writing about music, especially African music, since 1988. His work has appeared in the Boston Phoenix, Billboard, Guitar Player, Rhythm magazine, Folk Roots, and Sing Out! as well as on National Public Radio's Afropop Worldwide and All Things Considered. He is the co-author of Afropop! An Illustrated Guide to African Music (Chartwell, 1995), and the author of In Griot Time: An American Guitarist in Mali (Temple University Press, 2000). He is presently at work on a cultural biography of Thomas Mapfumo and the Blacks Unlimited from Zimbabwe.

John C. Falstaff once lived across the canal from the National Stadium in Dublin, where he frequently seized the opportunity to see acts such as Thin Lizzy, Horslips, Alan Stivell, and even Focus, but drew the line at Slade and Status Quo. Despite this, he went on to live a productive life in Atlanta, where he now hosts Georgia's only Celtic music radio show, on WRFG Atlanta (89.3 FM), and writes on all sorts of music for Creative Loafing locally and Dirty Linen nationally. Globally he can be read at http://www.pd.org/~jcf, and complained to at jcf@pd.org.

Christina Fuoco, the former music writer for the Observer & Eccentric newspapers in Livonia, Michigan, is now the senior content producer for Detroit.CitySearch.Com. She's addicted to working on MusicHound books and also freelances for Allstar, Michigan's Flint Journal, and CDnow.

Lawrence Gabriel is a Detroit-based writer, poet, and musician who is also editor of Detroit's Metro Times.

David Galens is the editor of the Gale Group's Drama for Students and Study Guides to Great Literature print series. He is also a freelance journalist and the guitarist/composer for the Detroit-based band the Civilians.

Ron Garmon is a music and film critic living in Los Angeles. He is consulting editor of RetroVision and his work has appeared in The Tracking Angle, Cult Movies, and Scarlet Street, among other publications. He claims no moral authority whatsoever.

Helen Giano is a music writer for Smug magazine.

Andrew Gilbert is a Bay Area–based writer who contributes regularly to the San Diego Union-Tribune, Contra Costa Times, East Bay Express, and the online magazine Salon. His writing on jazz has also appeared in the Los Angeles Reader, the Los Angeles View, the San Jose Metro, the Santa Cruz County Sentinel, Musician, and Jazziz. Born and raised in Los Angeles, Gilbert was first exposed to jazz at the Kuumbwa Jazz Center in Santa Cruz, California. For two years in the mid-'90s he was manager of the Jazz Bakery Performance Space in L.A. He is currently working on a documentary on the singer Weslia Whitfield. He can be reached at jazzscribe@aol.com.

Simon Glickman is the lead singer and lyricist for the L.A. band Spanish Kitchen. He has written for MusicHound Rock, MusicHound R&B, MusicHound Folk, Contemporary Musicians, Uncommon Heroes, Entertainment Today, Rockrgrl, and other publications, and served as co-editor of Native North American Biography.

Gary Pig Gold, a proud contributor to MusicHound Rock, MusicHound Country, MusicHound R&B, MusicHound Folk, MusicHound Swing, and even MusicHound Lounge, divides time in his Hoboken, New Jersey, home between writing his syndicated-all-over-the-place "Pigshit" column; running his own little record company; producing power-pop records for Shane Faubert and the Dave Rave Conspiracy; performing in his "maximum rhythm 'n' bluegrass" combo the Ghost Rockets; and listening intently to how very much Robert Plant actually sounds just like that one-and-only diva of Arabic song, Umm Kulthum.

Alex Gordon is a contributor to MusicHound Lounge, a former associate editor of Inside Sports magazine, and the co-author of the book College: The Best Five Years of Your Life, published by Hysteria Press and available in finer bookstores.

Gary Graff is the creator and series editor of MusicHound (see above).

David Greenberger has been publishing The Duplex Planet since 1979. His commentaries and music reviews are heard regularly on National Public Radio's All Things Considered.

Ben Greenman is a journalist whose work has appeared in Rolling Stone, Wired, the Village Voice, TimeOut New York, Miami New Times, the Chicago Reader, Yahoo! Internet Life (where he is now executive editor), and other publications. He is also the author or co-author of 10 books, including NetMusic: Your Guide to the Music Scene in Cyberspace (Michael Wolff and Company), and a contributor to Alt.Culture: An A-to-Z Guide to the '90s (HarperCollins).

Jason Gross, the short version: Freelance scribe for the Village Voice, Spin, and other rags; editor/perpetrator of Perfect Sound Forever online magazine (http://www.furious.com/perfect); besieged by CDs from every record company on God's earth (and other places); desperately in need of sleep and/or ammo. Any questions?

William Hanson works for the Mott Foundation in Flint, Michigan.

Craig Harris has been writing about non-mainstream music since 1971. His work appears regularly in the Boston Globe, the Middlesex News, Dirty Linen, and Folk Roots. The author/photographer of The New Folk Music, published by White Cliffs Media in 1991, he is also an accomplished percussionist, and has appeared with Rod MacDonald, Geoff Bartley, Anni Clark, Chuck Brodsky, Dewey Burns, Ellis Paul, Merl Saunders, and Rick Danko. Harris's photographs have been featured on CD and video covers for Robin Williamson, Greg Greenway, Barbara Kessler, the Jazz Futures, and the Greenwich Village Folk Festival. He is a music teacher at the Somerville Charter School in Somerville, Massachusetts.

Alex Henderson is a Philadelphia-based journalist, entertainment critic, and technical writer whose work has appeared in Billboard, Spin, Pulse!, Jazziz, HITS, CD Review, JazzTimes, Cash Box, and many other national publications. His taste in music ranges widely, and he has written liner notes and/or bios for Rhino, Island, MCA, Concord Jazz, Del-Fi, and countless other labels. Henderson now divides his time between music criticism and technical writing; in addition to contributing over 3,000 reviews to the All Music Guide since 1996, he has written many press releases for Vision X Software and Big Mouth Media (http://visionx.com/bigmouth), a company specializing in public relations for software developers.

Geoffrey Himes writes about music on a regular basis for the Washington Post, Replay, New Country, and Country Music. He contributed to The Blackwell Guide to Recorded Country Music, The Rolling Stone Jazz & Blues Album Guide, and The Country Music Foundation Encyclopedia. He has also written about music for Down Beat, Request, National Public Radio, No Depression, Fi Magazine, Crawdaddy!, Musician, Sing Out!, the Baltimore Sun, and the Patuxent Newspapers. He lives in Baltimore with his wife, Elizabeth Cusick.

Steve Holtje is co-editor of MusicHound Jazz and an editor at CDnow.

Aaron Howard is the Arts & Entertainment writer for the Jewish Herald-Voice, a contributing writer for Houston Sidewalk, and the former music editor of Inside Houston magazine. He is able to indulge his keen interest in both Jewish and Indian culture at the city's only kosher Indian restaurant. Who would have guessed that deep in the heart of Texas is a huge immigrant community that supports an amazing diversity of live ethnic musics?

Stephen Ide is a graphic designer who in his spare time is a writer, photographer, guitarist, and harmonica player. He pens a monthly folk records review column for the Patriot Ledger in Quincy, Massachusetts; contributes articles, reviews, and photographs to publications including the New England Folk Almanac, Dirty Linen, and Bluegrass Unlimited; and is the webmaster for the Rose Garden Coffeehouse in Mansfield, Massachusetts.

Jazzbo is Joseph Monish Patel, a San Francisco–based music journalist and writer who contributes to several print and Internet publications, including Rap Pages, The Source, URB, Raygun, and Mr. Showbiz.

Isaac Josephson is communities manager at Tunes.com; producer of Downbeatjazz.com; and the co-founder of Centerstage Chicago. In his spare time he avoids his past, incurs parking fines, and spends his money in bicycle shops.

Chris King (brodog@hoobellatoo.org) teaches African literature; writes about world music, literature, politics, and folklore; plays in an eclectic folk band, Three Fried Men; observes the Native American ritual ways of prayer; and works with a documentary collective, Hoobellatoo, specializing in the work of overlooked world elders (check out his field recordings of merchant marine songsters, tribal drummers, and Missouri spirit mediums at www.hoobellatoo.org and www.skunty.com). He has been called "dog" and "chief" in two African languages.

Steve Kiviat is an Alexandria, Virginia–based contributor to the Washington City Paper and other publications.

Steve Knopper, editor of MusicHound Lounge and MusicHound Swing, knows one non-English expression: "Il y a un cheval sur la table." It's French. He has written for Rolling Stone, George, Musician, Newsday, Billboard, Request, the Chicago Tribune, and many other publications.

Nancy Ann Lee is enjoying a second career as a freelance music journalist and photographer. She co-edited and contributed some photos to MusicHound Jazz and has written for MusicHound Swing and the forthcoming MusicHound Classical. Lee regularly reviews world-music, classical, and jazz albums for the CDnow Web site. For more than a decade she has been a regular JazzTimes reviewer, and has written about music for various other magazines and local alternative weekly newspapers. She is based in Cleveland.

Marty Lipp writes a world-music column for Newsday and has written for the New York Times, Details, New York magazine, the Beat, Rhythm magazine, and the Rootsworld.com Web site. He is currently working on his first novel.

Bret Love is the managing editor at INsite Magazine, where he dreams of one day visiting all the countries whose music he writes about. In addition to spending what little spare time he has as a freelance writer and photographer who has contributed to Rolling Stone Online, Drink, and Jezebel, he's also an amateur musician, and wishes like hell that he could play a fraction of the exotic instruments he collects.

John Lupton is a native of Wilmington, Delaware. In addition to his work as a contributing writer for Sing Out! magazine, he is a longtime board member and current president of the Brandywine Friends of Old Time Music, a Delaware-based organization that sponsors concerts and festivals, including the Delaware Valley Bluegrass Festival and the now-defunct Brandywine Mountain Music Convention. He is also a board member of the Green Willow Folk Club, which specializes in presenting Celtic and British artists in the Delaware area. Since 1989, he has been co-host of Rural Free Delivery, a weekly radio show featuring bluegrass, country, and old time music, broadcast over WVUD-FM 91.3, the non-commercial station owned and operated by the University of Delaware. Professionally, he works in computer network management and administration at the University of Pennsylvania in Philadelphia.

Elizabeth Lynch is an Evanston, Illinois, writer and novelist who has written for MusicHound Country, MusicHound Folk, MusicHound Rock, the Chicago Sun-Times, the Fort Lauderdale Sun-Sentinel, and Replay magazine.

Garaud MacTaggart is a Buffalo, New York–based freelance writer and editor whose first exposure to world music came from the old 78 rpm records played by his parents—"Blue Bells of Scotland" by his father and "Finlandia" by his mother. Since he took accordion lessons during his youth, MacTaggart also has a perverse interest in all manner of squeezeboxes. He worked for nearly two decades in music retail before deciding to write for a living. He is co-editor of the forthcoming MusicHound Classical, and is glad his wife Claudia doesn't think he can ever have too many albums.

Brian Mansfield has co-edited MusicHound Country and MusicHound Folk. He lives in Nashville, Tennessee, and is a senior editor for CDnow and the Nashville correspondent for USA Today. Mansfield writes regularly for ICE and CountryNow.com. His work has also appeared in Request, Pulse!, Country America, and Daily Variety.

Lynne Margolis has spent most of her career writing about music and other art forms. She created the pop music beat at the Tribune-Review in Pittsburgh before being named as the paper's first TV and radio writer. After realizing writing about TV turns one's brain into mush, she decided to go back to the music and is now a contributing editor at MusicDirect.com; a twice-weekly columnist at RadioDigest.com; and contributor to the Christian Science Monitor, the Creative Loafing Network, and other outlets. In other words, a freelancer. A happy one. She has contributed to MusicHound R&B, MusicHound Lounge, MusicHound Folk, MusicHound Swing and MusicHound Rock.

Sandy Masuo has written about a bewildering variety of music for a wide range of publications, including the Boston Phoenix, the Los Angeles Times, Musician, Rolling Stone, Raygun, and several online publications, including Allstar, MTV Online, and Launch. She is the associate editor at Request magazine and lives in Los Angeles with her anti-social cat, Spot.

Michaelangelo Matos is a freelance critic whose work can be read regularly in Minneapolis's City Pages, NY Press, Chicago Reader, Request, Creative Loafing Atlanta, Pulse of the Twin Cities, and Crawdaddy!. His "Monthly Mixtape" column can be accessed at Perfect Sound Forever online: www.furious.com/perfect/mixtape.html.

Cliff McGann is a Massachusetts-based musician, freelance writer, and folklorist. He gained a deep respect for Gaelic culture during the summers he spent on his grandparents' Nova Scotia farm. His love of traditional music led him to the Celtic Studies department at St. Francis Xavier University in Antigonish, Nova Scotia, and eventually to the Folklore department at Memorial University in Newfoundland, where he is completing his thesis on Cape Breton fiddler Dan R. MacDonald. He is a regular contributor to Celtic Heritage magazine and the Boston Irish Reporter.

Andre McGarrity is a 1995 screenwriting graduate from New York's prestigious School of Visual Arts, where he won the school's coveted Dusty Award for best screenplay. He currently works as creative editor for impact! interactive! inc., a Southfield, Michigan–based new-media company specializing in providing content for the Internet.

TJ McGrath is a co-founder of and contributing editor to Dirty Linen, a magazine featuring folk and world music. He also wrote and edited Fairport Fanatics, the first American newsletter devoted to English folk-rock and artists such as Fairport Convention, Sandy Denny, Richard Thompson, Nick Drake, and Iain Matthews. His freelance writing has also appeared in the magazines Trouser Press and Guitar Extra. He has written liner notes for albums by Jackson C. Frank and Scott Appel. He lives in a drafty cottage in Connecticut called Mole's End with his wife, four boys, and a cat named Lulu.

Chris Meloche is a jazz music fan, freelance writer, and struggling musician.

Kevin Meyer is a freelance writer (and frustrated wannabe drummer) who lives vicariously through the music he collects. A one-time college-rag music editor, Meyer is today a blues and roots-rock devotee who dreams of a Wilco/Dave Alvin collaboration and still pines for Luther Allison and the Long Ryders.

Stacy Meyn (spceltd@aol.com) is a media maven, covering music, movies, and martial arts for a plethora of magazines and

Web sites. In addition to favoring alliteration, she is also an editor, DJ, record producer, and radio programmer, as well as an investigative reporter of health issues. She resides in Alameda, California, where they used to keep the "nuclear wessels."

Sandy Miranda is a native of San Francisco who produces the popular Music of the World show on Wednesday mornings for KPFA-FM Pacifica Radio in Berkeley (and on www.kpfa.org). She is also a producer for Global Village, which is heard across Canada on CBC Radio One, at www.cbc.ca, and by shortwave all over the USA, Latin America, and the Caribbean. She is especially fond of old-time Hawaiian music, and you can often find her running around with a tape recorder at traditional music events in the islands (when she's not swimming around with the honu, a.k.a. green sea turtles). She has been known to write about music and culture for the San Francisco Chronicle, Rhythm magazine, Folk Roots, online music mags, and other nefarious publications, and has a handsome tabby named Elvis who likes to sing along with the Tuvans. Sandy likes to play guitar and Congolese goat-skin drums, but the shaker egg seems to be her one true instrument.

Jo Hughey Morrison is a Celtic harper and freelance writer whose work has appeared in MusicHound Folk, Folk Tales, Rambles, and the Folk Harp Journal. She has played harp at the Smithsonian, the U.S. Capitol, and Mount Vernon, and has taught popular harp classes at Common Ground. She released her debut solo recording, The Three Musics, in 1998.

Jeffrey Muhr is a freelance writer and musician who plays keyboards, drums, and guitar. His experiences in the latter field include training in Javanese music with the Friends of the Gamelan in Chicago, and a musical tour of Java and Bali. To pay the bills, he manages databases at the Gale Group and serves as Technology Wizard for the MusicHound series.

Chris Nickson is English and lives in Seattle, where he writes about roots music, both in print and online. He preaches the gospel of good beer and believes in the power of Leeds United.

Meredith Ochs is a writer/editor at Guitar World magazine, and slings a mean Telecaster for the twang-pop band Candy Jones. She has contributed to New York, the New York Press, the Boston Phoenix, and Salon, and hosts a weekly roots music program on legendary freeform radio WFMU (91.1 FM/www.wfmu.org).

David Okamoto is the music editor for the Dallas Morning News and a contributing editor to ICE magazine. His work has also appeared in CD Review, Rolling Stone, and Jazziz. In between writing for MusicHound Rock, MusicHound Lounge, MusicHound Folk, MusicHound Country, and MusicHound Jazz, he helped produce a compilation of Martin Mull's music for Razor & Tie Records. Really.

Allan Orski has written extensively for the MusicHound series, as well as Rolling Stone Online and a number of other publications, many of which have mysteriously gone belly-up shortly after Allan began writing for them. This, of course, is mere coincidence.

Dan Ouellette is a contributing writer for Down Beat, Stereophile, and the San Francisco Chronicle, and features editor for Schwann Spectrum.

Michael Parrish is associate professor of biological sciences at Northern Illinois University, with research focusing on dinosaurs and other extinct reptiles. He is also a freelance music writer who contributes to, among other publications, the Chicago Tribune, Dirty Linen, and Sing Out!

David Paul is a freelance journalist who has contributed interviews and articles on contemporary and world music to Performing Arts Journal, Seconds magazine, All Music Guide, and the Eugene Weekly.

Bob Paxman is a Nashville-based entertainment journalist whose works have appeared in MusicHound R&B, MusicHound Folk, Country Weekly, Billboard, TV Host, and numerous other publications.

Rick Petreycik lives in Bridgeport, Connecticut, and has written for Guitar Player, New Country, Keyboard, Musician, and Live. He was also a contributor to The Comprehensive Country Music Encyclopedia, MusicHound Country, and MusicHound Folk.

Randy Pitts is a contributor to MusicHound Country and MusicHound Folk who has labored in the vineyards of traditional music in various circumstances for nearly 20 years, most recently as artistic director of the Freight and Salvage in Berkeley, California, where he worked from 1989 until 1996.

Gary Plochinski is an advertising copy editor at the Bozell agency in suburban Detroit, and was a founding member of the Polish Muslims.

j. poet is older than rock 'n' roll, but younger than your parents. He has been interested in folk and world music since he heard Olatunji's Drums of Passion album, more years ago than he'd care to remember. He has worked as a political organizer, cook, poet, editor, and freelance writer. His world-music column for Pulse! magazine was the first nationally distributed one of its kind for the current world music boom. He is a frequent contributor to more magazines, newspapers, and Web sites than will fit in this space, including Pulse!, Rhythm, Folk Roots, In- dian Artist, Salon, Drum, and the New York Times Syndicate. He lives in a Victorian flat in San Francisco with his partner, Leslie, a rabbit named Flannel, and two birds. He loves tropical climates, hot music, and spicy food, and believes that while you can be too thin, you can't have too much money or garlic. poet was the lead singer and songwriter for the folk/punk band the Young Adults, and is considering a return to the stage to mine the riches of his extensive back catalog. He also writes poetry and dark fiction, and has finished several novels that will eventually make some adventurous publisher fabulously wealthy.

David Poole, a traveler to more than 50 countries, has written about music for Artforum, Detour, and TimeOut New York magazines, as well as MusicHound Soundtracks, in addition to writing on Turkey for Fodor's travel guides.

Sam Prestianni is an unrepentant music junkie, writer, teacher, musician, and music journalist/critic. He has published widely for the past 12 years in dozens of magazines and newspapers, including Option, Raygun, and Alternative Press. He currently pens features and reviews for the San Francisco Weekly, San Francisco Sidewalk, Speak, Soma, and other freelance outlets. He is also the "Outside/In" columnist for Jazziz. Contact him at: johnnycritic@earthlink.net.

Richard Price, bored by being house-bound with chicken pox in 1985, studied Digital Audio's editorial style and submitted his first album review. The publication bought it and asked for more—proving that anyone who puts his mind to it can be a music writer. He has since contributed hundreds of articles, reviews, and columns on rock, country, jazz, classical, new-age, avant-garde, and world music to leading audio publications including High Fidelity, CD Review, BAM (Bay Area Music), the Schwann CD Catalog, and Amazon.com's music site.

Barry M. Prickett is a Sacramento, California–based freelance music writer, editor of children's books, and drummer (thus not a musician). He enjoys counting past four, battling sucker MCs, and posing for muscle mag covers in his spare time.

David Prince's words on music have appeared as album liner notes and in a number of publications including the Boston Phoenix, Santa Fe Reporter, Cadence, Raygun, Stereophile, Schwann/Spectrum, the Albuquerque Tribune, and the Village Voice. He has produced and hosted jazz and freeform radio programs at both commercial and community stations in Santa Fe, New Mexico, as well as for Albuquerque's NPR affiliate, KUNM-FM. He can be reached via e-mail at Flight505@aol.com.

Doug Pullen is the music and media writer for the Flint Journal (Michigan) and Booth Newspapers. He is a contributor to MusicHound Rock, MusicHound Country, MusicHound R&B, MusicHound Blues, and MusicHound Folk.

Derek Rath has been writing on music for 24 years, with a focus on world music since the mid-'80s. He has been published on four continents and has made radio contributions to the BBC, KCRW (Santa Monica), and KPFK (Los Angeles). Born in Britain, he resides in Southern California where he can at least starve in the sunshine.

Dennis Rea is a guitarist/composer/writer who plays with ambient-improv group LAND and in numerous collaborative projects in Seattle. He is co-director of the Seattle Improvised Music Festival, co-editor of the Tentacle, and author of the forthcoming Live at the Forbidden City, an account of his experiences performing music in China and Taiwan. His company, Nunatak Press and Music, can be found on the Web at http://www.wolfenet.com/~nunatak/.

Bryan Reesman is a graduate of NYU's Tisch School of the Arts with a B.F.A. in film; a former story analyst for Miramax Films, New Line Cinema, and Imagine Entertainment; and an aspiring drummer. He currently freelances for music publications nationwide. He writes regularly for Gig, Goldmine, Keyboard, Magnet, Mix, Mixmag, Allstar, and MTV Online, and has also been published in Bikini, the Boston Phoenix, Detour, Guitar Player, the Improper Bostonian, Requestline, and numerous other publications.

Bob Remstein writes on popular music for several Web sites (Wall of Sound, E! Online) as well as for less high-tech media (Musician magazine). An active keyboardist and composer, his "Theme for the Children" can be found on the Qwest/Warner Bros. album Love Shouldn't Hurt.

Chris Rietz is the manager of Elderly Music in Lansing, Michigan, and a freelance writer and folk music aficionado.

Cynthia Rogers works as a freelance editor in New York City.

Ken Roseman is proud to announce that he sent in all of his MusicHound World assignments via e-mail and is thus no longer a complete Luddite. The related communication with music experts in Germany, Denmark, Spain, Scotland, Finland, Israel, England, and elsewhere has even made him feel like something of a global citizen, and that beats plane fare. Ken is a deep fan of cultural fusions, and says a hearty "Go Huskies!" to any alumni of Robert E. Peary High School who may be reading this. (No, there isn't any connection!)

Leland Rucker is the editor of MusicHound Blues and co-author of The Toy Book: A Celebration of Slinky, G.I. Joe, Tinkertoys, Hula Hoops, Barbie Dolls, Snoot-Flutes, Coonskin Caps, Slot Cars, Frisbees, Yo-Yos, Betsy Wetsy and Much Much More (Alfred Knopf, 1992). He lives in Boulder, Colorado.

Christopher Scanlon is the former editor of The Video Source Book and a MusicHound contributor. He has a master's degree in social work.

Bruce Schoenfeld writes from his Colorado home on topics ranging from wine to bullfighting for the New York Times Magazine, Outside, Travel & Leisure, and other national publications. While writing, he often listens to the new-wave and power-pop albums of the late '70s and early '80s that helped transform him from an unsteady youth to a sober, sophisticated adult—as well as Puccini, Dean Martin, and Blue Rodeo. It gives his work a certain edge.

Joel Selvin has covered pop music for the San Francisco Chronicle since 1970 and is the author of several books on the subject. He co-produced Dick Dale's Tribal Thunder album.

Todd Shanker's deep and diverse music collection is known to Chicagoans as the Shanksonian Institution (library cards are available). His work has appeared in Pulse!, Option, the Beat, Alternative Press, and many other publications. His "House of Stylus" column for Chicago's I.E. covers new and vintage vinyl-available soul, jazz, indie, hip-hop, funk, punk, reggae, garage rock, and more. By day he is a dedicated public defender who has argued victoriously in the Illinois Supreme Court and flashed stunning James Brown–like moves while avoiding judge-hurled gavels.

Tim Sheridan is a playwright and music fan who never met a genre he didn't like. He has contributed to Entertainment Weekly, Launch, Down Beat, the All Music Guide, Mojo, the Chicago Reader, and his two children. He lives in Oak Park, Illinois.

Clea Simon writes a weekly column about radio for the Boston Globe. She is the author of Mad House: Growing Up in the Shadow of Mentally Ill Siblings (Doubleday), and has contributed to the Boston Phoenix, Ms., the New York Times Book Review, Rolling Stone, and Salon, among other publications.

Jared Snyder is a graduate of Boston University who currently lives in Philadelphia. He has published articles on music from the United States, the Caribbean, and Africa. His current project is a book of historic images of accordion players from around the world. He plays diatonic accordion and electric guitar professionally in the Philadelphia area.

Denise Sofranko is a freelance writer.

David Sokol, senior editor at Disney Magazine, served as music editor and production manager of the Advocate Newspaper chain in Massachusetts and Connecticut from 1977 to 1993. He was hired as editor-in-chief to launch New Country magazine in November 1993 and quickly turned it into the most respected and objective monthly in the field of country music. His writing appears in MusicHound Country, MusicHound Folk, and in numerous other publications including Stereophile and Launch Online.

Steven Stancell writes the "Alternative Discs" column for the New York Beacon, and in 1996 authored the first biographical encyclopedia on rap music, Rap Whoz Who, which received a Ralph J. Gleason Music Book Award nomination. Stancell's earlier literary pieces have appeared on WBAI-FM's Radio Unnamable with Bob Fass, and his play Neighborhood Disrupted was produced by the American Theater of Actors in 1984. He is also a multi-genre musician, composer, and record producer, responsible for the co-production (with Strafe) of Shaman's 1985 single "This Is Not a Jungle, This Is a Zoo."

Wif Stenger is bicoastal—that is, dividing his time between the eastern seaboard and Finland's south shore. He covers cultural phenomena for Billboard, the International Herald Tribune (Paris), Discover Africa, Radio Finland, Public Radio International, and other unlikely outlets.

Mario Tarradell is the country music critic for the Dallas Morning News. His work has also appeared in MusicHound Country, MusicHound Folk, and Replay and New Country magazines.

Tom Terrell is a freelance music journalist based in New York who claims to know everything about pop music since 1955—and remembers it all despite a longtime backstage association with George Clinton and Funkadelic.

Suzy Rothfield Thompson grew up in the Northeast, studied classical music as a child, and apprenticed in Louisiana with master fiddler Dewey Balfa under an NEA fellowship. In 1981, Suzy helped form the Blue Flame Stringband, which evolved into the California Cajun Orchestra. Suzy has performed and recorded with those bands, Any Old Time, Klezmorim, and Eric Thompson. She has recorded as a side musician with jazz violinist Darol Anger, bluegrass fiddler/singer Laurie Lewis, the Savoy-Doucet Cajun Band, Sukay, and others. She appears briefly in the film J'ai Etais Au Bal (aired on PBS as French Dance Tonight), playing fiddle with D.L. Menard and Danny Poullard. In 1994, she represented the USA on a Masters of Folk Violin tour in England and Scotland. She has taught fiddle at Augusta Heritage Center (Elkins, West Virginia); Festival of American Fiddle Tunes (Port Townsend, Washington); Lark in the Morning (Mendocino, California); and Ashokan Fiddle & Dance Camp (New York). She is also a music reviewer for the Old Time Herald.

Philippe Varlet is a performer and teacher of Irish traditional music as well as an ethnomusicologist doing research on many aspects of that tradition. In particular, he specializes in the history of early recordings of Irish music, which he collects and of which he has produced several CD anthologies, including From Galway to Dublin (Rounder), Milestone at the Garden (Rounder), and Joe Derrane—Irish Accordion (Rego/Copley). Varlet resides near Washington, D.C., where he performs regularly at local ceilis (Irish communal dances) and concerts and provides private instruction on Irish fiddle playing. His name is familiar to members of Internet Irish music lists who seek assistance in identifying tunes and their sources. He has a master's degree in composition from Catholic University and studied ethnomusicology at the University of Maryland.

Jack and Linda Vartoogian are MusicHound World's photo editors (see above).

Stephen Vilnius was born in Grosse Pointe, Michigan, raised in Orange County, California, and now resides in Ferndale, Michigan, where he plays fretless bass in the pop band Brilliant. He is the nephew of Jose Feliciano.

Neal Walters is a veteran folk-music performer, teacher, critic, and collector, and the co-editor of MusicHound Folk.

Mara Weiss and Nego Beto write the "Brazil Beat" column for The Beat magazine.

Sam Wick not only contributed to MusicHound Lounge, but is editor-in-chief of Lounge magazine, which is credited with spurring the sputnik ascension of the so-called "cocktail nation." In addition to penning books, Wick is a frequent contributor to Drink, Grammy, and just about every bartender's pension plan.

Steve Winick is a talented writer about all kinds of music. He particularly loves English and Celtic folk, and writes prolifically about the artists that fall into that category.

Pamela Murray Winters is the author of a forthcoming biography of Sandy Denny. In addition to her contributions to MusicHound World and MusicHound Folk, she has written about music for Dirty Linen, Relix, femme musique, Folk Tales, and the Washington Review. She is a native of the Washington, D.C., area, an occasional vegetarian, an enthusiastic steering-wheel percussionist, and a library school dropout. She can sing in seven languages, but not very well.

Art Wojtowicz is a Detroit-based freelance copywriter, folk singer-songwriter, and recording studio owner and operator. His writing credits include a successful Broadway-style musical, an album of original piano music, and numerous pieces of political satire and poetry. His upcoming CD will present a loving and humorous look at the heroes of everyday life on this planet earth. Art's greatest accomplishment is finding continuing peace and happiness. His life's goal—to be a kid again.

Josh Zarov is the project manager for Ticketmaster Multimedia. He is also a contributor to Live Vibes Online.

Tony Ziselberger is the manager of a White Castle in Jacksonville, Mississippi. He has loved folk music since he was in his mother's womb and has been writing about it since the 1970s.

Befitting its global-village aspirations, this book was truly a community effort. My first thanks must go to the contributors, who served as invaluable consultants and comrades from the book's formative stages through its completion, offering advice on content, sharing crucial information, and providing indispensable encouragement. Their labors of love are a joy instantly taken up by the reader, and there could be no greater testament to their talent or gift to this project.

Of particular note is j. poet, with his unparalleled knowledge of the shape of world music today and insight into the shape this book should take, and his limitless familiarity with (and generosity in sharing) the contacts essential to making this book come about—not to mention writing more of it than anyone!

It's also hard to imagine MusicHound World existing without two colleagues, Jack and Linda Vartoogian, who made some excellent written contributions in the miraculously obtained spare time from their vital duties as photo editors. Not only did they supply the all-important visual accompaniment that does so much to make the music come alive, but they were pivotal advisers and constant supporters, making sure that many of the book's principal benefactors—from some of its finest contributors, to its most important sponsors, to its stellar foreword essayists—were initially reached and steadily encouraged, and bringing their seemingly boundless awareness of world music and affection for its practitioners to every facet of the book we all envisioned and now hold in our hands.

The MusicHound World contributors' honor roll certainly extends especially to those who stepped in at crucial junctures to take seconds—or even thirds and fourths—on their assignment loads; supply background scholarship; and do emergency rewrites as we raced (calmly!) to keep up with the ever-evolving world-music phenomenon and bring you the most up-to-date and comprehensive reading of its contours. The champions I'm talking about include PJ Birosik, Kerry Dexter, Michael Eldridge, John C. Falstaff, Marty Lipp, Bret Love, Stacy Meyn, David Poole, and Todd Shanker.

With a lineup like the one described above, I must give undying gratitude to the publishers, publicists, and other professionals who sent some of the top talent in world-music writing my way. I am particularly indebted to Andrew Seidenfeld of No Problem! Productions; Paul Hartman of Dirty Linen; Sarah Weinstein Dennison of Palm Pictures; CC Smith of The Beat; Jimi Schultz, formerly of In-Media and now of the Aquarian Weekly and East Coast Rocker; and Cliff Furnald of the Rootsworld Web site. The artists whose stories we strive to tell, and we the storytellers, could have no allies more conscientious and kindred than these.

Of course, the fortunate union of expert writers with a project perfect for them was also but one of many services performed by the staff at Visible Ink Press, a dream team from the perspectives of editorial excellence, interpersonal accommodation, and every other standpoint I can think of. The thoughtful insight, thorough care, tireless vigilance, and inexhaustible patience of the two editors who tag-teamed around a maternity leave over the course of the project, Judy Galens and Dean Dauphinais, made for the kind of literary relationship every writer/editor wishes to have, and the kind of honor he hopes to earn. The managerial vision and judicious receptivity of publisher Marty Connors; the creativity and determination of marketer Kim Marich and publicist Marilou Carlin; the expertise and wisdom of computer magician Jeff Muhr (who made the book happen both technically and textually, contributing scores of exceptional entries); the attentiveness and organizational flair of VIP Managing Editor Christa Brelin; the perceptiveness and devotion of the copy editors—particularly Barbara Cohen, Diane Dupuis, Christina Fuoco, Pamela Shelton, and Devra Sladics—and the wit and savvy of copywriter PJ Butland, all added up to an atmosphere of the utmost openness, professionalism, and genuine sense of shared mission to rely on and live up to.

And there could be no thanks more imperative and heartfelt than those offered to the person who made it possible for me to work with such an unsurpassable outfit on such an important project to begin with: Gary Graff, who primarily conceived the MusicHound format, gave me an early break as a writer in its inaugural volume, and, in recommending me for this book, showed a belief in me for which full repayment is impossible but gratitude inexhaustible. To justify his support and uphold the tradition he brought about would be my greatest accolade.

One of the many gifts Gary bestowed was that of advice, not only from his own considerable reserve of experience and imagination, but also from series veterans with whom he put me in touch. It is another dearly held hope that the honesty expressed and enthusiasm conveyed—not to mention hours of valuable time donated—by MusicHound Lounge and MusicHound Swing editor Steve Knopper, MusicHound Blues editor Leland Rucker, and MusicHound Rock co-editor Daniel Durchholz—three of this book's best writers in addition to being three of the series' most distinguished standard-bearers—will be honored by this compendium that couldn't have come about without their counsel.

MusicHound World was blessed by the involvement of many such impeccable reputations, perhaps never more prominently and generously than with our from-heaven foreword writers, David Byrne and Angélique Kidjo. Their graciousness in giving of their time, authority, and good names; their eloquence in expressing the nature and value of this vast and to many still new thing called world music; the patience they applied to the process and the quality they bequeathed the finished work, are all true treasures.

Special thanks for stewarding these two crucial contributions must go to the artists' representation: for Angélique, the team at Annie Ohayon Media Relations, especially Reyna Mastrosimone and Annie herself; and for David, the team at Todo Mundo and Luaka Bop, especially Kara Finlay. Their persistence, diplomacy, and expertise changed the course of this project everlastingly for the better. And once that was accomplished, Jeff Kaye, also at Luaka, was essential in building on it with the media to gain a priceless public ear for the book and its mission.

Combining with the forewords to literally bookend MusicHound World's appeal to the world-music connoisseur and newcomer alike, the bonus CD from Wicklow Entertainment is a prized survey of some of world music's most enjoyable and influential voices, made possible by one of its most prestigious new presenters. The generosity, receptivity, belief in the project, and true dedication to artist and audience shown in the realization of this collaboration by Label Manager John Voigtmann (now International Marketing Manager for RCA Records), A&R Manager Ian Menzies, special projects coordinator Ethan Crimmins, and, of course, label founder Paddy Moloney, commends their enterprise and enriches this one.

Wicklow showed particular enthusiasm in the promotion of the book, as did Rhythm magazine, America's definitive chronicle of the world's music. The effort and imagination of Rhythm's publisher Alecia Cohen especially ensured the maximum meeting between our endeavor and the public, both veteran and new, that will enjoy it—not to mention making it more possible for that public to seek out the artists profiled here by furnishing our book's Concert Venues appendix.

Way before these priceless finishing touches were put on the book, getting that far was assured through a miraculous computer resuscitation by Kiyomasa Toma; an automotive laying on of hands by Bill Brunskill that kept me mobile (back when I could still leave the house!); an emergency transfer of recordings and background material by Shomik Roy to a needy contributor; and a last-minute editing assist on the longest two letter-sections of the artist entries by Stacy Meyn. Thanks to all for saving me from myself.

In addition to all these singular supporters are the legions of other publishers, publicists, institutions, scholars, and artists themselves to whom I and the contributors extend our gratitude, just some of whom include: Klaus Adolphi of Horch; everyone at Almo Sounds; Ian Anderson of Folk Roots; Ana Araiz of LusAna Productions; Bess at Shanachie; Jane Blumenfeld of In-Media; Sandy Brechin; Lellie Capwell at Vanguard; Michelle Carter, Munsie Davis, and Bob Haddad at Music of the World; Greg Cohen; Jason Consoli at TVT; Andrew Cronshaw; Matt Darriau; Brenda Dunlap at Smithsonian Folkways; Jacob Edgar, David Hazan, Dawn Richardson, Dan Storper, and Dave Weinberg of Putumayo; Fortuna; Baruch Friedland of Zikidisc; Adrian Jeffries, formerly of Tinder Records; Dominic Kanza; Judy Kerr et al. at Capitol; Cynthia Kirk at syn•tax; Svend Kjeldsen of Roots

Music Agency; Stephanie Levine at Tuff Gong International; David Lewiston; Fredric Lieberman; Fiona MacKenzie; Talitha MacKenzie; Tess Magnum at Alula; Shiley Menard; Hilda Mendez at Arhoolie; Heather Mount at the Knitting Factory; Eduardo Muszcat of MCD World Music; Tom Muzquiz at Rhino Records; Stuart Oravetz at Sony; Margareta Paslaru; Aliza Rabinoff at Shore Fire Media; Christina Roden; Cynthia Rogers at Traditional Crossroads; Lisa Samper at Narada; Sue Schrader at RealWorld; Ronnie Simpson at Lismor/Iona; Chandra Smith at Triloka; Huston Smith; Joanna Spindler at Silverwave; Karen Strom; Brita Toivonen at Finlandia Records; Peter Uhlmann of Tanz Folkfest Rudolstadt; Terri Williamson and Ann Brumbaugh at Celestial Harmonies; and Rainer Zellner at akku disc.

Still more thanks are owed to the other employers who held my place and egged me on as this tome pulled farther away from deadline and closer to perfection—or at least perfectionism—especially my other best editor, Cree McCree at Yahoo! Internet Life.

An equally admirable waiting game was played by the friends and loved ones who agreed to retain that designation for the duration of my self-imposed exile to the keyboard, including but not limited to Salvatore DiSalvio; Peter Killeen; Elke Claus; Laura Firman and Kiyo Toma; Beth Ann Vogel; Rhonda DiMascio; Lora and Fred Blake; Bill and Marge Selden; Mary Van Bodegon and family; and Inge and Stephen Brunskill. I'm done, guys, and I promise it was worth it! . . . Uh, Adam, remember?

Speaking of loved ones, thanks go to my parents, Vivienne and Frank, who first opened my eyes to the world, and love goes to my nephew, Dylan, who sees it through fresher eyes.

Ultimately, all thanks go to the most wise and creative person I've ever known and the love of my life, Lynn Brunskill. She's both my destiny and my true beginning, and met her most selfless of many challenges yet as my long hours stretched to long months and CDs piled up everywhere but the damn refrigerator. (Oh—so THAT's where that one got to! . . . Sorry, King Sunny!) Anyway, honey, I'm home.

On a more uncharacteristically somber note, as world music endlessly renews itself, some spirits sadly have to make way, and this book is dedicated to the memory of the artists who, over the course of its completion, passed from life into legend, among them Dennis Brown, Junior Braithwaite of the Wailers, Mahlathini, Rose Kaohu Moe, Augustus Pablo, and Aldus Roger.

A book of this scope, on a subject of this importance, is rightfully the accomplishment of many, and its completion is deservedly the pride of all who are listed above. If there is anyone I left out, you have my sincerest apologies, my blanket recommendation, and my assurance that you will be mentioned in the second edition by myself or my executor, as necessary!

Adam McGovern

A

Najat Aatabou

Berber popular music

Born May 19, 1960, in Khémisset, Morocco. Based in Casablanca, Morocco.

Najat Aatabou sang from an early age and had her "accidental" debut in 1983. During a family celebration, a friend made a tape of her singing "J'en ai Marre (I'm Sick of It)," a song she'd composed that detailed the dissatisfaction a woman felt with her traditional place in society. The friend took the tape to Hossein Dobala, a producer in Casablanca. A few days later Dobala visited Aatabou and asked her to make a cassette of "J'en ai Marre." Afraid of her parents' reaction, Aatabou put the song out under an assumed name, but her powerful voice was instantly recognizable to anyone who knew her. The song became a smash hit, selling almost half a million copies, and Aatabou left her home town of Khémisset for the metropolis of Casablanca, another untraditional move for a single woman. Her next single, "Shouffi Rhirou," was also a hit, even though the traditional media—radio, TV, and concert halls—ignored her, at least at first. Aatabou's sound stays true to her Berber heritage; she uses Berber musicians and sings in a folky style using straightforward lyrics that have made her a favorite with the common people.

what's available: The Voice of the Atlas ♪♪♪♪ (Globestyle England, 1991, prod. Hossein Dobala) is a compilation of Aatabou's many album and cassette releases from 1984 to 1987. The band is a small acoustic unit, mostly just oud (lute) and percussion, but the rhythms are relentless and Aatabou's driving, soulful vocals are incredibly affecting. The two tracks with a full orchestra were hailed on their release for taking Aatabou in an exciting new direction.

influences:
⏮ Jil Jilala, Lem Chaheb

j. poet

Abana Ba Nasery

Omutibo dance music

Formed 1964, in Mwilonje, Kenya. Based in Bunyore, Kenya.

Studio band: Shem Tube (Kenya), guitar, vocals, leader; Justo Osala Omufila (Kenya), guitar, vocals; Enos Okola (Kenya), Fanta bottle, vocals. Touring band: The above musicians plus Lee (England), drums; Chopper (England), bass; Alan Prosser (England), viola, violin; Hijaz Mustapha (England), banjo, dobro-bass, melodeon; Ron Kavana (Ireland), bouzouki, banjo; Thomás Lynch (Ireland), uilleann pipes; Expen$ive Mustapha (England), trumpets.

Two acoustic guitars, three singers, and a percussionist rubbing out rhythms on an empty Fanta bottle: As odd as it sounds, those are the ingredients of omutibo, a traditional style of dance music from western Kenya. But when the Nursery Boys, as they are called in English, start to play their richly syncopated, polyrhythmic style of guitar picking, they rock the house, be they in Bunyore or London. Omutibo, a social music for funeral ceremonies and gatherings of beer-drinking older men, was usually played on the litungu (Ugandan harp) and siriri (a one- or two-stringed fiddle) until soldiers returning from World War II introduced the guitar to Kenya. At first, omutibo was played on a single guitar, but players like Shem Tube added a second and began using the rhythms of sukuti, a style usually played at Saturday night dances for young people.

Tube's family was poor and he only had five years of schooling, but when he got interested in music in the late '50s, he taught himself to play guitar. He met Omufila in 1964 and they began playing local dances in the Kakamenga district. In 1968, record producer Manasse Omwoma recorded them under the name Abana Ba Nasery—Nursery Boys—because of Tube's diminutive stature. They recorded regularly until 1972, when they formed an electric dance band called Mwilonje Jazz, which mutated into Les Bunyore and Super Bunyore. These outfits played a slightly urbanized form of omutibo, but were recording projects only—due to the high cost of electric instruments—and the Nursery Boys configuration has continued intermittently instead. Unhappily, because of the economic situation in Kenya, neither Tube nor Omufila owns a guitar. Tube, who makes his living as a farmer, says he works on a song in his head, until "it's good enough for recording."

what to buy: The tunes on Abana Ba Nasery ♪♪♪♪♪ (Globestyle, 1989, prod. Manasse Omwoma) were taken from singles the band recorded between 1968 and 1972, and they still sound as fresh and exciting as the day they were recorded. The guitar work is subtle and sublime, proving again that less is more; the Fanta rhythms have a faint Cuban trace that adds a touch of tropical grace to the playing.

what to buy next: When Abana Ba Nasery was released in England, it caused a sensation and led Ben Mandelson, head of the Globestyle label, to track down the trio and offer them a mini-tour of England and Europe. The result was Nursery Boys Go Ahead ♪♪♪♪♩ (Xenophile, 1992), a recording that proves traditional music doesn't have to be updated to be exciting. The backing tracks add a bit of folk-rock muscle to the band, creating what may be the first sessions of Afro Celtic fusion, but the main attraction remains the amazing fretwork of Tube and Omufila. The duo hasn't lost its chops, despite the dire economic straits; this is another low-key masterpiece.

influences:

⏮ George Mukabi, Bunyore Band

⏭ Samite, Victoria Kings, Shirati Jazz

j. poet

Dimi Mint Abba

Iggawin (Moorish music of Mauritania)

Born 1958, in Mauritania. Based in Mauritania and Dakar, Senegal.

Harsh history and geography underlie the plaintive, soulful songs of Dimi Mint Abba. The northwest African nation of Mauritania has seen centuries of struggle among Berber, Arab, Sudanese, Bambara, Tuareg, Wolof, Peul, French, and other peoples. Trumping all those forces has been the ever-encroaching desert, which has driven three-fourths of the once-nomadic population into cities, especially the crowded coastal capital, Nouakchott, where old cultures have collided and new ones continue to be forged. Abba and her husband/collaborator Khalifa Ould Eide both come from musical families and so began their careers early. Abba's spectacular voice brought her to national attention when she was just 16. At 17, she represented her country at the prestigious Umm Kulthum festival in Tunisia. Moorish iggawin tradition is loaded with ancient complexities, and young Dimi had to learn dance and percussion before approaching music theory and the formidable 14-string ardin harp. The iggawin system of modes specifies three "ways" of playing: the "black way," the "white way," and the "spotted way." While these rules and disciplines survive, the realities of modern Nouakchott have inevitably lead to extensions and experiments. No surprise, then, that Khalifa sports an electric guitar and Dimi's contemporary band includes electric keyboards alongside traditional Moorish instruments. Her central appeal remains her voice, which has the power to float on air, flutter through it bird-like, or tear it with the ragged precision of a chain saw.

what's available: Khalifa Ould Eide & Dimi Mint Abba: Moorish Music from Mauritania ♪♪♪♪♩ (World Circuit, 1990, prod. Nick Gold, John Hadden) is the only full-length album in circulation. Luckily, it's a gem. The mostly acoustic backing supports Dimi's nightingale voice with the evocative, jangling textures of the North African desert.

influences:

⏮ Centuries of Moorish tradition

⏭ Ali Farka Touré, Malouma

Banning Eyre

Abdelli

Berber worldbeat fusion

Born Abderrahmane Abdelli, in Algeria. Based in Belgium.

The love of that sprawling thing called "world music" contains utopian aspirations that can find many hasty and misguided expressions, from reckless cultural oversimplification to attempts at stuffing the whole world onto a single disc. A little selectivity can actually better reveal the far-flung cultural affinities for which the well-meaning one-worldists are looking. Eschewing the proverbial kitchen sink and lots more, Algerian native Abderrahmane Abdelli and Belgian producer Thierry Van Roy zeroed in on the sonic similarities of Abdelli's own Berber (Kabyl tribe) roots and those of some crack South American and Eastern European players for an ear-opening debut album. The Berbers are the indigenous people of pre-Islamic North Africa, and their music has a distinctive syncopation that nonetheless finds a sympathetic echo in Latin rhythms, and a sweet string sound that converses well with the Ukrainian bandura (zither) a little closer across the globe. "Discovered" by a Belgian official just hours away from deportation to the strife he'd left in Algeria, Abdelli lucked upon patrons who shared his taste for cultural mixing more than many non-Berbers back home or Europeans at the time—and listeners the world over would soon realize that the fortune was theirs as well. He hasn't been much heard from since, but his debut album remains essential, and very much in-demand and in-print.

Dimi Mint Abba

what's available: New Moon ♪♪♪♪ (RealWorld, 1995, prod. Thierry Van Roy) is an album of understated brilliance, soothing but never soporific, and sophisticatedly energized at all the right points. Geographically distant styles synchronize invigoratingly, and in a nervy effort to preserve the immediacy and naturalism of Abdelli's vocals, they were recorded before the instruments, surprisingly with no loss to the finished product's organic, intimate feel. Pleasurable but purposeful, accommodating but individualistic, this is music for a new moon, and the new dawn after that.

influences:

◀◀ Berber tradition, Radio Tarifa, Abed Azrié, Thierry Van Roy

▶▶ Rasha

Adam McGovern

Abel & Kaninerna

Worldbeat

Formed 1989, in Gothenburg, Sweden. Based in Gothenburg, Sweden.

Bo Ingvarsson, guitar, vocals; Carita Jonnson, accordion, clarinet, keyboards, Swedish bagpipe, flute, vocals; Pelle Bolander, fiddle, vocals; Benke Stanlén, bass, vocals; Tommy Johansson, drums, percussion. (All members are from Sweden.)

Bo Ingvarsson began looking for musicians to fulfill his skewed visions in 1989. The current Abel and Kaninerna lineup fell into place in 1990; they recorded their eponymous debut in 1993, an international hootenanny of folky and ethnic flavors. The Swedish press has compared them to the Pogues and that's a good starting place—at least attitude-wise—but their mix of ska, metal, rock, reggae, klezmer, Balkan and Swedish folk music, tangos, Gregorian chants, and just about everything else is a bit more far-reaching than their Irish counterparts. Judging from the vocal inflections, the lyrics are probably as off-the-wall as the band's musical excesses.

what's available: A bitch's brew of influences, solid arrangements, and vocals that sputter with snotty attitude make Sömnlösa Nätter och Hemmagjord Vodoo (Sleepless Nights and Homemade Voodoo) ♪♪♪♪½ (Slask Sweden, 1994, prod. Stefan Pettersoon) a solid outing; a great blend of Swedish folk, worldbeat, and pure rock insolence.

influences:

◀◀ Lars Danielson, Gryningen, Ricard Wolff

j. poet

Rabib Abou-Khalil

Arabic jazz

Born 1957, in Beirut, Lebanon. Based in Cologne, Germany.

Abou-Khalil grew up listening to classical Arabic music, Sinatra, Zappa, and Monk. He started playing oud (a Middle Eastern lute) at six, and studied that instrument and flute in Beirut, before his parents moved to Munich to escape the civil war. In Germany he studied Western classical flute, but the oud kept calling him back. As he developed his oud technique, he began exploring his own system of notation, based partially on Arabic music, which "follows the human voice," and partially on Western compositional theory. Equally drawn to jazz and Arabic music, Abou-Khalil found a way to do both. His first album, Between Dusk and Dawn, was self-produced and caused a sensation in the Arabic world. Since then he has gone from strength to strength, recording with heavies like Glen Velez, Steve Swallow, Nabil Khaiat, and Glen Moore.

what to buy: Arabic blues sound like an anomaly? Check out Odd Times ♪♪♪♪½ (Enja, 1997, prod. Rabib Abou-Khalil) for Howard Levy's blues harp on "The Sphinx and I ..." and "One of Those Days" before coming to a hasty conclusion. Levy's harp and the amazing sounds of Nabil Khaiat's frame drum provide the icing, but the cake is still the subtle yet driving oud of Abou-Khalil.

what to buy next: The words "world jazz" are tossed around with reckless abandon these days, but on Blue Camel ♪♪♪♪ (Mesa, 1992, prod. Rabib Abou-Khalil) as elsewhere, Rabib Abou-Khalil's music lives up to the name. He effortlessly fuses Arabic classical modes, or his approximations of them, with touches of flamenco, jazz, rock, and South Indian percussion. The compositions on Blue Camel show us the best of all possible worlds, one where traditions blend without losing their individual authentic flavor.

the rest:

Al-Jadida ♪♪♪♪ (Enja, 1991)
Tarab ♪♪♪♪ (Enja, 1993)
The Sultan's Picnic ♪♪♪♪ (Enja, 1994)
Arabian Waltz ♪♪♪♪ (Enja, 1995)

influences:

◀◀ Mohammed Abdel Wahab, Wadih Al-Safi, Fairuz

j. poet

Camara Aboubacar

Manding pop music

Born mid-1950s, in Guinea. Based in Paris, France.

Camara Aboubacar is a young singer, guitarist, and player of the kora, the 21-string harp-lute important to the music of West Africa's griots and jalis (oral historians). His name sets him up to be confused with one of Guinea's greatest vocalists, Aboubacar Demba Camara of Bembeya Jazz, who died in 1973. Perhaps that's one reason the young kora man uses the convention of putting his surname before his given name. Aboubacar started out as a guitarist raised on urban music, and became a protégé of singing kora innovator Jali Musa Jawara. Jawara took Aboubacar to Paris and used him on some of his acclaimed 1980s recordings. Following Jawara's roots-pop lead, Aboubacar then took up the kora himself. In Paris, he recorded two CDs for the international market, and made something of a name for himself back home. Decidedly not a traditionalist, Aboubacar backs his kora and vocal with keyboards, electric guitar, balafon (wooden xylophone), bass, and electronic drums. His second international release, Téléphone, is the one that deservedly got the U.S. press's attention, and opened ears for the certain accomplishments to come.

what's available: Téléphone ♪♪♪♪ (Celluloid/Melodie, 1994) is a fine example of electric griot pop. Aboubacar blends his fleet kora lines gracefully into energized grooves, and sings like an angel.

influences:

⏮ Mory Kanté, Sekouba "Bambino" Diabate

see also: Bembeya Jazz

Banning Eyre

Nathan Abshire

Cajun

Born June 27, 1913, in Gueydan, LA, USA. Died May 13, 1981, in Basile, LA, USA.

"The good times are killing me" was painted on the side of Nathan Abshire's accordion case and was his motto in life. He started playing at the age of six, learning from both his parents, who were well-known accordionists in their own right. As a young teenager he played dances with his longtime friend, fiddler Lionel Leleux, sometimes walking 10 miles each way with his accordion over his shoulder. Legendary accordionist Amédée Ardoin regularly used friendly coercion to have the young Abshire substitute for him at dances. When Abshire finally recorded, for Bluebird in 1934, his sides reveal an extremely bluesy kind of Cajun accordionist. However, the instrument would come to fall from favor until the 1950s—but one of the records that helped bring it back was Abshire's "Pine Grove Blues." The song was a massive regional hit, and continues to be extremely popular among Cajuns and Creoles. Abshire's singing was just as soulful and bluesy as his accordion playing and he continued to produce regional hits, including "Bayou Teche Waltz," "Musician's Life," and a Cajun version of "The Games People Play." The good times may have killed him, but good songs stand as his epitaph.

what to buy: French Blues ♪♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1993, prod. Chris Strachwitz) brings together everything Abshire made for the Koury label. Forget about the funky recording quality; these are the real deal—a soulful Cajun sound with Abshire's accordion cutting through the sawing fiddle of Will Kegley and a swooping steel guitar. Abshire's playing has a lot in common with the Cajun delicacy of "cracklin's" (fried pork skin): Hot like his blues, crisp on the outside like his two-steps, and liquid fat on the inside like his waltzes.

what to buy next: The Legendary Jay Miller Sessions ♪♪♪♪½ (Flyright, 1990, prod. Ray Templeton) is a little cleaner than French Blues, but there's still plenty of soul in these recordings, which include the superb fiddling of Dewey Balfa. The collection also spotlights several of Miller's production experiments, such as the horse clops on the "Mardi Gras Song" and the pairing of Abshire's bluesy accordion with the sound of blues harpist Lazy Lester on "La La Blues."

the rest:

The Good Times Are Killing Me ♪♪♪♪ (Swallow, 1986)
Cajun Tradition: Volume 1 ♪♪♪♪ (La Louisianne, 1990)
Cajun Tradition: Volume 2 ♪♪♪♪ (La Louisianne, 1990)
Cajun Fais Do Do ♪♪♪♪½ (Arhoolie, 1996)
(Various Artists) Les Haricots Sont Pas Salés: Legendary Masters of Cajun and Creole Music ♪♪♪♪♪ (Cinq Planetes, 1998)

worth searching for: The compilation of classic Cajun 78s Le Grand Mamou: A Cajun Music Anthology: The Historic Victor/Bluebird Sessions 1928–1941 ♪♪♪♪♪ (Country Music Foundation, 1990, prod. Country Music Foundation) includes "One-Step de Lacassine" by a young Nathan Abshire and the Rayne-Bo Ramblers. On this one-chord vamp Abshire surges past the string band with his bluesy riffs, almost tipping over the group as they bear down to keep up. This appears to be the only one of Abshire's early songs that he never recorded in the later part of his career.

influences:

⏮ Amédée Ardoin, Alphonse "Bois Sec" Ardoin

⏭ Balfa Brothers, Michael Doucet, Buckwheat Zydeco

see also: Amédée Ardoin, Balfa Brothers

Jared Snyder

The Abyssinians

Roots reggae

Formed 1968, in Kingston, Jamaica; disbanded 1980; reunited 1989; disbanded 1990; reunited 1999. Based in Kingston, Jamaica.

Bernard Collins, vocals; Donald Manning, vocals; Lynford Manning, vocals. (All members are from Jamaica.)

Under the definition of roots reggae, you will find the Abyssinians. Identified by the ancient name of Ethiopia and the primeval pit that represents the void between what is, what should be, and what will be, the Abyssinians were one of the very first Jamaican vocal groups to give passionate voice to the Rastafarian faith and express pride in their African cultural roots. "Satta Massa Ganna" (1969) and "Declaration of Rights" (1971) stand today as two of the most important, influential, and utterly moving songs in the history of Jamaican music. With Bernard Collins's pristine, spiritual lead vocals clasped tightly with the blood-oath-close harmonies of brothers Donald and Lynford Manning, the group took listeners to Satta's "faraway land" and implored black people to "get up and fight for your rights" over intricate nyabinghi (ritual Rasta) drumming long before such proclamations became de rigueur in the mid-to-late '70s. The first historic recording of "Satta" was made but shelved by Clement Dodd, which motivated the Abyssinians to start their own Clinch imprint and purchase the master back from Dodd in 1971. After "Satta" and "Declaration of Rights" rocked the very soul of Jamaica, the group followed up with a series of inspiring singles, including "Y Mas Gan," "Leggo Beast," "Reason Time," and a version of Satta called "Mabrak," which featured them "toasting" (reggae-rapping) biblical passages. Their debut album, Forward on to Zion (1976), contained recut versions of many of their greatest songs backed by the most inspiring of Jamaican musicians, including the Heptones's Leroy Sibbles, Sly Dunbar and Robbie Shakespeare, and guitarist Earl "Chinna" Smith. The follow-up Arise was released in England by Virgin, but never saw the light of day in Jamaica and did not sell well elsewhere. Nonetheless, it constituted their second straight masterpiece. In 1980, the American blues-based label Alligator released the virtually flawless Forward, which combined hypnotic new material—most notably "Forward Jah," "Prophesy," and "Praise Him"—with rarities like "Mabrak" and the flipside to the limited first pressing of "Satta," the righteous ska-tinged meditation "Jerusalem." Sadly, infighting that pitted the brothers Manning against Collins led to a breakup in the early '80s. Though they reunited briefly toward the end of the decade and recorded new songs of the same stunning quality as their early classics (most notably "Come Along" and "Do Good"), the feud between the factions continued, with both sides separately recording under the same name for most of the '90s. Another reunion and tour as this book went to press was a guarded celebration for true reggae believers everywhere. Though their catalog is relatively small, the hefty satchel of songs the band has released is of a singularly high quality and stands alone as uniquely heavyweight and heavenly. The Abyssinians are an essential cornerstone in the foundation of reggae music.

what to buy: Satta Massa Ganna ♪♪♪♪♪ (Heartbeat, 1993, prod. the Abyssinians) is a rerelease of the essential-as-oxygen Forward on to Zion ♪♪♪♪♪ (Blue Moon, 1976, prod. the Abyssinians) with the added bonus of digital clarity and four rare singles. If this interdimensional vocalizing doesn't send you, then you are incapable of uplift. The lack of sales for Arise ♪♪♪♪½ (Blue Moon, 1976, prod. the Abyssinians) had everything to do with music-business bullshit and nothing to do with the music, which is as lush, exotic, and meaningful as can be found anywhere. Forward ♪♪♪♪♪ (Alligator, 1982/Musidisc, 1996, prod. the Abyssinians) is imbued with the passion of captive Old Testament prophets vocalizing a longing for freedom with sage knowledge of faith's reward. Visionary cuts like "Forward Jah" and the hauntingly dread "This Is Not the End" are packaged with rare treasures "Mabrak," "Jerusalem," and "Peculiar Number."

the rest:

1995 + Tax ♪♪♪½ (Self-released, 1995)
Declaration of Dub ♪♪♪♪ (Heartbeat, 1998)
Reunion ♪♪♪ (Artists Only!, 1998)
Satta Dub ♪♪♪½ (Tabou, 1998)
Last Days ♪♪♪ (Tabou, 1999)

worth searching for: The superb roots-reggae documentary Rockers is hard to find but is available on video. The opening scene alone, where the Abyssinians sing "Satta Massa Ganna" a cappella with Ras Michael, is reason enough to begin your search now.

influences:

◀◀ Carlton & His Shoes, Count Ossie, Marcus Garvey

▶▶ Burning Spear, Culture, Junior Byles, Keith Hudson, The Twinkle Brothers, Wailing Souls

see also: Sly & Robbie

Todd Shanker

Ad Vielle Que Pourra

French/Canadian folk

Formed 1985, in St. Patrice de Beaurivages, Québec, Canada. Based in Montréal, Québec, Canada.

Daniel Thonon (1987–1997), vocals, hurdy-gurdy, harpsichord, accordion, piano, guitar, shakuhachi, Jew's harp, bouzouki; Alain Leroux (1987–1993/1995–1996), vocals, violin, mandola, bouzouki, mandocello; Clément Demers (1987–1990), accordion; Luc Thonon (1987–1995), Flemish pipes, recorder, flute, saxophone, accordion, bagpipes; Gilles Plante (1987–1994), vocals, flute, recorder, bagpipes, bombarde, tarragoto; Jean-Louis Cros (1990–1993/

1995–1996), guitar, guitarelle, bass guitar; Éric Mercier (1989–1990), bagpipes, oboe, shawm, bombarde; Pierre Imbert (1995–1997), vocals, hurdy-gurdy, tambourine, kalimba. (Members are from Belgium, France, and Canada.)

Ad Vielle Que Pourra is a French pun building on vielle à roue (the term for hurdy-gurdy) and its similarities to the phrase advienne que pourra ("come what may"). It's also the name of a French-Canadian band that has played Breton Celtic-tinged songs, on and off, since 1987. Unlike their Québecois contemporaries La Bottine Souriante, Ad Vielle Que Pourra tend to perform original works within an adapted historical framework, rather than arrangements of traditional tunes. Their music also has more of a European focus than a Québecois one, no doubt owing in part to the recent roots of their principal personnel. Belgian-born Daniel Thonon, a skilled luthier (stringed instrument maker) and hurdy-gurdy player, was at the center of the outfit from its beginnings. The other cofounder and major figure within the band was Alain Leroux, a French fiddler who had previously started Ar Skloferien, one of the best-known Breton Celtic groups of the 1970s. This duo, along with accordionist Clément Demers, flautist Gilles Plante, and the skilled multi-instrumentalist Luc Thonon, formed the initial lineup for Ad Vielle Que Pourra shortly after meeting at a festival in Québec. Their edition of the group released New French Folk Music in 1989, a well-constructed, lively batch of original tunes done in typical Breton style. Demers was the first member to leave, and he was replaced by Jean-Louis Cros by the time Come What May was released in 1991. When Musaïque was recorded in 1993 Cros had already left, and mounting creative tensions between remaining members were straining the band's future. Leroux also departed after that album's sessions and, with Cros, formed a new duo, Alter Ego. They later joined forces with Demers and Éric Mercier (who had played briefly with Ad Vielle Que Pourra but never recorded with them) to create yet another new ensemble. The result was Korventenn, a group that billed itself as "the one and only North America-based band playing authentic traditional Celtic dance music and songs from Brittany." Before this band went on the road, however, Daniel Thonon, Leroux, and Cros had joined up with Pierre Imbert (former hurdy-gurdy player with Lo Jai) to put out one more Ad Vielle Que Pourra album, Ménage à quatre. The end always seemed to be in sight for this outfit, but none had been definitively announced at this writing.

what to buy: New French Folk Music ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1989, prod. Daniel Thonon, Alain Leroux) was surprisingly sophisticated for a first release, with both swinging and atmospheric instrumental arrangements and clean vocals. Daniel Thonon and Leroux wrote all the music heard here, with the former contributing a clever batch of new dance tunes and the later dwelling more on balladry. Standouts include Thonon's "Schottische du Stockfish" and Leroux's "Fillettes des Campagnes."

what to buy next: All through Musaïque ♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1994, prod. Daniel Thonon, Alain Leroux) the playing was uniformly interesting, the production was solid, and the tunes were of fairly high quality. But the increasing antipathy between Thonon and Leroux, both of whom were talented composers and performers, was probably starting to become a factor. "La Complainte des Rengaines," the very last cut on the disc, is a wistful ballad by Thonon lamenting hit songs and their eventual relegation to the dustbins of memory, perhaps foretelling the band's demise. Ménage à quatre ♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet/Xenophile, 1996, prod. Daniel Thonon) introduced the

the bagpipe

A bagpipe is known for one fundamental thing—continuous sound. In order to achieve this, a bag is inflated and squeezed, supplying the pipes with the air required to let them sing. There are two basic types of bagpipes: mouth-blown and bellows-blown. With mouth-blown pipes the instrumentalist provides the air, while in the bellows-blown air is pumped from a bellows, held under one arm. Bellows-blown pipers like to claim that given a table and a straw, they can drink beer while playing their pipes. Ancient shepherds are credited with independently inventing the bagpipe in a variety of areas, from India to Ireland to Hungary, creating the bag from an animal's hide or stomach and connecting hollow sticks or bones to it as pipes. The best-known bagpipes in the United States are Celtic in origin: the Scottish Great Highland Bagpipes, commonly heard at parades and funerals, and the Irish uilleann pipes, as played by the Chieftains. Bagpipes vary in sound based on the type of reeded pipes attached to the bag. Most bagpipes incorporate a steady drone as their sonic backdrop, produced by pipes also called "drones." The number of drones varies, and they may all have the same pitch or be tuned at varying intervals. The other pipe attached to the bag is the "chanter," similar to a reeded recorder, which is used to play the melody.

—Jo Hughey Morrison

two-hurdy-gurdy attack of Thonon and Imbert, making a good attempt at recreating the magic of earlier days—but a list of who wrote what reveals this as essentially Thonon's show. Leroux was only credited with arranging two songs while Thonon tallied 10 compositions, a fact that upset the writing balance present in their previous projects.

the rest:
Come What May ♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1991)

worth searching for: Alter Ego's Mémoires d'Outremer ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet/Xenophile, 1995, prod. Alain Leroux and Jean-Louis Cros) is a very pleasant set of performances. Leroux's "Fillettes des Campagnes" (a remake from Ad Vielle's first album) is a welcome revival, though the rest of the material sounds a bit like a Pentangle project sung in French.

influences:
◀◀ Alan Stivell, Ar Skloferien, Lo Jai

▶▶ Korventenn

Garaud MacTaggart

Adaro

"Medieval crossover"

Formed 1997, in Stuttgart area, southern Germany. Based in Stuttgart area, southern Germany.

Christoph Pelgen, lead vocals, bombarde, gong, Spanish shawm, German bagpipes; Konstanze Kulinsky, vocals, electric and acoustic hurdy-gurdy; Jürgen Treyz, vocals, guitars, MIDI guitar, keyboards, loops; Ulli Stotz, drums, electric percussion; Davide Piai (Italy), bass, vocals (1998–present). (All members are from Germany except where noted otherwise.)

In only two years of existence, Adaro has made quite a mark. Its blend of medieval and folk sounds with heavy-metal dynamics and high-tech dance/pop grooves is quite attention-getting, with a lasting intrigue beyond its initial novelty. The band uses authentic "early music" and folk instruments, and goes back to centuries-old texts for inspiration. So far, the group's catalog numbers two: the full-length CD Stella Splendens (1997) and a four-cut EP, Words Never Spoken (1999).

what's available: Stella Splendens ♪♪♪♪♪ (akku disk, 1997, prod. Jürgen Treyz) is a fantastic fusion of medieval, folk, heavy metal, "prog," and other influences. Imagine a cranked-up Steeleye Span (elegant, precise multi-part vocal harmonies over a full electric band) singing in venerable and sometimes obsolete non-English languages, and you'll be as prepared as you're gonna get. Most of the selections on Stella Splendens are adaptations of material from two medieval song cycles: the Cantigas de Santa Maria from 13th century Spain (sung in Gallego Portuguese) and the Llibre Vermell from the Montserrat cloister of 14th-century Spain (sung in Latin and Catalan). Loud electric guitars, drums, bass, and keyboards mix with hurdy-gurdy, bagpipes, and medieval crumhorn to create a fantastic wall of sound buried in the dim past and unearthed in the unforeseeable future. The four pieces on Words Never Spoken ♪♪♪♪♪ (akku disk, 1999, prod. Jürgen Treyz, Davide Piai, Rainer Zellner) continue down the same winding sonic path—with some inevitable differences. For one thing, Jürgen Treyz wrote the music for three of the four cuts. What's more, each track is a mini-suite with several shifts of rhythm, texture, and melody. For example, "Sanctus Dominus" (with more 13th-century lyrics plus music by Treyz) starts off softly with voice, violin, and acoustic guitar. Then there's an abrupt shift as a mini-choir sings the title phrase repeatedly over an aggressive rhythm section. Then another softer passage begins and the pattern repeats. "Der Totden Dantz," an instrumental composed entirely by Treyz, begins as a fast Middle-Ages thrash that then gets even faster! But the pace quiets down for a lovely acoustic hurdy-gurdy interlude. But then an even more bombastic mix of medieval sounds, heavy metal, and grandiose prog-rock begins. Adaro tramples all boundaries and that keeps its music fascinating.

influences:
◀◀ Steeleye Span, Gryphon, Malicorne, Jethro Tull, Horch

▶▶ Horch, U.L.M.A.N., Radio Tarifa

Ken Roseman

Obo Addy

Afro-Beat

Born 1936, in Ghana. Based in Portland, OR, USA.

Obo Addy was drawn to drumming by the power he heard from infancy; his father was a shaman who used drumming to heal the sick. After learning the drumming rituals of his own tribe, the Ga, Addy moved to the city and played with the Joe Kelly Band—and after learning English, became the band's lead singer. In 1957 there was a heady post-colonial vibe in Ghana, and Addy was invited to join the Arts Council of Ghana, a group that was using music as a method to smooth over intertribal rivalries. The experience enabled Addy to learn from master drummers from all over the country. In 1969 Addy and his brothers moved to London, where they put together Oboade, a highlife band that toured Europe, Japan, and Australia. When the group broke up in 1977 Addy came to Seattle, but soon moved to Portland, thinking it would be easier to make his mark in that town's smaller scene. His first American band, Kukrudu, included Africans and Americans and played jazz, African rock, and "worldbeat." "People have the impression that African music must be traditional to be authentic," Addy says. "But in Ghana we grew up listening to American music as well as African music." Kukrudu has released several well-received albums on Avocet, Portland's premiere avant jazz label. In 1989, Addy also created Okropong, a company he trained to sing, dance, and play the traditional music of Ghana. He stays busy as an educator (teaching African drumming and culture to high school and university students) and as a composer (the Kronos Quartet commissioned "Wawshishijay" for their Pieces of Africa album) in addition to performing with his groups.

what to buy: Okropong ♪♪♪♪ (Earthbeat!, 1990, prod. Obo Addy) is a percussion showcase for Addy, who plays and sings everything on the album, mostly traditional material from various regions of Ghana. The production is minimal and the drums have a full, warm sound.

what to buy next: On The Rhythm of Which a Chief Walks Gracefully ♪♪♪½ (Earthbeat!, 1994, prod. Obo Addy, Denis Carter) Addy mixes Ghanaian tradition with his own compositions. Some of the vocal backgrounds have a new-agey feel, but the drumming throughout is powerful and crisply produced.

worth searching for: While not as strong as his traditional recordings, Addy's worldbeat albums are worth tracking down. Let Me Play My Drums ♪♪♪½ (Burnside, 1988, prod. Obo Addy, Chris Baum) is on CD, and probably easiest to find. Obo ♪♪♪ (Avocet, 1984) and African American ♪♪♪ (Flying Heart, 1986) both came out on small labels before the advent of digital technology.

influences:

◀◀ African Brothers, Highlife International, O. J. Ekemode

▶▶ Kotoja

see also: Yacub Addy, Kronos Quartet

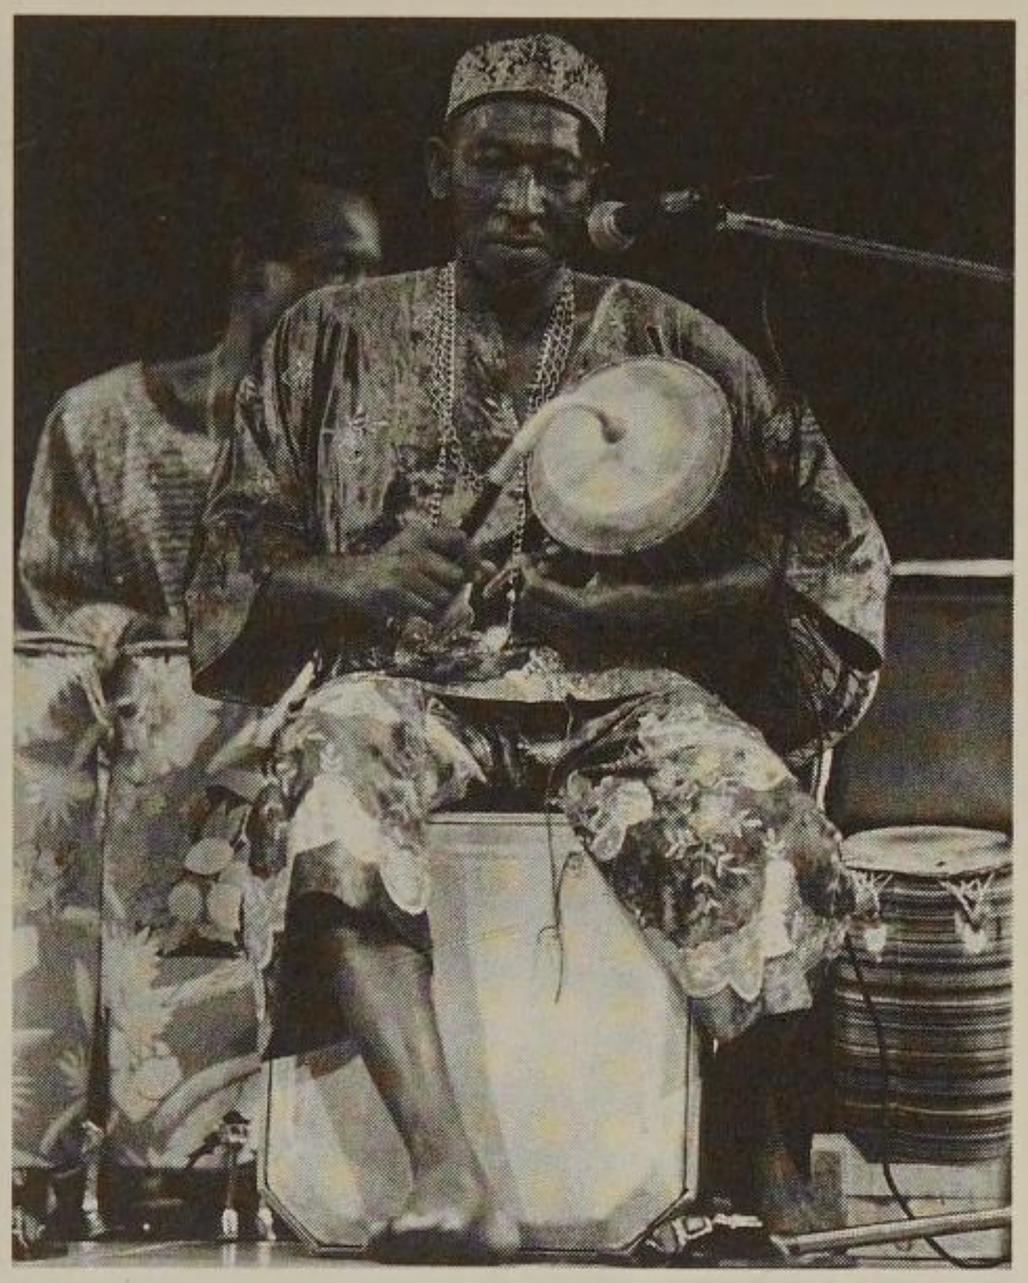
j. poet



Yacub Addy of Odadaa!

Yacub Addy /Odadaa!

Traditional Ghanaian music, Tsimo

Formed 1982, in USA. Based in Troy, NY, USA.

Rotating membership across more than a decade and a half, consistently led by Yacub Addy (born 1931, in Avenor, Ghana).

Promoting authentic traditional African culture to uninitiated audiences is an enterprise rich in opportunities for failure—and attempts to "modernize" these roots to broaden their appeal usually end up so homogenized that little interest is retained. Remarkably, traditional artist Yacub Addy, senior among the widely known Addy clan of musicians and dancers, has managed just such a melding of past and present, in America, since 1982.

Born in 1931 in Avenor, a village outside Ghana's capital, Accra, Addy was raised in the ways of old Africa: his father practiced traditional medicine with the help of Addy's mother, who sang in the ceremonies associated with her husband's practice. At the same time, Ghana's airwaves, not to mention Africa's in general, were thick with the sound of American swing and, later, be-bop. Addy, already having learned the traditional drumming and music of his Ga tribal heritage, also fell in love with the music of greats such as Louis Armstrong, Count Basie, and Louis Jordan.

Profound as these outside influences were, young Addy's aim was to preserve and present the music of his culture in a newly liberated Ghana where, as early as the first year of independence, 1957, he organized the first staged performances of traditional Ghanaian music and dance. By 1963 he and his brothers were touring Europe, and not long thereafter were performing in America, where he settled.

Invoking the name of a traditional rhythm, Addy founded Odadaa!, a company of U.S.-based Ghanaian (and some African-American) performers, in 1982. Now headquartered in Troy, New York, where Addy is a lecturer in African drumming at both Renssalaer Polytechnic Institute and Skidmore College, Odadaa! continues to tour the United States and abroad. In performance, emphasis is on drum-centered traditional music and dance, but other instruments are incorporated as appropriate. Of special interest, though, is the wide variety of drums at the heart of the ensemble—tall, short, round, square, upright, handheld, even sat-upon. Calabash shakers, flutes, bells—an iron bell provides the essential beat to follow—and voices complete the musical ensemble, which is then complemented with several dance pieces. The accent again is on the traditional, but Addy's love of American jazz is evident not only in his own compositions, but also in the group's collaborations with such jazz/world-music trailblazers as Randy Weston and his longtime associate, saxophonist Talib Kibwe, who bring their principal genre's phrasings to Odadaa's work while properly subsuming their performance into the group's structure. Such ongoing partnerships hold the continued promise of preserving musical styles and cultural forms that might otherwise quickly disappear.

King Sunny Adé

what to buy: Credited to "Yacub Addy's Odadaa!," Children of the Ancients ♪♪♪♪ (Aku Music, 1999, prod. Yacub Addy, Amina Addy)—not to be confused with the similarly titled release below—nicely presents the engaging mix of traditional and modern which defines Odadaa!. Only the dancing is missing, though this studio album recreates the sound and feel of the outfit's live performances surprisingly well. Of the disc's seven tracks, three are traditional Ga pieces, including the exuberant "Kolomashi"—literally "Colonialists will leave," or perhaps "Colonials go home!"—a processional from the '40s and '50s independence struggle. The remaining four tracks are Addy compositions that meld traditional Ghanaian and more modern Western elements in a fusion he calls "Tsimo" (pronounced "chee-mo"), from a Ga word meaning "powerful" or "heavy" (it's also a phrase exchanged between Ga drummers when their playing reaches a particularly energized level).

the rest:

(With Oboade) Kpanlogo Party ♪♪♪♪ (Tangent 1973/Lyrichord)

Yacub Addy, Master Drummer of Ghana: Blena Bii—Children of the Ancients ♪♪♪♪ (Makossa International, 1982)

influences:

⏮ Okonfo Akoto, Akua Hagan, Tetteh Coblah Addy (a.k.a. Attafio Tetteh), Louis Armstrong, Count Basie, Louis Jordan

⏭ Obo Addy, Mustapha Tettey Addy

see also: Obo Addy, Randy Weston

Jack Vartoogian

King Sunny Adé

Juju

Born 1946, in Oshogbo, Nigeria. Based in Lagos, Nigeria.

In addition to his hereditary crown, Nigeria's King Sunny Adé wears many hats—including businessman, nightclub owner, record company president, and film director—but it's his work as a master guitarist and bandleader of the New African Beats that has brought him international attention. His innovative brand of juju, a rich, polyrhythmic music that features multiple guitarists each playing different yet harmonious leads, includes pedal steel, congas, synthesizers, reggae-style dub effects, and a shimmering tidal wave of multi-layered percussion. It has made him a superstar at home and one of Africa's leading musical ambassadors to the world.

Adé was born to a royal family in the Yoruba tribe, but like many musicians of different means, he dropped out of grammar school and left home in search of fame and fortune. "Ja Funmi," a tune from Adé's first American album, tells of his struggle to gain respect from his family. "I was in love with music from my youth, but my family didn't want me to be in the music world. 'Ja Funmi' means 'my head fights for me.' The head controls your body and connects you to God; your head gives you the power to fight for what you believe in." Adé's first gig was in the other popular dance-music form of "highlife," with the band Moses Olaiya and his Rhythm Dandies—but he was increasingly drawn to juju, and, in the early '60s, joined the band of Tunde Nightingale, one of the sound's earliest pioneers.

Juju traces its roots back to various forms of traditional Yoruba guitar playing that include, but are not limited to, Christian aladura church music, traditional ashiko styles, and a Nigerian "blues" form. Ethnomusicoligist Chris Waterman says that the earliest forerunner of juju was probably a variant of the rural "palm wine" guitar style of Sierra Leone, as practiced by the large Leonian and Brazilian communities in Nigeria's capital, Lagos. In the '20s, as cheap gramophones became available there, players added elements drawn from American country music (especially the picking of Jimmy Rodgers), Hawaiian and Cuban pop music, and the British music-hall tradition. In the late '40s, the African talking drum became an integral part of the lineup, and the music took a giant leap in complexity and popularity. King Sunny Adé would bring it to an even higher level of sophistication and worldwide acceptance some 20 years later.

Adé formed his first juju band, the Green Spots, in 1967. Seven years later, after already recording 12 highly successful albums, he grew tired of the Nigerian music industry's hassles, broke his contract, changed the band's name to the African Beats, and formed his own label (Sunny Aladé, associated with London's Decca Records). Since then, he has released more than 100 albums for the home and international market.

While some Nigerian songwriters have used their music to address the country's mounting social problems, Adé's lyrics tend to try to influence the fray by being seemingly above it. "If I was political, I'd vibe my music to one side or the other, the rich side or the poor side, the oppressive side or the powerless side, the white side or the black side. Some people are creative, while others build weapons to destroy; that is my concern always. That is why I took a line of preaching love. If we talk heart to heart, and don't hide anything from ourselves, [everything would be] simple. The moment you love your brother as yourself, peace will be there."

what to buy: Juju Music ♪♪♪♪♪ (Mango, 1982, prod. Martin Meissonnier) is the album that introduced African pop to international audiences, and it couldn't be any stronger. Adé revamped several of his biggest Nigerian hits for the global market, and recorded them with just enough studio polish to make them come alive for ears unfamiliar with the complexities of the juju style. This album should be in any serious music collection.

what to buy next: 13 years after his international debut, Adé produced another masterwork with E Dide—Get Up! ♪♪♪♪½ (Mesa, 1995, prod. Sunny Adé, Andrew Frankel). There are a couple of tunes in English, and the tempos are faster, but the underlying groove is as deep and powerful as ever.

the rest:

Synchro System ♪♪♪♪ (Mango, 1983)
Aura ♪♪♪♪ (Island, 1984)
Return of the Juju King ♪♪♪♪ (Mercury, 1987)
Live Live Juju ♪♪♪½ (Rykodisc, 1988)
Live at the Hollywood Palace ♪♪♪½ (Hemisphere, 1994)
Odù ♪♪♪♪ (Mesa, 1998)

worth searching for: With more than 100 albums on vinyl and cassette, it's virtually impossible to do justice to Adé's output, but anything you come across in the collector's bins is probably worth your time.

influences:

◀◀ Ebenezer Obey, I. K. Dairo, Dele Abiodun

▶▶ Talking Heads, Shina Adewale & Superstars International, Dele Taiwo

j. poet

Adioa

African reggae

Formed 1986, in Paris, France. Based in Paris, France.

Maxidilick Adioa (Sidibe Mame Malick), vocals, percussion; Falman Bazuka (Etienne Fall), vocals, bass; Tony Harey Koy, vocals, drums, rhythm programs; Charly Winter, vocals, guitar; Dave Kynner, vocals, keyboards; Natti Kynner, vocals, synthesizer.

In Senegal's Soninke language Adioa means "progress" or "advance," and the reggae sound of these players from that country, Martinique, and Guadeloupe was quite progressive for its time. The band originally formed to back up the Paris-based reggae artist Jah Ark, with whom they toured Europe extensively before beginning to play their own music in 1986. Maxidilick, the band's vocalist and main songwriter, was born in Dakar, Senegal, and played in a trio called the Free Fires Band; he also worked briefly with Alpha Blondy. He met Falman Bazuka in the early 1980s, while playing with the band Apartheid Not. Bazuka was also briefly a member of Tshala Muana's backing band. The duo moved to Paris, and after breaking away from Jah Ark forged their own sound, a combination of reggae, zouk, funk, and jazz, with a touch of mbalax drumming added to the usual reggae one-drop riddims. The band's first single, "Toubab Bi Le," told the story of an infamous massacre of Africans by French troops in the days immediately after World War II. "Buma Done Yene," their second single, was a broad-based political protest: "If I were you, I would never get involved in politics. Culture should be shared worldwide. . . ." Their mixture of styles appeared fresh when they cut Soweto Man for Mango in 1989, and Maxidilick has the required high tenor and forceful delivery, but little has been heard from them since.

what's available: Hard riddims, sweeping synths, sharp rock guitar, and inventive percussion make Soweto Man ♪♪♪ (Mango, 1989, prod. Adioa, Paul "Groucho" Smykle) a solid reggae outing, in a roots reggae stylee.

influences:

◀◀ Alpha Blondy, Sonny Okosun, Kassav'

see also: Alpha Blondy, Tshala Muana

j. poet

Africando

Salsa, charanga

Formed 1992, in Senegal. Based in Senegal.

Pape Seck (Senegal, died February 2, 1995), vocals; Médoune Diallo (Senegal), vocals (1992–present); Nicolas Menheim (Senegal), vocals (1992–present); Ronnie Baró (USA), vocals (1995–present); Gnonnas Pedro (Benin), vocals (1996–present).

Ever since the 1930s the sultry Caribbean rhythms of Cuba and Puerto Rico—cultivated by the islands' musically fertile if socially troubled mix of African, Latin, and Native cultures—have returned to Africa via records, tapes, and radio broadcasts, making a huge impression on many indigenous bands. In Senegal, the Cuban charanga style with its violins and flutes was especially influential, and Cuban bands like Orquesta Aragon and the more recent Orquesta Ritmo Oriental still have their adherents. Where many of the Senegalese charanga-style bands differed from their Caribbean cousins was in taking the parts written for violin and flute and transferring them to the guitar. The 1960s saw further innovations in the form with the advent of the Star Band de Dakar, the first of the great African charanga bands to blend the jali traditions of Senegal and Gambia with Afro-Cuban rhythms. In 1971 another group, the Orchestre Baobab, helped complete the transition by incorporating Mandinka and Wolof lyrics into the equation. Pape Seck, one of the lead vocalists for the Star Band de Dakar, and Medoune Diallo, a singer with the Orchestre Baobab, were to form the vocal heart of Africando. The group itself came together when the legendary African producer Ibrahim Sylla was convinced by Boncana Maiga—a flautist from Mali with extensive experience in Cuba and in New York-based salsa bands—to combine some of Senegal's finest singers with a hand-picked batch of Latin musicians for a few sessions. The resulting dates mixed Seck, Diallo, and Nicolas Menheim (a singer in Youssou N'Dour's band) with salsa veterans whose partial résumés included work in bands led by Tito Puente, Mongo Santamaria, Cachao, Cal Tjader, Tito Nieves, and Johnny Pacheco. Ronnie Baró, the former lead vocalist with Orquesta Broadway, was initially in the chorus during the recording sessions but ended up singing lead on the title tune for the first album. After the gruff-voiced Seck died of liver cancer, Baró was brought into the band as a regular member. Just before the band recorded its third album, Gnonnas Pedro, a strong singer in the Afro-Cuban tradition from Benin, was added to the mix, giving Africando a legend-worthy front line of vocalists.

what to buy: Africando's initial release, Vol. 1—Trovador ♪♪♪♪♪ (Stern's, 1993, prod. Ibrahim Sylla), is chock full of rhythm and glorious vocals. The band organized by Boncana Maiga plays his arrangements with such verve that it's difficult to keep your feet still. Nicolas Menheim opens things up with "Doley Mbolo," a Wolof version of El Gran Combo's "La Eliminacion de los Feos," but the album enters immortality when Pape Seck's gruff yet supple singing puts "Lakh Bi" into hyperdrive. From then on Vol. 1—Trovador is nigh unbeatable. That "nigh" is necessary because the outtakes from the session form the heart of Vol. 2—Tierra Tradicional ♪♪♪♪♪ (Stern's, 1994, prod. Ibrahim Sylla), the perfect place to start one's acquaintance with Africando. Medoune Diallo is heard to great effect on "Xale Bile" but the heart of the album once again belongs to Seck, the power behind "Yay Boy," a huge favorite of New York City's Latino community when the album first hit the airwaves. The group's version of "Sabador (La Bamba)" is another killer cut.

what to buy next: Gombo Salsa ♪♪♪♪ (Stern's Africa, 1996, prod. Ibrahim Sylla) is more of a straight-ahead salsa album than the first two releases, though the blend of African and Spanish languages is still at the lyrical heart of the songs. Most of the musicians from the first two discs play on these sessions, ensuring high-quality instrumental continuity. There is also a batch of major-league Latin and African music stars helping out, including flute wizard José Fajardo and vocalist Tabu Ley Rochereau.

the rest:
Balboa! ♪♪♪½ (Stern's Africa, 1998) worth searching for: Pape Seck was involved with the outfit Starband Number One in 1972. Besides Seck the lineup also boasted Maquette N'Diaye, a singer prized for his Latin stylings. No. 1 de No. 1. ♪♪♪♪ (Dakar Sound, 1996, compilation prod. Ted Jaspers) documents this band, with various studio sessions and three live performances recorded at the Sahel nightclub where they regularly performed. It also includes the original version of "Maccaki," later recorded on the first Africando album as "Mathiaky."

influences:
⏮ Orchestra Aragon, Eddie Palmieri, Johnny Pacheco

see also: Sékouba "Bambino" Diabaté, Boncana Maiga, Tshala Muana, Orchestra Baobab, Gnonnas Pedro, Tabu Ley Rochereau

Garaud MacTaggart

Afro Celt Sound System

Anglo-Celtic/Afro-pop fusion

Formed 1995, in England. Based in England.

Ever-rotating membership, which has principally included: Simon Emmerson (England), guitars, programming; Myrdhin (Brittany, France), Celtic harp; Kauwding Cissokho (a.k.a. Kaouding Cissoko, Senegal), kora (1995–98); Massamba Diop (Senegal), talking drums (1995–98); Jo Bruce (U.K., died October 8, 1997), keyboards; James McNally (England), bodhrán, accordion, low whistle, keyboards; Martin Russell (England), keyboards, programming, engineering; N'Faly Kouyate (West Africa), vocals, kora, balafon (1998–present); Moussa Sissokho (West Africa), talking drum, djembe (1998–present).

The man behind the boards for many of Senegalese superstar Baaba Maal's tribal/Celtic crossover experiments, Simon Emmerson was eventually inspired to specialize in this surprising but successful hybrid with his own outfit, the Afro Celt Sound System. After collaborating on one such project of similar sensibility with Maal—prophetically, in a studio that happened to be decorated in Celtic symbols painted by artist Jamie Reid—Emmerson sent Reid a tape of the finished work, mentioning that he'd "recorded a collaboration between West African and Irish musicians and that [he'd] thought the studio atmosphere had been brilliant." In reply, Reid sent Emmerson an artwork titled "AfroCelts—Sound Magic Music from the Light Continent," along with a note stating, "Here's the sleeve for the album you are going to make." This set a predestined tone that would carry through in 1995 at a British WOMAD (World of Music, Arts and Dance) festival, where Afro Celt Sound System took the stage for the first time under that name, before they'd ever stepped into a studio—not a bad limbering-up exercise for the type of sound-assembly project that could easily succumb to the syndrome of being able to produce the goods but not deliver them live. There would be no worry of that, though; another thing this band was destined to do was transplant the creative disorder of the concert setting into the recording one. After launching at WOMAD, Emmerson, Jo Bruce, and Ron Aslan laid down debut backing tracks at RealWorld studios (like the festival, another Peter Gabriel-associated endeavor) during the all-star 1995 sound summit "RealWorld Recording Week," thus gaining access to a host of stellar participants—including French Celtic harpist Myrdhin, who'd played on some of the Maal recordings, and two members of Maal's band, Kauwding Cissokho (kora or African harp-lute) and Massamba Diop (tama or "talking drum"). A strong Celtic flavor came from vocalist Iarla O'Lionáird, multi-instrumentalist Ronan Browne (uilleann pipes, flute, mandolin, harmonium), and members of the Scottish avant-garde folk/rock/dance band Shooglenifty. The first Afro Celt Sound System disc, Volume 1: Sound Magic, was released in 1996; the follow-up, Volume 2: Release, in 1999. All along and still ongoing, much performance and a revolving cast of co-conspirators have kept up the circulation of fresh ideas and happy accidents that make the System's destiny as fulfilling for the listener as it is for the band.

what to buy: Volume 1: Sound Magic ♪♪♪♪♪ (RealWorld, 1996, prod. Simon Emmerson, Ron Aslan) puts the "multi" in multicultural, combining Anglo-Celtic and African roots with late '90s high-tech dance/pop grooves. Faster cuts like "Whirl-Y-Reel 1" lay melody lines played by uilleann pipes, harp, kora, whistles, and flute over chugging, dance-demanding rhythm tracks. Gaelic singer Iarla O'Lionáird's selections sound like slow airs, with the vocal taking the main melody while percussionists set down a steady rhythm and keyboard washes give the arrangements a haunting, symphonic effect. But there are even a few numbers with basically acoustic textures, like "Dark Noon, High Tide," in which the uilleann pipes are joined by acoustic guitar and percussion for a softer (if no less energetic) version of the System's characteristic sound. The evolution continues on Volume 2: Release ♪♪♪♪½ (RealWorld, 1999, prod. Simon Emmerson, Martin Russell), the main difference being that each track has more of an individual identity, and O'Lionáird's vocals are more prominent. His authentic Gaelic vocalizing works equally well on a slow, contemplative piece or a rousing dance number. As is already an Afro Celt trademark, several unexpected guests keep the party hearty; invited this time are Sinéad O'Connor, who gets the haunting Gaelic vibe perfectly on "Release," and uilleann pipers Ronan Browne (on a return appearance from Volume 1) and Michael McGoldrick, who contribute well to the project's distinctive Celtic flavor.

solo outings:
Kaouding Cissoko:
Kora Revolution ♪♪♪♪♪ (Palm Pictures/Yoff, 1999)

influences:
- Fripp & Eno, Kraftwerk, techno, electronica, Baaba Maal, Mouth Music, Moving Hearts, Capercaillie, Alan Stivell
- Talitha MacKenzie, Shooglenifty, Peatbog Faeries

see also: Baaba Maal, Ayub Ogada

Ken Roseman and Adam McGovern

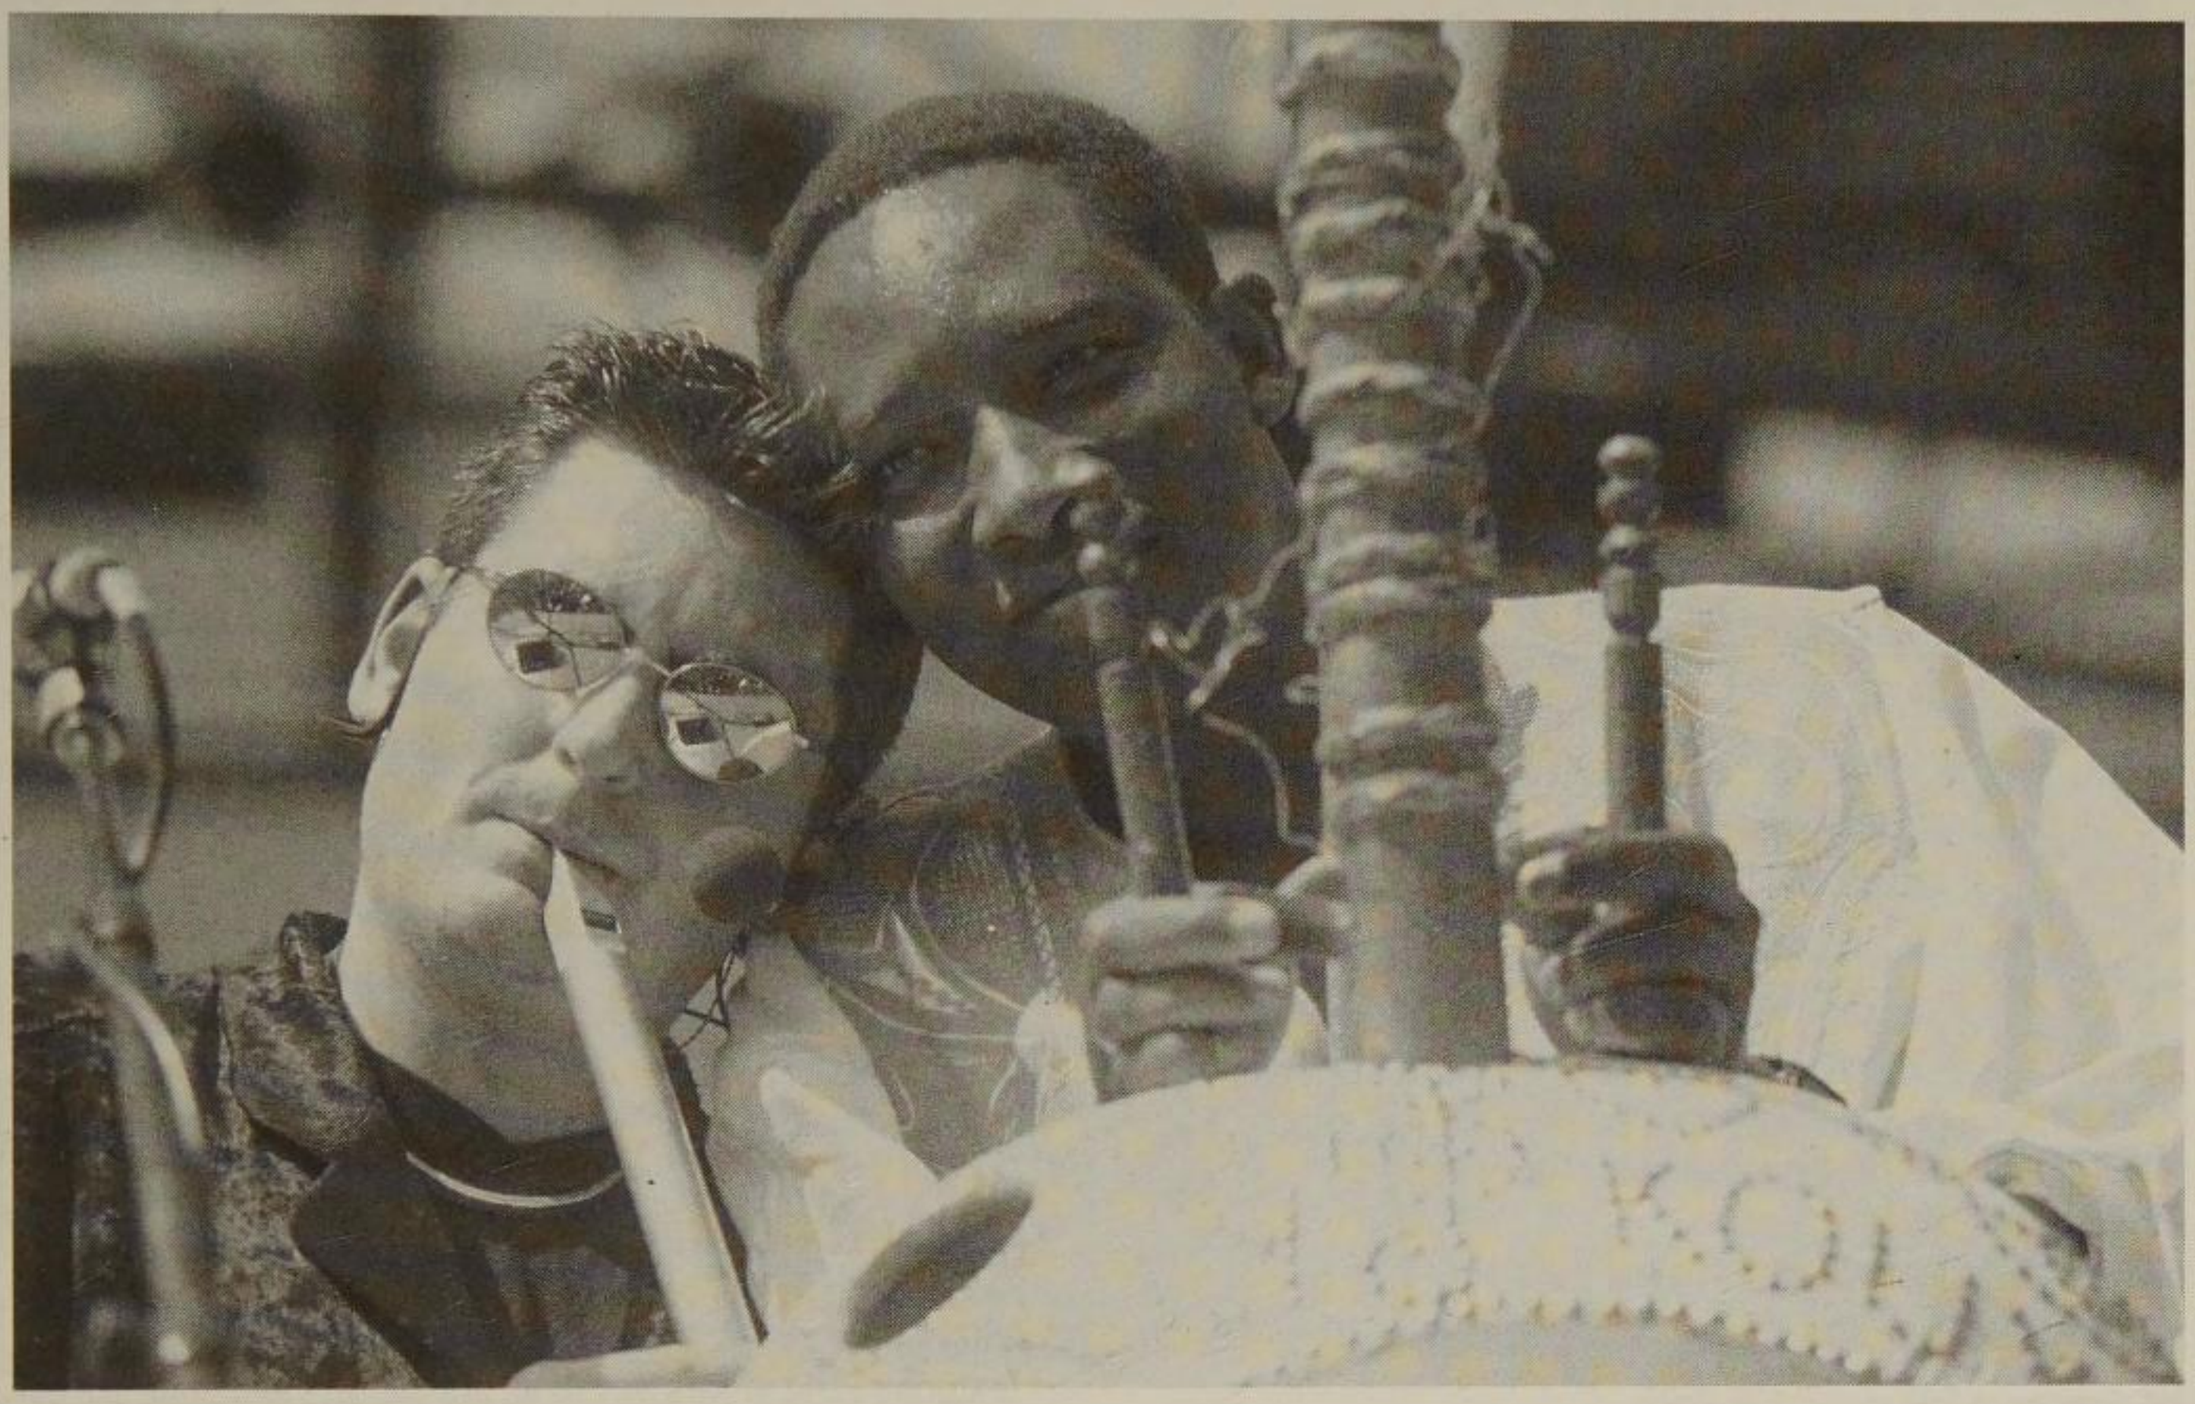
Mahmoud Ahmed

Ethopian soul

Born in Addis-Ababa, Ethiopia. Based in Addis-Ababa, Ethiopia.

In Ethiopia traditional music and popular music exist side by side, and most performers have two repertoires, one traditional, one pop. But the evolution of Ethiopian pop music has had an uphill battle. Thirty years of civil war, followed by 17 years of military dictatorship, put the brakes on the nightclub scene and made recording difficult. The last records were issued in 1978, and songs on cassettes were often banned for their "subversive" lyrics. Ahmed's father died when he was a child, and the family became homeless. Ahmed survived by shining shoes, often singing to the delight of his customers. He was expelled from grammar school and began singing seriously, hoping to make a living with music. During the years of the civil war, the only modern bands were those of the army and police. He auditioned for the army band, but was told he'd have to enlist to make the grade. Instead he got a job as a painter, carpenter and busboy at the Arizona, one of the few nightclubs in Addis-Ababa. One day he approached the bandstand during a rehearsal and asked for an audition. Gima Hadgue, the bandleader, let him sing; at the end of the number the applause signified the birth of a new star. Ahmed next joined the Imperial Bodyguard band as singer, and stayed there for 11 years. By the 1980s Ahmed owned his own record store and nightclub. With no formal music business, performers depend on hundreds of record-store labels for their bread and butter. Ahmed has recorded for them all, and with the end of the dictatorship and beginnings of democracy, performs regularly on the nightclub circuit.

what's available: Ahmed recorded Soul of Addis ♪♪♪½ (Earth-Works, 1997, prod. Mahmoud Ahmed) in the mid-1980s, and it's a solid effort. Ahmed sings tixta, which he calls the "Ethiopian blues," although to American ears it sounds like a cross between reggae, deep fried Southern soul, and Arabic R&B. Like many soul shouters, Ahmed has a big, emotional voice, with instrumental tracks that maintain a slow, satisfying simmer and feature a familiar backbeat and wailing, blues-drenched horn charts.



James McNally (l) & N'Faly Kouyate of Afro Celt Sound System

worth searching for: The recording on Ere Mela Mela ♪♪♪ (Crammed Discs, 1986, prod. Mahmoud Ahmed, Francis Falceto) isn't the best, and it's mixed with Ahmed's voice (and occasionally the sax) way out front, but this collection of cassette singles from 1975–1978 gives you a good idea of what Ethiopian street music sounds like.

influences:

⏮ Imperial Bodyguard Band, Tlahoun Gessesse

⏭ Aster Aweke, Ephrem Tamru, Kuku Sebsebe, Neway Debebe

j. poet

Pierre Akendengue

Pan-African pop

Born 1944, in Port Gentil, Gabon. Based in Port Gentil, Gabon and Paris, France.

Gabon is home to almost 50 ethnic groups, and until the ascent of Pierre Akendengue, most Gabonese recordings concentrated on this vast reservoir of folk and traditional music. In the wake of Akendengue's success, a Gabonese sound is starting to develop, but much of the country's music is still dominated by that of its powerful neighbors, Congo and Cameroon. That said, Akendengue is one of Africa's most creative and visionary musicians, and Gabon's reigning musical genius. He is an internationally recognized singer, composer, poet, playwright, and musician who spent seven years of his life in exile because of his outspoken political opinions.

By the age of 14 Akendengue's songs were being played on national radio. He moved to Paris when he was 20 to study literature in Caen and psychology at the Sorbonne. Unfortunately, he was also going blind, and he returned to Gabon, where his opposition to the government forced him into exile. He began releasing albums in 1974, and from the first they revealed a singular vision, combining music, poetry, traditional and electric instruments, political lyrics, and a diverse style. The latter melded influences from Caribbean to Latin, from North American (funk, bluesy guitars) to African, with an emphasis on inventive percussion arrangements. In 1993 Akendengue recorded Lambarena, one of the most startling African albums ever made.

Subtitled "Johann Sebastion Bach in Africa," Akendengue mixed a baroque chamber orchestra with an African rhythm section to play Bach. He arranged choral works for African voices, adapted African traditional music for baroque instrumentation, and had his drummers work changes on Bach's cantatas and partitas. Today, he continues to confound, following dance-happy excursions with dark, introspective outings full of sighing choral work and low-key yet relentless percussion.

what to buy: Lambarena ♪♪♪♪♪ (Celluloid/Melodie France, 1993, prod. Akendengue) is the first African concept album, recorded as a tribute to Albert Schweitzer, another lover of Bach, and named after the town Schweitzer lived and worked in. Akendengue finds the Africanisms in Bach, and the Baroque "influences" in African music, to create a work of rare beauty and stunning originality. Maladalite ♪♪♪♪½ (Celluloid/Melodie France, 1995, prod. Akendengue) is an African singer/songwriter album that once again combines classic European influences with Latin rhythms and traditional African touches.

the rest:
Awana W'Africa ♪♪♪♪ (Celluloid/Melodie France, 1983)
Reveil de L'Afrika ♪♪♪♪ (Celluloid/Melodie France, 1984)
Piroguier ♪♪♪♪ (Melodie France)
Silence ♪♪♪♪ (Celluloid/Melodie France)

influences:
Gabonese folk music, J. S. Bach
Kassav', Missema

j. poet

Farid al-Atrash

Arabic pop

Born c. 1915, in Jabal al-Duruz, Syria. Died December 26, 1974, in Beirut, Lebanon.

Farid al-Atrash was known as "The King of the Oud"(Arabic lute), but he was also a gifted composer and singer. Like his Egyptian counterpart, Mohamed Abdel Wahab, al-Atrash often blended non-Arabic styles (including flamenco, tango, and waltz rhythms) into his tunes, forever broadening the Middle Eastern musical palette. In 1924 al-Atrash's mother Aliyah Husayn moved her three children from Syria to Egypt, escaping the fighting that was going on between the French forces of occupation and the Druze rebels (among them Prince Fahd al-Atrash, Farid's father). Aliyah sang and played the oud on the radio and in various venues around Cairo to support her family. Farid heard her practicing around the house but started his formal musical education by singing in the choir at a local Christian-sponsored school. Legend has it that an instructor was unimpressed by Farid's pleasant but innocuous vocals, finally advising him to "cry" as a way of expressing feelings that audiences could react to. This advice worked and al-Atrash was later known for the "tear" in his voice when singing the poignant lyrics that helped shape his popularity. After graduation al-Atrash worked for a while in Ibrahim Hammoudeh's group before enrolling at the Institute of Arabic Music, where he studied oud performance with Riyad al-Sunbati. His career took off during the '30s when he started singing and playing on the Egyptian state-run radio network. By 1941 al-Atrash had added "film star" to his resume when he acted, along with his sister Amal (an incredibly popular singer known professionally as Asmahan), in a movie called Intisar Ichabab. He also wrote all the music for it, something he was to do for most of the remaining 30-plus films in his cinematic career. Even though al-Atrash was creating an artistically fulfilling oeuvre, his personal life had its playboy aspects, which would alienate his mother even as it created the raw material for his songs. Toward the end of his life al-Atrash had homes in Beirut and Cairo and had written more than 300 songs, plus a substantial number of works that stressed his instrumental prowess. When he died there were rumors that his family refused to let him be buried in the ancestral homeland due to his profligate behavior, but his will supposedly stressed his wish to be buried in Egypt where his career had first taken root.

what to buy: There are more than 20 different CDs available featuring Farid al-Atrash, but all are imports and none are especially easy to find in mainstream stores. Almost every one of them pairs the artist and an Arabic orchestra, with violins stroking a minor mode as percussion floats around the vocals. An Evening with the King of the 'Oud' ♪♪♪♪ (Voice of Lebanon, 1992) is a good place to start since one of his biggest hits, "al-Rabi," is included. Super Belly Dance, Volume 1 ♪♪♪♪ (Voice of Stars, 1978, prod. Daniel der Sahakian) is an exciting album of instrumental music with nary a reflective tune among its five.

what to buy next: With the exception of al-Atrash's soundtrack music, most of his available albums are taken from concerts. The eponymous (given the variations in his name's spelling in different countries) Farid El Atrache ♪♪♪♪ (Voice of Lebanon, 1990), with its dramatic "Baa Ayez Tensani" and the somewhat lighter-textured "Gara Eih Ya Ossalna," is one of the best studio albums available. It is fairly well engineered, with an emphasis on the vocal rather than the instrumental. King of the Oud ♪♪♪½ (Voice of Lebanon, 1990) is part concert recording and part studio effort. Most of al-Atrash's performances started with taqâsîm (an improvisational discipline based on a complex set of preestablished rules and conventions) that demonstrated his formidable technique on the oud before commencing the vocal portion of his show. The first cut on this album displays al-Atrash's instrumental artistry but is cobbled together from various concerts, with the audience(s) getting a bit exuberant at times. The other piece on the disc is a studio version of "Kelmet Itaab," an astonishing virtuoso piece for oud and singer, sans orchestra, that is worth the price of the album.

Ishtar of Alabina & Los Ninos de Sara

best of the rest:
Super Belly Dance, Vol. 2 ♪♪♪½ (Voice of Lebanon, 1980)
Baa Ayez Tensani ♪♪♪½ (Voice of Lebanon, 1990)
Les Archives (1930) ♪♪♪½ (Voice of Lebanon, 1993)

worth searching for: Soundtrack recordings are the best place to hear how al-Atrash attempted to blend Western musical idioms with Arabic modes. Original soundtrack recordings from "Rissala Men Imraa Majhoula" and "Youm Bila Ghad" ♪♪♪ (Voice of Lebanon, 1992) contains eight tunes that run the gamut from flamenco to waltz to traditional Arabic melodies, with a little Cuban clave rhythm tossed in for percussive spice. If all else fails, there is a well-recorded collection by Hossam Ramzy called Best of Farid al-Atrash ♪♪♪♪ (Arc Music, 1993, prod. Hossam Ramzy) that will give you a sense of how al-Atrash might have sounded.

influences:
⏮ Riyad al-Sunbati

⏭ Hossam Ramzy, Fawzi Sayeb, George Abyad

see also: Hossam Ramzy, Mohamed Abdel Wahab

Garaud MacTaggart

Alaap

Bhangra

Formed c. 1982, in London, England. Based in London, England.

Channi Singh, leader, singer, composer, toombi; Pandit Dinesh, dholak, tabla, chanda, bass, keyboards, drum programs, percussion; Stephen Luscombe, sound effects, live keyboard mixing; Errol Reed, keyboards; Arvind, keyboards; Paul Inder, guitar, bass; Sunil, tabla, dholak, dhol; Johny, dhol; Sumeet, keyboards; Claudio, sax. (All members are from England.)

Bhangra is a genuine worldbeat sound, created to serve a community that calls two far-flung countries home. In the Punjab (now part of Pakistan), where one of the main crops is hemp, or bhang, there are yearly harvest festivals driven by the relentless beat of the dhol, a doubled-headed folk drum. After the massive immigration to England that followed in the wake of World War II, the new Indian communities began looking for their own cultural expressions, a quest that Channi Singh of Alaap would eventually take up. When he realized the bhangra beat fit neatly into the 4/4 of Western pop, the band began adding western drum kits and electric instruments to the traditional lineup of dohls, dholak, and tablas. The result was an explosion of creativity that eventually led to new beats like "jungle." Singh formed Alaap in the early 1980s, and the band's updating of bhangra for a new generation made them a sensation, although Alaap has stayed closer to the music's traditional (and acoustic) roots than many.

what to buy: Hits of Alaap ♪♪♪♪½ (Multitone, 1991, prod. various) collects the hits that started the bhangra craze in Britain; Punjabi folk music given a modern spin. Multitone recently folded, but most Indian import stores will be able to supply you with all the Alaap titles you need.

the rest:
Teri Chunni De Sitare ♪♪♪♪½ (Multitone, 1978)
Best of Alaap ♪♪♪♪½ (Multitone, 1990)
Gold ♪♪♪♪ (Multitone, 1991)
Simply Alaap ♪♪♪♪ (Multitone, 1993)

influences:
◀◀ Punjabi folk music
▶▶ Heera, Premi, Holle Holle, Safri Boys

j. poet

Alabina

Egyptian-flamenco dance music

Formed 1997, in Paris, France. Based in Paris, France.

Ishtar (Egypt), vocals; Tonio, guitar, vocals; Coco, percussion, vocals; Santi, guitar, vocals; Ramon, guitar, vocals. (All members are from Spain unless otherwise noted.)

Alabina may be the only group that crosses Egyptian and Spanish styles, and they have certainly struck a popular chord with their passionate, accessible sound, making the world-music charts in France, Denmark, England, and the States. The band came together when Ishtar, the group's alluring vocalist, did some recording sessions with Los Ninos de Sara, a group of four cousins who played a driving, listener-friendly blend of flamenco and other gypsy music. The musicians decided to work together more permanently, and chose as their name a modified version of their song titled "Yallabina (Let's Go)." Their two CDs to date have blended Egyptian and Spanish vocals, and crossed traditional gypsy instrumentation with bright, contemporary pop production.

what's available: Alabina ♪♪♪♪ (Astor Place, 1997), the group's debut album, is its best, and showcases the wonderful contrasts between Tonio's deep vocals in Spanish and Ishtar's sultry vocals in Egyptian. When they alternate lines, as on the slow, soulful "Linda Maria," the sound they produce is exquisite. On churning dance tunes like "Espreso," Ishtar proves that she is a strong contender for diva-of-the-moment. Alabina 2 ♪♪♪♪ (Astor Place, 1998) continues in the same vein, but with a bigger, more layered instrumental sound. Smooth ballads, driving flamenco, and bouncy pop tunes are all attired in keyboards and percussion designed to maintain a strong dance groove.

influences:
◀◀ Gipsy Kings, Celine Dion

Michael Parrish

Chava Alberstein

Folk, worldbeat

Born 1946, in Szczecin, Poland. Based in Israel.

Chava Alberstein has been called "the first lady of Israeli song," and since the recording of her self-titled debut in 1964, she has released more than 50 albums in her adoptive homeland. A native of Poland, Alberstein moved with her family to northern Haifa, Israel, at the age of four. She acquired a love of Yiddish and Hebrew—along with her innate affinity for music—equally early on. Alberstein's public debut came with a popular Israeli radio show appearance in 1963 with her clarinetist brother Alex. Still a teenager, she spotlighted the range that would become her trademark as she performed a black gospel tune in English, a folk song in Spanish, a chanson in French, and a song in Yiddish. The positive reception prompted a swift step up to the even more widely heard show, Moadon Hazemer.

When CBS launched an Israeli branch in 1964, Alberstein became one of the first artists signed. Her debut album, which included four songs in Yiddish, was recorded in two hours, simply featuring Alberstein on vocals and guitar. She recorded the follow-up, an all-Hebrew effort, a month later. Drafted into the Army shortly afterward, Alberstein spent two years entertaining the Israeli troops. Upon her release, she recorded an album backed by an orchestra and her first collection of children's music. Maintaining this busy and diverse schedule, she performed a one-woman show and two children's musicals, and also played with a jazz band, Hoplatina.

Alberstein sought still other outlets for her talents: In addition to hosting a weekly children's television show for two years, she appeared in several feature films including Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dream Coat, and authored a children's book, I Am Not Perfect. A book of Alberstein's songs, Sher Bementana (A Gift of Songs), was the first of its kind to be published in Israel.

Chava Alberstein

Alberstein's broad tastes and ambitions were underscored by a 1996 tour with Argentinian songstress and activist Mercedes Sosa, which served to accentuate not only Alberstein's persistent social consciousness but her international appeal. That popularity finally spread to America in 1998, as she introduced herself with a look back and a bold new move, each in the same year: the retrospective Crazy Flower: The Collection, and a collaboration with innovative 21st-century klezmer band the Klezmatics.

what's available: Crazy Flower: The Collection ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1998, prod. various) surveys Alberstein's lengthy career and includes tracks from her Israeli albums. The Well ♪♪♪♪ (Xenophile, 1998, prod. Ben Mink) combines Alberstein's soulful vocals, uplifting musical accompaniment by the Klezmatics, and the spirited words of 20th-century Yiddish poets.

influences:

⏮ Leonid Utyosov, Moshe Beregovsky

⏭ The Klezmatics, Muzsikás

see also: The Klezmatics

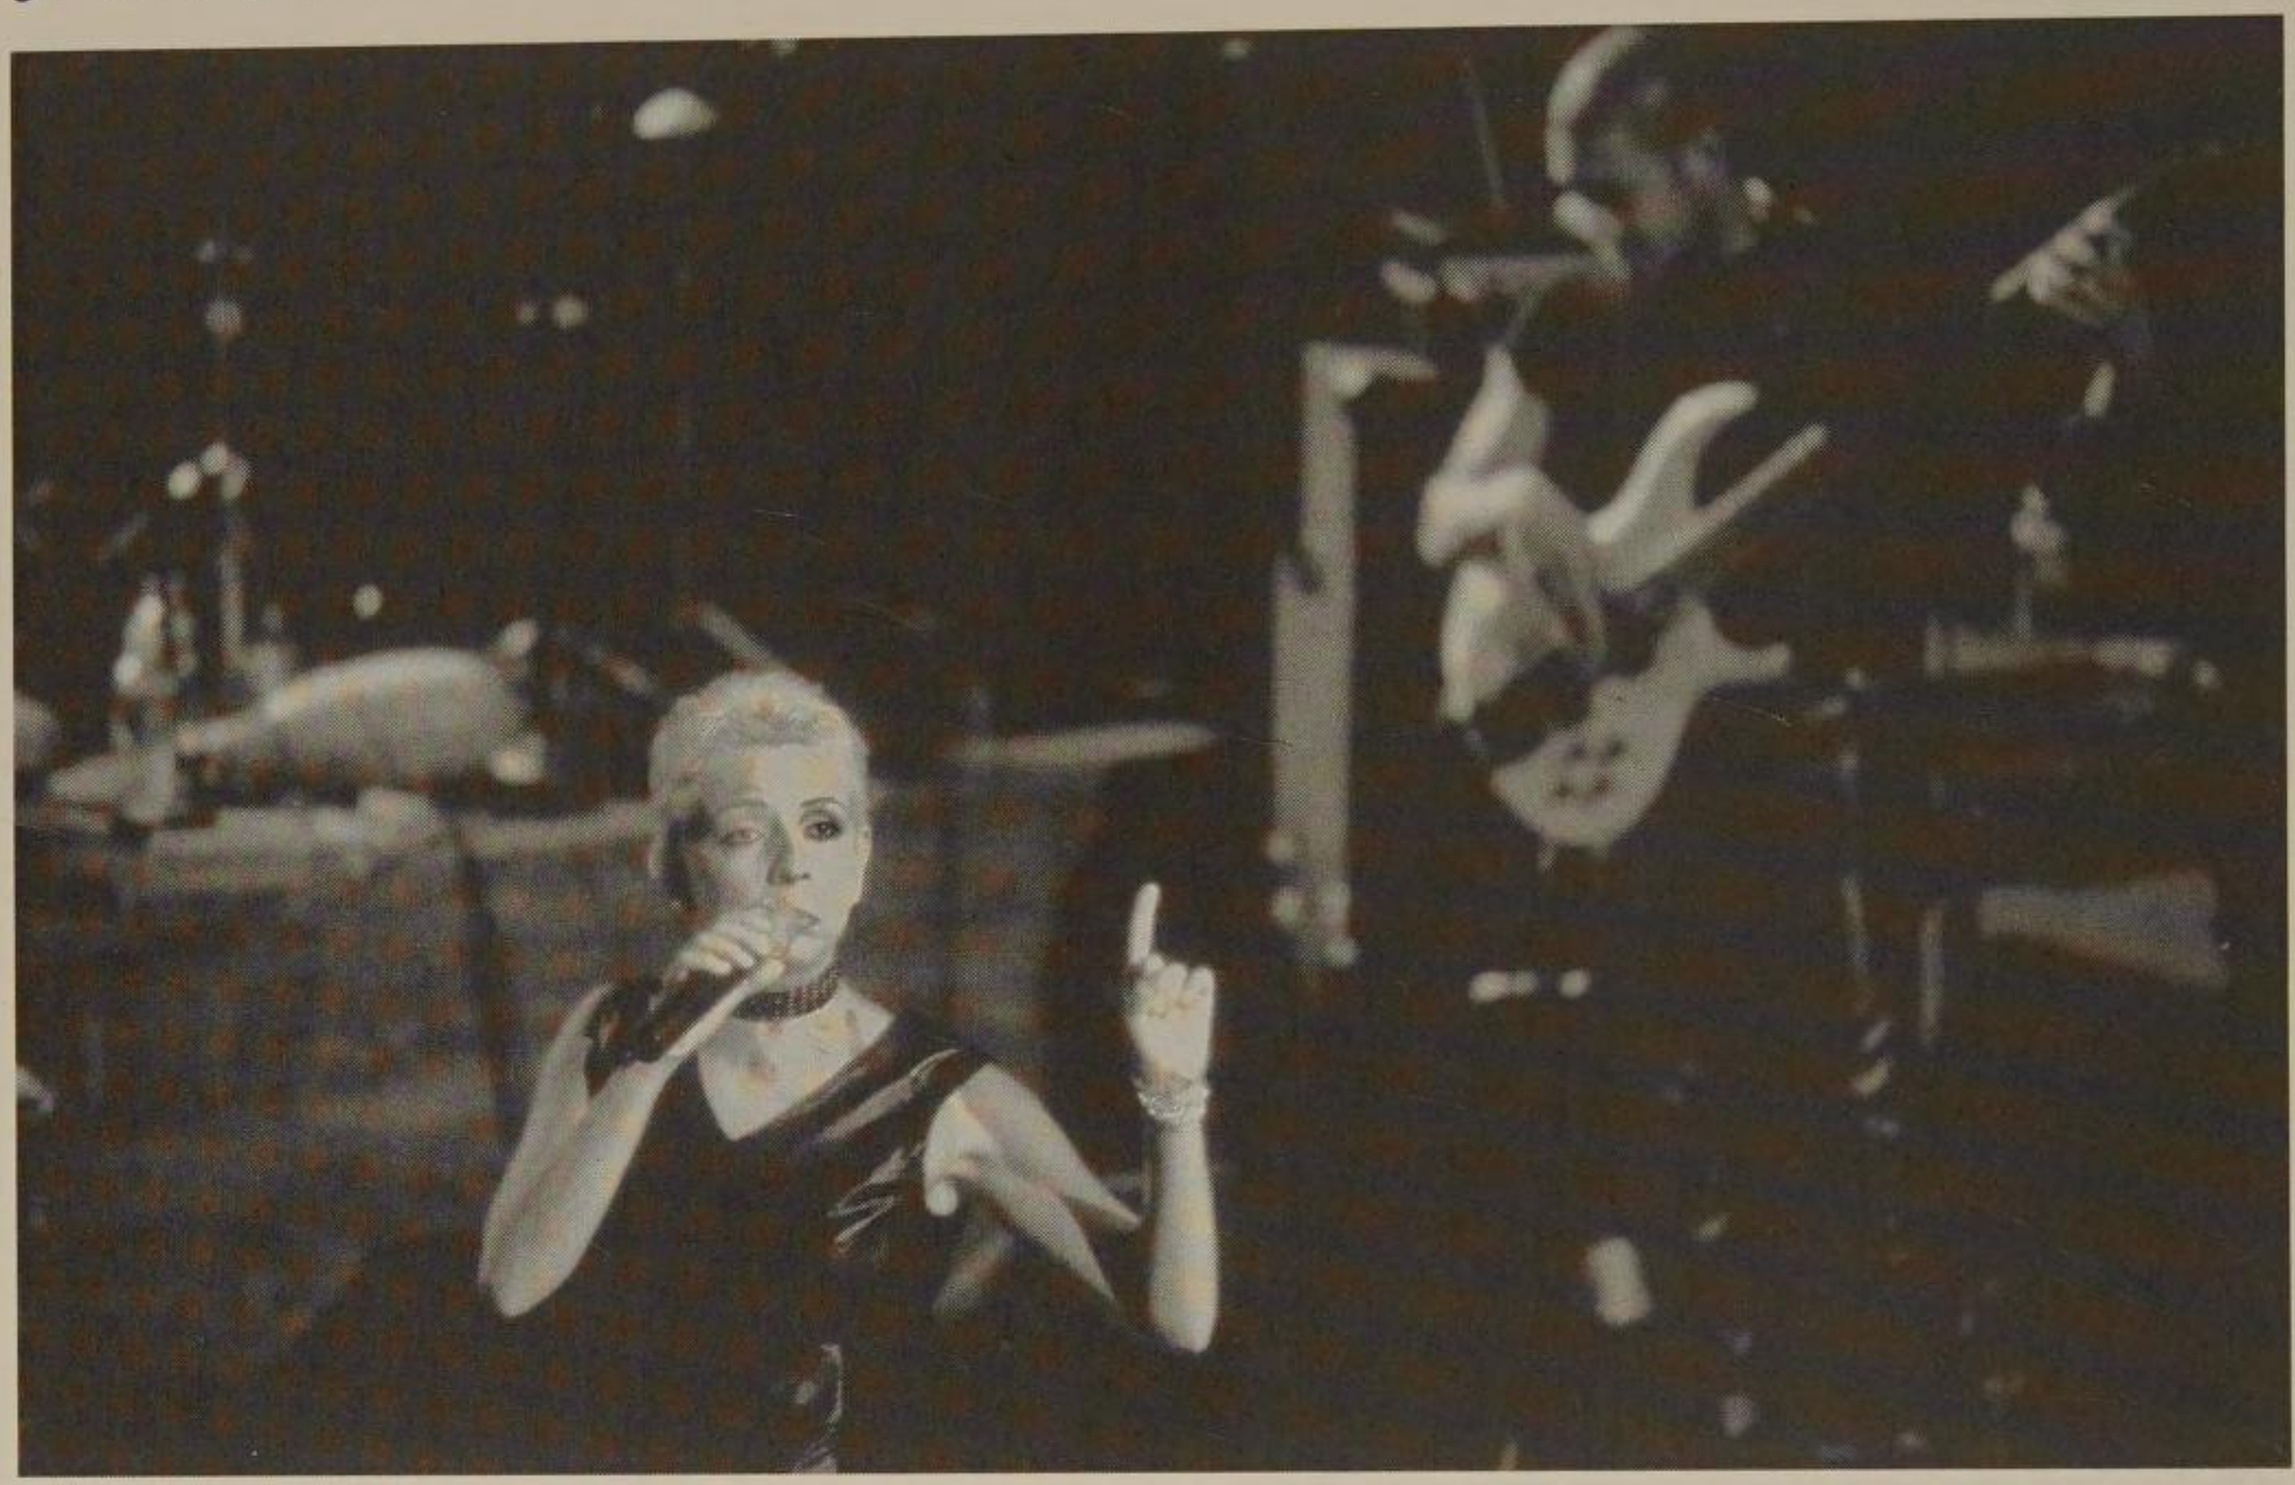
Craig Harris

Albita

Son, guajira

Born Albita Rodriguez, 1962, in Havana, Cuba. Based in Miami, FL, USA.

Albita performs guajira, a form of Cuban "country" music that many young Cubans consider corny, but since she and her band came to the United States in 1993 they've created the biggest buzz Miami's Cuban community has ever witnessed. She was immediately signed to Emilio Estefan's Crescent Moon label, had a video directed by Madonna's brother Chris Ciccone, posed for photo spreads in the fashion pages of magazines like Detour and Mirabella, and started doing turn-away business at Centro Vasco, where she and her band of expatriates churned out a "pure" brand of neo-classical Cuban music. "I grew up listening to punto guarijo," Albita says. "That mixture of Africa and Spain was inspirational. I wanted to do pure Cuban music, but the younger generation wasn't interested, which made it hard to stay authentic." Albita began playing guitar at 14, hoping to become a songwriter. Her forceful alto made her a favorite of Castro, but Havana wasn't wild about her "old school" style. "Because of the embargo,



Albita

North American music (especially rock) has an exotic appeal," she explains. "Music needs roots to stay strong, but authentic music isn't hip [in Cuba]. I had to leave home for my artistic survival." In 1993, Albita and her band decided to defect. They'd gotten a four-year gig in Colombia, but after two years they flew to Mexico for a bogus "recording session." They took taxis across the border at El Paso. A friend put her in touch with Emilio Estefan, who helped the band with a place to stay and a recording contract. The rest is history in the making.

what to buy: No Se Parece A Nada ♪♪♪♪ (Crescent Moon/Epic, 1995, prod. Juan R. Marquez), like the new land in which the band found itself, is as good a place to start as any. Albita is an expressive vocalist, with a rough-hewn alto that grabs you by the ears and gives you a good shake. The power of her band and the strength of the arrangements makes you realize how bland most salsa romantico is. Although that band is a crack unit, Estefan augmented the group with some of the top Latin musicians in the world for this album. Cachao Lopez played bass on a few tracks, and Ruben Blades did some arranging for a set that spins around you like a storm from the heart of West Africa. "I like that elemental feeling," the singer says. "Jazz, bolero, guaguanco, African drums, and syncopation, that's what keeps the music strong." Una Mujer Como Yo ♪♪♪½ (Crescent Moon/Epic, 1997, prod. Kike Santander, Roberto Blades, Julia Sierra, Albita) is another pure energetic jolt from Albita and her band.

worth searching for: Habra Musica Guajira ♪♪♪♪ (EGREM, 1988) is Albita's debut for Cuba's state-run record label, the set that made her a "contenda."

influences:
Celia Cruz

see also: Ruben Blades, Cachao, Gloria Estefan

j. poet

Haris Alexiou

Laiko, rembetiko

Born in Greece. Based in Greece.

Haris Alexiou's sultry vocals, personal lyrics, and tales of heartache have situated her as one of Greece's most admired contemporary artists, continually evoking the passion in everyday life through the rembetiko (Greek urban blues) style. Even as Alexiou does a great job of recording rembetika (the slightly different term for "rembetiko songs"), her laika, or pop songs, have managed to remain honest and simple—a feat that has eluded many modern-day recording artists in Greece. While the bulk of her work has been released in the past decade, few remember that Alexiou has been recording since 1973, when she appeared on Apostolos Kaladias's seminal rembetiko revival album Mikra Asia ("Asia Minor"). Her big break came with the single "Dimitroula" (from her album Laika Tragoudia), one of Greece's most popular hits throughout the 1970s. A versatile artist, Alexiou has sung in French and Arabic as well as Greek. Her rapturous songs about love continue to both break and heal the heart.

what to buy: Mikra Asia (Asia Minor) ♪♪♪♪♪ (1973) is a marvelous evocation of the oriental influence carried over to Greece through the city of Smyrne, which is now known as Ishmir, part of Turkey. Matching Alexiou with such other heavyweights-to-be as George Dalaras, this album helps trace the roots of rembetiko. Alexiou came into her own with the solo debut Laika Tragoudia ♪♪♪♪♪ (Mercury, 1975), which established the commercial success and commanding vocals that would make her one of the preeminent acts in Greece. Collaborating with musicians like Manu Katché and Pino Palladino, Alexiou released To Pehnidi tis Kardias (Games of the Heart) ♪♪♪♪♪ (Mercury, 1988, prod. Haris Andreadis), writing her own lyrics—a challenge few female artists have tackled in popular Greek music—and matching the poignancy of her most popular work, with a newly personal dimension.

what to buy next: Odos Nefelis ♪♪♪♪ (Mercury, 1995, prod. Haris Andreadis) is Alexiou's first plunge into full songwriting, in which she acquits herself admirably while lending her characteristic interpretive insight to the album's one cover, François Bernheim's "Les Hommes qui Passent." The recent Di Efkon ♪♪♪½ (Mondo Melodia, 1998, prod. Haris Andreadis) has given Alexiou more presence on an international level, but lacks the warmth of her previous efforts.

the rest:
Ta Tslilika ♪♪♪ (Mercury)

worth searching for: Ena Fili to Kosmo (A Kiss to the World) ♪♪♪♪ (Mercury, 1997, prod. Haris Andreadis) is Alexiou's live album. Complete with a booklet surveying her career, this collection showcases her prowess as a performer; highlights include a 1993 set in Athens with spiritual singer/songwriter Petros Gaitanos.

influences:

- George Dalaras, Apostolos Kaladias, Mikis Theodorakis, Arletta
- Anna Visi

Helen Giano

Jerry Alfred & the Medicine Beat

Native folk-rock

Formed 1993, in Yukon, Canada. Based in the Northern Tutchone Nation, Yukon, Canada.

Jerry Alfred, guitar, traditional drums, lead vocals; Bob Hamilton, electric and acoustic guitar, mandolin, bouzouki, vocals; Andrea McColeman, keyboards, accordion, marimba, vocals; Marc Paradis, drums, percussion; Marie Gogo, vocals. (All members are from Canada.)

Jerry Alfred is the song keeper of his nation, a position of great importance to a people whose traditions are passed down orally through song and poetry. "Our music was dying out," Alfred said. "The people in my tribe that lived in areas with the longest contact with Europeans had a lot of their culture missing, and the young kids were ashamed of singing with a drum. Our language was mostly spoken by middle-aged people." Alfred couldn't help but notice how acclimated young Indians were to the rhythms of rap and rock, so he decided to use pop music as a means of awaking them to the beauty of their own culture. Alfred teamed with producer and guitarist Bob Hamilton in a largely exploratory fashion for a first album, Etsi Shon. It won the Canadian Juno award for best Aboriginal Album in 1995, and became a pop hit as well, which led Alfred and Hamilton to create a band to take their show on the road. The album's title track was included on the United Nations' 50th Anniversary CD, and provided part of the soundtrack for the Native American Photo Exhibit at the Atlanta Olympics. Its success has also made the younger people of the Tutchone Nation start seeking out their elders to learn their native language. Alfred said the album's popularity surprised him—but not totally. "A medicine man told my father, when I was young, that I'd be a singer and bring back the old songs to my people. I think a lot of (non-Native) people are searching for that connection to the land and the old ways, the feeling that we have in our blood. Maybe when this music came out, people could sense how it stretches back in time to those deep feelings."

what's available: Etsi Shon: Grandfather Song ♪♪♪½ (Red House, 1996, prod. Bob Hamilton) is an album of timeless beauty. Hamilton's atmospheric guitar fills the background with sustained notes that shimmer like the northern lights. There are touches of rock, American and Canadian folk, blues, and Acadian (French Canadian) folk in the mix, but it's Alfred's plaintive singing and drumming that hook you. Nendaä: Go Back ♪♪♪♪ (Red House, 1996, prod. Bob Hamilton), recorded after the Medicine Beat had a year of touring under its belt, is comparatively polished and mainstream, sounding more folky than Native at times.

2/2 lillian allen

influences:

⏮ The Band, Gordon Lightfoot, Bob Dylan, Neil Young

j. poet

Lillian Allen

Reggae, dub poetry

Born in Jamaica. Based in Toronto, Ontario, Canada.

Lillian Allen is a seminal figure in dub poetry, the reggae-based verse that was a forerunner of rap and kin to calypso in its political content. For the past 20 years she's become particularly well-known for live performances at festivals, where she reads from her many books of poetry (including Women Do This Every Day, 1993) and performs with an always-stellar band. An eloquent wordsmith, Allen never shrinks from controversy, but in her revolution everyone dances.

worth searching for: At this writing all of Allen's recordings are out of print Stateside, so grab whichever one you find. Nothing but a Hero ♪♪♪♪ (Redwood, 1991) is a children's album of energetic charm, with a great title track saluting Harriet Tubman ("You didn't just sit there on your bum bum bum/Waiting for your freedom to come come come") and a number of other songs to entertain and educate children and adults. Revolutionary Tea Party ♪♪♪♪ (Redwood, 1986) was named by Ms. magazine as a "Landmark Album of the Past 20 Years" in 1991. Conditions Critical ♪♪♪♪ (Redwood, 1988) is equally powerful.

influences:

⏮ Sister Carol

⏭ Lauryn Hill

see also: Benjamin Zephaniah

Pamela Murray Winters

Herb Alpert

"Ameriachi"

Born March 31, 1935, in Los Angeles, CA, USA. Based in Los Angeles, CA, USA.

Widely derided for stuffing the pop charts of the 1960s with a slew of Mexicali-lite instrumental hits, Alpert and his band the Tijuana Brass, in their own insidious way, actually did more than any other recording group to expose the Latin sound to legions of unsuspecting listeners the world over. From his very first chart success in 1962 (a rearrangement of Sol Lake's "Twinkle Star" scored as a trumpet duet and rechristened "The Lonely Bull"), Alpert's easy-listening, south-of-the-border renditions of everything from Beatles to Bacharach quickly ingrained themselves into everything from TV game shows to motion picture soundtracks. Along with business partner Jerry Moss, Alpert produced and released each of these hits on his very own A&M Records label, which also launched several other Mexican-styled instrumental combos during the '60s, and would long reign as one of the most successful independent recording organizations in the world. In his own decidedly understated manner, Alpert to this day continues to take his trumpet into hitherto uncharted musical realms—recent collaborators include such diverse artists as South African great Hugh Masekela, pop-reggae hitmakers UB40, and dance-music superproducer Jimmy Jam. He's also got as good an impresario's ear as ever, now heading the label Almo Sounds and breaking visionary Latin acts—like Ozomatli—with the critical credibility that's eluded Alpert himself. And while he would be the first to admit he's hardly an innovator in league with, say, Quincy Jones, his Tijuana Brass sound remains an inescapable ingredient of soft jazz, Latin music . . . and, yes, TV game shows.

what to buy: From the overabundance of greatest hits packages available, Foursider ♪♪♪♪ (A&M, 1973, prod. Herb Alpert, Jerry Moss) and Classics, Volume 20 ♪♪♪ (A&M, 1987, prod. various) together provide a suitable overview of Alpert's work, both with the Brass and beyond.

what to buy next: The classic original Whipped Cream and Other Delights ♪♪♪ (A&M, 1965, prod. Herb Alpert, Jerry Moss) is the quintessential Alpert: from its crossover wallop of covers ("Lemon Tree," the monster hit "A Taste of Honey," and even Leiber & Stoller's "Love Potion #9") to its sleeve (of a whipped-cream-drenched, finger-licking young bride), this album was no less than the Sgt. Pepper of the MOR set in its day.

the rest:

Lonely Bull ♪♪♪ (A&M, 1962)
Christmas Album ♪♪♪½ (A&M, 1968)
Greatest Hits ♪♪♪♪ (A&M, 1970)
Greatest Hits, Volume Two ♪♪♪½ (A&M, 1973)
Rise ♪♪♪ (A&M, 1979)
Classics, Volume One ♪♪♪♪ (A&M, 1987)
Keep Your Eye on Me ♪♪½ (A&M, 1987)
North on South Street ♪♪ (A&M, 1991)
Midnight Sun ♪♪½ (A&M, 1992)
Second Wind ♪♪ (Almo Sounds, 1996)
Passion Dance ♪♪♪ (Almo Sounds, 1997)
Coleccion Mi Historia ♪♪♪½ (PolyGram Latino, 1997)
Herb Alpert and Colors N/A (Almo Sounds, 1999)

influences:

⏮ Chet Baker, Louis Prima, Carlos Arruza

Sergio Mendes, Baja Marimba Band, Chuck Mangione

see also: Ozomatli

Gary Pig Gold

Altan

Irish traditional

Formed 1987, in Gaoth Dobhair, County Donegal, Ireland. Based in Dublin, Ireland.

Mairéad Ní Mhaonaigh, fiddle, vocals; Frankie Kennedy (died 1994), flute, whistle, vocals; Ciarán Curran, bouzouki; Mark Kelly, guitar, vocals; Paul O'Shaughnessy, fiddle (1988–92); Cíarán Tourish, fiddle, whistle, vocals (1990–present); Dáithí Sproule, guitar, vocals (1992–present); Dermot Byrne, accordion (1994–present). (All members are from Ireland.)

As sure as Planxty and the Bothy Band were the Irish supergroups of the 1970s, Altan has dominated the traditional scene since the end of the 1980s. What is somewhat unusual about Altan is that its music is deeply rooted in the Donegal tradition, one that had received little attention before the band's commercial success popularized the Gaelic songs and Scottish-tinged highlands, strathspeys, and reels that comprise the unique Altan sound. From the start, the two main ingredients at the core of that sound were the dynamic interplay of the flute and fiddle played by husband and wife Frankie Kennedy and Mairéad Ní Mhaonaigh, and Ní Mhaonaigh's magical soprano. These were first captured on disc on the couple's 1983 Ceol Aduaidh, made at a time when few people had ever heard of Irish "Germans" (a type of Donegal barndance) or mazurkas. Ciarán Curran was one of the accompanists, and so was keyboardist Eithne Ní Bhraonáin, better known today as Enya. Indeed, Ní Mhaonaigh grew up in Gaoth Dobhair (Gweedore) in West Donegal, just a few miles away from Enya's family, whose band Clannad had started performing their brand of traditional music and jazz fusion in the early 1970s.

By the mid-1980s Ní Mhaonaigh and Kennedy had begun touring the United States with Curran and guitarist Mark Kelly, when they caught the attention of Green Linnet. As Dónal Lunny and Mícheál Ó Domhnaill had in the Bothy Band a decade earlier, Curran and Kelly were crafting highly inventive accompaniments for the foursome's instrumentals and songs. Their first album on the new label, released in 1987, was simply called Altan after Loch Altan, the name of a lake near Ní Mhaonaigh's home—as well as that of a reel she composed and played on the album. The title stuck and became the name of the band. By the time they recorded their next album, Horse with a Heart, in July 1988, the quartet had become a quintet with the addition of Dublin fiddle player Paul O'Shaughnessy, and the same ensemble made The Red Crow in 1990. Because O'Shaughnessy could not commit to constant touring, yet another musician, Inishowen fiddle player Cíarán Tourish, was added to the lineup, bringing his fiery playing into the mix on the band's highly successful 1992 Harvest Storm. Not too long after, O'Shaughnessy was obliged to leave the band for good. Donegal-born singer and guitar player Dáithí Sproule, a longtime friend of Ní Mhaonaigh and Kennedy who lives in Minneapolis, had been called upon on occasion to substitute for Mark Kelly; his status as a full-fledged member was made official on the band's next album, Island Angel.

the bouzouki

Originally a Greek folk instrument belonging to the family of long-necked lutes, the bouzouki was introduced into Irish traditional music in the early 1970s by Johnny Moynihan, who was then a member of the band Sweeney's Men, and later of Planxty, De Dannan, and Arcady. Now made by local craftspeople, the bouzouki and its relations—alternately called octave mandolins, citterns, or (improperly) mandocellos, and typically strung with four or five courses—have collectively become the instrument of choice for accompanying traditional music throughout the British Isles, Ireland, and further afield. Early Irish exponents who contributed to its success include De Dannan's Alec Finn, who still plays a three-course, bowl-back Greek instrument; Andy Irvine, formerly with Sweeney's Men and Planxty, and now with Patrick Street; and Dónal Lunny, of Planxty and Bothy Band fame, who introduced the five-course blarge (i.e., "bouzouki large," covering a wider range) during the second Planxty period, and the electric solid-body bouzouki while a member of Moving Hearts. The instrument is generally tuned an octave below the mandolin (GDAE) or in related open tunings (GDAD, ADAD), and can be used to pick melodies or counter-melodies; strum chords; or play combinations of all of the above.

see also: Arcady, Bothy Band, De Dannan, Andy Irvine, Dónal Lunny, Moving Hearts, Patrick Street, Planxty, Sweeney's Men

—Philippe Varlet

altan

That 1993 release was to be the band's last original recording for Green Linnet. These were trying times for Altan, most of all because of Frankie Kennedy's ongoing battle with cancer, one he ultimately lost in September 1994. By then, another longtime musical friend, accordionist Dermot Byrne, from Bridgend in North Donegal, had joined the ranks. Eventually, the band signed with Virgin and in 1996 released Blackwater, a rather disappointing mixture of somewhat uninspired instrumental medleys and overproduced vocal tracks, possibly a result of the transition to a major label. Their latest album, Runaway Sunday, is in a similar vein but with more exciting instrumental work. This work gives us hope that, to paraphrase a song they have done in eulogy of Kennedy, they will indeed carry on.

what to buy: Although not an Altan album strictly speaking, Ceol Aduaidh ♪♪♪♪ (Gael-Linn, 1983/Green Linnet, 1994, prod. Nicky Ryan) is the first commercial recording made by Mairéad Ní Mhaonaigh and Frankie Kennedy. However, the magical sound of their fiddle and flute duets and of Ní Mhaonaigh's singing, already accompanied by Ciarán Curran's cittern, are just as you hear them on later albums by the group. Altan ♪♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1987, prod. Dónal Lunny), the first official band album, is very similar in some ways, but the accompaniments and the song arrangements in particular have become quite sophisticated thanks to the addition of Mark Kelly's guitar. It is the magnificent Horse with a Heart ♪♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1989, prod. Phil Cunningham), though, that truly established Altan as a new force on the Irish traditional music scene. As with the Bothy Band's 1975 album, instrumental medleys such as the opening reel set "The Curlew" and the jig "The Road to Durham" were learned and repeated at many a session in the early 1990s. Other, quieter moments of the album, like Ní Mhaonaigh's achingly beautiful vocals on "The Lass of Glenshee" or Kennedy's flute solo on Tommy Peoples's air "An Feochán," are likely to be remembered as well. Throughout, the production by ex-Silly Wizard Phil Cunningham, who also contributes understated keyboards and whistle parts, is exemplary. Although recorded with the same lineup and later given a NAIRD award (or Indie Grammy), The Red Crow ♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1990, prod. P. J. Curtis) is not quite as strong an album as Horse with a Heart. Still, Ní Mhaonaigh's singing on the County Down song "The Flowers of Magherally" and on "Mallaí Chroich·Shlí," as well as the instrumental renditions of Jerry Holland's now universally known reel "Brenda Stubbert's," Ní Mhaonaigh's own reel "The Red Crow," and the charming "Tommy Bhetty's Waltz," give the album its share of highlights. The addition to the lineup of yet another fiddler, in the person of Cíarán Tourish, could have been a mixed blessing, but the opening track of Harvest Storm ♪♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1992, prod. P.J. Curtis) dispels all doubts. The powerful sound of the band's three fiddles on the reel medley "Pretty Peg" is simply breathtaking. This is followed by one of the very best vocal tracks recorded by the band, the song "Dónal Agus Mórag," featuring beautiful guitar work by Kelly and haunting vocal harmonies. With the presence of guest musicians like Dónal Lunny, Hothouse Flowers' Liam o' Maonlaí, and ex–Stockton's Wing percussionist Tommy Hayes, there is some experimentation with new instrumental sounds, like that of the bass bodhrán (Irish frame drum) and the Australian didgeridoo, but P.J. Curtis's production keeps things nicely balanced. Island Angel ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1993, prod. Brian Masterson, Altan) continues in the same vein. The band got around to recording some tunes Ní Mhaonaigh and Kennedy had been performing for years, like their friend Fintan McManus's reel, known to many as "The Guns of the Magnificent Seven." Ironically in view of sad events to come, Kennedy's flute playing is heard very strongly, as on his own reel "Humours of Andytown," or on the bittersweet "Island Angel," a piece composed for him by Ní Mhaonaigh. Ní Mhaonaigh's voice shines on "Bríd óg Ní Mháille" and the children's song "Dúlamán," with superb vocal harmonies that evoke the sound of Clannad (who recorded the song in 1976). There are two well-produced anthologies available, The First Ten Years, 1986–1995 ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1995, prod. Dónal Lunny) and The Best of Altan ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1997, prod. various), both based on the band's first five albums. The latter includes a bonus CD containing eight tracks recorded live in Germany in 1989 by the Horse with a Heart lineup and first released as part of the collection Ireland ♪♪♪♪ (WDR, 1993, prod. Christian Scholze, Jean Trouillet, Jan Reichow). The sonics are quite good and one gets a chance to experience the strength of the band's live sound. The last track, a medley of reels concluding with the essential Donegal one "The Gravel Walk," has not been recorded on any of the band's studio albums.

what to buy next: The band's latest, Runaway Sunday ♪♪♪ (Virgin, 1997, prod. Altan, Alastair McMillan), is not quite in the same vein as Altan's early work but is a step up from the previous Blackwater. Obviously, the sound of Kennedy's flute is missed on the instrumental tracks. This time around, though, they include some mighty tunes, among them "John Doherty's Reels," the two Con Cassidy jigs in "Australian Waters," and a version of "Scots Mary" with a third part that came from Doherty as well. As on Blackwater, however, the song arrangements often sound suspiciously mainstream, as if Ní Mhaonaigh were being promoted as the next great Irish folk vocalist. Still, it is hard not to fall under the spell of her heartrending "Time Has Passed," seemingly an acknowledgment of the trauma caused by her husband's death and of what the last three years must have been like—"Time has passed/You are gone/Your tune is played/I must carry on."

what to avoid: Blackwater ♪♪½ (Virgin, 1996, prod. Altan, Brian Masterson) was the band's first album after Frankie Kennedy's untimely death. What may have been a cathartic experience for the musicians did not necessarily translate into their best work.

Mairéad Ní Mhaonaigh of Altan

The instrumental tracks, while missing the unique tone color to which Kennedy's flute contributed, still feature some superior lead playing by Ní Mhaonaigh, Tourish, and new band member Dermot Byrne on accordion. However, the vocal tracks suffer from overproduction, with the addition of everything from Brendan Power's harmonica, to Dónal Lunny's popish keyboards, to a string quartet on "Blackwaterside." The album concludes on Ní Mhaonaigh's somber "Tune for Frankie."

the rest:
Altan ♪♪♪♪ (K-Tel, 1996)

worth searching for: The most devoted fans of Mairéad Ní Mhaonaigh's playing and singing may want to look for the first LP recorded by the Irish all-women band Macalla, Mná na héireann (Women of Ireland) ♪♪♪♪ (Gael-Linn, 1984, prod. Nicky Ryan), featuring, alongside Ní Mhaonaigh, Paul O'Shaughnessy's mother Pearl on fiddle, and a host of other terrific musicians.

influences:
⏮ John Doherty, Con Cassidy, Proinsias ó Maonaigh, Tommy Peoples, Clannad, Planxty, the Bothy Band, Macalla

⏭ Four Men and a Dog, Déanta, Dervish, Craobh Rua

see also: Clannad, Phil Cunningham, John Doherty, Enya, Dónal Lunny, Tommy Peoples, Silly Wizard, Trian

Philippe Varlet

Amampondo

Traditional folk

Formed 1981, in Cape Town, South Africa. Based in South Africa.

Dizu Zungulu Plaatjies, lead vocals, percussion, dance; Mzwandile Qotoyi, bass and piccolo marimba, African drums, percussion, dance; Simpiwe Matole, soprano marimba, vocals, dance, acrobatics; Michael "Nkululeku" Ludonga, drums, tenor marimba, vocals, dance; Mandla Lande, African drums, percussion, vocals, dance/acrobatics; Blackie Zandisile Mbizela, bass marimba, percussion, vocals; Lulu Lungiswa Plaatjies, lead and backing vocals, percussion, dance; Nondzondeleo Fancy Galada, lead and backing vocals, percussion, dance; Mantombi Matotiyane, lead and backing vocals; Mandosini Marquinei, lead and backing vocals, umrhubbe, isitolototolo, uhadi, dance; Nonhtle Sylvester, percussion, dance, vocals. (All members are from South Africa.)

This delightful 11-person ensemble from South Africa was founded by Dizu Plaatjies, who originally started it as a drums-and-marimba-based street-musician troupe. Eventually, though, a move up from the street into a concert venue elevated them even higher, to the world stage. An extended engagement at Johannesburg's exclusive Market Theater led to them being sent overseas as musical ambassadors of the Republic of South Africa. After returning and playing Nelson Mandela's 70th birthday concert, the group was banned from general public performance for four years by the dissident African National Congress (having hit two countries not participating in the anti-apartheid boycott while on tour). During this period, they taught music and performed in schools, until the ban was lifted with the intervention of Archbishop Desmond Tutu, only to be imposed again shortly thereafter. But with Nelson Mandela's release from prison in 1992, the ANC's edict was permanently lifted, and the group has since toured widely, both within and outside South Africa. Their self-titled debut release merges their ebullient vocal, marimba, and percussion sound with rhythmic traditions from elsewhere in Africa and the Americas.

what's available: Drums for Tomorrow ♪♪♪♪ (M.E.L.T. 2000, 1998, prod. B. Wassy), Amampondo's international debut, is a sensuous blend of layered percussion, joyful vocal harmonies, and melodic marimba textures as danceable as it is unique. With contemporary production by Cameroonian drummer Brice Wassy, the disc incorporates non-percussive instrumentation including trumpets and saxophones, and features many guest world-music notables including Brazilian percussionist Airto Moreira and Cuban guitarist Jose Luis Quintana.

worth searching for: The visual element is vital to Amampondo's performances, and the video Africa 2000 (M.E.L.T. 2000 Video, 1998) affords a fuller experience of the contributions made by the troupe's dancers and acrobats.

solo outings:
Dizu Plaatjies and Mzwandile Qotoyi:
Qotoyi N/A (DZM)

influences:
⏮ Ladysmith Black Mambazo, Juluka

see also: Airto Moreira

Michael Parrish

Amina

Arabic worldbeat

Born in Morocco. Based in Paris, France.

Amina Annabi, a Moroccan singer based in Paris, sings in Arabic, French, and English and mixes traditional Arabic rhythms, funk 'n' roll, romantic Parisian pop, and modern dance beats with the sounds of saz (lute), ney (flute), and electric guitar. As the child of immigrant parents, she scandalized the older generation with her rapid assimilation and choice of music as a career. She began her career singing backup and dancing on stage with various Franco-Arabic bands in Paris, and, after hooking up with producer Marlin Meissennier, began exploring a fusion of Arabic, French, and international pop. On "Belly Dance," for example (one of her biggest hits), the singer rode a sample taken from James Brown's "Cold Sweat" to deliver a sexy message that must have outraged the folks back home. Amina and Meissennier also collaborated with Senegal's Wasis Diop on "C'est le Dernier Qui a Parlé Qui a Raison (It Is the Last One Who Speaks Who Is Right)," the winner of the Eurovision Song Contest in 1991. Diop's music for the tune combined an Arabic melody with a hip-hop rhythm, Baroque string charts, and a French chord progression; an approach that's typical of much of the world fusion music coming out of the studios of Paris.

what's available: Yalil ♪♪♪½ (Island France, 1989, prod. Marlin Meissennier) is a slick yet soulful outing that showcases Amina's smooth, sensuous alto and Meissennier's understated production; there's a bit of R&B, some smooth Afropop (two tracks are co-produced by Wasis Diop), and lots of low-key Western pop. An American printing of Yalil exists, but for some reason it's missing "C'est le Dernier Qui a Parlé Qui a Raison (It Is the Last One Who Speaks Who Is Right)," one of the set's most affecting ballads.

influences:

◀◀ Umm Kulthum, Najat Aatabou

▶▶ Yosefa Dahari

see also: Wasis Diop

j. poet

Anam

Pan-Celtic

Formed 1992, in Dublin, Ireland. Based in Edinburgh, Scotland.

Brian Ó hEadra (Ireland), guitar, vocals; Myles Farrell (Ireland), bouzouki, (1992–95); Steve Larkin (Ireland), fiddle (departed; dates of service unknown); John Connolly (Ireland), button accordion (departed; dates of service unknown); Treasa Harkin (Ireland), button accordion (1995–present); Aimée Leonard (Orkney Islands, Scotland), bodhrán, vocals (1994–98); Neil Davey (Cornwall, England), bouzouki, mandolin (1997–present); Fiona MacKenzie (Scotland), vocals, bodhrán (1998–present); Anna Wendy Stevenson (Scotland), fiddle (1998–present).

The Best New Band at France's trend-setting Festival Inter-Celtique de Lorient in 1993 and, by way of numerous personnel changes, a virtually new band for each album since, Anam's stylistic survey of the Celtic world provides a fine welcome for listeners new to it, and a rich experience even for those more familiar with the terrain. Currently a quintet, the band toured North America in early 1999, and was completing a new album—with, to the surprise of few, two new members—as this book went to press.

what to buy: Riptide ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1998, prod. Calum Malcolm) is a fine showcase for the acoustic-based yet pop-oriented approach of this young Pan-Celtic band. Anam's sound is very smooth and easy on the ears; Ó hEadhra and Leonard provide lush, polished vocal harmonies on several tracks that are surprisingly reminiscent of Simon & Garfunkel. And the group's instrumental selections, generally featuring accordion backed by mandolin, bouzouki, and percussion, also have a fairly soft texture. To be sure, though, what the band lacks in aggressiveness they don't lack in inventiveness. For example, on their arrangement of "An Blew Treghys," a selection of Cornish gavottes (a centuries-old traditional dance style), accordion plays the lead melody line while guitar, bouzouki, and bodhrán (Irish frame drum) kick in with lively syncopated rhythms. "Aird a Chuamhaing," a lovely Gaelic song of lament for the homeland from the emigrant's perspective written by Sean Mac Ambrois, starts off with more full vocal harmonies, and finishes up with a neat instrumental passage that has a vaguely Middle Eastern flavor. First Footing ♪♪♪♪ (JVC, 1996, prod. Gerry O'Beirne), title notwithstanding, is Anam's third album, recorded by the trio of Ó hEadra, Leonard, and Harkin (augmented by several guest players). There's a jazzy version of "Sally Free and Easy" that's a bit reminiscent of Scottish folk-rockers Pentangle, but overall First Footing doesn't chart a lot of new territory; it's simply a collection of unaffected, well-played songs and instrumentals. It'll be interesting to see how the latest new members change Anam's sound, but as of now it is a group that folks previously not too involved with Celtic music can go to for a good first taste; those with more experience will enjoy Treasa Harkin's deft accordion work and the group's subtle incorporation of contemporary influences.

the rest:

Anam ♪♪♪♪ (Ceirnini Anam, 1994)
Saoirse ♪♪♪♪ (Ceirnini Anam, 1996)

worth searching for: It's a shame there probably won't be any more albums by Seelyhoo, Anam vocalist MacKenzie's former band, but the two that were made are a great mix of Scottish folk ballads and instrumentals with a strong touch of jazzy swing. Leetera ♪♪♪♪½ (Greentrax, 1998, prod. Seelyhoo), Seelyhoo's second album, is more confident than its predecessor, The First Caul ♪♪♪♪½ (Greentrax, 1995, prod. Seelyhoo, Roy Ashby, Adie Bolton), but both are recommended. MacKenzie is a fine Gaelic singer, and Jennifer Wrigley (fiddle) and Sandy Brechin (accordion) are bloody hot instrumentalists!

solo outings:

Fiona MacKenzie:

Camhanach ♪♪♪♪ (Macmeanmna, 1997)

influences:

◀◀ Altan, the Bothy Band, Capercaillie, Pentangle, Simon & Garfunkel

▶▶ Dervish, Deaf Shepherd, Show of Hands

Ken Roseman

2/8 robin adnan anders

Robin Adnan Anders

Sufi percussion, shamanic drums, trance music, sacred world music

Born in Minnesota, USA. Based in McGregor, MN, USA.

Sufi Muslim master-drummer Robin Adnan Anders is a renowned soloist who believes that "a drum is a home therapy kit in a box." He is considered a virtuoso of percussion, being equally proficient on the rhythm instruments of numerous cultures including the doumbek, tar, rik, tupan, tabla, dourbakee, muzhar, daire, and more, as well as trap set and keyboards. His non-profit corporation Arts for Life (3208 W. Lake St., Ste. 84, Minneapolis, MN 55405) affirms the common spirit of humanity, using communications technology in an unprecedented way. Recognizing the need for the world to see itself as a global community, and also to put state-of-the-art technology to a positive use, Arts for Life organizes worldwide satellite and Internet-linked drum jams and celebration dances. Anders's other "world"ly excursions have included duties as percussionist with the Grammy-nominated 3 Mustaphas 3; drummer with the award-winning Boiled in Lead; member of the Electric Arab Orchestra with Egyptian pop singer Anoushka; and teacher of Sufi drumming around the world, in addition to his work in soundtracks (National Geographic's The Great Barrier Reef); video (the interactive drum piece Voices of the Doumbek, co-created in partnership with Interworld Music); the folk, rock, and world-music festival circuit (too prestigious to ignore but too numerous to mention); and concert appearances on public broadcasting services the world over. Most recently he hosted a contingent to the annual Sacred World Music Festival in Morocco, noting that "in many cultures, there is a belief that the sound of the drum actually rearranges matter and spirit on the atomic level—correcting imbalances in emotion by bringing into balance those feelings that require release. It is not surprising, then, that the drum has been the tool of the shaman for all recorded time."

what to buy: Seemingly destined to be a modern mystic, Anders reveals, "I began my career as a bell-ringing altar boy for the Catholic church. I guess you could say I spent a lot of my childhood immersed in ritual." This early interest in the otherworldly eventually led him to a Washington, D.C., workshop given by an Iraqi Sufi master. "It was a transcendent experience that changed my entire life. He helped me realize that my music could only be as good as the quality of my life. After that, I began exploring disciplines from all over the world like Zen and transcendental meditation, deliberately looking for inspiration and joy on a daily basis." This search for a very personal, deeply profound sense of sacred ecstasy permeates all of Anders's work and is most evident on Omaiyo ♪♪♪♪½ (Candescence/Rykodisc, 1998, prod. Robin Adnan Anders), which boasts enough healing trances, sacred dances, and mystical rhythms to satisfy both straining body and yearning soul. His transfiguration of rhythm into devotion is positively spellbinding, highlighted by tracks such as "Tourra" and "Kadar," a 14-minute extended journey into altered consciousness led by tabla and clay-top dourbakee drum. Omaiyo starts out with gentle chanting voices, melodic percussion, and tuned instruments (saxophone, violin, guitar), then slowly removes the layers until only the sound of a Laotian jaw harp remains; it is nothing less than a masterpiece celebrating the union of spirit through percussion. (True to its purpose, proceeds from the album benefit the Sufi Foundation of America.)

what to buy next: The seeds for Omaiyo are sewn on Anders's debut solo effort, Blue Buddha ♪♪♪♪½ (Interworld, 1993, prod. Robin Adnan Anders), another inspired alchemy of inner quest and celestial expression.

worth searching for: Robin Adnan Anders and Antonio H. Albarran are legendary in nomadic circles as the pashas of pulse, the sadus of swing, the bards of boom, the sultans of smoke—or, as it says on their debut duo CD cover, the Darbuki Kings. The Darbuki Kings' Lawrence of Suburbia ♪♪♪♪½ (Darbuki Records, 1998, prod. Robin Adnan Anders, Matthew Davidson) may have been recorded with tongue firmly in cheek, but its seven syncopated selections display pyrotechnic playing and a wealth of sassily sensuous rhythms from all over the Middle East and North Africa. What started as a joke ends up as a treasure trove of sizzling instrumentals seriously worth seeking out.

influences:

- Hossam Ramzy, Fez Sacred World Music Festival performers
- Electric Arab Orchestra

PJ Birosik

Laurie Anderson

Experimental music and performance

Born June 5, 1947, in Chicago, IL, USA. Based in New York, NY, USA.

It's inaccurate to call Laurie Anderson a "world" artist because almost nobody can determine which world she's from. But Anderson, in her eclectic mix of rock 'n' roll, spoken-word poetry, strange unnamed sound effects, film, sculpture, slides, and mime, has occasionally used non-Western styles to great effect. "Monkey's Paw," one of her best songs, complements the vocalist's spooky, deep-chanting voice with South African guitarist Ray Phiri and bassist Bhakithi Khumalo (both of whom appear on this and several other songs from Anderson's Strange Angels as well as Paul Simon's Graceland). Anderson was elated to discover in the South African musicians a kindred, literally offbeat rhythmic sense that she had thought was just one more sound she alone could hear, and the album may be the epitome of her unostentatious but effective incorporation of "world" textures—an approach that goes to structural roots rather than settling for surface sonic garnish. Seeming satires of the latter kind of tourism appear regularly in her work as well (albeit with a wicked stylistic accuracy), from the pseudo-Scottish "Sweaters" and would-be Weimar "Example #22" on Big Science, to the approximately Japanese "Kokoku" on Mr. Heartbreak, to the Cold War–surplus Eastern European textures of Bright Red, not to mention her habit of having all or part of her wry monologues be spoken in various tongues. Anderson's other worldbeat influences are indirect: she taught Egyptian architecture in the early '70s at City College of New York, and her Tibetan near-death mountain-climbing experience inspired Bright Red. Still best known among pop audiences for her 1982 hit "O Superman," she continues to tour, displaying her spiky haircut, droll political wisdom, and bizarre special effects.

what to buy: For Strange Angels ♪♪♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1989, prod. Laurie Anderson, Roma Baran), Anderson stopped treating her voice with electronic effects and incorporated her deep tone into South African and other kinds of music. The experiment works: The monotone "Monkey's Paw" is as spooky as most hoodoo blues songs about mojos and black cat bones, and many Anderson fans consider this her best album.

what to buy next: Anderson's only hit, the #2 "O Superman," is on her debut Big Science ♪♪♪½ (Warner Bros., 1982, prod. Laurie Anderson, Roma Baran), which is eclectic and jittery but satisfying even after more than 15 years. At four CDs, United States Live ♪♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1984, prod. Laurie Anderson, Roma Baran) is a big project even for devoted Anderson fans—especially given its emphasis on spoken-word material—but more than anything else it's hilarious; she could have made it in comedy if the music world hadn't reached her first. The all spoken-word disc The Ugly One with the Jewels ♪♪♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1995, prod. Laurie Anderson) belongs in this book by way of its subject matter; its bemused tales of Anderson's international travels soften culture clash with an affectionate skepticism and self-deprecation. If "world music" is diversity's soundtrack, this is its laughtrack.

what to avoid: Mister Heartbreak ♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1984, prod. various) is overproduced and contains none of the accessible charm of its predecessor, Big Science. Of course, that's just how many Anderson fans like it.

the rest:
Home of the Brave ♪♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1986)
Bright Red ♪♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1994)

worth searching for: One of Anderson's earliest recordings, 1978's "Song from America on the Move"—on which she uses a gadget called the harmonizer for the first time—shows up on the out-of-print Cash Cow: The Best of Giorno Poetry Systems ♪♪♪♪ (East Side Digital, 1993, prod. various). Other arty, deliberately non-mainstream artists here include William S. Burroughs (a friend and primary influence for Anderson), the punk band Hüsker Dü, Frank Zappa, Patti Smith, and ex-Blondie singer Debbie Harry.

influences:
◀◀ William S. Burroughs, Lenny Bruce, Captain Beefheart, Philip Glass, Frank Zappa, Lou Reed

▶▶ Talking Heads, Henry Rollins, Jello Biafra

Steve Knopper and Adam McGovern

Leny Andrade

Samba, jazz

Born in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. Based in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil.

Singer Leny Andrade is a master. Affectionately called "Brazil's Ella Fitzgerald" and "the first lady of Brazilian jazz," Andrade's full, throaty voice and emotive delivery wrap themselves around classic and contemporary Brazilian music and jazz standards alike. Indeed, her unique phrasing and scat style do rival Ella's (with a Portuguese accent). Renowned and respected as a musician's singer well beyond the Brazilian jazz community, until recently Andrade had been largely undiscovered by U.S. listeners. That's changing, and although she has rarely recorded in English, she makes an emotional connection which itself makes translation unnecessary.

what's available: Andrade has been recording since 1961, so it's hard to believe that Maiden Voyage ♪♪♪♪ (Chesky, 1994, prod. David Chesky, Fred Hersch) is her first album made in the United States. Accompanied by Fred Hersch on piano (he also arranged), David Dunaway on bass, and Helio Schiavo on drums, Andrade delivers an eclectic selection—this time largely in English—ranging from evergreens like "This Can't Be Love," "I've Got You Under My Skin," and "My Funny Valentine" to Stevie Wonder's "Ribbon in the Sky" and Herbie Hancock's "Maiden Voyage." The sampling of Brazilian staples includes a tasty reading of Jobim's classic bossa nova "Dindi," and a new perspective on Luis Bonfá's familiar samba "Manha de Carnaval." On Cartola 80 Anos ♪♪♪♪ (1987, Pandisc), Andrade celebrates the songs of Brazilian samba composer Cartola in a simpatico pairing of singer and music.

influences:
◀◀ Luis Bonfá, Antonio Carlos Jobim, João Gilberto, Ella Fitzgerald

▶▶ Cassandra Wilson, Abbie Lincoln

Andrew BeDell

Leny Andrade

Maya Angelou

Calypso, poetry, spoken-word

Born Marguerite Johnson, April 4, 1928, in St. Louis, MO, USA. Based in Winston-Salem, NC, USA.

Decades before she read poetry at President Clinton's inauguration, Angelou made a pretty fair living as a calypso singer. Her gospel-trained voice, cute songs, and dramatic presentation made a powerful impact on the cabaret circuit. Working an extended gig at the Purple Onion in San Francisco, Angelou drew rave reviews and steady crowds of college kids who viewed calypso as the ultimate rhythmic folk music. Her success in clubs led to a featured role in the off-Broadway musical Calypso Heat Wave, as well as its 1957 film version. However, not many artists—outside of Harry Belafonte—were able to use calypso as a springboard to lasting Stateside fame. When the fad dissipated, Angelou began her career as a historian, screenwriter, poet, and character actress. She didn't abandon music, though. Angelou wrote songs for Sidney Poitier's For the Love of Ivy, as well as tunes for soul singer Roberta Flack. A Pulitzer Prize-nominated author, Angelou has found time to earn a Tony nomination for Look Away, and make well-received appearances in films such as How to Make an American Quilt. In recent times, she's better known as Dr. Maya Angelou—a professor at Wake Forest University.

what to buy: Angelou wrote nearly half the songs on Miss Calypso ♪♪♪♪ (Liberty, 1956/Scamp, 1996, reissue prod. Ashley Warren), a fine reproduction of her lone musical LP. The bongo-and-conga patterns perfectly accent Tommy Tedesco's guitar work, and Angelou's vocals are first-rate.

what to buy next: The best audio introduction to this artist's poetry can be found on Black Pearls: The Poetry of Maya Angelou ♪♪♪½ (GWP, 1969/Rhino Word Beat, 1998, original prod. Paul Robinson, reissue prod. Elizabeth Pavone), which intertwines 33 atmospheric and streetwise recitations with occasional jazz interludes. Many tracks are informed by the Black Power sensibilities of the late '60s and are the basis for a number of her audiobooks.

what to avoid: Angelou's collaboration with Ashford and Simpson, Been Found ♪♪ (Ichiban, 1996, prod. Jimmy Simpson, Logan Anderson), attempts to blend the soul duo's sensual R&B with the famed poet's readings. The result is an uneasy mix that never quite jells or satisfies. For hardcore fans only.

best of the rest:

On the Pulse of Morning ♪♪♪♪ (Random House Audio Books, 1993)

I Know Why the Caged Bird Sings ♪♪♪♪ (Random House Audio Books, 1996)

worth searching for: Angelou contributes solid vocals to Herbie Mann's excellent jazz disc Evolution of Mann ♪♪♪♪ (Atlantic, 1960/Rhino, 1992, prod. Herbie Mann, Frank Socolow, Pat Rebilot). You completists out there should know that Angelou also makes guest appearances on The Electric B. B. King—His Best ♪♪♪♪ (MCA, 1968/1998, reissue prod. Andy McKaie), Bobby Jones & New Life with the Nashville Super Choir ♪♪♪ (GospoCentric, 1998, prod. Derrick Lee), and the eponymous debut of Branford Marsalis's genre-crossing band project Buckshot LeFonque ♪♪♪½ (Columbia, 1994, prod. various).

influences:

⏮ Harry Belafonte, Mahalia Jackson

⏭ Cicely Tyson, Rita Dove, Roberta Flack

see also: Herbie Mann

Ken Burke

Anggun

Worldbeat, pop

Born Anggun Cipta Sasmi, April 29, 1974, in Djakarta, Indonesia. Based in Paris, France.

Thanks to world-music journalists, missionaries, multinational record labels, and (never forget) MTV, the music universe has shrunken in the two and a half decades Anggun has breathed air on the planet. Even a far-flung country with as strong and centuries-old a culture as Indonesia is caught up in the yin/yang pleasure principles of Western R&B, rock, and pop. Anggun was raised in a home full of paintings, sculptures, and a breakfast-to-bed soundtrack of all kinds of music (gamelan to classical to the Police). Encouraged by Moms and Pops, Anggun sang, danced, and played piano before she learned to tie her shoes. At the age of nine, Anggun made her recording debut with a self-penned children's album. Overnight, the precocious kidlet became a star. In 1986, Anggun hooked up with Ian Antonio, the biggest producer in Indonesian pop. Over the next seven years, the duo produced six award-winning/mega-selling albums. Anggun had the Total Package: youth, beauty, hooky songs, rock-star charisma (Pat Benatar lungs, Jon Bon Jovi moves, and Chrissie Hynde cheek). At 19 she was flush—German sports car, big bank, and her own record company. But Anggun wanted more; she wanted the world. In 1995 the singer relocated to Paris. Falling in with the movers and shakers of the city's world-music underground, Anggun was inspired to create pop music more reflective of her culture. Within a year, she was introduced to hot Parisian producer/songwriter Erick Benzi (Celine Dion, Khaled, Johhny Hallyday). Over the next 18 months, the pair would collaborate and lay down tracks for the album that became her international debut. While Snow on the Sahara rocked the European and Asian charts, it barely registered on the Stateside Richter. Still, a series of U.S. club dates proved Anggun to be an engaging singer/pianist in the Kate Bush-esque vein of Sarah McLachlan—and she's gotta have something left to look forward to!

what's available: Though it begins and ends smashingly (the Deep Forest-y bounce of the title tune, the achingly exalted cover of Bowie's "Life on Mars"), Snow on the Sahara ♪♪♪½ (Epic, 1998, prod. Erick Benzi) is a frustratingly uneven blend of radio cheese ("Valparaiso," "Dream of Me"), Lilith Fair patchouli ("By the Moon," "A Rose in the Wind"), Peter Gabrielesque honey ("Secret of the Sea"), and Indo-soul-sistah buttah ("My Sensual Mind"). More international pop than world music for sure.

influences:

◀◀ Stevie Nicks, Kate Bush, Peter Gabriel, Everything but the Girl

▶▶ Ashley Maher, Sarah McLachlan, Alanis Morissette

Tom Terrell

Anitas Livs

World, blues

Formed 1993, in Stockholm, Sweden. Based in Stockholm, Sweden.

Anita Livstrand, leader, drums, percussion, vocals; Lise-Lottte Norelius, drums, percussion, vocals; Monica Äslund, drums, percussion, vocals. (All members are from Sweden.)

Anitas Livs is a trio of art-damaged Swedish female singer/percussionists. Founder Anita Livstrand has played with Don Cherry, Lise-Lotte Norelius plays African percussion and samplers, and Monica Äslund is also a dancer. The trio uses hand drumming, sampled sounds, and studio magic to make music that's both commercial and impenetrable. Strangely enough, their vocal sound owes much to the early blues stylings of Bessie Smith and Ma Rainey, while their percussion is heavily rooted in West African traditions. They also delve into Sami (formerly Laplander) joiking (a form of traditional a cappella singing), Indian ragas, and American gospel.

what's available: World Wide Web ♪♪♪♪ (Slask, 1995, prod. Michael Blair) opens with the Stones/Robert Johnson tune "No Expectations," then kicks into gear with a polyrhythmic Swedish walking tune and a couple of Sanskrit hymns. They also pull off an all-percussion arrangement of Sam Cooke's "GoodTimes," a Tibetan folk song, a dance from the Italian Renaissance, and their own eclectic compositions with equal aplomb. The band's debut, Ugh! ♪♪♪♪ (Slask, 1993, prod. Anitas Lives, Thomas Mera Gartz), shows their eclectic vision already in place with a bit of joiking, blues, and Gospel all given the big beat treatment.

influences:

◀◀ Don Cherry, Jan Johansson, Bessie Smith

j. poet

Annabouboula

Greek folk-rock

Formed 1986, in New York, NY, USA. Based in New York, NY, USA and Athens, Greece.

Anna Paidoussi, vocals; George Sempepos, guitar, synthesizer, drum programs; Chris Lawrence, drum programs, clarinet. (All members are from USA.)

The three principals behind Annabouboula (Greek for "all mixed up") got together when Lawrence, a Texan of Greek descent, returned to New York after a stint in Greece, where the Anglo-Americanisms of the Greek rock scene had caused him some distress. The trio got together to try playing a rock 'n' roll version of "In the Baths of Istanbul," an old Greek belly dancing tune. Sempepos and Paidoussi had both dabbled in Greek traditional music during their youth, and the latter already had a reputation as a rembetiko singer. Rembetiko, a mournful, minor-key music often called the Greek blues, became the foundation of Annabouboula—but having grown up with rock, funk, reggae, and the other world beats that filter into the unconscious of all New Yorkers, this band's brand of rembetiko has an arty, experimental edge that sometimes makes them sound like a Greek-American Talking Heads.

3/2 marc anthony

Marc Anthony

what's available: The trio is still working on its conception with In the Baths of Constantinople ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1990, prod. George Sempepos, Chris Lawrence), but the culture clash makes for some compelling music. Paidoussi's passionate vocals and the creative sparks her partners are tossing off make this sound inspired and inspiring. The rock approach gives the material a peculiar, edgy feel. On Greek Fire ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1990, prod. George Sempepos, Chris Lawrence) Talking Heads are the obvious analogy; the Middle Eastern and Greek flavors are given a funky, rhythmically quirky spin that's straight out of New York's downtown club scene.

influences:

Roza Eskenazi, Georges Dalaras, Talking Heads, Cargo Cult

j. poet

Marc Anthony

Salsa, Latin hip-hop

Born Marco Antonio Muniz, early 1970s, in Brooklyn, NY, USA. Based in New York, NY, USA.

Marc Anthony is one of the most commercially successful vocalists in the history of salsa, with four out of four albums each reaching the top of the Billboard Latin charts, regularly sold-out concerts, and a 1999 Grammy for Best Tropical Latin Performance (for Contra La Corriente). To match his marketplace acceptance, Anthony has also acquired a reputation as the most artistically serious of the performers fueling the late-century Stateside "Latin Pop" phenomenon. Indeed, most Anglos first heard of him when he made entertainment headlines by postponing an almost certain pop ascendancy to tackle the sophisticated realm of Broadway as a star of Paul Simon's musical The Capeman. It was an overall commercial and critical failure in which Anthony nonetheless gave an acclaimed performance, emerging with his reputation only enhanced. To be sure, Anthony is now "popping" on his own terms, though his professional roots are in more generally mainstream soil. In his early teens he and his sister sang on numerous demo tapes and commercial jingles; his first break as a songwriter came when his tune "Boy, I've Been Told" was covered by dance floor diva Sa-Fire. He subsequently sang backup vocals on Sa-Fire's self-titled debut album, and other discs by the Latin Rascals and Menudo. Anthony's own debut CD, When the Night Is Over, was more of a hip-hop effort than his later salsa-inspired recordings, though he is now a standard-bearer—in praise if not always practice—for more traditionally based music during a "crossover" boom that some Latino observers fear will lead to cultural homogenization. Anthony himself has kept his roots secure while keeping his options open, acting in such films as Hackers, Big Night, The Substitute, and Bringing Out the Dead; recording high-profile duets with Jennifer Lopez and Maxwell; singing (with Australian star Tina Arenas) the theme song for The Mask of Zorro; and, at this writing, working on a highly anticipated English-language album.

what to buy: Anthony's salsa expertise is reflected on his second release, Otra Nota ♪♪♪½ (Soho, 1993, prod. Sergio George).

what to buy next: With guest appearances by Latin-jazz greats Tito Puente and Eddie Palmieri, Anthony's debut When the Night Is Over ♪♪♪ (Atlantic, 1991, prod. "Little" Louie Vega) is dance-inspiring hip-hop with a difference.

the rest:
Todo A Su Tiempo ♪♪♪ (Soho, 1995)
Contra La Corriente ♪♪♪ (Soho, 1997/RMM, 1998)

influences:
⏮ Tito Puente, Eddie Palmieri, Jose Feliciano

⏭ Sa-Fire, Tina Arenas

see also: Jennifer Lopez

Craig Harris and Adam McGovern

Anúna

Irish traditional and neo-traditional choral music

Formed in Dublin, Ireland. Based in Dublin, Ireland.

Variable membership led by director Michael McGlynn (born 1964, in Dublin, Ireland).

Anúna is a highly innovative choir masterminded by singer and composer Michael McGlynn, whose goal is to take a form normally associated almost exclusively with church music and bring it to a broader public. McGlynn has succeeded in exposing younger, nontraditional audiences to a dazzling variety of ancient, medieval, and modern choral music from Ireland (and beyond), performed with style and considerable discipline by his 16-member ensemble. In pursuing his vision, McGlynn displays a zeal and energy that remind one of the Chieftains' Paddy Moloney—and if his sense of marketing and eye for publicity prove to be half as sharp as Moloney's, the world may be hearing a lot more of Anúna in the years ahead.

Though many first encountered Anúna singing Bill Whelan's compositions for Riverdance, the phenomenal 1995 stage

the didgeridoo

Variously spelled "didgerido," "didjeridu," and "didjeridoo," and locally known as a yadaki or yidaki in addition to its most widely used spelling, the didgeridoo's mysterious origins predate written history by many thousands of years; natives of Australia's Northern Territories claim its use for over 40,000! This ancient legacy contrasts an increasingly popular sound which is easily mistaken for that of a synthesizer. The traditional instrument is made from a tree branch that has been hollowed out by termites; in recent years, didgeridoos made from dried cactus branches, sliced pieces of wood, and plastic resin compounds have appeared. The "didg," as it is popularly dubbed, is a simple tube with no finger holes or fitted mouthpiece. Beeswax is used to coat the rim that touches the lips, and instruments vary substantially in length depending upon the diameter available and tone desired by the player. Sounds—continuous, hypnotic, pulsing drones; deep, rumbling vibrations; and sharp, ear-piercing blasts—are created by using a combination of lip movement, throat vocalization, and tongue manipulation. Unlike most Western woodwind players, the didg performer does not need to break the cycle of sound to breathe; masterful performers can breathe in through one nostril and out the other, ensuring a consistent pattern of sound for hours. The use of the didgeridoo is essential in Aboriginal spiritual ceremonies, many of which find several performers playing for eight- to 12-hour stretches without interruption. In some tribal clans of northern Australia only men are allowed to play the instrument, and the didgeridoos used in several traditional ceremonies are frequently destroyed afterward because of the enormous power invested in them. Didgeridoo instrumentals can be traditional compositions or improvisations, inspired by real-life events, deep emotions, or visions. Usually, didgeridoos are decorated by the craftsman with natural ochre and designs pertaining to the season and heritage of the individual instrument, though it is becoming more common for plain ones to be sold and customized by the purchaser.

PJ Birosik

3/4 anúna

show, video, and Grammy-winning album of which they were an integral part, the choir's origins go back much further. McGlynn, who by the mid-'80s had earned degrees in both English and music from University College Dublin, composed several pieces in diverse styles before deciding to specialize in choral and vocal works and, in 1987, founding the choir An Uaithne—named after the collective term for the three ancient forms of Irish music: Suantraí (lullaby), Geantraí (pleasant music), and Goltraí (lament). By 1992, the ensemble had opted for the simplified spelling (and similar pronunciation) of "Anúna," and were starting to incorporate some theatrical movements into their stage act, with McGlynn's identical twin brother John serving as production designer. McGlynn credits the voice of classical-rock institution Renaissance's Annie Haslam with providing the blueprint for the female sound of Anúna, and points out that Irish trad/rock legend Clannad's Dulaman and Magical Ring albums were also hugely influential on the choir's impressionistic, introspective style.

In 1993, Anúna's self-titled, largely a cappella debut album appeared. Its temporal span—including texts from the 6th, 9th, 12th, 17th, and 20th centuries—and great range of styles proved to be hallmarks of the Anúna sound. This was also the year they performed live as part of a much larger choral unit for Bill Whelan's ambitious The Spirit of Mayo suite. When Whelan was commissioned to come up with the "interval" (intermission) music for the 1994 Eurovision Song Contest spectacular, broadcast live from Dublin to a huge European TV audience, it was Anúna he picked for the resulting song and dance number called "Riverdance." Katie McMahon's sweet and haunting performance fronting the choir captivated all who saw it, and within a year a full stage show of the same name was born, with Anúna in the forefront on four sumptuous songs.

By the time Riverdance the show hit the boards, Anúna had already released their second album Invocation (featuring more instrumental accompaniment than its predecessor), but found themselves touring as part of the extraordinarily successful stage production for over a year, not only singing but also taking on some modest theatrical and dancing roles. This introduced them to new audiences in cultural capitol stops like London and New York, and also forced them to draw on a larger pool of singers, many of whom had day jobs they were not ready to quit. In a swirl of unprecedented opportunities and obstacles, Anúna managed to do their own live shows as the hectic Riverdance schedule would permit, and issued a third album, Omnis. Soloists including Katie McMahon, Monica Donlon, and Eimear Quinn played a prominent role in the Anúna sound at this point; Quinn also won the 1996 Eurovision Song Contest for Ireland with a solo outing called "The Voice."

With no end in sight for Riverdance—at this writing let alone at the time—McGlynn decided to pull Anúna out so the group could focus on its own goals. But while the choir officially became disassociated with the show, most of its vocalists (including McMahon) stayed on under the new name, the Riverdance Singers. This forced McGlynn to do some fancy footwork of his own to get the depleted ranks back up to the numbers and standards to which he had become accustomed. Deep Dead Blue was recorded and released in Ireland in 1996, titled after the rare Elvis Costello (words)/Bill Frisell (tune) composition which opens it and shows just how broad this group's range is, but the album has yet to receive a widespread release. Omnis, on the other hand—rerecorded the same year, with the new Anúna line-up—was issued internationally in 1997. One further album, Behind the Closed Eye, which sees the choir accompanied by the Ulster Orchestra, was released just in Ireland in 1997, and also awaits broader distribution.

McGlynn and the aforesaid Paddy Moloney have already crossed paths, the latter having invited Anúna to contribute to several recent Chieftains albums. They back Sting on The Long Black Veil (1995), and actress Brenda Fricker (reciting a Yeats poem) on the opening track to Tears of Stone (1999); their finest such collaboration is with Elvis Costello on Long Journey Home (1998).

After many years of researching the few extant fragments of Irish medieval music to be found in libraries and using them as starting points for arrangements and compositions, McGlynn has more recently taken to writing all-new songs with great vigor. He has also written a specially commissioned piece for saxophone and piano for Northern Irish classical saxophone virtuoso Gerard McChrystal, part of which can be found on McChystal's Meeting Point (Silva Classics, 1996). He has even written songs with country stars Rodney Crowell ("I'm Tied to You") and Delbert McClinton ("Waiting for You"). McGlynn's own "Dulaman" from Omnis has been recorded by the renowned all-male choir Chanticleer on their Wondrous Love (Teldec, 1997). Few artists have survived either reversals or success like McGlynn, and he seems fit to continue bringing new life to both ancient and current genres with an end that isn't near.

what to buy: Invocation ♪♪♪♪ (Celtic Heartbeat, 1995, prod. Michael McGlynn, Brian Masterson) is in many ways the most balanced of the group's three international releases. Declan Masterson's piping provides great drama on the opening "Rising of the Sun," Anne-Marie O'Farrell's harp sparkles on several other tracks, and Noel Eccles is as brilliant as ever on percussion—even the humble bodhrán (Irish frame drum). The material is quite varied, going back as far as the 6th century, but also including Thomas Moore's 19th-century "Last Rose of Summer" and McGlynn's own setting of "Lake Isle of Innisfree" by William Butler Yeats.

what to buy next: Anúna ♪♪♪♪ (Celtic Heartbeat, 1993, prod. Michael McGlynn) is an impressive debut, with some startling juxtapositions between polytextual pieces drawing on ancient Irish, English, and Latin sources; new settings of medieval poems; church music displaying Byzantine influence; lullaby and unaccompanied "mouth music" from Scotland; and Irish songs ranging from Thomas Moore's "Silent O Moyle" to a revival of the humorous "An Poc ar Buile" (popularized by Seán Ó Riada and Ceoltoiri Chualann in the 1960s). A dozen of the 15 tracks on Omnis ♪♪♪♪ (Celtic Heartbeat, 1997, prod. Michael McGlynn, Brian Masterson) are rerecordings of songs from the original Irish album of same name from 1995. 12th-century visionary Hildegard von Bingen is represented once more, as is the earlier St. Godric. McGlynn takes the solo spot himself on a stunning version of the beautiful Northern Irish love song "The Flower of Maherally."

worth searching for: Look for Anúna's performance of the song "Deep Dead Blue" on Bespoke Songs, Lost Dogs, Detours & Rendezvous (Songs of Elvis Costello) (Rhino, 1999), whose sleeve notes include Costello crediting McGlynn with helping him overcome his reluctance to master written musical notation. The choir can also be found on Dawn of a New Century (Philips, 1999) by duo Secret Garden, who first came to fame by winning the Eurovision Song Contest for Norway in 1995, in Ireland, the year after the original "Riverdance" had been the interval music. This Windham Hill-sounding album also includes Irish accordionist Mairtín O'Connor, Scotland's Karen Matheson (of Capercaillie), and fellow-Norwegian jazz-guitar legend Terje Rypdal. French Celtic treasure Dan Ar Braz performs Anúna's "Diwanit Bugale" on the compilation L'Imaginaire Irlandais—Suite (Keltia Musique, 1997), while Eimear Quinn—with Anúna—performs his Eurovision entry from the year he won the contest.

influences:

◀◀ Machaut, Purcell, Debussy, Howells, Ligeti, Seán Ó Riada, Bill Whelan, David Bowie, Renaissance, Clannad, David Sylvian

▶▶ Bill Whelan, Ars Nova, Ronan Hardiman, Medieval Babes

see also: Bill Whelan

John C. Falstaff

Apache Indian

Ragga, bhangra, jungle

Born 1968, in Hansworth, England. Based in Hansworth, England.

Apache Indian (his stage name; a play on his parents' Asian birthplace) fell in love with reggae at an early age, but he was also exposed to British pop and dance music, as well as the traditional Indian sounds his parents played at home. As bhangra (a form of Indian immigrant popular music based on a traditional homeland rhythm) began to take off, Apache joined other Asian DJs in forging a combination of reggae, bhangra, and pop. "It may sound odd, but I grew up hearing Jamaican patois in school, English on the radio, and Hindi at home." Apache Indian uses all three languages in his music, as well as beats drawn from roots reggae, bhangra, Jamaican dancehall and ragga, and jungle and other English club beats. His singles, including "Arranged Marriage" (a controversial attack on Indian tradition) and parables about safe sex, have made him one of Britain's leading Asian pop stars, and also driven his albums to the top of the charts in India. In the late 1990s, the majors gave up on pushing bhangra to a larger non-Indian audience, and Apache was dropped by Island. Apache created his own label, Sunset, and has released two albums for them, Real People and Wild East.

what's available: No Reservations ♪♪♪ (Mango, 1993, prod. Simon & Diamond) is not particularly innovative, nor as interesting as Bally Sagoo's Asian/dancehall experiments, but the album does contain an interesting mix of bhangra, reggae, and dance club beats. Make Way For the Indian ♪♪♪ (Island, 1993, prod. Simon & Diamond) became a monster seller behind the "Boom Shak a Lak" single, but it's more formulaic and less interesting than No Reservations. Wild East ♪♪♪½ (Sunset, 1998) features remixes of the best tracks on Real People, a frenzied mix of bhangra, Bengali folk, techno, house, and dancehall.

influences:

◀◀ Alaap, Bally Sagoo, Bob Marley, Super Cat, Shabba Ranks

j. poet

Dan Ar Braz /Dan Ar Bras

Celtic

Born in Brittany, France. Based in Brittany, France.

A melodic and expressive approach to acoustic and electric guitar has made Dan Ar Braz (a.k.a. Ar Bras) one of the most influential musicians from Brittany, the Celtic area of France. First prominent in Cliff Richards's early-'60s pop/rock band the Shadows, Ar Braz went on to inspire scores of Celtic guitarists when he collaborated with Celtic harp-, bagpipe-, and flute-player Alan Stivell between 1967 and 1976, recording such landmark albums as 1972's The Renaissance of the Celtic Harp. Following the breakup of Stivell's band, Ar Braz continued to explore the emotional qualities of his instrument. Although he temporarily replaced Richard Thompson in English folk-rock colossus Fairport Convention, Ar Braz remained with the band for only six months and failed to produce any recordings (he does appear, however, on their 1998 live retrospective The Cro- predy Box). He formed a tradition-rooted acoustic/electric Celtic band in 1977, but made his next significant mark as a solo artist in the '80s. Beginning his full switch to acoustic guitar, Ar Braz produced a series of atmospheric solo recordings including the declaratorily titled Acoustic in 1985, and Music for the Silences to Come the following year. Ar Braz's work in the '90s has included two groundbreaking albums with his 50-piece band L'Heritage Des Celtes: Their self-titled 1994 studio debut, recorded at U2's Windmill Lane facility in Dublin, established Ar Braz as a superstar in France, with the excitement of the ensemble's live shows captured that same year on the album En Concert. It was an even busier time for Ar Braz than this implies; he also reunited with Stivell for 1994's Again.

ar log

what to buy: A revelation to his fans and a breakthrough for the artist himself, Ar Braz's first attempt at an all-acoustic album, the sensibly named Acoustic ♪♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1985, prod. Dan Ar Braz), is a memorable outing accompanied by keyboard player Benoit Wildemann. Music for the Silences to Come ♪♪♪♪½ (Keltia Musique, 1986, prod. Dan Ar Braz) continues Ar Braz's aural exploration and personal expression of acoustic Celtic music, this time complemented by saxophonist Daniel Paboeuf.

the rest:
Douar Nevez ♪♪♪½ (Hexagone, 1977)
Allez Dire à la Ville ♪♪♪½ (Hexagone, 1978)
The Earth's Lament ♪♪♪½ (Hexagone, 1979)
Borders of Salt ♪♪♪½ (Keltia Musique, 1992)
Les Iles de la Memoire ♪♪♪½ (Keltia Musique, 1992)
Reve de Siam ♪♪♪½ (Keltia Musique, 1992)
Xavier Grall Chante Por Dan Ar Braz ♪♪♪♪ (Keltia Musique, 1992)
En Concert ♪♪♪♪ (Keltia Musique, 1994)
L'Heritage Des Celtes ♪♪♪♪ (Keltia Musique, 1994)
Septembre Blue ♪♪♪½ (Keltia Musique, 1994)
Songs ♪♪♪♪ (Keltia Musique, 1994)
Theme for the Green Lands ♪♪♪½ (Keltia Musique, 1994) Kindred Spirit ♪♪♪½ (Keltia Musique, 1995)

influences:
◀◀ Richard Thompson, John Renbourn, Bert Jansch, Dick Gaughan
▶▶ Pierre Bensusan, Gabriel Yacoub, Malicorne

see also: Fairport Convention, Maddy Prior, Alan Stivell

Craig Harris

Ar Log

Traditional Celtic

Formed 1976, in Wales. Based in Wales.

Varying lineup over more than two decades, including original members David Burns, mandolin, guitar, bodhrán, vocals; Ialo Jones, fiddle, recorder; Dayfydd Roberts, triple harp, flute; Gwyndof Roberts, knee harp. (All members are from Wales.)

Ar Log is dedicated to preserving and expanding the musical traditions of Wales. Singing in their native language and accompanying themselves on traditional instruments like the triple harp and knee harp, the group has brought a fresh vision to their centuries-old repertoire. Ar Log, whose name translates as "on hire," originally came together to represent Wales at a Celtic music festival. In the early 1980s, they backed Welsh singer-songwriter, label founder, folk preservationist, and nationalist politician Dafydd Iwan on his Rhwng Hwyl A Thaith and Yma O Hyd albums (released in 1982 and 1983, respectively, and reissued in part on Iwan's Yma O Hyd in 1993). Although Ar Log has slowed down its touring and experienced numerous personnel changes through the years, the group continues to perform periodically in its native country.

what to buy: Ar Log II ♪♪♪ (Dingles, 1982, prod. Ar Log) captures the Welsh band at their best, harmonizing in their native language and showcasing their uplifting instrumental talents. Their technical skills are spotlighted even more on the all-instrumental album Meillonen ♪♪♪ (Dingles, 1982, prod. Ar Log).

the rest:
Ar Log ♪♪½ (Dingles, 1978)
Ar Log III ♪♪♪ (Dingles, 1982)
Pedawar ♪♪♪ (Ar Log, 1985)
Ar Log V ♪♪♪ (Sain, 1988)

influences:
◀◀ Welsh tradition, Dafydd Iwan ▶▶ Merc Stevens, Cilmeri, Robin Huw Bowen

see also: Crasdant

Craig Harris

Arawak Mountain Singers

Powwow drum

Formed 1987, in Staten Island, NY, USA. Based in Staten Island, NY, USA.

Al Bold Eagle, drum, vocals; Louie Tureyguard, drum keeper, drum, vocals; Jorge Baracutey, drum, vocals; Cliff Standing Bear, drum, vocals; Tonee Robles, drum, vocals; Lizzy Sarobey, vocals; Joan Henry, vocals; Tree Ceibo Rivas, drum, vocals; Ray Elk Silva, drum, vocals. (All members are from USA.)

Al Bold Eagle, leader and head drummer of the Arawak Mountain Singers, is a traditional man who lives in New York City. The Arawaks, traders known for their gold, silver, and turquoise, originated in the Amazon basin, ranged throughout the Caribbean, and established outposts as far north as Virginia. Bold Eagle is a drum man, singer, and historian; his group sings songs of northern and southern plains tribes including the Comanche, Kiowa, Tonka, and Otoe. "The spirit of a tree once told us; 'Hollow a piece of me out and make an instrument. With this instrument you will liven the hearts of those that are sick; those that are sad will be happy. The ground will tremble when you beat on this instrument, this drum. It is the heartbeat of your nation. Take care of it and it will take care of you.' That is what we believe."

Bold Eagle says the first Arawak drums were hollow logs with tongues cut in their sides, similar to the slit drums Africans were playing at about the same time; some so big it took four people to play them. "We also use circle drums—the rim was a single piece of hollowed-out cedar, covered with a skin of cowhide, deer, or buffalo. If you're going to use it for healing or spiritual purposes, you paint a design on the skin to put good medicine into it. The drum is female, the drumstick is male, and the throbbing sound the drum makes is the heartbeat of the nation. Every time we set up the drum to play, each person honors the drum with a spiritual herb like sage or tobacco. When we're not playing, the drum is covered with a blanket and carried away. If we see a drum left unattended, we can ask an elder or a medicine man to take the drum away from the owner, that's how sacred the drum is."

White people often say that Native American drumming and chanting sounds monotonous, but Bold Eagle says that Native music has its own logic. Since the songs come to humans from the spirit world, they never change, and improvisation is not encouraged. "Our drumming isn't as diverse as African drumming; there are no cuts [breaks], but the drumming gets louder, faster, or slower, and every song has a meaning and origin. Songs have a spirit, the way a person has a spirit." Despite 500 years of colonial interference, most Native American drum styles have remained pure. "There are songs that were sung before Columbus was born that are still being sung today, passed down in an unbroken oral chain for generations. Before the whites came, my people were living in Boriken (Puerto Rico) and the lands now known as Florida, Venezuela, Guyana, and Brazil. As a result our music has African and Afro-Caribbean influences, with songs sung in English, Spanish, and Native tongues. Africans and Native people mixed all over the Caribbean to create rhythms like the samba, plena, bomba, and guajira; the original music of the land we call America."

what's available: On Honoring the Ancient Ones ♪♪♪½ (SOAR, 1994, prod. Al Bold Eagle) there is one song partially in English—"Soldier Boy Fought Hard"—which makes it easier for non-Native ears to track the melody. There is also an instrumental—"Cry of the Manati"—on which Bold Eagle recreates the drumming style the Arawaks may have been playing a hundred years ago; part Native, part Latin, part African. Feel the Thunder ♪♪♪ (SOAR, 1995, prod. Arawak Mountain Singers) is another rewarding outing.

influences:

◀◀ Rocky Boy Singers, Black Lodge Singers, White Eagle Singers

▶▶ Otter Trail

j. poet

Arcady

Irish traditional and contemporary

Formed 1988, in Dublin, Ireland. Based in Ireland.

Johnny Moynihan, bodhrán; Frances Black, vocals (1988–94); Niamh Parsons, vocals (1994–97); Patsy Broderick, piano; Brendan Larrisey, fiddle; Nicolas Quemenar, guitar, flute, whistle; Jackie Daly, accordion (1990–95); Conor Keane, accordion (1995–present). (All members are from Ireland.)

Named for the land in ancient Greece where poets and artists came together, the group Arcady does indeed represent the coming together of many of Ireland's top traditional musicians. Anchored by founder Johnny Moynihan's bodhrán (Irish frame drum) and the outstanding piano playing of the underrated Patsy Broderick, Arcady plays a rhythmic, straightforward Irish style with a few world-music elements (harmonica and Australian didgeridoo among them) thrown in for spice. Like Moynihan's earlier band De Dannan, Arcady features English-language songs by talented, accessible vocalists such as Frances Black and Niamh (pronounced "Neeve") Parsons. A constant fixture on the concert scene, Arcady has managed to fashion an identifiable sound despite a tremendous amount of turnover in personnel. Sharon Shannon, Sean Keane, Cathal Hayden, and Tommy McCarthy are a few of the people who have briefly passed through the band during its history.

what's available: Many Happy Returns ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1995, prod. Johnny McDonough) is a tribute to the tunes and songs that form the backbone of traditional Irish music. Each of the musicians knows this material inside and out from years of playing it in sessions and competitions, and they give it their all in the studio. The band's adventuresome yet tasteful arrangements, using nontraditional instruments like didgeridoo and harmonica, keep these well-known pieces sounding fresh and contemporary. Accordion player Conor Keane in particular must be singled out for a driving, exuberant style that keeps the energy level high from the album's very first tune. The vocals are handled by Niamh Parsons, whose husky, Dolores Keane–like alto breathes new life into songs that have been sung literally millions of times. Anyone wishing to play Irish music would receive a crash course in the standard repertoire with a few listens to this album. After the Ball ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1991, prod. P. J. Curtis) is Arcady's debut album: a solid, pleasant collection of traditional and contemporary material from Ireland and beyond. Singer Frances Black brings her sweet voice to pop-folk songs by Bill Staines, Stan Rogers, Andy Stewart, and Dan Seals, and the instrumentalists attack a variety of tunes from Ireland, Brittany, and the U.S. The playing, while always solid, lacks a little of the fire that shines so brilliantly on Many Happy Returns.

influences:

◀◀ De Dannan, Planxty, Joe Cooley

▶▶ Sharon Shannon, Four Men and a Dog

see also: Frances Black, the Black Family, Jackie Daly, De Dannan, Four Men & a Dog, Dolores Keane, Niamh Parsons, Planxty, Sharon Shannon, Sweeney's Men

Tony Ziselberger

Alphonse "Bois Sec" Ardoin

Creole, Cajun

Born November 16, 1927, in Duralde, LA, USA. Based in Duralde, LA, USA.

"Bois Sec" (translation: "dry wood") grew up playing triangle behind his uncle, the legendary Creole accordionist Amédée Ardoin. He rapidly learned to play accordion himself, and teamed up with fiddler Canray Fontenot. It was a partnership that would survive until Fontenot's death in 1995; across its long heyday their duets of fiddle and accordion would come to be augmented by Bois Sec's sons and, eventually, grandsons. The sound was always funky and loose, with a great beat and an engaging originality, and the syncopated accordion of Ardoin and soaring fiddle of Fontenot were its heart and soul. Bois Sec continues to play and to influence whole new generations of young Cajun and zydeco musicians; his 1998 collaboration with Balfa Toujours shows him alive and well and playing as spryly as ever into his eighth decade of life.

what to buy: The Ardoin Family Band with Dewey Balfa: A Couple of Cajuns ♪♪♪♪♪ (Sonet, 1987, prod. Samuel Charters) is the best recording of the Ardoin Family band. They swing and swoop around Bois Sec and guest fiddler Dewey Balfa; Lawrence Ardoin kicks the drums the way his son Sean does now in Double Clutchin'; and Russell Ardoin's bass bounces off the beat like a superball. Balfa gives some of his most blues-inspired playing with this group, showing a looser, funkier side than his own recordings reveal. Bois Sec is the focus that holds it all together, with the gentle croak of his singing and an accordion style that constantly shifts beats and accents.

what to buy next: Les Blues du Bayou ♪♪♪♪♪ (Melodeon, 1967, prod. Richard Spottswood) is just duets between Canray and Bois Sec, with triangle contributed by Revon Reed or Isom Fontenot. Recorded at a studio in Washington, D.C., fresh from an appearance at the Newport Folk Festival, the playing is crisp and marvelous. The pair played with a loose kind of telepathy, in which both musicians knew the melody for the tune but rarely played it, preferring to play around it. Fontenot's fiddle, gliding high, cries over the bouncing, rhythmic playing of Bois Sec. The compilation Les Haricots Sont Pas Salés: Legendary Masters of Cajun and Creole Music ♪♪♪♪♪ (Cinq Planetes, 1998, prod. various) includes classic performances by Ardoin and Fontenot backed by the Balfa Brothers. As if to accentuate Bois Sec's influence on entire dynasties of other players in his genre, Allons Danser ♪♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1998) sees him backed by the Balfas' next generation Balfa Toujours, with Steve Riley (on drums) further fleshing out the all-star Cajun cast paying tribute and keeping pace.

the rest:

Louisiana Cajun French Music from the Southwest Prairies, Vol. 2: 1964–1967 ♪♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1976/1985)

worth searching for: La Musique Creole ♪♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1997, prod. Chris Strachwitz) features recordings of the Ardoin Family band from Morris Ardoin's Cowboy Club, and more duets by Canray and Bois Sec made in 1970 and '71. There is almost no overlap with the above recordings, and even when there is you'll barely notice; these guys never play a tune the same way twice.

influences:

◀◀ Amédée Ardoin, Dennis McGee

▶▶ Chris Ardoin, Keith Frank, Geno Delafose, Tasso, Beausoleil

see also: Amédée Ardoin, Chris Ardoin & Double Clutchin', Balfa Brothers, Balfa Toujours, Canray Fontenot, Steve Riley & the Mamou Playboys

Jared Snyder

Amédée Ardoin

Cajun

Born c. 1896, in L'Anse Rougeau, LA, USA. Died November 4, 1941, in Pineville, LA, USA.

The heart and soul of traditional Cajun music is Amédée Ardoin, an artist who can be considered the true father of modern Cajun and zydeco music alike. His virtuoso accordion playing and emotionally charged singing continues to be highly respected by both black and white musicians. He refined and adapted traditional Cajun and Creole songs that had been played on the fiddle or the diatonic accordion. His music was a major influence on both Clifton Chenier and Iry Lejeune, as well as the primary influence on the "bluesy" fiddling and singing of Michael Doucet and the accordion of Marc Savoy.

Alphonse "Bois Sec" Ardoin

Born the seventh of seven brothers, he was raised in L'Anse Rougeau near the town of Basile, where he became friends with fellow accordionist Adam Fontenot (father of Canray). He met Cajun fiddler Dennis McGee while sharecropping in 1921, and the two rapidly became extremely popular at dances in the Eunice area. Their partnership eventually led to three seminal recording sessions. These, combined with Ardoin's final session, form a canon for modern Cajun and zydeco music in the same way the recordings of Robert Johnson do for the blues or the Bristol Sessions do for country music. His last years were spent at the state sanitarium in Pineville, where he had been committed after what some sources say was a brutal racist beating, while others claim he was poisoned by a jealous musician.

what to buy: I'm Never Comin' Back: The Roots of Zydeco ♪♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1995, prod. Chris Strachwitz) contains all of Ardoin's second, most of his third, and all of his fourth recording sessions. It's full of classic performances, but the sound is somewhat harsh for those not used to it. "Les Blues de Crowley," which is reissued for the first time on this CD, is clearly the first zydeco recording, just needing some juiced-up bass and drums behind it to make it a current dance hall hit. Almost every song on this CD has been rehashed and rerecorded by other Cajun and Creole performers.

what to buy next: The compilation Cajun Music: Fais Do-Do ♪♪♪♪♪ (Columbia, 1994, prod. Lawrence Cohn) contains the six truly classic recordings of Ardoin and McGee that are not found on the Arhoolie release, and represents Ardoin at his best. All of these songs continue to be found in the repertoire of Cajun and zydeco bands throughout Louisiana, including "Eunice Two-Step," "Quoi Faire," and "Madame Atchen."

worth searching for: Louisiana Cajun Music, Vol. 6: Amade Ardoin: The First Black Zydeco Recording Artist ♪♪♪♪ (Old Timey, 1983, prod. Chris Strachwitz) is a fine collection. (In the credits of his early recordings, Ardoin's first name was spelled "Amade.") An earlier, vinyl compilation of Ardoin can also be found on Old Timey, and covers the recordings on Cajun Music: Fais Do-Do and many of the tunes on I'm Never Comin' Back: The Roots of Zydeco.

influences:

- Dennis McGee, Joe Falcon
- Clifton Chenier, Alphonse "Bois Sec" Ardoin, Michael Doucet, Iry LeJeune

see also: Nathan Abshire, Alphonse "Bois Sec" Ardoin, Chris Ardoin & Double Clutchin', Beausoleil, Clifton Chenier, Canray Fontenot, Iry Lejeune, Savoy-Doucet Cajun Band

Jared Snyder

Chris Ardoin & Double Clutchin'

Zydeco

Formed 1995, in Lake Charles, LA, USA. Based in Lake Charles, LA, USA.

Chris Ardoin, one-row accordion, three-row accordion, vocals; Sean Ardoin, drums, vocals; Tammy Ledet, frattoir, vocals; Derek Dee Greenwood, bass, vocals; Bobby Broussard, guitar; Nathan Fontenot, guitar.

Chris and Sean Ardoin have one serious zydeco pedigree. They are sons of zydeco musician Lawrence "Black" Ardoin, grandsons of the celebrated Alphonse "Bois Sec" Ardoin, and great grandnephews of the legendary Amédée Ardoin. They are also part of a very young generation of new zydeco players who are reshaping the music based on their strong family traditions and contemporary musical influences. They can mix together funk and hip-hop with a Creole tinge, or play revved-up versions of traditional two-steps and waltzes. At this writing, Chris was only 16 years old, with four albums already under his belt. As Steve Riley's done with Cajun music, the Ardoin brothers have added three-part vocal harmonies to zydeco, and that's just for starters. In every way, theirs is a new and fresh approach to zydeco that still has roots back out in the countryside.

what to buy: In the first minute of "Lake Charles Connection" on Gon' Be Jus' Fine ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1997, prod. Scott Billington), you get all the elements that make up the Double Clutchin' sound: the double bass drum beat as popularized by Beau Jocque, mixed with the slinky bass guitar and chippy minor-key rhythm guitar, the virtuoso accordion playing of Chris Ardoin, and the clean three-part harmonies. The vocals are mostly in English, with the constant interjections and asides sometimes straying to French. This sound seems to work best on the aforesaid song, "When I'm Dead and Gone," and "I Don't Want What I Can't Keep." The family tradition is represented by the frantic "Ardoin Two Step" and by Sean's reading of his grandfather's "Dimanche Apres Midi." A solid and different-sounding record.

what to buy next: The Ardoin brothers continue to grow and develop on Turn the Page ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1998, prod. Scott Billington). You can hear more of a rap and R&B influence than on Gon' Be Jus' Fine ; meanwhile they play Canray Fontenot's "Barres de la Prison," a blues waltz that Fontentot performed for 50 years with their grandfather Bois Sec! There's no shortage of dance grooves on this record, though maybe because it follows such an ambitious predecessor it doesn't seem quite as fresh or innovative, just smoother and more polished.

the rest:

That's Da Lick ♪♪♪ (Maison De Soul, 1995)

worth searching for: Lick It Up! ♪♪♪ (Maison de Soul, 1995, prod. Lawrence Ardoin) features the early sound of a very young—or should we say younger—Chris Ardoin. The also-youthful zydeco band with him shows they can bust a groove with the best of their seniors.

influences:

⏮ Alphonse "Bois Sec" Ardoin, Beau Jocque, Canray Fontenot

⏭ Keith Frank, Geno Delafose

see also: Alphonse "Bois Sec" Ardoin, Amédée Ardoin

Jared Snyder

Frankie Armstrong

English folk

Born in Workington, Cumbria, England. Based in England.

Frankie Armstrong is one of the classic voices of the English folk-song revival. A social worker who has aided the blind and the addicted, Armstrong brings a strong sense of justice and concern for humanity to the songs she sings. She came to the attention of the listening public in 1966, on two songs from The Bird in the Bush, a thematic album compiled by the leading folklorist of the revival, A. L. Lloyd. During the same period, she joined the Critics Group, a collective of young singers that gathered to discuss and explore folksong and the revival, under the direction of Ewan MacColl. She released several albums with the Critics Group during the late 1960s, and in 1971 began her career as a solo artist. In 1975, Lloyd wrote that Armstrong was "the outstanding woman singer in the folk revival," no small praise from such an eminent critic and authority. Lloyd also pointed out that Armstrong's great strength lies in her combination of "a distinctive approach to traditional ballads with a discriminating ear for contemporary songs." Unfortunately, the numerous solo albums she recorded during the 1970s and '80s, all of which are marvelous examples of these talents, are out of print, though plans are afoot to reissue at least one of them. During the late '80s and early '90s, Armstrong concentrated on areas of life other than her recording career. She was, for example, running singing workshops at which she helped others liberate their own voices. Therefore, the only CD release during this period was an album that she shared with Dave Van Ronk. During the late '90s, however, she decided to strike a different balance between teaching and recording, which led to an outpouring of three releases in a six-month period during late 1996 and early '97.

what to buy: Till the Grass O'ergrew the Corn ♪♪♪♪♪ (Fellside, 1996, prod. Paul Adams, Frankie Armstrong) features Armstrong singing her favorite traditional British ballads. Accompanied on many tracks by John Kirkpatrick on accordion or melodeon, and on a few by Maddy Prior's vocal harmonies, Armstrong treats the listener to 12 magical and mysterious ballads from the "Child Ballad" canon of earlier folk preservationist Francis Child. Her voice on this recent release is as strong as ever, and the hairs on the back of one's neck are apt to stand up while listening to her sing these old songs. Most of Armstrong's ballads deal with relations between the sexes, from husbands rescuing their kidnapped wives ("Young Orphy") to incest and murder between brothers and sisters ("Fair Lizzy"). The most powerful of them are the ones she sings a cappella, including "Lady Diamond" and the 11-minute "Child Waters," whose hair-raisingly cruel storylines are enhanced by the starkness of unaccompanied performance. Similarly frightening are the ballads "The Well below the Valley," a story of incest and rape in which the victim takes the blame, sung by Armstrong with harmony vocals by Prior; and "Clerk Colvin," the story of a two-timing rogue whose mermaid lover does him in, to which Kirkpatrick adds ominous accordion drones and noises. A few of the ballads are lighter-hearted, including "The Broomfield Hill," "John Blunt," and, in an unusual version told from a woman's point of view, "Hares on the Mountain." These do a lot to add levity to the otherwise gloomy feeling of the album. Erudite liner notes by Brian Pearson, who is clearly better-read and more knowledgeable about ballads than many professional folklorists, add the finishing touch to this fine package.

what to buy next: Ways of Seeing ♪♪♪½ (Harbourtown, 1996, prod. Charlie Grey) is a recording made live at London concerts. It's a diverse collection of material, including Eastern European songs, a translation of a Gaelic croon, and many modern works. Armstrong is backed by a chorus of female singers on a number of cuts, and on the rest sings unaccompanied. Some highlights include the Sydney Carter song "Girl in a Garden," on which Armstrong does incredible things with her voice; "Low Ground," a song by David Craig about the Norse in Britain; and "I Only Believe in Miracles," a tribute to one of Armstrong's friends. The album, including its title, makes frequent and poignant references to Armstrong's blindness. The Fair Moon Rejoices ♪♪♪ (Harbourtown, 1997, prod. Gordon Jones) also contains a wide variety. Two of the highlights are poems by William Blake set to music by Mike Westbrook. Others include songs from plays, poems set to music, original compositions, and several tunes by songwriter Leon Rosselson. Accompaniments are provided by Peter Stacey on saxophones and bagpipes, Ben Lawrence on African djembe drum and cello, and Geoff Haynes on piano. The overall feeling of many of the pieces—due to Armstrong's emotional and dramatic singing and the jazz/classical arrangements—is that of theater music, but inflected by the folksong movement. Let No One Deceive You: Songs of Bertholt Brecht ♪♪♪ (Flying Fish, 1989, prod. Gary Cristall) was an inspired idea. The politics and poetry of Brecht were a spur to many in both the American and the British folksong revivals, and this album brings together a giant of the American movement, Dave Van Ronk, with one of the British. Armstrong's contributions are among her most powerful, enraged, defiant, and sometimes gentle recorded performances. Van Ronk's beefy growl is equally riveting.

desi arnaz

the rest:
I Heard a Woman Singing ♪♪♪ (Flying Fish, 1998)

worth searching for: Armstrong has recorded numerous solo albums over the years, all of which are worth hearing. Some highlights of her career include Lovely on the Water ♪♪♪♪ (Topic Records, 1972), her debut album, and Songs and Ballads ♪♪♪♪ , a 1975 collection of traditional songs that was issued in the U.S. on the Antilles label. Her collaboration with Brian Pearson and Blowzabella to create the song cycle and LP Tam Lin ♪♪♪♪ (Plant Life, 1980) is also a fascinating piece of work. Finally, several LPs that she recorded with the Critics Group are worth hearing, especially The Female Frolic ♪♪♪♪ (Argo, 1968), on which she was joined by Sandra Kerr and Peggy Seeger to sing traditional songs from a feminist perspective.

influences:
◀◀ A. L. Lloyd, Ewan MacColl
▶▶ June Tabor

see also: Blowzabella, A. L. Lloyd, Ewan MacColl, Maddy Prior

Steve Winick

Desi Arnaz

Latin pop and jazz

Born Desiderio Alberto Arnaz y de Acha III, March 2, 1917, in Santiago, Cuba. Died December 2, 1986, in Del Mar, CA, USA.

Best known as hotheaded Ricky Ricardo, the Latin bandleader with the wiseacre wife on the beloved sitcom I Love Lucy, Arnaz's frequent musical numbers on television were largely responsible for introducing the blazing sounds of conga and mambo to Middle America. Before his days as a sitcom star and studio mogul—he and his real-life wife, Lucille Ball, headed up Desilu Productions—Arnaz was an accomplished musician and bandleader. His first break came in 1938, when well-known Latin-jazz bandleader Xavier Cugat caught the Cuban emigre's act in Miami and asked him to join his band as a vocalist. A year later, Arnaz struck out on his own, heading the Desi Arnaz Orchestra. Audiences adored his band's infectious if somewhat goofy numbers, and Arnaz's charisma led to a role in the Broadway musical and movie Too Many Girls, in which he met co-star Ball. The two married in 1940. After a stint in the army for World War II, Arnaz resumed his musical career, recording most of his signature songs for Victor in the late 1940s before turning his attention full-time to Lucy. After 20 somewhat acrimonious but profitable years of "'splaining," Arnaz and Ball divorced in 1960. Arnaz, however, had left music permanently behind and lived in semi-retirement until his death from lung cancer in 1986.

what to buy: The Best of Desi Arnaz: The Mambo King ♪♪♪♪ (RCA, 1992, prod. various) is a rollicking good time, including the raucous call-and-response "El Cumbanchero" and the melodic smash hit "Babalu."

what to buy next: Focusing on songs from 1946 to 1949, Babalu (We Love Desi) ♪♪♪♪ (RCA, 1996, prod. Paul Williams) covers the hits and includes some rarer tracks.

the rest:
Big Bands of Hollywood ♪♪ (Laserlight, 1992)

worth searching for: Lucy aficionado "Weird" Al Yankovic, who paid homage to Arnaz with his early 1980s parody hit "Ricky," produced a collection of songs culled from I Love Lucy and Arnaz's 1951 radio show Your Tropical Trip. Babalu Music: I Love Lucy's Greatest Hits ♪♪♪ (Columbia, 1991, prod. "Weird" Al Yankovic) is fun, but overall the collection is weighed down by novelties like a duet with Bob Hope on "Nobody Loves the Ump" and a cast version of "Jingle Bells" dominated by Ball's signature shrill.

influences:
◀◀ Machito, Tito Puente, Xavier Cugat, Perez Prado, Les Elgart, Juan Garcia Esquivel
▶▶ Buster Poindexter, Gloria Estefan, "Weird" Al Yankovic

Alex Gordon

Arrow

Soca

Born Alphonsus Cassell, 1955, in Montserrat. Based in Brooklyn, NY, USA.

It was a case of déjà vu all over again when Buster Poindexter (née David Johansen) hit with "Hot, Hot, Hot" in 1987. The tune, which is the de facto national anthem of soca (the Caribbean's popular contraction of SOul and CAlypso), had already sold more than two million copies, topped the charts in dozens of countries in Europe and South America, and made its composer, Arrow, one of the few modern calypsonians known outside the islands. Arrow recalls singing along to the James Brown and Elvis Presley records he heard over the radio since childhood, and also absorbing the rhythms of calypso and French and African music played by his neighbors. By the time he was 16 he was competing in Montserrat's Calypso King contests, but he wasn't considering a career in music until he made his first album, On Target, in 1974. The response was overwhelming, and it set Arrow on a "road march" (to put it in calypso terms) from which he has never looked back. Due to the nationalistic nature of the Carnival in Trinidad and Tobago, calypso artists from other islands are not permitted to compete for the coveted (and commercially important) King of Carnival crown, but if he can't have Trinidad, Arrow will settle for the rest of the world.

"There's an irresistible beat to soca music, but some producers of calypso are content to sell 5,000 records a year," Arrow says. "They're happy if they break even, but they're complacent and the music is getting left behind. When Buster Poindexter had a hit with 'Hot, Hot, Hot,' it should have been a clue that people will accept calypso, if they only hear it. When I do my records, I always earmark 10 percent of the budget for promotion; you have to let people know you're out there." To that end, Arrow and his band, which includes rock guitarist Chris Newland, stay on the road for most of the year, playing Europe, South America, Africa, and the Caribbean. "Every album I make is more diverse," Arrow rightfully boasts. "When I'm in Colombia, I add a bit of cumbia, when I'm in England, I may have Chris play more guitar, when I'm in Africa, the drums step out, and those experiences affect the way I compose the next song."

A great controversy rages in the Caribbean about the origin of soca. About 20 years ago the major calypso artists simplified their often complex songwriting structure, toning down the political content and adding exhortations to "parr-tayy"; they also added beats borrowed from Haiti's cadence and compas, Cuba's rumba, the influential band Kassav"s zouk, and a taste of North American funk. The result was a dance music that has had an international impact. In recent years rap, reggae, and various Latin rhythms have also crept in, as well as bhangra contributed by Trinidad's sizable Indian minority. At first calypsonians dismissed the form as a dilution of the calypso tradition, but after Kitch, Sparrow, and Arrow had major hits with the new beat, they changed their minds. Since the mid-1980s, various calypso singers have stepped forward to claim they invented soca.

When Poindexter channeled Arrow's song into a hit, the author finally landed a major label contract with Mango, the world-music division of Island Records at the time. After three albums and despite constant touring that grabbed raves from the critics, Arrow was dropped. Back on his own indie label, he continues to release album after album of classic party jams.

what to buy: Arrow's major label debut Knock Dem Dead ♪♪♪♪♪ (Mango, 1988, prod. Arrow) features eight strong songs with plenty of rock guitar and a smattering of international beats. "Groove Master," which kicks off the album, has become another signature tune for the artist. Soca Savage ♪♪♪♪♪ (Arrow Records, 1984, prod. Arrow) is a great early album with "Colombia Rock," a Latinized track that was a smash throughout the Caribbean.

best of the rest:
Instant Knock Out ♪♪♪♪ (Charlie's, 1980)
Soca Dance Party ♪♪♪♪½ (Mango, 1990)
Zombie Soca ♪♪♪♪♪ (Arrow, 1991)
Model de Bam Bam ♪♪♪♪ (Arrow, 1992)
Phat ♪♪♪♪ (Arrow, 1995)

influences:
◀◀ Sparrow, Kitch, James Brown

▶▶ Burning Flames, Brother Resistance

see also: Lord Kitchener, the Mighty Sparrow

j. poet

Joe Arroyo

Salsa, tropical, Pan-Latin, cumbia

Born Alvaro José Arroyo Gonzalez, November 1, 1955, in Cartagena, Colombia. Based in Colombia.

Joe Arroyo began his singing career at the age of eight, performing in strip joints in Cartagena. By the time he was a teenager he joined the historic Fruko y sus Tesos. That band was led by Julio Ernesto Estrada Rincon, or, more popularly, "Fruko," also known as Colombia's "Godfather of Salsa"—fittingly, since Arroyo would come to be its favorite son. In 1981 he founded his own group, La Verdad ("The Truth"), whose distinction was Arroyo's sometimes abrasive tenor and his fusion of salsa with his native land's cumbia dance music, Cuba's rhythmic son, and Haitian compas pop to create a sound so unusual it was given its own name: "Joe-son." His work is heard in every corner of Latin America, and the cross-cultural blend he's created has influenced salseros since the early 1980s.

what's available: Arroyo has an extensive discography on labels distributed in Latin America. One of the most readily available examples is Deja Que Te Cante ♪♪♪½ (Sony International, 1998, prod. Joe Arroyo), which showcases Arroyo's cohesive fusion of sounds.

influences:
◀◀ Fruko

▶▶ Grupo Niche

Kerry Dexter

Karen Ashbrook

Hammered dulcimer, Celtic

Born April 28, 1959, in Columbus, OH, USA. Based in the Washington, DC area, USA.

Known for her delicate touch and natural affinity for Irish music, Karen Ashbrook has made a unique mark in the hammered dulcimer world. After spending five years traveling the globe and studying its music, she settled in the Washington, D.C. area, where she has become a celebrity. Her in-depth knowledge of a wide variety of styles and traditions has made her an extraordinary all-around musician. Besides her exquisite hammered dulcimer playing, she also plays a mean pennywhistle and wooden flute. She studied flute with celebrated flautist Chris Norman, and has worked with several groups, including Ceoltoiri, King David's Harp, and Celtic Naught. Ashbrook began learning how to play the hammered dulcimer the week after building one as a high school project. Her love of the instrument is reflected in her nationally acclaimed instruction book and cassette, Playing the Hammered Dulcimer in the Irish Tradition. Ashbrook teaches at festivals and arts institutions across the country, including Common Ground in Westminster, Maryland, and Augusta Heritage Arts Center in Elkins, West Virginia. Notable Ashbrook performances have included appearances at the Smithsonian Institution and on National Public Radio, and a request to play for part of the festivities surrounding the marriage of Prince Charles and Lady Diana.

what's available: Ashbrook's debut recording Knock on the Door ♪♪♪♪ (Fools-Cap Pub., 1988/Maggie's Music, 1995, prod. Karen Ashbrook) has been digitally remastered. On this delightful collection of Irish and Breton tunes, Ashbrook works with many other talented musicians to display her first-hand understanding of Irish music, creating an upbeat and enjoyable recording. On Hills of Erin ♪♪♪♪ (Maggie's Music, 1994, prod. Bob Read), Karen is joined by a host of excellent musicians, including David Scheim on piano, Bob Read on reeds, Carolyn Surrick on viola da gamba, and Sue Richards on harp. The result is a rich tapestry of Irish music, taking the listener on a magic carpet ride to the emerald island. The choice of tunes ranges from the slow and haunting "The Osprey" to the jolly and jocular "The Cabin Boy." Karen displays her versatility and passionate expression with a rendition of J. S. Bach's "Prelude to the First Suite for Unaccompanied Violincello" on hammered dulcimer.

influences:

⏮ J. S. Bach, the Bothy Band, Alasdair Fraser, the Irish Tradition, Nick Blanton, David James

⏭ Jody Marshall, Maggie Sansone

see also: Ceoltoiri

Jo Hughey Morrison

Ashkabad

Turkmenistanian folk music

Formed c. 1990, in Ashkabad, Turkmenistan. Based in Ashkabad, Turkmenistan.

Atabai Tsharykuliev, vocal, tar; Gassan Mamedov, violin; Sabir Rizaev, clarinet, soprano sax, serp, nagara; Kurban Kurbanov, accordion, piano; Khakberdy Allamuradovm, dep, serp, nagra. (All members are from Turkmenistan.)

Much Turkmenistanian folk music centers around wedding celebrations, and all the members of Ashkabad have played their share of weddings. Atabai Tsharykuliev, the band's singer, used to tape other wedding singers to emulate. At the end of the 1970s the (then Soviet) government tried to suppress wedding music because it was "too religious" (i.e. Islamic). Tsharykuliev kept singing, and was briefly confined to an asylum, but since 1985 he's been able to work again. Three of the band's other four members honed their chops at weddings too, and while Sabir Rizaev was classically trained, he sometimes did such gigs with them and played in rock and jazz bands with Mamedov before the two joined their friends in Ashkabad.

what's available: City of Love ♪♪♪♪ (Realworld, 1993, prod. John Leckie) shows how this folkloric group incorporates bits of music from Iran, Turkey, and the United States into their highly traditional style. The percussion sounds Arabic, the clarinet and accordion could have come from a klezmer band, and the fiddling has a melancholy Russian feeling.

influences:

⏮ Alem Kossimov, Rustavi Choir, Hafezi

j. poet

Ashkaru

Worldbeat

Formed early 1990s, in Toronto, Canada. Disbanded mid-1990s.

Celina Carroll, lead and backing vocals, hand percussion; Carlo Cesta, congos, bongas, timbales, percussion; Yared Tesfaye, lead and backing vocals, guitars; Chip Yarwood, keyboards, midi woodwind, flute, tin whistle, guitar, mbira, backing vocals. (Members are from Canada and Ethiopia.)

Ashkaru was a talented worldbeat outfit from Canada, and one that, though it had only two releases before dissolving in the mid-'90s, really helped put the genre on the map in North America. Originally known as Mother Tongue, the band's Canadian/Ethiopian lineup brought a fresh sound to the Great White North, which earned them a Juno (Canadian Grammy) and hefty sales right out of the box. Barred from using their million-dollar name in the Lower 48 due to a trademark challenge from a U.S. band going by the same, they adopted the alias Ashkaru and released their well-liked international debut—titled Mother Tongue, thus displaying the kind of sass their music could have used a bit more of.

what's available: Given the dynamic friction when genres collide in the work of more daring fusionist favorites like Baaba Maal and Angélique Kidjo, Ashkaru's one-world melange is a bit too harmonious a bit too often. But if you like the low-impact world-vibe of Henri Dikongué (and millions do), you'll probably like Mother Tongue ♪♪♪ (Triloka, 1995, prod. various).

influences:

◀◀ Poi Dog Pondering, Osibisa

▶▶ Henri Dikongué

Adam McGovern

Badi Assad

Brazilian, jazz, new age, worldbeat, classical guitar

Born in São João de Boa Vista, São Paulo, Brazil. Based in USA.

Badi Assad's first musical instrument was a small electronic keyboard. "It was made for kids," she says, "and when my hands outgrew the keys, I stopped playing altogether." Not for long, though—soon the teenager took up guitar, which was natural for a family in which her two older brothers, Sergio and Odair, were already on their way to professional careers as classicists on that instrument. Though she studied the classical repertoire, Badi soon started looking into other genres, among them jazz, Brazilian rhythms, the music of her Middle Eastern heritage, and related forms of expression including percussion and dance. Gradually she began to incorporate all these elements into her own work. She has continued to explore possibilities and ignore boundaries, earning praise for her guitar technique and creative blending of musical styles.

what to buy: Chameleon ♪♪♪♪ (PolyGram, 1998, prod. various) is an acoustic-based advancement of Assad's quest after musical combinations in touch with cultural roots. On this disc she sings in English as well as Portuguese, and shows she knows how to blend her voice as another instrument in her palette of sounds. Solo ♪♪♪♪ (Chesky Jazz, 1990, prod. various) is Assad's international debut, demonstrating her technique and imagination on works by classical composers including her countryman Heitor Villa-Lobos.

the rest:

Rhythms ♪♪♪♪ (Chesky, 1995)
Echoes of Brazil ♪♪♪♪ (Chesky, 1997)

influences:

◀◀ Duo Assad, Heitor Villa-Lobos, Jeff Scott Young

Kerry Dexter

Aswad

Reggae

Formed 1974, in London, England. Based in England.

Variable membership over two-plus decades; current lineup includes: Brinsley "Dan" Forde, rhythm guitar, vocals; Angus "Drummie Zed" Gaye, drums, vocals; Tony "Gad" Robinson, bass. (All members are from England.)

Infectious melodies and heartfelt vocal harmonies have made Aswad one of the most successful reggae bands in England. And though firmly rooted in reggae, Aswad has incorporated dancehall, funk, hip-hop, and club influences. Once dubbed "the young Wailers" by no less than Bunny Wailer of Bob Marley's real thing, Aswad's sound has continued to grow closer to Motown-like pop. The band first came together in the Ladbroke Grove section of London as a quintet. Named after the Arabic word for "black," they created a dance-inspiring blend of jazz, soul, and jazz-fusion layered over a straight-ahead reggae beat. Aswad's early singles became fixtures of London dance clubs, and as an even surer stamp of approval, the group was invited to accompany visiting Jamaican performers Bob Marley and Black Uhuru. Aswad's debut single, "Back to Africa," was released in 1976 and reached the top slot on the British reggae charts. The band then achieved international acclaim in 1988,

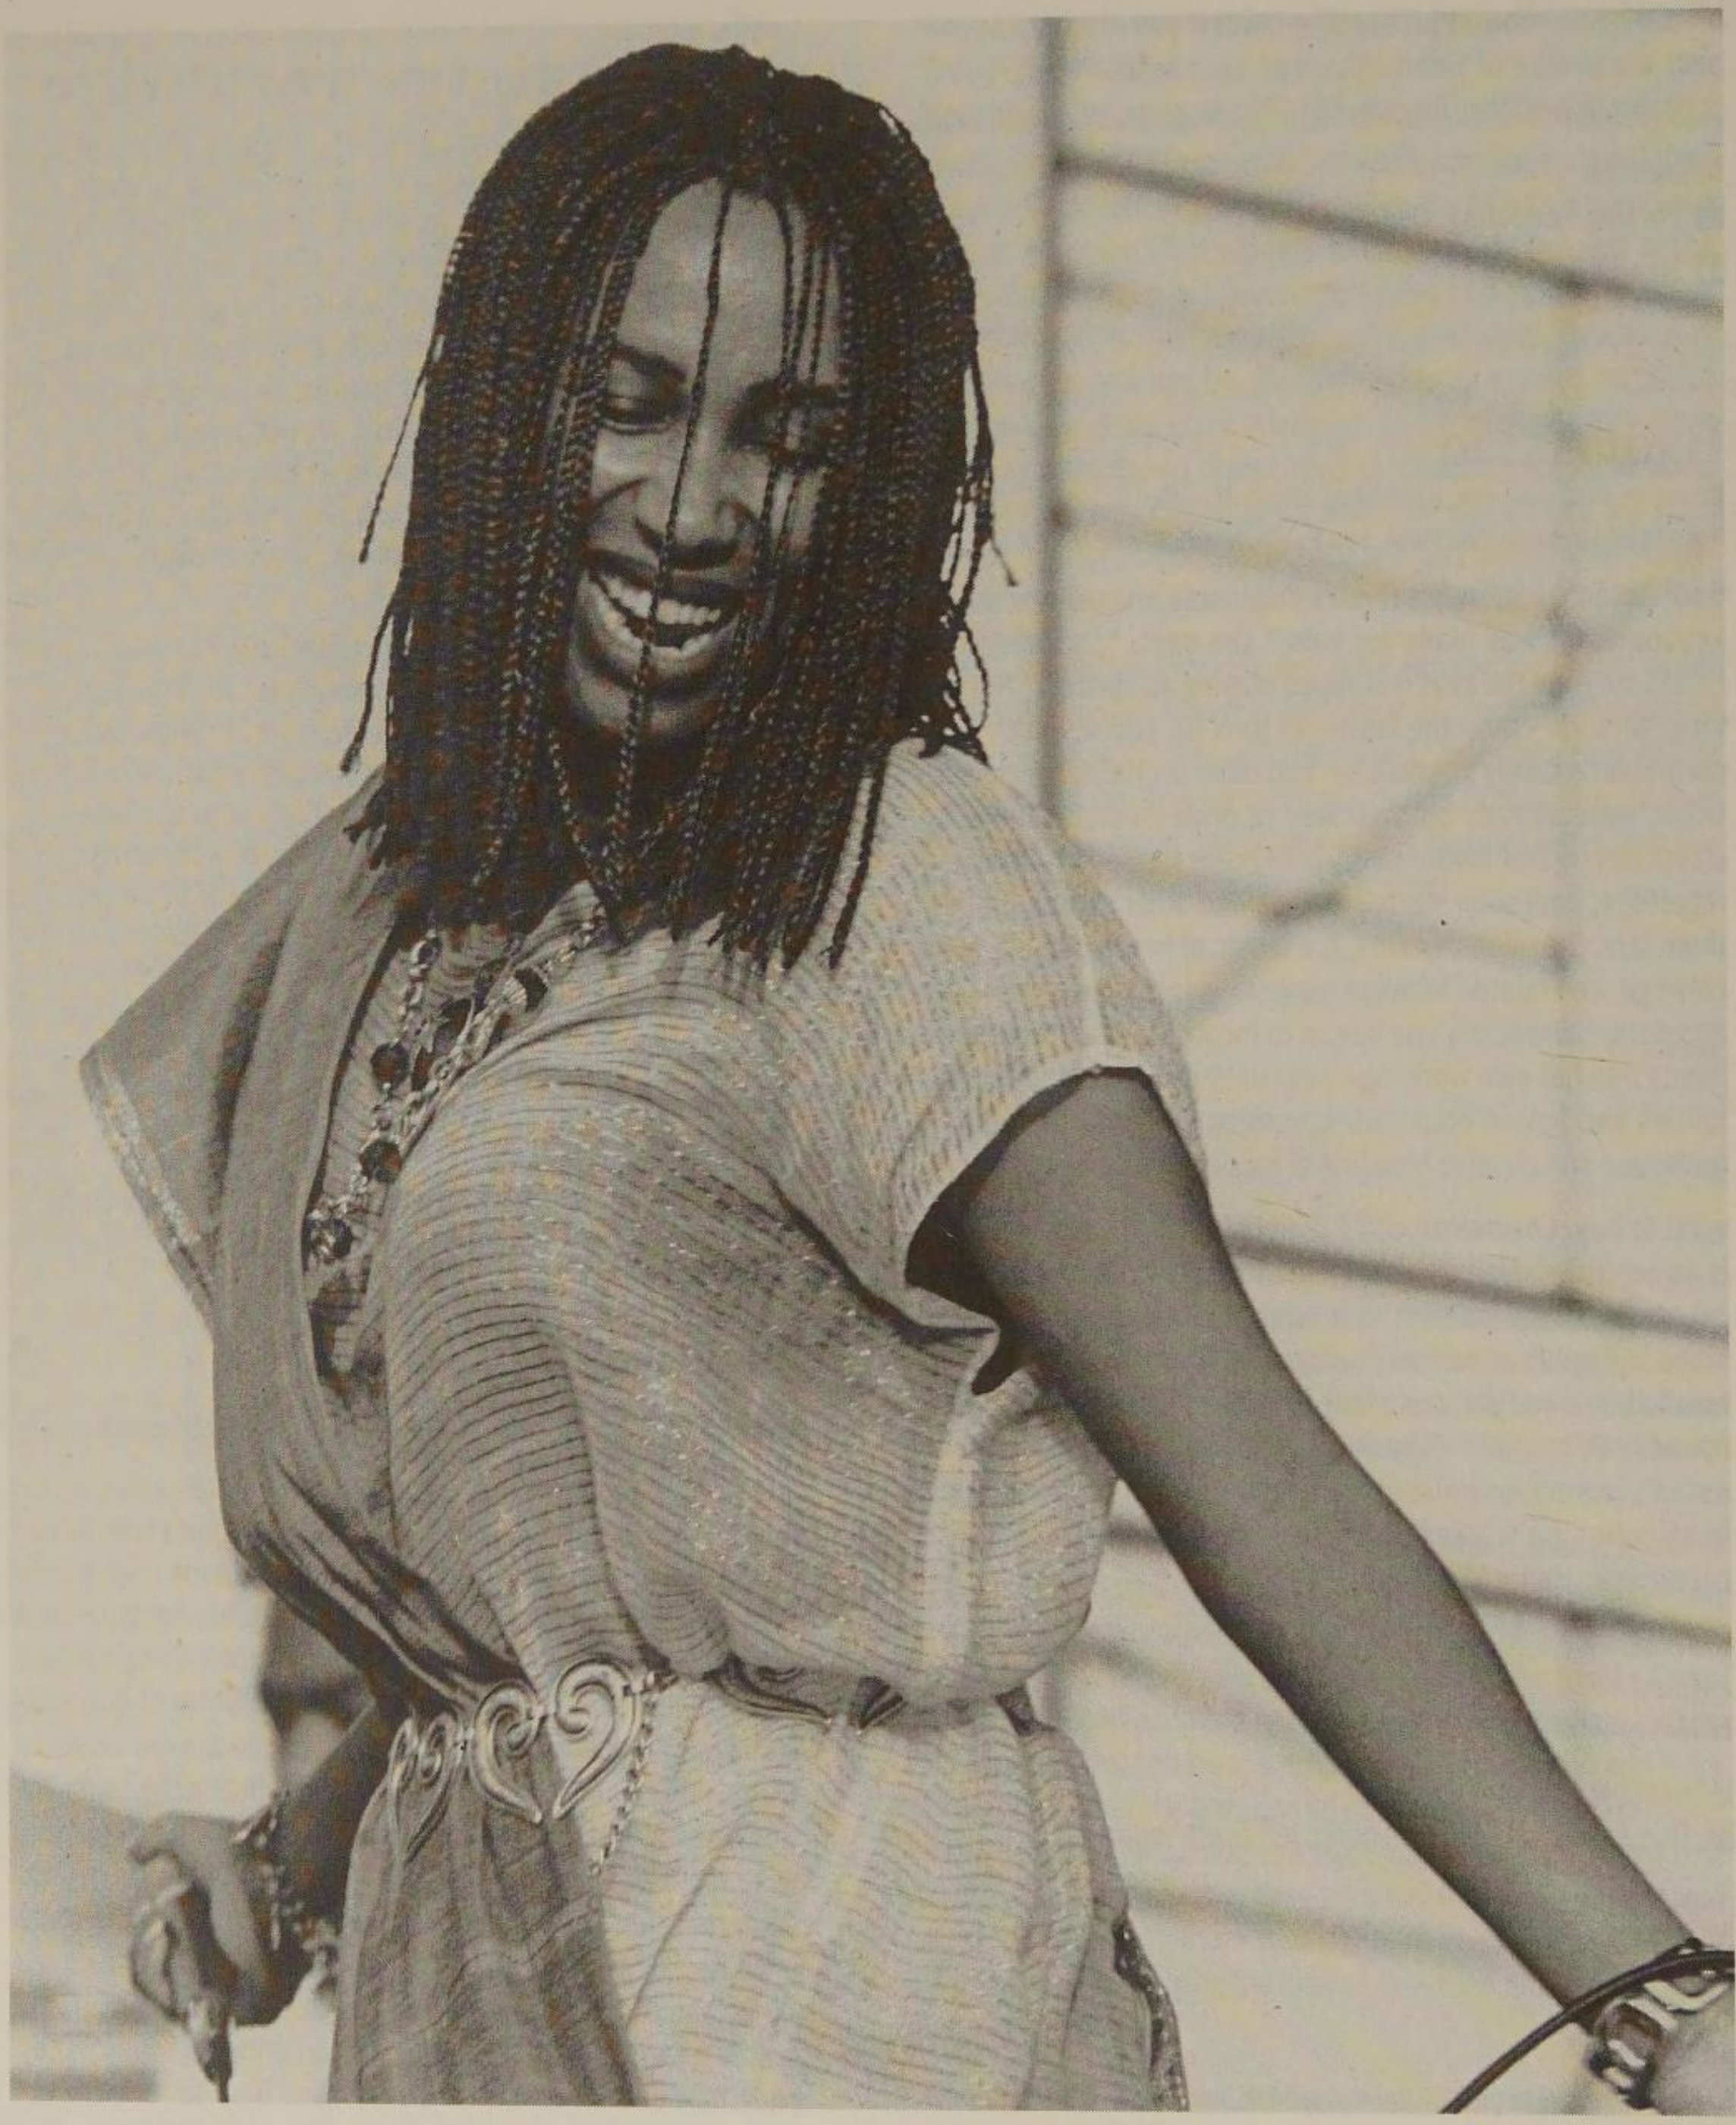
flutes worldwide

Krishna, Pan, and the Pied Piper all played flutes, and some variation of the instrument appears in almost every culture. A flute's range depends on its length, from pip-squeaks like Ireland's tin whistle to giants like the six-foot-long, sacred bamboo Sepik flute of Papua New Guinea. The timbre is determined by material and shape, be it wood, bamboo, metal, clay, plastic, stone, or bone; tubular or globular. Flutes may be side-blown (transverse) or end-blown; blown in pairs (double flute) or a series (panpipes).

Just as the instrument varies greatly, the performers' styles are even more diverse. The embouchure, or placement of the lips, tongue, and teeth on or near the mouthpiece, is crucial; whether gently piping or overblowing, the musician defines the sound. Flutes are constantly surprising—whether in mesmeric Indian songs, China's wistful melodies, lively Andean panpipe tunes, the overblowing of American free jazz, the simplicity of fife and drum, or the birdsong of Vivaldi's concertos, the flute is an extraordinarily versatile instrument capable of exquisite expression.

David Poole

4/6 aswad



Aster Aweke

with their reggae interpretation of the Luther Ingram and Tina Turner tune "Don't Turn Around." Rise and Shine, released in 1994, earned Aswad their first Grammy nomination; the album spent four weeks at #1 on the CMJ college music charts. The band has experienced a number of personnel changes through the years, but clearly has a lot of life left in it.

what to buy: In addition to sampling tracks from Aswad's earlier albums, Roots Rocking: The Island Anthology ♪♪♪♪½ (PGD/PolyGram, 1997, prod. Aswad) includes five tunes—"Tuff We Tuff," "Not Satisfied," "Roots Rocking," "Drum and Bass Line," and "African Children"—recorded live and otherwise unavailable.

what to buy next: With the release of New Chapter of Dub ♪♪♪♪ (CBS, 1982, prod. Michael "Reuben" Campbell), Aswad successfully returned to their original sound, with dub versions of songs from their commercially disappointing album New Chapter.

the rest:
Aswad ♪♪♪½ (Island, 1976)
Hulet ♪♪♪ (Grove Music, 1979)
New Chapter ♪♪♪½ (CBS, 1981)
Showcase ♪♪♪ (Island, 1981)
Not Satisfied ♪♪♪ (CBS, 1982)
Live and Direct ♪♪♪½ (Island, 1983)
Rebel Souls ♪♪♪ (Island, 1984)
To the Top ♪♪♪ (Simba, 1986)
Distant Thunder ♪♪♪ (Island, 1988)
Renaissance: 20 Crucial Tracks ♪♪♪½ (Stylus, 1988)
Too Wicked ♪♪♪ (Island, 1990)
Rise and Shine ♪♪♪½ (Mesa, 1994)
Dub: The New Frontier ♪♪♪½ (Mesa, 1995)
Rise and Shine Again ♪♪♪½ (Mesa, 1995)
Big Up ♪♪♪ (WEA/Atlantic, 1997)

worth searching for: The film soundtrack The X-Files: Fight the Future (OST, 1998) includes Sting and Aswad's rendition of the Police tune "Invisible Sun."

influences:
⏮ Bob Marley & the Wailers, Toots & the Maytals, the Skatalites ⏭ Third World, the Specials, Elvis Costello

see also: Burning Spear,Maxi Priest

Craig Harris

Natacha Atlas

See: Transglobal Underground

Julian Avalos & Afro-Andes

Andean folk, modern Afro-Peruvian

Formed 1993, in New York, NY, USA. Based in New York, NY, USA.

Julian Avalos (born in Laredo, Peru), guitar, vocals, leader; Arch Thompson (USA), flute, sax, rap; Cesar Ferreyra (Peru), congas, bongo, campana, vocals; Pedro Alalos (Peru), timbales, castañuelas, vocals; Juan Aguilar (Peru), bass.

Julian Avalos grew up in Laredo, a coastal town in northern Peru surrounded by sugar plantations. He remembers singing and dancing for enjoyment when he was a boy, "but I had no thoughts of seriously studying music, or doing it for a living. It was mostly to entertain my parents." For Avalos the real passion was soccer, and although his parents wanted him to stay in school and go to university, he eventually became a professional soccer player. "When I was on the juvenile teams it was a very Spartan life," Avalos said. "No smoking, no drinking, lots of hard work, like being in the military; but when we would get out to play games, it was different. The other guys on the team, the macho men, pushed me to drink, but I saw that my body would not work with alcohol." Avalos dropped out of the drinking competitions and went back to his guitar, forming a duo with a friend. "We played for fun, to get girls and help pay the rent. When I realized I wouldn't get too far with soccer, I got serious about the guitar." Cafe Con Leche, the first group Avalos formed, caused a sensation by combining the traditional music of his youth with Cuban and other Latin American strains. "I'm mixed; I have Indian, Spanish and African blood, and grew up with music from Colombia, Ecuador, Bolivia and other Spanish-speaking countries, so all these influences go into the music." Avalos eventually moved to New York, where he leads his new band, Afro-Andes. "I call the band Afro-Andes because the Andes are like the spine of the continent of South America, and although most of [our] music is original, it includes styles from the city, traditional music from the countryside, some Afro-Peruvian rhythms, some salsa from New York. Some of the music is not commercial, but my aim is to present a good mixture of songs from all of the cultures of Latin America."

worth searching for: The self-produced The Sound of Afro-Andes ♪♪♪½ (JA, 1995, prod. Julian Avalos) may be hard to find, but it offers a unique Peruvian brand of salsa, including an Afro-Andean take on the merengue.

influences:
⏮ Los Incas, Inti-Illimani

j. poet

Aster Aweke

Ethiopian soul

Born 1961, in Gondar, Ethiopia. Based in Washington, DC, USA.

Aweke is an Ethiopian "soul singer" akin to Mahmoud Ahmed. She grew up listening to both traditional music and Western pop, and loved Aretha and James Brown. She began singing as a child, and was performing by 1977. Following a couple of successful cassettes she joined the Roha Band, but left the country soon after due to political unrest upon the demise of Haile Selassie. She first moved to San Francisco but relocated to D.C., where there was a large Ethiopian expatriate community that supported her forward-looking music, which was a blend of funk, Ethiopian soul, and R&B. When one of her demo tapes found its way to Iain Scott and Bunt Stafford Clarke—owners of Triple Earth Records and producers of Indian-music synthesist Najma's first crossover album—they flew to the states to catch her show and subsequently signed her up. Columbia released two of her Triple Earth recordings—Aster and Kabu —with a barrage of hype, but they were unable to work the albums successfully and dropped her. Triple Earth hopes to get her back into the studio for a new album soon.

what to buy: On Aster ♪♪♪½ (Columbia, 1990, prod. Iain Scott, Bunt Stafford Clarke) Aweke sings against the beat, which gives her music a startling edge on first listen. After you get accustomed to it, you notice Aweke's rugged vocals and know why she's been compared to Aretha and Billy Holiday. She leaps over the language barrier and jabs you in the heart with the ferocity of her emotional attack, while the band's Ethiopian groove puts a new twist on familiar soul-music stylings. The two folk tunes Aweke sings only with kra (Ethiopian harp) accompaniment are show stoppers. On Live in London ♪♪♪½ (Triple Earth, 1996, prod. David White) Aweke and her band cut loose with extended versions of tunes selected from her first two albums.

the rest:
Kabu ♪♪♪ (Columbia, 1991)

influences:
Mahmoud Ahmed, Najma

see also: Mahmoud Ahmed

j. poet

Abed Azrié

Classical Arabic music

Born 1945, in Aleppo, Syria. Based in Paris, France.

Azrié grew up listening to Arabic folk music, as well as the Western and Latin pop he heard on the radio. His hometown of Aleppo is an ancient crossroads, and Azrié was also exposed to Greek, Turkish, Iranian, Egyptian, Kurdish, and Armenian music. As a teenager he commuted between Aleppo and Beirut in Lebanon, listening to Italian, French, Spanish, and American songs while studying Arabic literature at the Lebanese University. He moved to Paris to study European classical music in 1967. Dismayed by the population's ignorance of Arabic culture despite the city's large Arabic community, he began translating Arabic poetry—including the Sumerian "Epic of Gilgamesh" (probably the oldest complete poem known to humanity)—into French in an effort to "take the jewels of Arabic culture and put them into everybody's hands." He has lived and worked in Paris ever since, producing an impressive amount of poetry, music, and literature.

what to buy: The lyrics on Aromates ♪♪♪♪♪ (Nonesuch, 1990, prod. Abed Azrié) are taken from poems by noted Syrian, Lebanese, and Palestinian poets, and the subtle, almost ambient settings were composed by Azrié, who sings them in his own hypnotic style. He barely lifts his voice above a whisper, but still his vocals have an undeniable authority. The accompaniment is bare-bones—only qanun (zither), nay (flute), percussion, and subtle synthesizer washes—but the effect is powerful.

what to buy next: During the Arabic occupation of Spain, music and art flourished. A new Euro-Arabic fusion developed, perhaps the first "worldbeat" style to have wide influence. This Arabo-Andalusian form is at the root of flamenco, Cuban rumba, and much of the classical music of Morocco, and it's explored on Suerte ♪♪♪♪♪ (Harmonia Mundi France, 1994, prod. Abed Azrié). Once again Azrié borrows his lyrics from the poets, this time the 11th century bards who worked in the muwashshahat tradition, a multi-rhyming, multi-metric style that's similar to the troubadour songs that arose at about the same time. Azrié's music combines Arabic, Spanish, and Arabo-Andalusian rhythms to navigate the common ground these cultures continue to share. His vocals are complemented here by the work of Pedro Avedo, a flamenco singer whose florid, passionate style is the polar opposite of Azrié's quiet murmur.

the rest:
New Song of Arabic Poets ♪♪♪♪ (Chant de Monde, France, 1970)
Wajd ♪♪♪½ (Chant de Monde, France, 1973)
The Sufis ♪♪♪½ (CDA France, 1983)
Epic of Gilgamesh ♪♪♪ (Auvidis, 1994)
Suerte Live ♪♪♪♪½ (L'Empreinte Digitale, 1998)

influences:
Umm Kulthum, Mohamed Abdel Wahab

j. poet

B

Susana Baca

Afro-Peruvian, traditional and popular

Born in Chorrillos, Peru. Based in Lima, Peru.

Susana Baca grew up in a black, working-class neighborhood of Chorrillos, on Peru's northwestern coast. She says she was surrounded by music as long as she can remember, but it wasn't until 1980 that she began her professional career as a world-music diva and folklorist. Centuries before, Spanish conquerors had brought West African slaves to Peru, but avoided importing large numbers of any one ethnic group, knowing a common language could foster resistance to slavery as it did in Cuba. The slaves of Peru were slowly integrated into their new country, but the rhythms of Africa still dominated their music. Black Peruvians combined elements from Spain, Africa, and the indigenous Andean cultures to produce the unique Afro-Peruvian sound. They also invented several percussion instruments, including the licajón, a wooden box held between the legs and played with the hands, and the liquijada de burro, a burro's jawbone with loosened teeth that sounds like the Cuban güiro.

Susana Baca

"There was always discrimination against Negroes," Baca says. "Being black meant being a slave, being lazy or having 'rhythm in your blood.' As economic conditions improved, people didn't want to be considered black, and many Afro-Peruvians didn't want to talk about the old slave songs. For this reason, a lot of the music was lost." In the '60s the Black Consciousness movement reached Peru and Afro-Peruvian artists began to revive their roots music. The band Peru Negro created an Afro-Peruvian dance craze in the mid-'70s that still resonates in Lima's nightclubs. "Peruvian radio is dominated by foreign music," Baca said. "Growing up, I was surrounded by black music, but I never heard it on the radio, and I could find no mention of Afro-Peruvians in history books. When I started singing, I wanted to know more about my own culture and began searching for my roots, speaking to older people in my city and documenting what I heard."

As Baca got deeper into the songs and stories the elders gave her, she began documenting the history of Afro-Peru. After seven years of research, she produced the groundbreaking book-and-CD historical document Del Fuego y Del Agua, the success of which led to the creation of Negro Continuo, a foundation Baca started to preserve this heritage. The word spread farther when ex–Talking Head and world-music label founder David Byrne happened to see a homemade video of Baca singing in her garden. Byrne traveled to Peru, met Baca, and put together The Soul of Black Perù, a compilation of Afro-Peruvian music that introduced the genre to the world. To help promote the album, Baca came to the States for a couple of concerts, followed by her U.S. label debut. "These albums are an ongoing work," Baca explains. "So we chose the rhythms and tempos that haven't been explored commercially yet. I look for traditional songs; also songs that will capture the interest of the youth, so this tradition will not die out."

what's available: "People were entranced by her performance," David Byrne has remarked of Baca's first Stateside tour. "She is elegant and the music was basic, yet very moving. When we decided to do an album with her, that was the approach we agreed on." The result was Susana Baca ♪♪♪♪♪ (Luaka Bop, 1997, prod. Greg Landau), a very roots-based outing marked by driving percussion and Baca's sophisticated vocals. The material includes traditional Afro-Peruvian songs and newer compositions that draw on Latin American poetry for their lyrics. There are elements of Brazilian music and Cuban son mixed with rhythms like the traditional Afro-Peruvian lando and the Peruvian vals (waltz).

worth searching for: Del Fuego y Del Agua ♪♪♪♪♪ (Tonga, 1997) is the limited U.S. edition of the limited Peruvian edition, a beautifully designed box that includes a 150-page book of historical and folkloric articles about Afro-Peruvian music and history, and a 16-track CD containing examples of Afro-Peruvian music that range from simple acoustic treatments to current synthesizer-driven dance-club hits. Vestida de Vida ♪♪♪♪ (Kardum France, 1997), released in Peru in 1991, showcases Baca's interpretations of black music in the Americas and includes selections from Puerto Rico, Cuba, Brazil, and the United States (Gershwin's "Summertime"). Baca's "Maria Lando" is one of the highlights of the various-artists collection The Soul of Black Peru ♪♪♪♪♪ (Luaka Bop, 1995), which is also reviewed in this book's Compilations section.

influences:
⏮ Peru Negro, Nicómedes Santa Cruz

j. poet

Bad Brains /Soul Brains

Hybrid punk

Formed 1979, in Washington, DC, USA. Based in USA.

H.R. (born Paul D. Hudson, a.k.a. Joseph I), vocals (1979–83, 1986–87, 1988–89, 1994–95, 1999–present); Dr. Know (born Gary Wayne Miller), guitar (1979–95, 1999–present); Darryl Aaron Jenifer, bass (1979–95, 1999–present); Earl Hudson, drums (1979–83, 1986–87, 1989, 1994–95, 1999–present); Israel Joseph-I (born Dexter Pinto, in Trinidad), vocals (1992–94); Mackie Jayson, drums (1983–86, 1988–89, 1992–93). (All members are from USA unless noted otherwise.)

Bad Brains are the most influential band in hardcore, often overlooked due to an all-black lineup that's out of synch with punk stereotype. But the band's pioneering mix of that genre with reggae also makes it an unusual giant of world music, and a founder of the barrier-breaking aesthetic that has overtaken all late-century art forms. The Brains' explosive sound has the creative tension of cultures actually facing each other for the first time—call it Hard World. The band's sensibility stems from an upbringing in the ghettos around the capital of the free world; it embodies the past shame and future promise of American multiculturalism—bassist Darryl Jenifer even traces his lineage to a slave-owning signer of the Constitution. Reversing rock's usual trend, Bad Brains were not amateurs who gradually built up their sound, but fusion-jazz types who learned the value of simplicity from the late-'70s punk revolution. When they discovered the beliefs and music of Rastafarianism, the Brains set their cultural blender on high and threw away the knob. The creative energies involved make for a volatile brew, and since 1983 the band has literally made albums between breakups, with vocalist H.R. and his brother Earl Hudson departing regularly to pursue more straightforward reggae recordings. Narrowly marketed to the punk audience, portrayed more as historical figures than contemporary players, and eclipsed by violent incidents involving an unbalanced H.R., the Brains were cast into limbo after their most recent album in 1995. But the regular unearthing of vital archival sessions—and an early-1999 reunion tour with the band "positively" rechristened the Soul Brains—keep the future open and the legend alive.

what to buy: The debut, Bad Brains ♪♪♪♪♪ (ROIR, 1982/1996, prod. Jay Dublee), is not only the quintessential hardcore album, but the standard by which all nonconformist music can be measured. With oddly melodic power chords and vocal wails, polyphonic noise guitar, unpredictable acrobatics of rhythm and tempo, and precociously expert reggae, the Brains transcended a genre even as they defined it. On I Against I ♪♪♪♪½ (SST, 1986, prod. Ron St. Germain), the band grounds metal-leaning rock with the syncopation of funk, takes pop to blistering extremes, and keeps its playing tight while ambitiously stretching out its song structure. H.R. turns in his best lyrics and inflects his singing with a rich soul texture (after a drug bust, the vocals for "Sacred Love" were resourcefully recorded by phone from prison). The stunning Quickness ♪♪♪♪½ (Caroline, 1989, prod. Ron St. Germain) shifts genres within individual songs. The prodigal H.R. returned to create the lyrics and vocal melodies in one night; some remnants of his a cappella demos contrast the otherwise fat production sound with a fabulous rawness. His sometimes macho lyrics, and a few repeated musical ideas from I Against I, are the only things that qualify the album's success. Released after 17 years as Black Dots ♪♪♪♪½ (Caroline, 1996, prod. Bad Brains), the Brains' first-ever, live-in-the-studio recording session instantly took its place among the definitive documents of rock essence.

what to buy next: God of Love ♪♪♪♪ (Maverick, 1995, prod. Ric Ocasek) slows the pace of experimentation a bit and may seem to lack the other albums' visionary sweep. But it marks the band's most decisive same-song synthesis of hard rock and reggae yet, and features the must-have ambient reggae odyssey "How I Love Thee" and the metal-gospel/country & western prayer call (believe it!) of "Thank JAH." The Brains' first multi-track recording session, laid down in 1980 but released much later as the EP Omega Sessions ♪♪♪½ (Victory, 1997), is an intriguing artifact of a studio polish the band would sand off before its debut album. Live ♪♪♪♪ (SST, 1988, prod. Phil Burnett) is a sterling example of the Brains on stage.

what to avoid: Even a bad album for the Brains would be a good one for many other bands. But Rock for Light ♪♪♪ (PVC, 1983/Caroline, 1991, prod. Ric Ocasek) is packed with inferior versions of songs from the (then-rare) first album.

the rest:

Bad Brains ♪♪♪ (Alternative Tentacles EP, 1982)
I and I Survive/Destroy Babylon ♪♪ (Important EP, 1982)
Attitude: The ROIR Session ♪♪ (ROIR/Important, 1989)
The Youth Are Getting Restless: Live in Amsterdam ♪♪♪♪ (Caroline, 1990)
Spirit Electricity ♪♪♪♪ (SST EP, 1991)
Rise ♪♪♪ (Epic, 1993)

worth searching for: The soundtrack for Pump Up the Volume ♪♪♪ (MCA, 1990, prod. various) features the then-headless band's cover of the MC5's "Kick Out the Jams" with Henry Rollins on vocals.

solo outings:

H.R.: Anthology ♪♪♪ (SST, 1998)

influences:

- Bob Marley, Parliament-Funkadelic, the Sex Pistols, the Clash, the Damned, the Ramones, Mahavishnu Orchestra, Return to Forever
- Living Colour, Beastie Boys, Consolidated, Bad Religion, Cornershop, Goldfinger, Sting, Babe the Blue Ox, Spearhead, Skunk Anansie, the Urge

Adam McGovern

Badawi /Sub Dub

Experimental dub/Middle Eastern fusion

Born Reuel Mesinai, 1973, in Jerusalem, Israel. Based in New York, NY, USA.

Although he was born and primarily raised in Israel, "Raz" Mesinai's family moved back and forth to New York City on a regular basis before settling there in 1988, which explains quite a bit about the multicultural style he'd later be known for. As a child, Mesinai sought out the sounds of hip-hop and dub reggae, and his first record purchase, reggae great Burning Spear's Garvey's Ghost, would prove to be a lasting influence.

aly bain

Interestingly, though, what convinced Mesinai to become a musician himself wasn't an album at all, but the soundtrack to the film The Emerald Forest—music that's not too incompatible with the pop-culture cut-and-paste aesthetic of the other styles he admired, or with the cinematic sound-textures he would one day achieve. By the time he reached his teens, having started to seriously embrace his Jewish heritage, traditional Hasidic music provided yet another formidable influence. Teaching himself to play exotic percussion instruments like the Persian zarb, various frame drums, and the Turkish darabuka, Mesinai began fusing elements of real-time performance (he had also studied piano) with his growing affection for dub. After an impressive debut under his solo pseudonym Badawi, he teamed up with bassist John "JDubs" Ward to form the experimental ensemble Sub Dub, which lasted for two critically acclaimed albums. Surprisingly, Badawi's latest efforts seem to be moving away from dub towards a more mature, fully realized Middle Eastern/Moroccan fusion that incorporates strings, piano, santur (Persian/Indian hammered dulcimer), kalimba (African thumb piano), and live percussion, and uses almost no samples. A compelling artist to watch for in coming years.

what to buy: The Heretic of Ether ♪♪♪♪♪ (Asphodel, 1999, prod. Raz Mesinai) is an ethno-ambient masterpiece—a conceptual work of sorts, serving as the imagery-filled soundtrack to a story unfolded in three lushly rendered "chapters." Dub plays only a minor role here, as Badawi fully pursues his interest in Arabic music for the first time, proving himself remarkably adept for a self-taught percussionist. Credit must also be given to cellist Erich Schoen-Rene and violinist Ralph Farris, whose luscious string textures lend the proceedings a romantic air of melancholy as Badawi's intricate rhythms drive the music toward a climactic ending that simply begs for an accompanying film. All the powerful emotional dynamics of an epic like The English Patient, and not a single word uttered throughout!

what to buy next: For a glimpse of Badawi's more "traditional" dub side, it simply doesn't get any better than Sub Dub's Dancehall Malfunction ♪♪♪♪ (Asphodel, 1997, prod. Sub Dub), an extremely eclectic outing that takes the form to its outer limits of aural experimentation. You can hear echoes of dub deities King Tubby and Mad Professor's whacked-out influence reverberating through these 11 instrumental tracks, with John Ward's basslines holding down the fort as Badawi adds layer upon layer of live percussion and samples, until the whole thing is a heady sonic brew best imbibed with headphones on and lights off.

the rest:

Badawi:

Badawi Presents Bedouin Sound Clash ♪♪♪♪ (ROIR, 1996)

Sub Dub:

Sub Dub ♪♪♪♪ (Instinct, 1996)

influences:

Burning Spear, King Tubby, Lee Perry, Hossan Tehrani, Hossam Ramzy

see also: Burning Spear, King Tubby, Mad Professor

Bret Love

Aly Bain

See: The Boys of the Lough

Baka Beyond

Worldbeat

Formed 1992, in the Baka Forest, Cameroon. Based in London, England.

Martin Cradick (U.K.), guitar, mandolin, sampling; Paddy Le Mercier (France), violin, flute; Su Hart (U.K.), vocals; Baka Forest people (Cameroon), drums, vocals, waterdrums; Tom Green (U.K.), keyboards, programming (1995); Sagar N'Gom (Senegal), African hand drums (1995); Mark Pinto (U.K.), bass (1995–present); Alassana N'Gom (Senegal), vocals (1998); Nii Tettey Tetteh (Ghana), percussion (1998); Addoteh Richter (Ghana), percussion (1998); Annor Asanioah (Ghana), percussion (1998).

The story behind the Baka Beyond recordings, a collaboration between the Baka pygmies of Cameroon and British folk musician Martin Cradick, is tailor-made for the big screen, an epic adventure that spans continents and cultures. In his years of traveling, busking, and playing concerts, itinerant folk musician Cradick had picked up bits of reggae, Celtic, rock, flamenco, Caribbean, South American, Arabic, and West African influence, and played with musicians from all over the world, mixing and matching traditions as the spirit moved him. In 1988 he met didgeridoo player Graham Wiggins, who had an equally eclectic approach. Wiggins had played jazz, Cuban jazz, and modern dance music in addition to the didgeridoo, which he taught himself by listening to recordings of Aboriginal players. The duo began playing as Outback in 1989, later recruiting Senegalese percussionist Sagar N'Gom and trap drummer Ian Campbell. Cradick first heard the music of the Baka pygmies on a BBC television documentary and was so captivated by what he heard that he named the first Outback album Baka in their honor. He began dreaming of the pygmies, and within three years, after a strange series of coincidences, Cradick and his wife Su Hart found themselves in the jungles of Cameroon living with the Baka. Cradick has said that the Baka don't believe in coincidence, and greeted him and his wife as if they'd been expecting them. Cradick brought along a tent, drawing and recording gear, a camera, and a guitar and mandolin, but other than that he and Hart lived as the Baka lived, hunting, gathering, and playing music with their new friends. Cradick has recorded two collaborative CDs with the Baka, Spirit of the Forest and The Meeting Pool. All royalties due the Baka go into a fund to help preserve their forest and way of life, currently under attack from logging and farming interests.

what to buy: On Spirit of the Forest ♪♪♪½ (Hannibal, 1993, prod. Martin Cradick), Cradick's tinkling mandolin, the chirping of forest insects, and the jaunty Baka rhythms flow together as naturally as the water in a jungle stream. The Meeting Pool ♪♪♪½ (Hannibal, 1995) has more Celtic music, but half the tracks are still based on Baka singing and drumming to continue this pioneering Afro Celtic exploration. For Journey Between ♪♪♪½ (Hannibal, 1998), Cradick and company team up with members of Ghana's Kakatsitsi instead, resulting in another solid Afro Celtic fusion with charming vocals by Su Hart and compelling percussion by the drummers of Kakatsitsi.

solo outings:
Outback:
Baka ♪♪♪½ (Hannibal, 1990)
Dance the Devil Away ♪♪♪½ (Hannibal, 1992)

influences:
⏮ Outback, Battlefield Band
⏭ Afro Celt Sound System

see also: Dr. Didg

j. poet

The Balfa Brothers /Freres Balfa

Cajun

Formed 1946, in Basile, LA, USA. Disbanded 1978.

Will Balfa (died 1978), fiddle, vocals; Rodney Balfa (died 1978), guitar, vocals; Dewey Balfa, fiddle, guitar, harmonica, vocals; Harry Balfa, guitar; Burkeman Balfa, percussion; Nelda Balfa, vocals; Hadley Fontenot, accordion; Marc Savoy, accordion, fiddle; Nathan Abshire, accordion. (All members are from USA.)

The Balfa Brothers' style was based around the lonesome twin fiddles of Will and Dewey Balfa and the rock-solid guitar of Rodney Balfa. The two fiddles were not the sweet sound of the western swing that moved east into Louisiana after World War II, but a hearkening back to the rawer sound of the Cajun house-dance, prior to the introduction of the accordion. At those dances, one fiddle played lead while the other had to provide the dancing rhythm on the low strings. Taking that as their starting point, the Balfas did add a sophistication from their exposure to swing and country music, and created a new/old sound. Though the fiddle dominated, they worked with the finest of Cajun accordionists, including Hadley Fontenot, Nathan Abshire, and Marc Savoy. Dewey's singing was always passionate, but Rodney's tenor seemed to hit the hardest. To go with it, their song choices were always superb, drawn from deep within the Cajun tradition—often their own family's. The thoughtful arrangements respected the occasional extra bar or beat that is the hallmark of music passed down from generation to generation.

The band had begun performing in 1946 with just Will and Dewey's two fiddles and a friend on guitar. Dewey also recorded with Elsie Deshotel in the early 1950s for the Koury label, while the band continued to play locally. It was Dewey's experience as a last-minute substitute, playing guitar accompaniment with Gladius Thibodeaux and Louis Lejeune, at the 1964 Newport Folk Festival that changed the course of the Balfa Brothers' career. His wildly well-received performance led to Dewey's triumphant return three years later with a band that included brothers Rodney and Will, daughter Nelda, and Hadley Fontenot. Dewey had come away from the earlier festival with a sense of the value of traditional Cajun music and the uniqueness of the Balfas' rich family tradition. This new awareness would guide him through a sterling career in the genre, both within and out of the band. In the latter category, he had a long performing and recording run with master accordionist Abshire, accompanying him on records from the 1950s onward. Meanwhile, the Balfas participated in folk festivals throughout the U.S., Canada, and France, while continuing to live fairly nondescript lives in Louisiana. Both the concerts and the quiet life came to a tragic end in 1978 when Will and Rodney were killed in a car accident outside of Bunkie, Louisiana. Dewey continued to perform, with the help of friends like Tracy Schwarz and Robert Jardell and a new generation of musicians that included his own daughter Christine, who later rededicated the family legacy with her aptly named ensemble Balfa Toujours—Balfa forever.

what to buy: The Balfa Brothers Play Traditional Cajun Music, Vols. 1 & 2 ♪♪♪♪♪ (Swallow, 1987, prod. Floyd Soileau) is the Rubber Soul of Cajun music. The Balfas put away the drums and bass and play in an all-acoustic setting, long before the "unplugged" vogue. What you get is superbly soulful fiddle and voice, song after song. Many of these tracks are standards that have since been covered by groups like the Savoy-Doucet Cajun Band, Steve Riley & the Mamou Playboys, and Balfa Toujours.

what to buy next: On J'ai Vu le Loup, le Renard et la Belette ♪♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1988, prod. Gerard Dole), producer Dole has the Balfas play a mix of traditional waltzes and two-steps along with some "house-dance" music like a Cajun version of "Casey Jones" and an old contra dance, "La Vieille Danse a Balfa." The charming title track shows the place where Cajun and French folk music meet.

the rest:
New York Concerts ♪♪♪♪ (Swallow, 1980)
Les Haricots Sont Pas Salés: Legendary Masters of Cajun and Creole Music ♪♪♪♪♪ (Cinq Planetes, 1998)

worth searching for: Louisiana Cajun French Music from the Southwest Prairies: Vol. 1, 1964–1967 ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1976, prod. Ralph Rinzler) features the earliest recordings of the Balfa Brothers.

influences:
◀◀ Lawrence Walker, Dennis McGee, Leo Soileau

▶▶ Steve Riley, Balfa Toujours, Marc & Ann Savoy, Tracy Schwarz, Michael Doucet

see also: Nathan Abshire, Alphonse "Bois Sec" Ardoin, Balfa Toujours, Steve Riley & the Mamou Playboys, Rockin' Dopsie, Savoy-Doucet Cajun Band

Jared Snyder and Randy Pitts

Balfa Toujours

Cajun

Formed 1992, in Basile, LA, USA. Based in La Pointe, LA, USA.

Christine Balfa, guitar, triangle, vocals; Dirk Powell, fiddle, accordion, vocals; Kevin Wimmer, fiddle, vocals; Mike Chapman, drums; Nelda Balfa, vocals, triangle; Tony Balfa, drums, bass; Peter Schwarz, fiddle, bass, vocals. (All members are from USA.)

Christine Balfa is the guitarist, singer, songwriter, and heart of Balfa Toujours (Balfa forever). She carries on the tradition of her father Dewey, her uncles Will and Rodney, and their legendary Balfa Brothers ensemble. Christine and her older sister Nelda both write and sing; the elder Balfas' lonesome double fiddle sound is recreated by Kevin Wimmer (a protégé of Dewey) and Christine's husband Dirk Powell (who is also a brilliant accordionist). The lineup rotates, but the legacy moves directly forward.

what to buy: Sometimes you just want to get down on your knees and thank the Lord for bringing the right band together with the right producer, and La Pointe ♪♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1998, prod. Peter Schwarz) is certainly such a case. Peter Schwarz has succeeded in making a truly down-home record with Balfa Toujours—literally, as a matter of fact, on analog equipment at the Balfa home in La Pointe. Maybe it's the ancestral setting and the old-fashioned methods; maybe it's the band's recent work with other tradition-bearers like Octa Clark, Eddie LeJeune, Alphonse "Bois Sec" Ardoin, and Geno Delafose that has changed their approach. Whatever it is, this is their best so far, a balanced mix of old and new.

what to buy next: A Vieille Terre Haute ♪♪♪♪½ (Swallow, 1995, prod. Balfa Toujours) is the band's second effort and was their finest before La Pointe. The addition of Mike Chapman on drums revs up the traditional sound without detracting from it, the quality of the musicianship is uniformly high, and by this point Christine Balfa has grown into a strong and passionate singer. Her songwriting in collaboration with Powell has matured also: "Les Fleurs du Printemps" stacks up with just about any traditional Cajun song for its lyrical imagery, and the last four tracks qualify as almost a mini-tribute to the Balfa Brothers, while showing how Balfa Toujours is developing their own sound, building gracefully on that heritage. Deux Voyages ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1996, prod. Tim O'Brien) suffers from the warm sheen in which Tim O'Brien wraps the group; it takes away some of the buzz and wheeze that's integral to the naturalistic appeal of Cajun music. Still, listening to Christine do that upward glide on Canray Fontenot's "La Valse à Canray," or to her passionate reading of the Balfa standard "La Valse à Grand Père," will convince anyone of her skills as a singer. The fidelity with which she and Powell evoke the musical and lyrical essence of old-time Creole music with songs like "Le Canard à Bois Sec" demonstrates their advancing development as writers.

the rest:
Pop, Tu Me Parles Toujours ♪♪♪½ (Swallow, 1993)
(With Alphonse "Bois Sec" Ardoin) Allons Danser ♪♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1998)

worth searching for: The American Fogies, Volume 1 ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1996, prod. Ray Alden) is an anthology of regional American groups that includes a track of Balfa Toujours kicking it through "Duson Two Step."

influences:
◀◀ Dennis McGee, Marc and Ann Savoy, Lawrence Walker, the Balfa Brothers, Dewey Balfa, Tracy Schwarz, Steve Riley

▶▶ Tasso, Magnolia Sisters, Kristi Guillory

see also: Alphonse "Bois Sec" Ardoin, the Balfa Brothers, Steve Riley & the Mamou Playboys, Tracy Schwarz/Tracy Schwarz Cajun Trio

Jared Snyder

Patrick Ball

Celtic harp and storytelling

Born March 27, 1950, in San Francisco, CA, USA. Based in Sebastopol, CA, USA.

A dynamic performer, Patrick Ball combines his loves of Irish music and history to bring passionate shows to his audiences.

His unique touch on the wire-strung harp creates a bell-like tone of great beauty, neither as percussive nor as strident as many of his contemporaries on the instrument. This allows his music to sing more intimately and more freely, creating a magical and expressive sound. Combined with this technique, true genius emerges in his arrangements, which take traditional melodies and allow them to shine their brightest through the use of simple-yet-full accompaniment that never obstructs the essence of the tune. Given his musical accomplishments, it is surprising to note that he grew up expecting to follow in his father's footsteps as a lawyer, a plan that persisted through college law studies and up to his father's untimely death—after which Bell soon switched to a graduate degree in history. This led to a trip to Ireland, where he quickly fell in love with the Irish oral tradition. After another trip there he realized he wanted to combine his training with his love of Irish music into what would become his life's career. Before long, he had taught himself the harp and began weaving his magic spell with stories and songs for widespread audiences. His talents most recently culminated in the completion of a one-man play, O'Carolan's Farewell to Music, which he wrote in collaboration with Peter Glazer. Ball plays the title role—of Turlough O'Carolan, the legendary 18th-century harper who contributed a staggering oeuvre to the Irish musical canon—with intensity and insight.

what to buy: Fiona ♪♪♪♪½ (Celestial Harmonies, 1993, prod. Patrick Ball) features a delightful collection of beautifully arranged Celtic tunes. Ball displays his highly evocative and emotional use of the harp, occasionally joined by Tim Britton on uilleann pipes and tin whistles and Kevin Carr on fiddle. The arrangements have a simplicity and clarity without sounding empty or hollow. Album highlights include a bewitching "She Moved through the Fair" and the heartfelt Scottish "Fårewell to the Land of Mist." Christmas Rose ♪♪♪♪½ (Fortuna, 1990, prod. Patrick Ball) won a 1991 Indie Grammy for Best Seasonal Recording and contains sprightly arrangements of upbeat carols like "Bring a Torch, Jeanette Isabella," and haunting renditions of more somber ones like the little-known Appalachian number "Jesus, Jesus, Rest Your Head." This is an unusual holiday recording not to be missed.

what to buy next: On The Music of Turlough O'Carolan ♪♪♪♪ (Fortuna, 1983, prod. Dan Drasin), Ball manages to make solo harp remain vibrant through an entire album without any accompaniment to add variety; a rare talent indeed. It is a wonderful collection, including 15 outstanding melodies written by the famous blind harper O'Carolan. Ball's love of the composer's music radiates in his playing. Containing more O'Carolan as well as a number of other Irish tunes, Secret Isles ♪♪♪♪ (Fortuna, 1985, prod. Dan Drasin) also displays Ball's remarkable talents with elegance and liveliness. Particularly lovely on this album is a Manx set, with "Song of the Water Kelpie" and "The Sheep under the Snow" paired beautifully. With a caveat to those who prefer the musical to the spoken, Ball is a master storyteller, and he shows his talent well on the album Storyteller: Gwilan's Harp and Other Celtic Tales ♪♪♪½ (Celestial Harmonies, 1995, prod. Patrick Ball). It is the stories that take center stage here, backed by the joyous sounds of Ball's harp. The tales are hauntingly told, and the album won an Indie for Best Spoken Word Recording in 1995. Finnegans Wake ♪♪♪ (Celestial Harmonies, 1997, prod. Patrick Ball) is a more ambitious effort; here Ball reads passages from James Joyce's well-known and highly enigmatic work. The excerpts are chosen with an ear for the musicality of the words themselves and brought further alive through interwoven harp playing (though also quite intermittent, music lovers).

the rest:
From a Distant Time ♪♪♪½ (Fortuna, 1983)
O'Carolan's Dream ♪♪♪½ (Fortuna, 1989)

influences:
◀◀ Turlough O'Carolan, Derek Bell, Alan Stivell
▶▶ Carol Thompson, Wendy Stewart

Jo Hughey Morrison

Bamboleo

Timba

Formed February 1995, in Havana, Cuba. Based in Havana, Cuba.

Lázaro Moisés Valdés, keyboards; Julio Pincheiro, keyboards (1995–97); Haila Monpié, vocals (1995–98); Vannia Borges, vocals; Osvaldo Chacon, vocals (1995–97); Rafael Leberra, vocals; Alejandro Barrero, vocals; Manuel Pelayo, tenor saxophone (1995–97); Wilfredo Cardosa, tenor saxophone; Juan R. Larrinaga, alto saxophone (1995–97); Abel Fernández, alto saxophone; Pavel Diaz, trumpet (1995–97); Omar A. Peralta, trumpet (1995–97); Junior Romero, trumpet; Ulises Texidor, bongos; Luis A. Abreu, tumbas (1995–97); Andrés Gonzalo Gavilán, tumbas; Gilberto Moreaux, drums (1995–97); Ludwig Nuñez, drums; Rafael Varges, bajo; José Espinosa, timbales. (All members are from Cuba.)

Four decades of U.S.-imposed embargo have kept Cuba jailed in near-total isolation. We've seen all the footage of decaying buildings, bedraggled slum kids, ration queues . . . but that's only yang. What you can't see is the indomitable yin-force that enriches, uplifts, and chills out the Cuban soul 24-7: all the music. The rapturous drums of Santería rituals, the humble lilt 'n' sway of country son and its sophisticated cousin danzon, the sweaty rushes of mambo, cha-cha-cha, rumba, Afro-Cuban salsa—the people's spiritual flashlight cutting through a century's worth of dark times. The mango curtain has not only enshrouded that rich legacy but also obscured outside-the-Western-Hemisphere supergroups like Irakere, Los Van Van, and NG La Banda. But since '95, the trickle of Cuban youngbloods whose sounds had reached these shores has become a deluge thanks to Ry Cooder's landmark album Buena Vista Social Club. Fortuitously swept in with the tide was Bamboleo, the hottest band in Cuba. Along with other new jacks like David Calzado & La Charanga Habanera, Bamboleo rocks the street-fresh timba sound. Timba freaks old-school salsa with '70s-funk horn riffs and keyboard vamps, R&B bang, rap slang, and D.C. go-go–style extended percussion breakdowns. Whether on tape or in the dancehall, Bamboleo's timba is a rawer, looser, funkier, juicier cipher than the competition. Ironically, Bamboleo's rapid ascension to Cuban-pop superstardom is due more to Monpié and Borges's street juice than the music. Near-bald, dark-complexioned, charismatic, and confident lead divas, these sistahs rendered all the ingrained stereotypes obsolete—in Cuba that's way deeper impact than a Madonna or a Lauryn Hill. At the end of the day, Bamboleo is the first modern Cuban band with the Total Package: two rock-star icons with attitude, cool tunes/hotter albums, mackadacious band, and houserockin' show. From Havana to Lincoln Center to Montreux, Bamboleo is all-world-certified. The wheel having been reinvented in '95, the atom was split in mid-'98, with Monpié and chief songwriter/now-ex-Bamboleo manager L. Limonte leaving with half the band to form Azucar Negra; at presstime, a reconstituted Bamboleo records album numero tres.

what to buy: Mostly written by Limonte (seven out of nine songs) and absolute when sung by Monpié ("Cuentales," "Con Un Canto En El Pecho," title track), Yo Me Parezco A Nadie ♪♪♪♪♪ (Ahi-Nama Music, 1998, prod. Lázaro Moisés Valdés) is two exhilarating steps forward, one gloriously bittersweet look backward at the greatest-timba-band-you-never-saw-and-will-never-see-again.

what to buy next: The sound of a band in evolutionary transition, Bamboleo's debut Te Gusto O Te Caigo ♪♪♪♪ (Ahi-Nama Music, 1997, prod. Lázaro Moisés Valdés) is a glop of Los Van Van/NG La Banda old-school here ("Circulame"), a pinch of African soukous (rumba) there ("Bamboleo y Meleza"), a whiff of timba-to-come all over ("Bemba Colora"). Roots-positive, next-level prescient.

influences:

- Irakere, Los Van Van, NG La Banda, Earth, Wind & Fire, Kool & The Gang, Sugarhill Gang
- David Calzado & La Charenga Habanera, Issac Delgado, Manolín, El Médico De La Salsa, Azucar Negra, Aldaberto Alvarez

see also: Ry Cooder, Manolín, El Médico de la Salsa

Tom Terrell

Bana

Morna

Born in Mindelo, Sao Vicente, Cape Verde. Based in Lisbon, Portugal.

Bana is considered the finest singer of morna (the melancholy Verdean style sometimes compared to blues), a man who has influenced most of the singers to come after him. Bana began singing at an early age and left high school to travel West Africa and Europe in search of a career, but finally returned to Cape Verde and the morna. Early in his career, Bana, who is over six feet tall and quite muscular, used to physically carry B. Leza, one of the great morna composers, to his gigs. By the 1950s Bana was developing his own style of singing and became quite popular with the expatriate Verdean communities in America and West Africa. In 1965 he moved to Rotterdam, Holland, and formed A Voz de Cabo Verde with Luis Morais, Toi De Bibla, Jean Da Lomba, Morgadinho, and Frank Cavaquinho. The band caused a revolution in the sound of Verdean music that continues to reverberate today. In 1975, after Cape Verde became independent, Bana was accused of collaborating with the colonial government and fled to Lisbon where he continued his career, playing at his own restaurant and operating a music shop. In 1982 the Cape Verde government issued a formal apology, and in 1992 the Portuguese government awarded him the Medal of Grand Merit for his contribution to Portuguese culture.

what's available: Chante la Magie du Cape-Vert ♪♪♪♪♪ (Melodie France, 1993) is a beautiful and moving collection of mornas, with a couple of mid-tempo coledeiras thrown in for good measure. Bana's aching sincerity and rueful delivery make each tune drip with longing and sorrow. There is no information on the CD, but the backing band of acoustic virtuosos and the low-key production give the session a classic feeling. Ritmos de Cabo Verde ♪♪♪♪ (Movieplay) is a set of upbeat Congolese soukous tunes played in a Cape Verdean style, with vocals by a master singer in rare high spirits.

influences:

- B. Leza, Eugenio Tavares
- Cesaria Evora, Nando, Masa Abrantes

see also: Cesaria Evora, Fantcha

j. poet

Buju Banton

Ragga, roots dancehall

Born Mark Myrie, 1973, in Kingston, Jamaica. Based in Kingston, Jamaica.

Buju Banton is one of the most celebrated and controversial artists in dancehall and ragga (digital) reggae, a still-young man who has both reaped the rewards and felt the sting of a highly public growing-up. Banton is descended from a rebellious family of Maroons who escaped the British slavery system of the 17th century into the rugged vastness of the Jamaican countryside, using any means necessary to defend their freedom. He was raised in the poverty-stricken Denham Town and nicknamed "Buju," meaning "breadfruit," due to his chubby appearance as a child. He later took his stage surname from the undervalued Buro Banton, a deejay beloved in Jamaica but virtually unknown beyond the island. Buju began his career by deejaying on the Sweet Love and Rambo Mango sound systems (dance-ready mobile turntable, mic, and amplification set-ups) at age 13, and the same year released his presciently titled debut single, "The Ruler." With the passing of puberty, his voice matured into a cavernous growl, and in 1991, when he teamed with Penthouse producer Donovan Germain and the studio's forward-thinking engineer, Dave Kelly, Banton's star began its rise, though controversy courted him almost instantly. Despite infuriating many dark-complected sistren, his ode to light-skinned black women "Love Mi Browning" included a blistering digital rhythm that made it a dancehall hit. A string of fashion-defining smashes followed, including "The Bogle," which inspired a trendy dance and was titled after Paul Bogle, the black Baptist preacher who led the Morant Bay rebellion against British military law in 1865. On Kelly's own Madhouse imprint, Banton released the scorching "Big It Up" and "Batty Rider," the latter a keen, er, observation on the skin-tight, extremely skimpy shorts worn in the dancehalls by women called "donettes," which in turn fueled the eye-popping uniform's popularity. "The Only Man" was another surging and influential dancehall hit, this one propelled by Kelly's ingenious "Arabian" rhythm. By now, Banton had enough hit singles to release two full-length albums, Mr. Mention and Stamina Daddy. An early example of his ability to articulate the frustrations of ghetto life—and examine the have-and-have-not dynamics that keep the underclass under—came on "How Massa God World A Run." Banton also breathed life into his Cell Block 321 label, which released fine singles from Frisco Kid ("Video Light") and the vocal duo Brian & Tony Gold ("Searching for the Light"), not to mention Banton's own uncompromising "Rampage."

His forward momentum hit some self-inflicted turbulence, however, with the appearance of "Boom Bye Bye" on the Shang imprint, a tune which apparently encouraged the murder of "batty boys"—ragga slang for homosexuals—over Mad Cobra's white-hot "Flex" rhythm: "Boom bye bye inna batty boy head/Rude-boy haffi know say nasty man fe dead." In the ensuing storm of protest Banton was coldly unapologetic. Many Jamaicans admired his backbone during the controversy, and some journalists even described his stance as a matter of principle in a land deeply hostile to the gay lifestyle. Stateside, opinion was split between outright condemnation of an attitude then finally starting to go into decline, and tempered condemnation cognizant of past American rushes to judge Third World cultures—each position a sign of progress in some way. Years later, the file on this 19-year-old's transgression seems to have been sealed, through a combination of the standard public attention span and perhaps some realization of his youth and inexperience at the time. To acknowledge his musical vision is not necessarily to sanction his past lyrical myopia, and indeed, Banton's conversion to Rastafarianism soon after and his socially conscious songs since indicate a reformed outlook. His most recent releases, the phenomenally rootsy 'Til Shiloh and Inna Heights, have spurred a fascinating self-examination by his genre's "massive" (public), and his single "Murderer" was a devastating plea to cease the violence in the dancehall after the brutal shootings of talented performers like Dirtsman, Nitty Gritty, and Banton's own close friend Pan Head. Banton also brought back an exhilarating sonic vitality by reintroducing the organic rhythms of studio musicians to the standard digital beats that had dominated the dancehall since the mid-'80s. It's a sensory symbol of the genuineness he now seeks—when he was still a teen in the hurricane of criticism, few could have predicted that Banton would reach and know his own "inna heights" and transform himself into one of contemporary reggae's most important worldwide spiritual ambassadors.

what to buy: Despite its Grammy nomination and not because of it, Inna Heights ♪♪♪♪ (V.P., 1997, prod. Donovan Germain, Buju Banton) is one of the most thoughtful and cohesive albums to ever shake the soul of the dancehall, and includes Banton's excellent collaborations with Jah Mali ("Mother's Cry"), Beres Hammond ("My Woman Now"), the legendary Toots Hibbert ("54/46"), and deejay progenitor "The Ugly One"—selecta King Stitt ("Small Axe"). Whether backed by live rhythms or digital beats, Banton proves adept at succor-drenched singing ("Hills and Valleys," "Destiny") and rock-stone deejaying ("Redder Than Red," "Love Dem Bad"). 'Til Shiloh ♪♪♪½ (PolyGram, 1995, prod. various) is a similarly ambitious, Rasta-themed album with "conscious" lyrics, particularly on the watershed hits "'Til I'm Laid to Rest" and "Untold Stories," the latter recalling Marley's "Redemption Song" with its spare acoustic guitar and hungry-bellied wail. Banton also demonstrates his hydroelectric microphone flow over delightfully rude rhythms on a remix of "Champion" (with a sample of Ice Cube's "You Know How We Do") and the first album appearance of the fiery "Murderer." A lush, healing cover of the late Garnett Silk's "Complaint" provides a further sign of Banton's raised consciousness and concurrent lack of loftiness.

what to buy next: Voice of Jamaica ♪♪♪ (Mercury, 1993, prod. various) marked his shift into strictly cultural concerns and is his most underrated album by far, including "Tribal War," a cutting plea for peace between Kingston's then-warring political factions. Equally compelling is Banton's dissection of the repressive police-instituted curfew laws on "Operation Ardent." Elsewhere he collaborates with singer Wayne Wonder on the pensive "Commitment" and "Searching," the latter a lyrical gateway into a rapidly opening and maturing mind.

the rest:
Stamina Daddy ♪♪ (Payday, 1991)
Mr. Mention ♪♪½ (I1S, 1991)
Bogle ♪♪ (Mango, 1992)
Quick N/A (Exworks, 2000)

influences:
◀◀ Buro Banton, Clement Irie, Tony Rebel, Garnett Silk, Winston Riley, Bunny Lee, Red Dragon, Brian & Tony Gold, Tenor Saw, King Stitt, Bob Marley, Dave Kelly, Mad Cobra

▶▶ Jigsy King, Capleton, Frisco Kid, Chevelle Franklin

see also: Beenie Man

Todd Shanker

Carlos Barbosa-Lima

Classical, South American folk

Born December 17, 1944, in São Paulo, Brazil. Based in Brazil and USA.

One of the foremost classical guitar players in the world, Carlos Barbosa-Lima is also a pretty good jazz guitarist. His understanding of, and versatility in, both genres has made him one of the most formidable technical players around. It should come as no surprise that Barbosa-Lima has authored at least eight books on classical, jazz, and Brazilian technique in addition to serving as a faculty member at the Manhattan School of Music. Much of Barbosa-Lima's jazz performing and recording has been in the company of Charlie Byrd and the late Laurindo Almeida, two marvelous guitarists and influential aficionados of Brazilian jazz. He has also recorded with Byrd as part of the Washington Guitar Quintet. Barbosa-Lima's playing is characterized by precision but, within the context of Brazilian repertoire, also possessed of a remarkable sense of swing, which makes him equally at home with the music of a Joplin, Gershwin, or Jobim.

what to buy: Barbosa-Lima's performances of the aforesaid three composers, while recommendable in their own way, don't have the sheer joie de vivre of the solo recital Plays the Music of Luiz Bonfá & Cole Porter ♪♪♪♪½ (Concord Concerto, 1984, prod. Carl E. Jefferson, Charles E. Brown). Bonfá composed such wonderful songs as "Manha de Carnaval" and "Samba de Orfeu" and toured the States with Stan Getz during the height of the bossa nova craze. Cole Porter was the composer of witty standards like "Night and Day," "Love for Sale," and "In the Still of the Night," which hundreds of jazz musicians have used as a road map for improvisation. Barbosa-Lima does a great job with both oeuvres.

what to buy next: Plays the Music of Antonio Carlos Jobim & George Gershwin ♪♪♪ (Concord Concerto, 1982, prod. Carl E. Jefferson) in some ways is more of a classical recording than a jazz one, but Barbosa-Lima excels in each mode, with no loss of vigor in either direction. The playing is lovely and these are some of the most memorable tunes of the 20th century.

best of the rest:
(With Sharon Isbin) Brazil, with Love ♪♪♪½ (Concord Picante, 1987)
(With Sharon Isbin) Rhapsody in Blue/West Side Story ♪♪♪ (Concord Concerto, 1988)
(With Laurindo Almeida and Charlie Byrd) Music of the Brazilian Masters ♪♪♪♪♪ (Concord Picante, 1989)
(With the Washington Guitar Quintet) Charlie Byrd & the Washington Guitar Quintet ♪♪♪♪ (Concord Concerto, 1992)
(With the Washington Guitar Quintet) Aquarelle ♪♪♪♪ (Concord Jazz, 1994)

worth searching for: Chants for the Chief ♪♪♪♪½ (Concord Picante, 1991) also leans more toward Brazilian-flavored classical music than jazz, but the rhythms and percussive effects give the works a flexibility and third-world swing that most classical just doesn't have. Barbosa-Lima and composer/percussionist Thiago DeMello perform the 10-movement title work, and then the headliner plays six solo guitar pieces by various Brazilian composers who use folk melodies as their starting point.

influences:
◀◀ Andres Segovia, Atahualpa Yupanqui

▶▶ Sharon Isbin, Manuel Barrueco

see also: Luiz Bonfá, Antonio Carlos Jobim

Garaud MacTaggart

The Barra MacNeils

Celtic fusion

Formed 1986, in Sydney Mines, Cape Breton, Canada. Based in Cape Breton, Canada.

Sheumas MacNeil, piano, keyboard, vocals; Kyle MacNeil, violin, acoustic guitar, electric guitar, mandolin, vocals; Stewart MacNeil, vocals, accordion, keyboards, whistle, flute, electric guitar; Lucy MacNeil, vocals, bodhrán, Celtic harp, backing vocals, viola, violin. (All members are from Canada.)

Growing up together in a home where musicians would casually drop by for a jam session, the Barra MacNeils had it made when it came to a nurturing environment for their future career. Each of the four had appeared on TV and radio by the time they were 10, and they were touring during school breaks as they grew up. Each is an outstanding multi-instrumentalist, and they frequently switch roles from one piece to the next. All four also have rich, evocative voices, which blend to create memorable mouth music (an unaccompanied form of Scots Gaelic dance singing) or modern harmonies. While drawing on their Maritime roots, this quartet has forged ahead into a world of modern visions, giving listeners a shower of styles and sounds on their eight albums, rapidly switching from traditional folk to jazz, pop, and even punk. It is this lack of a single category to define them which has itself been the defining factor in the Barra MacNeils' success. Never seeming satisfied with having grasped any one genre, they keep reaching for others, combining as they go. Fusing pop, folk, and worldbeat, they strive to see where music might take them.

what to buy: The Traditional Album ♪♪♪♪♪ (Iona, 1994) is considered a classic of its type. Entirely instrumental, the album shows the Barra MacNeils at their best, with fiery reels and jigs galore. A must-have for traditional music fans.

what to buy next: Until Now ♪♪♪♪ (1997) showcases much of the material that has made the group famous, with heavy leanings on their traditional Scottish heritage. The Barra MacNeils ♪♪♪♪ (Polydor, 1986) introduced them to the world, with a rich variety of traditional music beautifully presented.

what to avoid: Fans will either love or hate The Question ♪♪ (Mercury/Polydor/PolyGram, 1995, prod. Nick Griffiths), which lives up to its name by leaving the listener wondering what type of music the band really plays. Bordering on punk, jazz, and worldbeat at times, the album shows almost nothing of the traditional roots for which the Barra MacNeils are renowned.

the rest:
Rock in the Stream ♪♪♪♪ (Polydor/PolyGram, 1989)
TimeFrame ♪♪♪ (Polydor/PolyGram, 1992)
Closer to Paradise ♪♪♪♪ (Polydor, 1993)
Timespan ♪♪♪♪ (Iona Records, 1996)

worth searching for: The band burns a second hole in the CD with their title-says-it-all rendition of "Rattlin' Roarin' Willie" on the Chieftains' all-star Canadian Celtic invitational, Fire in the Kitchen ♪♪♪♪ (BMG Classics, 1998, prod. Paddy Moloney).

influences:
◀◀ The Rankin Family, Buddy MacMaster
▶▶ Mouth Music

Jo Hughey Morrison and Neal Walters

Ray Barretto

Salsa, hispanic pop, jazz

Born April 29, 1929, in Brooklyn, NY, USA. Based in USA.

During the late 1940s Ray Barretto, fresh from his tour of duty with the army, was hanging out in Harlem and partaking in the famous jam sessions that went on at Minton's and the Apollo

frame drums worldwide

One of the three main types of drums worldwide (along with cylindrical drums and kettle drums), the family of frame drums is remarkable not only for its nearly universal distribution, but also for its longevity—the basic instrument's history began more than 4,000 years ago in the Middle East, then spread throughout the Mediterranean world. Visual representations of frame drums appear in ceremonial scenes from ancient Mesopotamia, on Greek vases with women dancing and drumming, and in Italian Renaissance paintings featuring angels playing tambourines. In stark contrast to our modern world, where men are usually the drummers, in antiquity frame drums were most commonly associated with women. Frame drums come in a wide variety of shapes and sizes. Most are round, but some are square or triangular; all have shallow frame depths, though heads can measure from six to more than 30 inches across. Some frame drums are played with a stick, as in the shamanic traditions of Native America and Central Asia, but most are played with the hands. The most well-known frame drum in the Western world is the bodhrán, the traditional drum of Ireland popularized by the Chieftains. But nearly every culture has its own variation on this simple instrument, from the Moroccan bendir (which features twine stretched across the inside of the goatskin head to produce a buzzing effect) and the South Indian kanjira (a lizardskin drum with a single set of jingles), to the Brazilian pandeiro (a lively drum with rows of jingles) and the increasingly popular North African tar (a lightweight, physically and tonally deeper tambourine). For a fascinating introduction to the wondrous and ancient art of frame drumming, check out the music of Glen Velez, who is widely considered the world's finest frame drum virtuoso.

see also: Glen Velez

Bret Love

Bar. Playing alongside such members of the bop elite as Sonny Stitt and Charlie Parker inspired the career path Barretto was to take. From there he went on to play in Latin bands led by José Curbelo and Tito Puente (for whom he replaced Mongo Santamaria). After Barretto recorded with Red Garland on Manteca, receiving special-guest-artist billing on the album cover, he became the first choice for jazz musicians looking for a bit of Latin percussion. These have included Lou Donaldson, Gene Ammons, Dizzy Gillespie (an early influence along with Chano Pozo), and Sonny Stitt, though as a crack session man Barretto has also played on the pop side of the street with the Rolling Stones and Bette Midler, to name just a few. While working the jazz scene has always been special to Barretto, a lot of his recordings and commercial successes have come from the Latin arena. In 1961 he recorded a novelty tune for Tico Records, "El Watusi," that became a big hit in 1963, lasting seven weeks in the Billboard magazine Top 40. Seminal salsa label Fania Records was his next major recording home. While there he recorded several groundbreaking albums including Acid, which worked in elements of jazz, Latin, and soul and capitalized on the bugalú craze of the moment. Barreto has also been a key member of the Fania All-Stars since their founding in 1968. In 1990 his collaboration with salsa queen Celia Cruz, Ritmo En El Corazón, won a Grammy Award. His more recent albums have swung back towards his jazz beginnings (albeit in a decidedly Latin-influenced mode), with 1994's Taboo and 1996's My Summertime receiving Grammy nominations for Best Latin Jazz Performance.

what to buy: Barretto's outfit New World Spirit is in the running for most interesting Latin jazz group of the 1990s. The personnel has stayed fairly consistent over the years, but the lineup on Taboo ♪♪♪♪½ (Concord Picante, 1994, prod. Allen Farnham) is even more exceptional for featuring Latin trumpet legend Ray Vega soaring over the keyboard fantasies of Colombian-born pianist Hector Martignon, with Barretto's always-inventive percussion binding the whole together. Martignon is an interesting composer as well, with his sensuous mid-tempo "Guajirita" sustaining rhythmic tension where a lesser group of musicians would probably want to sprint for the finish instead of enjoying the ride. Barretto's songs; including "Bomba-riquen" and "Montuno Blue," are also notable, as is his choice of covers, among them McCoy Tyner's "Effendi" and Nat Adderly's always-welcome "Work Song." My Summertime ♪♪♪♪½ (Blue Note, 1996, prod. Jean-Jacques Pussiau) is another fine mix of covers and originals from Barretto and the band. Trumpeter Michael Philip Mossman, though relatively young, is already a veteran of the Latin jazz world, having appeared on the final two albums by genre pioneer Mario Bauzá in addition to playing with such jazz stars as Gene Harris, Horace Silver, and Toshiko Akiyoshi. Pianist Martignon and bassist Jairo Moreno have been part of Barretto's band for years and help form the rhythmic core along with drummer Vince Cherico. Barretto is his usual superb self on congas.

what to buy next: Handprints ♪♪♪♪ (Concord Picante, 1991, prod. Ray Barretto, Eric Kressmann) is definitely a percussion album. Barretto and drummer Ed Uribe wrote 40 percent of it and provide a percolating rhythm bed for their bandmates to float improvisations over. This early edition of New World Spirit was already a pretty happening band, a lot of which owes to Barretto's guidance and virtuosity—along with his ability to attract young, high-caliber talent (and, in the case of the aforesaid Martignon and Moreno, to keep it). Saxophonist Steve Slagle is the other major player on the album and contributes three fine songs, with the leadoff tune "Tercer Ojo" taking high honors.

best of the rest:
Carnaval ♪♪♪ (Fantasy, 1962)
La Cuna ♪♪♪½ (Epic, 1979)
Rican/Struction ♪♪♪½ (Fania/Charly, 1979)
(With Celia Cruz) Ritmo En El Corazón ♪♪♪½ (Fania/Charly, 1988)
Latin Gold Collection ♪♪♪½ (PolyGram Latino, 1995)

worth searching for: Red Garland's album Manteca ♪♪♪½ (Prestige, 1958, prod. Bob Weinstock) was Barretto's first big break as a jazz sideman. The same year Garland's trio once again gave Barretto featured billing on Rojo ♪♪♪ (Prestige, 1958, prod. Bob Weinstock).

influences:
◀◀ Chano Pozo, Mongo Santamaria, Tito Puente
▶▶ Giovanni Hidalgo

see also: Mario Bauzá, Celia Cruz, Larry Harlow, Tito Puente, Mongo Santamaria

Garaud MacTaggart

Dr. Sikuru Ayinde Barrister

Fuji

Born 1948, in Abadan, Nigeria. Based in Staten Island, NY, USA, and Nigeria.

Sometimes the reason you haven't heard much from a major African star is that he's so popular and successful at home that seeking international fame isn't worth the trouble. Until recently, that was certainly the case with Dr. Sikuru Ayinde Barrister, the greatest living exponent of Nigeria's percussion-based fuji style. Barrister started out singing were music, Muslim songs used to wake the faithful for their pre-dawn meal during Ramadan. By 1965, Barrister had adapted the form considerably, adding in elements of percussive apala music and a philosophical Muslim song style known as sakara. That was the year he began calling his sound fuji, after Japan's Mt. Fuji, the "mountain of love."

Dr. Sikuru Ayinde Barrister (center)

In the 1970s, fuji vied for standing against Nigeria's leading pop style, juju, championed by King Sunny Adé and Chief Commander Ebenezer Obey. Fuji gained slowly, and by the mid-'80s, it had become the dominant recreational music among the Yoruba majority in the Nigerian capitol, Lagos. Barrister and his biggest fuji rival Kollington Ayinla had arrived. Whereas juju was predominantly Christian and incorporated electric guitars and keyboards, fuji had a Muslim identity and used only percussion and vocals. Barrister's all-night concerts were more like ceremonies, in which wealthy Lagos socialites competed to "spray" the star with money. A night's take typically reached or exceeded $10,000. Barrister did tour in Europe and the U.S. occasionally, bringing as many as 35 musicians with him. But he tended to play for Nigerian audiences, and largely missed out on the public adulation among Americans that Adé received. The spraying continued, of course, but given the expenses of touring, earnings could hardly compete with those available in Lagos.

In the mid-'90s, though, things began to change. Barrister's 1993 cassette The Truth got him in trouble with Nigeria's military leaders, and as governance there declined steadily, so did the income of musicians. Now, Barrister has moved to Staten Island, New York, where he has gradually reassembled his band and is poised for a full-scale assault on the U.S. market.

what to buy: New Fuji Garbage ♪♪♪♪ (GlobeStyle, 1991, prod. GlobeStyle) takes its name from an earlier Nigerian cassette in which Barrister played on black American lingo wherein "bad" means "good." The release is a classic, bubbling with dense, lively percussion. Barrister's voice is powerful and passionate, quite a contrast to the understated near-whisper of the top juju singers.

what to buy next: Look for Barrister's two recent U.S. releases, Precaution/Canadian Fuji American Version ♪♪♪½ (New Genesis Promotion, 1996, prod. various) and Mr. Fuji ♪♪♪♪ (New Genesis Promotion, 1998, prod. Aare (Dr.) S.S. Balogun, a.k.a. Barry Black). These newer recordings introduce occasional keyboards and Hawaiian guitar, but the percussion-rich fuji sound palette and Barrister's ripping voice remain absolutely intact.

6/2 dr. sikuru ayinde barrister

Waldemar Bastos

worth searching for: The Nigerian artists who contributed to Barrister's musical education are mostly unknown and unrecorded. You can get some idea of those origins, though, by listening to the historic compilation Yoruba Street Percussion ♪♪♪♪ (Original Music, 1995).

influences:
Adewale Ayuba

see also: King Sunny Adé, Ebenezer Obey

Banning Eyre

Waldemar Bastos

Angolan Afro-pop

Born 1954, in São Salvador do Congo, Congo. Based in Paris, France.

Singer/guitarist Bastos, though born in Congo, was raised in Angola and became inextricably associated with its culture, both to his fans and to himself. Like so many artists of his adoptive land before and after him, he had to leave this nation—racked first by colonialism (he was imprisoned as a teenager by the Portuguese political police), then civil war, then a new set of oppressions starting in 1974—to find free expression. Over the ensuing decades, he took refuge in Brazil, a much-changed Portugal, and finally France. He made several albums overseas before recording his major-label debut in New York. Bastos is that rare breed of artist in whose hands the acoustic guitar manages to sound fresh and stimulating. His sole U.S. album so far is a fine Pan-African snapshot that synthesizes many styles from all over the continent (and beyond), fronted by a plaintive, heartfelt voice.

what's available: On Pretaluz [blacklight] ♪♪♪♪ (Luaka Bop, 1998, prod. Arto Lindsay), carefully balanced acoustic and electric guitars combine with loping bass and keys for a smooth canvas against which Bastos sings pleas for peace, love, and understanding. There is a quiet dignity and authority in songs such as "Sofrimento (Suffering)," "Muxima (Heart)," and "Kuribota (Evil Tongue)," and an overall sense of warmth and forgiveness, but also an unflinching documentation of some bloody aspects of Angola's troubled recent history. Musically, the album ranges from the Portuguese fado style of lament on "Sofrimento (Suffering)," to the African semba (basis for the Brazilian samba) of "Querida Angola," to the Caribbean zouk-inflected "Menina (Girl)." On the Brazilian-influenced "Minha Familia (My Family)," a delightfully dirty electric guitar unexpectedly joins the proceedings briefly. It's one of the few hints that this was recorded so far away from the source of its inspiration.

influences:
Bonga, Youssou N'Dour

John C. Falstaff

Ashwan Batish

Indian traditional and fusion

Born November 1951, in Bombay, India. Based in Santa Cruz, CA, USA.

The sitar was freed from its traditional Indian repertoire by Bombay-born and Santa Cruz–based multi-instrumentalist Ashwan Batish. On his groundbreaking 1987 album Sitar Power, Batish electrified his sitar and incorporated elements of rock, jazz, and calypso into his dance-inspiring music. Batish continued his progressive experiments with the 1994 sequel, Sitar Power #2.

Batish inherited his love of music from his father, Pandit Shiv Dayal Batish, a renowned Indian musician who played on the Beatles' album Help! Just as his father influenced British rock in this capacity, the young Ashwan was in turn heavily influenced by British rock when he and the family moved to London in 1962. He continued to grow as a musician after another family move to the United States in 1973. Music, however, remained a pastime, second to Batish's dreams of working in aeronautics. These dreams were shattered with the mass factory closings by aviation giant Boeing, and Batish shifted his academic pursuits to accounting. Finally, however, though he earned a bachelor's and a master's degree in that field, Batish returned to music in the late 1970s.

Batish's first three albums were rooted in the traditional music of India. His 1980 debut effort, Morning Meditations, was a collaboration with his father. His second album, The Third Stream, released the following year, was a type of fusion recording with an acoustic-guitar accompanist. In Concert, released in 1984, moved him back toward the traditional, with rhythmic accompaniment by Zakir Hussain on tabla drum. That album's follow-up, Om Shanti Meditation, showcased the swarmandal, a four-octave Indian harp more often used for accompanying singers. This gravitation back away from tradition became a hard swerve with Sitar Power, following the release of which Batish married and cut down on his touring to focus on raising a family. A master instructor at his own Batish Institute of Music and Fine Arts in Santa Cruz, he also founded the label Batish Records, and has produced several concert videos as well as instructional videos on sitar, tabla, and harmonium playing.

what to buy: Sitar Power ♪♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1987, prod. Ashwan Batish) is an electrified demonstration of the previously unexplored flexibility of the sitar. Accompanied by a hard-rocking rhythm section, Batish blends Indian ragas with jazz, rock, and calypso influences.

what to buy next: The experimentation continues on Sitar Power #2 ♪♪♪♪ (Batish, 1994, prod. Ashwan Batish).

the rest:
Morning Meditation ♪♪♪♪ (Batish, 1980)

6/4 battlefield band

The Third Stream ♪♪♪ (Batish, 1981)
In Concert ♪♪♪½ (Batish, 1984)
Om Shanti Meditation ♪♪♪ (Batish, 1985)

influences:
Pandit Shiv Dayal Batish, Ravi Shankar, George Harrison, John McLaughlin

see also: Zakir Hussain

Craig Harris

Battlefield Band

Scottish traditional and contemporary

Formed 1969, in Glasgow, Scotland. Based in Scotland.

Alan Reid, keyboards, guitar, vocals; Brian McNeill, fiddle, viola, mandolin, vocals (1969–90); John McCusker, fiddle, vocals (1990–present); John Gahagan, concertina, whistle (1977–78); Jamie McMenemy, cittern, guitar, mandolin, vocals (1977–79); Pat Kilbride, guitar, cittern, vocals (1978); Jenny Clark, dulcimer, guitar, vocals (1978); Ged Foley, guitar, vocals (1980–84); Alistair Russell, guitar, cittern, vocals (1984–97); Davy Steele, guitar, cittern, bodhrán, vocals (1997–present); Duncan McGillivray, bagpipes (1979–83); Dougie Pincock, bagpipes (1984–90); Iain MacDonald, bagpipes (1990–97); Mike Katz, bagpipes (1997–present).

Named for a suburb of Glasgow, Battlefield Band, along with the Tannahill Weavers and Silly Wizard, has been at the very heart of the Scottish folk revival of the last three decades. Hard-driving and energetic, the band has built a loyal and sizable audience by fusing traditional Scottish music with elements from jazz and rock 'n' roll. Although their current albums sound traditional when compared to the likes of Shooglenifty or recent Capercaillie, their experiments with synthesizers and pop music were revolutionary for their day. The band's early recordings were indeed more traditional, with the sparing use of synthesizer adding a slight modern touch. During the early 1980s, they developed a larger, more aggressive sound and produced their two defining albums, Home Is Where the Van Is and There's a Buzz, which established the band as a favorite in both Scotland and the U.S. These recordings were marked by modern arrangements using electric keyboards; a brace of traditional songs; a few compositions by band members; and, most important, great bagpiping and fiddling. After wholesale personnel changes in the mid-'80s, the band developed a more political sound, but kept the energy just as high with the fine Anthem for the Common Man and two instrumental albums with harper Alison Kinnaird. By the late '80s, however, the band seemed to be losing steam. Although they finally recorded Home Ground, a much-needed live album, releases from this period represent a low point in their history and a distinct decrease of drive. The replacement of Brian McNeill with fiddler John McCusker brought some youthful energy and ideas back to the band, and by 1997's Across the Borders they were once again playing solid Scottish music mixed with outside influences—in this case the playing of Irish master flutist Seamus Tansey. More sweeping changes in late '97 ushered in yet another new sound, this time with former Ceolbeg members Davey Steele and Mike Katz joining John McCusker and Alan Reid.

what to buy: Home Is Where the Van Is ♪♪♪♪½ (Temple, 1980, prod. Robin Morton) made Battlefield Band's reputation; it's a collection of traditional instrumentals and songs given a jolt through the addition of electric bass, synthesizer, and some imaginative arrangements. Alan MacGillavry's killer bagpiping sent kilts flying, and guitarist Ged Foley's tasteful playing filled in all the gaps. Featuring a strong set of tracks, including one original by Brian MacNeil ("The Lads o' the Fair"), the group proved that the tradition could take some updating without losing its soul. They've never been better than when they featured this lineup, and There's a Buzz ♪♪♪♪½ (Temple, 1982, prod. Robin Morton) made two in a row. Highlights include Robert Louis Stevenson's "Shining Clear," set to music by Reid, and a sweet set of instrumentals beginning with "The Presbyterian Hornpipe." Anthem for the Common Man ♪♪♪♪ (Temple, 1984, prod. Robin Morton) saw Dougie Pincock pick up the piping mantle and singer Alistair Russell replace Foley. The lyrics became more political, featuring a great cover of Richard Thompson's "The Old Changing Way." Any worries about a loss of energy were dispelled by the opening track, "The Four-Minute Warning," featuring the new man, Pincock, more than holding his own on the pipes.

what to buy next: Battlefield Band is at its best in concert, and Home Ground ♪♪♪½ (Temple, 1989, prod. Robin Morton) accurately captures its entertaining stage show. Jammed with more than 70 minutes of music, the album shows the band working through an exuberant run of songs and dance tunes. Particular highlights are the two sets featuring Dougie Pincock's solo piping and the nine-minute tour de force "Band of a Thousand Chances," in which the group combines Scottish classics with ones by Wilson Pickett and the Beatles. Like the archetypal American mail carrier, the quintessential Scottish band will not let Rain, Hail or Shine ♪♪♪½ (Temple, 1998) deter their momentum—as this first studio CD from their yet-again-reconfigured roster proves; not with a vengeance (the sound changes are not all that radical), but with a confidence that's infectious (they still hold their own with any outfit of their kind). For the true believer, this one comes enhanced with some video interviews and photos.

what to avoid: Quiet Days ♪♪ (Temple, 1992, prod. Robin Morton) is a little too long, has no great numbers, and reveals a band looking for direction. The subsequent Threads and Across the Borders (listed below) found them with new life and ideas; when filling out your Battlefield Band collection skip ahead to these.

the rest:
Battlefield Band ♪♪♪♪ (Topic, 1977/Temple, 1994)
At the Front ♪♪♪♪ (Topic, 1978/Temple, 1994)
Music in Trust ♪♪♪ (Temple, 1986)
On the Rise ♪♪♪ (Temple, 1986)
After Hours ♪♪♪♪ (Temple, 1987)
Celtic Hotel ♪♪♪ (Temple, 1987)
Music in Trust 2 ♪♪♪ (Temple, 1988)
New Spring ♪♪½ (Temple, 1991)
Opening Moves ♪♪♪½ (Topic, 1993)
Threads ♪♪♪ (Temple, 1995)
Across the Borders ♪♪♪½ (Temple, 1997)
Celtic Folk: Live ♪♪♪½ (Munich, 1998)

influences:
Tannahill Weavers, Silly Wizard

Shooglenifty, Tartan Amoebas, Runrig

see also: Capercaillie, Ceolbeg, House Band, Alison Kinnaird, Kornog, Ossian, Patrick Street, Shooglenifty, Silly Wizard, Tannahill Weavers

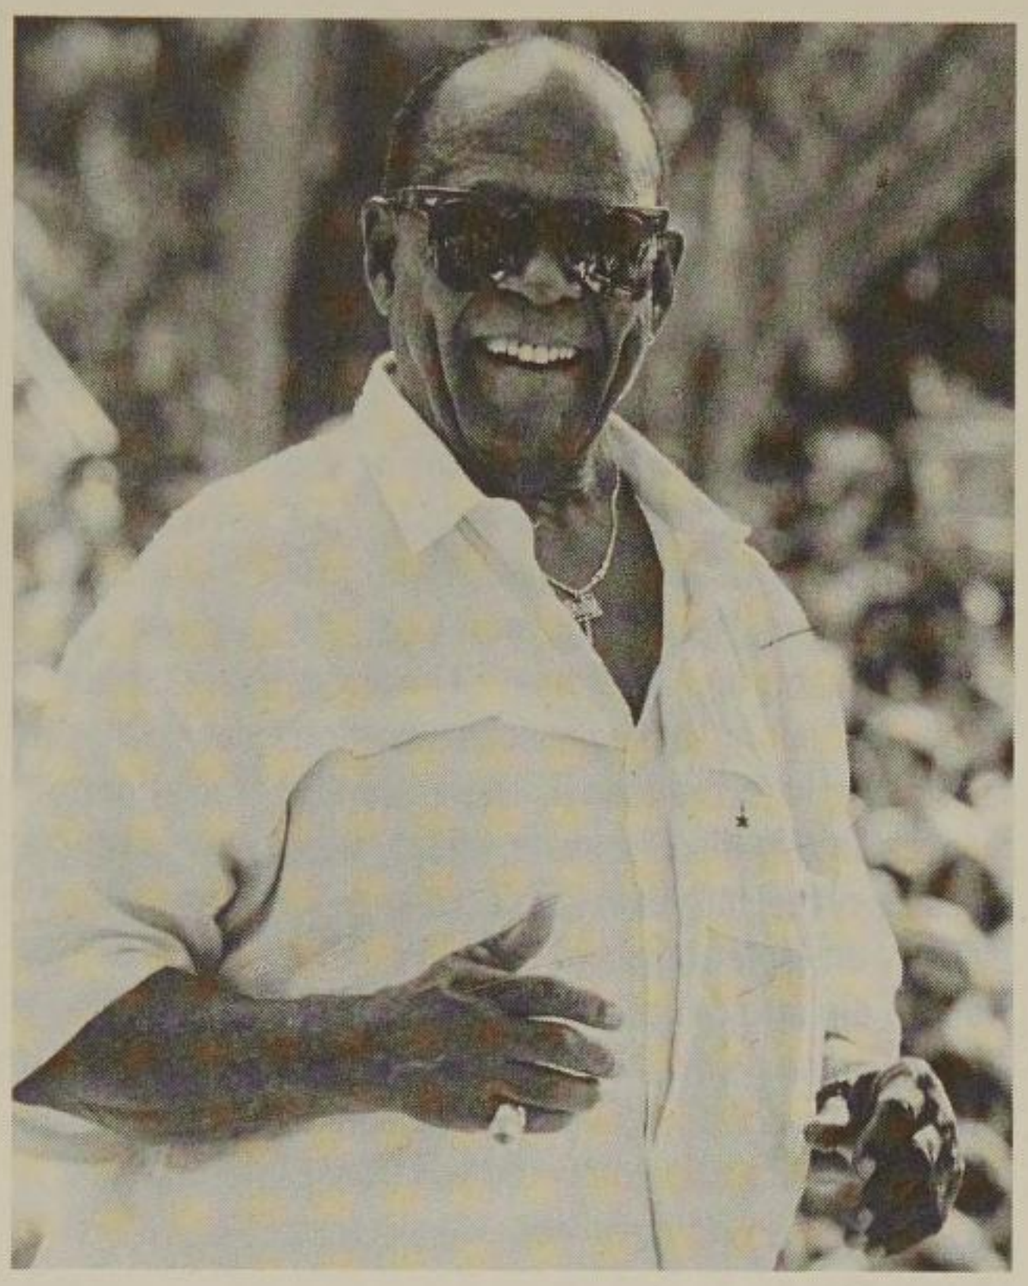
Tony Ziselberger



Mario Bauzá

Mario Bauzá

Cuban jazz

Born April 28, 1911, in Havana, Cuba. Died July 11, 1993, in New York, NY, USA.

Mario Bauzá was involved in two of the major jazz and Latin trends of the 1930s and '40s. He was responsible for introducing Dizzy Gillespie to conga legend Chano Pozo and for bringing the standard Cuban rhythm section into line with the big band sound of Cab Calloway and Chick Webb. The meeting of Gillespie and Pozo was influential in the development of a hybrid known as Cubop which included among its proponents Stan Getz and Charlie Parker. The blending of big band arrangements with Cuban rhythms made Bauzá's brother-in-law Machito (Frank Grillo) the leader of what was arguably the most influential Latin-flavored band in the first half of this century. Bauzá's first instruments were the clarinet and the bass clarinet, which he played in the Havana Philharmonic. In 1930, shortly after coming to the United States, Bauzá joined Cuarteto Machin playing trumpet, an instrument he learned in the two weeks preceding his initial job with the band. His first major jazz gig was with Chick Webb in 1933 and from there Bauzá worked briefly with bands led by Don Redman and Fletcher Henderson before joining Cab Calloway's outfit in 1939. In 1940 Bauzá made the move to Machito's newly formed band as the musical director, and there he stayed until 1976.

During the late '70s and early '80s Bauzá and Graciela (his sister-in-law and former vocalist with Machito) recorded a couple albums for small labels, which have since turned into prized collector's items. He then made a recording in 1992 featuring Chico O'Farrill's arrangement of "Tanga," a landmark tune originally written by Bauzá back in 1943, and this led to a gratifying, deserved, and none-too-soon resurgence of his career in the last year of his life.

what to buy: Tanga ♪♪♪♪♪ (Messidor, 1992, prod. Mario Bauzá, Götz A. Wörner) is by a truly big band, something like 24 pieces not counting vocalists and special guest Paquito D'Rivera. Things could get messy when arrangers work with an ensemble this large, but everyone involved in the project is top-notch. Special honors go to Chico O'Farrill, whose transformation of Bauzá's "Tanga" into the subtitled "Afro-Cuban Jazz Suite in Five Movements" is a masterpiece. There is not a weak moment in the whole album. The end result is not only a paean to the spirit of Latin jazz but a celebration of one of its cardinal figures, Mario Bauzá. My Time Is Now ♪♪♪♪♪ (Messidor, 1993, prod. Mario Bauzá, Götz A. Wörner) is another splendid album from one of the most important musicians in Latin jazz history. The band romps through Cuban classics by Arsenio Rodríguez what to buy next: Two months before he died, Bauzá was actively at work recording what would be his swan song. On 944 Columbus ♪♪♪♪ (Messidor, 1994, prod. Mario Bauzá, Götz A. Wörner) the writing, arranging, and playing are still at a remarkably high level from all involved, but the spark of genius that informed the previous two efforts was starting to fade along with the leader. There are still crucial performances on this disc, however, and it is tempting to read a valedictory feel into Bauzá's pieces as well as compositions by Dizzy Gillespie and about Chano Pozo. For those who only want to dip into Bauzá's work, the compilation Messidor's Finest, Volume One ♪♪♪♪♪ (Messidor, 1997, prod. Mario Bauzá, Götz A. Wörner) includes selections from all of the above, though it shouldn't stop you from exploring them in their equally rewarding fullness.

("La Vida Es Un Sueño") and Moíses Simons ("El Manisero," otherwise known as "The Peanut Vendor") in addition to rearranging Kurt Weill's "Moritat" into a Latin version of "Jack the Knife" (no, that's not a typo). Many Tanga alumni show up here, including such major participants as vocalist Rudy Calzado, drummer Bobby Sanabria, and mythic conga player Carlos "Patato" Valdéz.

worth searching for: One of the albums Bauzá recorded with Graciela after Machito's death in 1984 was Afro-Cuban Jazz ♪♪♪♪♪ (Caiman, 1984), which features a dream-team lineup including Paquito D'Rivera, Claudio Roditi, Daniel Ponce, and Jorge Dalto.

influences:

⏮ Antonio Machin, Don Apiazo, Cab Calloway

⏭ Dizzy Gillespie, Tito Puente

see also: Paquito D'Rivera, Machito, Patato, Arsenio Rodríguez

Garaud MacTaggart

Bayou Seco /Bayou Eclectico

American roots

Formed 1978, in Louisiana, USA. Based in Silver City, NM, USA.

Jeanie McLerie, fiddle, guitar; Ken Keppeler, fiddle, accordion, harmonica. (Both members are from USA.)

Jeanie McLerie began singing in French at age five and took up the ukulele at age eight. For those familiar with Bayou Seco, that might sound like things haven't changed very much. McLerie and Ken Keppeler have been researching and playing the music of the Southwest—from the Mississippi River to the deserts of Arizona—for 20 years. McLerie got interested in folk forms during the 1950s and learned to play Travis-style guitar in time to show a young James Taylor how to do it one summer on Martha's Vineyard. In 1962, she went to France to study at the Sorbonne and got ever more involved with the folk scene. While in France, she met future husband Sandy Darlington, and the two eked out a living busking the movie theater queues. In 1964, the couple moved to England to perform in its folk clubs and became acquainted with most of the traditional and revival singers—later-legend Maddy Prior even served as their roadie for a time. They returned to the U.S. in 1967 to play the Newport Folk Festival and settled in the Berkeley, California area. McLerie published Grow Your Own, a book on organic gardening that was subsequently picked up by Random House and sold over 180,000 copies. In 1971, they moved to New Mexico, though they separated in 1973.

Keppeler, a fourth-generation Southwesterner, came from a musical family; his father played harmonica and was a very good singer, his maternal great-grandfather was a fiddler and pump organ player. He began to play guitar in high school and often hung out at the old Ash Grove where he would hear such acts as the Kentucky Colonels, Doc Watson, and Clifton Chenier. In 1978, he met McLerie in Louisiana and they began a long association with Cajun music, learning directly from a host of renowned practitioners including Michael Doucet, Dennis McGee, Canray Fontenot, and Alphonse "Bois Sec" Ardoin. During the late '70s, McLerie worked with Ann Savoy and Jean Broussard in a group called the Magnolia Sisters and recorded Music from the Old Timey Hotel with Franny Leopold. In 1979, she joined Alice Gerrard and Irene Herrmann as the Harmony Sisters and they toured extensively until 1983, when she and Keppeler moved to Santa Fe, New Mexico. As artists-in-residence, they visited every nook and cranny of New Mexico to learn music and songs from cowboy, Hispanic, and Navajo sources. Keppeler also became a sought-after craftsman of violins and mandolins.

McLerie and Keppeler developed strong ties to traditional musicians in New Mexico. Over the years they met and encouraged Cleofes Ortiz, a traditional Hispanic fiddler, and Max and Antonia Apodaca, two other traditional musicians whose work they brought to public attention and who taught them many of the tunes that have since become Bayou Seco staples. Similarly, they discovered the music of the Gu-Achi Fiddlers of the Tohono O'odham people of southern Arizona. Through fiddler Elliott Johnson of Cababi, Arizona, they learned much of the old-style material that was rapidly being forgotten. They continue to share the music and dances they were taught by these old masters, touring extensively in Europe and throughout the Southwest from their home in Silver City, New Mexico. McLerie recently started a school for fiddle instruction called the Fiddling Friends, which focuses on an international repertoire of styles and emphasizes the sources, including contact with traditional musicians. Keppeler continues to make fine violins. All of these experiences and influences have combined to form the Bayou Seco sound, which has been described as "delightfully danceable Chilegumbo with a spicy bite and delicious aftertaste." Bayou Seco recordings are available from Bayou Seco, P.O. Box 1393, Silver City, NM 88061, or by e-mail from bayouseco@aol.com. Of interest to fans present and future, a new CD titled Use It Again is due out at this writing, set to feature rerecorded versions of tunes from the otherwise-rare Songs of New Mexico and Beyond. Also look for the Harmony Sisters to re-form and release a CD compilation of their two Flying Fish LPs plus a few live recordings from the early '80s.

what to buy: Following in the Tune Prints ♪♪♪♪ (UBIK Sound, 1995, prod. Ken Keppeler, Jeanie McLerie, Manny Rettinger) finds Bayou Seco in fine form, presenting a program of "old music in the new West . . . desert stomps, Cajun romps, and songs for modern cowgirls and vaqueros." The CD mixes genres shamelessly, but allows the group to salute the old masters they've learned from while pursuing their own eclectic yet delightful musical tastes. The sound is not slick and is most definitely authentic, blending elements of Cajun, Tex-Mex norteño, Native American "chicken scratch," and zydeco into a downhome composite sketch of the Southwest. Also check out a couple of anthologies that feature one or more cuts by the group: Old Time Music on the Air, Vol. 2 ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1996, prod. Old Time Music on the Radio) and The American Fogies, Vol. 1 ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1996, prod. Ray Alden), each filled with very generous selections of great music.

what to buy next: The cassette-only Songs of New Mexico and Beyond ♪♪♪½ (UBIK Sound, 1991, prod. Ken Keppeler, Jeanie McLerie, Manny Rettinger) is another eclectic batch of Cajun, New Mexican, Navajo, original, and only-they-know-what-else. If you crave a less mixed-bag approach, Memories in Cababi: Tunes of the Tohono O'odham ♪♪♪½ (UBIK Sound, 1995), also cassette only, is a real treat; delightful tunes in a style that deserves the exposure.

the rest:
No Borders ♪♪♪½ (UBIK Sound, 1986) (cassette only)
Orquesta Cleofonica ♪♪♪ (UBIK Sound, 1987) (cassette only) Recuerdos de Rociada ♪♪♪ (UBIK Sound) (cassette only) worth searching for: Cactus Gumbo and Alligator Enchiladas ♪♪♪ (Blue Guitar Productions, 1983, prod. various) is the one Bayou Seco album that is out of print and unavailable. It's certainly worth grabbing if you come across it.

solo outings:
Jeanie McLerie:
(With Franny Leopold) Music from the Old Timey Hotel ♪♪♪ (UBIK Sound, 1994)

Harmony Sisters:
Harmony Pie ♪♪♪½ (Flying Fish, 1980)
Second Helping ♪♪♪½ (Flying Fish, 1983)

influences:
⏮ The Balfa Brothers, Dennis McGee, Cleofes Ortiz, Elliott Johnson

⏭ Balfa Toujours, Delta Sisters

see also: Gu-Achi Fiddlers, Savoy-Doucet Cajun Band

Neal Walters

Keola Beamer /Keola and Kapono Beamer /Nona Beamer

Slack-key guitar

Born Keolamaikalani Breckenridge Beamer, February 18, 1951, in Hawaii, USA. Based in Hawaii, USA.

One of Hawaii's most popular contemporary musicians, Keola Beamer can trace his island history back to the 15th century. Many of those ancestors were musicians too: his great-grandmother, Helen Desha Beamer, was a noted songwriter and performer, and his mother teaches dancing and music, and occasionally records. Beamer's available output is perhaps more far-reaching than any other artist in his homeland's distinctive, open-tuned "slack-key guitar" style; it incorporates elements of chants and other traditional Hawaiian sounds, as well as the influence of soft Western pop. Through the years he has recorded as a solo artist, with his brother Kapono Beamer, and with his mother Nona Beamer.

what to buy: The gorgeous Mauna Kea: White Mountain Journal ♪♪♪♪ (Dancing Cat, 1997, prod. George Winston) is Beamer's finest moment on record, an instrumental album that features him playing both electric and acoustic guitar. Beamer does many of the tunes solo, overdubbing a few; George Winston occasionally joins on guitar as well. Beamer's arrangements of "Kaula 'ili" and "Hi'ilawe," songs associated with slack-key legends Sonny Chillingworth and Gabby Pahinui respectively, are both exquisite. Moe'Uhane Kika (Tales from the Dream Guitar) ♪♪♪♪ (Dancing Cat, 1995, prod. George Winston) is of similar quality, only here Beamer's the only player, sometimes adding a nylon-string acoustic or electric overdub.

what to buy next: A rare recording with a full band, Wooden Boat ♪♪♪ (Dancing Cat, 1994, prod. George Winston) has a more contemporary sound than most of its label's other albums. Producer George "Keoki" Winston plays guitar on several tracks (including the duets "Kalena Kai" and "He Aloha no 'O Honolulu (Beloved Is Honolulu)"), and piano on the instrumental "No Ke Ano Ahiahi (In the Evening Time)."

beausoleil

what to avoid: Though Keola & Kapono Beamer's Honolulu City Lights ♪♪ (Paradise, 1987, prod. Teddy Randazzo) is considered one of the most successful albums ever recorded in Hawaii, it will have more value to tourists and honeymooners than slack-key aficionados. Both it and Pure Hawaiian Magic ♪♪ (Paradise, 1991, prod. Tom Moffatt), a second duo album, contain some fine slack-key picking, but the songs and arrangements are saccharine and overly romanticized.

the rest:

Hawaiian Slack Key Guitar in the Real Old Style ♪♪♪ (Music of Polynesia, 1972)

Sweet Maui Moon ♪♪ (Paradise, 1989)

Kolonahe: From the Gentle Wind ♪♪♪♪ (BMG/Windham Hill/Dancing Cat, 1999)

worth searching for: Beamer has released an instructional video, The Art of Hawaiian Slack Key Guitar, and published a book-and-cassette package, Guitar Playing Hawaiian Style.

solo outings:

Nona Beamer:

The Golden Lehua Tree ♪♪♪ (Starscape, 1997)

influences:

◀◀ Sonny Chillingworth, Gabby Pahinui

▶▶ Ozzie Kotani

see also: Sonny Chillingworth, Gabby Pahinui

Brian Mansfield

Beausoleil

Cajun

Formed 1975, in Lafayette, LA, USA. Based in USA.

Michael Doucet, fiddle, vocals; David Doucet, guitar; Billy Ware, percussion; Tommy Alesi, drums (1977–present); Jimmy Breaux, accordion (1988–present); Al Tharp, bass, banjo, fiddle, backing vocals (1990–present); Errol Verret, accordion (1975–87); Tommy Comeaux, bass, mandolin (1975–90); Robert Vignaud, bass (1982–84). (All members are from USA.)

Led by fiddler, singer, and Cajun-culture zealot Michael Doucet, Beausoleil is not only Louisiana's premier Cajun band, but during the past decade or so has also become the best-known "world-music" band from North America. When Europeans, for example, think of Cajun music, they inevitably think of Beausoleil. Based in the acoustic version of their genre—a fiddle and accordion–led style that generally follows two forms, the waltz and the two-step—Beausoleil has consistently had the vision and skill to add elements of New Orleans R&B, blues, folk, jazz, and country to their very vital take on traditional French music from Louisiana.

A Cajun heritage enthusiast since he was a teenager, Doucet made a trip to France in 1973 that convinced him of the value of his native culture. He returned to Louisiana determined to play the string music that had come to that state from France via the Acadian people of eastern Canada. Combining musical history and infectious dance music, Beausoleil—which borrowed the nickname of Acadian resistance leader Joseph Broussard—was initially the alter ego of a regionally famous cosmic Cajun band called Coteau. Fronted by Michael Doucet and known locally as "the Cajun Grateful Dead," Coteau lasted until 1977, when it broke up and its Beausoleil incarnation continued on. The fledgling group recorded its first album for Pate Marconi/EMI in France in 1976. The second disc, The Spirit of Cajun Music, was made in the U.S. for Louisiana-based Swallow Records in 1977. The band signed with Arhoolie Records during the early 1980s and in the fashion of that label released a number of traditional recordings, one of which, the soundtrack to the film Belizaire the Cajun, won a Grammy nomination. Constant touring and a revival of interest in all things Cajun (thanks in large part to New Orleans chef Paul Prudhomme) aided and abetted Beausoleil's growing popularity; in 1986 the band members quit their day jobs and committed to music full-time. In that same year they released four albums: the Belizaire the Cajun soundtrack, Allons a Lafayette, Christmas Bayou, and Bayou Boogie, the last of which was the band's first disc for Rounder Records—and the first time they recorded with electric instruments. In this period they also made several appearances on radio's definitive roots-music showcase, Prairie Home Companion, and were invited to play Carnegie Hall. In 1990 Beausoleil signed with Rhino Records' RNA imprint (later renamed Forward Records). Three consecutive Beausoleil albums won Grammy nominations in the Best Contemporary Folk category: 1989's Bayou Cadillac, 1991's Cajun Conja, and 1993's La Danse de la Vie. In 1991 Mary Chapin Carpenter won a Grammy for "Down at the Twist and Shout," a song she'd written about the band. When she performed the song during the Grammys telecast, they joined her onstage, a feat repeated at the 1997 Super Bowl. Beausoleil has even come to the attention of the rock community, with Rolling Stone referring to them as "the best damned dance band you'll ever hear." Having performed at two presidential inaugurations—Jimmy Carter's in 1977 and Bill Clinton's in 1993—Beausoleil continues to tour over 200 nights a year.

what to buy: Bayou Deluxe: The Best of Michael Doucet & Beausoleil ♪♪♪♪ (Rhino, 1993, prod. various) is probably the best place to jump into Beausoleil's ever-expanding catalog. Upbeat tunes like "Vieux Crowley" mix with slower, more introspective numbers like "Je M'Endors." Drawn from eight different albums and two compilation discs, this collection is a generous slice of the many sides to this traditional-music powerhouse.

what to buy next: Choosing any one album by a band that has yet to make even a mediocre disc is nearly impossible. Bayou Cadillac ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1989, prod. Michael Doucet, Ken Gorz, Ken Irwin) gets the nod on the strength of classic Louisiana tunes like "Bon Temps Rouler" and great Doucet originals like "Valse Bebe." Add to that the band stretching into a successful medley of "Bo Diddley" and "Iko Iko" and you have one of their best. Again though, this is strictly a matter of taste: Cajun Conja ♪♪♪♪ (Rhino, 1991, prod. Al Tharp, Michael Doucet) and La Danse de la Vie ♪♪♪♪ (Rhino, 1993, prod. John Jennings, Michael Doucet, Beausoleil) are very close seconds.

the rest:

Spirit of Cajun Music a.k.a. Louisiana Cajun Music ♪♪♪♪ (Swallow, 1977)
Michael Doucet dit Beausoleil ♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1981/1994)
Zydeco Gris Gris ♪♪♪♪ (Swallow, 1985)
Allons a Lafayette & More with Canray Fontenot ♪♪♪½ (Arhoolie, 1986)
Christmas Bayou ♪♪♪½ (Swallow, 1986)
Bayou Boogie ♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1986)
Belizaire the Cajun ♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1986)
Hot Chili Mama ♪♪♪½ (Arhoolie, 1988)
Live! From the Left Coast ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1989)
Deja Vu ♪♪♪½ (Swallow, 1990)
Parlez-Nous a Boire ♪♪♪½ (Arhoolie, 1991)
L'Echo ♪♪♪♪ (Forward, 1994)
L'Amour ou la Folie ♪♪♪♪ (Rhino, 1997)
The Best of Beausoleil ♪♪♪½ (Arhoolie, 1997)
Cajunization ♪♪♪ (Rhino, 1999)

worth searching for: Vintage Beausoleil ♪♪♪½ (Music of the World, 1995, prod. Bob Haddad) collects live performances from 1986–87 in New York City. Several are from a rain-delayed Central Park concert where the band is responding to the enthusiasm of the muddy, dedicated crowd. For even more vintage Beausoleil, Arc de Triomphe Two Step ♪♪♪½ (EMD/Blue Note, 1997) unearths and retitles La Nuit, the band's long-lost France-only debut studio release. Another disc worth hunting down is Le Hoogie Boogie ♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1992), a charming children's record of Cajun music featuring Michael Doucet, his wife Sharon Arms Doucet, and the members of Beausoleil.

solo outings:

Michael Doucet:

Michael Doucet & Cajun Brew ♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1988)
(With Alison Krauss, Seamus Connolly, Kenny Baker, Claude Williams, and Joe Cormier) Master of the Folk Violin ♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1989)
Beau Solo ♪♪♪½ (Arhoolie, 1990)

David Doucet:

Quand J'ai Parti ♪♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1990)

influences:

◀◀ Amédée Ardoin, Dewey Balfa, Canray Fontenot

▶▶ Filé, Balfa Toujours

see also: California Cajun Orchestra, Savoy-Doucet Cajun Band, Jo-El Sonnier

Robert Baird

Francis Bebey

Makossa, rumba, classical

Born July 15, 1929, in Douala, Cameroon. Based in Paris, France.

One of West Africa's artistic elder statesmen, Francis Bebey has long been a champion of African culture, introducing it to the world through his music, poetry, novels, theater works, and film. As a boy, though, Bebey was alienated from this culture by his Westernized upbringing and the colonial educational policies of France. His early training in piano and guitar, Bebey has said, "schooled [me] to ignore, and even to detest, traditional African styles." But by his teens he had come under the spell of African traditional music, as well as local pop, Cuban rumba, and American jazz. Then, while a student at the Sorbonne in the 1950s, he first heard the classical guitar of Andres Segovia, a watershed in Bebey's understanding of music that changed his approach to guitar technique and composition. Before the decade was out he wrote his first important guitar piece, Lake Michigan Summer, during communications studies in the U.S.

Bebey's two academic paths converged in an early career as a radio journalist and disc jockey, leading the world traveler to a job with the information service of UNESCO in Paris in 1961—and, eventually, to the leadership of its traditional music section. His role during this period brought him back to Africa frequently to study its regional styles and to perform. Meanwhile, his creative abilities in both music and literature were coming into bloom; his first novel, Agatha Moudiou's Son, was published in 1968, and his first LP appeared the following year. Bebey has since released roughly 25 albums, mostly on the French Ozileka label, and has over a dozen books to his credit, including poetry collections, novels, and musical studies such as the popular African Music: A People's Art. Much of his work has certain themes in common: a focus on social issues relevant to Africans; a commitment to the integrity of African culture in the post-colonial era; and an effort to make African art meaningful to the world at large. On this point Bebey stresses that "African music . . . must first be made accessible to all men everywhere . . . and allowed to take root, germinate, and flower in their cultural understanding."

As accomplished in his art's execution as in its conception, Bebey can be ranked among the greatest African guitarists. His instrumental style, which combines elements of European classical music with traditional Latin and African rhythms, is a powerfully emotive synthesis that transcends self-conscious "fusion." Bebey's compositions move seamlessly between the folkloric and urbane, and he masterfully employs native African instruments like the sanza thumb piano and his trademark pygmy flute alongside pop instruments including the saxophone, rhythm box, organ, and synthesizer. For any given release, it's hard to predict what Bebey will put together, but it's nearly a certainty that the result will have a humor and sincerity that few contemporary musicians can equal.

what to buy: When buying Bebey's albums keep in mind that, like a West African griot (oral historian), he enjoys revisiting favorite tunes from time to time, so don't be surprised to hear a few songs repeat between releases. With help from his sons, Bebey makes some of his most polished music on Dibiye ♪♪♪♪♪ (Pee Wee, 1998, prod. Vincent Mahey), a sometimes buoyant, sometimes melancholy set imbued with his gentle wisdom. Djanjo Preface ♪♪♪♪½ (Ozileka, 1992, prod. Francis Bebey) is a fine selection of works for guitar. "Fond D'Ivresse" displays Bebey's genius at merging the elegance and technique of European classical music with the rhythmic flair and soul of African forms, while on "Guitar Makossa" he unforgettably interprets Cameroon's dominant makossa pop style.

what to buy next: Sourire De Lune (Moon's Smile) ♪♪♪♪½ (Ozileka, 1995, prod. Francis Bebey) is a pleasant mixed bag of styles in which rhythm box, sanza, synth, and guitar all somehow work together.

what to avoid: Virtually every tune on Mwana O ♪♪½ (Ozileka, 1994) can also be found on Moon's Smile, which has twice as many cuts.

the rest:
Amaya #2 (Ozileka, 1987)
La Condition Masculine ♪♪♪ (Ozileka, 1991)
Travail Au Noir ♪♪♪♪ (Ozileka, 1997)

worth searching for: Two releases from the sadly defunct Original Music label are worth tracking down. The breathtakingly beautiful Akwaaba ♪♪♪♪♪ (Original Music, 1986, prod. Francis Bebey, John Storm Roberts) marks a return to traditional roots, featuring sanza, pygmy flute, percussion, and some stunning vocal techniques. The lovingly assembled Nandolo: Works 1963–1994 ♪♪♪♪♪ (Original Music, 1995, prod. Francis Bebey, John Storm Roberts) compiles some of Bebey's best material and includes a new performance of the classic guitar solo "Magic Box." The biographical liner notes are excellent.

influences:
⏮ Andres Segovia, Jean Bosco Mwenda, many African traditional styles

Jeffrey Muhr

Tom Bee

See: Xit

Robby Bee & the Boyz from the Rez

Native American rap

Formed 1987, in Albuquerque, NM, USA. Based in Albuquerque, NM, USA.

Robby Bee (born 1971, in Albuquerque NM, USA), vocals, keys, samples; Michael D., vocals; Doug S., vocals. (All members are from USA.)

Robby Bee is a producer/singer/rapper/performer, one of the most progressive Native American artists of the current generation. His father Tom is the president and founder of SOAR (Sound of America Records), the country's only Native-owned and -operated label. The elder Bee was also the founder of Xit, the first all-Native rock band. Like his father, Robbie Bee gives good interview and is tireless in his efforts to promote Indian music. "To most whites, Indians are like unicorns, creatures that exist in legends, not real life; but there are as many Native Americans in L.A., riding the concrete prairie, as there are on any reservation." In an effort to change the stereotypical ideas of what Native music is, Bee created the Boyz from the Rez, an integrated Native/African American rap group. Bee is the group's producer, writer, and spokesperson. "After Columbus, 95 percent of my people were wiped out, so most people think about us in stereotypical images they got from Hollywood movies. That's what we're trying to change with our music. Native music is an expression of a living tradition; to keep it alive you've got to honor the old ways, but you have to leave room for contemporary expression too. We have to draw people in and educate them about the things Native culture has to offer."

what's available: Reservation of Education ♪♪♪ (Warrior, 1993, prod. Robbie Bee) gives you a good idea of the sounds Native youth find appealing; there's powwow drumming and chanting, rock guitar, and streetwise lyrics that detail the joys and trials of everyday life, pulled together by the group's solid hip-hop beats.

influences:
⏮ Xit, Redbone, Run-D.M.C., Litefoot ⏭ Natay

see also: Xit

j. poet

Beenie Man

Ragga

Born Anthony Moses Davis, August 22, 1972, in Kingston, Jamaica. Based in Kingston, Jamaica.

"Beenie" is Jamaican patois for "tiny." And that's what Beenie Man was when he started toasting (reggae-rapping) as a precocious five-year-old and released his first album five years later—appropriately titled The Invincible Beenie Man: The Ten-Year-Old DJ Wonder. Not so today. After woodshedding in relative obscurity with the Black Star Sounds outfit for a number of years after his novelty status waned with puberty, the adult-size Beenie Man is now a star as massive as the crowds that pack the dancehalls to hear him.

Beenie Man's microphone redemption began in 1989 when he started a long and prosperous association with the Shocking Vibes label and producer Patrick Roberts. This gave him the sounds, but as with professional wrestlers and boxers, a little controversy and an avowed enemy are sure-fire ways to build your hard-core fanbase. In the footsteps of Derrick Morgan's famed feud with Prince Buster in the '60s, Beenie Man took aim at Bounty Killer and his gun-celebrating lyrics with Beenie's 1994 "No Mama, No Cry," a moving elegy to slain deejay Pan Head. When the two engaged in a microphone clash on Face to Face, both benefited from the battle.

Since then Beenie Man has released more #1 hits than any artist in Jamaican music history. The 1995 single "Slam," a bawdy tribute to the sexual power and mystique of the "real ghetto gal," was the most popular song in Jamaica for nearly two years, and to this day sends women of all skin shades and classes onto the dancefloor for some serious winding and grinding. For the guys, 1996's boastful "Nuff Gal" celebrated male promiscuity in a surprisingly clever fashion for an otherwise juvenile topic, and was another huge hit. In '97, Beenie Man voiced the scorching theme song to the critically acclaimed Jamaican film Dancehall Queen. It too reached and held the #1 spot, and Beenie Man was named the top deejay in Jamaica for the third straight year. In '98, Beenie's success was surprising even to him. He recorded the single "Who Am I? (Sim Simma)" at Jeremy Harding's "beenie" 2 Hard studio/apartment in Kingston. The record was the unlikely indie success story of the year, reached #1 in Jamaica (of course!), and became the first independently produced and marketed ragga (digital reggae) cut to blitz into the American Top 40.

what to buy: The Many Moods of Moses ♪♪♪♪ (V.P., 1998, prod. Patrick Roberts) is his greatest work and without a doubt one of the most fully realized ragga albums ever made. On top of the aforementioned "Who Am I?" it includes the wicked "Woman A Sample" with Buju Banton; "Steve Biko," an uplifting tribute to the slain anti-apartheid activist; and "Ain't Gonna Figure It Yet," a country song recorded in Nashville! Also ambitious and deserving of big-ups is Maestro ♪♪♪♪ (V.P., 1996, prod. Patrick Roberts), which ranges from fist-pumping roots-conscious anthems ("Africans," "Jerusalem"), to horny dancehall barnburners ("Nuff Gal"), all the way to the utterly singular "Blackboard," which makes striking use of mariachi trumpets and groovealicious percussion.

what to buy next: Beenie Man's comeback album Cool Cool Rider ♪♪♪ (V.P., 1993, prod. Patrick Roberts) was also the release that made Shocking Vibes (the disc's Jamaican label and production crew) one of the hottest properties on the island. His heavyweight championship bout with Bounty Killer on Face to Face ♪♪♪ (V.P., 1994, prod. Patrick Roberts) provides consistently enthralling chat action. And his brief flirtation with a major label resulted in the mic-ripping Blessed ♪♪♪ (Island, 1995, prod. various), with "Slam" as its centerpiece.

the rest:

The Ten-Year-Old DJ Wonder ♪♪ (Bunny Lee, 1981)

(With Triston Palmer and Dennis Brown) Three Against War ♪♪♪ (V.P., 1994)

hammered dulcimers worldwide

Fortunately for those who have never seen a hammered dulcimer (also called "hammer dulcimer"), it is a relatively simple instrument to describe. It consists of metal strings stretched horizontally across a shallow wooden box, generally trapezoidal in shape, which acts as a resonator. The strings vary in length and are struck with wooden mallets (hammers) to produce tones that vary in pitch. A typical hammered dulcimer has two or three strings per course, tuned in unison, similar to a piano. The word "dulcimer" comes from the Greek dulce, or "sweet," and the Latin melos, or "song." The hammered dulcimer has a well-documented history in America, dating back to colonial times, and its European-Asian relatives include the German hackbrett, the Hungarian cimbalom, the Greek santouri, the Arabic santir, and the Indian santoor. Some of the hammered dulcimer's virtuosos include the USA's Karen Ashbrook and India's Shiv Kumar Sharma.

see also: Karen Ashbrook, Shiv Kumar Sharma

Heidi Cerrigione

Beenie Man Meets Mad Cobra ♪♪♪ (V.P., 1995)
All the Best ♪♪♪ (Jamaican Authentic Classics, 1995)
Dis Una Fi Hear ♪♪ (Hightone, 1995)
Defend It ♪♪½ (V.P., 1995)
(With Spragga Benz) Best of 2 Badd DJs ♪♪½ (V.P., 1997)
The Doctor N/A (V.P., 1999)

worth searching for: Based on his notorious hit "Slam," Beenie Man recorded a hilarious and controversial radio jingle called "Nuff Slam," promoting a condom named after said hit and packaged with the words "Slam Country" printed over the Jamaican flag. The usual "patriotic" protests were registered; bootleg tapes of the ditty are in circulation.

influences:
⏮ Louise "Miss Lou" Bennett, U-Roy, Wayne Smith, Yellowman, Cassius Clay/Muhammed Ali
⏭ Red Rat, Goofy, Kid Kurrupt

see also: Buju Banton, Dennis Brown, Barrington Levy

Todd Shanker

Jay Begaye

Traditional Native American

Born in Steamboat Canyon, AZ, USA. Based on the Chopaka Reserve, British Columbia, Canada.

Jay Begaye is a Navajo Din'e singer, songwriter, artist, sculptor, and founder of the Cathedral Lakes Singers, one of the best-known drum groups on the powwow trail. Although he grew up in a traditional manner, Begaye didn't get interested in singing and performing until he attended a powwow in Salt Lake City in 1981. The power of the drum groups he saw that day inspired his first song and led him to found the Cathedral Lakes Singers. In 1987 Begaye moved with his wife to the Chopaka Reserve in British Columbia, where he has developed a style that links American and Canadian Native traditions. Begaye is also a well-known artist and sculptor.

what's available: A mostly solo recording of Native praise songs, Honoring Our Ways ♪♪♪♪ (SOAR, 1995, prod. Tom Bee) allows non-Indians to appreciate the beauty of Native melodies and the simple power of Native singing styles. On The Beauty Way ♪♪♪½ (SOAR, 1997, prod. Steven Butler), Begaye's double-tracked tenor has a pure, clear quality that makes these songs quietly appealing. A small drum is used on a few songs, and one, the love song "Dearest Sweetheart," features the Cathedral Lakes Singers.

influences:
⏮ A. Paul Ortega, Snake River Singers

j. poet

M'Bilia Bel

Soukous

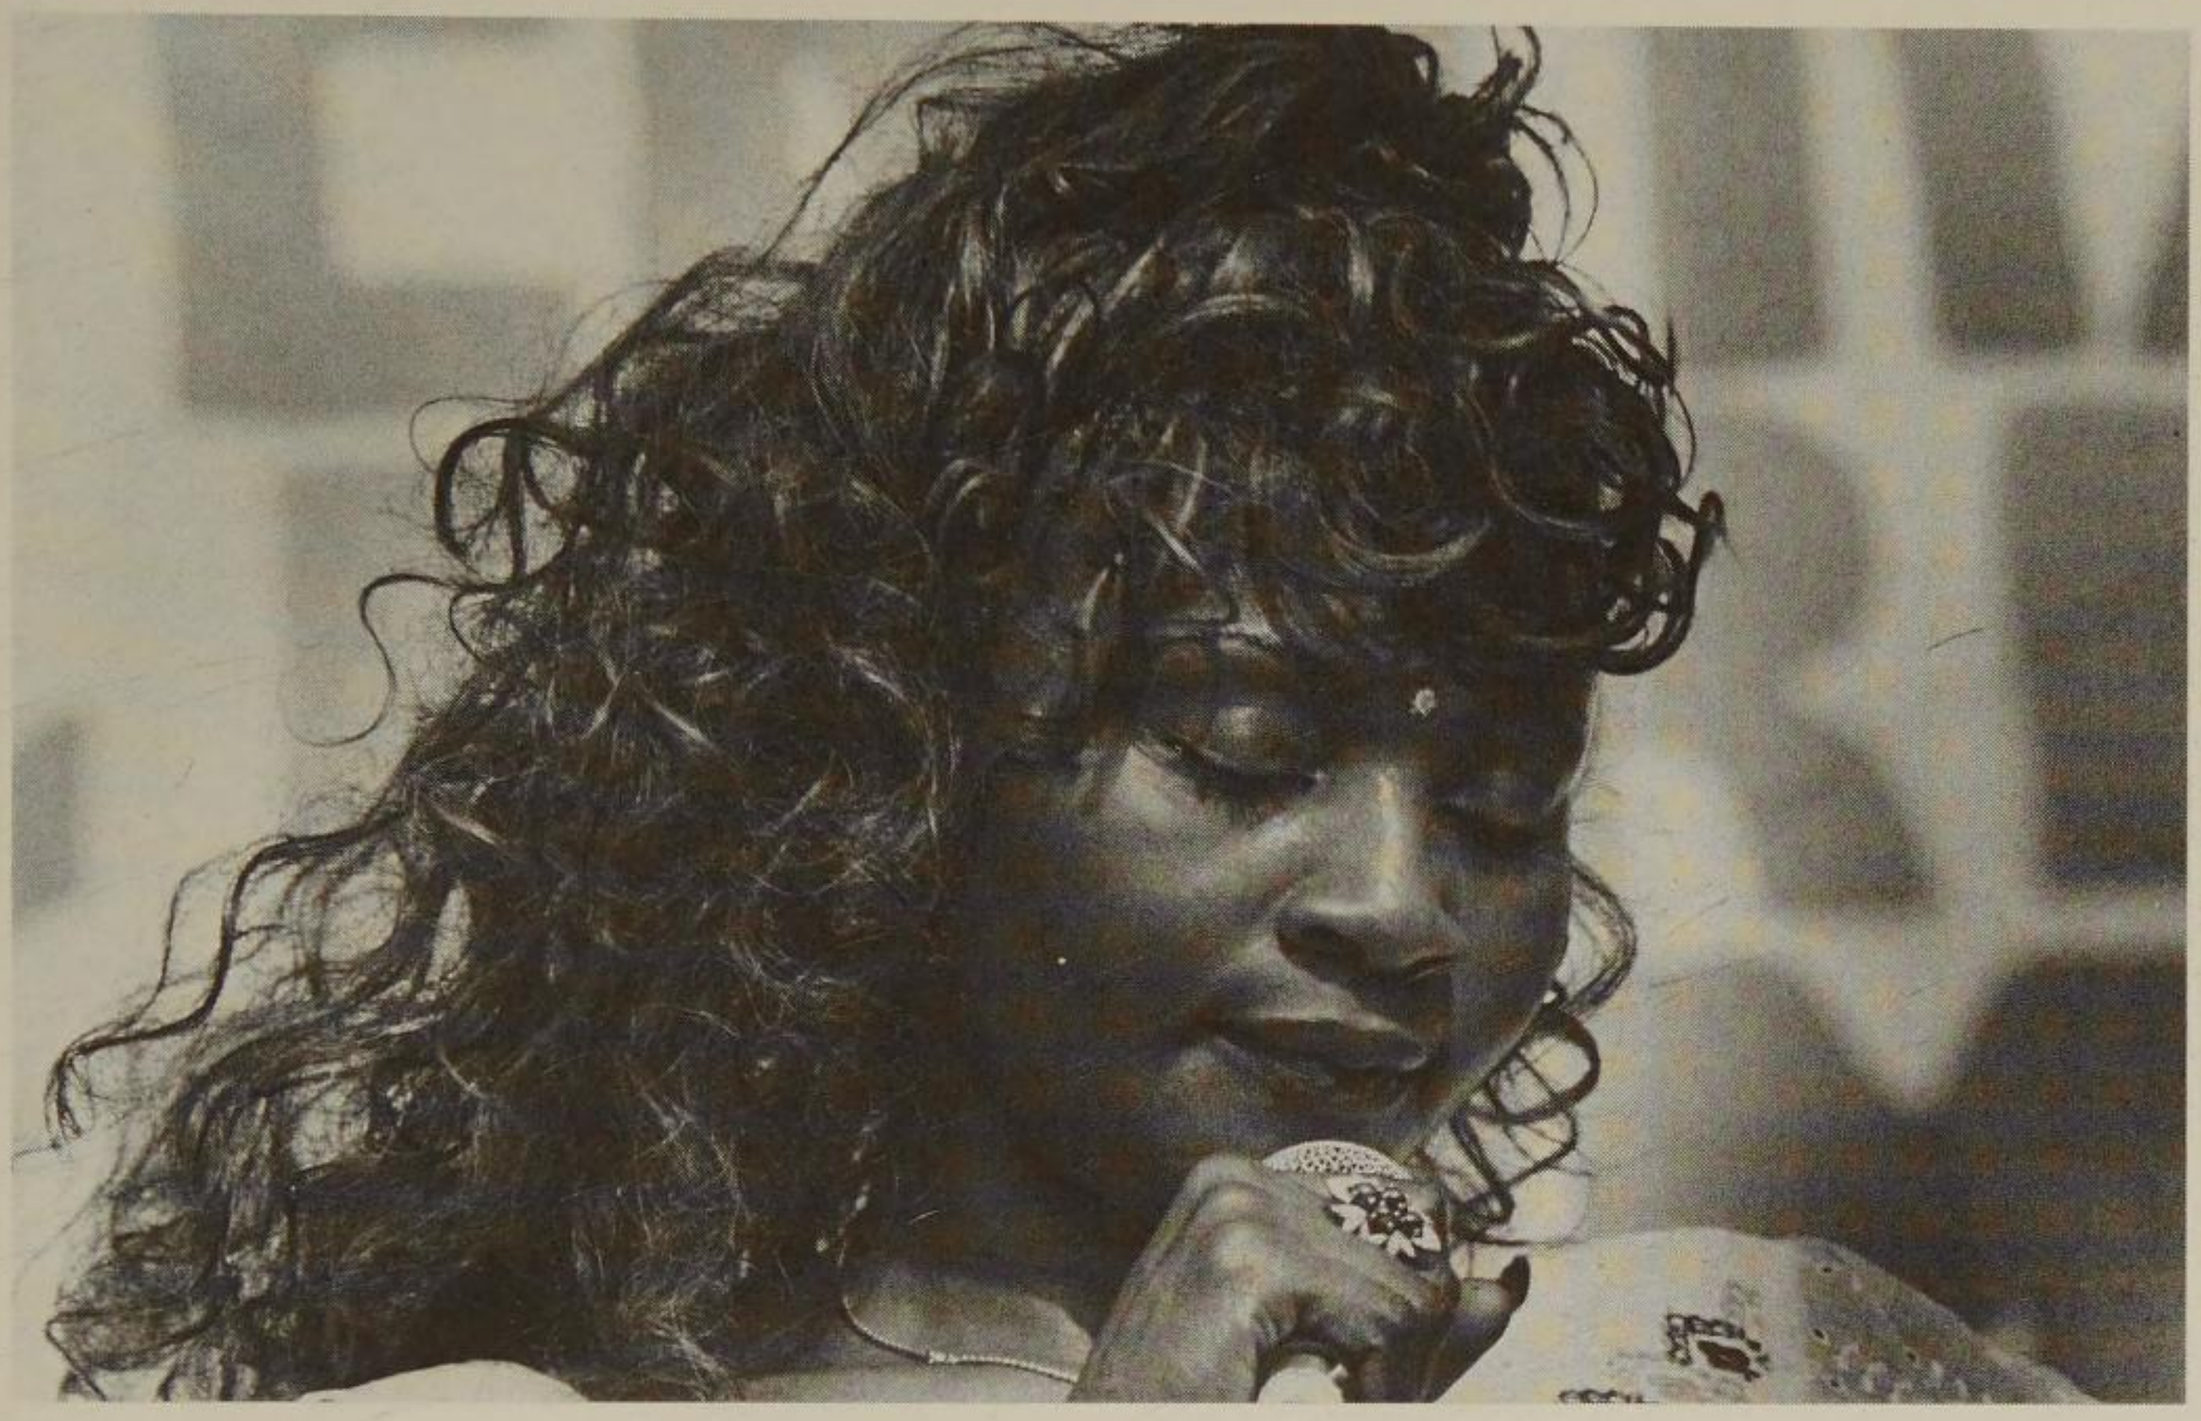
Born January 10, 1959, in Kinshasa, Zaire (now Congo). Based in Paris, France.

M'Bilia Bel rose from backup dancer to most popular woman singer in French-speaking Africa in the 1980s. Her mentor was the Congolese legend Tabu Ley Rochereau, who picked her out when she was dancing behind the soukous (African rumba) singer Abeti Masekini. Masekini was a successful band leader and the creator of the "sakossa" rhythm, and Bel had been working with her for four years. Under Rochereau's tutelage she developed her singing while performing with his band Afrisa. He first introduced her to audiences by singing duets with her and eventually letting her front the band. In 1983, still under the firm control of Rochereau, she released her first solo record. Her songs brought a woman's perspective to controversial topics like divorce and polygamous marriages. When her first child was born she took time off from solo recording but continued to collaborate with Rochereau, eventually completing seven albums with him. Their creative partnership came to an end in 1988. Since then she has followed the path of many Francophone African musicians and relocated to Paris, where she has worked with guitar giant Rigo Star. Between 1988 and 1990 she toured throughout the U.S., Europe, and West Africa. More recently she has experimented with different combinations of Western elements and the soukous sound, with varied results.

what to buy: Originally released in 1988, Phenomene ♪♪♪♪♪ (IMA, 1996, prod. Rigo Star, M'Bilia Bel) is the declaration of independence, full blown, with swingin' singin' and rich dance grooves. It's a little less wound-up than most of the soukous records of the time, and there is a sweetness reminiscent of the genre's late, lamented luminary M'Pongo Love.

what to buy next: Bameli Soy ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1987, prod. M'Bilia Bel, Tabu Ley Rochereau), recorded near the end of her work with Rochereau, gives a good idea of what their collaboration was like, though it is essentially a solo work. The band is crisp and tight and Bel's voice lilts over the groove. Another great set, this one from longer before her solo breakout, is Tabu Ley et M'Bilia Bel ♪♪♪♪ (Shanchie, 1984, prod. Tabu Ley Rochereau)—something on the order of George Jones/Tammy Wynette or maybe Porter Wagoner/Dolly Parton, only backed by a tight soukous orchestra.

the rest:
Eswi Yo Wapi ♪♪♪♪ (GEN, 1983)
Loyenghe ♪♪♪ (Sonodisc, 1984)
Boya Ye ♪♪♪♪ (GEN, 1985)
Beyanga ♪♪♪ (Sonodisc, 1986)
Ba Gerants Ya Mabala ♪♪♪ (Sonodisc, 1986)
8/10 Benedicta ♪♪♪♪ (Sonodisc, 1987)



M'Bilia Bel

Contre Ma Volonte ♪♪ (Sonodisc, 1987)
Kenya/Cadence Mudanda ♪♪♪♪ (Sonodisc, 1994)

influences:
Abeti Masekini, Bora Uzima, Yenga Moseka

see also: Tabu Ley Rochereau, Rigo Star

Jared Snyder

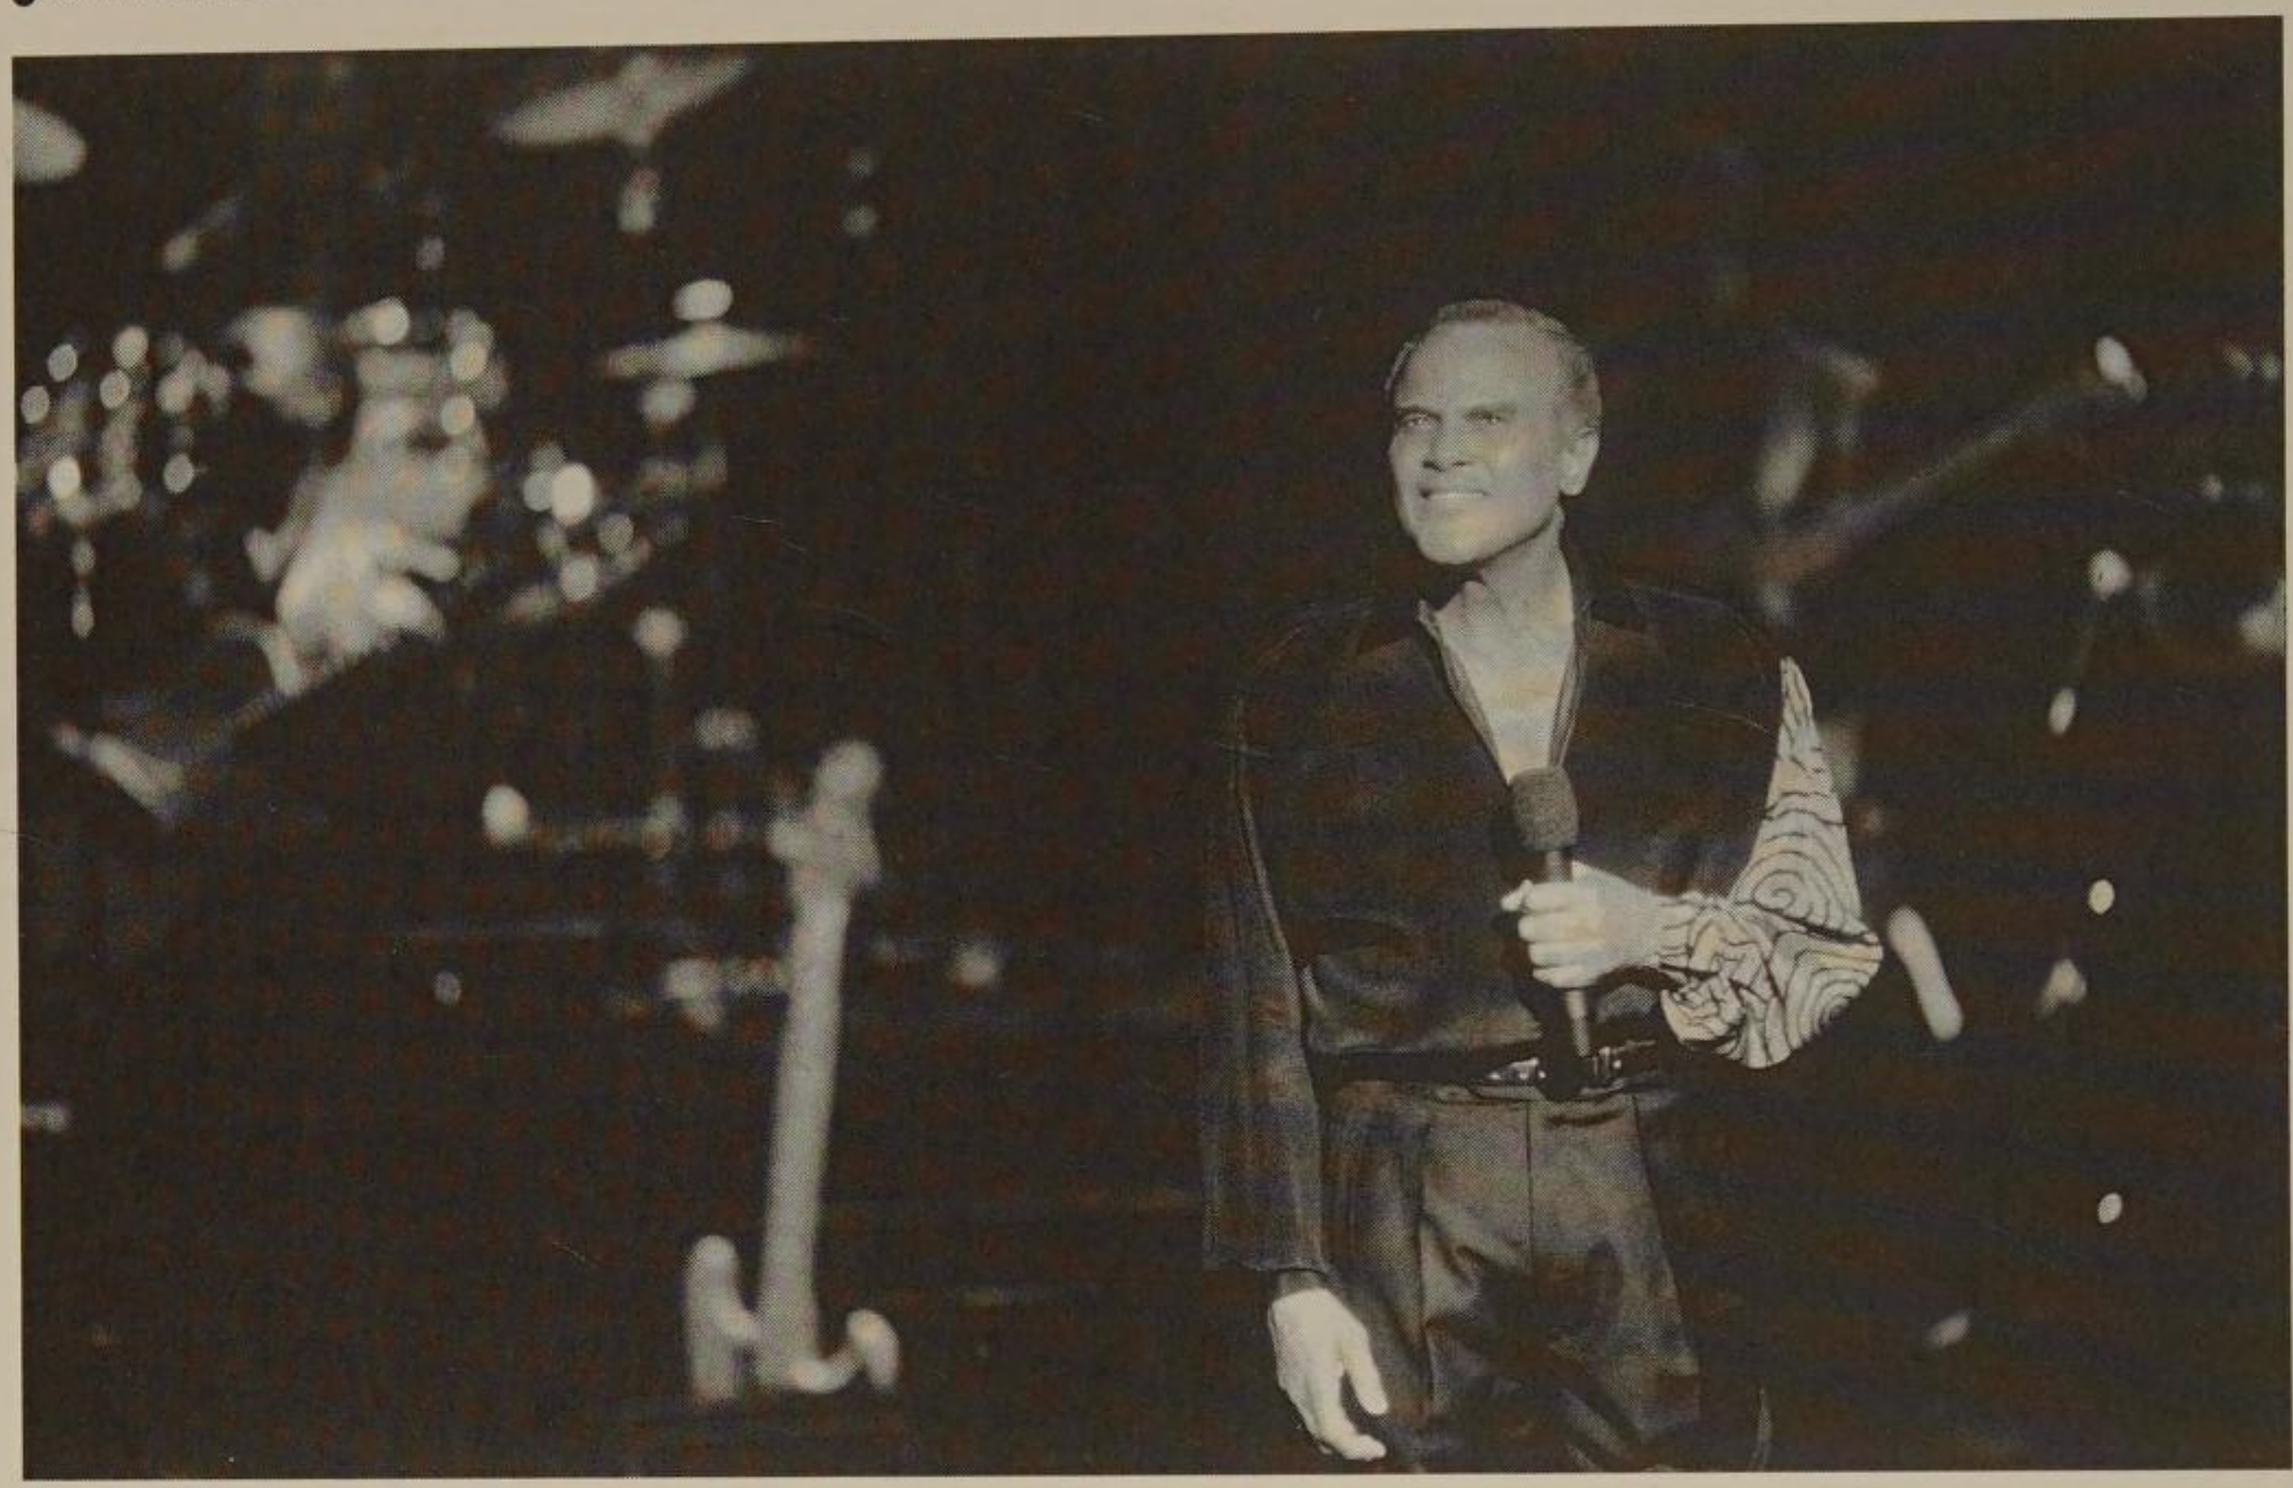
Harry Belafonte

International folk

Born Harold George Belafonte, March 1, 1927, in New York, NY, USA. Based in USA.

Whether you consider him primarily a singer, an actor, or a humanitarian, there's no disputing that Harry Belafonte is one of the most beloved entertainers of the 20th century. A native New Yorker, he spent his formative years in Jamaica, where he was exposed to the Caribbean folk music he later made hugely popular across the globe. While Belafonte is forever identified by his signature tune "Day-O (The Banana Boat Song)," several other songs associated with him ("Matilda," "Jamaica Farewell") have also become standards in both the folk and easy-listening canons. Belafonte first came to singing via acting. After his U.S. Navy service in World War II, he studied theater and started landing singing roles. His voice caught the attention of a club owner, and soon Belafonte was touring the nation as a nightclub singer with a pop repertoire. In the early 1950s, Belafonte lent his diverse talents to a number of projects, while further embracing folk standards. He won a Tony in 1953, but it wasn't until the incredible success of his 1956 albums Belafonte and Calypso that he became a household name. In fact, Calypso, a collection of songs from the West Indies, was lodged at the top of the Billboard album charts for 31 weeks, ending up as the first million-seller by a single artist. Belafonte refused to be typecast as a calypso singer, though, releasing pure calypso albums only at five-year intervals, in 1961, '66, and '71. In the years between, Belafonte explored a mind-boggling range of musical styles, tackling blues, chain-gang hymns, Gershwin standards, Christmas carols, cowboy ballads, and Hebrew love songs. He also continued acting, becoming the first African American to win an Emmy in 1960 and appearing in numerous films. Though his output and commercial appeal slowed somewhat by the late '60s (his last Top 40 album was in 1964), he continued to be an influential performer as well as a tireless humanitarian and activist. Belafonte was one of the prime movers behind the USA for Africa recording session that led to 1986's inescapable "We Are the World" single. An appearance on the Marlo Thomas–organized Free to Be You and Me album and special in 1972 (a '70s elementary school staple), and Winona Ryder's lip-synching to "Jump in Line (Shake, Shake Senora)" in 1989's Beetlejuice have further introduced him to new audiences.

7/4 harry belafonte



Harry Belafonte

what to buy: The album that made Belafonte's name synonymous with its title genre, Calypso ♪♪♪♪♪ (RCA, 1956, prod. various) is an unadulterated joy, from the fun drumbeat of "Day-O" to the poignant pennywhistle of "Jamaica Farewell" to the surprisingly feminist sentiment of "Man Smart (Woman Smarter)." All-Time Greatest Hits, Vols. 1–3 ♪♪♪♪♪ (RCA, 1987, prod. various) is an even more definitive package of over 50 Belafonte classics, highlighting his ability to seamlessly and successfully cross genres. Belafonte at Carnegie Hall ♪♪♪♪♪ (RCA, 1959, prod. Bob Bollard) captures the artist in legendary form on what was the first commercially successful live album.

what to buy next: Belafonte Returns to Carnegie Hall ♪♪♪♪ (Mobile Fidelity, 1960) marks a triumphant homecoming to the venerable concert hall for what was scheduled to be its last event. On his second all-calypso album, Jump Up Calypso ♪♪♪♪ (RCA, 1961, prod. Bob Bollard), Belafonte proves that his earlier foray into the music of the islands was no fluke. His most recent collection of original material, Paradise in Gazankulu ♪♪♪♪ (EMI America, 1988, prod. Hilton Rosenthal), finds Belafonte newly recharged, recording anti-apartheid music in Johannesburg with South African musicians.

what to avoid: As charming as he is, Belafonte's To Wish You a Merry Christmas ♪♪ (RCA, 1962), a compilation of 19 holiday classics, grates on the nerves.

best of the rest:
Three for Tonight (O.S.T.) ♪♪♪ (RCA, 1955)
Evening with Belafonte/Mouskouri ♪♪♪ (RCA Victor, 1966)
Island in the Sun ♪♪♪½ (Pair, 1990)

An Evening with Harry Belafonte ♪♪♪ (PolyGram, 1997)
With Miriam Makeba & Odetta ♪♪♪½ (A World of Music, 1998)

worth searching for: An out-of-print set of folk standards, Midnight Special ♪♪♪½ (RCA, 1962) is notable for being the first album to feature a 20-year-old harmonica player named Bob Dylan, who played on the title track, then quit after clashing with Belafonte.

influences:
- Leadbelly, Woody Guthrie
- The Kingston Trio, Peter, Paul & Mary, the Chad Mitchell Trio, Bob Dylan, Bob Marley

see also: Irving Burgie, Miriam Makeba, Hugh Masekela

Alex Gordon

Derek Bell

Irish traditional

Born 1935, in Belfast, Northern Ireland. Based in Ireland.

If one were to assess the short, soft-spoken, sixtysomething, vaguely rumpled Derek Bell by his appearance, you'd guess he was perhaps a professor of some sort—as indeed he is. You'd be less likely to picture him consorting with Mick Jagger, Van Morrison, and most of the notable cats in Nashville, or opening for the Pope in Dublin—but that's just the beginning of his resume as a member of the Chieftains, Ireland's musical ambassadors to the world. Perhaps uniquely, that country's chief symbol—the image that appears on the flag and the currency—is a musical instrument: the harp, for which Bell has also become famous. However, although he was the son of a fiddler and received a thorough and formal musical education as a youngster, Bell didn't start to play the harp until he was well into his 30s. He played piano and xylophone in his youth and eventually trained on oboe and English horn, graduating from London's Royal College of Music in 1957 and, two years later, earning a degree from Trinity College in Dublin. Despite such deep musical training (or perhaps because of it), and despite the fact that he'd been captivated by the sound of the Irish harp all his life, Bell's career took him elsewhere, leaving the harp as "a reward for goodness to be played in heaven!" But his life-long love for this ancient folk instrument remained unquenched, and one day he borrowed one from the North of Ireland Arts Council and started lessons; by 1965 he had joined the BBC in Belfast as solo harper for its Northern Ireland Orchestra. He eventually became Harp Professor at the Belfast Academy, a position he still holds; but the course of his future was secured in 1972, when he joined an aggregate of folk instrumentalists who called themselves the Chieftains. Bell signed on just as they were about to record their fourth album, a critical point in their early history. It was the first evidence on record of founder and musical director Paddy Moloney's ultimate dream for the band: to mold a repertoire of traditional Irish work into a unique, almost chamber-music ensemble. Indeed, such a group would be unthinkable without a harp player, and Derek Bell has been with the celebrated Chieftains ever since.

what to buy: Carolan's Receipt ♪♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1992, prod. Paddy Moloney) may well be the best of many recordings devoted to the music of Turlough O'Carolan, the 18th-century Irish bardic figure and beloved composer of harp tunes. Here Bell plays the more commonly heard harp strung with nylon or gut strings, but also devotes much of the program to the more ancient wire-strung harp, an instrument with an entirely different timbre and technique. Various members of the Chieftains guest on this delightful album, providing welcome variety among the solo tracks. O'Carolan wrote at a time when the English suppression of Irish culture was relatively relaxed; in those days the indigenous music was popular, as well as the classical music of Italy and the rest of the European continent. His music was characterized by a distinctive blending of these two sensibilities, and it's hard to imagine a more perfect modern interpreter than Derek Bell, in whose nimble fingers the music of the academy and the pub converge.

what to avoid: Unfortunately, Bell forgot the winning formula used on his first collection of O'Carolan's music, and the second, Carolan's Favourite ♪ (Shanachie, 1989, prod. Paddy Moloney), perhaps in an ill-advised attempt to distinguish itself from its predecessor, buries the tang and spontaneity of the composer's music in an over-gentrified, orchestral sugar-coating. Even the stuff without the Belfast Orchestra, while appealing enough, suffers from the curse of all sophomore outings: it's material that wasn't chosen for the first album.

the rest:
Derek Bell's Musical Ireland ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1989)
Ancient Music for the Irish Harp ♪♪♪½ (Claddagh, 1996)
Mystic Harp ♪♪♪ (Crystal Clarity, 1996)
A Celtic Evening ♪♪♪♪ (Clarity Sound & Light, 1998)
Mystic Harp 2: Sailing the Blue ♪♪♪ (Clarity Sound & Light, 1999)

influences:
- Sheila Larchet-Cuthbert, Seamus Ennis
- Patrick Ball, Kim Robertson, Sheila Woods, Maire Ní Chathasaigh

see also: The Chieftains

Chris Rietz

Bembeya Jazz

Manding swing dance orchestra

Formed 1961, in Beyla, Guinea. Disbanded 1991.

Large rotating membership over several decades, principally including: Aboubacar Demba Camara (died 1973), lead vocals; Sekou "Bembeya" Diabaté, guitar; Sekouba "Bambino" Diabaté, lead vocals (1980s). (All members are from Guinea.)

Following its independence from France, Guinea became a vital center for the emerging dance music of post-colonial West Africa. No band contributed more to the new genres than Orchestre Bembeya Jazz, named for a river in eastern Guinea where the group formed, far from the capitol of Conakry. The prevailing models for dance bands at the time were Cuban son and Congolese rumba outfits. But Guinea's fiercely nationalistic leader, Sekou Touré, insisted that local bands find ways to incorporate indigenous African music into their styles, and Bembeya Jazz proved an inspired trailblazer. The group managed to adapt many sounds, especially the gusty, majestic vocals and hypnotically cycling melodies of the Manding griots (oral historians), traditional praise singers and musical virtuosos since ancient times.

Bembeya sacrificed none of the dance drive of Latin rhythms, while delivering distinctly Guinean music with an emotional depth that resonated far beyond the country's borders. Not only did Bembeya soon begin winning national Biennale talent festivals, but in 1963 the group performed in that mecca of musical influence from and on Africa, Cuba, where local singing star Abelardo Barroso is said to have cried upon hearing the voice of Bembeya's lead singer, Aboubacar Demba Camara. After a sensational 12-year run, Bembeya was devastated when Camara died in a car accident while returning from a concert in Dakar, Senegal. As the group revived in the late '70s, the spotlight fell more and more squarely on its sensational lead guitarist, Sekou "Bembeya" Diabaté, also dubbed "Diamond Fingers" for his fleet fretwork.

Following Sekou Touré's death in 1984, Guinea liberalized and Bembeya managed to tour some in Europe and once in the U.S., in 1988. But during the '90s big bands became less and less economically feasible, and one by one, all the remaining orchestras of Conakry folded. Some Bembeya alumni have gone on to solo careers. Diamond Fingers continues to record and perform in various formations, and Sekouba "Bambino" Diabaté, who began as a talented young vocalist in Bembeya's late-'80s edition, is now a strong contender for the title of Guinea's most popular living singer.

what's available: Bembeya Jazz National ♪♪♪♪ (Sonodisc, 1993) offers a richly varied sampling of the final formation of this historic band. Big horns, liquid electric guitar, and an excellent cross-section of Guinea grooves.

worth searching for: Any 1970s recordings from Guinea's Bolibana label that you can find on vinyl or reissue CDs are worth owning. Sonodisc has released some over the years, though few remain in print. Sekou "Bembeya" Diabaté's Diamond Fingers ♪♪♪♪ (Dakar Sound, 1995) offers a beautiful acoustic set—gorgeous guitar; no vocals. Samba Gaye ♪♪♪ (Dakar Sound, 1997), featuring accomplished jalimuso (female jali or griot) Djanka Diabaté, is Diamond Fingers' play at being a star by Guinea's new rules—i.e. without a regular band. Not up to classic Bembeya Jazz, but a respectable effort.

influences:
- Sekouba "Bambino" Diabaté

see also: Sekouba "Bambino" Diabaté

Banning Eyre

Jorge Ben /Jorge Ben Jor

Samba, "suingue"

Born Julio Duilio Lima Menezes, March 22, 1945, in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. Based in São Paulo, Brazil.

At 18 Jorge Ben still couldn't decide if he wanted to be a soccer player or a singer. It didn't matter, though. It was the mid-'60s, Rio was the most beautiful city on earth, and between the beach by day and the bohemian haunts by night, the budding artist exuded the free-spirited nonconformism of the times. He composed sambas, drawing freely from bossa nova and from close associations with the Tropicalismo (protest song) and Jovem Guarda (rock) movements. He added electric guitar to the traditional samba rhythms, and when samba musicians couldn't keep up, he began working with jazz players. His unique approach was dubbed samba esquema novo, meaning "new style samba," and his first full-length record of the same name was an instant hit, featuring the song "Chove Chuva" (immensely popular to this day). The 1970s found Jorge Ben very prolific, gleaning influences from Brazil's varied regional sources and gulping down American funk. It was sometime in the '70s that the term suingue was coined. This Portuguese version of "swing" has nothing to do with the American music genre. In Brazil, if someone has rhythm, knows how to dance, and is generally at home around music, he or she is said to have suingue. The suingue that matured with Jorge Ben in the '70s could be described as samba-funk—an exhilarating dance beat and energetic vocals, often dipping into a spoken singing style reminiscent of the Northeastern repente (not to mention the later Stateside rap). In the '80s Jorge Ben hit the American charts with "Mais, Que Nada" (sung by Sergio Mendes), sued Rod Stewart for ripping off the song "Taj Mahal" (and turning it into "Do Ya Think I'm Sexy?"), and changed his name. He became Jorge Ben Jor in 1989 after discovering royalties lost to American singer George Benson over confusion between their names. With his new identity came a series of highly acclaimed records and a sudden mass popularity that bordered on frenzy, etching his songs into the Brazilian psyche as eternal dancefloor standards.

what to buy: For all his universal appeal, it is disappointing to find but a few of Jorge Ben Jor's 40 albums readily available in the U.S. Live in Rio, Vols. I and II ♪♪♪♪♪ (Warner-Latin, 1992, prod. Pena Schmidt) showcases his sheer power as an entertainer. Old and new classics like "W/Brasil," "Pais Tropical," and "Salve Simpatia" weave seamlessly together, and the audience steps up as the unofficial chorus. A historic recording session in 1975 with Gilberto Gil rendered Gil e Jorge ♪♪♪♪♪ (Verve, 1994). The two masters kicked it for an afternoon and evening and just let the tape roll; the result is at once intimate and expansive, largely acoustic.

what to buy next: The other extreme, World Dance ♪♪♪♪ (Warner-Latin, 1994, prod. Ricky Peterson) paired Ben Jor up with Paisley Park Studios. Some have criticized this album as Americanized, remixed, and remastered to death. We like it though, and Ben Jor's music certainly lends itself to technical enhancement. For a fresh listen, try 23 ♪♪♪♪½ (Warner-Latin, 1994, prod. Pena Schmidt), featuring the original tight, brassy executions of "Engenho de Dentro" and "Alcohol."

best of the rest:
Big Ben ♪♪♪♪ (Philips, 1965)
Jorge Ben ♪♪♪♪½ (Philips, 1969)
Ben ♪♪♪♪♪ (Philips, 1972)
A Tabua Da Esmeralda ♪♪♪♪♪ (Philips, 1974)
Africa Brasil ♪♪♪♪½ (Philips, 1976)
Tropical ♪♪♪♪ (Philips, 1977)
A Banda Do Ze Pretinho ♪♪♪♪ (Som Livre, 1978)
Salve Simpatia ♪♪♪♪½ (Som Livre, 1979)
Ben Vinda Amizade ♪♪♪♪½ (Som Livre, 1981)
Dadiva ♪♪♪♪½ (Som Livre, 1983)
Ben Jor ♪♪♪♪½ (Warner, 1989)
Homosapiens ♪♪♪½ (Sony/CBS, 1995)

worth searching for: Samba Esquema Novo ♪♪♪♪½ (Philips, 1963) is largely a bossa-nova album, a privileged glimpse into Ben Jor's beginnings, and almost impossible to find outside of Brazil. Features "Por Causa de Voce, Menina."

influences:
⏮ João Gilberto, Wilson Simonal, Bezerra da Silva ⏭ Carlinhos Brown, Fernanda Abreu

see also: Gilberto Gil

Mara Weiss and Nego Beto

Mary Bergin /Dordan

Celtic

Born September 13, 1949, in Dublin, Ireland. Dordan formed 1991, in Galway, Ireland. Based in Galway, Ireland.

Mary Bergin, flute, whistle, fiddle; Kathleen Loughnane, harp, synthesizer; Dearbhaill Standun, fiddle, viola, spoken word; Martina Goggin, vocals, percussion, guitar (1996–present). (All members are from Ireland.)

Mary Bergin is the undisputed queen of the Irish tin whistle. Her astounding technique and beautiful repertoire have defined tin whistle playing in Irish music for the past 30 years and have set a new standard for the instrument. Born in Dublin, she grew up hearing traditional music both at home and on family vacations in the west of Ireland, where she fell under the spell of legendary musicians like Willie Clancy and Junior Crehan. She began playing as a young girl and soon developed her own unique style, winning the All-Ireland title while in her late teens. After playing briefly with Ceoltoiri Laighean, a group that melded traditional and classical music in the manner of the Chieftains, she moved to Galway, married, and pursued a solo career. Her debut album, Feadoga Stain, was an instant classic, redefining the role of the tin whistle and propelling her to the front of the traditional music scene in Ireland. Since that time she has toured as a solo artist, with De Dannan, and with Joe and Antoinette McKenna of Sean Nua. She has also recorded a second solo album. In 1991 Bergin became a founder of her own ensemble, Dordan. Playing a combination of baroque pieces and Irish dance tunes, the group has recorded three albums and toured in Ireland, England, and the U.S. Bergin continues to perform and record both solo and with Dordan, and can often be found teaching tin whistle at music camps in the U.S. and Ireland.

what to buy: Feadoga Stain ♪♪♪♪♪ (Gael-Linn, 1976/ Shanachie, 1992, prod. Michael O'hEidhin) is a classic of Irish music and should be among the first albums purchased by anyone with a serious interest in the tradition. At the time of this album's original release, there had been only a few full-length recordings of tin whistle music, the instrument being taken somewhat less seriously than its cousins the flute and the uilleann pipes. Bergin's debut album changed forever the whistle's status in the genre. Driving, lyrical, and tasteful, Feadoga Stain set a new standard for tin whistle playing, exploring different keys and pushing the simple instrument to its limits. Bergin rips through reels and jigs with awesome grace and precision at a breakneck speed, and pulls every bit of soul out of a pair of ancient airs. Accompanied by De Dannan's Ringo McDonough and Alec Finn, Bergin plays Irish music on this recording with as much power, elegance, and style as anyone before or after.

what to buy next: Feadoga Stain 2 ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1992, prod. Mary Bergin) shows Bergin is still an awesome musician 15 years later. The guest list is a little bigger this time, with appearances by the McKennas and Dordan. The sound is a little fuller as well, with uilleann pipes, guitar, and even bass on a few tracks. The whistle playing, of course, is at the same high standard, with her exquisite taste in tunes and arrangements always on display. The Night Before . . . A Celtic Christmas ♪♪♪♪ (Narada, 1997/1998, prod. Dordan) is Dordan's third album and their first holiday collection, as well as their first to feature vocals. The group's mix of classical and traditional styles works to great effect on Christmas material, remaining tasteful without sinking into safe holiday dullness. Their selection—several originals mixed with some traditional Irish holiday music—is well chosen and arranged to allow each of the members to show off their considerable skills (especially on Tommy Coen's reel, "Christmas Eve.") Guests Steve Cooney and Johnny Connolly, on guitar and accordion respectively, provide some extra punch, and the addition of Goggin's warm alto voice brings a new dimension to the group's sound.

what to avoid: Irish Traditional and Baroque ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1991, prod. Jackie Small) is Dordan's debut album. A pleasant collection that introduced the group's syncretic blend of baroque and traditional music to the world, the record features some tasty individual playing but never really cuts loose. Some standard works by Handel, Bach, and Purcell, among others, are presented alongside traditional Irish tunes and one piece composed by the group. This was a solid premiere, making explicit the links between the two genres, but it has been overshadowed by the group's subsequent releases.

the rest:
Dordan:
Celtic Aire N/A (Narada, 1999)

worth searching for: Jigs to the Moon ♪♪♪♪ (Gael-Linn, 1994, prod. Dordan) was Dordan's second album and a deeper, more successful exploration of the common ground between baroque and Irish music. The group plays a German chaconne, a sonatina by the Czech composer Dussek, and a whole bunch of Turlough O'Carolan tunes in conjunction with a few traditional waltzes, reels, and jigs. Highlights include a stately version of Jerry Holland's beautiful waltz, "My Cape Breton Home," and a set of polkas drawn from English, Irish, and Austrian sources. Unfortunately, it seems that the band's sound, part Irish, part classical, falls between the marketing cracks in the U.S. Perhaps considered too traditional for the classical market, too reserved for the Irish tunehead crowd, and too serious for the new-agers, this album has yet to see release in the States.

influences:
⏮ Willie Clancy, Tom McHaile, Seamus Ennis

⏭ Sean Ryan, Kevin Crawford, Hesperus

see also: De Dannan, Seán Ó Riada, Sean Nua

Tony Ziselberger and Kerry Dexter

Maria Bethânia

Tropicalismo, MPB (Brazilian Popular Music)

Born Maria Vianna Telles Veloso, 1946, in Santo Amaro da Purificaco, Bahia, Brazil. Based in Salvador, Bahia, Brazil.

If not for a little brotherly nepotism, Brazil would have lost Maria Bethânia—one of its most beloved, influential, and enduring singers—to the theater stage. Although Moms and Pops Veloso were professional singers and sibling Caetano a guitar/songwriting prodigy, the teenaged Maria's only dream was to be a famous dramatic actress. Her budding theatrical career brought her to Salvador in 1963. Two years later, Caetano persuaded her to join the cast of a musical he was scoring. Bethânia's show-stopping rendition of his "Carcara" won her critical accolades; the single version made her an overnight national sensation. Ever the iconoclast, Bethânia refused to play the pop-star game, opting instead for the life of the cult musician. In the late '60s the two siblings hooked up with like-minded hippie freaks Gilberto Gil and Gal Costa. Together, the quartet revolutionized Brazilian pop music with a sound they called Tropicalismo. Conceived in a nation under military rule, Tropicalismo was a provocative mix of Beatles-baroque arrangements, jazzy mood swings, and allusions to social injustices subversively cloaked in "love" and "party" lyrical metaphors. A feel-good radio music that soon sparked a status-quo-defying youth movement, Tropicalismo was summarily banned by the government, and its male stars (Veloso and Gil) went into European exile. Back home Maria continued to sing Tropicalismo . . . in her own way. Gifted with an emotionally expressive, sensuously intimate, warmly burnished contralto, she cunningly made her political statements through visual symbolism (the flowing hair, simple ankle-length dresses, and barefoot humility of the common folk), dramatic gesture, and vocal nuance. In 1978, despite all attempts at dodging commercial acceptance, Bethânia's album Alibi made her a major star. A collection of intense love songs written by the likes of Chico Buarque and Djavan, Alibi not only became Brazil's first million-selling album by a female artist, it's also the numero uno MPB disc of all time. Today with more than 30 albums' worth of masterful interpretative songs in her discography, Maria Bethânia is still standing tall, stone immaculate.

what to buy: Even though most of Bethânia's albums are either out of print or unavailable in the States, Ambar ♪♪♪♪♪ (Metro Blue, 1996, prod. Guto Graça Mello) is the pick of the domestic litter. There's not a duff cut in the total mix; absolutely, totally essential.

what to buy next: Though recorded in Los Angeles, As Canções Que Você Fez Pra Mim ♪♪♪♪ (PolyGram Latino, 1994, prod. Guta Graça Mello) is nevertheless a satisfying Bethânia-does–Sarah Vaughan experience . . . once you surrender to the orchestral strings/slick brass overkill. Simply the Best of Maria Bethânia ♪♪♪ (Verve, 1990, prod. various) is a compilation of the singer's earliest hits (1971–85, including "Alibi"). The roots of a living legend.

worth searching for: A near-invisible French import, Maria ♪♪♪♪ (Ruda Records, 1985, prod. Nancy Ypsilants) is subsumed in Africa-to-Brazil rhythms and spirits. Showcasing some of her most exquisite vocals, the album is essential for "A Terra Tremeu/Ofa"—her Candomblé-meets-Zulu gospel duet with Ladysmith Black Mambazo—alone.

influences:

◀◀ Gal Costa, Sarah Vaughan, Clara Nunes, Edith Piaf

▶▶ Virginia Rodrigues, Marisa Monte

see also: Jorge Ben, Gal Costa, Djavan, Gilberto Gil, Caetano Veloso

Tom Terrell

V.M. Bhatt /Vishwa Mohan Bhatt

North Indian classical/fusion

Born 1952, in Rajasthan, India. Based in Rajasthan, India.

Vishwa Mohan Bhatt is the younger brother of Ravi Shankar's early pupil Shashi Mohan Bhatt, and thus uncle to the older Krishna Bhatt, an accomplished sitar player. Vishwa, his sister Manju, and Krishna all eventually followed in Shashi's footsteps and learned from the same legendary guru. V.M. (as he is widely known) began studying sitar at the age of five, but in 1967, after 10 years on that instrument and several on violin, his father bought him his first guitar from a visiting German musician at the institute where his father taught, and V.M. never looked back. Soon after, he and Krishna started their own "orchestra," the Bhatt Brothers, in which they played a variety of popular, classical, and Rajasthani folk music—a harbinger of the illustrious, musically diverse career to come. Thinking that the guitar sounded flat compared to the rich, warm tones created by the sitar's sympathetic strings, Bhatt began experimenting with making his own instrument, which eventually came to be known as the Mohan Vina. He modified the guitar by adding several drone strings and eight sympathetic strings, playing it like a Hawaiian slide guitar to allow for the sustained, sliding notes common to the vocal style of Indian classical music. In keeping with his history of radical innovation, the 1990s have seen V.M. Bhatt become a favorite collaborator among fusion-friendly Western musicians, including Béla Fleck, Jerry Douglas, Taj Mahal, and Ry Cooder, with whom he won a Best World Music Album Grammy for 1993's A Meeting by the River.

what to buy: As Bhatt's work can be divided into two distinct categories—Indian classical and genre-bending fusion—your first choice depends largely on which style suits you best. If you're the more purist, traditional type, check out Guitar a la Hindustan ♪♪♪♪♪ (Magnasound/OMI, 1992, prod. Daman Sood), a dazzling collection of four classical ragas featuring nimble accompaniment from tabla drum virtuoso Ustad Sabir Khan. If, however, you've got a fever for the flavor of fusion, there are two must-have collaborations that should top your to-buy list. The aforementioned A Meeting by the River ♪♪♪♪½ (Water Lily Acoustics, 1993, prod. Kavichandran Alexander) is a doozy, with Bhatt's ragas matching Cooder's blues slide-for-slide to create a remarkably fluid East-West connection. Saltanah ♪♪♪♪♪ (Water Lily Acoustics, 1996, prod. Kavichandran Alexander), Bhatt's meeting of the minds with Arabic oud (lute) master Simon Shaheen, is somehow even better, with dizzying solos that point out the inherent similarities in their two musical traditions.

what to buy next: Only slightly less essential is Bourbon & Rosewater ♪♪♪♪ (Water Lily Acoustics, 1995, prod. Kavichandran Alexander), Bhatt's strangely endearing Bengali-gone-bluegrass experiment with New Grass pioneers Jerry Douglas and Edgar Meyer. It's a collaboration that few would expect to work, but once those lightning-fast fingers start picking away at chord progressions that seem to originate in some nether region halfway between Nashville and nirvana, all preconceptions are blown right out the window. An imaginative masterpiece.

what to avoid: Although not a bad album per se, Mumtaz Mahal ♪♪½ (Water Lily Acoustics, 1995, prod. Kavichandran Alexander) sounds somewhat forced, with Bhatt's distinctive sound vastly overshadowed by that of legendary bluesman Taj Mahal. It's an okay outing for hard-core blues fans or diehard Mahal devotees, but Bhatt's talents are mostly wasted, as he is essentially relegated to the role of sideman. An ultimately disappointing effort.

the rest:

Easter Sunday Recital ♪♪♪♪ (Raga, 1990)

Bihag Desh ♪♪♪♪ (Raga, 1991)

(With Tarun Bhattacharya and Ronu Majumdar) Song of Nature ♪♪♪♪½ (Magnasound/OMI, 1992)

Saradanabu (Water Lily Acoustics, 1992)

Gathering Rain Clouds (Water Lily Acoustics, 1994)

(With Béla Fleck and Jie-Beng Chen) Tabula Rasa ♪♪♪½ (Water Lily Acoustics, 1996)

worth searching for: Like most Indian classical musicians, Bhatt has released at least one album back home for every one he has released abroad, so a scouring of local Indian music shops is likely to turn up numerous inspired classical imports, a standout among standouts being The Brilliance of Guitar ♪♪♪♪½ (EMI India, 1994).

Asha Bhosle

influences:

◀◀ Shashi Mohan Bhatt, Ravi Shankar, Ali Akbar Khan

▶▶ Vijay Arun, U. Srinivas

see also: Tarun Bhattacharya, Jie-Beng Chen, Ry Cooder, Simon Shaheen, Ravi Shankar

Bret Love

Tarun Bhattacharya

North Indian classical

Born 1952, in West Bengal, India. Based in Calcutta, India.

Among the most respected figures in the current wave of Hindustani musicians, Tarun Bhattacharya is considered one of India's greatest masters of the santur (a.k.a. santoor), the 100-stringed hammered dulcimer popularized by Shiv Kumar Sharma (and only recently accepted in Indian classical music through his efforts). Trained at an early age by his sitarist father Robi, Bhattacharya went on to hone his skills under the tutelage of Dulal Roy and the aforesaid Sharma. His biggest influence, however, is Ravi Shankar, with whom he has studied for the past 17 years. In addition to expanding Bhattacharya's scope to include the karnatak traditions of South India, Shankar gave the young virtuoso his first big break in 1988, when he asked Bhattacharya to perform with a stellar Indian ensemble at Shankar's historic concert inside the Kremlin. In the last few years, Bhattacharya has primarily collaborated with tabla drum master Bikram Ghosh, and in 1996 the two received standing ovations for their set during the centennial of England's beloved performance series and patriotic event the Promenade Concert. When not recording or touring, Bhattacharya looks after the music academy established by his father in Calcutta.

what to buy: Kirvani ♪♪♪♪♪ (Music of the World, 1996, prod. Bob Haddad) is an awe-inspiring performance worth purchasing just for the 35-minute opening track, "Rag Kirvani." Starting with a host of innovative santur techniques, including finger-plucked chords and a variable pitch made possible by the addition of a lower string, which he presses down and releases to create otherwise impossible glides and sliding sounds, the epic track builds to a mindblowing climax featuring Bhattacharya and Ghosh trading dazzlingly complex riffs. Arguably one of the greatest Indian classical ragas ever captured on tape.

what to buy next: Although his near-telepathic improvisational relationship with Ghosh is sorely missed, Sargam ♪♪♪♪ (Music of the World, 1995, prod. Badal Roy, Bob Haddad) is a fine outing, pairing Bhattacharya's heavenly santur melodies with the wailing notes of Daya Shankar's shehnai (a double-reeded oboe) and Shashank Bakshi's able, if relatively pedestrian, tabla.

the rest:
(With Ravi Shankar) Inside the Kremlin ♪♪♪♪ (Private Music, 1989)
Imaginations ♪♪♪½ (Magnasound, 1996)
(With Bikram Ghosh) Talking Tabla ♪♪♪♪ (Music of the World, 1997)
(With Ravi Shankar) Chants of India ♪♪♪½ (Angel, 1998)

worth searching for: Bhattacharya has put out a host of albums that are available only on import, all of which reward a search—especially his collaborations with fellow Ravi Shankar protégés V.M. Bhatt and Ronu Majumdar.

influences:
◀◀ Robi Bhattacharya, Dulal Roy, Shiv Kumar Sharma, Ravi Shankar

see also: V.M. Bhatt, Bikram Ghosh, Ravi Shankar, Shiv Kumar Sharma

Bret Love

harps worldwide

Along with the flute and the drum, the harp is a truly global instrument that is found, in some form, in almost every culture worldwide. Harps are also very ancient, and have been discovered in sites as old as Mesopotamian burial chambers that date back to the third millennium B.C. Most familiar, of course, are the European harps, which come in a plethora of sizes, string numbers, and tunings, from the relatively small wire-strung Celtic folk harp (the clarsach), to the giant pedal harp that has returned to vogue in Euro/American classical circles in the last few decades. Harps were a central fixture of Irish and Scottish culture from 1000–1400 A.D. Though they were also suppressed in Ireland from the 14th to the 16th century by an increasing English presence, they flourished in Scotland during the same time. Much of traditional Celtic music was originally written for the instrument, including the prolific work of the blind harpist Turlough O'Carolan. The crwth, or Welsh folk harp, dates back to at least the 11th century, and may once have been played with some kind of bow, but is plucked today. In Latin America, the harp has also spread far and wide. Historically, folk harps have been an important part of Andean ensembles, though their popularity has waned somewhat in recent years. Harps are integral as well to the traditional son ensembles of Mexico, which form the foundation for much of that nation's music. The Ethiopian harp, or krar, is another small, handheld instrument that resembles a classical lyre, with five or six strings. Throughout the Middle East and on into Asia are found harp variants such as the santoor, which is played flat with hammers and was brought into Europe as the hammered dulcimer.

see also: Turlough O'Carolan (sidebar)

Michael Parrish

Asha Bhosle

Filmi music

Born 1932, in India. Based in Bombay, India.

Along with her sister, Lata Mangeshkar, Asha Bhosle has been one of the most enduring pop vocalists in the history of Indian music. She has lent her voice to thousands of songs that have appeared in thousands of movies, as well as recording light classical and traditional folk material.

Bombay, India's film capital, produces over 1,000 films a year, each usually containing at least five songs. Even today, Indian films follow traditional ideas about theater and entertainment and there is no distinction between a musical, an adventure epic, or a love story. The principals are as likely to break into song as stage a car chase. Films often rise and fall on the success of their music, so a system of musical directors and playback singers arose in the early days of the industry. Musical directors compose and arrange the music, hire the lyricist, and present their tunes with elaborate production numbers (the first music videos?). And since many actors don't sing, a parallel system of "playback singers" developed, and the singers who dub the vocals for the film stars have also become stars.

Asha Bhosle began singing professionally in the 1940s, when she was only 10, but for years she labored in the shadow of her more famous older sister. Often the best songs by the best directors went to Mangeshkar. The turning point came in the 1950s when the musical director O.P. Nayyar began using Bhosle exclusively and was rewarded with a string of major hits. This opened the doors for Bhosle's collaborations with R.D. Burman, one of the greatest music directors of the 1950s. Bhosle has said that her work with Burman made her dig deeper into her own feelings and made her a better, more emotional singer. In her lengthy career, Bhosle has recorded over 11,800 songs for films, but in recent years, she has stepped back from the highly competitive soundtrack scene to begin recording classical and devotional material. Still straddling as many musical genres as the "Bollywood" films do thematic ones, in 1996 she came to San Francisco to cut a devotional album with Ali Akbar Khan, and she's also done some vocals for club remix projects.

what to buy: Bhosle has thousands of CDs, cassettes, and albums in print, making a farce of any attempt to put together a comprehensive list. The following releases—some new material, some reissued classics—barely scratch the surface, but they're all in print: Songs to Remember ♪♪♪♪½ (EMI India); Tribute to R.D. Burman ♪♪♪♪½ (Multitone U.K.); Bala Main Bairagan Hungi ♪♪♪♪½ (EMI India); Dil Padosi Hai—Hindi Love Songs ♪♪♪♪½ (EMI India); Legacy ♪♪♪♪♪ (AMMP, 1996, prod. Ali Akbar Khan). Many Westerners will only know Bhosle by reference, from the name-check in the Indian fusionist band Cornershop's alterna-pop hit "Brimful of Asha." Now learn what moved them to begin with.

influences:
⏮ Lata Mangeshkar, Geeta Dutt

see also: Ali Akbar Khan

j. poet

Bhundu Boys

Jit

Formed 1980, in Harare, Zimbabwe. Based in Harare, Zimbabwe.

Biggie Tembo (died late 1980s), lead guitar, vocals; Rise Kagona, lead guitar, vocals; Shakie Kangwena (died late 1980s), keyboards, vocals; David Mankaba, bass, vocals; Kenny Chitsvatsva, drums, vocals; Shakespear Kangwena, guitar, keyboard, percussion (1993–96); Washington Kavhai, bass, percussion, vocals (1993–present); Kuda Matimba, keyboard, vocals (1997–present); Gordin Mapika, drums, vocals (1997–present). (All members are from Zimbabwe.)

Bhundu means "bush" or "jungle." When Zimbabwe won its freedom from Britain after a long, vicious war in 1980, many men came home from the bush. It was in an implicit tribute to these freedom fighters that the Bhundu Boys took their name. "We started the band in 1980, the year our country started. We were just boys who wanted to have fun and play cover versions of the music we loved," Shakie Kangwena once said. "We liked the Rolling Stones and hard rock, even though it was the music of a culture that had been imposed upon us from the outside. Even so, there is an element of humanity in all music, so we took from that culture and combined it with our own music."

The Bhundus built their following by taking the more traditional guitar styles of chimurenga made popular by Thomas Mapfumo ("In Zimbabwe we look up to him the way Americans look up to the Beatles," Biggie Tembo said), adding some English/American-style finger-picking and a heavy disco-like bass drum beat, and playing with a lilting, rhythmic swing that's part highlife and part Congolese rumba. Although the songs are sung in Shona, they're constructed around short, rapid-fire bursts of guitar magic, and most of them clock in at around four minutes, making them perfect for radio play or dance-floor aerobics. This hybrid of traditional mbira (thumb piano) music and Western rock was called "jit," and in the early 1980s it was Zimbabwe's dominant pop music.

After their first albums exploded throughout Africa, the Bhundus were signed by Island Records for international distribution, and many people expected them to become the first African guitar heroes to make a dent in the British and American marketplace. In 1987 Scottish booker Gordon Muir brought the Bhundu Boys to the U.K., where they knocked audiences for a loop. With British music-industry heavies like Elvis Costello touting them to the press and with Madonna in their corner, they were soon duplicating the feat in American clubs. But as good as their live shows were, the American music business still rises and falls on hit "product," and with no radio support, save the few local niche-market world-music programs on smaller stations, the promise of the Bhundu Buys soon faded. In the late 1980s Tembo, the band's exuberant leader, and Shakie Kangwena died of AIDS, and while a revamped lineup is still playing clubs and releasing albums in Zimbabwe, the band's glory days are sadly passed.

what to buy: The Bhundus' first album, Shabini ♪♪♪♪♪ (DiscAfrique France, 1986, prod. Steve Roskilly), is an amazing blast of African rock 'n' roll energy; there's not a single weak track. Their global debut, True Jit ♪♪♪♪½ (Mango, 1988, prod. Robin Millar), has slick production values, but the band's energy still kicks serious international butt.

the rest:
Pamberi! ♪♪♪ (Mango, 1989)
Friends on the Road ♪♪♪½ (Cooking Vinyl, 1993)
Muchiyedza ♪♪♪ (Cooking Vinyl, 1997)

worth searching for: The second Bhundu Boys album from Zimbabwe, Tsvimbodzemoto ♪♪♪♪♪ (DiscAfrique, 1987), is as good as their first; if it's not available on CD, look for cassette or vinyl.

Biggie Tembo of the Bhundu Boys

influences:

⏮ Thomas Mapfumo, the Rolling Stones, the Beatles

j. poet

Theodore Bikel

International folk

Born March 2, 1924, in Vienna, Austria.

With a treasure-trove of folksongs and a mastery of 11 languages, Theodore Bikel was one of the originators of "world music." An internationally renowned actor too, Bikel made his deep voice and benevolent bear-like presence felt in many classic films and the original stage production of The Sound of Music, the album from which sold millions of copies. One of folk music's most eclectic performers, Bikel signed with Elektra in the mid-1950s and recorded such thematic albums as From Bondage to Freedom, Yiddish Theater and Folk Songs, Songs of the Russian Gypsy, and Folk Songs from Just About Everywhere. A native of Austria, Bikel moved with his family to Palestine in 1938. He first learned to speak English in hopes of becoming a linguist, then worked for a time on a collective farm, after which his destiny in performing became ever more apparent, with involvement in the Habimah Theater in Tel Aviv, a role in organizing the Tel Aviv Chamber Theater in 1943, and study at the Royal Academy of Dramatic Arts in London. Moving to New York in 1955, he continued a run of memorable film and stage roles for many years, his contributions acknowledged—but thankfully far from completed—with an appointment to the National Council for the Arts in 1977.

what to buy: Best of Theodore Bikel ♪♪♪ (Elektra, 1962) includes cuts from Bikel's earlier albums and showcases his full-bodied vocals and diverse repertoire.

the rest:

Actor's Holiday ♪♪ (Elektra, 1956)
Folk Songs from Just About Everywhere ♪♪♪ (Elektra, 1959)
Bravo Bikel ♪♪♪ (Elektra, 1959)
The Sound of Music ♪♪♪♪ (Columbia, 1960)
From Bondage to Freedom ♪♪♪ (Elektra, 1961)
On Tour ♪♪♪ (Elektra, 1962)
Folksinger's Choice ♪♪♪ (Elektra, 1964)
Yiddish Theater & Folk Songs ♪♪♪ (Elektra, 1965/Bainbridge, 1991)
Folk Songs of Israel ♪♪♪ (Elektra, 1966)
Songs of the Russian Gypsy ♪♪♪ (Elektra, 1967)
New Day ♪♪♪ (Reprise, 1969)
(With various artists) A Taste of Passover ♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1998)

influences:

⏮ Leadbelly, Burl Ives, Pete Seeger

⏭ Oscar Brand, Will Ackerman

Craig Harris

Bio Ritmo

Salsa, swing

Formed 1991, in Richmond, VA, USA. Based in Richmond, VA, USA.

Jim Thompson, bongos, vocals; Jorge Negrón, vocals, maracas (1991); Reinaldo González, vocals, clave (1991); Justin Riccio, timbales, tambora, vocals; Charles Kilpatrick, piano; Shade Wilson, bass; Gabriel Tomasini, congas; René Herrera (Cuba), trombone, lead vocals, arranger; Gary Jones, sax, flute (1991); Bob Miller, trumpet (1997–present); Mathew Paddock, saxes (1997–present). (All members are from USA unless otherwise noted.)

Bio Ritmo is Richmond, Virginia's hottest salsa band. "We're actually the only salsa band in town," confessed Jim Thompson, one of the band's percussionists. "We're probably the only Afro-Cuban group between New York and Miami." Bio Ritmo was a happy accident, started when Thompson was jamming with a couple of Puerto Rican friends. "We played Latin percussion to open a science fair, which led to gigs in rock clubs. We attracted a pianist, some horns, and suddenly had a salsa combo." Although they learned their Afro-Cuban licks off records, the band had a solid Latin groove on their eponymous debut for their own small label. Then René Herrera arrived on the scene. "I'd just come from Cuba," Herrera recalled. "When somebody told me there was a salsa band in town, I thought they were joking." Herrera contacted Thompson and was soon Bio Ritmo's main composer, arranger, and lead singer. "I could see their potential," Herrera said. "But Cuban music has a lot of rules, and they didn't really know what they were doing." With Herrera in charge, Bio Ritmo began a period of explosive growth, culminating in a major label deal with Triloka/Mercury. "Rumba Baby Rumba was recorded live, in a large studio, so we could play off each other, and we're happy with the results," says Thompson of the band's latest album. "We cut 'Tequila' as a mambo, had René give Mozart's 'Nachtmusik' a Latin tinge and even did a few tunes with English lyrics. What happens next is up to the fans."

what's available: Que Siga La Música ♪♪♪♪ (Shameless, 1995) is a steaming helping of post-punk salsa that proves you don't have to know what you're doing to have a good time. Salsa Galactica ♪♪♪♪ (Permanent, 1997, prod. Bio Ritmo) is a solid collection of tunes by René Herrera that shows the band flexing its considerable muscle, although it lacks the unbridled energy of its predecessor. Rumba Baby Rumba ♪♪♪♪ (Triloka, 1998) is slicker and more commercial as befits a major label debut, with a few swing tunes sung in English added to the mix, perhaps in hopes of latching onto the current (in 1998) swing-band fad.

influences:

⏮ Tito Puente, Ray Baretto, Joe Cuba, Willie Colon

j. poet

Tony Bird

Worldbeat

Born February 18, 1945, in Malawi, Africa. Based in New York, NY, USA.

The creative traditions and environmental settings of southern Africa combine with Western influences in the music of white Malawian Tony Bird. His songs have successfully alternated between exposés of racism and celebrations of a childhood spent amongst monkeys and mango trees. Recorded while he was still living in Africa, Bird's first two albums, Tony Bird and Bird of Paradise, predated Paul Simon's more commercial attempts at incorporating Africa's music with Western sensibilities by a decade or more. Despite a long struggle with a muscular disorder, Bird, who moved to New York in 1979, has continued to perform in folk coffeehouses throughout the world. His 1991 album, Sorry Africa, featured musicians from Simon's Graceland sessions. Bird has been working on the follow-up, Precious Africa, for several years. Initially intended as an acoustic project, the album has expanded into a full-band recording with backing vocals furnished by South African superstars (and Graceland alumni) Ladysmith Black Mambazo.

what to buy: Sorry Africa ♪♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1991, prod. Morris Goldberg, Tony Bird) is one of the all-time classic worldbeat albums, capturing the sounds and lifestyle of Bird's homeland. With heavyweights from the continent collaborating with him to blend African and Western musical influences, Bird recalls the struggles and joys of his youth. A personal view of racism is hauntingly expressed in the ballad "Ahalone Incident," which tells of being stranded at night in a black township in South Africa, while the title track is an apology for apathy. "Mango Time" and "Rift Valley" offer more optimistic recollections of the Motherland.

what to buy next: Predating Paul Simon's Graceland by nearly a decade, Bird of Paradise ♪♪♪ (Columbia, 1978, prod. Tony Bird) looks back fondly at the Africa of Bird's youth with tunes including "Zambezi Zimbabwe," "There's a Bright Dawn," "The Cape of Flowers," and "The Mynah Birds." On an album as carefully balanced as ever, "Black Brother" provides a chilling indictment of apartheid.

the rest:
Tony Bird ♪♪♪ (Columbia, 1974)

influences:
◀◀ Hugh Masekela, Johnny Clegg

▶▶ Paul Simon

see also: Ladysmith Black Mambazo, Paul Simon

Craig Harris

Frances Black

Irish pop, Celtic

Born in Ireland. Based in Ireland.

Frances Black began singing professionally with her brothers and sisters as the Black Family, and went on to join the group Arcady, with whom she recorded for several years. Solo tracks on the international best-selling anthology A Woman's Heart (reviewed in this book's Compilations section) opened the way for Frances to begin her headlining career. She's successfully forging her own identity away from the shadow of her sister Mary (long one of Ireland's top female vocalists and rapidly becoming an international music force). Frances's voice is a bit lighter than Mary's and quite distinctive. So far she's chosen material in the country and pop vein (she's covered many songs by American writer Nanci Griffith, for example), with which she's had great success in Ireland and on international tours.

what's available: Talk to Me ♪♪♪½ (Celtic Heartbeat, 1995, prod. Pearse Dunne) includes Black's interpretations of a number of Nanci Griffith's songs. Griffith herself and Frances's sister Mary are among the backing vocalists. Sky Road ♪♪♪ (Uptown/Universal, 1997, prod. Pearse Dunn) shows Black venturing more into the light pop vein, while The Smile on Your Face ♪♪♪ (Dara, 1996) produced a platinum-selling single in "When You Say Nothing at All," a hit on the U.S. country charts for American singer Keith Whitley almost a decade ago. Black has signed with Sony Music and has plans to work with Declan Sinnott, who produced several of Mary's records.

influences:
◀◀ The Black Family, De Dannan, Mary Black, Nanci Griffith

see also: Arcady, the Black Family, Mary Black

Kerry Dexter

Mary Black

Celtic, contemporary

Born May 22, 1955, in Ireland. Based in Ireland.

Singing in an emotionally rich soprano brogue, Mary Black is one of the preeminent Irish vocalists. A member of the Black Family, General Humbert, and De Dannan before her phenomenal solo career took center stage, Black has successfully bridged the musical traditions of her native country and the lyrical poetics of modern singer-songwriters. Black grew up surrounded by music, by way of a fiddler father and music-hall-singing mother. Taught to sing folk songs herself at the age of eight by a brother, she performed with her siblings in Dublin, eventually recording with them. Later, after departing for two albums with the tradition-rooted Irish band General Humbert, Black released a self-titled debut album in 1982. Produced by

8/6 mary black

Mary Black

Declan Sinnott, it reached #4 on the Irish music charts. Next joining one of Ireland's most successful bands, De Dannan, she performed in the United States and sang (as did Maura O'Connell) with the band for three years, recording several albums including Anthem, winner of a National Association of Independent Record Distributors (NAIRD) award for Best Irish Album of 1983 (one of many NAIRD honors). Black balanced these collaborations with her own work, releasing the solo albums Collected and Without the Fanfare in 1984 and '85. Shortly after being named Irish Entertainer of 1986, she left the band to concentrate on her own career. Her subsequent solo effort, By the Time It Gets Dark, attained multi-platinum status, and she was voted Ireland's Best Female Artist of both 1987 and '88. Her album No Frontiers remained in the Irish Top 30 for more than a year, while Babes in the Wood spent six months on the U.S. adult alternative charts. Then in 1993 The Holy Ground was voted Best Irish Album of the Year and Black expanded her following with several cuts on the million-selling showcase of female Celtic singers, A Woman's Heart (reviewed in this book's Compilations section). In the spring of 1995 Black joined Joan Baez at New York City's legendary Bottom Line club to record duet versions of the title track of Baez's Ring Them Bells and Black's own beloved "Song for Ireland." The pairing was just one of many confirmations of a stature to which Black will add years more evidence.

what to buy: On Babes in the Wood ♪♪♪½ (Gift Horse, 1991, prod. Declan Sinnott), Black turns songs by Richard Thompson ("Dimming of the Day"), Joni Mitchell ("Urge for Going"), and Noel Brazil ("Golden Mile," "Might As Well Be a Slave," and the title track) into very personal statements.

what to buy next: Collected ♪♪♪ (Gift Horse, 1984, prod. Declan Sinnott) spotlights Black's ability to make traditional Irish tunes, including "She Moved through the Fair," sound thoroughly contemporary.

the rest:

(With General Humbert) Dolphin ♪♪ (Gael-Linn, 1975)
(With General Humbert) II ♪♪♪ (Gael-Linn, 1978)
Mary Black ♪♪♪ (Gift Horse, 1982)
Without the Fanfare ♪♪♪ (Gift Horse, 1985)
By the Time It Gets Dark ♪♪♪ (Gift Horse, 1987)
No Frontiers ♪♪♪ (Gift Horse, 1989)

The Holy Ground ♪♪♪ (Gift Horse, 1993)
Circus ♪♪♪ (Grapevine, 1995)
Looking Back ♪♪♪ (Curb, 1995)
Shine ♪♪♪ (Curb, 1997)
Song for Ireland ♪♪♪♪ (Gift Horse, 1998)

influences:

◀◀ Sandy Denny, Billie Holiday, Bonnie Raitt

▶▶ Maura O'Connell, Tríona Ní Dhomhnaill, Nanci Griffith

see also: The Black Family, Frances Black, De Dannan, Maura O'Connell

Craig Harris

The Black Family /Shay, Michael, and Martin Black

Folk, Celtic traditional and contemporary

Formed 1965, in Dublin, Ireland. Based in California, USA, and Ireland.

Mary Black, vocals; Shay Black, vocals, guitar, piano, synthesizer; Michael Black, vocals, tenor banjo, guitar; Martin Black, vocals, fiddle, bouzouki, tenor banjo; Frances Black, vocals. (All members are from Ireland.)

Hailing from Dublin, the Black Family ranks with the Clannad/Enya Brennans on the scale of Ireland's most successful musical clans. As kids, Mary, Shay, Martin, and Michael Black absorbed music from their household. Their father was a fiddle player from Rathlin Island off the coast of Antrim, and their mother was a Dublin-born singer of traditional and music-hall songs. Although neither parent was a full-time musician, they played and sang with passion and passed that passion on to their children. Four of the children performed together around Dublin in their teen years, but the family act was broken up in 1977 when Mary went professional with the group Terrace. Terrace later changed its name to General Humbert and recorded two albums that are now out of print. Mary's career then took her to De Dannan, one of Ireland's top traditional bands, in 1983. After several albums with them, she left the band in 1986. As she concentrated on an already successful solo career, Mary also took the opportunity to revive the family group with an album and a tour. For this version of the Black Family, Mary's youngest sibling, Frances, also participated. By 1989, with Mary's solo career having made her a household name in Ireland and keeping her too busy for multiple projects, the Black Family continued as a quartet again, though their second album was recorded with harmony vocals and production assistance from Mary. Frances's initial success with the Black Family led her to a gig with the traditional folk group Arcady, a track on the best-selling anthology A Woman's Heart (reviewed in this book's Compilations section), and ultimately her own successful solo career. By 1995 she too was a household name in Ireland, with big-selling albums and sold-out tours. Still, both she and Mary found time to contribute harmony vocals to the 1995 album of Shay, Michael, and Martin Black, the trio that remained of the Black Family. These days, Michael and Shay live in the San Francisco area while their three siblings remain in Ireland. The family rarely gets a chance to sing together anymore, though all five siblings did reunite for a concert at Milwaukee's famed Irish Fest in the summer of 1997, to raise money to restore the house on Rathlin Island where their father was born.

what to buy: The Black Family ♪♪♪♪♪ (Dara, 1986, prod. Declan Sinnott) was the group's debut, and it is a truly terrific album. It features quite a variety, from ballads to Bob Dylan, from sea chanteys to sweet love songs, and from political commentary to Victorian music-hall silliness. The songs on which Mary takes lead vocals show why she's the most famous singer of the lot; "James Connolly" and "Will Ye Gang, Love" are exactly the kind of achy-breaky material she excels at, and she nails both of them beautifully. Frances's turns at the mic are cast in a similar vein, sad and full of longing. The men, on the other hand, sing energetic sea chanteys and music-hall songs along with a few melancholy numbers like Michael's "Broom of the Cowdenknowes." Musical accompaniment is provided by the Black brothers, as well as by members of Mary's touring band.

what to buy next: What a Time ♪♪♪♪ (Dara, 1995, prod. Máire Breatnach) is the first recording credited to the trio of Shay, Michael, and Martin Black. It's about a 50-50 mix of traditional material and contemporary songs by Jez Lowe, Ron Kavana, Kieran Goss, Bob Franke, and others. As an added attraction, the boys' mother Patty sings lead on one silly music-hall ditty, in which a young woman's boyfriend dumps her for her widowed mother; the song's title is the bitter observation "Now I Have to Call Him Father." A lot of the traditional songs, in fact, are anonymous pieces of amusing doggerel from the Victorian music-hall stage, performed with audible good humor by the Blacks. The contemporary songs deal with Ireland's past and present, but also with the universal theme of love: long-distance love, true love, and the fear of losing love. The brothers' sharp nasal voices suit most of these songs quite well, especially the working-class tough-guy tunes "Down Our Street," "London Danny," and "The Recruiting Sergeant." The instrumental backing is by the Blacks, with accompanists including Máire Breatnach on fiddle, Mairtin O'Connor on accordion, and Noel Eccles on percussion. The singing and arrangements are full of ebullient energy, making this a fun listen. Time for Touching Home ♪♪♪ (Dara, 1989, prod. Declan Sinnott, Mary Black) was recorded by the quartet of Shay, Michael, Martin, and Frances, with harmony vocals and production assistance by Mary. It features a panoply of contemporary folk from Irish, North American, and British songwriters, including Nanci Griffith, Jimmy McCarthy, Jez Lowe, Leon Rosselson, Stan Rogers, and Dougie MacClean. In this it marks a shift away from their earlier traditional material, but also includes a few old sea chanteys and a version of "Peat Bog Soldiers" from the Irish folk cannon. The backing ensemble includes such prominent Irish traditional musicians as Máire Breatnach (fiddle) and Peter Brown (uilleann pipes), along with the Black brothers and members of Mary's band. All the arrangements are tastefully done, and the voices, as always, shine.

influences:

⏮ Nanci Griffith, Jez Lowe, Ron Kavana

⏭ Mary Black, Frances Black

see also: Arcady, Frances Black, Mary Black, Máire Breatnach, Clannad, De Dannan

Steve Winick

Black 47

Hybrid Celtic

Formed 1989, in New York, NY, USA. Based in New York, NY, USA.

Larry Kirwan, guitar, keyboards, percussion, lead vocals; Chris Byrne, uilleann pipes, tin whistle, bodhrán, vocals; Fred Parcells, trombone, tin whistle, vocals; Geoffrey Blythe, saxophone, clarinet; Thomas Hamlin, drums, percussion; Andrew Goodsight, bass (1995–present); Kevin Jenkins, bass (1993–95); David Conrad, bass (1989–93). (Members are from Ireland and USA.)

Black 47 is a New York Irish outfit combining the attitude of the Big Apple with the pride of the Emerald Isle. Essentially an extremely rowdy bar band in the best sense, Black 47 is so named for the peak year of the Irish famine during the 19th century. Larry Kirwan, erstwhile playwright from the old sod itself, and Chris Byrne, a New York City cop with a passion for Irish traditional as well as rap and punk, shared several pints at the hole-in-the-wall pub Paddy Reilly's while complaining about the dismal state of modern music. At some point that evening, Black 47 was born, and soon thereafter Paddy Reilly's became the band's home. Kirwan and company's reputation for original music and a confrontational attitude soon attracted a loyal following. Kirwan's songs, crowded with lyrics and ecstatic horn arrangements, tend toward the rousing anthem as the band wails like a Memphis soul unit trapped in the bodies of an Irish folk combo. Their first recording was a self-produced indie release that was basically sold by hand as they toured Irish hot spots around the country, always landing back at Paddy's. After catching the show one evening, Cars veteran Ric Ocasek volunteered to polish that first album, and Fire of Freedom was completed in a mere three weeks. Soon the band found itself a rising star, while still fulfilling its dates at Paddy's. Ex–Talking Head Jerry Harrison arrived for production duty on the second album, and appearances on The Tonight Show and other national media led to more widespread recognition. Black 47 recently released their third major-label album—keeping their lifeline to street credibility and the juice of the barley with a still-regular slot at Paddy's.

what to buy: The essential Black 47 album is their first one. Fire of Freedom ♪♪♪ (SBK Records, 1992, prod. Ric Ocasek, Larry Kirwan) is Celtic to the core, while still strongly suggesting the band's American roots. Songs range from the swing of "Funky Ceili" to the rabble-rousing pint-raising of "James Connelly." While the production seems a bit crowded and thin, the band's exuberant personality is well captured.

what to buy next: Green Suede Shoes ♪♪♪ (SBK Records, 1996, prod. Larry Kirwan) returns to the band's pub roots, supplying a sweaty, passionate sound to support the usual free-the-Irish-or-we'll-really-bang-on-the-bodhrán anthems (e.g. "Bobby Sands MP").

the rest:

Home of the Brave ♪♪ (SBK Records, 1994)

Live in New York City ♪♪♪ (Gadfly, 1999)

influences:

⏮ The Pogues, Enemy Orchard, Them, Bruce Springsteen, Booker T. & the MG's

⏭ Goats Don't Shave

Martin Connors

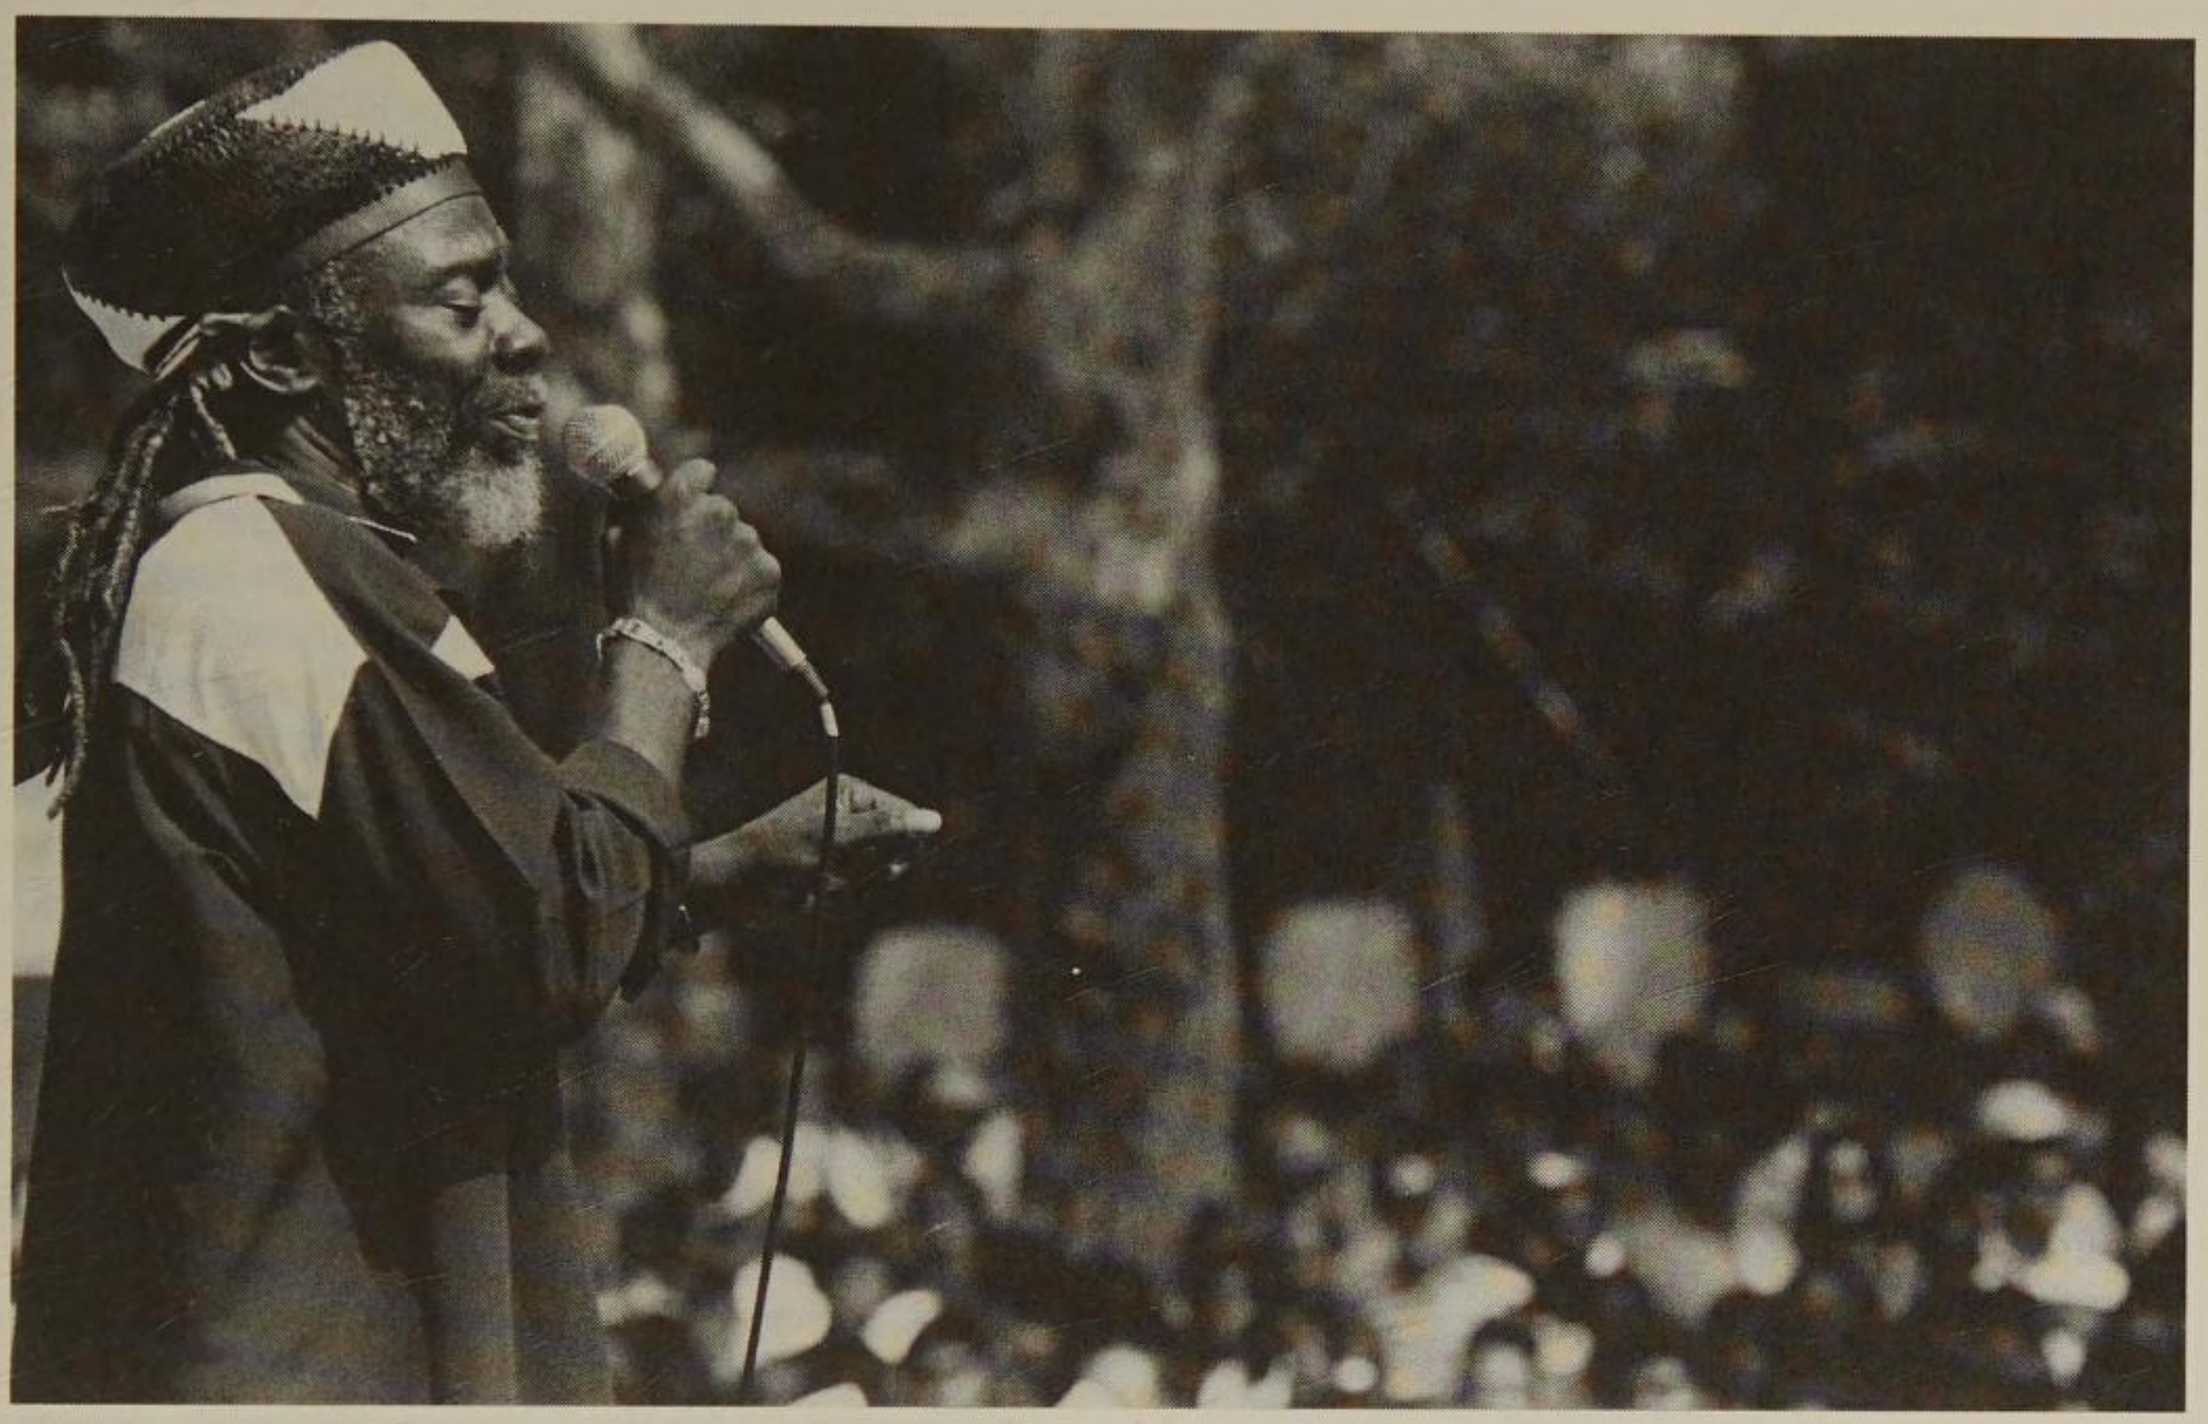
Black Lodge Singers

Powwow drum

Formed c. 1982, in White Swan, WA, USA. Based in White Swan, WA, USA.

Thomas Scabby Robe, singing, drumming; Kenny Scabby Robe Jr., singing, drumming; Elgin Scabby Robe, singing, drumming; Erwin Scabby Robe, singing, drumming; Kenneth Scabby Robe Sr., singing, drumming; Louise Scabby Robe, singing; Myron Scabby Robe, singing, drumming; Darwin Scabby Robe, singing, drumming; William White Grass, singing, drumming; Keith Kicking Woman, singing, drumming; Lonnie Sammaria, singing, drumming; Shaen Old Mouse, singing, drumming. (All members are from USA.)

In pre-Columbian America, Black Lodge was the name of a Black Feet warrior society. The members stayed to themselves and had their own ceremonies, apart from the rest of the tribe. They were known by their black (or black and white) lodges or teepees. The elders of this society passed on the name Black



Black Stalin

Lodge to Kenny Scabby Robe, inspiring him to form this drum group. All members of the drum group conduct themselves in a traditional Indian way, observing strict drum etiquette. But the group is also dedicated to taking drum music out of the Indian community and into the white world, hence their recent album Kid's Pow Wow Songs, a collection that interpolates familiar tunes like "Twinkle Twinkle Little Star" and the theme from "The Flintstones." They perform Northern Style singing, where the voices have a high, almost falsetto quality.

what to buy: The subtle qualities of powwow music are difficult for non-Indian ears, but the tunes and phrases on Kid's Pow Wow Songs ♪♪♪♪ (Canyon, 1996, prod. Robert Doyle, Steven Butler) should be familiar to mainstream listeners and give you a clue as to how the drummers and singers develop a melody.

the rest:
Intertribal Pow Wow Songs, Live in Arizona ♪♪♪♪ (Canyon, 1996)
Live at White Swan ♪♪♪♪ (Canyon, 1996)
Round Dance Tonight ♪♪♪♪ (Canyon, 1997)

influences:
Native American tradition

j. poet

Black Stalin /Stalin

Soca, calypso, kaiso

Born in Trinidad. Based in Trinidad and Brooklyn, NY, USA.

Black Stalin, four-time winner of the Calypso Monarch crown, is one of the soca (SOul + CAlypso) style's most militant lyricists, and a practicing Rastaman. "In the Caribbean everyone is aware of Marcus Garvey," Stalin says from his Brooklyn home. "My parents collected newspaper articles about his work, so my Rastafarian faith is an inheritance from them." Stalin was born in Trinidad and "grew up poor, poor, poor. But there was always music. I lived near a pan yard [a social club where a steel band rehearses] and I was infatuated by kaiso from an early age. [Stalin prefers the traditional name for calypso, which implies social criticism and an ability to turn in on-the-spot lyrical improvisations.] Fortunately I had a gift for it." Stalin first performed for assemblies in grammar school; by high school he was a street musician and freelance calypsonian. "I would hang out in the calypso tents, and in '67 I met Kitchener. He taught me the fine points of the trade, how to write a lyric and aspects of presenting a whole show." Stalin competed for years before taking the crown in '79, but his winning (and first) album Caribbean Man is one of soca's greatest. Stalin's lyrics of Pan-African unity are full of militant fire, and the tunes ride monstrous, sweat-inducing groves. "There was criticism because [it] was so political, but politics affect every decision we make in our lives, and a calypsonian is the people's messenger. Like the old African storytellers who went from village to village to spread the news, a calypsonian should be a serious educator."

what to buy: The compilation Roots, Rock, Soca ♪♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1991, prod. various) includes most of Caribbean Man —one of the greatest soca albums ever waxed, on a par with Bob Marley's Burnin' for its impact on Caribbean culture. Stalin, like Sparrow, has never made a bad album and seldom cuts a weak tune. The production on Rebellion ♪♪♪♪ (Ice, 1994, prod. Eddy Grant) is a bit slick, but Stalin's missionary spark always shines through.

best of the rest:
You Ask for It ♪♪♪♪♪ (CCP, 1984)
I Time ♪♪♪♪½ (B's, 1986)
To De Master ♪♪♪♪♪ (WB, 1989)

worth searching for: In Ah Earlier Time ♪♪♪♪♪ (Makossa, 1981) may not be on CD yet, but it stands with Caribbean Man as a stunning example of soul-stirring, militant music-making.

influences:
⏮ Lord Kitchener, Pretender, Sparrow, Attila the Hun
⏭ David Rudder

see also: Lord Kitchener, the Mighty Sparrow

j. poet

Black Uhuru

Reggae

Formed 1974, in Kingston, Jamaica. Based in Kingston, Jamaica.

Derrick "Duckie" Simpson, vocals; Rudolph "Garth" Dennis, vocals (1974–76; 1989–96); Don McCarlos (a.k.a. Don Carlos), vocals (1974–76; 1989–96); Michael Rose, vocals (1977–84); Errol Nelson, vocals (1977); Sandra "Puma" Jones (USA, died January 28, 1990), vocals (1978–86); Delroy "Junior" Reid (1985–89); Janet "Olafunke" Reid, vocals (1986–88); O'Neill Beckford (a.k.a. Andrew Bees), vocals (1998–present); Jennifer Connally (a.k.a. Jenifah Nyah), vocals (1998–present). (All members are from Jamaica except where noted otherwise.)

The first reggae group to win a Grammy award (for their 1984 album Anthem), Black Uhuru are one of the most successful bands in their genre and country; Rolling Stone referred to them as "Jamaica's premier post–Bob Marley reggae outfit."

Formed in the ghettos of Kingston in 1974 by vocalists Duckie Simpson, Don Carlos, and Garth Dennis under the name Uhuru (Swahili for "freedom"), the band initially released a beautiful but commercially disappointing version of the Impressions' "Romancing to the Folk Song." After Carlos departed and Dennis joined the Wailing Souls, hints of Black Uhuru's later preeminence could be heard on their excellent 1977 debut LP Love Crisis (later reissued as Black Sounds of Freedom), which featured new members Michael Rose and Errol Nelson (formerly of the Jayes). Rose's anguished lead vocals injected a rapt intensity into the majestic "I Love King Selassie" and a spiritually uninhibited interpretation of Bob Marley's "Natural Mystic." Rose had previously released the stellar single "Born Free" and the original version of "Guess Who's Coming to Dinner," which was based on the Sidney Poitier film and later became a hit for Black Uhuru on their 1979 Showcase album.

In 1978, Nelson rejoined the Jayes and was replaced by the gifted African American Puma Jones, a former social worker who journeyed to Jamaica to trace her African cultural roots and subsequently became a nyah (ritual Rasta) dancer with Ras Michael & the Sons of Negus. Along with the addition of reggae dynamic duo Sly Dunbar and Robbie Shakespeare as producers and instrumentalists (though not official members), it was Puma's eerie soprano harmonies, in combination with Rose's distinctively dread lead vocals and Simpson's deep bass harmonies, that solidified the band's signature sound. During this politically outspoken period Black Uhuru released a succession of Sly & Robbie productions—most notably the singles "Plastic Smile" and "General Penitentiary" and the aforesaid Jamaican hit album Showcase —which lead to a contract with Island records. A series of uncompromising modern roots albums followed, including Sinsemilla, Red, Chill Out, and Anthem; compilations of their early singles were issued on Black Uhuru and Guess Who's Coming to Dinner.

In late 1984, Rose left the group to run a coffee plantation, which in turn spurred Sly & Robbie's departure. The domino effect continued when Island decided not to re-sign the band. However, a new era for Black Uhuru began with the recruitment of another exciting lead vocalist: Junior Reid. Raised in the infamously impoverished Waterhouse district and with performance skills steeped in Kingston's intensely competitive dancehalls, Reid was a singer who made up in rhythmically concussive impact what he may have lacked in expressiveness.

After the Grammy-nominated Brutal, the band issued two stunning and rare singles on Reid's newly inaugurated JR Productions imprint, "Pain on the Poor Man's Brain" and "Nah Get Rich and Switch." In 1986, Jones fell ill and was replaced by Janet "Olafunke" Reid; sadly, Puma died of cancer in 1990 at the age of 37. Junior Reid left the group in 1989, soon after the release of Live in New York City.

The original lineup of Simpson, Carlos, and Dennis then reunited. Their comeback album Now, released in 1990, reached the #2 position on the Billboard world-music chart, bringing the legend back to life. After recording a number of albums together throughout the '90s, the trio broke up in 1996, and the blood was bad; Simpson sued Carlos and Dennis for the rights to the Black Uhuru name in what would be a bitterly contested lawsuit. In 1998, Simpson won the court clash, re-formed the band with newcomers Andrew Bees and Jenifah Nyah, and recorded the recently released Unification.

what to buy: Black Uhuru's culture-proud defiance, visually arresting appearance, supernatural vocal arrangements, and impressive roster of richly conceived songs have ensured a legacy as powerful and absorbing as a spell cast by a St. Ann's Parish sorcerer. Befitting one of the great international reggae bands, Liberation ♪♪♪♪½ (PolyGram, 1993, prod. various) is a terrific anthology of the group's best and boldest work for Island records, with the inimitable Michael Rose on lead vocals and including the amazing title cuts from Sinsemilla and Chill Out ; both "Youth of Eglington" and "Sponji Reggae" from Red ; and "Black Uhuru Anthem," "Solidarity," and "Botanical Roots" from Anthem. After Junior Reid joined the group, Black Uhuru continued their culturally and politically radical stance with Brutal ♪♪♪♪½ (RAS, 1986, prod. Black Uhuru, Doctor Dread). Featuring several tracks recorded at the Lion and Fox studios in Washington, D.C., the album spotlights the harmonic vocals of what some fans argue is the band's finest lineup: Junior Reid, Duckie Simpson, and Puma Jones. Brutal was successfully redone dub-style on Brutal Dub ♪♪♪♪ (RAS 1986, prod. Black Uhuru, Doctor Dread).

what to buy next: Black Sounds of Freedom ♪♪♪♪ (Prince Jammy's, 1977/Shanachie, 1982, prod. Prince Jammy)—originally titled Love Crisis —is Black Uhuru's debut, and strong proof that music and spirituality have always been inextricably linked for this band. Besides the aforementioned devotional classic "I Love King Selassie" and the tight, whorling cover of Marley's "Natural Mystic," there is Rose's achingly resonant vocals on "Hard Ground" and the gorgeous "African Love," which sweeps cultural roots, slavery, religion, and even jazz and blues into an uncommon Rastafarian repatriation song. To top it off, the backing band is exquisite and includes Sly & Robbie and future Roots Radics Bingy Bunny (guitar) and Style Scott (syndrums).

the rest:
Showcase ♪♪♪½ (Taxi, 1979)
Sensimilla ♪♪♪½ (Island, 1980)
Black Uhuru ♪♪♪½ (Virgin, 1981/Island, 1987)
Red ♪♪♪♪ (Island, 1981)
Tear It Up ♪♪♪♪ (Island, 1981)
Chill Out ♪♪♪½ (Island, 1982/1992)
Guess Who's Coming to Dinner ♪♪♪½ (Heartbeat, 1983)
The Dub Factor ♪♪♪½ (Island, 1983/1993)
Anthem ♪♪♪♪½ (Island, 1984/1989)
Reggae Greats ♪♪♪♪ (Island, 1985)
Positive ♪♪♪½ (RAS, 1987)
Positive Dub ♪♪½ (RAS, 1988)
Live in New York City ♪♪½ (Rohit, 1989)
Now ♪♪♪½ (Mesa, 1990)
Now Dub ♪♪♪½ (Mesa, 1990)
Iron Storm ♪♪♪½ (Mesa, 1991)
Iron Storm Dub ♪♪½ (Mesa, 1992)
Mystical Truth ♪♪♪½ (Mesa, 1992)
Mystical Truth Dub ♪♪♪½ (Mesa, 1993)
Strongg ♪♪♪½ (Mesa, 1994)
Strongg Dub ♪♪ (Mesa, 1994)
Love Dub ♪♪½ (Culture Press, 1994)
20 Greatest Hits ♪♪♪♪ (Sonic Sounds, 1994)
Live ♪♪♪½ (Sonic Sounds, 1995)
RAS Portraits ♪♪♪½ (RAS, 1997)
Unification ♪♪ (Five Star General, 1998)

worth searching for: Filmed at London's Rainbow Theatre in 1981, Tear It Up—Live! (PolyGram Video, 1991) is the best available document of a Black Uhuru show at the band's performing peak. Combining stadium rock's spectacle with reggae's entrancing mysticism, the set features Rose's ferocious vocals on bedrock Uhuru hits like "General Penitentiary," "Plastic Smile," and "Youth of Eglington," all backed by Sly & Robbie's penetrating and propulsive rhythms. Puma Jones adds otherworldly harmonies and spellbinding African dance to this galvanic performance.

influences:
◀◀ Bob Marley & the Wailers, Curtis Mayfield & the Impressions, Wailing Souls, Peter Tosh, Sly & Robbie, Mikey Chung

▶▶ UB40, U Brown, African Headcharge, Dub Syndicate

see also: Roots Radics, Sly & Robbie, Wailing Souls

Todd Shanker and Craig Harris

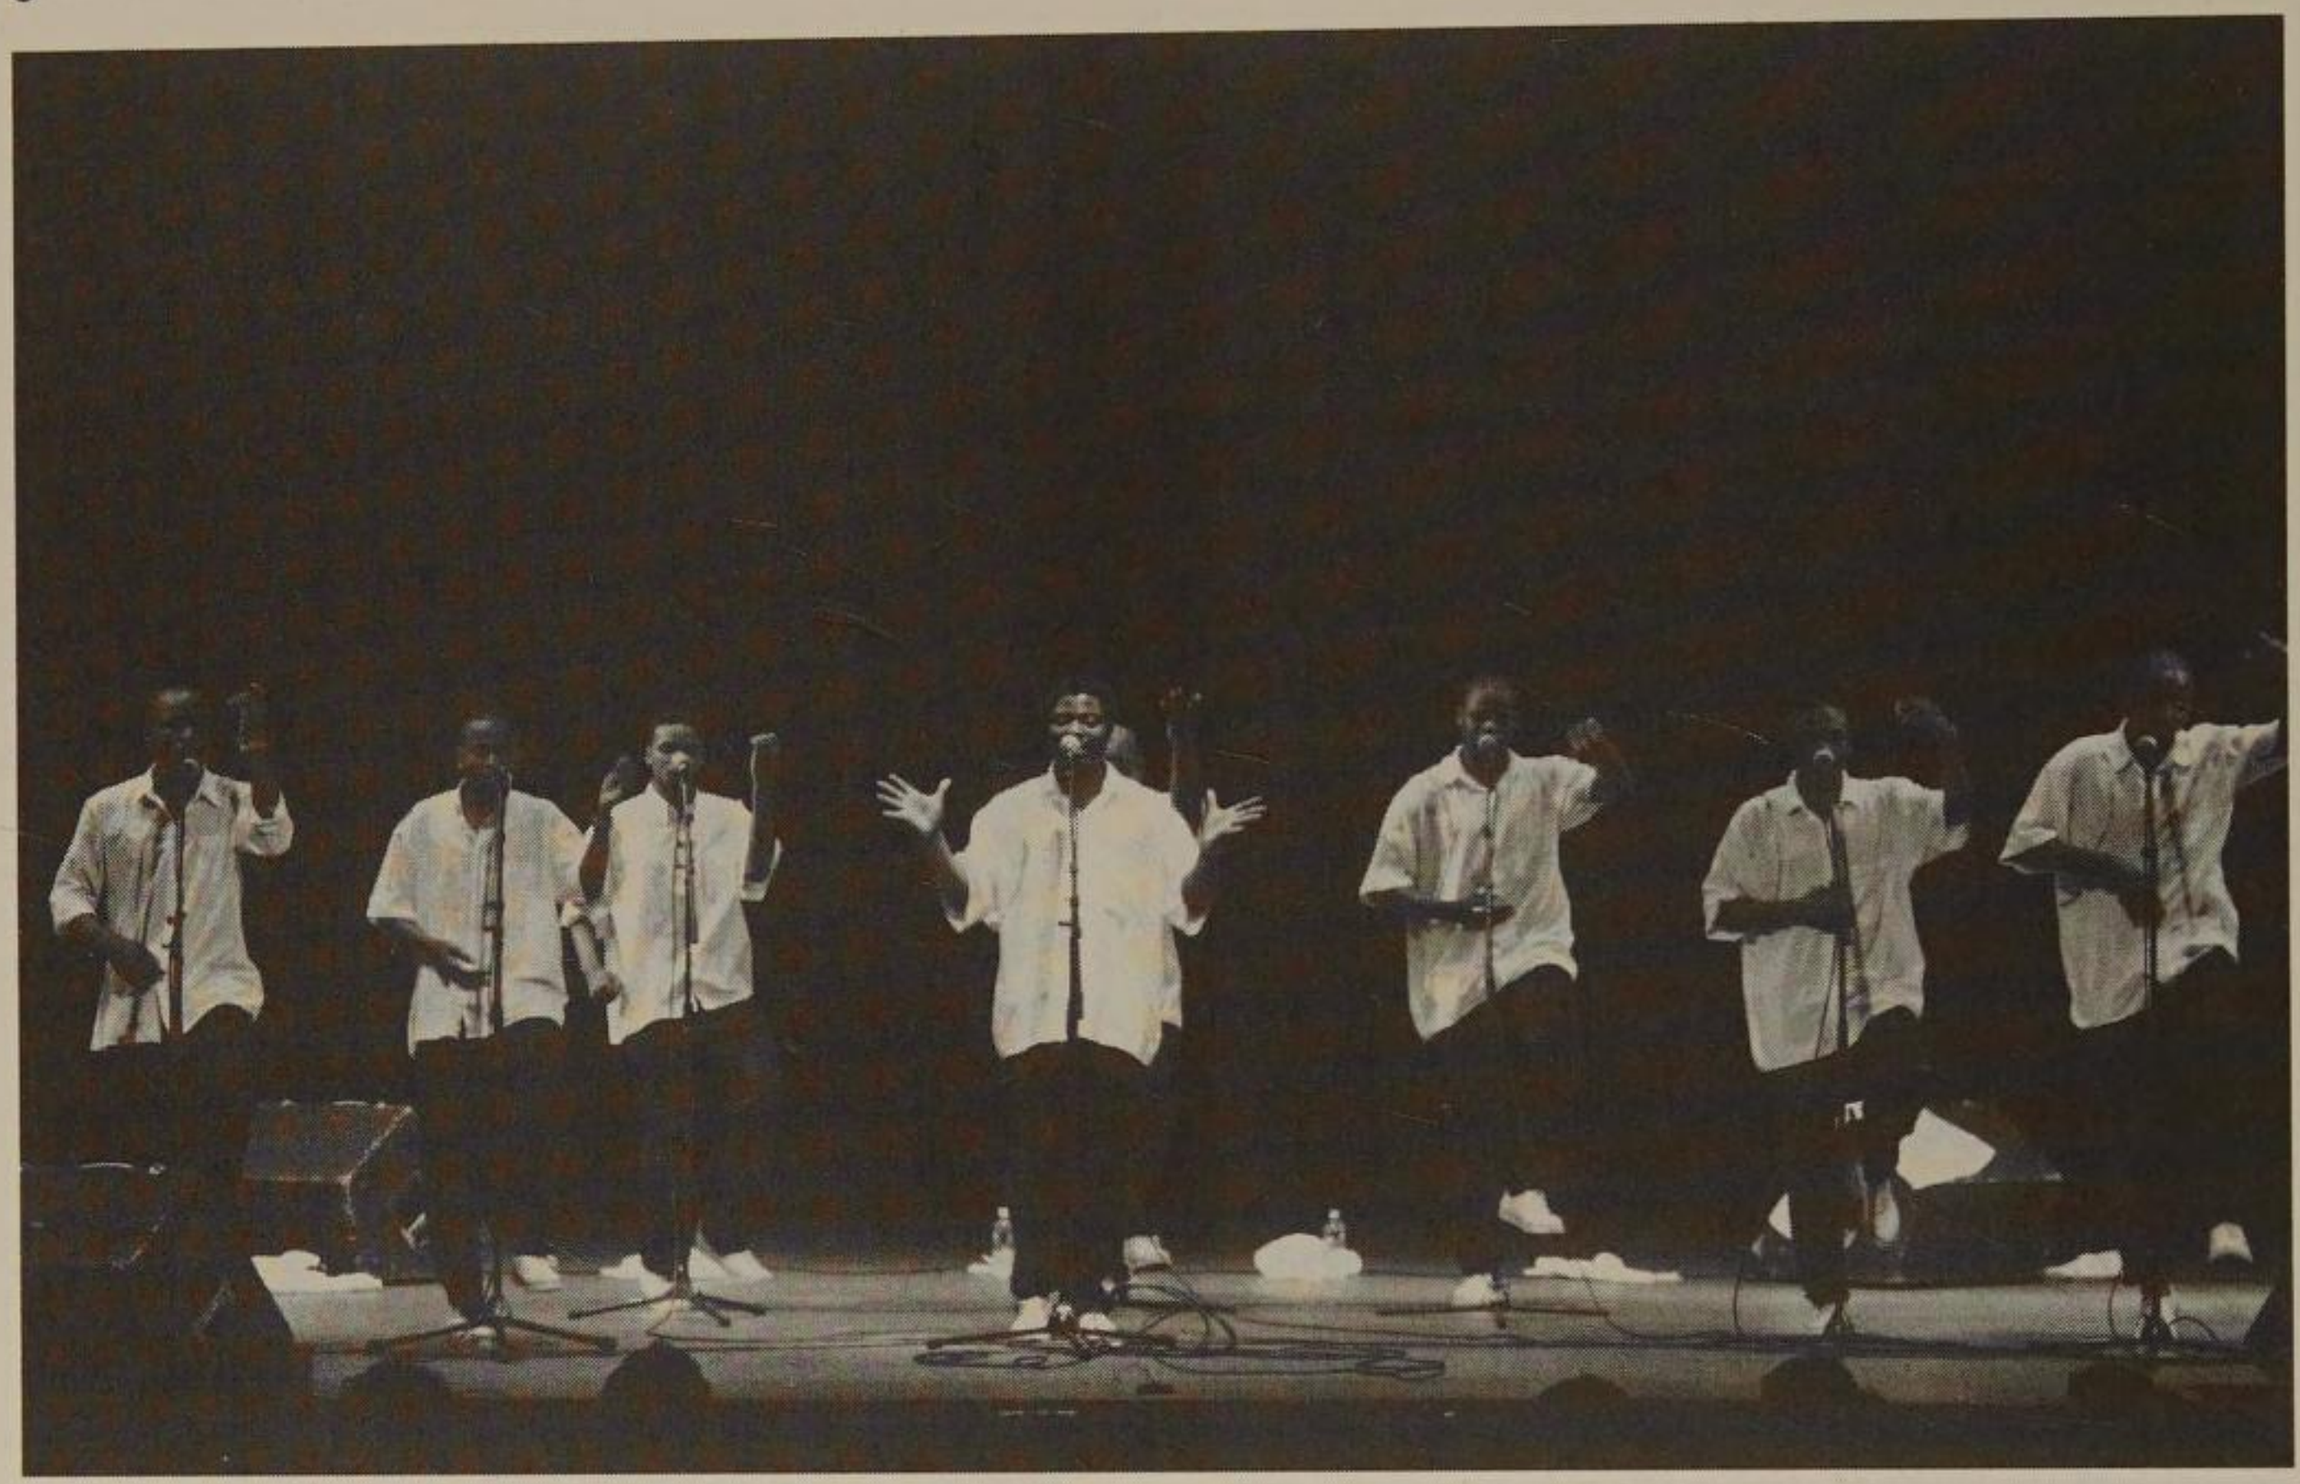
Black Umfolosi

Ndebele a cappella music

Formed 1982, in Bulawayo, Zimbabwe. Based in Bulawayo, Zimbabwe.

Thomeki Dube, vocals; Bornface Mlilo, vocals; Lucky Moyo, vocals; Morgen Moyo, vocals; Sotsha Moyo, vocals; Noah "Mike" Ncube, vo-

black umfolosi



Black Umfolosi

cals; Benia Phuti, vocals; Taurai Tichareva, vocals. (All members are from Zimbabwe.)

The South African vocal technique known as "bombing"—for its low bursts of unison bass voices—started as a competitive entertainment form in the mining hostels of South Africa. Ladysmith Black Mambazo brought this and other South African a cappella styles to a global audience, but they are hardly the only practitioners. Across the border in Zimbabwe, the Ndebele people are closely related to South Africa's Zulus, and the music of Black Umfolosi testifies to that closeness. Though Black Umfolosi perform a wide range of Southern African styles, their concerts and their one international release mostly rely on rich, rhythmic layerings of male voices, very much in keeping with the classic mining-hostel sound. The group's name refers to a river in South Africa where the chief Mzilikazi fought Zulu warlord Shaka Zulu early in the 19th century. Mzilikazi and his followers then moved north to become today's Ndebele in Zimbabwe. Three of Black Umfolosi's eight singers are brothers, which may help to explain their easy, unified sound. Lead singer Sotsha Moyo has a rougher timbre than Ladysmith's silky-smooth frontman Joseph Shabalala; Sotsha's growl complements his own group's lush, controlled vocal mix. In performance, the members of Black Umfolosi often wear warriors' pelts and dance with gusto. They also feature a version of the "gumboots dance"—not unfamiliar to Ladysmith fans—in which a synchronized line of hopping, coiling men slap the sides of their high, rubber boots in tight, earthy rhythms.

what's available: Festival~Umdlalo ♪♪♪ (World Circuit/Rounder, 1993), the group's only recording to reach the international market, swings and stomps. It lacks the ultimate intensity of Ladysmith in their prime, but if you love those deep harmonies, you won't be disappointed. The group has made other albums before and since this one, but none is available outside Zimbabwe.

influences:

- Ladysmith Black Mambazo, other South African choral groups

see also: Ladysmith Black Mambazo

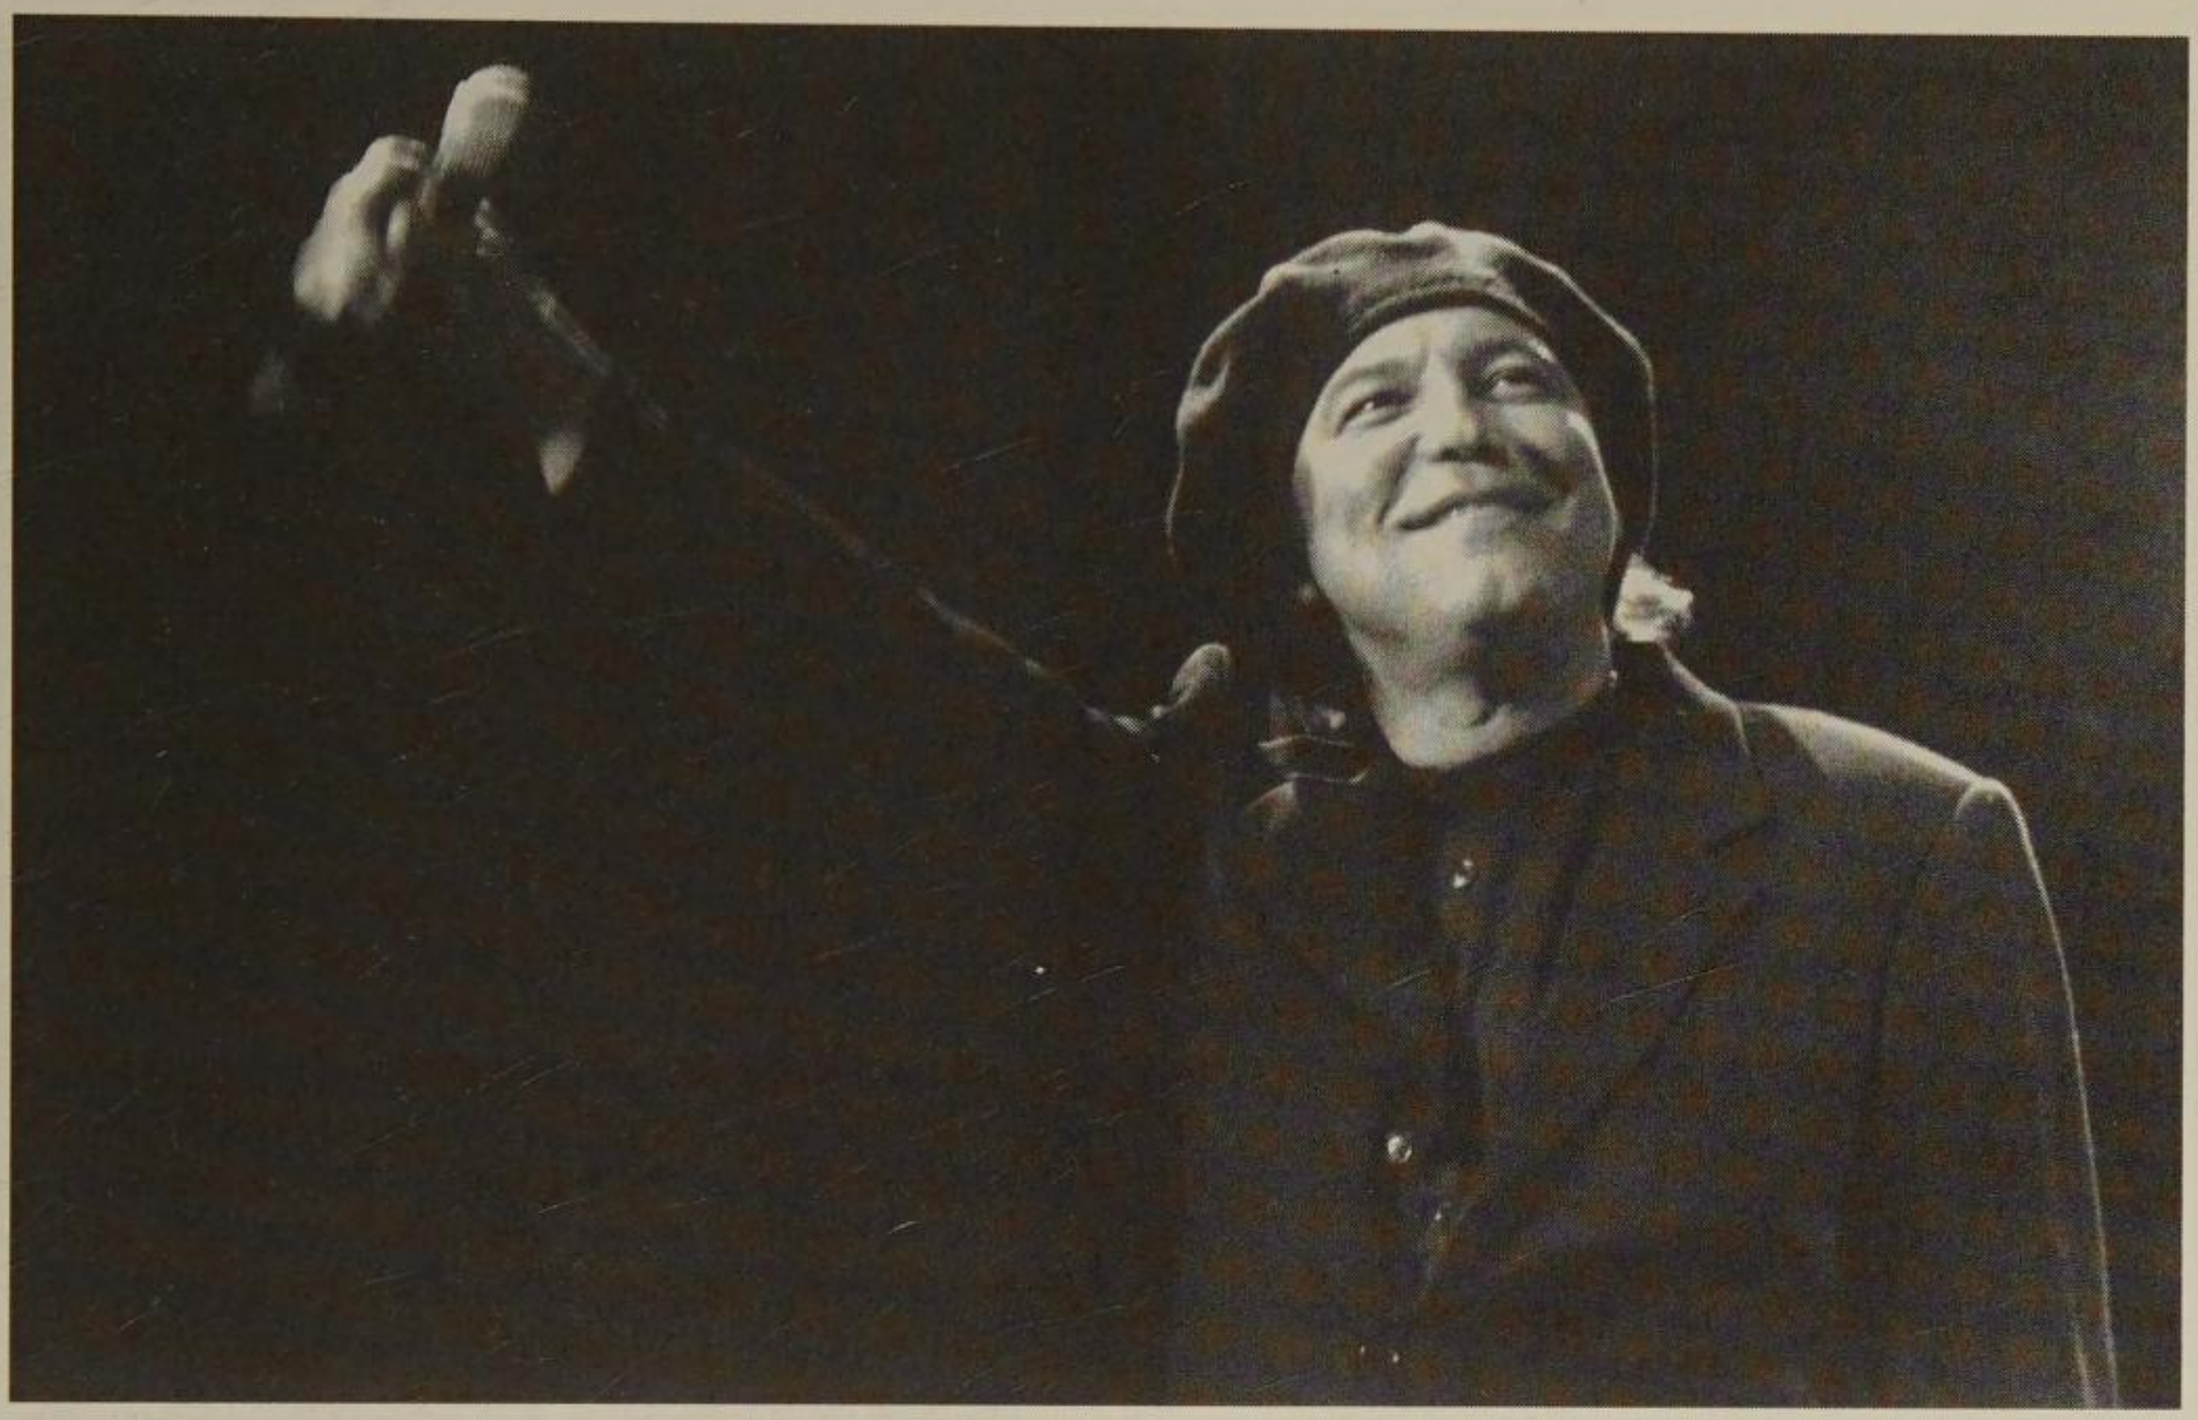
Banning Eyre



Ruben Blades

Ruben Blades

Salsa

Born July 16, 1948, in Panama City, Panama.

A Harvard-trained lawyer and movie star, Ruben Blades the singer emerged with the mid-'70s Fania label, which popularized much of the New York salsa scene. After a stint with trombonist Willie Colon, Blades worked with the band Son (a.k.a. Seis) Del Solar, eschewing the jazz influence in salsa for a more pop-oriented sound incorporating synthesizers. Blades's music is hugely popular among Latin Americans due to his lyrical examination of some of the sadder realities of life in that community; he's closer to the nueva cancion ("new song") movement of Latino leftists than to the exuberant party salsa of New York. For non–Spanish speakers Blades always provides translations of his songs with the albums. Major movie roles in Crossover Dreams, The Milagro Beanfield War, and others, as well as an acclaimed turn on stage in Paul Simon's less-than-acclaimed musical The Capeman, have given Blades a public profile well beyond the music world. And his social concerns have taken him further than that; Blades came in second in the 1994 elections for Panama's presidency (which is better than Joe Walsh ever did in his periodic campaigns to run the U.S.).

what to buy: Blades took a piercing look at hard lives on Buscando America (Searching for America) ♪♪♪♪½ (Elektra, 1984, prod. Ruben Blades). "Decisions" spotlights a pregnant teenage girl and a philandering husband. "Disappearances" depicts loved ones searching for disappeared family members, and the title song despairs that the promise of America has been kidnapped by dictators. Throughout, Blades avoids preachiness by letting his characters tell their own stories. The Colon-Blades collaboration Siembra ♪♪♪♪½ (Fania, 1978, prod. Willie Colon) is a more traditional salsa scorcher, with the Fania crew providing grooves and Colon's trombone adding a jazzy touch. This disc is legendary among salsa fans. Greatest Hits ♪♪♪ (WEA Latina, 1996, prod. various) is as good a place as any for Blades novices to begin, though it's skimpy at only 10 tracks.

what to buy next: Nothing but the Truth ♪♪♪½ (Elektra, 1988, prod. various) is Blades's first all-English outing, with songs written by Sting, Lou Reed, and Elvis Costello. Not one for the salsa fans, but it merits listening.

what to avoid: Agua de Luna (Moon Water) ♪♪♪ (Elektra, 1987, prod. Ruben Blades) features unmemorable arrangements and conceptual lyrics that seldom feel lived in by the songs' characters.

best of the rest:
Crossover Dreams (Soundtrack) ♪♪♪ (Elektra, 1986)
Antecedente ♪♪♪♪ (Elektra, 1988)
Amor y Control ♪♪♪♪ (Sony Discos, 1992)
La Rosa de Los Vientos ♪♪♪♪ (Sony Tropical, 1996)
Fabulosos Calavera ♪♪♪♪ (BMG U.S. Latin, 1997)

worth searching for: Ruben Blades and Son de Solar . . . Live ♪♪♪♪ (Elektra, 1990, prod. Ruben Blades) is a smoking dance set driven by the salsa ethos of his earlier work.

influences:
◀◀ Celia Cruz, Fania All Stars
▶▶ Victor Manuel, Jon Secada, Robbie Robertson

see also: Albita, Willie Colon, Little Steven, Paul Simon, Yomo Toro

Lawrence Gabriel

Edward "Eddie" Blazonczyk

Polka

Born 1941, in Chicago, IL, USA. Based in Bridgeview, IL, USA.

Blazonczyk's polka pedigree is relatively spotless. Although he did pull a stint playing bass guitar for his own rock group (Eddie Bell and the Hill Boppers) and with Bill Haley, Blazonczyk grew up in the bosom of the genre. His mother, Antonia Blazonczyk, ran a couple of Chicago-area banquet halls (starting with Pulaski Village in 1948 and the Club Antoinette in 1967) that featured polka music. A host of genre giants passed through the clubs, including Frankie Yankovic, Eddie Zima, and Li'l Wally Jagiello. Her role in providing performance space and sustenance for the art and its practitioners would later earn her a spot in the I.P.A. (International Polka Association) Polka Hall of Fame. In 1963, Blazonczyk gave up his rock 'n' roll dreams to redicate himself to polka music. His first album, Polka Parade, was released that year on his own Bel-Aire label and helped establish the young bandleader as a force to be reckoned with in the genre. While Blazonczyk's own style has its roots in the pulsing, energetic beat of Li'l Wally Jagiello and the smooth, cultured vocal stylings of Marion Lush, he is a trailblazer within his chosen field. He sought to broaden his fan base by blending polka rhythms with American-style country music on groundbreaking albums like All American Country Polkas and Country Flavored Polkas, and mixing English lyrics with the Polish-language tunes favored by the older members of his constituency. As a result, he influenced generations of aspiring young talent. In concert, his clear tenor vocals cut through crowd noise with ease, and his band, the Versatones, is a sharply honed outfit that has served as a training ground for many current stars touring the polka circuit. With the Versatones, Blazonczyk has released over 50 albums on Bel-Aire and other labels, and won over 100 different awards from the three main organizations promoting polka in the United States (the International Polka Association, the United States Polka Association, and the United Polka Boosters). Notwithstanding his influence as a bandleader, Blazonczyk's activities promoting polka are arguably even more important. He runs his own record label, recording studio, and record store, produces radio shows, promotes concerts and festivals (including Polka Fireworks in Champion, Pennsylvania, and Bel-Aire Polka Days in Chicago), and is one of the founding members of the I.P.A.'s Polka Hall of Fame (in 1968). In recognition of Blazonczyk's efforts on behalf of polka music a resolution honoring him was read into the Congressional Record in 1997, and he received a National Heritage Fellowship from the National Endowment for the Arts (NEA) in 1998.

what to buy: Neophytes to the Blazonczyk experience should start with Polkatime: 20 of the Best from Eddie Blazonczyk and the Versatones ♪♪♪♪♪ (Cleveland International, 1996, compilation prod. Eddie Blazonczyk, Pamela Popovich) and/or Greatest Hits, Volume II ♪♪♪♪♪ (Cleveland International, 1997, compilation prod. Eddie Blazonczyk). Both volumes select English- and Polish-language hits that Blazonczyk recorded for Bel-Aire Records from 1968 to 1994, but the second release contains only 12 tracks compared to 20 on the first album. Both discs feature a fair number of early rock and roll standards ("Tweedle Dee," "Hey Joe," "Apples, Peaches, Pumpkin Pie") and country music tunes ("Talk Back Trembling Lips," "Talkin' to the Wrong Man," "Today's Teardrops") that Blazonczyk adapted for the polka market, but they also include more idiomatic polka classics. The second set is shorter in length but still deserving of its bone rating. Longtime fans may carp about tunes not included ("Potato Chip Polka" for one) but that just hints at how deep the man's catalog is for those wishing to explore it further.

what to buy next: While Blazonczyk has been nominated for a polka Grammy ten times (and counting), he has won it only once. That disc, Another Polka Celebration ♪♪♪♪ (Bel-Aire, 1985, prod. Eddie Blazonczyk), managed to tie in the voting with Jimmy Sturr's I Remember Warsaw for the top spot in 1986. The most interesting of Blazonczyk's recent albums is Shakin' Not Stirred ♪♪♪♪ (Bel-Aire, 1998, prod. Eddie Blazonczyk Jr.), where he continues to assault the preconceptions many folks have about polka music. There are a batch of country music mutants ("Someone Cares for You" and "'Scuse Moi My Heart"), a cajun-inflected fiddle tune ("Cajun Polka Queen"), and an interesting treatment of a Stephen Foster classic ("After the Ball") mixed in with straightforward Chicago-style polkas and obereks (another favorite dance rhythm at polka festivals).

Eddie Blazonczyk (l) and Eddie Jr. (center) with the Versatones

best of the rest:
Polka Fireworks ♪♪♪♪ (Bel-Aire, 1984)
Let's Celebrate Again ♪♪♪♪ (Bel-Aire, 1986)
Good Ol' Days ♪♪♪♪ (Bel-Aire, 1989)
Everybody Polka ♪♪♪♪ (Bel-Aire, 1989)
All Around the World ♪♪♪♪ (Bel-Aire, 1990)

worth searching for: Blazonczyk has influenced a host of current polka practitioners so it isn't surprising that a tribute album has been released. Frankie Liszka and TBC put out Our Polka Hero ♪♪♪♪ (Ethnic World Records, 1997, prod. TBC), featuring a batch of hits associated with Blazonczyk. Numerous polka luminaries assist the boys in the band, including Dave "Scrubby" Seweryniak, Larry Trojak, and Mark Trzepacz from the Dynatones and former Versatone Lenny Gomulka.

influences:
⏮ Antonia Blazonczyk, Eddie Zima, Steve Adamczyk, Li'l Wally Jagiello, Marion Lush

⏭ The Dynatones, Lenny Gomulka & Chicago Push, Brave Combo, the Polka Family Band, Frankie Liszka & TBC, Toledo Polkamotion, Eddie Blazonczyk Jr.

Garaud MacTaggart

Alpha Blondy

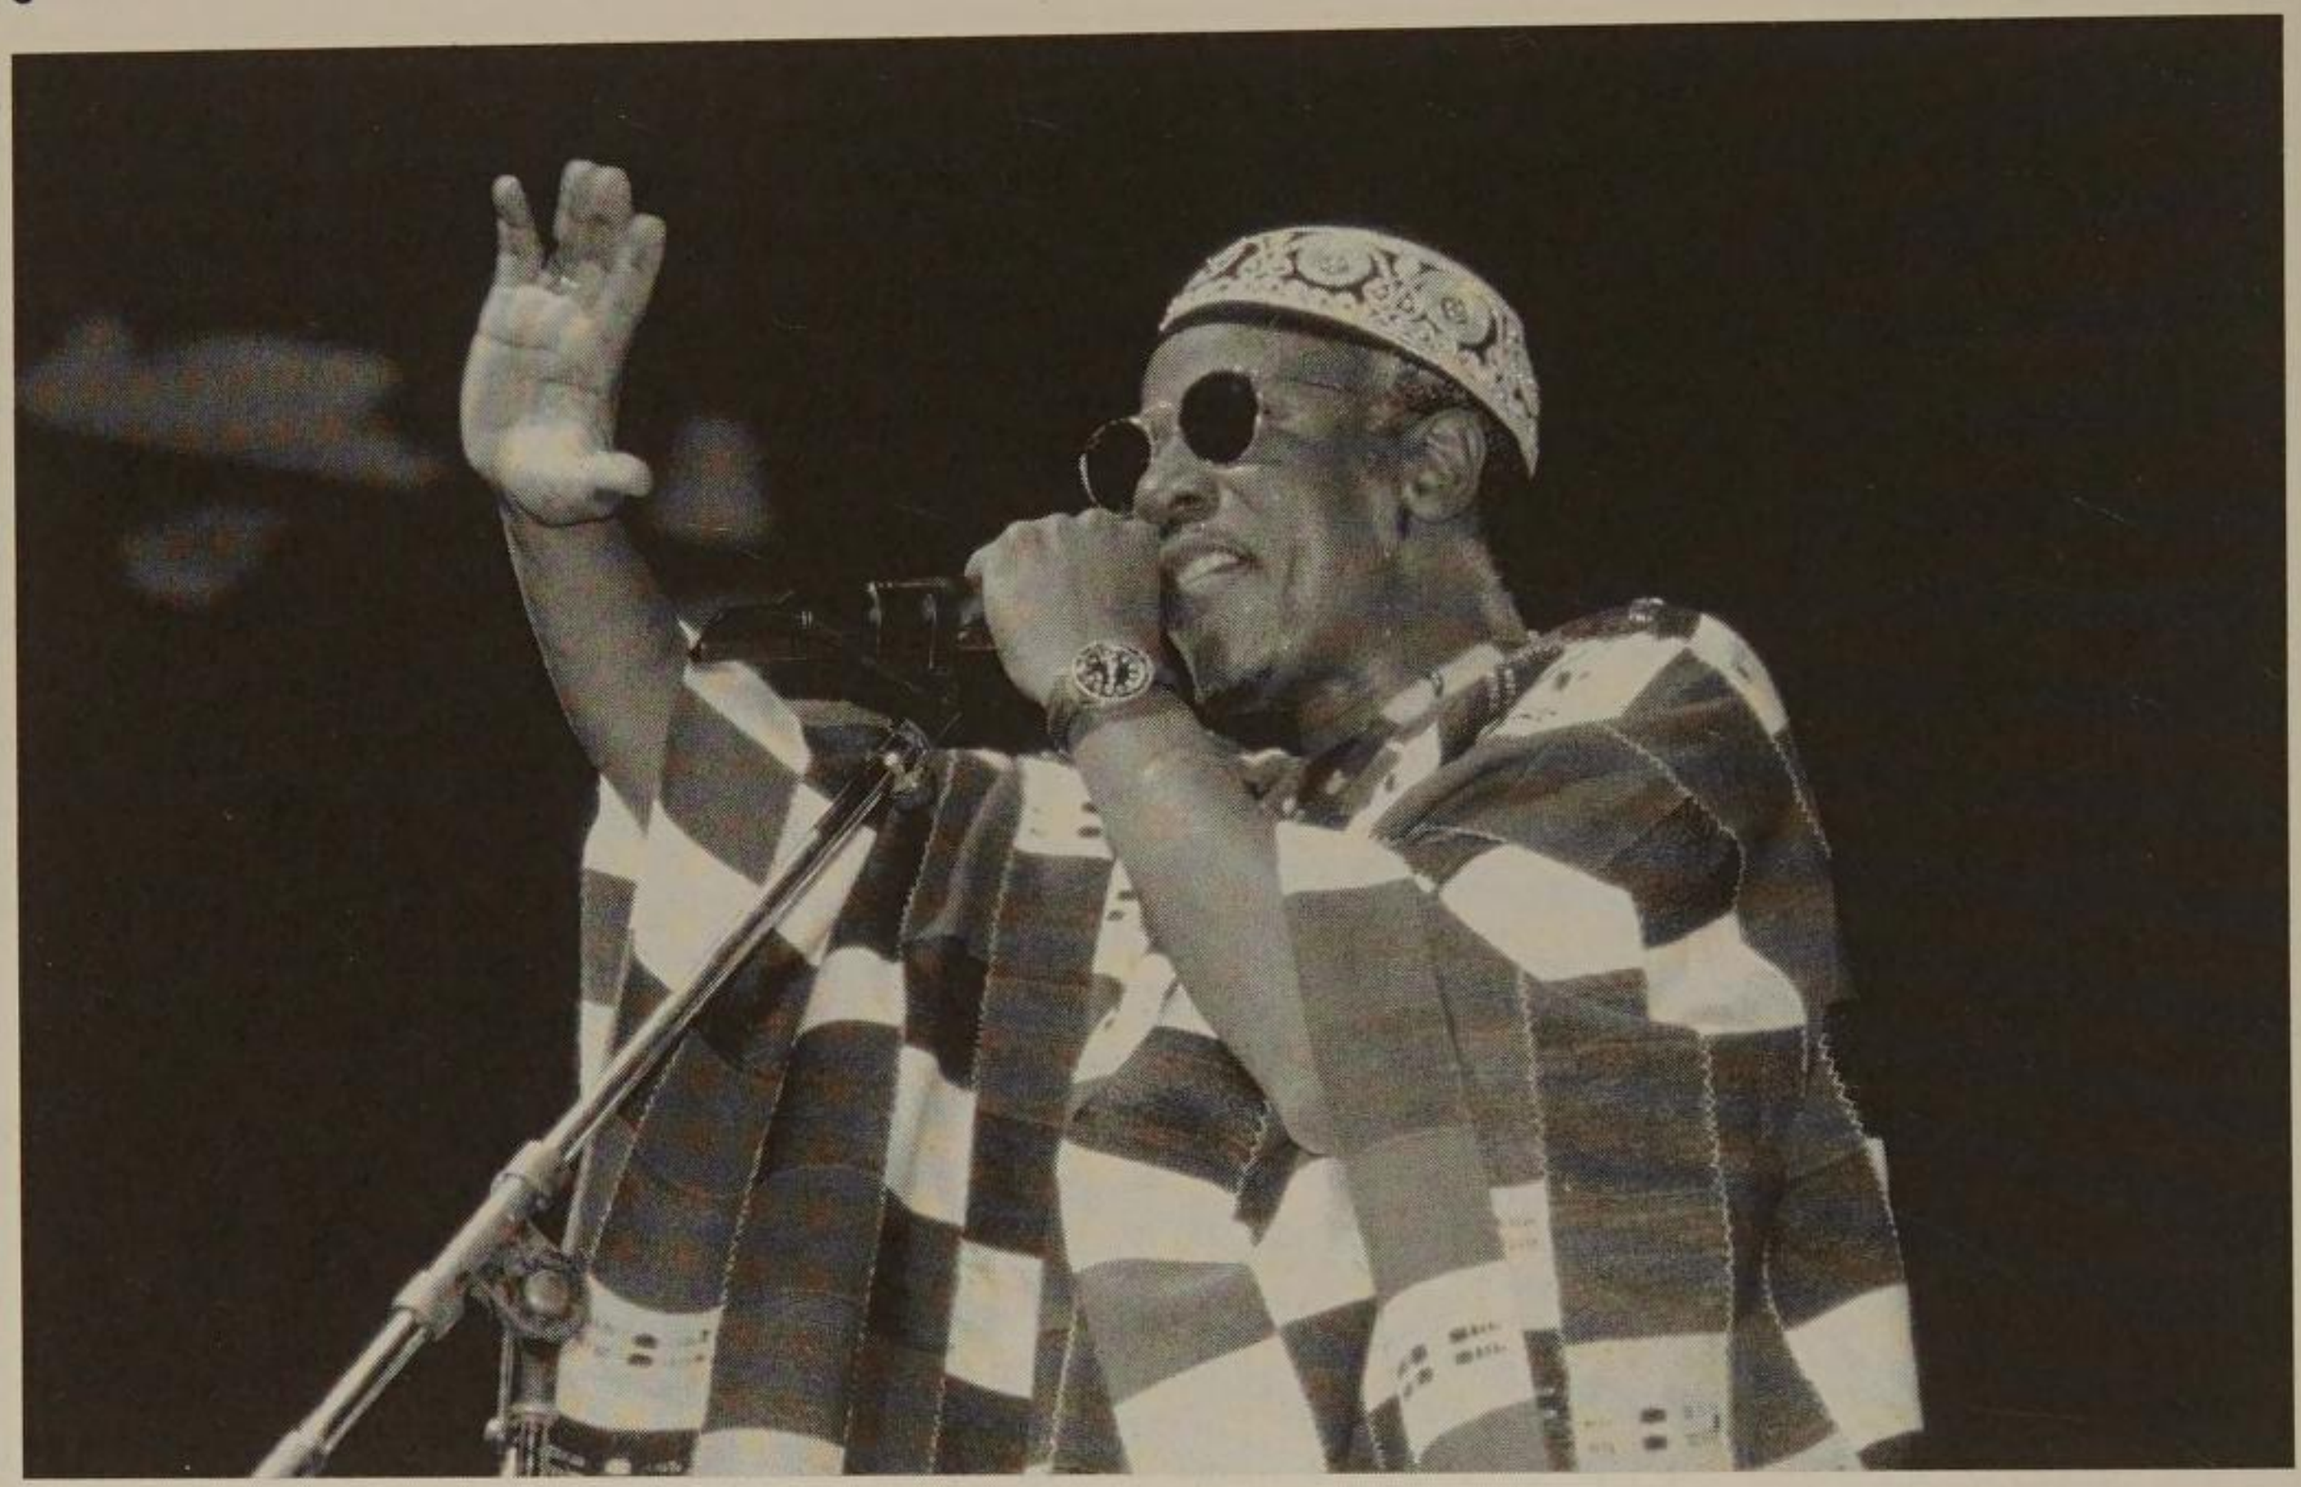
African reggae

Born Seydou Kone, January 1, 1953, in Dimbo Kora, Cote d'Ivoire. Based in Cote d'Ivoire.

Radical politics are fused with African folk music and Bob Marley–inspired reggae by Ivory Coast–born Alpha Blondy. Accompanied by his 12-piece band Solar System, Blondy has used music to speak out against police brutality and racial oppression and to encourage revolution and African unity. Sung in a number of African, Middle Eastern, and European languages, Blondy mainstays like "Apartheid Is Nazism", "Bloodshed in Africa," and "Interplanetary Revolution" leave no doubt about his views.

A member of the Jula tribe, Blondy was raised by his grandmother. A rebellious child, Blondy (meaning "bandit") took the other half of his stage name from the first letter of the Greek alphabet (fully conscious of its Biblical associations). Although as a youth he listened to Western rock bands including Deep Purple, Led Zeppelin, and the Beatles, Blondy initially set his sights on becoming not a musician but a teacher. After traveling to the U.S. to study English at Hunter College and Columbia University in New York, Blondy began performing Bob Marley songs in Harlem clubs. His recording debut might have come soon after when he made six songs produced by Clive Hunt, but Hunt quickly disappeared with the master tapes.

9/6 alpha blondy



Alpha Blondy

It was part of a cycle of anger, justified and otherwise, that has consistently gotten Blondy into trouble with the authorities. Returning to the Ivory Coast, he was arrested for threatening the Ivorian ambassador in New York. Arriving at the police station, he slapped an officer. He subsequently spent a week in jail and a short stay at the Bingerville Asylum in Abidjian. Blondy's fortunes took their first upswing after a well-received performance on the Ivory Coast TV talent show Premier Choice. On the strength of this break he released his debut album, Jah Love, in 1983, and he's been making his own breaks ever since.

what to buy: A heavily political collection, The Best ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1990, prod. Alpha Blondy) reprises 10 tunes from Blondy's early albums, including "Cocody Rock" and "Jerusalem" (recorded with none other than the Wailers), and "Apartheid Is Nazism," "I Love Paris," and "Come Back Jesus" (recorded with the Solar System).

what to buy next: Jerusalem ♪♪♪♪ (Tuff Gong, 1984/Shanachie, 1988, prod. Alpha Blondy) is a true cultural exchange, with the rhythms of the Motherland and the diaspora finding hallowed common ground. Recorded at Bob Marley's Tuff Gong studios in Jamaica, the album backs Blondy's gutsy vocals and hard-hitting lyrics with accompaniment from that definitive complement of reggae royalty, the Wailers.

the rest:

Jah Love ♪♪♪ (Tuff Gong, 1983)
Cocody Rock ♪♪♪½ (Tuff Gong, 1984/Shanachie, 1986)
Revolution ♪♪♪ (Tuff Gong, 1987/Shanachie, 1989)
Apartheid Is Nazism ♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1988)
Masada ♪♪♪ (EMD/Blue Note, 1992)
Dieu ♪♪♪ (EMD/Blue Note, 1995)

The Best of Alpha Blondy ♪♪♪½ (World Pacific, 1996) Prophets ♪♪♪½ (EMI, 1998)

influences:
⏮ Bob Marley, Peter Tosh, Aswad, Black Uhuru

see also: Bob Marley

Craig Harris

Bloque

Rock en Español

Formed 1997, in Bogotá, Colombia. Based in Colombia.

Ivan Benavides, vocals, guitar; Ernesto "Teto" Ocampo, guitar, vocals; Mayte Montero, maraca, gaitas, vocals; Carlos Ivan Medina, piano, vocals; Luis Angel Pastor (el Papa), bass; Pablo Bernal, drums; Alex Martinez, bongos, bell, tambora; Gilbert Martinez, congas, cymbals, side drum, plastic bag, chequere, guiro. (All members are from Colombia.)

Just as "Rock en Español" was becoming clichéd shorthand for Spanish-speaking bands that sounded like the Police and made barely a dent in the U.S. pop psyche, Bloque came along to box a few uninformed ears and reveal just how fresh and inventive this genre could be. Bloque's two principals—frontman Ivan Benavides and guitarist Ernesto Ocampo—had already made a mark as band members and co-writers for techno-traditional Latin superstar Carlos Vives, with whom they field-tested the kind of roots 'n' horizons music they'd later push further as Bloque. Recruiting six additional players, Benavides and Ocampo went about crafting a style that eschewed both fashion and trend: "Something in this world stinks and it's not the sewers/So much concern with image, so much makeup," they sing in "El Hedor (The Stench)." Instead, Bloque effects a strong synthesis of sounds, embracing jazz, hip-hop, and crunching electric guitar riffs along with the traditional African-derived polyrhythms of its homeland. Benavides calls the result "psychotropical funk," and by any other label it's an arresting brew that's immediately pushed Bloque to the forefront of the world pop movement.

what's available: Bloque ♪♪♪♪½ (Luaka Bop/Warner Bros., 1998, prod. Ivan Benavides, Ernesto Ocampo) starts with a song called "Damage in the Bathroom" and closes with Benavides's declaration that "We're partying/And the world is crumbling." Well, when your john and the world are in trouble, why not throw down a little? And on its debut, Bloque throws down a lot. "Nena" fuses hard-rock guitar with salsa rhythms, while the politically charged "Rap del Rebusque" offers horn-fueled hip-hop. Jazz flavors roll through "La Pluma"—a tribute to Colombian guitar hero Peregoyo—and Southern Baptist organ riffs dance around the Afropop licks of "Ay Donde Andara." As with much of Rock en Español, the meaning is sometimes lost

lutes worldwide

"Lute" is a general term describing an extremely large family of diverse musical instruments, the most well-known being the guitar. This family can be divided into long, short, and bowed lutes, but all consist of two parts: a neck (or fingerboard) and a body (or resonator). Lutes have at least one string, but usually more, attached to the body and running across a bridge to the end of the neck, where they connect to some sort of tuning device.

Long lutes have long necks and proportionally smaller bodies, and are generally plucked; archaeology shows that they existed in ancient civilizations in Mesopotamia, Egypt, Greece, and Rome, and they're still popular today throughout much of the non-Western world. Among the more well-known long lutes are the Asian tar (not to be confused with the North African frame drum of the same name); the Indian sitar and tambura; the Turkish saz; and the Japanese shamisen.

Short lutes have necks that are shorter than their bodies, which, in the case of the guitar and violin, is compensated for by running the fingerboard down onto the resonator. These lutes can be seen in Central Asian artwork dating back to the 8th century B.C. The most important short lute is arguably the oud (or 'ud), which originated in the Middle East around the 7th century A.D. and served as the prototype for nearly all of the European plucked instruments—including the guitar, which evolved from the Spanish qitara. Other variations include the Ukrainian balalaika and the Chinese pipa.

Bowed lutes, usually referred to by the generic term "fiddle," come in a broad variety of shapes and sizes, but their precise origins remain unknown. Before the 9th century there is no mention of bowed lutes to be found, yet by the 10th century they were common from Europe and North Africa to Eastern Asia. Modern instruments of this family include the Arabic rabab; the Greek lyra; the Bulgarian gadulka; the Indian sarangi; and, of course, the European violin.

see also: The Bouzouki (sidebar)

Bret Love

in translation, but you don't need a lyric sheet in any language to understand the passion and fire of these 12 songs.

influences:

⏮ Tito Puente, Peregoyo, Carlos Vives, Led Zeppelin, Jimi Hendrix, Ruben Blades, Grandmaster Flash

see also: Carlos Vives

Gary Graff

Blowzabella

British and Celtic folk fusion

Formed 1978, at the London College of Furniture, London, England. Disbanded c. 1990.

Original members: Jon Swayne, bagpipes, woodwinds; Bill O'Toole, bagpipes, woodwinds; Sam Palmer, hurdy-gurdy; Dave Armitage, melodeon, percussion. Final lineup: Andy Cutting, melodeons, percussion; Nigel Eaton, hurdy-gurdies, cello, percussion; Jo Freya, vocals, saxophone, clarinet; Paul James, soprano saxophone, bagpipes, rauschfeife; Ian Luff, guitars, cittern; Jon Swayne, saxophones, bagpipes.

A far cry from the typical folk music produced in England, the gone-but-never-forgotten Blowzabella's distinctive sound was carried on the base of a drone. Using bagpipes and hurdy-gurdy to establish it, the group explored this driving and primal sound to its fullest through the interweaving of dance melodies. The result was hypnotic and extremely unusual, sounding almost as much Middle Eastern as English and drawing on a variety of roots, from England to Ireland to Eastern Europe. The original group—a bunch of musical instrument craftsmen—set out, with great success, to combine the drone with traditional dance tunes; the band's later incarnations explored this further with the use of original material and other harmonic sounds. Blowzabella's members still perform in various configurations, and are a vital link in a chain giving tradition a future.

what's available: The only Blowzabella album currently to be had on an American label, Vanilla ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1990, prod. Paul James) represents the band at its pinnacle. Exciting and highly danceable, the group explores more complex harmonies in its instrumentals and, through vocalist Jo Freya, displays strong emotion in its songs. The result is one of Blowzabella's most varied, highly textured albums, while still spotlighting their drone-based trademark.

worth searching for: Compilation ♪♪♪ (Osmosys, 1995) chronicles the history of the band, featuring two or three cuts from each of their six original albums. A Richer Dust ♪♪♪ (Osmosys, 1988) includes "Wars of the Roses Suite," which was written on a grant from a local arts council to commemorate the 500th anniversary of the Battle of Stoke Field. This piece marked a major turning point for the band, after which their confidence in their own material soared and they began to explore music of a new seriousness and complexity.

influences:

⏮ John Kirkpatrick, Ashley Hutchings, Roger Nicholson

⏭ Tanteeka

see also: Frankie Armstrong

Jo Hughey Morrison

Mari Boine /Mari Boine Persen

Modern joik, worldbeat

Born 1956, in Gamehhisnjarga, Norway. Based in Voss, Norway.

Mari Boine is a Sami (the indigenous people of Northern Finland), but she was raised without any connection to her heritage. "At school we learned Sami culture was worthless," Boine said. "I was ashamed of being Sami." Boine began singing in a Christian church. Unknown to her at the time, there was a Sami influence at work even then. Though the hymns she sang had Christian lyrics, the tunes were adapted from Sami folksongs and joiks (a Sami spiritual form). As her confidence as a performer grew, she began to revisit Sami culture, particularly the joiking tradition, which offers singers unlimited freedom to discover their own voices. She dove into her own background and began developing her own style of joiking, one that included jazz, rock, and world music, particularly the rhythms of the Andes and Africa. Her first album, 1987's Jaskatvouda Manna, brought her to the attention of Peter Gabriel, who signed her to RealWorld. Gula Gula, her international debut, introduced most of the world to Sami music and included tunes about racial discrimination and sexism as well as celebrations of the natural world. Since 1993 she has been recording for Verve World in Europe. Coming full circle in her exploration of personal roots and global affinities, her current project is a combination of Christian hymns and Sami shamanistic music.

what's available: Her latest American release, Radiant Warmth ♪♪♪♪ (Antilles, 1997, prod. Mari Boine and band), is a compilation of two Verve albums from Norway. Boine's eclectic musical bag includes African and Arabic rhythms, jazzy fiddling, and the impressive bass playing of her musical partner, Roger Ludvigsen, but it's Boine's joiking—full of grace notes, falsetto shrieks, growls, and unexpected ululations—that really grabs your ear, and chills you to the bone. Boine's major-label debut, Gula Gula ♪♪♪♪ (RealWorld, 1989), was a reissue of her second album (cut for the indie Sami label Iduit), with a few overdubs to make it more friendly to Western ears. It's more folky and less eclectic than Radiant Warmth, but still worth owning if you like her style.

worth searching for: Boine's Norwegian albums include Jaskatvouda Manna (Iduit), Goaskinviellja (Eagle Brother) (Verve World, 1993), and Leahkastin (Unfolding) (Verve World, 1995).

influences:
⏮ Girls of Angeli

⏭ Ulla

j. poet

Yami Bolo

Reggae

Born Rolando McLean, 1970, in Kingston, Jamaica. Based in Jamaica.

One of the least "slack" (sexually explicit) of the younger reggae performers, Yami Bolo also might be one of the most experienced. Performing since his early teens, he set out on a prestige-by-association track early, performing and recording with heavyweight after heavyweight in his genre. He worked with Sugar Minott's Youth Promotion Crew in the late '70s alongside such notables as Tony Rebel and the late Garnett Silk, and cut his first side for Winston Riley in 1985. One of the young singers not totally caught up in the present-day ragga (digital reggae) style, he performs cultural, positive music with a strong "rock-steady" (proto-reggae) beat but lots of modern sounds as well. Bolo's voice stands up with the best, reminiscent of a tougher Michael Rose (the storied Black Uhuru vocalist). He also throws a tasteful cover version onto nearly every album.

what to buy: Up Life Street ♪♪♪½ (Heartbeat, 1992, prod. T. Douglas, RE McLean) is a throwback to the days of vinyl, when one side might say one thing, and the flipside might present another. In this case, the first "side" is a set of tunes with a streetwise political perspective on life in Kingston. From the opening sirens of "Blood a Run," Bolo rails melodically against Babylon. Later he switches gears, starting with an outstanding cover of the Philly International standard "Life Is a Song Worth Singing." With the exception of "Jah Jah Loving," a more spiritual tune, this "side" stands up with any lovers' rock (the romantic, soul-inspired reggae variant from England) out there.

what to buy next: On the reality tip, Fighting for Peace ♪♪♪½ (RAS, 1994, prod. Yami Bolo, Leggo) includes Bolo's big hit "Glock War, Gun War." On the other, it has an absolutely wonderful version of "Nature Boy." That's depth.

the rest:
He Who Knows It, Feels It ♪♪♪ (Heartbeat, 1991)
Yami Bolo Meets Lloyd Hemmings ♪♪ (Rockers International/RAS, 1995)
Born Again ♪♪½ (RAS, 1996)

influences:
⏮ Black Uhuru, Sugar Minott

see also: Black Uhuru, Sugar Minott, Garnett Silk, the Techniques

Hank Bordowitz

Luiz Bonfá

Brazilian jazz, samba, bossa nova

Born October 17, 1922, in Santa Cruz, Brazil. Based outside of Rio de Janeiro, Brazil.

Brazilian jazz, bossa nova, samba—who comes to mind? Probably Antonio Carlos Jobim and João Gilberto. Both are brilliant musicians and composers who did much to define Brazilian jazz as we know it today. But another looms large: guitarist and composer Luiz Bonfá. Arguably as influential as either Jobim or Gilberto, Bonfá spent his early years honing his impeccable guitar playing and songwriting in the clubs and casinos around Rio de Janeiro. He moved to New York in the late 1950s and, along with Jobim, Gilberto, and saxophonist Stan Getz, helped take bossa nova international in the early '60s. Bonfá is perhaps most famous as the co-composer (with Jobim and Vinícius de Morães) of the score for Marcel Camus's landmark film Black Orpheus, which included the theme "Manhã De Carnaval" (one of the most-recorded songs of all time). In an idiom where subtlety is key, Bonfá is a king. Throughout his career, Bonfá has made more than 30 albums, but sadly, most are out of print and not available on CD. He can, however, be readily heard on the bossa nova recordings of Stan Getz, for which he was such an integral participant and inspiration.

what's available: Non Stop to Brazil ♪♪♪♪½ (Chesky, 1989, prod. David Chesky) captures Bonfá at his most intimate. Accompanied by renowned Brazilian percussionist Café on all tracks and by New York musician Gene Bertoncini as second guitarist on three, Bonfá retraces some of his classics, including "Manhã De Carnaval," "Gentle Rain," "Passeio No Rio," and "Sambolero."

worth searching for: Stan Getz's bossa nova recordings are a sure thing for any jazz collector and provide an excellent opportunity to hear Bonfá in a small group setting. The CDs include Jazz Samba ♪♪♪♪♪ (Verve, 1963, prod. Creed Taylor) and the five-disc boxed set The Bossa Nova Years ♪♪♪♪♪ (Verve, 1964/1989, prod. Richard Seidel, Seth Rothstein, Phil Schaap).

influences:
⏮ Isaias Savio

⏭ Antonio Carlos Jobim, João Gilberto, Charlie Byrd, Laurindo Almeida

see also: João Gilberto, Antonio Carlos Jobim

Andrew BeDell

Bonga

Semba, fado, political

Born Barcelo de Carvalho, 1943, in Luanda, Angola. Based in Lisbon, Portugal.

Born in the working-class outskirts of the Angolan capital and renowned for his feats on the soccer field and the Portuguese national track team, Barcelo de Carvalho forfeited official approval for a leadership role in the Angolan independence movement. He became Bonga Keunza after an arrest warrant was issued in his original name by the Portuguese authorities. Seeking to revive the indigenous music that had fallen into disrepute in his then-colonized homeland, Bonga recorded his first album, Angola 72, soon after going into political exile in the Netherlands. His eloquent rasp of a voice, spotlit by spare instrumentation, made the record an instant classic on two continents, considered as profound a turning point for contemporary African music as Bonga had tried to effect for Angolan society. The follow-up, Angola 74, was equally well received. Bonga continues to record and support a variety of human-rights causes, his dream perhaps deferred but his hope undiminished.

what to buy: Rousing, tender, and deeply emotional, Angola 72 ♪♪♪♪½ (Morabeza, 1972/Tinder, 1997, prod. Bonga) is still Bonga's main claim to history's attention. His favored style here is the semba, an ancient African folk form that became the samba when exported via the slave ships from what is now Angola to Brazil. Banned on Angolan radio (but widely played on stations throughout Central and East Africa), the album became a touchstone and manifesto for the burgeoning liberation movement in the singer's homeland. Even to the most calcified of English-only ears, the music speaks a language of pride and better times ahead.

what to buy next: With a larger contingent of session players and a commercial dance beat, Angola 74 ♪♪♪♪½ (Morabeza, 1974/Tinder, 1997, prod. Bonga) extended Bonga's activist concerns into more accessible sonic territory. If the previous album was his Plastic Ono Band, this is his Imagine. Bonga's voice is even stronger here, with a firmer grip on the emotional demands of each song. To extend the Western pop metaphor, 74 really most resembles There's a Riot Goin' On, with Bonga matching Sly Stone's exhilarating message and graceful command of mood and form. For the moment at least, these are the only two albums available in America by this hugely influential performer.

influences:

⏮ James Brown, Patrice Lumumba

⏭ Waldemar Bastos

Ron Garmon

Cedella Marley Booker

Gospel, reggae, calypso, pop

Born Cedella Malcolm, 1926, in Nine Miles, St. Ann's Parish, Jamaica. Based in Miami, FL, USA.

Everyone knows Bob Marley's legacy lives on—in the person of his also-acclaimed life partner and spiritual executor Rita and the couple's talented children—but how many people know his heritage lives on too, through the recordings of his musical mom? Cedella Marley Booker–"Mother Booker" to her relatives and widespread admirers—lived a quiet life for most of her now 70-plus years, running a grocery shop in the hill country of St. Ann and later living with young Robert Nesta Marley in the government housing of Kingston before settling in the U.S. without fanfare. But her voice was never quiet, nurtured by an upbringing around a musician father and uncle, and apprenticed, to local acclaim, in the gospel choirs of her home parish. Years afterward, the son she saw rise to fame would promise to one day produce a gospel album with Mother Booker singing in front of his legendary band the Wailers. But destiny intervened, and Booker ended up succoring her son on his deathbed with the songs that grew into her first album, chronicling their mutual ordeal and serving as one of many heartfelt epitaphs he continues to receive. Song became Bob's immortality and Mother Booker's survival, and though her body of work remains small, it retains the rare uplift of music not driven by the market but moved by the spirit.

what's available: This living madonna of reggae's holy family never fails to draw a pantheon of other music luminaries to her side for her infrequent recordings. For instance, Awake Zion ♪♪♪♪ (ROIR, 1990, prod. Aston "Family Man" Barrett, Cedella Booker, Sporty), originally released in 1984 as Redemption Songs with one less track, features nearly all of the prophesied Wailers as its backing band. In both sound quality and style, the album's first few songs recall budget compilations of 1940s Stateside pop and country entertainers, but stick with it; inspiration hits in due course. "Stay Alive" stands out with impassioned vocals and real-deal reggae production; gospel meets girl-group and Booker revels in her roots on the exuberant "You've Got to Move." The singer transcends "Mother Don't Cry"'s odd Nashville-reggae arrangement with an emotion-brimming, life-force vocal and a moving, insightful spoken dedication to the bereaved. She then acquits herself admirably on a gospel-ized version of Marley's "Put It On (Lord I Thank You)." The sensational "Something in a Something" (the one track added for the album's '90s release) contrasts a raw live choral recording with slick late-'80s pop-reggae production for a cinematic sound-pan from Booker's church-house roots to her studio reign. Living up to her nickname in yet another way, Mother

Booker does an unlikely diva turn on a children's album, Smilin' Island of Song ♪♪♪♪ (Music for Little People/Warner Bros., 1994, prod. Leib Ostrow, Taj Mahal), which features jubilant Caribbean traditionals, some Booker originals penned with Ronald Asher, and one Marley song. Once again, an extended family of musical admirers convenes around her, including boundary-less bluesman Taj Mahal, string virtuoso and world-music patron David Lindley, and Trinidadian multi-percussionist Kester Smith. Booker is in fine, full voice; the tracks are by and large delightful; and though the loose between-song narrative is more for kids than grown-ups, its overall message of intercultural welcome is nourishing and deft, its end-of-disc instrument identification guide is illuminating and succinct, and Booker's background stories on the songs are a folkloric gem. Mahal lends his smoldering vocals to a sweet, singular "Banana Boat Song"; prime reggae and calypso rhythms abound; Booker's own "Jah Wanna Dance" and her cover of Marley's "Three Little Birds" work beautifully; and spry, imaginative arrangements guarantee as much substance for the adults as there is fun for the target audience—especially on a dread, cautionary "Ooey Gooey the Silly Worm" (stop laughing, you!).

influences:

⏮ Omeriah Malcolm, Shiloh Apostolic Church

⏭ Bob Marley, Rita Marley

see also: Taj Mahal, Bob Marley, Rita Marley, Ziggy Marley & the Melody Makers, Bunny Wailer

Adam McGovern

Boom Shaka

Reggae

Formed 1986, in Los Angeles, CA, USA. Based in Los Angeles, CA, USA.

Trevor "Trevy" Felix (Dominica), lead vocals, guitar; Lesterfari Simbarashe (USA), lead guitar; Ra Bassie (Dominica), bass, vocals.

Boom Shaka plays roots reggae—with touches of dancehall, rock, and funk, as befits a band trying to make it in L.A.'s club scene. "Trevy" Felix, originally from Dominica, came to the U.S. in 1978 to join his brother Ra Bassie in a quest for fame and fortune in the music business. They tried several styles but finally fell under the spell of the militant message and Caribbean groove of reggae. In 1986 they met Lesterfari Simbarashe, an L.A. native who'd played with Black Uhuru, and things clicked. With the help of a couple of side men, they recorded Creation for their own Baga Style label, but a strong local buzz led to national distribution by Moving Target, Celluloid's reggae subdivision. They tour their high-energy show endlessly, and although the music does have traces of funk and dancehall in the riddims, they are serious about maintaining a roots-reggae vibe, and eschew technology in favor of live musicians. In 1998 they signed a three-record deal with Shanachie, which should take them another step closer to national recognition.

what to buy: Best Defenses ♪♪♪ (Liberty, 1992, prod. Ron Terry) is a solid roots-reggae set highlighted by a touch of Motown and a decided Afro-Jamaican funde groove. On Rebel-Lion ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1998, prod. Fabian Cooke) the band's strong original material is supplemented by a couple of tasty covers, including a reggae-ized version of Prince's "Sign o' the Times."

the rest:

Creation ♪♪♪ (Moving Target, 1988)
Freedom Now! ♪♪♪ (Stone Mountain, 1996)

influences:

⏮ Steel Pulse, Black Uhuru

see also: Black Uhuru

j. poet

Jimmy Bosch

Salsa, Latin jazz

Born 1962, in Hoboken, NJ, USA. Based in New York, NY, USA.

Jimmy Bosch is the preeminent trombone player in Latin music. Renowned for his highly lyrical style, Bosch has worked with such genre leaders as Eddie Palmieri, Marc Anthony, Celia Cruz, Ray Barretto, Ruben Blades, and Manuel Orquendo. A student of the trombone from age 11, Bosch first attracted attention with a local merengue band, Arcoires. Shortly after enrolling in the classical music department of New Jersey's Rutgers University in 1978, Bosch began playing with Orquendo's Salsa band Y Libre. Notwithstanding his ascent as a much in-demand session player, he stayed with this musical mentor until the mid-1990s. Then, after years as one of Latin music's most illustrious faces in the crowd, Bosch successfully stepped into the spotlight with the formation of his own band, the Masters, in 1996, releasing his debut solo album two years later.

what's available: With Bosch's Latin-flavored trombone playing accompanied by such influential honored guests as Cuban trumpeter Chocolate Armenteros and vocalist Pete Rodriquez, Soneando Trombon ♪♪♪♪ (Ryko Jazz, 1998, prod. Jimmy Bosch) is an excitingly auspicious solo debut.

influences:

⏮ Ruben Blades, Willie Colon, Manuel Orquendo

⏭ Marc Anthony, Cachao, La India

see also: La India

Craig Harris

Jimmy Bosch

The Bothy Band

Irish traditional

Formed February 1975, in Dublin, Ireland. Disbanded August 1979.

Dónal Lunny, bouzouki, guitar, bodhrán, synthesizer, vocals; Paddy Glackin, fiddle (1975); Paddy Keenan, uilleann pipes, whistles; Matt Molloy, flute, whistles; Mícheál Ó Domhnaill, guitar, vocals; Tríona Ní Dhomhnaill, vocals, clavinet, harmonium, electric piano; Tommy Peoples, fiddle (1975–76); Kevin Burke (England), fiddle (1976–79). (All members are from Ireland except where noted otherwise.)

When Dónal Lunny left Planxty and formed his record company Mulligan, he also began to work with a select group of musicians, Matt Molloy (flute), Paddy Keenan (pipes), and Paddy Glackin (fiddle), who had been performing with Tony MacMahon (accordion) for radio broadcasts. The five were joined soon afterwards by siblings Mícheál Ó Domhnaill (guitar, vocals) and Tríona Ní Dhomhnaill (vocals, clavinet), whose songs from the Donegal sean-nós ("old-style") tradition had brought them recognition with the band Skara Brae. They had indeed previously recorded with Lunny, Molloy, and Donegal fiddle player Tommy Peoples on Mick Hanly's 1974 Celtic Folkweave, and Tríona had also played and recorded with Molloy, Peoples, piper Peter Browne, and singer Liam Weldon in 1973 under the name Sixteen Ninety-One. The configuration that would come to be known as the Bothy Band was initially called Seachtar ("seven" in Gaelic) and was short-lived, MacMahon being forced to leave early on because of his work as a TV and radio producer. With a name change, the six remaining musicians made their debut at Trinity College, Dublin, on February 2, 1975. Only a few months later, Glackin was replaced by Peoples, with whom the band made its first recording, simply called The Bothy Band 1975. The impact of that album was tremendous, and many of the tunes and songs on it became instant classics, played and replayed to this day at sessions in and out of Ireland. After Kevin Burke replaced Peoples as the band's fiddle player, the Bothy Band recorded two equally memorable studio albums in 1976 and '77, then released a live recording made in Paris in 1978. By then, the strain of constant touring and financial mismanagement had taken its toll, and band members were starting to pursue other projects. The Bothy Band made its final appearance at the Ballysadare festival in August 1979. While hopes of a reunion have not materialized so far, all former members have continued to be major creative forces in the Irish traditional music scene and beyond.

what to buy: From the very first chord strummed by Lunny and Ó Domhnaill—with Keenan's drones adding their low buzz before he and Molloy launch into "The Kesh Jig"—to the last echoes of the reel "The Sailor's Bonnet," The Bothy Band 1975 ♪♪♪♪♪ (Mulligan, 1975/Green Linnet, 1983, prod. Dónal Lunny, Mícheál Ó Domhnaill) is a monumental album that set the scene for much of what has happened since in the world of Irish traditional music. The sound quality may not be quite as good as what listeners would expect today, and the lead instruments may be slightly out of tune on a couple of tracks; still, this is the quintessential Bothy Band recording. Peoples's razor-sharp, urgent fiddle playing gives the band unmatched raw sound and energy, while Lunny and Ó Domhnaill's inventive chord progressions and tightly matched accompaniment patterns propel the music forward. Last but not least, the Domhnaills' thrilling songs in English and Gaelic perfectly balance the band's instrumental virtuosity. Old Hag You Have Killed Me ♪♪♪♪♪ (Mulligan, 1976/Green Linnet, 1982, prod. Dónal Lunny, Mícheál Ó Domhnaill) is the band's mature album. With Kevin Burke's flowing and bluesy Sligo- and Clare-tinged fiddle playing replacing Peoples's hard-edged sound in the mix, the band may have lost some of its grittiness, but none of its energy. The production is first-rate and one gets a sense that the band is graduating from its experimental phase and taking charge of its sound. The players achieve a near-perfect balance between breathtaking instrumentals, like the fiddle-driven "Farewell to Erin" or the dramatic "Michael Gorman's," and striking vocal tracks, like the piece of Scottish "mouth music" "Fionnghuala" and Ní Dhomhnaill's lilting "16 Come Next Sunday." The group's third album, Out of the Wind into the Sun ♪♪♪♪½ (Mulligan, 1977/Green Linnet, 1985, prod. Dónal Lunny, Mícheál Ó Domhnaill), while still packing a punch, did not quite achieve that same balance. Although they are classics, Ní Dhomhnaill's songs (she is the only vocalist on this one) are all pretty much in the same vein. On the other hand, the band's instrumentals are as powerful as ever, especially the reel marathon "Rip the Calico," Kevin Burke's setting of the classic pipe tune "The Hag at the Churn," and the amazing closing set of slides. By the time the live album Afterhours ♪♪♪♪½ (Mulligan, 1978/Green Linnet, 1984, prod. the Bothy Band) was recorded in Paris, the band was reportedly falling apart, a victim of the pressures of the road. Yet the performance is as good as one might hope for—and there are even a few surprises, like some songs that did not appear on any of the studio albums, particularly "The Death of Queen Jane" and "The Heathery Hills of Yarrow."

what to buy next: The Best of the Bothy Band ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1988) is an appealing collection of 12 tracks taken from the band's four original albums. When rumors started circulating about new Bothy Band recordings about to be released, they generated a considerable amount of anticipation. As it turns out, the 16 tracks on Live in Concert ♪♪♪♪ (Windsong, 1994/Green Linnet, 1996, prod. Pete Dauncey) were selected from two BBC-sponsored concerts that took place in 1976 and 1978. Although perhaps not as impressive as Afterhours, the album has its moments. The first batch of tracks is somewhat curious because sitting in for Paddy Keenan is piper Peter Browne, formerly associated with some of the "Bothies" in the band Sixteen Ninety-One. Browne is not nearly the piper Keenan is, but his presence may be the cause of changes in the instrumental medleys that will keep the listeners attentive. Keenan's pipe solo, from the 1978 concert, may also sound odd but will make sense to anyone who has met this moody genius or heard him perform. There is still plenty of exciting music throughout, as the crowd's reactions during the closing "Rip the Calico" medley will attest.

worth searching for: As obscure albums go, one could hardly beat the two Breton-produced LPs mixing tracks by Sixteen Ninety-One with recordings by the Castle Ceili Band of Dublin. On Irish Music ♪♪♪½ (Escalibur, c. 1973) and Chants et Danses d'Irlande ♪♪♪½ (Folk Loisirs, c. 1973), which were combined on the more recent CD release Irish Traditional Pub Music (Arfolk), Bothy Band fans can hear the emergence of some of the ideas that shaped the band's sound a few years later. A prototype version of the famous track "Green Groves" has Molloy's flute introducing the tune, soon joined by Tommy Peoples's fiery fiddling, with Tríona Ní Dhomhnaill's now-classic clavinet accompaniment taking it up a notch on "Flowers of Red Hill." While the mix is often rough, there are some nice surprises, particularly with Tríona's songs, which include the unaccompanied "Rinne Me Smaointeadh Im Intinn" and a version of "The Banks of Claudy," which her brother recorded with Mick Hanly on the LP Celtic Folkweave ♪♪♪♪½ (Polydor, 1974, prod. Dónal Lunny). There is also hope that the Domhnaills' work on Skara Brae ♪♪♪♪½ (Gael-Linn, 1971/Shanachie, 1983) will eventually reappear on CD, but for now one must search the used LP bins for it.

influences:

- Ceoltóirí Cualann, Sweeney's Men, Planxty, Skara Brae, Sixteen Ninety-One, Seachtar
- Touchstone, Moving Hearts, Nightnoise, the Dónal Lunny Group, Altan, Dervish

see also: Kevin Burke, Patrick Cassidy, Paddy Glackin, Dónal Lunny, Matt Molloy, Maighread Ní Dhomhnaill, Tríona Ní Dhomhnaill, Nightnoise, Tommy Peoples, Planxty, Trian

Philippe Varlet

Boukan Ginen

Mizik rasin

Formed 1990, in Port-au-Prince, Haiti. Based in Port-au-Prince, Haiti.

Eddy François, vocal, guitar, bass; Vladimir Jean-Félix, lead guitar, bass; Richard Laguerre, bass; Bedy Andre Eugene, guitars; Milot Eliassant, keyboards; Evens Seney, hand drums; Myrtho Exavier, hand drums; Dieseul Liberus, hand drums; Jude Sanon, hand drums; Jean E. Dorvil, lead vocals. (All members are from Haiti.)

Eddy François, Evens Seney, and Jean E. Dorvil were early members of Boukman Eksperyans and helped that band revolutionize Haitian music by returning the African rhythms of the Vodou ritual to the soundscape of the island's carnival forms. Mizik rasin (roots music) soon became the island's most notable artistic export since the heyday of Tabou Combo, with Boukman spawning a number of clones and worthy competitors. In 1990, François, Seney, and Dorvil left Boukman over the usual "creative differences" and founded Boukan Ginen. Happily, the split has produced two great bands, with Boukan Ginen quickly finding its own artistic voice. Boukan's literal voice, though, sings—like Boukman's—in Creole, the "language of the poor," which was frowned upon during the days of the Duvalier regime. Their songs are full of breakneck rhythms, soul-stirring vocal harmonies, blazing hand drumming, and militant lyrics—still a potent and sometimes dangerous mix, even under the current, allegedly democratic government.

what to buy: Jou a Rive ♪♪♪♪♪ (Xenophile, 1995, prod. Yvon Ciné) is a blast of pure energy that'll shake you to the core. The African vibe is palpable, not only in the bouncy drum rhythms, but also the deep Ladysmith-like vocal harmonies. Vladimir Jean-Félix adds some shredding rock guitar to the mix, but it's the supersonic basslines and supercharged drumming that make this music cook.

what to avoid: Rèv an Nou ♪♪♪½ (Xenophile, 1996, prod. Boukan Ginen) is a relative disappointment after the blistering energy of the band's debut. The production is softer, with the electric kick drum bringing to mind the smooth pop of the Afro-Parisian session heavies. There are traces of Cuba and Jamaica in the band's sound, and "Move Fanmi" and "Ma Doute" will definitely get you moving, but overall this is a rather laid-back excursion.

influences:

⏮ Boukman Eksperyans, Groupo Mackandal

⏭ Ram

see also: Boukman Eksperyans, Tabou Combo

j. poet

Boukman Eksperyans

Mizik rasin (roots music), rara, Vodou, worldbeat

Formed 1979, in Ouanaminthe, Haiti. Based in Port-au-Prince, Haiti.

Théodore "Lôlô" Beaubrun Jr., lead and backup vocals, keyboards, piano, tambou; Mimerose "Manze" Beaubrun, lead and backup vocals; Daniel "Dady" Beaubrun, lead and backup vocals, lead guitar, rhythm guitar, bass, keyboards, drum programming, percussion (member until the late 1990s); Marjorie Beaubrun, lead and backup vocals, percussion (1992–late 1990s); Eddy "Samba Agau" François, lead and backup vocals, rhythm guitar, bass (member until 1990); Evens Seney, backup vocals, maman tambou (member until 1990); Gary Seney, backup vocals, tambou, kata, maman tambou, percussion; Frantz "Ti Crab" Seney, backup vocals, percussion (member until 1992); Patrick St. Val-Demorcy, backup vocals, percussion (member until 1992); Maguy Jean-Louis, lead and backup vocals, percussion (member until the late 1990s); Henri B.D. Pierre Joseph, backup vocals, katabou, tambou, percussion; Michel Melthon "Olicha" Lynch (died 1994), backup vocals, maman tambou, percussion (1992–94); Hans "Bwa Gris" Dominique, maman tambou, bamboo, percussion (1992–present); Mackel "Ti Bazol" Jean-Baptiste, lead guitar, bass (1995–present); Ted Gabriel Beabrun, percussion, keyboards (1998–present); Jean Paul Coffy, keyboards (1998–present); Alexis Raymond, drums, percussion (1998–present); Hubert Sévère, bass, vocals (1998–present). (Published spellings of names and instruments vary; all members are from Haiti.)

Lots of bands inspire passionate pros and cons, but they've got nothing on Boukman Eksperyans. "One time some military guys at a concert tried to shoot on us, but other military pulled their guns out also, and said to them, 'If you shoot on the people of Boukman we're going to shoot on you.'" Co-leader Lôlô Beaubrun is recalling one of many times the band has found itself on a dictatorship's literal hit parade. "And these colonels, captains, majors, told us to leave the stage, and gave us security to go home. And they were risking their lives at that time, but no reaction ever came." That time was 1990, shortly before Boukman's Carnival anthem "Ke'-m Pa Sote" ("My Heart Doesn't Leap/I'm Not Afraid") became the theme song of those who swept the dictator Prosper Avril from power; and the place was Haiti, where rock 'n' roll rebellion is more than a figure of speech.

"Boukman" was the name of a prominent figure in Haiti's original liberation struggle with France, but Boukman the band's first revolution was musical. They dared a back-to-the-future-ism common to many of the most lauded "Third World" bands—those who revive indigenous genres frowned upon by their nations' West-courting elites, and endow their music with a distinctness and originality that ends up catching more of the international community's attention than ever before. In Boukman's case the progression from underground to global sensation drew on the misunderstood religion of Vodou, the springtime street-festival rhythms of rara, and the vernacular language of Creole, mixed with a range of modern influences that the band adopted audaciously rather than accepting meekly. Their simultaneous seizing of outside possibilities and reclaiming of their roots was both rewarded as an instant musical hit and embraced as a validation of the common people after a long suppression of their identity and ambitions by a succession of U.S.-supported regimes. That period was actually still at full force when Boukman formed, and not quite over when the band's first album appeared in the historical minefield between the fall of the Duvalier dynasty and the unprecedented free election of Jean Bertrand Aristide. The international attention and intense homefront support garnered by Boukman's blend of alternately impassioned and unearthly vocals and alternately insistent and reassuring rhythms no doubt helped keep them alive, as song after song was banned from broadcast and performance and physical threats were made on members. But Lôlô also attributes the band's longevity to fans in higher places.

"A guy came to our concert with an Uzi and tried to shoot on us, but something was happening that night and he never really could do the act—and we were just in front of him. The real reason," Lôlô recalls with relieved laughter, "I think it was God—God really helped us a lot during that time." There was an earlier time when at least some of the members of Boukman might not have needed quite so much help. The Beaubrun brothers were born into celebrity and relative comfort as sons of one of their country's all-time favorite entertainment personalities, Theodore Beaubrun, "The Bill Cosby of Haiti." But rather than presenting a materialistic lure, the range of cosmopolitan influences this upbringing exposed them to seems to have just instilled a keener sense of the global machinations hindering their nation, and of how much more that nation could have. Time and again the band has thrown in with the masses, never relocating abroad and running very real risks in the process.

Then again, the powers with a stake in Haiti's most desperate hour—the period of military rule that for several years left Aristide in exile—had other ideas about the relocation part. At one point midway through an early-'90s tour of Europe and America, Boukman became a band without a country, as their British visas ran out, an executive order barring non-resident Haitians from entering the U.S. went into effect, and an ongoing U.S. embargo kept them from returning to their own land. (That same blockade, while not appreciably affecting the U.S.-trained dictator Raoul Cédras, did fatally delay medications to their ailing bandmate Michel Melthon "Olicha" Lynch). With scant hours left on their legal status in any country, Island Records had them flown to a safe house in then-CEO Chris Blackwell's adoptive home of Jamaica, where, out of the most adverse circumstances of their lives, they forged the most upbeat and energizing album of their career, Libète (Pran Pou Pran'l!)/Freedom (Let's Take It!).

Eventually both Boukman and Aristide got back to Haiti, the latter with mixed results that the band, though once a scourge of his enemies, has not hesitated to critique. The experience of being outcasts in the eyes of both the junta and the "land of the free" solidified their healthy skepticism of all people in power, while the absurdity of that situation seems to have fortified, rather than undermined, their sense of humor. "The day after the 1990 Carnival, the people got on the street against President Avril, and were singing our song ['Ke'-m Pa Sote'] at every occasion, and he left power 10 days after—and then, you know, all the politicians, on the right and left, took the song also at their rallies," Lôlô chuckles, "to show the people they're on their side—you know those guys!"

At least give Haiti's political hacks credit for having better taste in music than our own '70s-MOR-loving leaders. And rest assured that they're no more able to strip a great song of its meaning than the car-commercial producers up here. "Ke'-m Pa Sote" is the tip of a very large and unstoppable iceberg of electrifying Boukman music; the opening chord in one of the Western hemisphere's most durable artistic success stories. Its advent in 1990 was an exhilarating epilogue for an often brutally neocolonialist decade, and to hear that song ring out from both stage and audience amidst a mostly Haitian concert crowd is to feel possibility personified.

Neither the feel-good performances nor the mad-as-hell subject matter have subsided in the years since. Boukman's themes range from devotional invocations to folkloric anecdote to, in hefty proportion, denunciations of outside military intervention and monetary manipulation in their homeland. It's mostly sung in Creole so non-Haitians don't have to listen to the message if they don't want to—but its unquenchable optimism and indomitable groove is something you couldn't resist if you tried. Boukman Eksperyans stand as an unpretentious legend of late-20th-century music and politics, both survivors of the worst that human nature is capable of, and prophets of the best it has to offer.

what to buy: Libète (Pran Pou Pran'l!)/Freedom (Let's Take It!) ♪♪♪♪♪ (Mango, 1995, prod. Clive Hunt, Daniel Beaubrun, Theodore Beaubrun Jr.) may just be world-music's Sgt. Pepper, catchy but never compromised, multi-influenced but the product of an unmistakably singular vision. Boukman have never cracked the live-in-the-studio code better than with the soulful percussion-and-voice album opener "Legba," and never at a better time—the song is an invocation of the Vodou deities. Holed up as renegades from both their would-be assassins and supposed saviors, they must have felt they needed divine intervention, and divine inspiration is what they deliver, from the

if-you're-not-dancing-you're-dead festivity of "Rara te Celia (Little Celia's Rara)," to the substantive pop balladry of "Ki Moun (Who Will)," and from the soul-synth diva turn of "Zili," to the urgent, exhilarating Carnival rallying cries of "Peye Pou Peye (You Must Pay)" and "Jou Mallè (Day of the Shock)." The band digs deep for the best vocals of their career, and the spirits of dub reggae hang over the Jamaican studio to guide a humanistic yet mystical electronics sound they haven't yet surpassed. Sharp songwriting, pristine but gutsy production, and an ecstatic resolve in the face of crushing obstacles yield up a true masterwork. Boukman achieve a stunningly organic sound on Kalfou Danjere/Dangerous Crossroads ♪♪♪♪♪ (Mango, 1992, prod. Eric Clermontet), with tight musicianship and serene melodicism that ingeniously evoke both the tension the band was facing after the overthrow of Aristide and the composure with which they met it. The dominant acoustic instruments are recorded in the most rich and immediate way, and the electric and electronic ones are deployed with maximum restraint, impact, and atmosphere. This is the Boukman album that hews most consistently to the folkloric continuum of sounds, yet offers a wealth of variety within it, from the rolling, pastoral rhythms of "Kouman Sa Ta Ye (What Would It Be Like)" or "Vodou Adjae," to the galloping tempo of the Carnival-theme title song, to three breathtaking, chorally chanted Vodou invocations, "Badè Zile," "Fèy (Leaf)," and "Mayi A Gaye." As striking an album in its depth as Libète is in its breadth.

what to buy next: On their debut, Vodou Adjae ♪♪♪♪ (Mango, 1991, executive prod. Claude Duvall Jr.), Boukman take a while to hit their trademark stride of balancing vital traditional acoustics with catchy modern electronics, and the wait takes its toll with some well-written songs dampened by prettified production ("Se Kreyo'l Nou Ye (We're Creole)"; "Nou La (We're Here)"). But "Plante (Plant)"'s driving coda hints at the visionary abandon to come, as does a pretty faithfully incendiary reading of the legendary "Ke'-m Pa Sote," whose inclusion alone makes this an important purchase. "Nou Pap Sa Bliye (We Won't Forget This)" gets the mix very right, and then we're off into the breathtaking vocal showcases "Wet Chen (Get Angry, Break the Chains)" and "Mizike A Manze' (Song for a Woman)." Though the syrupy "Tribilasyon," unavailable on cassette versions of the album, is enough to make you lament the advent of CDs, the other disc-only track, "Mizere'Re' (Misery Follows You)" is anomalous in a good way; an intriguing Haitian/hard-rock hybrid that a less eclectic band could easily mine a whole career out of. The album ends on a strong if haunting note with the compelling, ominous "Pwazon Rat (Rat Poison)," which manages to be at once syncopated and somber.

what to avoid: Comings and goings are to be expected in a band of Boukman's mini-orchestra size, but Revolutíon ♪ (Tuff Gong International, 1998, prod. Theodore "Lôlô" Beaubrun Jr., Mimerose "Manze" Beaubrun) shows the band's most profound membership shake-up yet not to be a change for the better. Co-founders Lôlô and Manze Beaubrun stayed and their long-time partners Daniel and Marjorie Beaubrun departed, seemingly taking at least half the band's muse with them. Cheesy synths, justly uncredited hack guitar heroics, melodramatic melodic clichés, and a general shortage of momentum predominate. The rara "Peye Loa Yo" effects a nice spontaneity and replication of on-site street sonics, though it's not their most memorable exploration of the style; the Carnival tune "Tipa Tipa" starts out energetic but, as too often occurs on this album, the band gets into a good groove that soon turns into a rut. The album has its moments; unfortunately, they seldom last for the length of any one song, Exhibit A being the Carnival tune "Gran Bwa Karnival," a nine-minute heap of very good ideas and not-so-good ones that has all the scope of Boukman's past entries into this genre, but none of the resolution. Hope for the band's artistic fate is confirmed by the fact that the album's most promising track is the one furthest from its trademark sounds: "Nou Se Limye," a poignant yet amorphous pop ballad with a notable, haggard, torch-song vocal by Manze. Let's just say they're between masterpieces at the moment.

the rest:

Boukman Eksperyans—Live at Red Rocks N/A (Tuff Gong International, 1999)

influences:

◀◀ Bob Marley, Kassav'

▶▶ Boukan Ginen, Spearhead

see also: Boukan Ginen

Adam McGovern

Robin Huw Bowen

Welsh harp

Born June 7, 1957, in Liverpool, England. Based in Wales.

Robin Huw Bowen is on a mission to reinvigorate the tradition of the triple harp in Wales. The triple harp is a very unusual variety, with three rows of strings. It is the only truly chromatic harp extant, and it opens up a whole new repertoire. When the Welsh discovered it in the 16th century, they adopted it as their national instrument, thereby helping to maintain the tradition of harping in Wales long beyond that in the neighboring Celtic countries. Although the Welsh eventually turned to the pedal harp, there were some proponents of the triple harp to keep its legacy alive; these included the Gypsy harpers and later a few dedicated individuals who learned from the last of them. Bowen studied several of the standard-bearers' work and in his quest has developed an amazing virtuosity, surpassed by none. His mastery of his instrument and love of his ancestral roots have allowed him to give a special gift to the harping community. In 1987 he published a book of some 200 Welsh hornpipes that he collected, edited, and arranged for the triple harp; his in-depth understanding of the Welsh form of theme-and-variation is demonstrated in these arrangements. He now tours the world, introducing the magic of the triple harp to audiences wherever he goes.

Boukman Eksperyans

what to buy: Bowen usually shines in concert in a way that doesn't quite translate to the studio. On Greet the Harp ♪♪♪♪ (Sain, 1988), he is joined by a few other musicians on fiddle, banjo, and guitar. Their presence adds a depth and variety that is lacking on all his other solo efforts. This is Bowen's first recording, and unquestionably his best. His rendition of "The Bells of Aberdyfi" sparkles, and his arrangement of "Ruddlan Marsh/Cuckoo's Nest" is vibrant. There are fun sets of both jigs and polkas, and this is an enjoyable, high-quality collection overall.

what to buy next: Bowen's other solo outings lack his live vivacity and his debut release's variety; he also has an unfortunate habit of repeating material among albums. But much of his choicest solo work is combined on Harp Music of Wales ♪♪♪ (Saydisc Records, 1995, prod. Gef Lucena). A wide scope of Welsh music is represented here, from the well-known "Ash Grove" and "All through the Night" to Gypsy tunes like "Polca Saiforella." Alongside the traditionals, two modern Welsh compositions are included: "Sailing Home," a beautiful, wistful air; and "The Thread of Life," an amazingly seductive piece clearly written for the harp. The Sweet Harp of My Land ♪♪♪ (Flying Fish, 1991, prod. Steve Howard, Dai Shell) has a few special gems on it, including "The Swan Song."

what to avoid: Unless you find you are a particular aficionado of Welsh Gypsy music, Hunting the Hedgehog ♪♪ (Firebird, 1994, prod. Steve Howard) is likely to sound very repetitive by the third or fourth listen. The toe-tapping is unrelenting, though the music is brilliantly performed, with unbelievable speed and accuracy.

the rest:
Hen Aelwyd/Old Hearth ♪♪♪♪ (Sain, 1999)

worth searching for: Bowen's group outings have all been strong. Particularly wonderful is Cusan Tan's Kiss of Fire ♪♪♪♪♪ (Fflach, 1992/Firebird, 1994), a rich example of what present-day Wales has to offer. Here Bowen teams up with Ann Morgan Jones and Sue Jones Davies to create new and invigorating Welsh music in the traditional vein. Lush open vocals, deep resonant cello, and soaring flute lines accompany Bowen's exquisite harp. Check out Mabsant's Through the Wire ♪♪♪ (Sain, 1987) if you'd like to hear Welsh music with an even more modern twist. Combining triple harp with vocals, guitar, synthesizers, and other contemporary instruments, this group explores a variety of musical styles with a political slant. Fiery and elegant, Bowen's latest band project, the Celtic supergroup Crasdant, is discussed at more length in its own entry in this book.

solo outings:
Cusan Tan:
Esgair—The Ridge ♪♪♪♪ (Sain, 1995)

influences:
◀◀ Alan Stivell, Nansi Richards, Ar Log

▶▶ Siwsann George

see also: Crasdant

Jo Hughey Morrison

David Bowie

Experimental pop

Born David Robert Jones, January 8, 1947, in London, England. Based in Switzerland and New York, NY, USA.

The around-the-world-in-12-inches approach of international folklorists like Harry Belafonte and Theodore Bikel established them as the 1950s' great precursors of what would come to be known as "world music"; late-'70s rock audiences were given a similar taste for the world's broad palette by David Bowie's Lodger album. The Beatles and Simon & Garfunkel had zeroed in on Indian and Andean sounds, respectively, but it was Bowie and collaborator Brian Eno (and, roughly simultaneously, Stevie Wonder with his Secret Life of Plants album) who reintroduced the globe-trotting aesthetic we now recognize as worldbeat. With his well-established rep for being one of rock's most impressionable impresarios, Bowie's adoption of this among many musical guises evaded the charges of piracy that have trailed other first-world culture-crossers (Peter Gabriel, David Byrne, Paul Simon) who actually delved much deeper. The sound of Lodger has long since been superseded by its sources—no doubt to Bowie's delight—but there was a time when it helped set a lot of Westerners on the road to the real World.

what to buy: The self-described "sketch pad" of Lodger ♪♪♪♪♪ (RCA, 1979/Rykodisc, 1991, prod. David Bowie, Tony Visconti) includes aural portraits of Africa, Asia, the Caribbean, and the Mediterranean, most fully realized on "Yassassin"'s unexpectedly successful synthesis of reggae rhythms and Turkish modalities. On "African Night Flight" hear Bowie try to invent rap but not quite know how! For an even more influential (though less readily apparent) application of Third World sources to global-pop advances, check out the disciplined but amorphous sound paintings of Low ♪♪♪♪♪ (RCA, 1977/Rykodisc, 1991, prod. David Bowie, Tony Visconti) and "Heroes"

♪♪♪♪♪ (RCA, 1977/Rykodisc, 1991, prod. David Bowie, Tony Visconti), whose ambient instrumentals, while seldom recognizably ethnic—save for the odd koto here ("Heroes" 's "Moss Garden") and polyrhythm there (Low 's "Weeping Wall")—are clearly informed by the structure and soundscapes of Indian raga and Indonesian gamelan.

what to buy next: Bowie's sax makes a most unconvincing run at Arabic charts all over Black Tie White Noise ♪♪♪♪ (Savage, 1993/Virgin, 1995, prod. David Bowie, Nile Rodgers), but the "Yassassin" approach scores him another worldbeat winner in "Miracle Goodnight," a weirdly workable mesh of hip-hop beat, reggae bass, highlife guitar, and electronic fugue with Euro-pop vocals. Bowie's two flirtations with "straight" reggae on the title track of Tonight ♪♪ (EMI, 1984/Virgin, 1995, prod. David Bowie, Derek Bramble, Hugh Padgham) and "Don't Look Down" are two too many, but "Tumble and Twirl"'s respectable salsa/flamenco simulation—and some lush yet vaguely troubled Western art-pop—make this album worth the cutout-bin prices at which you're likely to find it.

influences:

- Lindsay Kemp, Anthony Newley, Bob Dylan, Lou Reed, Iggy Pop, Kraftwerk, Brian Eno, Iman, Goldie
- Grace Jones, Gary Numan, Siouxsie Sioux, Duran Duran, Little Steven, Trent Reznor, the entire "alternative" era

Adam McGovern

Boyoyo Boys

Mbaqanga, sax jive

Formed 1969, in Soweto, South Africa. Based in Soweto, South Africa.

Vusi Xhosa, lead guitar, leader; Vusi Knosi, bass; Lucas Pelo, sax; Philippe "Mle" Mziza, rhythm guitar; Boyoyo, drums (before the band's recording career), manager; Archie Mohlala, drums (1972–1984); Vusi Mashinini, drums (1987–present). (All members are from South Africa.)

According to record-company legend, it was a Boyoyo Boys tape that first sparked Paul Simon's interest in South African music. The Boys began playing as a unit in 1969, but all members had been musically inclined since they were children. Leader Vusi Xhosa began teaching himself to play on instruments he'd made from recycled materials. Finally, he stole some money and bought a guitar; his parents found out and punished him, but let him keep the guitar. Xhosa found Vusi Knosi at school and taught him to play bass. Lucas Pelo and Philippe "Mle" Mziza were recruited from rival bands. The new outfit's first name was the Mabhoko Band, with Boyoyo, a yo-yo fanatic, on drums. After a name change to the T-Bones they cut "Boyoyo," dedicated to their now-manager. It was a big hit, and the band changed its name for the third and last time. This proved to be such a good idea that at one point there were several different Boyoyo Boys recording in South Africa, where the producer often ends up with the rights to a band's name. You'll find the recommended albums from the original here.

what's available: The Boyoyo Boys are noted for their innovative drum patterns, thumping bass lines, snaky, syncopated guitars, and the searing, fatback sax of Lucas Pelo. Back in Town ♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1987, prod. Clive Risko) is an energetic, non-

appalachia

The Appalachian mountains of the eastern United States have produced a rich interweave of English, Irish, Scottish, and African roots with regional folk traditions—for a sound that is distinctly American. "Old-time" (Appalachian country) music, unaccompanied ballad singing, the beginnings of bluegrass, and much of the nation's most familiar traditional folk repertoire can be traced to this region, as can the incorporation of both the banjo and the fiddle into American popular music. Shape note singing, a starkly beautiful form of sacred choral music that incorporates archaic harmonies and melodies, also came from the Appalachian region. The principal reason that Appalachia developed so many singular styles probably lies in the relative isolation in which most communities there existed. Because of this, even though ballads may have been passed from county to county, each area would over time develop its own unique version of the song. Similar diversity can be found in instrumental techniques, including picking and bowing styles as well as tunings. As the technology for field recording improved, regional variations in Appalachia became well preserved through the efforts of ethnomusicologists like Alan Lomax, Ralph Rinzler, and Mike Seeger. Among the best-documented Appalachian instrumentalists are banjo player Dock Boggs, fiddler Hobart Smith, and guitarist Doc Watson. Among the many ballad singers from the region, Aunt Molly Jackson, Sarah Ogan Gunning, and Jean Ritchie are some of the best represented.

see also: Cecil Sharp (sidebar)

Michael Parrish

stop sampling of stomping Zulu rock 'n' roll, guaranteed to wake the dead and rattle the bones of the living. On TJ Today ♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1988, prod. Clive Risko) the band is joined by sax player Thomas Phale, the man who taught Pelo how to blow sax over 20 years ago. The production here is a bit smoother than on Back in Town, but the groove still predominates.

influences:

◀◀ Thomas Phale, Lulu Masilela, Wilson "King Force" Silgee

▶▶ Mahlathini & Mahotella Queens, Dark City Sisters, Yvonne Chaka Chaka

j. poet

The Boys of the Lough

Pan-Celtic

Formed 1967, in Belfast, Northern Ireland.

Aly Bain, fiddle (1971–present); Cathal McConnell, flute, tin whistle, vocals; Dave Richardson, mandolin, cittern, English concertina, button accordion (1974–present); Christy O'Leary, uilleann pipes, tin whistle, mouth organ, vocals (1985–98); Chris Newman, guitar (1995–98); John Coakley, piano, guitar (1985–95); Robin Morton, vocals, Anglo concertina, bodhrán (1967–79); Dick Gaughan, guitar, vocals (1972–74); Tich Richardson (died 1983), guitar (1979–83); Mike Whellans, vocals, guitar (1971–72); Tommy Gunn (1967). (Members are from Ireland, Scotland, and England.)

The Boys of the Lough formed in Belfast as a trio of Northern Irish musicians: Cathal McConnell and Tommy Gunn, both of County Fermanagh, and Robin Morton from County Armagh. That lineup fell apart quite quickly, and the Boys of the Lough ceased to exist for a short period, but McConnell and Morton continued to perform as a duo. At the 1969 Falkirk folk festival they met Shetland fiddler Aly Bain and singer/guitarist Mike Whellans, who were playing on the Scottish folk circuit. They played a set together at the festival and left with the hope of teaming up again. Their opportunity came in 1971, and soon thereafter the band was officially re-formed, this time as a hybrid Irish/Scottish outfit. Dick Gaughan of Glasgow replaced Whellans in 1972, when the band was most of the way through recording its first LP. Interestingly, they scrapped the original takes and redid all the tracks to include Gaughan, which suggests a "lost" Boys of the Lough album somewhere, waiting to be issued—though it probably never will be. Gaughan was replaced after two years and one LP by Dave Richardson of Northumberland, completing the group's "internationalization" by the addition of its first Englishman. The four-piece lineup of McConnell, Bain, Richardson, and Morton lasted for six years, touring widely in Europe and America and releasing six albums. Robin Morton left in 1979 to found Scotland's Temple Records. He was replaced by Dave Richardson's brother, Tich, on guitar.

This grouping survived until 1983, when Tich was killed in a car accident. Although they recorded three albums, none of them is currently in print. After two years of recuperation, the band came together again in 1985, with new members Christy O'Leary and John Coakley. That configuration survived 10 years, until Coakley was replaced by jazzy English guitarist Chris Newman in 1995. The latest news from the Boys of the Lough is that both O'Leary and Newman have left the band due to contractual disputes; no replacements are known as of this writing.

what to buy: The title track of Farewell and Remember Me ♪♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1987, prod. Peter Harris, Boys of the Lough), a sad emigration song sung by McConnell, is only one highlight of the Boys of the Lough's best available CD. Mostly an album of Irish music, this features two songs each from McConnell and O'Leary, the best being O'Leary's rendition of the Gaelic ballad "An Spailpin Fanach." It also contains tunes played on a historically fascinating set of uilleann pipes, made by Taylor of Philadelphia in about 1890, and later owned by the piper William Hanafin. The rest of the album is as solid a collection of Irish and Scottish dance music as you'll find.

what to buy next: To Welcome Paddy Home ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1985, prod. Peter Harris, Boys of the Lough) is only a slight step down from Farewell and Remember Me. The first album after the devastating car accident that killed Tich Richardson, it reflects the new band's predominant makeup with lots of material from Ireland. Mostly a terrific album of jigs, reels, and hornpipes, this also features two songs, of which the title track is the most affecting. Sweet Rural Shade ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1988, prod. Boys of the Lough, Peter Harris) is very much in the mold of the previous two albums by this lineup—mostly traditional Irish music; mostly strong, textured arrangements of dance music—with impeccable musicianship on fiddle, flute, pipes, mandolins, and other instruments. It also has a couple of songs for good measure. Live at Passim ♪♪♪♪ (Philo, 1975, prod. Boys of the Lough) captures an early version of the band, complete with Robin Morton, and is the only CD release to feature Morton's singing and sense of humor. One of his songs here, a humorous ballad/recitation/vaudeville act, is a hilarious account of trying to care for an uncooperative baby. Other highlights include a set of Shetland fiddle tunes (including perennial favorite "The Day Dawn"); a "piece," or descriptive tone poem, from the piping tradition; and some lovely songs sung by McConnell. The group's other concert document currently available on CD is Live at Carnegie Hall ♪♪♪½ (Sage Arts, 1992, prod. Boys of the Lough, Peter Harris, Matthew Sutton). Although it was recorded in 1988, 14 years after Live at Passim, the group includes another version of "Flower of Magherally," which has changed remarkably little since its earlier incarnation. This album preserves a good but short Boys of the Lough set, one at which they played support to Bill Monroe and the Blue Grass Boys. Perhaps to highlight the connections between their own music and Monroe's, they performed a high proportion of Scottish music, almost none of it from Bain's native Shetland. Jigs, reels, and polkas galore fill up this album; it has only two songs besides "Flower of Magherally," one of which is a very silly untitled number introducing the band, written and sung by emcee Garrison Keillor. A Midwinter Night's Dream ♪♪♪ (Blix Street, 1994, prod. Boys of the Lough) is the Boys of the Lough's Christmas album. With driving rhythms from guest guitarist Chris Newman and guest pianist Henning Sommero, the four-piece group of O'Leary, Bain, McConnell, and Richardson performs a lot of beautiful dance music from Ireland and Shetland. They also sing two carols and a heartbreaking ballad. Interesting twists include some Swedish tunes and one that is said to have come from Yaki Eskimos. Bain's strong fiddling, a preponderance of Shetland selections (including the well-known "Da Day Dawn," "Christmas Day in the Morning," "The Papa Stour Sword Dance," "Da Trowie Burn," and "Da Fields of Foula," all of which have appeared on previous Boys of the Lough albums), and a long section in the notes about "Yule in Shetland" make this an album focused on Bain's native islands. It was released in the U.K. as The Day Dawn.

what to avoid: Good Friends—Good Music ♪♪ (Philo, 1977) isn't really a Boys of the Lough CD. It's really "members of the Boys of the Lough play in duets and trios with friends who are not in the band." While this can be diverting, and isn't by any means bad, it isn't what most people will want to hear when they sit down to listen to the actual band.

the rest:
The Fair Hills of Ireland ♪♪♪ (Sage Arts, 1992)

worth searching for: Two albums, Lochaber No More ♪♪♪ (Philo, 1976, prod. Boys of the Lough) and The Piper's Broken Finger ♪♪♪ (Philo, 1976, prod. Boys of the Lough), are both available on cassette only. The band's debut, The Boys of the Lough ♪♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1973, prod. Boys of the Lough), features Dick Gaughan, later to become one of the great voices of the Scottish folk scene. His renditions of several ballads are unforgettable and are very much worth buying if you can find an old LP copy; the album was available on vinyl in the U.S. for many years.

solo outings:
Aly Bain:
Aly Bain & Friends (Greentrax, 1994)
(With Phil Cunningham) The Pearl ♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1995)
Lonely Bird (Green Linnet, 1996)
(With Phil Cunningham) The Ruby ♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1998)

influences:
◀◀ The Chieftains, Tom Anderson
▶▶ Craobh Rua

see also: Phil Cunningham, Connie Dover, Dick Gaughan, Andy M. Stewart

Steve Winick

Paul Brady

See: Kevin Burke, Jackie Daly, Andy Irvine, James Keane, Andy McGann, Mick Moloney, Tommy Peoples, Planxty

Anouar Brahem

Arabic classical, jazz

Born 1957, in Tunis, Tunisia. Based in Tunisia.

Music in the Islamic world generally places a higher premium on the human voice than it does on any instrument. Even such wizards of the oud (lute) as Farid al-Atrash and Mohammed Abdel Wahab were valued more for their vocal and songwriting abilities, respectively, than their instrumental skills. Despite this cultural bias, there is a performer from Tunisia whose gifts as a player, composer, and improviser are such that it is hard to ignore him.

Anouar Brahem started studying the oud at the Tunis National Conservatory of Music when he was 10 or 11 years old (sources differ). His primary instructor was one of Tunisia's most distinguished and accomplished performers, Ali Sriti, who taught Brahem the traditional ways of playing including the art of taqâsîm (an improvisational discipline based on a complex set of preestablished rules and conventions). After his musical apprenticeship, Brahem began writing his own pieces and performing in solo concerts. It was also about this time that he started working closely with percussionist Lassad Hosni.

At age 24 Brahem left Tunis for a four-year stint in Paris, where he was exposed to the music of other cultures and vice versa. He started writing music for film during these years and has since composed scores for over a dozen movies. In 1985 Brahem headed back to Tunis to continue his music research and promote some of the ideas he had picked up during his Paris sojourn. By 1987 he had been appointed to head the Musical Ensemble of the City of Tunis, a group which he proceeded to revamp. Brahem started breaking the ensemble up into smaller units and blending new compositions (some with jazz influences) into its typically traditional repertoire. He also started writing songs, departing slightly from the instrumental focus that had been the hallmark of his earlier efforts. When Brahem finally left Tunis to tour North America, he was already being touted as one of the Arab world's most adventurous musicians. It was shortly after his return from touring that Brahem met Manfred Eicher of ECM Records, who was to produce and release Brahem's albums from then on. Since that time the artist has continued an active touring schedule, hitting Europe and Japan in addition to occasional forays in North America, the Middle East, and his native North Africa. His onstage and studio associates have included a host of talents from a variety of disciplines including Jan Garbarek, Kudsi Erguner, Dave Holland, Manu Dibango, Manu Katché, and Fareed Haque.

what to buy: The best-recorded, best-sounding, best-played oud album you are ever likely to own is Brahem's Barzakh ♪♪♪♪♪ (ECM, 1991, prod. Manfred Eicher). Joined by violinist Bechir Selmi and longtime associate Lassad Hosni on percussion, the oud master has created a beautiful aural document with solo, duo, and trio arrangements that show off each performer's exceptional skills.

what to buy next: Brahem's next album, Conte de l'incroyable amour ♪♪♪♪ (ECM, 1992, prod. Manfred Eicher), marked a slight break from the more traditional Barzakh. Here is where Brahem started mixing music from Turkey and Tunisia by playing with Barbaros Erkose (clarinet), Kudsi Erguner (ney flute), and Lassad Hosni (percussion). The reed instruments of Erkose and Erguner provide an interesting sonic backdrop for Brahem's oud that presaged later recordings he would make with Jan Garbarek and John Surman.

the rest:
Madar ♪♪♪½ (ECM, 1994)
Khomsa ♪♪♪½ (ECM, 1995)

worth searching for: Brahem's Thimar ♪♪♪♪ (ECM, 1998, prod. Manfred Eicher) is an intriguing cross-cultural chamber-music session with master bassist Dave Holland and reed virtuoso John Surman on bass clarinet and soprano saxophone. In its classic austerity this European-only release comes closer to Barzakh's haunting beauty than just about anything else Brahem has done.

influences:
⏮ Ali Sriti

see also: Farid al-Atrash, Kudsi Erguner, Mohammed Abdel Wahab

Garaud MacTaggart

Brave Combo

Worldbeat

Formed 1979, in Denton, TX, USA. Based in USA.

Carl Finch, vocals, accordion, guitar; Bubba Hernandez, bass, vocals; Jeffrey Barnes, saxophone, clarinet, percussion.

A self-described "nuclear polka" band, Brave Combo is often shortchanged as a novelty act since its frenetic live shows zigzag from stampede-inducing romps through "Who Stole the Kishka" and "The Happy Wanderer" all the way to a surf version of "Oh, What a Beautiful Morning." But over the years the Combo—a revolving six-piece built around the nucleus of Finch, Hernandez, and Barnes—has evolved into a versatile outfit capable of being both faithful and funky: they've developed a startling command of traditional folk music from Greece, Israel, and Mexico while retaining the infectious, dance-frenzy enthusiasm that makes them a favorite at weddings, bar mitzvahs, Oktoberfests, and alternative-rock clubs. Once a band to simply get wrecked to, Brave Combo is now a group to be reckoned with.

what to buy: No, No, No, Cha Cha Cha ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1993, prod. Brave Combo) focuses on the group's Latin influences and boasts a seamless medley of the Rolling Stones' "Satisfaction" and Ringo Starr's "No No Song," a festive salsa version of Cher's "The Way of Love," and a boss bossa-nova rendition of "Fly Me to the Moon." Polkas for a Gloomy World ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1995, prod. Brave Combo) is their Grammy-nominated return to straight-ahead polka, mixing jaunty originals like "Flying Saucer" with traditional Mexican, Russian, and German polkas. Group Dance Epidemic ♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1997, prod. Brave Combo) collects studio versions of such live favorites as "The Chicken Dance," their Devo-like demolition of "The Hokey Pokey," and other vintage tunes designed for conga lines and bunny-hop parades. The band's warped genius is revealed on its cover of Van McCoy's "The Hustle," in which it uncovers the melodic thread connecting the disco hit with Lou Reed's "Walk on the Wild Side."

what to buy next: Girl ♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1996, prod. Brave Combo, Bucks Burnett), a surprisingly listenable collaboration with Tiny Tim, demonstrates the depth of Brave Combo's musical vocabulary and its astounding ability to make anyone sound good. Check out the hepcat-jazz version of "Stairway to Heaven" and the "Wooly Bully"–like reworking of "Bye Bye Blackbird."

what to avoid: Musical Varieties ♪♪ (Rounder, 1988, prod. Brave Combo) is a compilation of pre-Rounder tracks from the early '80s. Although hardly horrid, they lean toward predictable gimmickry ("People Are Strange" and "Sixteen Tons" as polkas), sideswiping genres the band would eventually tackle head-on.

the rest:
Polkatharsis ♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1987)
Humansville ♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1989)
A Night on Earth ♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1990)
It's Christmas, Man! ♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1992)
Mood Swing Music ♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1996)
Polka Party with Brave Combo ♪♪♪ (Easydisk/Rounder, 1998)

worth searching for: The Hokey Pokey ♪♪♪ (denTone, 1994, prod. Brave Combo), a self-released EP, features early versions of several tunes on Group Dance Epidemic as well as the otherwise unavailable concert favorite "The Hava Nagila Twist." Kiss of Fire ♪♪♪½ (Watermelon, 1996, prod. Brave Combo) is a sublime collaboration with Lauren Agnelli, formerly of folk trio the Washington Squares, on torch songs ranging from the French chansons of Edith Piaf and Francoise Hardy to the fiery tangos of Carlos Gardel.

influences:

- You name it, from Xavier Cugat to Astor Piazzolla
- The New Orleans Klezmer All Stars

David Okamoto

Brave Old World

Contemporary klezmer

Formed 1989. Members live in New York, NY, USA; Chicago, IL, USA; Berkeley, CA, USA; and Berlin, Germany.

Michael Alpert, vocals, fiddle, guitar, percussion; Alan Bern, accordion, piano; Kurt Bjorling, clarinet, bass clarinet; Stuart Brotman, bass, tsimbl (cimbalom), tilinka, percussion; Joel Rubin, B-flat and C clarinets (1989–1991).

Even though Brave Old World's members live across the U.S. and, in one case, Europe, they've managed to arrange enough quality time for three albums and numerous tours all over their two home continents. But those aren't the only ways they happen to run into each other—Brave Old World also present workshops and educational programs on such topics as "Dancing to the Ceiling: Traditional East European Jewish Dance"; "The Whole World Is in These Songs: Jewish Life in Yiddish Folk and Popular Song"; and "Making Klezmer Music: Jewish Instrumental Traditions." Forging ahead from history as their name implies and forging cultures together as their lineup embodies, Brave Old World may have attained their highest public profile with the PBS documentary In the Fiddler's House, in which they and other klezmer youngbloods accompany old-school classicist Itzhak Perlman on his journey into Jewish roots.

what to buy: Blood Oranges ♪♪♪♪♪ (Pinorrek Records, 1997, prod. Frank Dostal) is a magnificent showcase for Brave Old World's distinctive style, which combines the discipline and richness of classical music with jazz-like improvisation. The longer instrumental selections include tempo and texture shifts agile enough to impress though not abrupt enough to overpower—an exceptional inter-player empathy lends a nimbleness to material that in other hands might come off as empty virtuosity or fall disastrously short of its ambitions. Meanwhile, lighthearted tracks like the jaunty, a cappella "Welcome" and the self-deprecating "The Band" keep the ensemble's serious musicianship from getting too serious. Beyond the Pale ♪♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1994, prod. Frank Dostal) is worth it alone for the instrumental showstopper "Basarabye"'s accordion-and-clarinet klezmer inferno, courtesy of Bern and Bjorling respectively. But there's much more that makes the album worthwhile, particularly the opener and closer "Berlin Overture" and "Berlin 1990," Alpert's emotional accounts of being Jewish and performing in Germany at the end of the 20th century. Klezmer Music ♪♪♪♪½ (Flying Fish, 1991, prod. Brave Old World) is remarkable for its inclusion of "Chernobyl," which matches Alpert's original lyrics with an upbeat traditional Ukrainian/Jewish melody and a self-consciously schmaltzy vocal for a levity at odds with the subject matter—but not with the all-too-experienced Jewish tradition of fatalistic humor.

worth searching for: Look for the band on the recorded documents of Perlman's brave expedition to his own Old World, In the Fiddler's House ♪♪♪♪½ (Angel, 1995, executive prod. Jac Venza) and Live in the Fiddler's House ♪♪♪♪ (Angel, 1996, prod. Steven Paul).

influences:

- Klezmer Conservatory Band, Naftule Brandwein, Dave Tarras, Andy Statman, Bronya Sakina, Leon Schwartz, the Chieftains
- Naftule's Dream, the Klezmatics

see also: Itzhak Perlman

Ken Roseman

Máire Breatnach

Irish traditional and neo-traditional

Born 1956, in Dublin, Ireland. Based in Dublin, Ireland.

Violinist, composer, and occasional singer and keyboardist Máire Breatnach was brought up in Dublin, in a bilingual family that cherished traditional Irish music. Classically trained on violin, in the '80s she played in various traditional conglomerations, sometimes alongside her flutist brother Cormac. The '90s have seen her write, arrange, and record three albums of new music in a traditional vein, inspired by ancient Irish legends. While her work has solid Irish roots, it also displays the influence of 20th-century pastoral composers Peter Warlock, Arnold Bax, and Ralph Vaughan Williams. She was a featured soloist in the original Riverdance stage-show and soundtrack album in 1995, and has done session work—both as violinist and singer—for artists ranging from Mary Black and Sharon Shannon at home to Alan Stivell and John Renbourn overseas. Though recent recordings have indicated more consolidation than experimentation, the very track record she's consolidating is that of keeping one foot on firm traditional ground and one foot on the cutting edge.

what to buy: For both Angel Candles ♪♪♪½ (Starc, 1993/Blix Street, 1995, prod. Máire Breatnach) and The Voyage of Bran ♪♪♪♪ (Starc, 1995/Celtic Heartbeat, 1995, prod. Máire Breatnach), Breatnach enlisted accordionist Sharon Shannon, piper Ronan Browne, singer and keyboardist Liam Ó Maonlaí, guitarist Steve Cooney, and percussionist Tommy Hayes for a bounty of sprightly jigs, reels, and slides, as well as dignified polkas and waltzes. She accompanies her own violin with keyboards on some delightful airs and elegiac tone poems. A few charming and unusual songs are included with the instrumentals; Breatnach and Ó Maonlaí's voices sound wonderful together.

what to buy next: Celtic Lovers ♪♪♪ (Starc, 1996/Blix Street, 1997, prod. Máire Breatnach) also contains some fine writing and playing, but shows little progression from the earlier albums. It slides dangerously close to the slough of new-age at times, and the lack of vocals leads to a certain monotony. Oddly, the musicians (including accordionist Máirtín O'Connor) are not credited on the U.S. issue.

worth searching for: The complex and delicate fiddling on the original Irish release of Bill Whelan's soundtrack for Riverdance was all Breatnach; the second, better-known Riverdance ♪♪♪♪♪ (Celtic Heartbeat, 1995) includes all of Breatnach's work plus two newer tunes featuring fiddler Eileen Ivers instead.

influences:
⏮ Nollaig Casey, Bill Whelan

see also: The Black Family, Eileen Ivers, Sharon Shannon, Bill Whelan

John C. Falstaff

Jean Binta Breeze /Breeze /Sister Breeze

Dub poetry

Born Jean Lumsden, 1956, in Patty Hill, Hanover, Jamaica. Based in Jamaica and London, England.

The patronizing tag often bestowed upon Breeze by the boys' club of the reggae industry—"Jamaica's leading female dub poet"—doesn't begin to do her justice. Acclaimed in Britain, Europe, and the Caribbean but woefully overlooked in the U.S., she is one of the most important artists in dub poetry (the reggae form of "spoken-word"), period, not to mention one of the leading figures in contemporary Caribbean literature. A virtuosic stage performer equally at home in Jamaican Creole and BBC English, Breeze broke through on the Reggae Sunsplash tour of 1983, after training with fellow dub-poet luminaries Oku Onuora and Mikey Smith at the Jamaican School of Drama in the late 1970s, then retreating to the countryside for several years to work as a Rastagrarian and hone her art. Even her early, more sloganeering poems, whether denouncing "slack" (sexually explicit) deejays' denigration of women ("Get Back") or decrying the IMF's ravaging of Third World economies ("Aid Travels with a Bomb"), were animated by an understanding of theater in which the spoken word is integrally fused with elements of music and dance. By the time Breeze arrived in London in 1985 (at the urging of the genre's acknowledged giant Linton Kwesi Johnson), she'd begun to break free of the syntactic spareness and metrical monotony of some early dub poetry, dramatically modulating a range of rhythms and tones (and themes) with a vocal versatility that never fails to leave audiences rapt and electrified. Breeze's voice is uncommonly expressive, capable of great emotional range, depth, and complexity; her poems are by turns forceful and fragile, soft-spoken and deep-throated, passionate and playful. And while she can chant down Babylon with the best of them, as a homegrown feminist she's always emphasized the politics of the personal, deftly foregrounding the everyday experience of women as mothers, lovers, workers, and fighters against a backdrop of geopolitics and neocolonial economics.

worth searching for: Sadly, little of Breeze's work is currently available on CD in the U.S., though all of it is worth seeking out. Her debut album (as "Sister Breeze"), Riddym Ravings ♪♪♪½ (ROIR, 1987, prod. Delroy Thompson, Breeze), remains in print, though on cassette only. Many of the tunes—a Rastagrarian marching song, a Nyabinghi (ritual Rasta) anthem, a parodic street-hustler skank—are simple though lively and rootsical. But the album is worth buying solely for Breeze's famous dramatic monologue "Riddym Ravings (The Mad Woman's Poem)," a breathtaking tour de force about urban alienation and the redemptive promise of the reggae beat that signaled a quantum leap in her performance skills. Prior to this album, Breeze had contributed two poems ("To Plant" and "Aid Travels with a Bomb") to the seminal compilation Word Soun' 'Ave Power: Reggae Poetry ♪♪♪ (Heartbeat, 1983, prod. Mutabaruka)—reissued with added dub versions in 1994 as Word Soun' 'Ave Power: Dub Poets and Dub)—and two more ("Get Back" and "Reality") to the worthier follow-up compilation Woman Talk: Caribbean Dub Poetry ♪♪♪½ (Heartbeat cassette, 1986, prod. Mutabaruka). Her best recorded work, though, is undoubtedly Tracks ♪♪♪♪½ (LKJ Records, 1990/Shanachie, 1991, prod. Dennis Bovell, Linton Kwesi Johnson), deleted from the Shanachie catalog but available on import from LKJ. Six short, evocative, unaccompanied poems alternate with six others set to sublime arrangements by the peerless Dennis Bovell and backed by the Dub Band. Standouts include an ebullient ska prophecy ("Confusion") and the bluesy, bittersweet dirge of a woman worn down by the tedium of domestic routine ("Ordinary Mawning"). Completists may want to search out the 12" single Slip ♪♪♪ (The Poets, 1982/Heartbeat, 1982, prod. Mutabaruka). Finally, a newer cassette, Riding on de Riddym: Selected Spoken Works, featuring unaccompanied readings of 30 poems, is available from 57 Productions, 57 Effingham Road, Lee Green, London SE12 8NT, England. Breeze's printed work has been much anthologized; her own collections are Answers (1983), Riddym Ravings (Race Today, 1988), Spring Cleaning (Virago, 1992), and On the Edge of an Island (Bloodaxe, 1997).

influences:
⏮ Louise Bennett ("Miss Lou"), Michael Smith

see also: Linton Kwesi Johnson, Oku Onuora

Michael Eldridge

Anne Briggs

See: A.L. Lloyd

Michael Brook

Electronica

Born in Toronto, Canada. Based in Canada.

Though he started his career playing conventional rock and blues with various bands in his native Toronto, including a stint with the noted act Martha and the Muffins, Michael Brook nurtured his love of experimental and minimalist music by studying with masters like La Monte Young, Jon Hassell, and Hindustani classical vocalist Pandit Pran Nath. The effort paid off, eventually leading to Brook recording with ambient-music pioneer Brian Eno and his protégé Daniel Lanois; releasing like-minded albums of his own; and producing a number of extraordinary world-music/electronica collaborations with artists like Nusrat Fateh Ali Khan, Djivan Gasparyan, and U. Srinivas. Brook has also scored films such as Captive, Albino Alligator, and the IMAX release The Fires of Kuwait, and become a sure hand behind the boards for world-music and pop artists alike.

what to buy: For those who like electronic atmospheres spiced with exotic sounds from distant lands, Brook may be the quintessential artist. His album with Indian mandolinist U. Srinivas, Dream ♪♪♪♪ (RealWorld, 1995, prod. Michael Brook), began as a straight production job but turned into a full-scale collaboration, including contributions from British cellist Caroline Lavelle, Brazilian percussionist Nana Vasconcelos, and fellow Canadian avant-gardist Jane Siberry. Brook achieves a similar effect in a different musical direction with Albanian duduk (oboe) player Djivan Gasparyan on Black Rock ♪♪♪♪ (RealWorld, 1998, prod. Michael Brook). Among Brook's most celebrated collaborations, however, is his album with Pakistani qawwali (devotional song) master Nusrat Fateh Ali Khan on Night Song ♪♪♪♪½ (RealWorld, 1996, prod. Michael Brook). Some of its tracks were remixed (with varying success) by Talvin Singh, Asian Dub Foundation, and Joi on Nusrat Fateh Ali Khan & Michael Brook: Remixed ♪♪♪½ (RealWorld, 1997, prod. Michael Brook).

what to buy next: Brook's dreamy and textured solo work is the perfect vehicle for his effects-laden "infinite guitar," which he plays over minimalist backing on Cobalt Blue ♪♪♪♪ (4AD, 1992, prod. Michael Brook), a gorgeous mating of music and machinery. He explores some of the same material in unaccompanied solo performance on Live at the Aquarium, London Zoo 21 May 1992 ♪♪♪♪ (4AD, 1993, prod. Michael Brook).

the rest:
(With the Edge) Original Soundtrack: Captive ♪♪♪ (Virgin, 1987/Blue Plate, 1994)
(With Pieter Nooten) Sleeps with the Fishes ♪♪♪ (4AD, 1987)
(With Daniel Lanois and Brian Eno) Hybrid ♪♪♪ (E.G. Editions, 1990)
Albino Alligator ♪♪♪ (4AD, 1997)

worth searching for: If you like the sound Brook achieves on his own records, it's worthwhile checking out some of his many fine production jobs as well. On the world-music front, they include Nusrat Fateh Ali Khan's Mustt Mustt ♪♪♪♪½ (RealWorld, 1991, prod. Michael Brook) and Shahbaazz ♪♪♪♪ (RealWorld, 1991, prod. Michael Brook), and Youssou N'Dour's Set ♪♪♪½ (Gold Rush, 1996, prod. Michael Brook); on the pop side, the Pogues' Waiting for Herb ♪♪♪ (Chameleon, 1993, prod. Michael Brook) and Mary Margaret O'Hara's exquisite Miss America ♪♪♪♪ (Bar/None, 1996, prod. Michael Brook).

influences:
⏮ Jon Hassell, Brian Eno, La Monte Young, Robert Fripp, Pandit Pran Nath

⏭ The Orb, Talvin Singh

see also: Brian Eno, Djivan Gasparyan, Nusrat Fateh Ali Khan, Daniel Lanois, Pandit Pran Nath, Youssou N'Dour, the Pogues, Talvin Singh, U. Srinivas, Nana Vasconcelos

Daniel Durchholz

Carlinhos Brown

See: Timbalada

Dennis Brown

Reggae, lovers' rock, dancehall

Born 1957, in Kingston, Jamaica. Died July 1, 1999, in Kingston, Jamaica.

Bob Marley's favorite singer, Dennis Brown was best known for his reggae-ized versions of pop love songs. Beginning with his first hit, "No Man Is an Island"—recorded in 1968 at age 11—Brown became one of Jamaica's most successful reggae acts. The child prodigy had indeed honed his skills from the age of nine, by singing in tourist clubs in Jamaica and the West Indies. As a teenager, Brown was befriended and guided by influential reggae bandleader Byron Lee. Though Brown's earliest recordings were produced by Coxsone Dodd, he reached his commercial peak during his years with producer Joe Gibbs, 1977 to '82. The upswing began in earnest in 1978, when Brown attracted attention with his appearance in the live concert film Heartland Reggae. The following year, Brown's rerecording of "Money in My Pocket" reached #14 on the British music charts and helped catapult him to international acclaim. Following a tour throughout Europe in 1980, Brown was signed to his first major label, A&M. His subsequent North American hits included "Foul Play" and "If I Ruled the World." Too in-demand to be restricted to his own albums, Brown's vocals can be heard on recordings by Big Youth, Junior Delgado, Aswad, Gregory Isaacs, and Mutabaruka; as a sought-after producer as well, Brown oversaw albums by John Holt and the Mortals. His death in 1999 was as premature as his rise had been precocious, and was a profound loss to the reggae community.

what to buy: Despite many omissions, Love Hate: The Best of Dennis Brown ♪♪♪½ (VP, 1996, prod. Robbie Shakespeare, David Harriott & the Giants) surveys the full length of Brown's recorded career.

what to buy next: The power of Brown's early concerts is documented on Live in Montreux ♪♪♪½ (Laser, 1979/Magnum America, 1995, prod. Joe Gibbs) (a.k.a. Live at Montreux). Brown's love and message songs are accompanied by such legend-renewing colleagues as the Roots Radics on the recent Tribulation ♪♪♪½ (Heartbeat, 1999, prod. Alvin "G.G." Ranglin).

best of the rest:
Super Hits ♪♪♪½ (Trojan, 1972)
Just Dennis ♪♪♪ (Trojan, 1975)
Visions ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1977)
Westbound Train ♪♪♪ (Third World, 1978)
Words of Wisdom ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1979)
Love Has Found Its Way ♪♪♪ (Laser, 1982)
The Best ♪♪♪ (Magnum, 1982)
Satisfactory Feeling ♪♪♪ (A&M, 1983)
Money in My Pocket ♪♪♪ (Tads, 1983)
Collection ♪♪♪ (Dennis Ting, 1984)
Judge Not ♪♪♪ (Trojan, 1984)
Walls & Letters ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1984)
Love's Got a Hold of Me ♪♪♪ (Joe Gibbs, 1984)
Reggae Superstars Meet ♪♪♪ (Joe Gibbs, 1985)
20 Greatest Reggae Tracks ♪♪♪ (Meteor, 1985)
Halfway Up, Halfway Down ♪♪♪ (Live & Love, 1986)
Greatest Hits ♪♪♪ (Rohit, 1988)
My Time ♪♪♪ (VP, 1989)
No Contest ♪♪♪ (Rohit, 1989)
Go Now ♪♪♪ (VP, 1991)
Victory Is Mine ♪♪♪ (Rohit, 1991)
Some Like It Hot ♪♪♪ (VP, 1991)
Another Day in Paradise ♪♪♪ (Heartbeat, 1992)
Classic Hits ♪♪♪ (Sonic Sounds, 1992)
Blazing ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1992)
Friends in Life ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1992)
Live in Montego Bay ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1992)
Cosmic Force ♪♪♪ (Heartbeat, 1992)
Unforgettable ♪♪♪ (VP, 1993)
Light My Fire ♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1994)
20 Magnificent Hits ♪♪♪ (Sonic Sounds, 1994)
Blood Brothers ♪♪♪ (RAS, 1994)
Visions of a Reggae King ♪♪♪ (VP, 1994)
Early Days ♪♪♪ (Sonic Sounds, 1994)
The Best: Vol. 1/Africa ♪♪♪ (Lagoon, 1995)
Temperature Rising ♪♪♪ (VP, 1995)
Dennis Brown & Friends ♪♪♪ (JA, 1995)
Love Light ♪♪♪ (Blue Moon, 1995)
Milk & Honey ♪♪♪ (Trojan, 1996)
Could It Be ♪♪♪ (RAS, 1996)
Songs of Emmanuel ♪♪♪ (VP, 1996)
Dennis ♪♪♪ (World, 1996)
Lovers' Paradise ♪♪♪ (Burning Sounds, 1996)
Got to Have Loving ♪♪♪ (M.I.L. Multime, 1997)
RAS Portraits ♪♪♪ (RAS, 1997)
He's One of a Kind ♪♪♪ (Rooney, 1998)
The Pine ♪♪♪ (Music Club, 1998)
Bless Me Jah N/A (RAS, 1999)

influences:
◀◀ Marvin Gaye, Bob Marley, Sam Cooke
▶▶ Aswad, Gregory Isaacs

see also: Beenie Man, Freddie McGregor, the Roots Radics

Craig Harris

Buckwheat Zydeco

Zydeco

Born Stanley Dural Jr., in Lafayette, LA, USA. Based in Lafayette, LA, USA.

Although Stanley Dural Sr. was a respected La-La (pre-zydeco) accordionist, his son Stanley Jr. rebelled and took up the piano. By age nine he had gone professional; he put together his first R&B band in 1971 and worked the busy Lafayette scene. During the late '70s he began playing organ with zydeco king Clifton Chenier's Red Hot Louisiana Band. Chenier lectured Dural on the importance of Creole culture and music, causing a deflection in his career trajectory. By 1979 "Buckwheat" had learned the piano accordion and left to start his own zydeco band, Ils Sont Partis. His combination of traditional and more contemporary sounds has given Buckwheat accessibility to listeners far outside the normal zydeco audience. He has been able to attract major-label interest and spread the zydeco gospel worldwide. His bands have a reputation for being extremely well-rehearsed yet spontaneously danceable.

Buckwheat Zydeco (r) with his father, Stanley Dural Sr.

what to buy: 100% Fortified Zydeco ♪♪♪♪ (Black Top, 1985, prod. Hammond Scott, Nauman S. Scott) shows Buckwheat and his band rocking away. It has the mix—from the very rural and funky to the very urbane—that packs the floor at El Sido's in Lafayette.

what to buy next: When Buckwheat steps up with just the drums behind him and drives the music with his accordion, you hear how good this man can be—it's the litmus test for all good zydeco bandleaders. He passes it on Waitin' for My Ya-Ya ♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1988, prod. Scott Billington), which comes close to striking the golden balance between his talent and his desire to please a diverse audience.

the rest:
On a Night Like This ♪♪♪½ (Island, 1987)
Buckwheat's Party ♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1987)
Turning Point ♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1988)
Taking It Home ♪♪½ (PolyGram, 1988)
Ils Sont Partis ♪♪♪ (Blues Unlimited, 1988)
Buckwheat's Zydeco Party ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1988)
Where There's Smoke There's Fire ♪♪♪ (Island, 1990)
Menageri: Essential Zydeco ♪♪♪♪ (Mango/Antilles, 1993)
Five Card Stud ♪♪½ (Island, 1994)
Choo Choo Boogaloo ♪♪♪½ (Warner Bros., 1994)
Trouble ♪♪♪ (Atlantic, 1997)
The Buckwheat Zydeco Story N/A (Tomorrow Recordings, 1999)

influences:
◀◀ Clifton Chenier, Boozoo Chavis, Amédée Ardoin

▶▶ Nathan Williams, Lynn August, Zydeco Force

see also: Clifton Chenier, Jesse Cook

Jared Snyder

Buena Vista Social Club

See: Ry Cooder, Rubén González

Bukken Bruse

See: Annbjørg Lien

Bŭlgari

Bulgarian folk music

Formed 1993, in Bulgaria. Based in Bulgaria and Chapel Hill, NC, USA.

Georgi Doichev, gaida, vocals; Georgi Andreev, gadulka, vocals; Dimiter Lavchev, gadulka, tupan; Georgi Zeliazov, kaval, vocals; Anton Tsambov, tambura; Radostina Kaneva, vocals. (All members are from Bulgaria.)

Formed and led by Georgi Doichev, the premier bagpipe player in Bulgaria and a former lecturer in the Department of Ethnomusicology at the University of California, this sextet features some of Bulgaria's leading musicians playing authentic interpretations of traditional Bulgarian folk. All of the group's members are graduates of Bulgaria's Musical High School and Conservatory; Zeliazov, Tsambov, and Andreev are currently soloists in the orchestra of the Bulgarian National Ensemble—of which Andreev is a director; and Kaneva, one of the top singers in Bulgaria, is a soloist in the world-famous Bulgarian National Radio and Television Choir (a version of which is known and loved by many in the West as Le Mystère des Voix Bulgares). While deeply rooted in tradition, Bŭlgari's music is gleefully inventive and arranged in a way that allows the small ensemble to sound as full and robust as a large orchestra. They're at their best in a live setting (where they've been known to churn through a killer Bulgarian version of Dave Brubeck's "Take Five") and had already played more than 100 concert dates across the U.S. and Canada in their first year as part-time Americans, gaining the national prestige platform of a two-night stint at the Kennedy Center in June of 1999.

what's available: The group's only Stateside release to date, Bulgarian Folk Music ♪♪♪♪♪ (Music of the World, 1999, prod. Bŭlgari), doesn't quite compare with the visceral impact of their live performances, but it's a stirring taste of traditional Eastern European folk nonetheless. Dimiter Lavchev lays down syncopated rhythms on the booming tupan drum as Anton Tsambov plays rhythm riffs on his 8-string tambura (a Bulgarian lute not to be confused with the Indian drone instrument the tamboura), providing a rock-solid foundation for the dazzling melodic interplay between Georgi Doichev's piercing gaida (bagpipes), Georgi Zeliazov's soothing kaval (flute), and Georgi Andreev's lightning-fast runs on his gadulka (a bowed, violin-like instrument). Add the enchantingly mysterious Bulgarian voice of Radostina Kaneva and you have one heck of an American debut.

influences:

⏮ Bulgarian Radio Women's Choir, Trio Bulgarka, Trakiiskata Troika, Trio Karadzhovska see also: Le Mystère des Voix Bulgares

Bret Love

Sandy Bull

World-folk

Born 1941, in New York, NY, USA. Based in Nashville, TN, USA.

Long before "world music" was a marketing term, way before Paul Simon discovered there was gold in Graceland, Sandy Bull was mixing and matching musical cultures like a hundred-CD carousel with a broken "random" button. Originally stirred by the black drum corps at the nearby Florida high school but forbidden from drumming by his dad, he turned to the guitar and moved back to his professional-harpist mother in New York at age 11, getting exposed to a wide range of musical influences from her record collection and her cabaret act, "From Bach to Boogie Woogie." At 14 he started learning both bagpipes and banjo, and in Greenwich Village he met Pete Seeger, Odetta, Ramblin' Jack Elliott, and others of some musical repute. At 16 he was already undertaking paid gigs and at 18 began studying bass and composition at Boston University College of Music—as well as playing the odd coffeehouse with Joan Baez. But he soon dropped out to return to a professional music career in New York, right in time for the booming folk revival. His expertise let him stand out in a very crowded crowd, and he was soon signed to the prestigious Vanguard label. His first album, Fantasias, ran the American folkloric gamut, but its real treat was "Blend," which took up an entire LP side and had him playing with jazz drummer Billy Higgins on stretched-out music that ranged from Appalachia to India.

The next level was a departure for Europe and study with oud (Arabic lute) master Hamza El Din. After a few months he returned to the U.S., this time California. His quickly following 1964 album Inventions saw him stretching out still further, adding oud, electric bass, and electric guitar to his arsenal and playing Brazilian, classical, jazz, Indian, and Middle Eastern musics, as well as his somewhat meditative take on Chuck Berry's "Memphis"—nothing if not eclectic. The follow-up E Pluribus Unum appeared four years later, and both justified and explained the wait with two ambitious side-length tracks, each again Cuisinarting everything into a quite delicious gumbo. His next album (and last for Vanguard), 1971's Demolition Derby, took it all at least two steps further.

That would be the last anyone would hear of Sandy Bull on record for some time. The experimental spirit of the '60s had passed, and no label wanted to know about his ideas. In addition, the substance-abuse problems of the '70s had arrived and would take him a while to resolve. Each spell was broken by the time of his next album, Jukebox School of Music, way over in the year 1987. His hiatus notwithstanding, the record was as adventurous as anything he'd done, reunited him with Higgins, and arrived at a point when the times were finally beginning to catch up with him. The carousel started spinning again and hasn't paused yet.

what to buy: The Vanguard Sessions ♪♪♪♪½ (Vanguard, 1998, prod. various) collects from those early Vanguard years, when Bull was at his most experimental.

the rest:
Fantasias ♪♪♪♪ (Vanguard, 1963)
Inventions ♪♪♪♪ (Vanguard, 1964/Timeless Recording Society, 1996)
E Pluribus Unum ♪♪♪♪½ (Vanguard, 1968)
Demolition Derby ♪♪♪ (Vanguard, 1972)
Jukebox School of Music ♪♪♪½ (ROM, 1987)
Vehicles ♪♪♪½ (Timeless Recording Society, 1991)
Steel Tears ♪♪♪ (Timeless Recording Society, 1996)

influences:
◀◀ Hamza El Din, Staple Singers, Pete Seeger
▶▶ Van Morrison, everyone who's ever heard him

see also: Hamza El Din

Chris Nickson

Jane Bunnett

Jazz, Latin jazz

Born 1955, in Toronto, Ontario, Canada. Based in Paris, France; New York, USA; Toronto, Canada; and Cuba.

Bunnett was originally trained as a classical pianist but had to take another career path when tendinitis made it too difficult for her to play. Traveling to San Francisco to recoup her energies, Bunnett heard a series of concerts by Charles Mingus that inspired her to change her instrumental focus to the flute. She is also a gifted soprano saxophone player, having studied with Steve Lacy and won a couple of Down Beat polls for the instrument. Another crucial landmark in her musical history—particularly for readers of this book—was her discovery of Cuban rhythms and musicians. Before that encounter, she was a fairly straight-ahead post-bop player with interesting, if conventional, ideas. Bunnett's exposure to Cuban music has opened up new vistas in her playing and widened her compositional palette.

what to buy: The definitive disc for world-music fans is the artist's own recorded initiation in that vein. Although Bunnett became a fan of Latin rhythms prior to her first trip to Cuba, it was this physical journey that introduced her to some of the most talented musicians in the genre and helped make possible the wonderful Spirits of Havana ♪♪♪♪½ (Messidor, 1991, prod. Guillermo Barreto, Danny Greenspoon). Bunnett's flute solo over the percussion ensemble Grupo Yoruba Andabo on "Hymn" is squarely in the tradition of such Cuban masters as Fajardo and Filiberto Rico, while the group's take on Thelonious Monk's "Epistrophy," with Bunnett on soprano saxophone, has interesting rhythms percolating beneath the surface courtesy of pianist Gonzalo Rubalcaba and a slew of percussion. The focus of the album is on the group sound, though there are spaces for soloists. Other participants in the sessions include pianist Hilario Durán, vocalist Merceditas Valdes, bassist Kieran Overs, trumpeter Larry Cramer, and timbales player Guillermo Barreto, to whom the album is dedicated.

the rest:
New York Duets ♪♪♪♪ (Denon/Music & Arts, 1989)
Live at Sweet Basil ♪♪♪ (Denon/Music & Arts, 1991)
The Water Is Wide ♪♪♪♪ (Evidence, 1994)
Rendez-Vous Brazil/Cuba ♪♪♪½ (Justin Time, 1995)
Jane Bunnett & the Cuban Piano Masters ♪♪♪½ (World Pacific, 1996)
Chamalongo ♪♪♪½ (Blue Note, 1998)

influences:
◀◀ Charles Mingus, Steve Lacy, Guillermo Barreto

Garaud MacTaggart

Sharon Burch

Navaho singer/songwriter

Born in Gallop, NM, USA. Based in Santa Rosa, CA, USA.

Burch is the daughter of a German father and a Navaho mother; for her, growing up bi-cultural was a blessing—figuratively and literally. "My grandfather was a Navaho healer who followed the Blessing Way," Burch says, in reference to a sacred healing ritual. "He brought my mother up to respect Indians and non-Indians, and taught us not to be afraid of what happens in this life, because in the final account, everything turns back to beauty." In her music Burch has kept to the Blessing Way, managing to balance Navaho traditions with the demands of the modern non-Indian world. She has recorded three albums for Canyon Records, including Touch the Sweet Earth, winner of the 1996 Indie Grammy for Best Native American Recording; and while her music pays respect to her traditional Navaho childhood, it also reflects her bicultural outlook, combining Navaho words and melodies with western guitar styles. "I grew up traveling with my mom and granddad to the ceremonies my grandfather conducted. They tell me I joined in the singing as a child, and although I don't remember that, I do remember the sound of the music, bouncing off of the walls of the hogans and surrounding me." In college Burch began singing at folk festivals, and a meeting with A. Paul Ortega, the Apache godfather of Native singer/songwriters, led to her recording debut. "I sing in Navaho to pay respect to my family, the earth and the language I was raised in," Burch sums up. "Having a German father and Native mother helped me understand that a human can relate to all people, not just your own kind. The whole planet is ours; there should be no boundaries."

what to buy: Burch finds a perfect balance between Navaho tradition and American folk music on her solo debt, Yazzie Girl ♪♪♪♪ (Canyon, 1989, prod. Robert Doyle). It includes traditional chants set to music by Burch, as well as her own full compositions. Her honey-soaked alto and spare guitar accompaniment make the album a treat for both Navaho and non-Indian ears. Touch the Sweet Earth ♪♪♪♪ (Canyon, 1993, prod. Robert Doyle) continues in the same low-key vein with a collection of traditional ballads and lullabies.

what to buy next: The Blessing Ways ♪♪♪ (Canyon cassette, 1984) is a duet album with Ortega that sparked Burch's own songwriting career, drawing largely on the teachings of her grandfather. Ortega and Burch sing both traditional songs and Ortega's compositions with flute and drum accompaniment.

influences:
⏮ A. Paul Ortega, Buffy Sainte-Marie

see also: A. Paul Ortega

j. poet

John Burgess

Scottish traditional

Born 1934, in Aberdeenshire, Scotland. Based in Invergordon, Scotland.

It is not for nothing that many in his native Scotland know John Burgess as "King of the Highland Pipers"—it's more like for everything. His first tutoring on the Great Highland Bagpipes came very early in life at the hands of his father; upon the family's move to Edinburgh Burgess began taking lessons with Pipe Major Willie Ross, the resident piper at Edinburgh Castle. It wasn't long before the child prodigy was dominating the world of Highland piping competitions, and at the ripe age of 16 he won a gold medal at the Argyllshire Gathering in Oban. Observers had hardly had a chance to absorb the fact that this made Burgess the youngest piper ever to win a gold medal, when he took a second gold at the Northern Meeting in Inverness the same year. Over the next three decades he would arguably come to be Scotland's most prodigiously decorated piper, winning more than 200 gold and silver medals. Taking care to replenish the tradition in another way, he became the piping instructor for the Easter Ross–area school system in the Scottish Highlands from the mid-'60s to 1996. Burgess has also, as Highland pipers go, been quite prolific in his recorded output, releasing at least 12 U.S. and U.K. albums over the course of his busy career.

what's available: King of the Highland Pipers ♪♪♪♪ (Topic, 1993, prod. Tony Engle, A.L. Lloyd) is a compilation culled from Burgess's first two albums for the Topic label, originally recorded in the 1970s. This must-have collection for fans of the Great Highland Bagpipes runs the gamut of Scottish music, including piobaireachd (the classical form for the Highland pipes, also known as ceol mor or "big music"), and teeming as well with fine examples of the more informal genre of the pipes, ceol beag or "small music," represented by some magnificent airs, reels, jigs, marches, strathspeys, and hornpipes. The Piping Centre 1996 Recital Series—V. 2 ♪♪♪½ (Temple, 1996, prod. Robin Morton) was, as the title reveals, recorded as part of a concert series at Glasgow's Piping Centre featuring some of the world's finest practitioners. This volume focuses on Burgess for half of the recording, and on his contemporary Donald MacPherson, who is every bit as legendary in piping circles, for the other half. The youthful vibrancy of each man's playing belies his widely held elder-statesman status, even as the expertise displayed confirms it.

worth searching for: If further investigation into the Life of Burgess intrigues you, John D. Burgess—A Piping Legend is a wonderful film that documents his extraordinary career and lifelong dedication to his craft.

influences:
⏮ Willie Ross, Robert Brown, Robert Nicol

⏭ 78th Fraser Highlanders, Dougie Pincock, Gordon Duncan

Cliff McGann

Irving Burgie /Lord Burgess

Calypso

Born 1924, in Brooklyn, NY, USA. Based in USA.

In the forgotten mid-'50s prehistory of the British Invasion, a brief calypso boom ruled the American airwaves, set sales records, and, some suggest, sowed the seeds of later mass success for artists with an island beat like Bob Marley and Gloria Estefan. The Stateside calypso king was Harry Belafonte, but the power behind the throne was the man who wrote his most famous songs: Irving Burgie.

A native New Yorker born to parents from the Caribbean (like Belafonte), Burgie heard many island songs while growing up and visited his mother's home country of Barbados. But this background didn't always inform his own music. Burgie began singing in chapel services while stationed in the China/Burma/India theater during World War II, and the response from his fellow soldiers convinced him to seek a music career after the war. At first he took opera training at the Juilliard School of Music, the University of Southern California, and the University of Arizona. But by the mid-'50s, with a gathering folk revival giving American roots music currency again, Burgie was inspired to look to his own heritage to compose songs and began a performing career under the name of Lord Burgess. The jazz-club audience for calypso was fast converging with the growing following for folk, so Burgie met with ready acceptance. He then met with Belafonte, after a writer for the latter's TV show caught a Burgie concert in New York. Soon Belafonte recorded eight of Burgie's songs for Calypso —the first album in the United States to sell over a million copies. In the wake of that success Burgie decided to concentrate on writing rather than performing, and a number of his songs have become standards in both the calypso genre Burgie and Belafonte aspired to and the lounge one many now perceive them in—each form, at the turn of the millennium, more popular in the Americas than ever.

what's available: Recently Burgie resurfaced to record his own hits and make them available to new audiences as Island in the Sun: The Songs of Irving Burgie ♪♪♪ (Angel, 1996, prod. Irving Burgie). The standards are all accounted for, including "Day-O," "Yellowbird," "Island in the Sun," "Jamaica Farewell," and the one with lyrics perhaps most evocative of the islands, "Kingston Market." The distinct Caribbean flavor is here, and so is the smooth pop sensibility of the '50s.

worth searching for: Irving Burgie's songs (sometimes credited to "Lord Burgess") appear on many albums in Harry Belafonte's extensive catalog. The original million-seller Calypso ♪♪♪½ (RCA, 1956, prod. Herman Diaz Jr.) is still in print. Decades later, Burgie's staying power as a songwriter is proven with Jimmy Buffett's cover of "Jamaica Farewell" on his Feeding Frenzy ♪♪♪ (MCA, 1990, prod. Nina Avarmunde-Berducat).

influences:

◀◀ Sir Lancelot, Pete Seeger

▶▶ Harry Belafonte, the Kingston Trio, Jimmy Buffett

see also: Harry Belafonte

Kerry Dexter

Kevin Burke

Irish traditional

Born June 9, 1950, in London, England. Based in Portland, OR, USA.

As the child of parents with roots in Sligo, Ireland, Kevin Burke grew up on the music of the Sligo master fiddlers of the 1920s and '30s: Michael Coleman, James Morrison, Paddy Killoran. As a budding fiddler himself, he was also exposed to the playing of the many expatriate Irish musicians who lived in London during the 1950s and '60s; hence the unmistakable blend of influ-

bollywood

A potpourri of Indian raga and ghazal, international jazz, orchestral, and pop, and almost every other style imaginable, Indian film music is the most alluring, bizarre, and exotic of sounds. It's also certainly the largest body of recorded work in any genre, with more than 1,000 soundtracks produced every year in Bombay ("Bollywood" to film fans), and a history dating back to the first Indian movie with sound, 1931's Alam Ara.

Most Indian films are romantic musicals, watched as much for the songs as for the plot. Actors lip-synch to the voices of "playback singers." The nasal treble common to female playback singers is an acquired taste for Westerners, but, once it's warmed to, possesses a delightful bite that cuts through the accompanying man's warm tenor and the loping beats of the tabla drum.

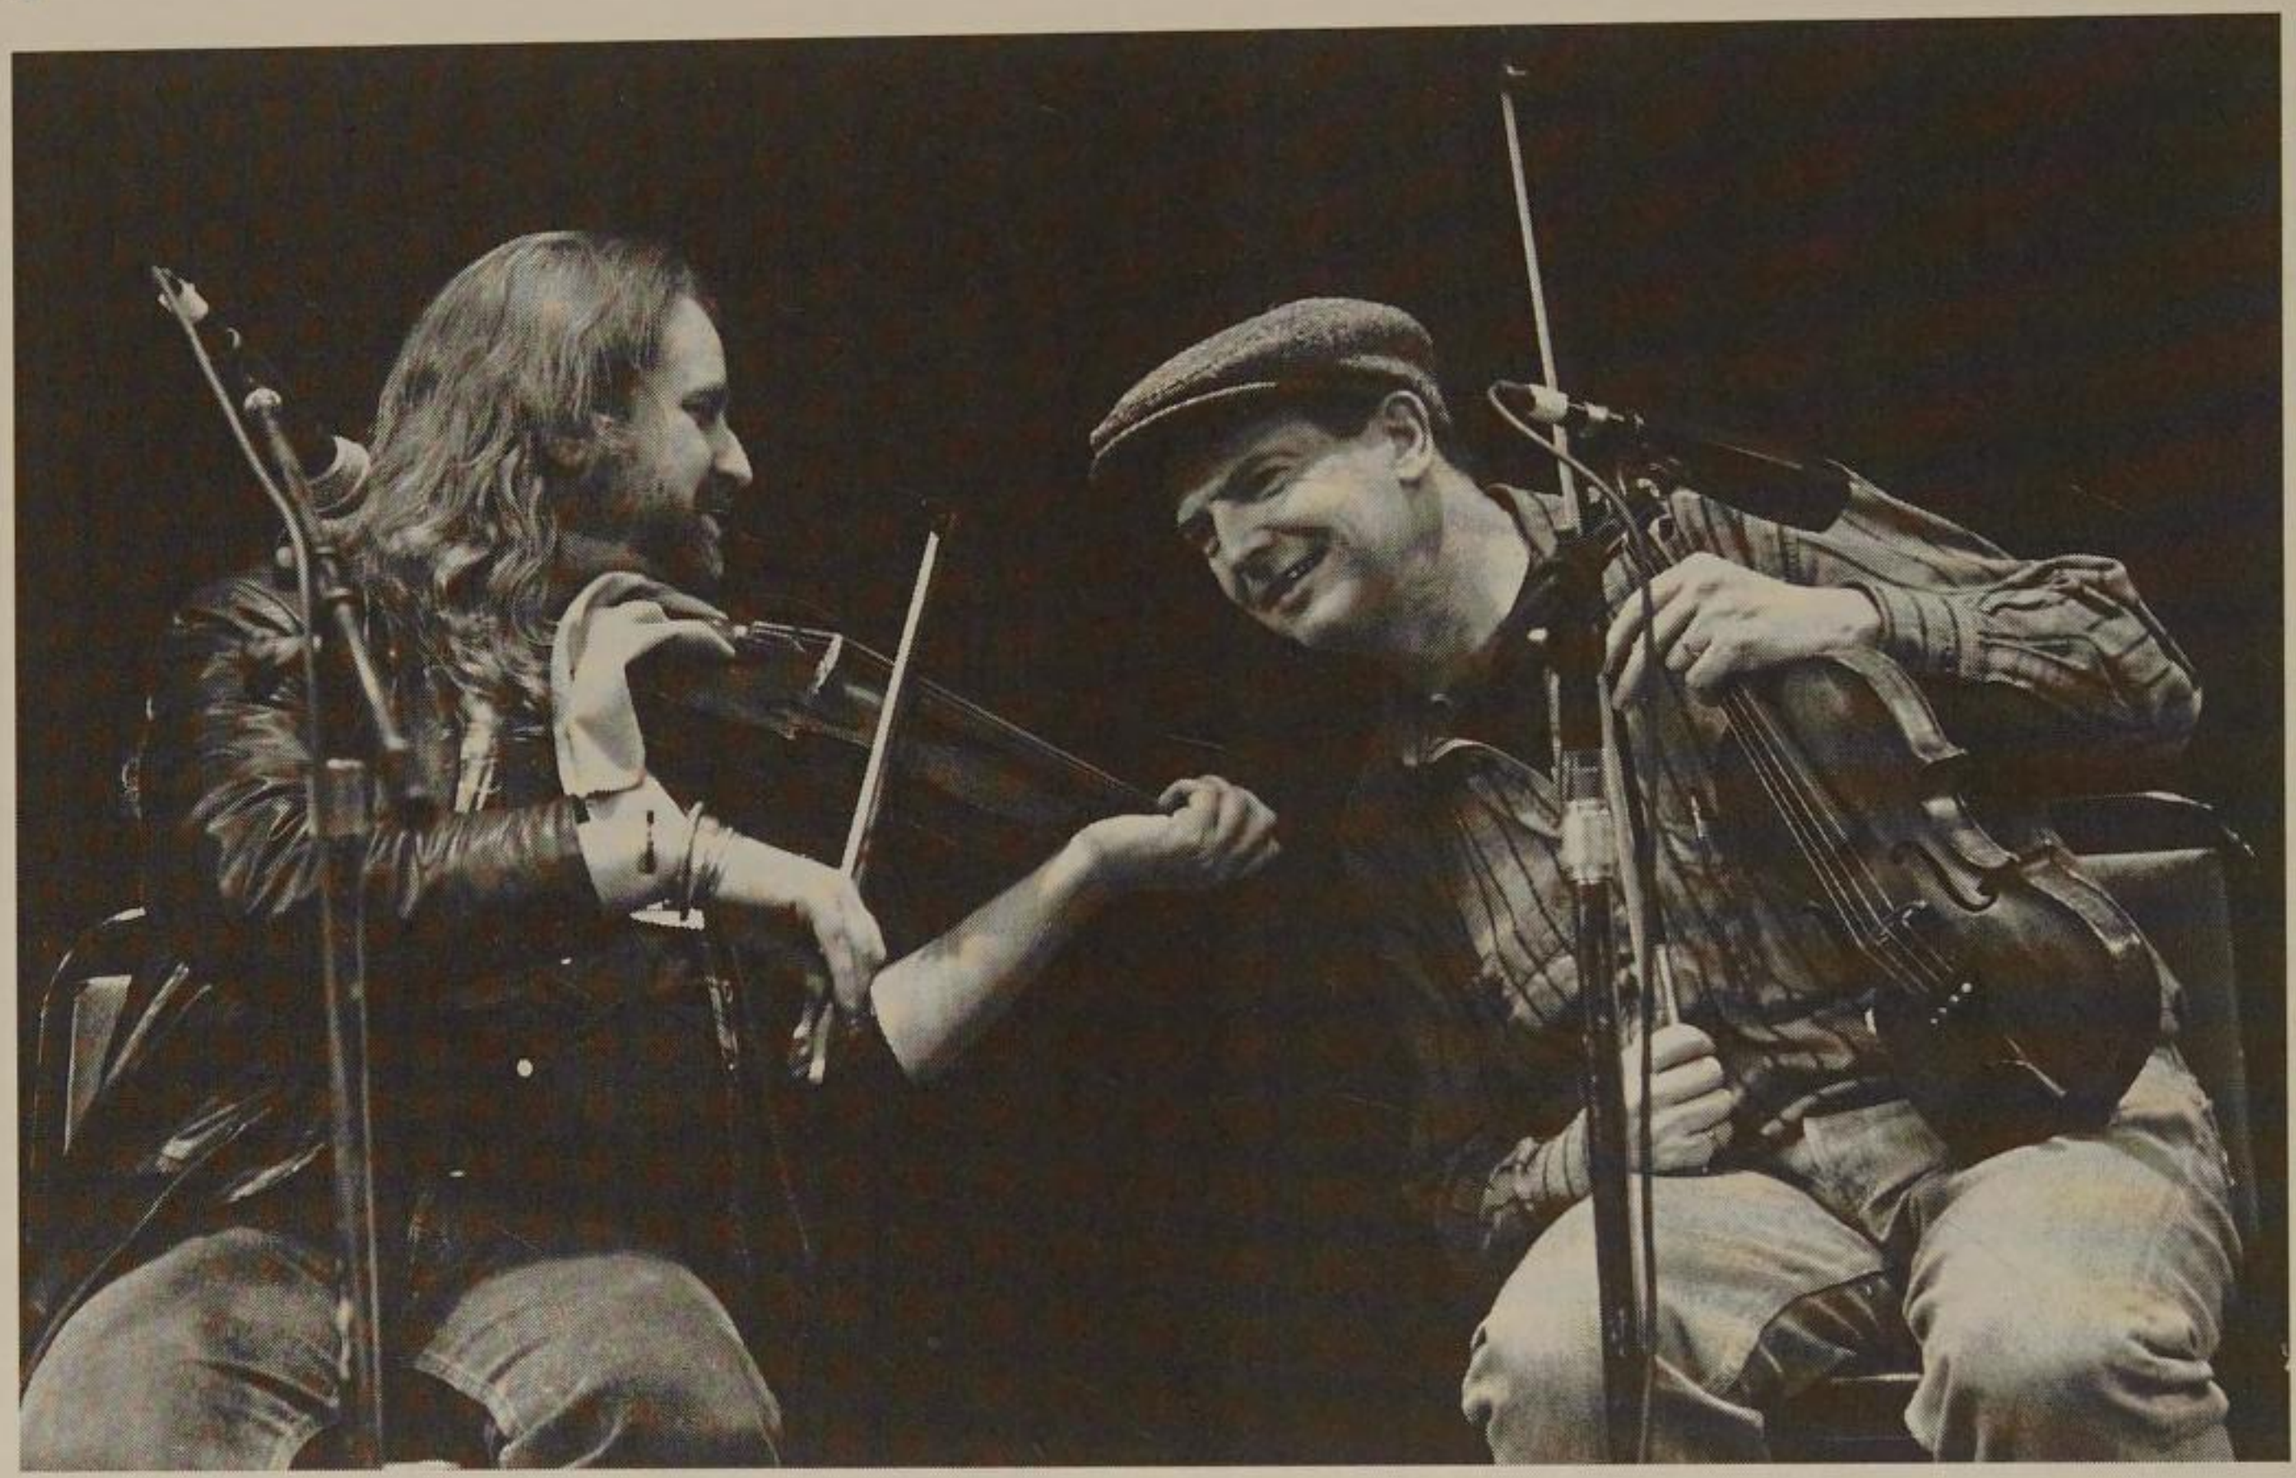
Many Indian communities in American towns sell this "filmi" music through Indian video stores, delis, and restaurants. In India the cassette is still the dominant medium, and typically in the U.S. soundtrack tapes cost two to three dollars, with reissues often featuring two scores on one cassette (though CDs are becoming increasingly available). The selection is often dauntingly vast, but titles and credits are written in English, and by following a few of the classic playback singers or directors you can't go wrong.

Especially look for the gorgeous voice of Lata Mangeshkar on Mughal-E-Azam/Goonj Uthi Shehnai ♪♪♪♪ (The Gramophone Co. of India)—or on any of her 2,000 other soundtracks if this one doesn't turn up. Next ask for the latest best-seller; it changes almost daily. An alternate search for those far away from Indian communities is the deleted Golden Voices from the Silver Screen, Vols. 1–3 ♪♪♪♪ (Globestyle U.K.), or the also recently discontinued Asia Classics 1: Dance Raja Dance: The South Indian Film Music of Vijaya Anand ♪♪♪♪ (Luaka Bop/Sire, 1992), which surveys the new-generation music director whose postmodern pastiche of anything from bluegrass to funk is particularly sophisticated.

see also: Asha Bhosle, Post-Soca (sidebar)

David Poole

kevin burke



Kevin Burke (r) and Johnny Cunningham

ences, mainly from Sligo and Clare, which would come to characterize his style. A chance encounter with Arlo Guthrie during Willie Clancy Week in Milltown Malbay led to an invitation to record with Guthrie in the United States. This was a turning point for Burke, after which he made his decision to become a professional musician; it was during this first visit to the States that he also recorded his own debut album, Sweeney's Dream, for Folkways. Back in Dublin, Burke was playing in Christy Moore's backup band when he was approached to replace Tommy Peoples in the Bothy Band in 1976. With Moore's blessing, he jumped at the chance of joining the best Irish band then on the scene. During his time with them, he would do the odd gig with one or two of the other members if the venue could not accommodate the full lineup. He especially liked to work with Mícheál Ó Domhnaill, and the two of them collaborated on Burke's album If the Cap Fits in 1978, then made the very successful Promenade as a duet the following year. After the Bothy Band officially called it quits in 1979, Burke and Ó Domhnaill decided to try their luck in America and ended up based in Portland, Oregon, where local guitar and mandolin player Paul Kotapish had set up some gigs for them. Their equally successful second duet album, the fittingly titled Portland, was recorded for Green Linnet in 1982. Shortly thereafter, Ó Domhnaill having broken away for headlining work, Burke found guitarist Gerry O'Beirne as a replacement and recorded Up Close with him in 1984. Meanwhile, Kerry accordionist Jackie Daly, who had appeared on If the Cap Fits and with whom Burke had recorded Eavesdropper in 1979, had left De Dannan, yet another of the many Irish-traditional supergroups that seem to somehow cross paths with Burke sooner or later. Burke, Daly, and former Planxty member Andy Irvine toured together, with guitarist Arty McGlynn soon joining in, and the band Patrick Street was born in 1987. Burke also kept in touch with Kotapish, who had introduced him to singer and harmonica player Mark Graham (both appeared on Up Close), who, in turn, introduced them to dancer Sandy Silva—and this quartet was soon touring the Pacific Northwest as an additional band setting for the prolific and eclectic Burke, Open House, which started to record for Green Linnet in 1992. A further musical venture with which Burke became associated during that period was the Celtic Fiddle Festival, a tour first organized in 1992 and bringing together the talents of Burke, Scotland's ex–Silly Wizard fiddler Johnny Cunningham, and Brittany's ex-Kornog member Christian Lemaître. This project has led to two well-received live albums thus far. One of today's best-known and busiest Irish musicians, Kevin Burke continues to appear solo as well as with Patrick Street, Open House, and the Celtic Fiddle Festival at concert venues and festivals throughout the United States and abroad.

what to buy: Although recorded early on, Burke's If the Cap Fits ♪♪♪♪½ (Mulligan, 1978/Green Linnet, 1981, prod. Dónal Lunny) remains one of the quintessential Irish fiddle albums. The repertoire is Burke's typical mixture of Sligo and Clare tunes, with a few Kerry polkas learned from accordion player Jackie Daly, who appears on a couple of tracks. The debt to the Bothy Band is clear, Burke's main two accompanists being that band's alumni Dónal Lunny and Mícheál Ó Domhnaill. Yet there are new ideas too, like the double- and triple-tracking of the fiddle to vary the texture, which Burke continues to exploit on later recordings. The most spectacular experiment on the album has to be the relentless, 16-minute-long medley of reels that occupied most of side two of the original LP, in which Burke keeps going from tune to tune while the instrumental combinations vary with each change. Promenade ♪♪♪♪ (Mulligan, 1979/Green Linnet, 1981, prod. Gerry O'Beirne, Mícheál Ó Domhnaill) is a somewhat quieter affair, and a different kind of album since it is a duet with Ó Domhnaill, even if the fiddle instrumentals outnumber the songs. Burke performs some of his classic tune medleys, like the reels "Pigeon on the Gate" and "Lafferty's," in his characteristically fluid and lilting style. Ó Domhnaill's songs include the now-famous ballad "Lord Franklin," relating the events of Franklin's doomed expedition of 1845–47 to the Northwest Passage. By contrast, Eavesdropper ♪♪♪♪ (Mulligan, 1981/Green Linnet, 1981, prod. Kevin Burke, Jackie Daly), a duet album made in 1979 with Kerry accordion and concertina player Jackie Daly, is entirely instrumental. It features some of the closest duet playing one is likely to hear, with sparse guitar or piano accompaniment or none at all, and an eclectic repertoire of lesser-known tunes. Among the latter, a beautiful arrangement with guitar of an uncommon version of "The Blackbird" stands out. Cork flute player Conal Ó Gráda guests on a few tracks, and so does Paul Brady on piano. The excellent Portland ♪♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1982, prod. Kevin Burke, Mícheál Ó Domhnaill), the first album made by Burke and Ó Domhnaill in the United States, follows the same formula as Promenade but the result is even more exciting. Burke's renditions of Ed Reavy's "Maudabawn Chapel," the jig set "The Rolling Waves," and the final reel medley starting with "Tom Morrison's" and "The Beare Island Reel" have inspired many a fiddle player. Ó Domhnaill's love songs in Gaelic provide a melancholic counterpoint to the dance tunes, and the piece of Scottish mouth music (unaccompanied singing for dances) "S'iomadh Rud a Chunnaic Mi" fits perfectly in the set of instrumental flings. The entirely instrumental Up Close ♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1984, prod. Gerry O'Beirne) is the product of Burke's later association with guitarist Gerry O'Beirne. The fiddle playing is as inspiring as ever—for instance on the opening "Lord Gordon's Reel" or on Bill Monroe's "Jerusalem Ridge"—and O'Beirne's distinctive accompaniments complement it well. The participation of musical guests like ex–Bothy Band flute player Matt Molloy, Galway accordionist Joe Burke, and the amazing harmonica-playing Murphy family from Wexford brings variety to the album, even if it ends up sounding a bit piecemeal.

what to buy next: Sweeney's Dream ♪♪♪ (Folkways, 1973) was Burke's debut, recorded while he was on his first visit to the U.S. Still available from Folkways through the Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D.C., it has also been issued on compact disc by the Irish label Ossian (1989). Burke's selections lean heavily towards the Sligo repertoire, with famous medleys from the 78s of Coleman and Killoran and quite a few tunes that he would record again later, solo or with the Bothy Band. The accompaniment on guitar, five-string banjo, mandolin, and autoharp gives some of the tracks an American string-band sound. Burke's contributions to The Celtic Fiddle Festival ♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1993, prod. Johnny Cunningham) include two unaccompanied solos, the Clare jigs "Garrett Barry's" and "Cliffs of Moher," and a reprise of the "Pigeon on the Gate" medley from Promenade. These and the remarkable trio ensemble on other tracks make the album well worth a listen. Also look for Burke on two superior multi-act live albums, My Love Is in America—The Boston College Irish Fiddle Festival ♪♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1991, prod. Mícheál Ó Súilleabháin) and Dear Old Erin's Isle—Irish Traditional Music from America ♪♪♪♪ (Nimbus, 1992, prod. Mícheál Ó Súilleabháin, Robin Broadbank), the latter of which was recorded on the occasion of the 8th annual Éigse na Laoi festival of traditional music at University College, Cork.

the rest:

(With Johnny Cunningham and Christian Lemaître) Celtic Fiddle Festival Encore ♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1998)

worth searching for: Burke was one of four fiddle players featured on the LP An Fhidil Sraith II (The Fiddle, Volume II) ♪♪♪♪ (Gael-Linn, 1980, prod. Paddy Glackin), an outstanding collection of unaccompanied traditional fiddle playing. Of the several albums on which Burke has been a guest fiddler, few rival the classic Andy Irvine, Paul Brady ♪♪♪♪♪ (Mulligan, 1976/Green Linnet, 1981, prod. Dónal Lunny). Although the focus of the album is vocal, there are some dance tunes on which Burke's playing can be savored, particularly the jig "The Blarney Pilgrim" and the reel medley of "Fred Finn's" and "Sailing into Walpole's Marsh." One of Burke's most curious guest appearances, though, would have to be on Arlo Guthrie's Last of the

burning bridges

Brooklyn Cowboys ♪♪♪½ (Warner Bros., 1973, prod. John Pilla, Lenny Waronker), on which the fiddler performs two short reel medleys, one with Guthrie on banjo and Ry Cooder playing bottleneck guitar.

influences:
⏮ Michael Coleman, Paddy Killoran, Michael Gorman, Bobby Casey, Martin Rochford, Paddy Fahy

⏭ Martin Hayes, Dale Russ, Randal Bays

see also: The Bothy Band, Ry Cooder, Johnny Cunningham, Jackie Daly, Andy Irvine, Kornog, Matt Molloy, Open House, Patrick Street, Planxty, Silly Wizard

Philippe Varlet

Burning Bridges

Worldbeat

Formed 1985, in San Diego, CA, USA. Based in San Diego, CA, USA.

Andrew Vereen (USA), vocals, guitars, keyboards, mandolin, flute, accordion, percussion; Cynthia Antillon (USA), vocals, percussion; Don Story (USA), guitars, vocals, percussion; Rick Nash (USA), bass, percussion; Robert Montoya (Mexico), drums, percussion; Marcos Fernandes (Portugal), drums, vocals, percussion.

Vereen, Fernandes, and Montoya, vets of San Diego's local music scene, formed Burning Bridges in 1985 to play their own brand of "inauthentic world music." After the usual round of personnel changes, the band settled into its current lineup and began plugging away at local clubs. Despite their tongue-in-cheek description of their music, the band's considerable chops serve them well as they navigate a course through an array of styles that might have seemed bewildering only a few short years ago. "Worldbeat is pop music," Fernandes says. "American music has always had traces of African, Arabic, Latin and Cuban sounds. We're presenting it in a somewhat less diluted form, but it's still pop music. Once you open your ears, you can't help but like it." Still, the Bridges found local crowds somewhat resistant, so they branched out to play coffeehouses, fashion shows, universities, and gallery openings. In 1992 the band created their own label, Accretions, and began sending out promos of their first CD, From Benny's Tiki Room and Ammo Dump. The album did well and led to a tour of Japan and a front page rave in Billboard. The success of From Benny's . . . has allowed Accretions to become a small full-service label, offering a home for other genre-bending bands.

what's available: The Bridges' second album, Feast of Fools ♪♪♪♪ (Accretions, 1996, prod. Burning Bridges, Randy Fuelle), is a quantum leap forward; a 16-track cornucopia of border-smashing styles that places the band's music at the top of the current worldbeat hit parade. Here they range from Warren Zevon–esque folk-rock tunes to bits of Zulu jive, soca, and chimurenga, all played with plenty of attitude. They originally called their music "world rock," which may be a more apt label for their hard-hitting sound. The band was still trying to unify that sound on From Benny's Tiki Room and Ammo Dump ♪♪♪♪ (Accretions, 1992, prod. Burning Bridges, Randy Fuelle), which makes the program seem somewhat more diverse with distinct samplings of Arabic, African, and Caribbean styles. The low-key production gives the tunes a pleasingly folky character.

influences:
⏮ Looters, Jungular Grooves, Kotoja

j. poet

Burning Flames

Soca, Caribbean funk

Formed 1984, in Antigua. Based in Antigua.

Toriano Edwards, vocals, guitar; Clarence Edwards, vocals, keyboards; David Edwards, vocals, bass; Rone Watkins, drums, vocals. (All members are from Antigua.)

The Edwards brothers grew up listening to the local Caribbean sounds of soca, salsa, reggae, and zouk, as well as the rock 'n' roll they heard on the radio. While still in their teens they were playing for tips on the street. In their 20s the brothers separated for a while: Toriano and David got gigs on cruise ships, while Clarence hooked up with leading calypsonian Arrow during his "Hot, Hot, Hot" period. Eventually Clarence brought his brothers and cousin Rone into Arrow's organization, where they formed the core of his backing band for three years. In 1984 they decided to strike out on their own, and since (as off-islanders) they are unable to compete in Trinidad's Carnival calypso contests, they created a more eclectic kind of soca (the modern sensation named after SOul and CAlypso) that they dubbed "C-funk." After six best-selling Caribbean albums, they were signed to Island in 1991 for their only international release, Dig, produced by Lawrence Dermer, Joe Galdo, and Rafael Virgil, a team known for its work with Gloria Estefan.

what's available: The Flames have a pleasing blend of funk, pop, reggae, and soca, and have been one of the top bands in the Caribbean for most of the 1990s. The album/compilation Dig ♪♪♪½ (Island, 1991, prod. Lawrence Dermer, Joe Galdo, Rafael Virgil) includes reworkings of some of their biggest hits including "Island Girl," "Chook and Dig," and "Workey Workey," one of the best-selling soca singles of the '90s.

worth searching for: Most of the Flames' best work is found on smaller labels with limited distribution. Titles to look for are Left to Right, Burning Flames Rule, Session Pwyle, Rysh and Dutty, and their 1998 release Fan de Flames.

Burning Spear

influences:
Arrow, Nelson, Taxi

see also: Arrow

j. poet

Burning Spear

Reggae, dub

Formed 1968, in Jamaica. Based in Jamaica.

Winston Rodney, lead vocals; Rupert Willington, bass vocals (1975–76); Delroy Hines, tenor vocals (1975–76). (All members are from Jamaica.)

The oppression of slavery and the mysticism of Rastafarianism are recurring themes for reggae's Burning Spear—at one time a group, but primarily a solo pseudonym for vocalist Winston Rodney. Taking his name from the self-description of Jomo Kenyatta, Kenya's first leader after independence, Rodney started working in the late 1960s. He recorded several singles for the prestigious producer Clement "Sir Coxsone" Dodd, but commercial success proved elusive—though the singles "Marcus Garvey" and "Slavery Days," released in 1974 and '75 respectively, attracted international attention. Tellingly, only in 1977, after Burning Spear reverted to a Rodney solo project after a brief trio configuration, did the biggest commercial breakthrough come—with the album Live, which captured the dynamic energy and mystical, trance-like spirit of Rodney's concerts. Today Rodney burns on in both his creative passions and social concerns, balancing the musical career with work as a cultural history teacher at the Marcus Garvey Youth Group in Jamaica.

what to buy: With more than 30 tracks, the two-CD overview Chant Down Babylon: The Island Anthology ♪♪♪♪½ (Island, 1986, prod. Burning Spear) surveys Burning Spear's history from its struggling beginnings, to its brief but eventful tenure as a group, to Rodney's influential later solo recordings. In addition to such best-selling tunes as "Marcus Garvey" and "Jah No Dead," the collection features 12-inch mixes and dub versions.

what to buy next: Regrouped and rededicated as a solo act, Rodney/Burning Spear (accompanied by English reggae stalwarts Aswad) declared the ongoing vitality of his art with the

1
2
6 burning spear

David Byrne

simply but fittingly titled Live ♪♪♪♪½ (Mango, 1977, prod. Winston Rodney).

best of the rest:
Marcus Garvey ♪♪♪½ (Mango, 1976)
Garvey's Ghost ♪♪♪½ (Mango, 1976)
Man in the Hills ♪♪♪♪ (Mango, 1976)
Harder Than the Best ♪♪♪♪ (Mango, 1979)
Hail H.I.M. ♪♪♪½ (Radic, 1980)
Farover ♪♪♪♪ (Heartbeat, 1982)
The Fittest of the Fittest ♪♪♪♪ (Heartbeat, 1983)
Resistance ♪♪♪½ (Heartbeat, 1984)
People of the World ♪♪♪½ (Slash, 1988)
Mek We Dweet ♪♪♪½ (Mango, 1990)
The World Should Know ♪♪½ (Heartbeat, 1993)
Social Living ♪♪♪♪ (Blood & Fire, 1995)
Rasta Business ♪♪♪½ (Heartbeat, 1998) Appointment with His Majesty ♪♪♪♪ (Heartbeat, 1998)

influences:
◀◀ The Wailing Souls, Pablo Moses, Bob Marley ▶▶ Third World, Augustus Pablo

see also: Aswad

Craig Harris

David Byrne

Art pop, worldbeat

Born May 14, 1952, in Dumbarton, Scotland. Based in New York, NY, USA.

Quirky pop and suave samba may seem worlds apart, but David Byrne has proven big enough to encompass them both. Besides writing and performing music, Byrne's far-reaching talents include video direction, screenwriting, photography, and record production, as well as heading his own label. A restless creative spirit, Byrne studied at the Rhode Island School of Design for one year in the early '70s; there he met Chris Frantz and Tina Weymouth, with whom he formed Talking Heads in 1975. Of all the bands that got their break (and, in this case, initially got miscategorized) in the late-'70s New York punk explosion, Talking Heads showed the most propensity for growth. Its eccentric first release revealed a taste for angular rhythms, and the band gradually warmed up its music with American funk and African polyrhythms. Byrne recorded two outside ventures while with the band, My Life in the Bush of Ghosts, a 1980 collaboration with then-frequent Heads producer Brian Eno; and The Catherine Wheel, the 1981 score for his Broadway collaboration with choreographer Twyla Tharp. Although Talking Heads was technically still together when Byrne released Rei Momo in 1989, an early-'90s retrospective set was all that would ever again bear the band's name. Byrne was off on a musical world tour, its first stop being Rei Momo 's catalog of Latin rhythms.

As a "first worlder" navigating third-world waters, he was accused of having hijacked Latin music for his own purposes. However, he transcended tourism with concert spotlights for Latin musicians (including Brazil's Margareth Menezes, who legendarily "blew me off the stage"), and the formation of Luaka Bop, a label that has done much to put "world" artists on the world map—especially its commercially crucial but notoriously cautious Stateside longitudes. As a producer, Byrne compiled a number of Luaka Bop collections that serve as American primers on Cuban and Brazilian music. The label also introduced such artists as Zap Mama, Cornershop, Tom Zé, Susana Baca, Bloque, Os Mutantes, and many others to U.S. audiences, and has offered collections of Asian and African music. Even more than his own international explorations, Luaka Bop may constitute Byrne's greatest and most enduring contribution to world music.

what to buy: Reviving a practice not seen much since the days of 78 rpm discs, Byrne labeled each of the songs on Rei Momo ♪♪♪♪ (Luaka Bop/Sire, 1989, prod. Steve Lillywhite, David Byrne) with its rhythmic/dance style. He included sambas, cha cha chas, merengues, and rumbas, as well as styles less well-known to the American mainstream. His intellectual whimsy ("Independence Day") and paranoia ("The Dream Police") blend surprisingly well with the Latin musics' hip-swiveling ethos. The horn-whipped ride of "Make Believe Mambo" is itself worth the price of the album.

what to buy next: To some extent Byrne had submerged his own musical personality into the styles explored on Rei Momo. Uh-Oh ♪♪♪♪ (Luaka Bop/Sire, 1992, prod. Nick Launay) is more like a reassertion of his Talking Heads aesthetic with the help of Latin horns and percussion. When My Life in the Bush of Ghosts ♪♪♪♪ (Sire, 1981, prod. David Byrne, Brian Eno) was released, it was unusual for an album in the pop bins to include such staples of the avant-garde as found sounds—here including Egyptian songs and Islamic chants. With the advent of digital sampling, such elements have become commonplace, but that doesn't diminish the door-opening feel of this album.

what to avoid: Byrne's grasp is broad, but he hasn't figured out how to make "experimental" theater music palatable, as The Catherine Wheel ♪♪ (Sire, 1981, prod. David Byrne) and The Forest ♪½ (Luaka Bop/Sire, 1991, prod. David Byrne) reveal.

the rest:
David Byrne:
Music for the Knee Plays ♪♪♪ (ECM, 1985)
David Byrne ♪♪♪♪ (Luaka Bop/Sire, 1994)
Feelings ♪♪♪♪ (Luaka Bop, 1997)

Talking Heads:
Talking Heads 77 ♪♪♪♪ (Sire, 1977)
More Songs about Buildings and Food ♪♪♪♪½ (Sire, 1978)
The Name of This Band Is Talking Heads ♪♪♪♪ (Sire, 1982)
Little Creatures ♪♪♪½ (Sire, 1985)
True Stories ♪♪♪ (Sire, 1986)
Naked ♪♪♪½ (Sire, 1988)
Popular Favorites, 1976–1992: Sand in the Vaseline ♪♪♪♪ (Sire, 1992)

worth searching for: These Talking Heads recordings are not hard to find, but among the band's output they are the ones most interesting from a world-music standpoint: Fear of Music ♪♪♪♪½ (Sire, 1979, prod. Brian Eno, Talking Heads) spiked its definitive art-pop with the then-uncharacteristic Fela Kuti–derived Africanesque track "I Zimbra"; Remain in Light ♪♪♪♪½ (Sire, 1980, prod. Brian Eno, Talking Heads) was the band's first full-blown excursion into African forms; Speaking in Tongues ♪♪♪♪½ (Sire, 1983, prod. Talking Heads) took the journey in more stylistically diverse and melodically engaging directions; and Stop Making Sense ♪♪♪♪ (Sire, 1984, prod. Talking Heads) records the innovative and funk-fueled tour that would turn out to be their last. These releases cover the period when the band reached its top polyrhythmic form, before less-inspired albums signaled their dissolution. The Heads themselves seemed to share this assessment by de-emphasizing the mid-period, American-roots-oriented albums Little Creatures and True Stories in their retrospective, but these (and the worldbeat swansong Naked) may suit some tastes.

influences:
- Celia Cruz, Willie Colon, Brian Eno, John Cage, Parliament-Funkadelic, Captain Beefheart
- Beck, Big Audio Dynamite, Love & Rockets

see also: Brian Eno, Fela Kuti, Selena, Talking Heads

Salvatore Caputo

Cachao

Cuban jazz

Born Israel Lopez, September 14, 1918, in Havana, Cuba. Based in USA.

Israel Lopez, a bassist and composer-arranger (who also plays trumpet, piano, celesta, and bongos), is better known as Cachao, a central figure in the development of Cuban music for a substantial portion of the 20th century. He, along with his brother Orestes, presided over the mutation of danzón (a Cuban ballroom dance in rather staid rondo form) into the mambo, with the arrangements they wrote for bandleader/flautist Antonio Arcaño Betancourt and his group, Arcaño y Sus Maravillas. The Latin jam session known as a descarga might not have evolved into the vital training ground for young Latin jazz players it later became if Cachao hadn't encouraged his compatriots to be more daring in their improvisations. Pianist Bebo Valdes has been quoted as saying, "if Cachao and Arsenio Rodriguez had never been born, the Cuban music of the '50s—and perhaps the last 30 years—would have sounded like the music of the '30s." After a series of ground-breaking descarga albums for the Panart, Maype, and Bonita lapels, Cachao moved to New York City where he worked with Charlie Palmieri, Tito Rodriguez, and Eddie Palmieri before finally settling in Miami. Throughout the 1960s, 1970s, and 1980s he appeared on albums with musicians/fans such as Hubert Laws, Mongo Santamaria, Eddie Palmieri, and Grupo Niche, while concertizing with Tito Puente, José Fajardo, and Alfredo "Chocolate" Armenteros. He has even played with the Miami Symphony Orchestra.

what to buy: There is a long story behind the 12-tune album Master Sessions, Vol. 1 ♪♪♪♪♪ (Crescent Moon/Epic, 1994, prod. Andy Garcia). That tale deals with the years of neglect and poor-paying gigs endured by one of the major figures in Latin music history, and it has been made into an award-winning video by actor Andy Garcia that is making new fans for Cachao's music. The albums around which the video revolves have also won awards, and their content is an awesome tribute to the man and his music. From the opening notes of "Al Fin Te Vi," a duet between Cachao's bowed bass and Paquito D'Rivera's clarinet, the album rolls through a sublime primer in the art of Afro-Cuban music. There can be no standout performances when everything is this good.

what to buy next: On Master Sessions, Vol. 2 ♪♪♪♪½ (Crescent Moon/Epic, 1995, prod. Andy Garcia), 24 of the 30 songs cut during one historic week with Cachao have been released. Each of the Master Sessions albums is so impressive that the next question a listener should ask after hearing both CDs is, "When are the other six tunes coming out?" The sidemen include many greats from the Latin music community, including trumpeter Armenteros, reed man extraordinaire D'Rivera, and flautist Nestor Torres. The percussion section has so many time signatures going on that it's a good thing the melody players are used to floating with a polyrhythmic pulse. An earlier release that helps show off the reason why Cachao made such a marked impact on the Latin music community is Descargas Cubanas, Vol. 1: Jam Session with Feeling ♪♪♪♪ (Maype, 1962). It includes a great version of Ernesto Lecuona's classic "Siboney" and some fine tres (small guitar) playing on Orestes Lopez' "La Floresta." Much of this material is duplicated on Descargando ♪♪♪♪½ (Musica del Sol, 1996), with somewhat better mastering and 14 tunes as opposed to the dozen found on the other album.

Cachao

best of the rest:
Latin Jazz Descarga, Part I ♪♪♪♪ (Tania, 1985/1994)
Maestro de Maestros ♪♪♪½ (Tania, 1986)
Cuban Jam Session, Vol. II, Descargas Cubanas ♪♪♪½ (Rodven, 1987) worth searching for: Check out the companion documentary video to the Master Session albums, Cachao ... Como Su Ritmo No Hay Dos (Like His Rhythm There Is No Other), available from Epic Music Video, for an intriguing, well-constructed view of Latin music from the inside.

influences:
⏮ Sexteto Habanero, Arsenio Rodriguez

⏭ Machito, Mario Bauzá, Chico O'Farrill, Tito Puente

see also: Albita, Paquito D'Rivera, Charlie Palmieri, Eddie Palmieri, Tito Puente, Arsenio Rodriguez, Tito Rodriguez, Mongo Santamaria, Bebo Valdes

Garaud MacTaggart

Café Tacuba

Rock en Español, worldbeat

Formed c. 1990, in Mexico City, Mexico. Based in Mexico City, Mexico.

Anónimo, vocals; Emmanuel del Real, keyboards; Joselo Rangel, guitar; Enrique Rangel, bass. (All members are from Mexico.)

Café Tacuba, one of the leading bands of Mexico's "rocanrol" movement, have managed to reinvent rock music to suit their own needs, something that's evaded British and American bands for decades. In the process they've become demigods in Mexico and may become the first Mexican "alterlatino" band to cross over to the U.S. market without singing in English. Named after a local hangout that was once the mecca for mestizo (Mexican, Indian, and North American) culture, Café Tacuba began as a series of all-night discussions between four friends who had gathered to solve the problems of the world. One night they discussed the way Mexican rock was being shaped by what U.S. and U.K. bands were doing. The inspiration was coming down from the record companies and radio stations, not up from the streets, and despite Mexico's immense musical and cultural diversity, no rock band had ever built their sound on the various styles of Mexican folk music. That's the task Café Tacuba set for itself. The band "went acoustic" and began cranking out tunes based on traditional motifs. The group's eponymous 1992 debut rocked the nation and in '94 it released Re, a 20-song collection that went even deeper into its roots. Re was a success, even though it lacked a "pop" flavor. Tacuba's most recent outing, Avalancha de Exitos (Avalanche of Hits), which has become one of the first Latin rock albums to break onto the playlists of Anglo radio stations, showed the band moving in a new, more eclectic direction. The songs are all covers of well-known Latin American hits, arranged in settings that combine techno, tango, rock, cumbia, ska, bolero, punk, huapango, Tejano, and more.

Café Tacuba lead singer Anónimo

what to buy: By covering well-known tunes and recasting them in a variety of Latin American forms on Avalancha de Exitos ♪♪♪♪ (WEA Latina, 1997, prod. Café Tacuba), Café Tacuba has created a worldbeat sound based on the Latin continuum, thereby breaking new stylistic ground. It's a major creative leap for the band's members, but their chops have muscle to spare and every track is a little gem. Re ♪♪♪♪ (WEA Latina, 1994, prod. Café Tacuba) is slightly less eclectic, but still impressive. For the band to move away from the hard-core sound of its debut and take on the Mexican folk tradition was a real risk, but the result has created a revolution in Mexico's rock underground.

the rest:
Café Tacuba ♪♪♪½ (WEA Latina, 1992)

influences:
⏮ Los Tigres del Norte, Los Camperos de Valles, Juan Reynoso

j. poet

Caifanes /Jaguares

Rock en Español

Formed 1985, in Mexico City, Mexico. Disbanded 1995.

Saul Hernandez, vocals; Alfonso Andre, drums; Alejandro Marcovich, guitar. (All members are from Mexico.)

With all the hype surrounding today's crop of Rock en Español imports, the shadow that the legendary Caifanes cast is growing even longer. Caifanes had the luck of coming together right at the time when Mexican rock began to evolve from covers of American and English artists and seek its own voice. While the government still discouraged the rock movement in Caifanes's day, a generation of musical forbears like El Tri and Ritmo Peligroso had at least paved a path for them. Caifanes initially gained fame as one of the earliest Mexican rock bands signed to an American label. Their first big hit soon followed: "La Negra Tomasa," a modern reworking of classic cumbia rhythms. It wasn't long before Caifanes shook off the Cure comparisons that dogged them in their formative period to deliver a string of four multi-platinum albums. Tall, lanky, and exotically tattooed, frontman Saul Hernandez was what the Lizard King always should have been: both sex symbol and social leader to a generation craving a spokesman. When Caifanes split up Hernandez formed a new band, Jaguares, which continued to captivate the nation.

what to buy: Caifanes's last release, El Mervio del Volcan ♪♪♪♪ (BMG, 1994, prod. Greg Ladanyi, Caifanes), is easily their best. Hernandez's paganistic lyrics turn introspective as the band still manage to integrate the pop hooks that brought them to fame. This album shows why Caifanes has remained one of the models of the Rock en Español movement.

the rest:
Caifanes ♪♪♪ (BMG, 1985)
El Diabolito ♪♪♪½ (BMG, 1990)
El Silencio ♪♪♪½ (BMG, 1992)

worth searching for: It seemed only fitting that when Hernandez formed a new band after the breakup of Caifanes, he would call it Jaguares ("the jaguars"). Many fans saw him as an artistic shaman whose spokesman status made him an extension of the Aztec Gods of old—gods who legend has it could turn themselves into jaguars. Formed with fellow Caifanes alum Alfonso Andre in 1996, Jaguares drew on the duality of the animal, combining spirituality with sensual danger while continuing the members' musical growth. The band's first album, El Equilibrio de los Jaguares ♪♪♪♪ (BMG, 1996, prod. Don Was, Ed Cherney, Jaguares), picked up right where Caifanes' acclaim had left off.

influences:
⏮ El Tri, Ritmo Peligroso
⏭ Meldita Vecindad, Café Tacuba, Mana, Molotov

Sam Wick

California Cajun Orchestra

Cajun, Creole

Founded 1982, in San Francisco, CA, USA. Based in San Francisco, CA, USA.

Danny Poullard, accordion, vocals; Eric Thompson, guitar; Suzy Thompson (Germany), fiddle, vocals; Sam Siggins, bass; David Hymowitz, drums. Past members have included: Kevin Wimmer, fiddle; Alan Senauke, guitar. (All members are from USA except where noted.)

Danny Poullard is one of the finest Cajun accordionists anywhere. Born in Eunice, Louisiana, he grew up hearing his father play the instrument with his grandfather, a fiddler. Like many Creole south Louisianans, he relocated to the San Francisco Bay region. Once there, he began playing with John Simien's Louisiana Playboys at the same Creole Catholic church dances where Queen Ida got her start. When Simien died Poullard took over the band for a time. By the early 1980s he was being backed by the Blue Flame stringband, which included Eric and Suzy Thompson (then Rothfield). Suzy had studied with Dewey Balfa through an N.E.A. grant and visited such other traditional Cajun and Creole fiddlers as Dennis McGee, Wallace "Cheese" Read, and Canray Fontenot. The band evolved from steady dance work into the performing and recording unit now known as the California Cajun Orchestra. The group has an exceptionally extensive repertoire, and has garnered regular regional airplay in the Cajun heartland of South Louisiana.

what to buy: On Nonc Adam Two-Step ♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1995, prod. Bob Shumaker, Jody Stecher) you can hear how well the years have served this band—Poullard's playing continues to get ever better. He rips through a whole group of Iry LeJeune tunes, the standard against which every Cajun accordionist is measured. But it is the Creole tunes in particular, such as "John Pollard's Two-Step" and the title track, that are absolutely unique for current Cajun or zydeco recordings, evoking the old-time Creole music of Canray Fontenot and Alphonse "Bois Sec" Ardoin.

what to buy next: Not Lonesome Anymore ♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1991, prod. various) was the band's debut, showing them in good form and demonstrating the breadth of repertoire they pull from. Using four different vocalists brings an additional richness to the recording. Suzy Thompson wails through a version of the Shorty LeBlanc hit "Sugar Bee," while Charlie St. Mary sings Canray Fontenot's "Jolie Bassette." Guest Andrew Carriere contributes the vocals to old chestnuts like "Valse Crimenelle" and "L'anse Paille," and Danny Poullard gets to sing "Monsieur Leonard," written by his old bandleader John Simien.

worth searching for: Michael Doucet, Danny Poullard, and Alan Senauke's Cajun Jam Session ♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1983, prod. Chris Strachwitz) is a somewhat raw recording of a live radio program aired on KPFA in Berkeley, California, and hosted by Chris Strachwitz of Arhoolie Records. The music has a loose quality, but through Doucet and Poullard is graced by two true masters of the genre.

solo outings:
Eric & Suzy Thompson:
Adam & Eve Had the Blues ♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1989)

calypso rose

influences:
- Tracy Schwarz, Dewey Balfa, Canray Fontenot
- Steve Riley, Balfa Toujours

see also: Alphonse "Bois Sec" Ardoin, Balfa Brothers, Beausoleil, Canray Fontenot, Iry LeJeune, Queen Ida

Jared Snyder

Calypso Rose

Calypso, soca

Born McCartha Lewis, in Trinidad. Based in Port of Spain, Trinidad and Brooklyn, NY, USA.

Since breaking onto the scene during Carnival 1963, Calypso Rose has maintained a high writing and performing standard. One of the few women in soca—that pop phenomenon that takes its name from SOul and CAlypso—her compositions tend to deflate the usual sexual braggadocio of the male, but she's not above a racy double entendre when it suits her purpose. She was the first woman to win the Calypso King competition, making 1978 the year of the first Calypso Monarch. Her gruff delivery and straightforward performing style give her albums and live dates an intimate feeling.

what to buy: Smooth production lends Soca Diva ♪♪♪♪½ (Ice, 1993, prod. Eddy Grant) plenty of pop sheen, but Rose's lyrics and no-nonsense stance come through loud and clear. "Columbus"—an indictment of colonial mentality—and "You No Need Dem"—a parable about cheating spouses—are particularly strong.

worth searching for: Rose was at a peak just before the takeover of CDs, and much of her older material has yet to find its way to that format. Look for Pan in Town ♪♪♪♪ (Straker's), Trouble ♪♪♪♪♪ (Straker's, 1984), and Leh We Punta ♪♪♪♪ (Straker's, 1987).

influences:
- Sparrow, Melody, Duke
- Singing Francine, Denyse Plummer

j. poet

Camarón de la Isla

Flamenco

Born Jose Monge Cruz, 1950, in San Fernando, Cadiz, Spain. Died July 2, 1992, in Barcelona, Spain.

Camarón de la Isla was one of the most influential vocalists in the history of flamenco. Only 41 when he died of a heroin overdose in 1992, he had been setting the pace with his exquisite, high-pitched vocals for nearly 30 years. An obituary published by the Madrid newspaper El Pais noted that "Camarón revolutionized flamenco from the point of absolute purity." The second of eight children born to a family of gypsy blacksmiths, Camarón (whose nickname translates as "shrimp of the island") began singing professionally at the age of eight. His debut album, recorded in 1968, featured accompaniment by virtuoso guitarist Paco de Lucia. Although he temporarily retired in 1979, Camarón returned the following year with one of his most successful albums, La Leyenda De Tiempo. Toward the end of his life, Camarón worked with guitarist Tomatito. They performed their final concert together in Madrid, Spain, on January 25, 1992.

what to buy: With the release of La Leyenda De Tiempo ♪♪♪♪½ (Philips, 1980, prod. Ricardo Pachon, Flamenco Viva), Camarón elevated flamenco music to new heights, incorporating rock and jazz influences as well as such non-flamenco instruments as Fender piano, moog, electric guitar, bass, drums, and zither.

what to buy next: Autoretrato ♪♪♪♪½ (Alex, 1992, prod. various) samples tracks spanning Camarón's lengthy career and chronicles his evolution from flamenco roots to fusion with a variety of musical influences.

the rest:

Al Verte Las Flores Lloran ♪♪♪ (Alex, 1969/1993)
Cada Vez Que Nos Miramos ♪♪♪ (Alex, 1970/1993)
Canastera ♪♪♪ (Philips, 1972)
Son Tus Ojos Dos Estrellas ♪♪♪♪½ (Alex, 1973/1993)
Arte Y Majestad ♪♪♪ (Alex, 1975/1993)
Rosa Marca ♪♪♪ (Alex, 1976/1993)
Calle Real ♪♪♪ (Alex, 1983/1993)
Como El Agua ♪♪♪ (Alex, 1984/1993)
Vivire ♪♪♪ (Alex, 1984/1993)
Te Lo Dice Camarón ♪♪♪ (Alex, 1986/1993)
Flamenco Vivo ♪♪♪♪½ (Alex, 1987/1993)
Soy Gitano ♪♪♪ (Philips, 1989)
Camanito De Totana ♪♪♪ (Alex, 1993)
Una Leyenda Flamenca, Vol. 1 ♪♪♪ (Philips, 1993)
Una Leyenda Flamenca, Vol. 2 ♪♪♪ (Philips, 1994)
Lo Mejorde Camarón ♪♪♪♪½ (PolyGram, 1994)
Grandes Canteores ♪♪♪♪½ (Alex, 1995)
Nuestra Camarón ♪♪♪♪½ (Alex, 1996)

influences:
- Manolo Caracol, Pastora Pavon
- Enrique Morente, Carmen Linares, El Potito

see also: Paco de Lucia

Craig Harris

Ian Campbell Folk Group /Ian Campbell

British folk

Formed 1960, in Birmingham, England. Disbanded 1977.

Ian Campbell, vocals; Lorna Campbell, vocals; Brian Clark, guitar, vocals; Johnny Dunkerly (died April 25, 1977), banjo, accordion, guitar, ian campbell folk group 1 3 3

autoharp, vocals; Dave Swarbrick, fiddle, viola, mandolin, mandola, vocals (1960–66); George Watts, flute, clarinet (1966–69); Dave Pegg, double bass, bass, mandolin (1967–69).

The Ian Campbell Folk Group were one of the finest and most influential outfits of their kind ever to come out of Britain, and are only now starting to make a belated appearance on the CD reissue market. In many ways they explored the same kind of terrain the Clancy Brothers and more particularly the Dubliners did in Ireland during the same crucial phase of the folk revival movement. Their sound remained remarkably consistent over their lifespan, in an age when rapid change was the norm, and their popularity on the folk-club circuit was not hurt by the fact that they tempered their unmistakably pro-worker politics with healthy doses of humor.

The Campbells' repertoire ranged from songs of Scottish or nautical origin—many learned from singers-revivalists A.L. (Bert) Lloyd, Ewan MacColl, and Hamish Henderson—to Australian and American items, to spirited instrumentals for fiddle and banjo, to their own original material. Ian Campbell's anti-nuclear "The Sun Is Burning" from 1963 has been covered by Simon & Garfunkel, the Dubliners, Christy Moore, and Kate Wolf.

Like Martin Carthy, another of the prominent younger pioneers of the British folk revival, the Campbells first wet their feet in the mid-'50s skiffle scene with the Clarion Skiffle Group. As the '50s gave way to the '60s, brother and sister Ian and Lorna, whose family hailed from Aberdeen, Scotland, roped in guitarist Brian Clark (who would later marry Lorna), fiddle and mandolin maestro Dave "Swarb" Swarbrick, and banjoist Dunkerly. The ICFG soon secured a residency at the Jug of Punch folk club in Birmingham, issued a live EP from there, and appeared on national radio and TV. By the time they turned professional in 1963, following the warm reception they received at that year's Edinburgh Folk Festival, they had already topped the bill at the Royal Albert Hall. More importantly, they had attracted the attention of legendary folk producer and arranger Bill Leader. With an occasional nod to Pete Seeger and Bob Dylan—the Campbells were one of the first U.K. acts in any genre to cover a song by His Zimmerness ("The Times They Are a'Changin'," in early 1965)—the ICFG left an indelible mark on the U.K. folk scene, with relentless touring and a large, impressive catalog of singles, EPs, and LPs. To date, only the LPs have started to resurface on CD.

Swarb left in 1966, working as a duo with Martin Carthy before opting for life with folk-rock pioneers Fairport Convention. George Watts was drafted to replace his distinctive fiddle with flute, but Swarb also guested on some Campbell releases up to 1969. In 1967 the ICFG finally hired a full-time bassist in the form of Dave "Peggy" Pegg—he too migrated to Fairport by 1970. As it turned out, it's been Swarb (throughout the '70s) and Peggy (ever since) who have effectively led that folk-rock institution for the past three decades. The influence of the Campbells on Fairport is undeniable: many of the instrumentals (and a few of the songs) popularized by the band in electric form date from Swarb and Peggy's days with the Campbells.

The ICFG soldiered on (and off) well into the '70s, despite the changing musical fashions, and disbanded following Dunkerly's sad death at age 33 of Hodgkin's disease. They appeared on stage again many years later as part of Swarb's and Peggy's (separate) 50th birthday celebration concerts, and are featured on the resulting CDs. Ian Campbell issued a solo album of all original songs in 1993, on which he was joined by sister Lorna, sons David, Duncan, and Robin, and nephew Angus Clark. If the name Robin Campbell rings a bell, it may be on account of his long involvement with pop reggae/ska band UB40, led by his brother Ali: the Campbell family legacy has touched more aspects of the U.K. music scene than many realize.

what to buy: The Ian Campbell Folk Group/Across the Hills ♪♪♪♪♪ (Transatlantic, 1963/1964, Castle Communications, 1996, prod. Bill Leader) is hard to beat: the first two LPs united on one CD (although one instrumental from the second LP is inexplicably omitted). The eponymous debut includes classics such as "The Drover's Song," "Down in the Coalmine," "The Jute Mill Song," and "The Bells of Rhymney," as well as a couple of spirited fiddle/banjo instrumental medleys. Across the Hills is noticeably smoother, with Ian and Lorna sounding particularly wonderful singing Leon Rosselson's title track together. Lorna makes "Gypsy Rover" her own, and the entire group joins forces at the microphone for an impressive a cappella "Cho Cho Losa," a Johannesburg mining song learned from South African group the Manhattan Brothers. Contemporary Campbells/New Impressions ♪♪♪♪ (Transatlantic, 1966/Castle Communications, 1996, prod. Nathan Joseph) teams up two later LPs. The first, with Swarb, contains many cover songs (including four by Ewan MacColl) and a stately "Battle of the Somme" on fiddle; the second, with Swarb's replacement George Watts on flute, has more group originals, and a great arrangement of "New York Girls." Both lead off with Sydney Carter songs ("Marilyn Monroe" and "Lord of the Dance," respectively).

what to buy next: Something to Sing About ♪♪♪½ (Pye, 1972/Wooded Hill, 1997) was produced in conjunction with an extensive TV series about the changes in social life brought on by the industrial revolution. The album stands up surprisingly well today, and is mercifully devoid of the kind of dated, trend-conscious "let's prove we've moved with the times" sound that so many others of their ilk succumbed to during that period (something this band had gotten out of its system back in 1967–68). Ian Campbell's And Another Thing ♪♪♪½ (Celtic Music, 1993) shows the singer/writer's talents undulled by years of relative inactivity. The songs, some of which were written over the previous decade-and-a-half for stage shows and TV programs, tackle everything from politics, capitalism, and the environment to artsy pretensions and women's issues. The treatments vary from the distinctive stripped-down British folk ensemble sound that Campbell helped to define decades earlier, to the decidedly world-music colorations of son Duncan's multi-layered vocals on a song about South African politics.

worth searching for: Traditions of an Aberdeen Family (Topic, 1965/Ossian, 1994), credited to the Singing Campbells, saw Ian and Lorna as the younger generation's representatives in a large family celebration. The ICFG also appears on New Electric Muse (Castle Communications, 1996), a various-artists collection. Ian and Lorna join up with Peggy for an ICFG reunion on Swarb's 50th-birthday-bash memento Folk on 2: Dave Swarbrick (Cooking Vinyl, 1995), while Ian, son Duncan, Brian Clark, and Swarb do the same for Dave Pegg's Birthday Party (Woodworm, 1998).

influences:

- A.L. (Bert) Lloyd, Ewan MacColl, Peggy Seeger, Pete Seeger, Bob Dylan, the Dubliners, the Clancy Brothers
- The Dubliners, the Clancy Brothers, Fairport Convention, UB40

see also: Fairport Convention, A.L. Lloyd, Ewan MacColl, Dave Swarbrick

John C. Falstaff

Capercaillie

Scottish traditional and fusion

Formed 1984, in Oban, Scotland. Based in Scotland.

Original lineup: Karen Matheson, vocals; Donald Shaw, accordion, keyboards; Marc Duff, recorder, whistles; Joan MacLachlan, fiddle, vocals; Shaun Craig, guitar, bouzouki; Martin Macleod, bass, fiddle. Later members include: Mánus Lunny, bouzouki; Charlie McKerron, fiddle; John Saich, bass; Fred Morrison, bagpipes, whistles; Wilf Taylor, percussion; David Robertson, percussion.

Capercaillie rose to stardom almost overnight, forming in 1984 and recording their first album, Cascade, in three days. They rapidly developed a local reputation for strong live performances in their home town of Oban, Scotland. By 1988 they were being courted to compose the soundtrack for a documentary about the history of the Gaelic Scots. The resulting album, The Blood Is Strong, shot to platinum in Scotland, and soon the group was on tour around the world. Continuing this trend, they swiftly recorded several award-winning albums. In 1995 they appeared in the film Rob Roy, adding to their fame and association with Scottish culture. However, though known as a Scottish band, Capercaillie is truly an ethnic mix. The lineup includes two Scots, one Canadian, one Irishman, and two Englishmen. Traditional Scottish music is, nonetheless, the source from which they draw much of their material—albeit with an increasing modernization of instrumentation and broadening of ethnic inspirations. The group's strongest asset has to be the supernatural voice of Karen Matheson, who inspired Sean Connery to remark that she had "a throat surely touched by God."

what to buy: Perhaps the best overview of Capercaillie's style is Get Out ♪♪♪ (Survival/BMG, 1992, prod. Capercaillie, Iain Morrow, Dónal Lunny), which contains some live tracks and several previously recorded ones. This album displays the basic Scottish feel that made the group so popular, while capturing a bit of the modern sound that causes frequent comparisons to the Irish group Clannad. A beautiful rendition of "Fear a' Bhàta" from The Blood Is Strong and a live version of their rhythmic take on the 400-year-old waulking (Gaelic for "washing") song "Coisich a' Rùin," which skyrocketed to the U.K.'s Top 40, are highlights of the album.

what to buy next: Sidewaulk ♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1989, prod. Dónal Lunny) captures the essence of what the group sounds like in performance, though it itself contains no live tracks. Highly traditional in nature, the driving reels and jigs make listeners want to get up and dance. Crosswinds ♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1987, prod. Capercaillie) is also filled with traditional material. There are several very moving songs here, including "Am Buachaille Ban."

what to avoid: Beautiful Wasteland ♪½ (Survival, 1997) takes a much more modern approach, further electrifying the sound and combining African rhythms into the mix. It's an interesting experiment, but seems to lose completely the tradition the group originally set out to reclaim. If you like your genres spliced, however, you might be inclined to switch the ratings given here for this album with those given to their more characteristic work.

the rest:

The Blood Is Strong ♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1988)
Delirium ♪♪½ (BMG, 1991)
Secret People ♪♪ (Survival/BMG, 1993)
Capercaillie ♪♪ (Survival/BMG, 1994)
To the Moon ♪½ (Green Linnet, 1997)

worth searching for: Cascade ♪♪♪ (Greentrax, 1984) displays the raw energy that initially got the group off the ground.

influences:

- Na h-Oganaich, Christine Primrose, Flora MacNeill
- Clannad, Silly Wizard, Altan, Poor Clares

see also: Andy M. Stewart

Jo Hughey Morrison

Milton Cardona

Salsa, Latin jazz

Based in New York, NY, USA.

It seems a shame that one of the most talented conga players of our time has only released one album under his own name. Milton Cardona's skills as a percussionist have made him an in-demand session player for a variety of artists including pop stars Paul Simon and David Byrne, jazz players J.J. Johnson and Michael Brecker, and Latin-music royalty Cachao, Celia Cruz, Rubén Blades, and Willie Colon. The Colon connection has been especially fruitful for both parties, with a recorded association that dates back to Colon's 1972 album El Juicio. Other frequent employers include Manny Oquendo, Kip Hanrahan, and Dave Valentin, but Cardona is also a member of Conjunto Clasico, a New York City–based group dedicated to the old Cuban format pioneered by Arsenio Rodríguez and others. With Conjunto Classico Cardona gets to display his often-underrated vocal talents as well, showing off a clear, fluid tenor that weaves around the beat.

what's available: Cardona's only solo album is a landmark recording of a Santería ceremony, Bembé: A Recording of the Songs and Rhythms of 10 Orishas (Deities) of Santería in New York ♪♪♪♪♪ (American Clave, 1994, prod. Kip Hanrahan). Santería, like Vodou (formerly known to whites as "voodoo"), is a syncretic (hybrid) religion associating the African deities brought to the West by slaves with the Christian saints they encountered once they got there, Santería having a Cuban twist while Vodou has a Haitian slant. The pulse of Santería is at the heart of this album and Cardona—like fellow Santería high priest Tito Puente—is an expert at calling forth a particular "saint's" rhythm. He is ably abetted by fellow drummers Hector Hernandez, Steve Berrios, and Jose Fernandez as well as a set of female vocalists chorusing behind Cardona's invocation in a glorious call-and-response pattern.

worth searching for: Putting Cardona together with fellow congasero Daniel Ponce was a wonderful idea. The twist is that Ponce composes most of the tunes—and plays fiery congas and bata drums on all the cuts—while Cardona is one of the featured singers on all but two of them. The resulting collaboration, Chango Te Llama ♪♪♪♪♪ (Mango, 1991, prod. Oscar Hernandez), smokes from beginning to end. The Santería underpinnings of Bembé are repeated somewhat, but in a format that places a less overt emphasis on the religious aspects of the music.

influences:

- Cortijo
- Giovanni Hidalgo

Garaud MacTaggart

border music: tex-mex

Although musical traditions develop everywhere, some of the most intriguing ones represent hybrids that originate on the borders between regions, or when immigrants bring styles from elsewhere to blend with those already present in an area. One of the most dramatic examples of this has occurred along and near the U.S./Mexico border, principally in Texas, where European, American, and Mexican roots have entwined to inspire conjunto, norteño, Tejano, and other "Tex-Mex" musical mergers. Blues, country, and jazz were contributed from the American canon. The most significant European ingredient was the introduction of polka styles and the accordion from the dance bands of Eastern European immigrants who moved into southern Texas in the early 20th century. The polka beat formed the backbone of the seminal conjunto sound, with the rhythmic orientation and lyrical structure coming from traditional and contemporary Mexican music. The result was a unique new strain that blended an irresistible dance beat with passionate vocals, sensuous melodies, and virtuoso musicianship.

In the 1930s two pioneers, Narciso Martinez and Don Santiago Jimenez, were the first accordion players to lead conjunto ensembles. In the '50s and '60s the popularity of this music, which had become centered in the San Antonio area, was cemented by the work of bandleaders like Tony de la Rosa and Paulino Bernal. Steve Jordan and later Flaco Jimenez took the accordion to new ground and broader audiences. Jimenez's work with Ry Cooder and others brought this musical hyphenate to the rock and country constituencies, and paved the way for the wide cross-cultural popularity of the Texas Tornados and Los Lobos.

see also: Conjunto Bernal, Ry Cooder, Tony de la Rosa, Don Santiago Jimenez, Flaco Jimenez, Esteban "Steve" Jordan, Los Lobos, Narciso Martinez, the Texas Tornados

Michael Parrish

carreg lafar

Carreg Lafar

Welsh traditional

Formed 1993, in Cardiff, Wales. Based in Cardiff, Wales.

Linda Owen Jones, vocals; Antwn Owen Hicks, vocals, whistle, pibgorn (Welsh hornpipe), Welsh bagpipes, drum, bodhrán; Rhian Evan Jones, violin, cello, keyboards; James Rourke, flute, whistle; Nick Dowsett, 12-string acoustic guitar, vocals (1993–95); Simon O'Shea, acoustic guitar, mandola. (All members are from Wales.)

Carreg Lafar (meaning "Echo Stone") is a new Welsh band whose young members hail from all over: Wrexham in the north, Swansea on the south coast, and the valleys of southeast Wales. While much of their material is based on carefully researched old sources and sung in their native Welsh language, they inject it all with a lusty vibrancy which sets them apart from many of their peers. They first toured the U.S. in 1997, and are starting to make a mark on the festival circuit with their infectious, energetic live shows. Owen Jones exudes a feisty, indomitable spirit on stage, whether singing or egging-on her bandmates, and Owen Hicks is equally charismatic on pipes, percussion, and vocals. The band has occasional Gypsy overtones, and also sounds positively medieval at times. They show more interest—not to mention aptitude—for bringing traditional Welsh music to the great unwashed masses than most others of their generation.

what to buy: Ysbryd y Werin (Spirit of the People) ♪♪♪½ (Sain, 1995/Blix Street, 1995, prod. Emyr Rees) is an impressive debut; its U.S. release on Blix Street features welcome translations of the mysterious song titles, as well as the helpful annotations of the original on Sain. It's mostly a high-octane romp through songs of mothers-in-law, henpecked husbands, the wonders of nature and the seasons, and the usual stuff of peasant life (hard work, dreams of romance), all sung and played with great gusto. When they do slow down, as on two tracks concerning a love of Welsh culture and on the stunning closing song (a woman's affirmation of her love for a departed sailor husband), they reveal a welcome sensitive side.

what to buy next: The band's second release, Hyn (This) ♪♪♪½ (Sain, 1998, prod. Lawson Dando)—recorded shortly after the British Medical Journal reported a study of villagers in South Wales valleys that concluded that men who have more orgasms live longer—shows their energy levels undiminished. A dejected spinster finds love and marriage in the frantic opening song, which is followed by a carefully paced "If My Love Will Come." Actually, the tempos on many of the songs here are slowed down quite a bit compared to the earlier release, and there is a greater variety of musical textures and vocal harmonies.

influences:

⏮ Ar Log

John C. Falstaff

Chubby Carrier /Chubby Carrier & the Bayou Swamp Band

Zydeco

Formed 1990, in Lawtell, LA, USA. Based in Lafayette, LA, USA.

Chubby Carrier (born J.R. Carrier Jr., July 1, 1967, in Lafayette, LA, USA), one-row and three-row accordion, piano accordion, vocals; John Gaar, guitar; Lance Ellis, saxophone; Tray Landry, drums; Corey Duplechain, bass; Mike Chaisson, frattoir, percussion. Past members have included: David Lejeune, guitar; Rodney Dural, bass. (All members are from USA.)

Chubby Carrier is part of an extended family of musicians from the Lawtell/Mallet area of Louisiana. His father, Roy Carrier Sr., is a well-respected zydeco musician and club owner who leads his own band, the Night Rockers. Chubby got his break filling in for Roy at the Offshore Lounge on nights when the elder Carrier was out working an oil rig in the Gulf of Mexico. Roy encouraged Chubby to develop his own style, and introduced him to Clifton Chenier and blues performers like Bobby "Blue" Bland and B.B. King. He got his start away from dad's band playing drums with Terrance Simien and the Mallet Playboys. Like Simien, he puts a lot more guitar solos in his music than most other zydeco bands. He also uses a lot more rock 'n' roll rhythms—there's even a tribute to the Grateful Dead's Jerry Garcia!—which makes him more accessible to the mainstream audience, if less appealing to the zydeco scene's hard core. This is not to disparage Chubby, though; he's a fine performer on the one- and three-row accordions right out of the Rockin' Dopsie school of tough zydeco licks, and his experience as a drummer shows in his always-tight grooves.

what to buy: On Who Stole the Hot Sauce? ♪♪♪½ (Blind Pig, 1996, prod. Michael Freeman) Carrier shows not just his roots—with a cover of Clifton Chenier's classic version of the traditional "Zydeco Sont Pas Sale"—but the more contemporary influence of Beau Jocque as well, with his own remake of War's "The Cisco Kid." Fans of his rock 'n' roll side will want to check out the zydeco version of Pete Townshend's suitably titled "Squeezebox" to hear how a rock song can be turned into a South Louisiana dance number.

what to buy next: No one is denying that Carrier can wail on the three-row, or that the man can sing and lead a band, but Dance All Night ♪♪♪ (Blind Pig, 1993, prod. Chubby Carrier, Edward Chmelewski, Jerry Del Giudice) may not satisfy south Louisiana–sound purists. Still, a piquant version of the Texas Playboys' "Stay a Little Longer" is especially fun if you're familiar with Bob Wills's original. And Carrier passes the litmus test for zydeco accordionists by soloing over just the drums and rubboard on "Old Time Zydeco," and pays his respects to Clifton Chenier with a high-speed cover of "Tout le Temps en Temp."

the rest:
Boogie Woogie Zydeco ♪♪♪ (Flying Fish, 1991)

influences:
◀◀ Roy Carrier, Rockin' Dopsie, Clifton Chenier
▶▶ Keith Frank, Chris Ardoin, Geno Delafose

see also: Roy Carrier, Clifton Chenier, Beau Jocque, Rockin' Dopsie, Terrance Simien

Jared Snyder

Roy Carrier /Roy Carrier & the Night Rockers

Zydeco

Formed 1961, in Lawtell, LA, USA. Based in Lawtell, LA, USA.

Roy Carrier, one-row and three-row button accordions, vocals; Kevin Carrier, guitar; Troy Dickie Carrier, drums; Paul Newman, bass; Kevin Brousard, frattoir; Gerard St. Julien Jr., drums. (All members are from USA.)

Roy Carrier's Offshore Club is the place for zydeco music in the small town of Lawtell, Louisiana, where the Carrier family has a deep tradition of music-making. Uncles Bebe and Eraste Carrier were playing dances in the area almost as far back as the turn of the twentieth century, and the Lawtell Playboys of Calvin Carrier and Delton Broussard also played the area for years. Roy grew up in this rich culture; he started to play the rubboard at age six and would sneak his father's accordion out to the barn to learn that instrument as well. Despite the whipping he got when his father found out, he was determined to learn accordion, and by age 14 had formed the Night Rockers with his brother. A farm accident took half of Roy's index finger on his right hand, but like Django Reinhardt and other musicians he used the adversity to his advantage, developing a "cross chord" technique that is unique among zydeco players. Roy's style has a diatonic push-pull and syncopated scratch that hearken back to the rural zydeco of the Lawtell Playboys. This is balanced by his love of blues performers like Bobby "Blue" Bland and B.B. King, as well as the influence of zydeco king Clifton Chenier. Preserving the family tradition in more ways than one, Roy is the father of the "Jimi Hendrix of the Accordion," Chubby Carrier.

what to buy: It's axiomatic that zydeco bands are always much better live than on record, and that's certainly true in this case. However, Zydeco Strokin' ♪♪♪½ (Paula, 1995, prod. Lee Lavergne) gives a good taste of what to expect when you go out and get dancing to the Night Rockers. Any good zydeco recording has to have a tune where the accordionist/leader solos over just the frattoir (rubboard) and drums to prove that he can drive the band without the benefit of guitar and bass, and this album is no exception. Carrier plays a kicking version of Clifton Chenier's "Baby Do Right" over the rhythm section, and the overall mix emphasizes the drums, frattoir, and accordion over the guitar and bass. While many of the tunes are slight rewrites of current zydeco material, you also get the band riffing off on Clarence Carter's R&B hit "Strokin'," keeping just enough of the original to see where they're coming from. Carrier's strong blues influence shines on "My Baby Wants to Leave Me," and the obligatory zydeco novelty cover is, in this case, a rocking version of "Tequila." Not as good as a night at the Offshore, or seeing Carrier at your local dance hall, but it's a nice record. Don't make this your first zydeco purchase, though.

what to buy next: The same reservations stated above apply to Offshore Blues and Zydeco ♪♪♪½ (Chubby Dragon, 1997, prod. Ray Alden). Carrier ain't gonna win any awards as the poet of his generation, but that's not the point with this genre. Lots of Carrier's songs are built around a zydeco riff and call-and-response singing. His "Kansas City Blues" sounds like Wilbert Harrison lost in the fog on Highway 190 somewhere between Lawtell and Swords, and his "Living in the USA/Shake, Rattle and Roll" medley sounds like something he pulls out for LSU frat parties. Still, the man can drive a band with his accordion: check out his "My Baby Don't Wear No Shoes," done in the old house-dance style, and his cover of Chenier's "Blake Snake Moan." This one is only available by mail order—from Chubby Dragon Productions, 124 Quaker Bridge Rd, Croton-on-Hudson, NY 11052; Phone: (914) 941-8536—but it has some of Carrier's nicest playing.

the rest:
At His Best ♪♪♪ (Zane, 1996)
(With Joe Walker) Soulful Side of Zydeco ♪♪ (Zane, 1996)

influences:
◀◀ Clifton Chenier, Boozoo Chavis, Rockin' Dopsie
▶▶ Chubby Carrier, Chris Ardoin

see also: Chubby Carrier, C.J. Chenier, Clifton Chenier

Jared Snyder

Liz Carroll

Irish traditional

Born September 19, 1956, in Chicago, IL, USA. Based in Chicago, IL, USA.

We have Sister Francine to thank in part for Liz Carroll's contribution to Irish traditional fiddle music. As Carroll was growing up and becoming involved in Irish dancing and music-making in her native Chicago, she first started playing on her father's three-row accordion, only later to be inspired to take up the fiddle by Sister Francine's violin teaching at school. Fortunately for Carroll, the 1960s were a time of cultural reawakening for Chicago's Irish community and, under the aegis of the city's Irish Traditional Musicians Association, she was soon playing and learning alongside veteran practitioners like Mayo piper Joe Shannon and Chicago-born fiddler John McGreevy. By 1973 Carroll's playing had become impressive enough for visiting accordionist Paddy Gavin to encourage her to compete in the All-Ireland competitions on the emerald isle itself. Although that year she was second to future De Dannan frontman Frankie Gavin in the under-18 category, she won first place in 1974, and went on to a stunning victory in the senior division the very next year, with a title in the duet competition to boot. It wasn't long before Carroll was asked to join in Mick Moloney's Green Fields of America tours, and to record for New York City–based world-music label Shanachie. Two early LPs, the first being a duet album with Offaly accordion player Tommy Maguire, were followed by a number of guest appearances on recordings by fellow Green Fielders Mick Moloney and Jimmy Keane as well as ethnomusicologist and folk-rock artist Lawrence McCullough. Carroll has since made another solo album, consisting mostly of her own compositions, and has been touring and recording since 1991 with the group Trian, alongside accordionist Billy McComiskey and singer/guitar player Dáithí Sproule. In 1994 Carroll was presented with a prestigious National Heritage Fellowship award from the National Endowment for the Arts.

what to buy: On the strength of her All-Ireland success, Carroll recorded her debut duet album, Kiss Me Kate ♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1978, prod. Daniel Michael Collins, Richard Nevins), with accordion player Tommy Maguire—himself an All-Ireland winner in 1964—and Jerry Wallace on piano. The album abounds in impressively tight playing of the often-complex melodies which the notoriously tune-hungry Carroll seems to favor. However, her true musical personality really unfolds on her first solo album, A Friend Indeed ♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1979, prod. Richard Nevins, Daniel Michael Collins), recorded a year later with Marty Fahey on piano. Here, Carroll demonstrates not only her awe-inspiring command of the instrument and the idiom—sometimes spicing things up with quirky, American-sounding licks—but showcases her talents as a composer as well. It took Carroll almost 10 years before she made her next solo album, but the result was worth the wait. Liz Carroll ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1988, prod. Liz Carroll, Dáithí Sproule) is a dazzling display of her superior musicianship and compositional genius, all but six of the tunes coming from her pen. Besides her work with the group Trian, there are a few tracks by Carroll on a number of anthologies worth seeking. She recorded an uncommon setting of "Miss McLeod" followed by a couple of her own compositions on Cherish the Ladies: Irish Women Musicians in America ♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1985, prod. Mick Moloney), the original album resulting from Mick Moloney's efforts to promote the female side of Irish-American music. This also featured Eileen Ivers, recently of Riverdance fame. Carroll also appears on the live recording My Love Is in America: The Boston College Irish Fiddle Festival ♪♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1991, prod. Mícheál Ó Súilleabháin), a fabulous collection every Irish fiddle-music lover should have on their shelf; as well as on the recently released and equally worthwhile Gaelic Roots ♪♪♪♪½ (Kells Music, 1997, prod. Séamus Connolly), also recorded live at Boston College. Finally, she can be heard playing solo on two more of her own compositions, and in one duet with accordionist Billy McComiskey, on Dear Old Erin's Isle: Irish Traditional Music from America ♪♪♪½ (Nimbus, 1992, prod. Mícheál Ó Súilleabháin, Robin Broadbank), recorded live on the occasion of the eighth annual Éigse na Laoi festival of traditional music at University College, Cork.

worth searching for: Irish Traditional Instrumental Music from Chicago, Vol. 2 ♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1976, prod. Miles Krassen, Larry McCullough) and Ed Reavy ♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1979, prod. Mick Moloney), the latter album devoted to the compositions of the famous County Cavan fiddle player, are two of the LP collections that featured Carroll's early playing; one Carroll track from the former and two from the latter were recently reissued on the easier-to-find compilation Jigs and Reels from Ireland ♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1998). On Fathers and Daughters from Cherish the Ladies ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1985, prod. Mick Moloney), the follow-up to the original Cherish the Ladies album and as yet not reissued on CD, Carroll appears on two tracks along with her father Kevin on accordion.

influences:

- Kevin Carroll, Martin Byrne, Joe Shannon, John McGreevy, Eleanor Neary, Terry Teahan
- Eileen Ivers, Cherish the Ladies, Kathleen Collins

see also: Cherish the Ladies, Déanta, De Dannan, James Keane, Mick Moloney, Trian

Philippe Varlet

Eliza Carthy /Waterson:Carthy

English folk, folk-rock, and fusion

Waterson:Carthy formed c. 1994, in England. Based in England.

Eliza Carthy (born 1975, in Yorkshire, England), fiddle, vocals; Norma Waterson (born August 15, 1939), vocals; Martin Carthy (born May 21, 1940), guitar, vocals; Saul Rose, melodeon (1999–present). (All members are from England.)

Eliza Carthy was born into one of the most musically gifted and important families in England. Her father is the noted guitarist and singer Martin Carthy—distinguished by service in Steeleye

Span, the Albion Country Band, Brass Monkey, the Martin Carthy & Dave Swarbrick duo, the Watersons, and Waterson:Carthy as well as by his solo work—and her mother is sublime vocalist Norma Waterson, of the latter two bands. Starting out, Eliza played guitar and mandolin; it wasn't until 1990, when she partnered in a duo with Nancy Kerr, that she picked up the fiddle as well, in that instrument (and her own vocals) finding the vehicle with which she would carry forth the family tradition in phenomenal form. In a short career that has already included work as one half of the aforesaid duo and the other third of the above-mentioned Waterson:Carthy, as well as two of her own outfits, Eliza Carthy & the Kings of Calicutt and the Eliza Carthy Band, Carthy has shot into the music firmament as one of the hottest stars of the English folk scene's '90s generation.

what to buy: Heat, Light & Sound ♪♪♪♪ (Topic, 1996, prod. Eliza Carthy, Ray Williams, Tony Engle) boasts exciting arrangements of traditional instrumentals and songs. Carthy's voice is charmingly untutored and sweet. The plaintive "Ten Thousand Miles/Bacca Pipes" exemplifies the best of what the English music tradition has to offer. Two years later Carthy released a unique package consisting of two complete CDs—Red ♪♪♪♪½ (Topic, 1998, prod. Niall Macauley) and Rice ♪♪♪♪½ (Topic, 1998, prod. Eliza Carthy, "the rest of the world")—in one box. On Red Carthy takes English ballad and instrumental traditions into the 21st century with startling new arrangements of centuries-old works. On "Billy Boy," accordion-led English folk-rock meets dub reggae. What makes the track even more fascinating is that Carthy's unadorned folk-singing style fits just fine with the decidedly different instrumental backing. There's also a refreshingly blues-and-jazzed-up version of "Greenwood Laddie," complete with scintillating syncopated piano riffing by Martin Green. Several of the instrumental selections are English counterparts to the approach of avant-garde Scottish folk bands like Shooglenifty and Peatbog Faeries, in which ancient dance tunes meet modern rhythm grooves and high-tech production techniques. For contrast, Rice is a stripped-down acoustic set that shows Carthy equally powerful singing or playing fiddle, backed only by guitar or accordion.

what to buy next: The guiding spirit of the Waterson:Carthy project is Eliza's mother Norma Waterson, whose deep, resonant voice suggests centuries of toil and more than a little pleasure. Waterson:Carthy ♪♪♪♪½ (Topic, 1994, prod. Tony Engle) spotlights her strong lead vocals, though the Carthy father and daughter each get their turn at the mic. Eliza's fiddle blends well with her father's guitar on "Ye Mariners All," which Martin Carthy sings. Common Tongue ♪♪♪♪½ (Topic, 1997, prod. Tony Engle), a more specifically English album than its predecessor, is helped by the presence of various Watersons on backing vocals. The melodeon of Saul Rose (recently made a full-fledged member) duetting with Eliza Carthy's fiddle on "Valentine Waltz" is a sweet addition to the first track.

the rest:

(With Nancy Kerr) Eliza Carthy & Nancy Kerr ♪♪♪½ (Mrs. Casey Records, 1993)

shape of scrape ♪♪♪½ (Mrs. Casey Records, 1995)

(With the Kings of Calicutt) Eliza Carthy & the Kings of Calicutt ♪♪♪♪ (Topic, 1997)

worth searching for: Norma Waterson's solo effort, Norma Waterson ♪♪♪♪♪ (Rykodisc, 1996, prod. John Chelew), includes Martin and Eliza Carthy, as well as Roger Swallow (percussion), Danny Thompson (bass), and Richard Thompson (guitar). It emphasizes the work of a wide range of songwriters, including the latter Thompson, Jerry Garcia, Robert Hunter, Billy Bragg, and Lal Waterson. The mother-daughter vocal harmonies on "There Ain't No Sweet Man That's Worth the Salt of My Tears" are exquisite.

influences:

- Martin Carthy, the Watersons, Copper Family, Shirley Collins, Maddy Prior
- Kate Rusby, Shooglenifty, Peatbog Faeries

see also: Martin Carthy

Pamela Murray Winters and Ken Roseman

Martin Carthy

British folk

Born May 21, 1940, in Hatfield, Hertfordshire, England. Based in England.

There's nary a significant development in the British folk music of the past 30 years that singer-guitarist Martin Carthy can't claim to have impacted. He taught British-folk standards like "Scarborough Fair" to Paul Simon; he played with British-folk revolutionaries like Steeleye Span and Dave Swarbrick; he influenced definitive British-folk guitarists like Richard Thompson, Martin Simpson, and Stephen Fearing; he married into the British-folk institution the Watersons. Carthy's first recording came out in 1963, and he has shone ever since as an understated singer, a superbly sensitive guitarist, and a scholar of folk music noted for his respect for the original material. Today he shares the spotlight in bands like Waterson:Carthy with his spouse and daughter (Norma Waterson and Eliza Carthy), and basks in a bit of his own with such honors as his 1998 receipt of an M.B.E. (Member of the British Empire) award for his contributions to British culture.

what to buy: The Martin Carthy Collection ♪♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1993) is an obvious starting point for learning about the artist. With traditional songs; a Carthy composition ("Company Policy," about the Falklands conflict); and "Palaces of Gold" by Leon Rosselson, one of Britain's best-known political songwriters, it highlights Carthy's socially conscious side, as well as his fondness for reworking older sources.

what to buy next: Martin Carthy and Dave Swarbrick's CD Life and Limb ♪♪♪♪♪ (Topic/Green Linnet, 1991, prod. John Chelew) includes the beautifully creepy "Bows of London" and one of many versions of "The Begging Song." Swarbrick fiddles beautifully on "Carthy's March/The Lemon Tree," tunes he wrote for Carthy and Trevor Lucas, respectively.

best of the rest:
Martin Carthy ♪♪♪♪½ (Topic, 1965)
Byker Hill ♪♪♪♪½ (Topic, 1967)
Crown of Horn ♪♪♪♪ (Topic, 1976)
Out of the Cut ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1982)
(With Dave Swarbrick) Skin and Bone ♪♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1992)

worth searching for: Carthy joins bride Norma's family on the Watersons' For Pence and Spicy Ale ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1975, prod. Tony Engle), which contains wassails, work songs, and other traditional fare. The presentation is a cappella, in a style similar to that of vocal pioneers Young Tradition, though more elaborate. The reissue also includes some tracks by individual Watersons.

influences:
◀◀ A.L. Lloyd, Davey Graham, Ravi Shankar, the Watersons
▶▶ Simon & Garfunkel, Bob Dylan, Martin Simpson, Eliza Carthy

see also: Eliza Carthy, Ashley Hutchings, Steeleye Span, Dave Swarbrick

Pamela Murray Winters

John Carty

Irish traditional

Born in London, England. Based in Boyle, County Roscommon, Ireland.

Born in London in the early 1960s of Irish parentage, John Carty began his self-professed addiction to Irish traditional music in the early '70s under the tutelage of Clare-born musician Brendan Mulkere. Carty went on to enter the annual Fleadh competitions of Irish music, in which he achieved success at all levels, culminating in his Senior All-Ireland banjo championship title in 1982. 1983 saw Carty travel to Australia, where he spent a year teaching and playing music. Upon returning to London in 1984 he became a fixture in the vibrant London Irish session scene until 1991, when he finally moved to Ireland itself. Carty settled in Boyle, County Roscommon—the area from which his father came—and has lived there with his own family ever since. A multi-instrumentalist, Carty is best known for his fiery banjo and fiddle playing but is also a fine flute player. His unabashed love for the true greats of Irish traditional music and his reverence for that style is a breath of fresh air at a time when frequent experimentation with Irish tradition seems to be the norm—though in Carty's imaginative hands the legacy is definitely a living one.

what to buy: Last Night's Fun ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1996, prod. Daniel Michael Collins) is a brilliant collection of Irish traditional music. It also features several of Carty's frequent musical partners, including pianist Brian McGrath and guitarist Francis Gaffney. The liner notes poke fun at Carty's lack of celebrity as a fiddle player by saying the recording could have been called "Out of the Blue" or "They Laughed When I Sat Down to Play." You won't be doing much laughing when you sit down to listen to Last Night's Fun, though it will cause you to stand up and take notice of his brilliance. At the Racket ♪♪♪♪ (Racket, 1997, prod. Garry O'Briain) is the eponymous debut of a remarkable band put together by Carty, McGrath, Garry O'Briain, and Seamus O'Donnell. The outfit is modeled after Irish traditional bands of the '20s and '30s like the Flanagan Brothers, from whose recording "Flanagan at the Racket" this band takes its name. The album is slyly innovative and preservationist at the same time in its use of the saxophone within a traditional idiom—uncommon today, though during the Irish dance-band heyday being evoked it was the norm rather than the exception. Overall excellence and inventiveness, O'Donnell's sax coupled with Carty's banjo, and a couple of vocal cuts thrown into the mix of mostly instrumentals make this recording a must-have for fans of Irish music with a sense of history and an eye on the future.

what to buy next: The Cat That Ate the Candle ♪♪♪½ (Cló Iar-Chonnachta, 1994, prod. John Carty, Brian McGrath) is a marvelous recording that showcases Carty's banjo-playing side, along with his frequent musical partner McGrath. Carty's At the Racket cohort holds down the fort with subtle piano accompaniment while Carty lets loose on banjo. The one track that features his superb fiddling as well is what led Shanachie Records to ink Carty for a multi-album deal.

worth searching for: Across the Waters ♪♪♪ (Nimbus, 1994, prod. Mícheál Ó Súilleabháin, Robin Broadbank) was recorded live at University College of Cork, Ireland, as part of an annual concert series featuring music from various parts the Celtic world—including many of the finest exponents of Irish traditional music from England. While Carty's vibrant banjo playing is only featured on one track, the recording deftly illustrates the fertile Irish music scene in London from which Carty emerged.

influences:
Brendan Mulkere, Lad O'Beirne, the Flanagan Brothers, Micheal Coleman, Paddy Killoran

Cliff McGann

Karan Casey

See: Solas

Casper

Reggae, Native American

Born Casper Loma-Da-Wa (a.k.a. Lomayesva) in Winslow, AZ, USA. Based in Scottsdale, AZ, USA.

Casper grew up on the Hopi Reservation, where his father and paternal grandparents had a big influence on him. His mother was Navajo and his father Hopi; when his parents broke up Casper would get to experience both cultures. "I was raised on traditional music," he once explained. "In Hopiland, every weekend there would be ceremonies and my grandparents and father brought me into the traditional ways. They taught me to live in harmony with the Great Spirit." In high school Casper listened to pop and rap, and considered putting his poetry to music, but it was reggae that really rocked his world. "Reggae is a big thing in Hopiland," Casper explained. "Hopis went down to all the big reggae shows in Flagstaff, and eventually we started Culture Connection, a group that began bringing bands onto the rez, and I'm talking Wailers, Dennis Brown and Steel Pulse. Seeing those people on stage made me hungry. Something in the rhythm connected with the traditional music I'd been raised on. And the message of awareness and responsibility made me open my eyes." In the spirit of this heightened social consciousness, Casper continued, "What happens on the rez isn't too different from what happens to people of color everywhere, but people don't realize Hopiland isn't a reservation. We've never been relocated. One of our villages is one of the oldest continually inhabited villages in the world. I stress that in the music. We aren't imported people, we've been here a long time, and to be considered second-class citizens is absurd."

what's available: Casper speaks out strongly, both musically and lyrically, on his self-produced debut Original Landlord ♪♪♪♪ (Third Mesa, 1997, prod. Casper Lomayesva). He sings in a convincing Jamaican patois and the one-drop riddims of his band crackle with energy; the music is a potent blend of roots reggae, dancehall, and Native American styles. Joyous celebrations of love and music like "Love Me, Love Me" and "Nuff Dread Dem Come" complement tough political tracks like "Hundred Years of Redemption" and "Roadblock," which pays an implicit compliment to Marley's "Rebel Music (3 O'Clock Roadblock)."

influences:
Bob Marley, Gladiators, Culture

j. poet

Patrick Cassidy

Irish traditional and classical

Born 1956, in Claremorris, County Mayo, Ireland. Based in Ireland and Los Angeles, CA, USA.

Harp-player and composer Patrick Cassidy grew up in a large bilingual family in the west of Ireland, dabbling with rock music in the late '70s and early '80s while growing increasingly fascinated with piano and harp. Entirely self-taught as a composer and arranger, and inspired by the example of Irish-heritage standard-bearer Seán Ó Riada, he blossomed in his 30s on a series of albums recorded with some of the top names in classical and Irish music. At first drawing on the legacy of the great 18th-century Irish harper Turlough O'Carolan, by the '90s Cassidy had turned to ambitious large-scale orchestral and choral works based on ancient Irish historical and mythical subject matter, distinguished by librettos in the Irish language, and often incorporating uilleann pipes. While Shaun Davey in Ireland had first married pipes and orchestra in the late '70s, and Breton harper Alan Stivell had written and recorded a Celtic Symphony a few years later, Cassidy's vision seems quite different: to take a familiar Baroque form and imbue it with distinctively Irish colorations.

what to buy: Famine Remembrance ♪♪♪♪ (Windham Hill, 1997, prod. Patrick Cassidy) features operatic soloists and the Choir and Orchestra of Saint Patrick's Cathedral, NYC, on a dignified and rather somber requiem written and released for the 150th anniversary of the Great Irish Famine, which led to mass emigrations to America. Original pieces for orchestra are placed alongside choral arrangements of "St. Patrick's Breastplate" (in Irish), "De Profundis" (in Latin), and two settings of poems (in English) about the famine published in the late 1840s by "Speranza," better known as the mother of Oscar Wilde. Ex-Bothy Band piper Paddy Keenan joins in for the stately closing "Funeral March."

what to buy next: The Children of Lir ♪♪♪½ (Son, 1993/Celtic Heartbeat, 1994, prod. Patrick Cassidy) was Cassidy's first oratorio, recorded by the London Symphony Orchestra, the Tallis Chambre Choir, and former Planxty piper Liam O'Flynn. The libretto (in Irish) is based on an 1883 manuscript, and the scoring is strongly reminiscent of the works of Händel and Haydn. Cassidy's song cycle Deirdre of the Sorrows ♪♪♪½ (Windham Hill, 1998, prod. Patrick Cassidy) was recorded by the London Symphony Orchestra and the Tallis Chambre Choir in 1995, its release being delayed to allow Famine Remembrance a timely issue. Three unrelated O'Carolan pieces, recorded with the worth searching for: On the Irish-only Cruit (Gael-Linn, 1988, prod. Patrick Cassidy) Cassidy, on harp, leads a Baroque chamber ensemble in his own arrangements of O'Carolan melodies.

1/4/2 dori caymmi

Dori Caymmi

Dublin Philharmonic Orchestra and featuring Cassidy on harp, are appended to this CD.

influences:

- Georg Friedrich Händel, Joseph Haydn, Seán Ó Riada, Shaun Davey, Alan Stivell

see also: Bothy Band, Shaun Davey, Liam O'Flynn, Seán Ó Riada, Planxty, Alan Stivell

John C. Falstaff

Dori Caymmi

Brazilian pop-jazz, samba

Born 1943, in Brazil. Based in Brazil and Los Angeles, CA, USA.

The son of the late bossa nova icon Dorival Caymmi, Dori Caymmi is a Brazilian pop-jazz singer, acoustic guitarist, and composer who is known for his subtlety, softness, and restraint. In addition to being greatly influenced by the bossa nova movement of the 1960s, Caymmi has been an ardent admirer of U.S. jazz and pre-rock pop. His vocals and acoustic guitar playing are airy, caressing, and light, yet never lightweight. Being the son of an artist who was so famous in Brazil in the '60s and '70s could have been daunting, but Dori Caymmi is a great artist in his own right. Caymmi was only 17 when he started writing music for commercials, and he went on to play or record with artists ranging from Sarah Vaughan and Toots Thielemans to Johnny Mathis. Since the early '90s, Caymmi has been recording for Quincy Jones's Qwest label with generally rewarding results.

what to buy: Although all of Caymmi's Qwest CDs are worth hearing, the best albums to start out with are Brazilian Serenata ♪♪♪♪½ (Qwest, 1991, prod. Dori Caymmi) and Kicking Cans ♪♪♪♪½ (Qwest, 1991, prod. Dori Caymmi). Caymmi sings in both English and Portuguese on Brazilian Serenata, his first recording for Qwest, and he is amazingly soulful on such introspective treasures as "Mercador de Siri," "The Colors of Joy," and "Flower of Bahia." Equally impressive and just as introspective is Kicking Cans, which finds him joined by John Patitucci, Billy Childs, Branford Marsalis, and other jazz greats. Whether he's providing lyrics or wordless scat-singing, Caymmi's vocals never fail to be personal.

what to buy next: If I Ever . . . ♪♪♪♪ (Qwest, 1994, prod. Dori Caymmi) gets off to a fine start with Caymmi's gentle interpretation of Stephen Sondheim's "Send in the Clowns," and he demonstrates that he is a sensitive and poignant composer himself on heartfelt originals like "Homesick for Old Rio (Saudade Do Rio)" and "We Can Try Love Again."

influences:

◀◀ Antonio Carlos Jobim, João Gilberto, Milton Nascimento

Alex Henderson

Celtic Fiddle Festival

See: Kevin Burke, Johnny Cunningham

Ceolbeg

Scottish traditional and neo-traditional

Formed 1988, in Edinburgh, Scotland. Based in Scotland.

Peter Boond, vocals, flute, whistle, cittern; Davy Steele, lead vocals, guitar, bouzouki (1988–95); Katie Harrigan, vocals, clarsach, electroharp (1988–91); Andy Thorburn, vocals, keyboards (1988–91); Gary West, vocals, Highland pipes (1988–92); Wendy Stewart, vocals, electroharp, concertina (1991–present); Colin Matheson, vocals, keyboards (1991–95); Mike Katz, Highland pipes (1994–97); Rod Paterson, lead vocals, guitar (1995–present). (All members are from Scotland.)

In the Gaelic language of the Scots, Ceol Beag (KALE-beg) translates literally as "small music" and refers to the jigs, reels, and strathspeys of traditional Scottish music, while Ceol Mor ("big music") describes the booming classical sound of the Highland bagpipe. Over the last 20 years and more, a number of such Scottish outfits as the Battlefield Band, the Tannahill Weavers, and Wolfstone have combined traditional music, modern acoustic and electric instrumentation, and the Ceol Mor to produce what many have called "bagpipe rock," drawing large numbers of new fans into the world of folk music in the process. Missing from these bands in many instances, though, was the delicacy and variety of the Ceol Beag. From their formation during the late 1980s (Peter Boond is the sole remaining original member), Ceolbeg set out to prove that the harp and Highland pipes could be brought together in a format both traditional and contemporary to produce music that is anything but "small"—and as many critics and reviewers have commented throughout the history of Ceolbeg, the band's name is a misnomer; they're big.

Part of Ceolbeg's secret has been the uncommon ability of pipers Gary West, and later Mike Katz, to moderate the Highland pipes and achieve a sound that one publication described as "fluency with firepower." Combined with the electroharp—particularly when played in Wendy Stewart's distinctive percussive style—as well as with keyboards and Boond's flute and cittern work, the effect has been described as "an atmospheric mist of swirling instrumentation." Yet Ceolbeg is much more than an instrumental phenomenon; much of their appeal can be traced to the powerful, emotional lead vocals of Davy Steele, a singer widely considered to be an interpreter of modern and traditional Scottish music in the same league with his close friends Andy M. Stewart and Dick Gaughan. Steele left the band in 1995, replaced by Rod Paterson, and as of September 1997 had joined the Battlefield Band to replace the departing Alistair Russell. Mike Katz has also signed on with the Battlefield Band, with his replacement in Ceolbeg yet undetermined. In more recent years Ceolbeg has added a drummer and percussionist in the person of Jim Walker, who appears on their most recent album. Their recorded output is of uniformly high quality, but from their earliest days Ceolbeg have believed themselves to be at their best when performing live—they even regard their longtime sound man Adie Bolton as a full-fledged band member. In 1991 the Scottish Folk Gazette recounted, with accuracy and enthusiasm, that "Ceolbeg bring to their audiences not only musical virtuosity and dynamic performances, but also a great deal of humour and repartee." Luckily, on their fine albums you can listen for yourself.

what to buy: All three of Ceolbeg's generally available releases on the Greentrax label are of consistently good quality. The one to start with is their most recent, An Unfair Dance ♪♪♪♪½ (Greentrax, 1993, prod. Roy Ashby), if for no other reason than it contains the most music—60 full minutes. Their trademark treatments of reels and strathspeys are satisfying, and Steele's vocals are powerful, whether delivering a Burns ballad ("My Love Is like a Red, Red Rose") or one of his own songs, such as the emotion-packed "The Collier's Way," which deals with his father's experiences as a miner. It's a gripping song that deserves mention in the same breath as American mining classics like Merle Travis's "Dark as a Dungeon" and Jean Ritchie's "Blue Diamond Mine." While Steele's voice is reminiscent of pop-rock icon Sting, his singing is much richer and more expressive, and totally devoid of pretension. The unusual instrumental combination of Highland war pipes with Wendy Stewart's harp style (described by some as "bubbling") brings to mind the "bull in a china shop" metaphor, but Gary West's piping is well modulated to allow each band member's contributions to be clearly heard and appreciated.

what to buy next: Both their debut album, Not the Bunnyhop ♪♪♪♪ (Greentrax, 1990, prod. Phil Cunningham), and their second release, Seeds to the Wind ♪♪♪♪ (Greentrax, 1992, prod.

Dick Gaughan), feature the same entertaining mix of instrumental and vocal accomplishment. Highlights on Not the Bunnyhop include Andy M. Stewart's "Queen of Argyll" and Steele's "The High and Mighty." On Seeds to the Wind Steele shines on material like "Johnnie Cope" and Robert Burns's "A' the Airts," while the interplay between Stewart's harp and West's piping makes both recordings worthwhile additions to any collection.

solo outings:

Wendy Stewart:
About Time ♪♪♪½ (Greentrax, 1992)
About Time, Vol. 2 ♪♪♪ (Greentrax, 1997)

Davy Steele:
Chasing Shadows ♪♪♪♪ (Temple, 1997)

influences:

◀◀ Capercaillie, Silly Wizard, Clan Alba, Dick Gaughan, Andy M. Stewart

▶▶ Battlefield Band, Tannahill Weavers, Old Blind Dogs

see also: Battlefield Band, Dick Gaughan, Andy M. Stewart, Tannahill Weavers, Wolfstone

John Lupton

Ceoltoiri

Celtic

Formed as a duo in 1983, in the Washington, DC, area, USA. Based in the Washington, DC, area, USA.

Karen Ashbrook, hammered dulcimer, pennywhistle, boxwood flute; Sue Richards, Celtic harp; Connie McKenna, vocals, guitar (1987–present).

Ceoltoiri, the Irish Gaelic word for musicians, is the perfect name for this band, which was originally formed as a Celtic harp and hammered dulcimer duo, combining two traditional sounds that were obviously made to go together. Karen Ashbrook's virtuoso melodies combine with Sue Richards's haunting harp lines to create a rich texture of sounds, and then they switch roles, keeping the tunes fresh and interesting. It is sometimes hard to believe they can create such lush sounds with so few instruments. Occasionally described as "chamber folk," Ceoltoiri selects traditional tunes with great soul and then arranges them in a theme-and-variations format. The result is dynamic. The group was joined by guitarist Connie McKenna in 1987, after she guested on their first recording. Following Irish tradition, Connie studied sean-nós singing, a particular style of unaccompanied, highly ornamented vocal work, and brought an elegant classical guitar background and a rich sense of Irish vocals to the group, adding spice to an already flavorful mix.

what to buy: Silver Apples of the Moon ♪♪♪♪ (Maggie's Music, 1992, prod. Charlie Pilzer) combines the best these musicians have to offer, all on one recording. From delightful duets by Karen and Sue, such as "Flowing Tide/New Claret," to Connie's evocative a cappella sean-nós singing on "The Plain Girl's Lament," the tracks offer something different at every turn. The darkly beautiful "Death of Queen Jane" alone is worth whatever price you pay for this CD.

what to buy next: The original duo shows their stuff on Celtic Lace ♪♪♪ (Foolscap, 1989/Maggie's Music, 1992). This recording amply demonstrates the perfect blend that Celtic harp and hammered dulcimer can create. Women of Ireland ♪♪♪♪ (Maggie's Music, 1998, prod. Charlie Pilzer) features some heartwrenching ballads, beautifully delivered. The rendition of Dougie MacLean's "Caledonia" is a standout. Guests include Trian's Billy McComiskey on accordion and Kieran O'Hare on uilleann pipes. Harper and pianist Carol Rose Duane, a regular performing guest with the group, also joins them here.

influences:

◀◀ Maggie Sansone, Magical Strings

▶▶ Ironweed, Jody Marshall

see also: Karen Ashbrook, Trian

Jo Hughey Morrison

Dr. Krishna Chakravarty

North Indian classical, Hindustani

Born in Benares, India. Based in Benares, India.

Dr. Krishna Chakravarty is from Benares, a city that has produced such well-known artists as Bismillah Khan and Ravi Shankar. Chakravarty, who studied with Shankar himself in the 1970s, is associate professor of sitar at Benares Hindu University and has taught in the U.S. She's a relative newcomer to the scene, with a CD debut in 1987. Shankar's passionate, bravura performing style has clearly influenced Chakravarty, and she carries on the tradition very capably.

what to buy: Circular Dance ♪♪♪♪ (Celestial Harmonies, 1998, prod. David Parsons, Ram Chakravarty) is Chakravarty's third recording, but her second solo effort. She is accompanied by Vinod Gangadhar Lele on tabla drum and an unidentified tamboura (stringed drone instrument) player on "Raga Hemant," "Raga Lalit," and "Bhairavi Dhun," the last a folk melody played in a lyrical, light classical style.

what to buy next: Dancing to the Flute ♪♪♪½ (Celestial Harmonies, 1997, prod. David Parsons, Ram Chakravarty) is a collaboration between music faculty members of Benares Hindu University recorded for an art gallery exhibition. The album features karnatak (South Indian) and dhrupad (unembellished classical) singing (on the famous "Rag Darbari" of Emperor Akbar's court); a shehnai (double-reed pipe) ensemble; sarangi (bowed string instrument); tamboura; and various percussion instruments. Chakravarty plays a ragamala (medley of classical ragas) on "Raga Mishra Khamaj," accompanied by Lele on tabla. Perhaps this composite raga is a tribute to her illustrious teacher and his penchant for the same.

the rest:
Ananda ♪♪♪½ (Fortuna, 1987)

influences:
◀◀ Ravi Shankar

David Paul

Sheila Chandra

Cross-cultural vocal

Born March 14, 1965, in England. Based in England.

Indians living in Britain face an automatic culture clash, but Sheila Chandra, born of Indian parents and raised in England, has continually vaulted the cultural border with accuracy and enthusiasm. She started out firmly on mainstream ground as an actress in the British teen show Grange Hill, then moved closer to the precipice with the early-'80s band Monsoon, which was attempting to fuse Asian sounds with pop, initially quite successfully. When it all fell apart she inched back a bit stylistically, while still advancing personally as a now-solo artist, working with former musical partner (and future life partner) Steve Coe. From that point, a series of albums released on the Indipop label between '83 and '85 shows how quick Chandra's progress was. Over the course of four records she moved from what was essentially pop/rock (Out on My Own) into much more creative and sometimes experimental areas (Nada Brahma), with a couple of intriguing detours along the way—including one record entirely without lyrics (Quiet); a daring step for a singer. Then, with an already notable body of work at the venerable age of 20, she departed the music business for five years, finally re-emerging with a mature recording, Roots and Wings, that made it seem at once as if she hadn't ever been gone and as if she was an entirely new artist. Chandra had seen how the vocalizations of the Celtic and Indian worlds were connected, and she explored their dynamic differences and surprising similarities while also experimenting with traditional Indian patterns of konnakkol, a form of "vocal percussion" with its own revelatory relationship to late-20th century rhythmic vocal genres. For all these innovations Roots was largely a transitional disc, the approach of which came to further fruition—with a strong spiritual element added—on Chandra's move to the prestigious RealWorld label with Weaving My Ancestors' Voices. Two years later The Zen Kiss took this route almost as far as it could go—albeit in more than one direction simultaneously; her version of "A Sailor's Life," for instance, came close to eclipsing that of English folk-rock synonyms Fairport Convention. With this artist, though, there always seems to be more road to travel: the essential sound of the drone and all its possibilities, including the overtones she could hear in it, had long fascinated Chandra, and she explored that on ABoneCroneDrone, six abstract pieces that truly tested her abilities. At this writing she's no doubt ready for yet another next step—and perhaps even the world is.

what to buy: Weaving My Ancestors' Voices ♪♪♪♪ (RealWorld, 1992, prod. Steve Coe) is a daring day-trip among cultures, connecting their vocal similarities—which turn out to be many. In Quiet ♪♪♪♪ (Caroline, 1983, prod. Steve Coe) Chandra experiments with no lyrics, and effectively presages many new-age ideas while still containing plenty of substance.

the rest:
Out On My Own ♪♪♪ (Caroline, 1983)
The Struggle ♪♪♪♪ (Caroline, 1985)
Nada Brahma ♪♪♪½ (Caroline, 1985)
Roots and Wings ♪♪♪♪ (Caroline, 1990)
The Zen Kiss ♪♪♪♪ (RealWorld, 1994)
ABoneCroneDrone ♪♪♪½ (RealWorld, 1996)
Moonsung N/A (RealWorld, 1999)

influences:
◀◀ Bollywood, classical Indian music, international drones

Chris Nickson

Chateau Neuf Spelemannslag

Norwegian folk-rock

Formed 1992, in Oslo, Norway. Based in Oslo, Norway.

Carl Petter Opsahl, leader, clarinet; Eline Monrad Vistven, sax; Mikael Nyberg, sax (1992–97); Eivind Sognnæs, sax; Elisabeth Vatni, clarinet; Tori Snerte, flute, selje flute; Linn Korsjøen, vocals; Line Nilsen, vocals; Gine Heien, vocals; Ingrid Forthun, vocals; Siri Rude, vocals; Ragnhild Mo, fiddle, hardanger fiddle; Håkon Asheim, fiddle, hardanger fiddle; Hans Hinrich Thedens, fiddle, hardanger fiddle; Randi Rosendahl Moland, keyboard; Ronny Yttrehus, guitar; Åsmund Reistad, bass; Ingar Zach, drums, percussion. (All members are from Norway.)

Chateau Neuf (the band's U.S. releases drop the "Spelemannslag" from their name) ironically bill themselves as "Norway's most popular big folk band"—ironic because most Norwegian folk music is played on solo fiddle. Chateau Neuf was formed by students at the University of Oslo to explore Norwegian folk music on "non-traditional" instruments like the guitar, piano, and woodwinds. According to Carl Petter Opsahl, the band's director, "We don't traditionally have bands in Norway, only solo playing—which makes tuning a lot easier! Fiddlers tune their instruments in different ways and if a musician knows many tunings, he is considered to be good. All the tun-

1/4/6 hari prasad chaurasia

ings have different names, often indicating a certain mood ("the blue tuning," "the light tuning")—about 30 different tunings are known."

Norway's national instrument is the hardanger fiddle, which is similar to a violin, but has four or five extra strings under the fingerboard. They resonate when the instrument is played, and are usually tuned to the key of the melody. The bridge is also flatter, allowing fiddlers to bow two or three stings at once. "The hardanger fiddle is played in the south and west of Norway (Telemark, Hardanger, Voss, and Valdres are the main areas), the ordinary fiddle in all other areas (Gudbrandsdalen, Østerdalen, Trøndelag, and the northern part of Norway)," Opsahl says. "The structure of typical hardanger fiddle tunes [is] short motifs, one or two bars, which are repeated and varied, a so-called additive structure. These tunes give a tonal center, but not any sense of harmonic development. Many of these tunes have a minor feeling, sometimes they can switch from minor to major and sometimes it's hard to tell. Also the tonality can differ from each region and from each fiddler. It has been said that there are no scales in Norwegian folk music, which is not correct, but what kind of scale is very complicated. In Chateau Neuf Spelemannslag we try to adapt to the fiddlers, but we mostly play what is comfortable with the tempered instruments. And we don't always mind if it's slightly out of tune."

Chateau Neuf first recorded on the two volumes of Sweet Sunny North, the Henry Kaiser/David Lindley investigation of Norwegian folk music, and have since released two albums of their own. While much Norwegian and Swedish folk has a slightly gloomy vibe, Chateau Neuf's sprightly music-making is guaranteed to cure the blues and put a bounce in your step.

what's available: Stolen Goods ♪♪♪♪ (NorthSide, 1998, prod. Roger Valstad) is a dizzying mixture of sprightly female vocals, mellow woodwinds, and bouncy folk/pop melodies. The women singers have a bright, cheery sound that instantly warms the heart; they bring to mind the babes in Värttinä, while the combination of woodwinds and strings gives the backing tracks a big, lush sound. The arrangements sparkle, with every tune sporting a catchy melody, a strong vocal hook, or both.

influences:
⏮ Kjetil Løndal, Olav Heggland, Anund Roheim

j. poet

Hari Prasad Chaurasia

North Indian classical music

Born 1938, in Allahabad, India. Based in India.

Hari Prasad Chaurasia is a first-generation musician. That's not an easy path in Indian classical music, where son-follow-father professional expectations are nearly inviolable. His father was a professional wrestler, and began training the young Hari to follow in his footsteps. But Chaurasia loved music and began studying in secret with a neighbor. At age 19 he got a job with All-India Radio. He might have been nothing more than a musical journeyman except that he practiced the Indian bansuri flute for 12 hours a day, and took the opportunity to learn everything he could when accompanying big-name musicians at their concerts. It wasn't until 1966 that Chaurasia acquired a musical guru. But his single-minded devotion to the bansuri paid off with the release of the groundbreaking Call of the Valley in 1967. Not only did it place Chaurasia and collaborator Shiv Kumar Sharma on the musical map, but it also validated the bansuri flute as a legitimate classical instrument. The bansuri is recognized in Indian tradition as Krishna's instrument, but because it is played with the lips it was considered somewhat impure by classical musicians. Chaurasia changed all that and took the bansuri to the next level. With his extraordinary breath control he is able to make the flute do everything from whisper to roar.

what to buy: Call of the Valley ♪♪♪♪♪ (Hemisphere/EMI, 1967, prod. G.N. Joshi) is the closest thing to a "concept album" you'll find in classical Indian music. The five movements of the principal piece tell the story of a day in the life of two lovers in a Kashmiri valley. Hard-core classical music fans were wowed by the new colors that the bansuri, the santoor (hammered zither), and the guitar brought to Hindustani music. Non-classical fans appreciated the accessible folk melodies this classically oriented work incorporated, and the direct way the music seemed to tell a story. The album is an ideal introduction to Indian classical music for the new listener, and has long held the interest of connoisseurs as well.

what to buy next: The Valley Recalls ♪♪♪♪½ (Navras, 1996, prod. Vibhaker Baxi) documents a landmark reunion of Chaurasia and Sharma. Their history-making 1995 concert, recorded at Delhi's Nehru Centre, was originally released as two separate albums. Of the two collected here, particularly impressive is Peace, Love & Harmony, a series of alaaps and gats. The alaap is the slow, meterless, introductory movement of a classical raga; the gat is the second, medium-slow movement. Taken as a whole, the CD is perfect for those who prefer a dreamy, meditative type of Indian music. Chaurasia has not been as active as others of his genre in exploring cross-cultural meetings with Western artists, one notable exception being Making Music ♪♪♪♪ (ECM, 1987, prod. Manfred Eicher), a successful session that features improvisations with John McLaughlin on acoustic guitar, Jan Garbarek on alto and soprano saxophones, and Zakir Hussain on tabla drum.

worth searching for: Well-stocked Indian music stores will carry 50 or more of Chaurasia's releases. Some of the better ones include Rag Lilit ♪♪♪♪ (Nimbus, 1988), Maestro's Choice ♪♪♪♪½ (Music Today, 1991), Raga Darbari Kanada ♪♪♪♪ (Nimbus, 1993), Live at Shivaji Park ♪♪♪♪ (Navras, 1993), and Possession ♪♪♪♪ (Pan, 1995).

influences:
Panna Lal Ghosh

see also: Zakir Hussain, Shakti, Shiv Kumar Sharma

Aaron Howard

Boozoo Chavis

Creole, zydeco

Born Wilson Anthony Chavis, October 23, 1930, in Lake Charles, LA, USA. Based in Lake Charles, LA, USA.

Born and raised in Lake Charles, Louisiana, the son of a tenant farmer, Boozoo Chavis began playing the accordion in his teens. His father played the accordion too, as did a cousin, the legendary Sidney Babineaux. Chavis regularly practiced his craft at his mother's dance hall, where he would sit in with no less a zydeco deity than Clifton Chenier. In 1954 he recorded "Paper in My Shoe," which despite its very raw sound was a major regional hit—and certainly the first zydeco hit. Still, Chavis left music to pursue a more lucrative career as a horse trainer, but began a real comeback in 1984. His style remains raw, funky, and loose. His one- and three-row button accordion playing gets to the heart of a groove, and the band and dancers can't help but follow suit. The always-intense response to Chavis's music is what inspired later luminaries like Beau Jocque and Keith Frank.

what to buy: Zydeco Trail Ride ♪♪♪♪½ (Maison de Soul, 1989, prod. Floyd Soileau) brings together the best of Boozoo's 45s from the Maison de Soul label. Each of these songs is in its way a classic that almost every zydeco band has in its repertoire, whether they give credit to Chavis or not. Check the Chavis standards like "Motor Dude Special," "Dog Hill," and "Leona Had a Party"; the band locks into a kicking groove and Chavis's no-nonsense accordion and singing charge along on top. There is a cleaned-up version of his "Deacon Jones," which was released in an X-rated version on 45. There's also a remake of Smokey Robinson's "Harlem Shuffle" that's still a very popular line dance in southwest Louisiana. And though the recordings here only hint at what it's like to hear Chavis in a dance hall, every one is indispensable.

what to buy next: The Lake Charles Atomic Bomb ♪♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1990, prod. Eddie Shuler) contains Chavis's early recordings on the Goldband label, and there is little music out there as wild or as raw. Imagine Ornette Coleman's uncle playing zydeco or Captain Beefheart backing up Amédée Ardoin. A version of Chavis's historic hit "Paper in My Shoe" is here, along with much more. Legends abound about the players not knowing the tunes or having had way too much to drink; nevertheless, the music has an unadulterated power like no other. From the alchemical mix of the band's immediate sound and Shuler's strange production techniques emerges something that feels very primitive and very modern at the same time. "Hamburgers and Popcorn" is one of those tracks that just has to be heard to be described.

the rest:
Louisiana Zydeco Music ♪♪♪ (Maison de Soul, 1986)
Boozoo Zydeco ♪♪♪½ (Maison de Soul, 1987)
Live at Richard's ♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1988)

cajun music

Cajun music is music for dancing, and its steady, solid heartbeat always throbs just beneath the melody. While the jaunty two-steps often catch the ear of the outsider, it is the waltzes that pull at the heartstrings of the Cajuns themselves; a band will alternate between the two all night long. Cajun music-makers took their own Acadian songs from French Canada and added elements from the cultures they assimilated: syncopation and improvisatory singing from their Creole neighbors; blues from African Americans; fiddles from Anglo Americans; guitars from the Spanish; accordions from the Germans; and the whoops and steady beat from Native Americans. Early Cajun music was the sound of two fiddles; accordions paired with fiddles became popular in the 1920s. Fiddle-led string bands dominated the scene during the '30s and '40s; after World War II Cajuns again embraced the accordion, particularly the music of Iry Lejeune. By the late '60s Cajun culture was being overwhelmed by mainstream America, until a revival was spearheaded by Dewey Balfa. His efforts revitalized the music and rung in the rise of a new generation of practitioners. These younger players are using the mass media to promulgate the sounds of Cajun music throughout the world.

Jared Snyder

Zydeco Homebrew ♪♪♪ (Maison de Soul, 1988)
Boozoo, That's Who! ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1993)
Live! at the Habibi Temple ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1994)
Hey Do Right ♪♪♪½ (Discovery, 1997)
Who Stole My Monkey ♪♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1998)

worth searching for: On Boozoo Chavis ♪♪♪♪ (Elektra/Nonesuch, 1990, prod. Terry Adams) NRBQ's Terry Adams got Chavis to play a bunch of his signature songs, including a magnificent version of the Creole classic "Bernedette." It's indisputable from listening to this music: Chavis can swing, and that's one thing most of his would-be heirs have failed to pick up from him. You can feel it on hard-core Chavis tunes like "Gilton," where the band caresses a beat while Boozoo's accordion just glides on top.

influences:
⏮ Amédée Ardoin, Alphonse "Bois Sec" Ardoin
⏭ Keith Frank, Beau Jocque, Geno Delafose

see also: Clifton Chenier, Beau Jocque

Jared Snyder

Chayanne

Latin pop, dance-pop, tropical, salsa
Born June 28, 1968, in Puerto Rico. Based in USA.

Chayanne is a once-and-future next-big-thing in the mainland USA, and an elder statesman of Latin dance-pop back home in Puerto Rico—though by no means an elder. He began singing on the radio on his native island at age 10, and racked up a range of music and stage experience throughout his teens on the way to his self-titled debut album in 1988. The "stage" part came in handy for his flourishing parallel career as an actor, at first in Spanish-language telenovelas (soap operas) and more recently at the movies, appearing opposite Vanessa Williams in Dance with Me. That film and its male lead may have missed something by being too soon for the Stateside "Latin pop" phenomenon that broke out a year later, but the tide is still in and when the next wave comes, Chayanne's musical craft is particularly seaworthy.

what to buy: Volvera a Nacer ♪♪♪½ (Sony, 1996, prod. Manny Benito) and the Grammy-nominated Atado a Tu Amor ♪♪♪½ (Sony, 1998, prod. Ronnie Foster) give the best picture of Chayanne's tropical dance blend of pop, rock, and salsa. Influencias ♪♪♪ (Sony, 1994, prod. R.E. Martinez) also offers interesting melodies. The soundtrack album Dance with Me ♪♪♪ (Sony, 1998, prod. various) puts Chayanne's music in context with that of such Latin-pop peers as Gloria Estefan and Elvis Crespo.

the rest:
Chayanne ♪♪½ (Sony, 1988)
Tiempo del Vas ♪♪½ (CBS, 1990)
Provocame ♪♪½ (CBS, 1992)

influences:
⏮ Gloria Estefan, Emilio Estefan, Luis Gomez Escolar

see also: Elvis Crespo, Gloria Estefan

Kerry Dexter and Adam McGovern

Jie-Bing Chen

Traditional Chinese, contemporary Chinese, jazz
Born in Shanghai, China. Based in USA.

Jie-Bing Chen is a virtuoso player of the erhu (sometimes spelled "erh-hu"), a two-stringed, bowed instrument with a small resonation cavity at its base. Dating back over 2,000 years, it's somewhat similar to a violin—which is one reason Chen's been called "the Itzhak Perlman of the Far East"—but is held vertically, with the resonator in the player's lap. Lacking a fingerboard, it allows for considerable intonational expression, which an interpreter of Chen's gifts realizes to the fullest. Chen was a prodigy whose first performance came at age six, and who won two national competitions prior to graduating from the Shanghai Conservatory of Music in 1982. She was noted for incorporating her instrument into a symphonic context. Moving to the United States in 1989 and earning a master's degree in music theory from the State University of New York at Buffalo, she has since involved herself in an even broader range of musical activities than before, including jazz recordings with pianist/composer Jon Jang.

what to buy: Though Chen has recorded more than a dozen albums, most are unavailable in the U.S., but Spirit on Two Strings, Vol. 1 (Traditional) ♪♪♪♪ (Solar/Wind, 1993, prod. Sheng-di Wang), recorded after Chen's move to the States, has distribution here. She's accompanied here by Yang-qin Zhao on yang-chin, a multi-stringed, plucked instrument that sounds like a zither. Playing traditionally oriented music ranging from folk melodies to 20th-century compositions, Chen imbues the highly melodic, pentatonic material (having little or no harmonic content) with soulful expressiveness through precise manipulation of her instrument's timbres. Harder to find, Spirit on Two Strings, Vol. 2 (Contemporary) ♪♪♪½ (Solar/Wind, 1993, prod. Sheng-di Wang) also pairs her with Zhao on yang-chin.

what to buy next: Tabula Rasa ♪♪♪½ (Water Lily Acoustics, 1996, prod. Kavichandran Alexander) is a collaborative album by Chen, mohan vina (Indian guitar) player V.M. Bhatt, and banjo star Bela Fleck, with the rest of the band including P. Srinivasan (mridangam drum), S. Shankar (violin), and R. Majumdar (bansuri flute). As if the multi-culti intent weren't clear enough just from the lineup, the album's dedicated to Ravi Shankar and Earl Scruggs.

worth searching for: Jon Jang's Two Flowers on a Stem ♫♫♫♫ (Soul Note, 1996, prod. Jon Jang) is a masterful fusion of jazz and traditional Chinese music that puts Chen into a jazz group with the leader on piano, James Newton on flute, David Murray on tenor sax and bass clarinet, Santi Debriano on bass, and Jabali Billy Hart on drums. There is traditional Chinese material (the famous "Butterfly Lovers Song"), a famous jazz tune by Charles Mingus ("Meditations on Integration"), and Jang's highly creative original material.

influences:
⏮ A-Bing, Zhong-yue Wei, Wen-ming Sun

see also: V.M. Bhatt, Jon Jang

Steve Holtje

Sisi Chen

Yangqin (Chinese hammered dulcimer)
Born in China. Based in Chicago, IL, USA.

Sisi Chen began studying the yangqin, a.k.a. yang-chin (Chinese hammered dulcimer), when she was 10. The yangqin has been a part of Chinese music for about 500 years as both a supporting and solo instrument, and Chen brings out all of its richness in her performance.

what's available: On Tides and Sand ♫♫♫♫½ (Henry Street, 1996, prod. Peter K. Siegel) Chen interweaves traditional melodies and her own embellishments into a marvelously evocative work, with strong echoes of nature.

influences:
⏮ Chinese tradition

Pamela Murray Winters

C.J. Chenier

Zydeco
Born September 28, 1957, in Port Arthur, TX, USA. Based in Lafayette, LA, USA.

C.J. Chenier's father, the legendary Clifton Chenier, was based in Lafayette, Louisiana, and toured constantly. The younger Chenier was able to see his father only a couple times a year. Growing up in Texas, he rarely heard zydeco, let alone Clifton's music. Instead, he studied piano and alto saxophone and took an interest in jazz and R&B. His favorites at this time included Miles Davis, John Coltrane, James Brown, and the Commodores. He eventually earned a music scholarship to Texas Southern University. In 1978 his father called him to play saxophone. The experience was a jolt: Chenier wasn't familiar with the beat and didn't know any of the songs. By the early 1980s C.J. began to learn accordion from a then-ailing Clifton, who, it was clear by then, could not continue to tour much longer. He had to sit down to perform, and often left it to son C.J. to finish the show. When the senior Chenier died in 1987 C.J. took over the band and has come into his own as an accordionist, singer, and all-round performer. He continues as a fitting standard-bearer of his father's and Creole music's legacy—which to many are synonymous.

what to buy: The version of the Red Hot Zydeco band on My Baby Don't Wear No Shoes ♫♫♫½ (Arhoolie, 1988, prod. Chris Strachwitz, C.J. Chenier) still featured Clifton's brother Cleveland on frattoir (rubboard), and there is a feel throughout the record of the torch being passed to the next generation. That doesn't get in the way of excellent zydeco music, though, for there's a moving reading of Clifton's "I'm Comin' Home" here, a song he often performed at the end of his life with tears in his eyes.

what to buy next: Slash Records was the home of the Blasters and Los Lobos, and Hot Rod ♫♫♫♫ (Slash, 1990, prod. C.J. Chenier) was their effort to branch out into zydeco music. On an excellent recording that just failed to cross into the mainstream market, Roy Carrier replaces Cleveland Chenier on frattoir, but the band doesn't miss a beat, while C.J.'s accordion playing continues to blossom.

the rest:
I Ain't No Playboy ♫♫♫½ (Slash, 1992)
Too Much Fun ♫♫♫½ (Alligator, 1995)
Big Squeeze ♫♫♫ (Alligator, 1996)

influences:
⏮ Rockin' Dopsie, Clifton Chenier, Buckwheat Zydeco
⏭ Nathan Williams, John Delafose, Lynn August

see also: Roy Carrier, Clifton Chenier, Steve Riley & the Mamou Playboys

Jared Snyder

Clifton Chenier

Zydeco, blues
Born June 25, 1925, in Opelousas, LA, USA. Died December 12, 1987, in Lafayette, LA, USA.

Clifton Chenier took a backwoods form of Cajun folk music called zodico, hyped it up with elements of jump blues, R&B, and early rock 'n' roll, and created what we know today as zydeco. A versatile musician as well as a gifted interpreter, Chenier was proficient on guitar and harmonica, but his lasting fame came via the accordion, an instrument he rescued from perpetual ridicule and made cool once again. Besides being a prolific writer of his own music, Chenier was the ultimate stylist; he could take a song from any genre, recast it with French patois, Creole, or English lyrics, and transform it into a foot-stomping Mardi Gras party jam. Chenier cut his first sides for the Elko label in 1954, but his first burst of national fame came at Specialty Records the following year. While "Ay-Te Te Fee" and "Boppin' the Rock" featured Chenier's stinging guitar work and achieved respectable chart positions, Specialty was putting all its efforts into the burgeoning rock 'n' roll scene and, as a result, Chenier's work was lost in the shuffle. He label-hopped for a few years, cutting excellent tracks for Argo, Checker, Zynn, and Crazy Cajun among others. In 1960 Chenier signed with Arhoolie (though he also leased material to the Bayou, Home Cooking, Blue Star, GNP/Crescendo, and Caillier labels), where he recorded his greatest, most influential body of work and established a base for his growing cult appeal. Along with "Louisiana Stomp" and "Squeeze Box Boogie," he scored dozens of regional hits with his danceable hybrid music and toured constantly, playing folk festivals and R&B revues and opening for rock acts both at home and abroad. In later years diabetes forced the partial amputation of his right foot and sapped his energies, but despite his illness, he is said never to have given a bad show. In his last years Chenier recorded quality sides for Maison de Soul and Alligator, his debut for the latter winning him a Grammy award. Chenier died just as the music he pioneered achieved true national prominence, but he remains the undisputed King of Zydeco.

what to buy: Chenier's best sides for Specialty, Argo, Elko, Bayou, Arhoolie, and Maison de Soul have been collected on Zydeco Dynamite: The Clifton Chenier Anthology ♪♪♪♪♪ (Rhino, 1993, compilation prod. James Austin, Greg Durst), an amazing 40-track, two-disc set with a fine, informative booklet to boot. Nearly all facets of Chenier's remarkable talent are joyously on display here, and this batch is guaranteed to drive away the baddest hoodoo and bring on good times galore.

what to buy next: The cream of Chenier's Arhoolie work is deftly compiled on three sensational discs: 60 Minutes with the King of Zydeco ♪♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1988, prod. Chris Strachwitz) collects his finest house-rockin' sides from the mid-'60s through the late '70s; Louisiana Blues & Zydeco ♪♪♪♪½ (Arhoolie, 1965/1991, prod. Chris Strachwitz) gives equal space to the traditional sounds of zydeco and gut-bucket blues, at which Chenier was also a master; and Sings the Blues ♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1992, prod. Roy C. Ames, Chris Strachwitz) is a potent two-LPs-on-one-disc collection featuring the title album from 1969 and Clifton Chenier & His Red Hot Louisiana Band from 1977. All three collections are as tasty and satisfying as pepper gravy on rice. Mon Dieu!

what to avoid: Chenier does not sing with Rockin' Dopsie on Clifton Chenier & Rockin' Dopsie ♪♪½ (Paula, 1992, prod. various), so for the price of this two-disc set, you could easily purchase fuller, more satisfying packages by either artist.

the rest:
Zydeco Sont Pas Sale ♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1964/1997)
Black Snake Blues ♪♪♪½ (Arhoolie, 1966/1994)
King of the Bayous ♪♪♪½ (Arhoolie, 1970/1993)
Live at Saint Marks ♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1971/1988)
Out West ♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1974/1991)
Bogalusa Boogie ♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1975/1993)
The King of Zydeco Live at Montreux ♪♪♪½ (Arhoolie, 1975/1991)
And His Red Hot Louisiana Band in New Orleans ♪♪♪ (GNP, 1979/Crescendo, 1990)
Frenchin' the Boogie ♪♪♪½ (Verve, 1979/1994)
Classic Clifton ♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1980/1993)
Bon Ton Roulet ♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1981/1991)
I'm Here ♪♪♪½ (Alligator, 1982/1993)
Country Boy Now Grammy Award Winner ♪♪♪ (Maison de Soul, 1984/1989)
Live ♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1985/1993)
Live at the Long Beach & San Francisco Blues Festivals ♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1985/1993)
Boogie & Zydeco ♪♪♪ (Maison de Soul, 1987/1994)
On Tour ♪♪ (EPM, 1989/1996)
Zydeco Legend ♪♪½ (Maison de Soul, 1989/1993)
Zodico Blues & Boogie ♪♪♪♪ (Specialty, 1993)
We're Gonna Party ♪♪♪ (Collectables, 1994)
I'm Coming Home ♪♪♪ (Magnum America, 1996)

worth searching for: Hit the import racks for Bayou Soul: The Crazy Cajun Recordings ♪♪♪½ (Edsel, 1999, prod, Huey P. Meaux), an unusually strong mix of R&B and foot-stompin' zydeco recorded with the legendary producer Huey P. Meaux. Also, Chenier can be seen performing live on King of Zydeco (Arhoolie Video, 1995), a videotaping of a concert from late in his career.

influences:
- Amédée Ardoin, Izeb Laza, Professor Longhair, Louis Jordan, Lowell Fulson
- C.J. Chenier, Buckwheat Zydeco, Rockin' Sydney, Lonnie Brooks, the Zydeco Hurricanes

see also: C.J. Chenier, Canray Fontenot, Rockin' Dopsie

Ken Burke

Cherish the Ladies

Celtic

Formed 1983, in New York, NY, USA. Based in USA.

Joanie Madden, flute, whistle, vocals; Cathie Ryan, vocals, bodhrán; Aoife Clancy, vocals, guitar; Siobhan Egan, fiddle, whistle, bodhrán; Maureen Doherty Macken, button accordion, flute, whistle; Mary Coogan, guitar, tenor banjo, mandolin; Mary Rafferty, button accordion, flute, whistle; Donna Long, piano, fiddle, vocals.

The original idea behind Cherish the Ladies was simple: a series of concerts highlighting the contributions of women to Irish music in America. In 1983 folklorist and musician Mick Moloney had a brainstorming session with the directors of New York's Ethnic Folk Arts Center, Martin Koenig and Ethel Raim. Moloney drew their attention to the extraordinary number of young American women involved in Irish traditional music, and the three organizers created a concert series featuring some of these women. The resulting performances left audiences and critics roaring their approval. In 1985 Moloney convinced the National Endowment for the Arts (NEA) to fund an album, Cherish the Ladies. Like the concerts, it featured instrumental soloists with a few duos and trios, plus singing in the Irish language. Like the concerts, it included more than a dozen women, two of whom (flute player Joanie Madden and guitarist Mary Coogan) are still a part of the Cherish the Ladies band today. Like the concerts, the LP was a tremendous success, chosen by the Library of Congress as one of the best folk albums of 1985. The NEA knew a good thing when they saw it and decided to sponsor a Cherish the Ladies tour. The paring down of dozens of musicians and singers to a manageably sized touring ensemble was a big step in the group's evolution. The first lineup included Madden, Coogan, and Maureen Doherty Macken, as well as singer Cathie Ryan and fiddlers Siobhan Egan and Eileen Ivers. The group has been through a few more personnel changes since. First, Ivers was replaced by Winifred Horan. Eventually, Horan, too, left the band, as did Doherty Macken and Ryan; the three were replaced by Donna Long, Mary Rafferty, and Aoife Clancy, respectively. Despite the changes, though, their commitment to high-quality music and high-energy fun has never wavered.

what to buy: Cherish the Ladies' sound has never been more confident than it is on New Day Dawning ♪♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1996, prod. Johnny Cunningham). The lineup changes that ensued between their second disc and this one resulted in no missteps, just a new repertoire of material and a renewed sense of direction. Strong playing from all the lead instrumentalists is matched by a newfound power in the accompaniments; Donna Long's piano fills out the sound beautifully, and Aoife Clancy's guitar playing leaves Mary Coogan freer to play banjo and mandolin without hurting the bottom end. She rises to the occasion marvelously on a set of polkas learned from her father. Clancy's polished voice interprets several lovely traditionals and a few other numbers by such songwriters as Dougie MacLean, Pete St. John, and even Robert Burns. The result is as fresh and appealing a set as you're likely to find in Irish music.

what to buy next: The Back Door ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1992, prod. Mick Moloney), recorded after the ensemble's establishment as an ongoing band, demonstrated the new group ethic and established the outfit as a major presence on the American Irish music scene. It features an excellent selection of instrumentals and songs, played with finesse on flute, fiddle, and accordion (with the occasional whistle or banjo), accompanied always by Mary Coogan's expert guitar and often by Cathie Ryan's bodhrán (Irish frame drum). The sources Ryan looked to for the songs she sings—Jimmy Crowley, Joe Heaney, Frank Harte—indicate her impeccable taste, while her one original—the title track itself—indicates her own songwriting talent. Her lovely, clear voice ensures a real treat for the listener; her vocals are sincere and expressive, and the spirit of the song always comes through. The second album, Out and About ♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1993, prod. Johnny Cunningham), contains material near and dear to the group's heart: a polka and several waltzes written in a French style commemorate a trip to Brittany. Ryan's second song about Irish emigration, "Missing Pieces," shows that the sincerity and depth of feeling in her songwriting has continued to grow. This was the last album before the major lineup change. Finally, if solos and duets, rather than a full band sound, appeal to you, you'd appreciate Cherish the Ladies ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1985, prod. Mick Moloney), featuring Madden, Maureen Doherty, Mary Coogan, Eileen Ivers, Liz Carroll, and others. Nicely played instrumentals, plus a few songs; note that only a few of these artists wound up in the band version of Cherish the Ladies.

the rest:
One and All: The Best of Cherish the Ladies ♪♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1998)
Threads of Time ♪♪♪♪ (BMG/RCA Victor, 1998)
At Home N/A (RCA Victor, 1999)

influences:
Mick Moloney, Liz Carroll
Solas

see also: Liz Carroll, Eileen Ivers, Joanie Madden, Mick Moloney, Cathie Ryan, Solas, Paul Winter

Steve Winick

The Chieftains

Irish traditional

Formed 1963, in Dublin, Ireland. Based in Dublin, Ireland.

Paddy Moloney, uilleann pipes, tin whistle, bodhrán; Martin Fay, fiddle, bones; Sean Potts, tin whistle, bones, bodhrán (1963–79); Michael Tubridy, flute, tin whistle, concertina (1963–79); Dave Fallon, bodhrán (1963–64); Peadar Mercier, bodhrán, bones, vocals (1966–75); Sean Keane, fiddle, tin whistle (1968–present); Derek Bell, harp, tiompán (hammered dulcimer), keyboards, oboe (1973–present); Kevin Conneff, vocals, bodhrán, (1976–present); Matt Molloy, flute, tin whistle (1979–present). (All members are from Ireland.)

The Chieftains are without a doubt the single most important group to come out of Ireland: more important than the Clancy Brothers and Tommy Makem, and more important than U2.

Their impact on people's awareness—and perception—of Irish music has been incalculable. Over decades of playing together, their carefully honed blend of fiddle, flute, whistle, and harp, propelled by Paddy Moloney's signature sound on the uilleann pipes and fueled by numerous high-profile, boundary-crossing collaborations, has made them a household name in many corners of the globe.

As the best-known Irish act in the music business, whose friends and admirers—and collaborators—range from Paul McCartney, Mick Jagger, and Roger Daltrey to Chet Atkins, Willie Nelson, and Jackson Brown, the Chieftains have no peers. While pursuing a hectic musical career whose modest beginnings date back to 1963, they have incidentally done more to boost Irish tourism than most government agencies in Dublin. They also brought Breton (French Celtic) music to the attention of Irish audiences very early on, often sneaking in a few Scottish, Welsh, and Manx items too. Later, they devoted entire albums to Breton and Galician (Spanish Celtic) music.

Moloney, Fay, Tubridy, and Potts had all served in Ceoltoiri Chualann, the innovative ensemble led by visionary Irish composer and folk-tradition revivalist Sean Ó Riada, before forming their own group to record The Chieftains (1963), which was planned as a one-off album for fledgling Irish traditional label Claddagh. Indeed they continued to play and record with Ó Riada's group on and off throughout the '60s, as well as gigging around Ireland under their own heading as their day jobs permitted. Along the way, Mercier and Keane also made the transition from Ceoltoiri to Chieftains. Even this early on, it was clear that piper Moloney, who won his first All Ireland title for his instrument in 1952 at the age of 14, was the engine driving the group: he did the lion's share of the arranging and handled the booking and accounts. He also ended up running Claddagh Records, the label that helped put the band of the map. Today it is largely his energy, ambition, and focus—not to mention savvy marketing skills and keen eye for publicity opportunities—that have ensured the band's seldom-matched survival over three-and-a-half decades, though perhaps even he couldn't have foreseen it during the six years it took the Chieftains to issue a second album.

The band went back into the recording studio in 1969, and again in 1971, gradually hitting their stride and getting noticed by the public-at-large in Ireland. As they unknowingly climbed the stairs of fame and fortune, they were hardly typical star material: a bunch of family men in suits and ties, most of whom had learned their craft back in the '50s and looked like they had day jobs in banking, accountancy, engineering, and architecture—which they did! Along the way, they fleshed out their sound by seducing harper Derek Bell away from the stability of the BBC's Northern Ireland Orchestra. A series of excellent releases thrust them into the front ranks of Irish traditional music, and they surprised everybody, including themselves, by selling out London's Royal Albert Hall on St. Patrick's Day, 1975. And so, after five albums and a dozen years of playing together more for fun than profit, the Chieftains turned professional. Film director Stanley Kubrick then hired them to contribute "Mná na hÉireann (Women of Ireland)"—which dated back to their Ó Riada days—as the love theme for the soundtrack of Barry Lyndon, which helped open doors in the USA. It wouldn't be too long before it was Carnegie Hall they played on St. Patrick's Day.

Ireland is a nation of begrudgers, and while the natives can be very supportive of struggling artists trying to make it big at home, once that happens and acts start to get accolades abroad, a certain cynicism invariably sets in. The level of success earned by the Chieftains outside Ireland, like that later enjoyed by U2, Clannad, Enya, and Riverdance, is often assumed by some elements to be a sure sign of having "sold out." One person who felt that way about the Chieftains in the mid-'70s was Dublin singer and bodhrán (Irish frame drum) player Kevin Conneff. An invitation to partake in the recording of Bonaparte's Retreat in 1976—with its attendant opportunity to actually sit down and listen to the band—forced Conneff to reevaluate. He subsequently became the group's only full-time vocalist, and found out firsthand what it meant to "sell out" as a member of one of the most successful traditional acts in the world. Matt Molloy (ex–Bothy Band) joined in 1979 to replace the flute of departing Michael Tubridy, and the band's lineup has not changed in the 20 years since.

The '80s saw the Chieftains scale back their recording schedule and spend more time on the tour circuit. Commissions for film scores came Moloney's way, which led to several albums of Irish-inspired music for the group with orchestra. In 1983 the Chieftains pulled off an amazing coup in the midst of the cold war by touring China and playing alongside local musicians. Parts of this extraordinary expedition were documented on album and video. By mid-decade—well before the Riverdance craze—they were livening up their concerts with dancing, most notably thanks to the abundant talents of the flamboyant Irish-American champion dancer Michael Flatley, who would come to know a thing or two about said phenomenon.

In 1987 the band issued Celtic Wedding, an entire album of Breton music—selected with the help of folklorist Polig Monjarret (a longtime friend of Moloney's), but recorded in their own inimitable style—as well as the first of two releases teaming them with Belfast-born classical flute maestro James Galway. A highly anticipated collaboration with another son of Belfast, Van Morrison, followed soon after in the form of Irish Heartbeat, while a fourth Belfast-related project, The Celtic Harp—A Tribute to Edward Bunting, recorded with Janet Harbison's Belfast Harp Orchestra in 1992, was inspired by the bicentenary of the historic 1792 Harp Festival in that city.

Paddy Molonoy of the Chieftains

154 the chieftains

The '90s have seen the Chieftains stretch even further, into projects that involve American country music stars and British rock icons, with predictably mixed results. More interestingly, they took another young and then-unknown Irish-American dancer named Jean Butler on tour with them (the one who, along with Flatley, would later take the world by storm in Riverdance), and they championed Canadian wildman Ashely MacIsaac, whose occasionally unorthodox Cape Breton fiddle and dance routines turned quite a few heads among the more traditional-minded at the time, though he is acquiring respectability as a modern master today.

The spirit of adventure they encouraged in others has continued in their own work. With the help of many coconspirators, the Chieftains tackled the music of Galicia in Spain—and the Galician diaspora in Cuba and the U.S—on Santiago (1996), with Linda Ronstadt (a mainstream brand name but no stranger to other Latin-influenced musics) acquitting herself quite nicely. The soundtrack to Long Journey Home (1998), a PBS documentary series that attempts to chart the convoluted history of Irish emigrants to the U.S. over 250-plus years, also works, though the group took a back seat to such guests as Van Morrison, Mary Black, Sinéad O'Connor, Vince Gill, Mick Moloney, Eileen Ivers, Elvis Costello, and the choral group Anúna. Oddly, the Chieftains are not credited on the cover of Fire in the Kitchen (1998), a collection of tracks showcasing Canadian Celtic performers, though their presence is quite noticeable. Tears of Stone (1999) is an album of mostly Irish love songs (from a female perspective) whose all-star cast includes singers Bonnie Raitt, Natalie Merchant, Joni Mitchell, the Rankins, the Corrs, Sissel, Akiko Yano, Sinéad O'Connor, Mary Chapin Carpenter, Loreena McKennitt, Joan Osborne, and Diana Krall, as well as fiddlers Máire Breatnach, Eileen Ivers, Natalie McMaster, and Annbjørg Lien. The album has much greater coherence than the rock-star-themed The Long Black Veil from a few years earlier. To expand on all these explorations, in the late '90s Moloney founded the high-profile world-music label Wicklow to promote an even wider range of international styles than the Chieftains have approached themselves.

As the century draws to a close one indisputable fact remains: the stature of diminutive Paddy Moloney and the group he shepherded through so many changes in musical fashion—not to mention the stature of Irish music in general—has never been higher worldwide. The carefully rehearsed spontaneity which now so often characterizes the Chieftains' live shows masks the fact that this is a group of consummate professionals, with all the baggage that brings with it. Those who complain about the Chieftains' recent propensity for all-star albums (with guests both appropriate and otherwise) should bear in mind that the band has more than paid its dues, and the public is still free to listen to their early gems—or any other traditional music for that matter. Highly successful middle-aged musicians who spend much of their working lives on arduous world tours tend to have lifestyles somewhat removed from the bubbling cauldron of inspired sessions that first spewed them forth, and this is certainly true for several members of the Chieftains. Cutting-edge music naturally emerges from younger players—but many of these, and no doubt others yet to arise, are still inspired by the examples set by the Chieftains.

what to buy: Chieftains 3 ♪♪♪♪♪ (Claddagh, 1971/Shanachie, 1980s, prod. Ioan Allen) and Chieftains 4 ♪♪♪♪♪ (Claddagh, 1973/Shanachie, 1980s, prod. Paddy Moloney), along with the first Planxty album from the same era, are defining moments in Irish traditional music as heard by the record-buying public, and were destined to have enormous influence on a whole generation of young players. Virtually every tune on these two great albums—and many of the arrangements too—became standards soon after they were unleashed on the masses. Not that "Carolan's Concerto," "March of the King of Laois," "Lord Inchiquin," "Drowsy Maggie," "The Morning Dew," or Sean Ó Riada's "Carrigfergus" and "Mná na hÉireann (Women of Ireland)" were exactly obscure to begin with; many of them were already firm favorites from Moloney and friends' days with Ceolteoiri Chualann. Chieftains 4 was Derek Bell's first outing with the group, and the addition of his harp was most welcome. Chieftains 5 ♪♪♪♪½ (Claddagh, 1975/Shanachie, 1987, prod. Paddy Moloney) and the oddly titled Bonaparte's Retreat ♪♪♪♪½ (Claddagh, 1976/Shanachie, 1987, prod. Paddy Moloney) are close behind their two illustrious predecessors. The inclusion of a set of Breton tunes on the former is noteworthy, as is the 15-minute title track on the latter that features a very young Dolores Keane as guest vocalist. Bonaparte's closing "Round the House and Mind the Dresser" also includes future Chieftain Kevin Conneff on vocals, and live dancers stomping their stuff alongside the musicians.

what to buy next: Many first encounter the Chieftains via one of their numerous all-star collaborations, and while none of these is worth selling your grandmother for (despite the occasional Grammy that has come their way), each has its moments. The Long Black Veil ♪♪♪ (RCA/BMG, 1995, prod. Paddy Moloney) gained the group more attention and a wider audience than their previous albums, which was probably the main idea. However, it's clearly more a showcase for Famous People Paddy Moloney Knows than a real album: Sting sounds ridiculous (and uncomfortable, in both Irish and English) on the opening "Mo Ghile Mear" (arrangement borrowed from Peadar Ó Riada?); Mark Knopfler and Ry Cooder are definitely out of place (and arguably out of their depth) here; and the half-hearted attempt at a studio marriage of the Chieftains with old pals the Rolling Stones on "Rocky Road to Dublin" is just laughable. On the upside, Van Morrison's "Have I Told You Lately?" is good; the title track sounds like it was written for singer Mick Jagger; and Sinéad O'Connor does a credible job on "The Foggy Dew." The much-vaunted Irish Heartbeat ♪♪♪½ (Mercury, 1988, prod. Van Morrison, Paddy Moloney) sees the band unite with Morrison for a partially satisfying album of (mostly) standards. Morrison's stamp on the material is unmistakable, his coproduction coming through loud and clear. Another Country ♪♪♪ (RCA/BMG, 1992, prod. Paddy Moloney) delivers rather less than its stellar lineup (Ricky Skaggs, Emmylou Harris, Willie Nelson, et al.) promises, but Sean Keane's laconic take on Elvis Presley's "Heartbreak Hotel" is worth hearing. Featuring dancer Jean Butler, An Irish Evening—Live at the Grand Opera House Belfast ♪♪♪½ (RCA/BMG, 1992, prod. Paddy Moloney) is a bit more spirited. Roger Daltrey's "Behind Blue Eyes" almost works, and Nanci Griffith is acceptable if a little coy.

the rest:
Chieftains 1 ♪♪♪♪ (Claddagh, 1963/Shanachie, 1988)
Chieftains 2 ♪♪♪♪ (Claddagh, 1969/Shanachie, 1988)
Chieftains Live! ♪♪♪ (Claddagh, 1976/Shanachie, 1988)
Chieftains 7 ♪♪♪ (Claddagh, 1977/Columbia, 1978)
Chieftains 8 ♪♪♪½ (Claddagh, 1978/Columbia, 1979)
Chieftains 9—Boil the Breakfast Early ♪♪♪ (Claddagh, 1979)
Chieftains 10—Cotton-Eyed Joe ♪♪♪½ (Claddagh, 1981/Shanachie, 1991)
The Year of the Frenchies ♪♪♪ (Claddagh, 1982/Shanachie)
The Chieftains in China ♪♪♪ (Claddagh, 1985/Shanachie, 1985)
Ballad of the Irish Horse ♪♪½ (Claddagh, 1986/Shanachie, 1986)
Celtic Wedding ♪♪♪½ (RCA/BMG, 1987)
(With James Galway) In Ireland ♪♪♪½ (RCA/BMG, 1987)
A Chieftains Celebration ♪♪♪ (RCA/BMG, 1989)
(With James Galway) Over the Sea to Skye ♪♪♪½ (RCA/BMG, 1990)
The Bells of Dublin ♪♪♪♪ (RCA/BMG, 1991)
Reel Music—The Filmscores ♪♪½ (RCA/BMG, 1991)
The Best of the Chieftains ♪♪♪½ (Columbia, 1992)
The Celtic Harp—A Tribute to Edward Bunting ♪♪♪♪ (RCA/BMG, 1993)
Film Cuts ♪♪½ (RCA/BMG, 1995)
Santiago ♪♪♪½ (RCA/BMG, 1996)
Long Journey Home ♪♪♪½ (Unisphere/BMG, 1998)
Fire in the Kitchen ♪♪♪½ (RCA/BMG, 1998)
Tears of Stone ♪♪♪½ (RCA/BMG, 1999)

worth searching for: Both Ó Riada sa Gaiety ♪♪♪♪♪ (Gael-Linn, 1969) and Ó Riada ♪♪♪♪½ (Gael-Linn, 1972) by Sean Ó Riada and Ceoltoiri Chualann feature Moloney, Fay, Potts, Tubridy, and Mercier on live recordings of material subsequently popularized by the Chieftains. For another slice of musical history, try Van Morrison, Sinéad O'Connor and the Chieftains on a severely under-rehearsed live take of "Have I Told You Lately?" from Live on Letterman ♪♪♪ (Reprise, 1997). After one verse, Van hands the song over to Sinéad, who apparently didn't know all of the words! Moloney and friends manage to hold it all together.

influences:
⏮ Sean Ó Riada, Ceoltoiri Chualann, Turlough O'Carolan, Peadar Ó Riada, Alan Stivell, Polig Monjarret, Milladoiro
⏭ Planxty, Horslips, Alan Stivell, Whistlebinkies, Altan, Cherish the Ladies, Milladoiro, Craobh Rua, Moving Cloud

see also: Derek Bell, Bothy Band, Ry Cooder, James Galway, Dolores Keane, James Keane, Matt Molloy, Sinéad O'Connor, Sean Ó Riada, Planxty, Linda Ronstadt, Alan Stivell

John C. Falstaff

Toni Childs

Folk, blues, worldbeat

Born 1958, in Orange, CA, USA. Based in USA.

Singer-songwriter Toni Childs grew up in small towns all over the U.S.; her parents, missionaries for the Assemblies of God, moved the family on a regular basis, preaching their beliefs to as many as possible—and not letting much popular culture into the household. It's no wonder Toni became a bit rebellious. After spending three months in prison on a drug charge Childs moved first to London, then to Los Angeles, where she met David Ricketts of David + David. Union chronicles Childs and Ricketts's broken romance, and examines the broader issues of love. After a slight letdown on the follow-up, House of Hope, Childs offered The Woman's Boat, a concept album that takes the listener on a spiritual journey through life from a woman's point of view, all done in Childs's unique style of rock and world music. The album features guest appearances by Peter Gabriel, Karl Wallinger of World Party, Robert Fripp, and the late master of Pakistan's devotional qawwali music, Nusrat Fateh Ali Khan.

what to buy: Childs's seamless fusion of blues, folk, pop, and world music on Union ♪♪♪♪½ (A&M, 1988, prod. David Tickle, David Ricketts) is an amazing achievement, featuring such memorable tunes as "Don't Walk Away," "Hush," and "Let the Rain Come Down."

the rest:
House of Hope ♪♪♪ (A&M, 1991)
The Woman's Boat ♪♪♪½ (DGC, 1994)

influences:
⏮ Peter Gabriel, Joni Mitchell, David + David

Joshua Zarov

Sonny Chillingworth

Slack-key guitar

Born July 14, 1932, in Oahu, Hawaii (now USA). Died August 24, 1994.

Along with Gabby Pahinui, Sonny Chillingworth is considered one of the greats of Hawaiian slack-key guitar, a style named for its retuning (or "slacking") of the guitar's strings. Fittingly for multicultural Hawaii, the slack-key style is influenced by the music of many different cultures, most importantly that of Mexico and Portugal. Chillingworth, who counted English, Irish, and Hawaiian among his ancestry, fits easily into this melting-pot tradition. He was also part of the Purdys, one of the great paniolo (Hawaiian cowboy) families, and his music drew strongly on that tradition during his four-decade career. He made his first recordings around 1954, and performed with such artists as Gabby Pahinui and the Sons of Hawaii. Chillingworth was so highly regarded in his homeland that he was given the Bank of Hawai'i's Na Hoku Lifetime Award for Slack-Key Guitar in 1992. He played on more than 30 albums, but made his only solo-guitar recordings shortly before his death in 1994.

what to buy: Sonny Solo ♪♪♪♪ (Dancing Cat, 1994, prod. George Winston), released just months before Chillingworth's death, was many people's introduction to his music and to slack-key guitar. Chillingworth's voice imbues the love ballads and paniolo songs with all his 60-plus years of experience, and his smoothly flowing picking is both beautiful and deceptively simple.

what to avoid: The poor sound quality on Sonny ♪♪½ (Mahalo, 1995, compilation prod. John Aeto) sometimes lends Chillingworth's voice an otherworldly tone that's not unpleasant, but this posthumously released compilation hardly gives Sonny's talent its due.

the rest:

Waimea Cowboy ♪♪♪ (Lehua, 1998)
Endlessly ♪♪♪♪ (BMG/Windham Hill/Dancing Cat, 1999)

influences:

◀◀ Aunty Vickie I'i Rodrigues, Gabby Pahinui

▶▶ Ozzie Kotani, the Kahumoku Brothers, Rev. Dennis Kamakahi

see also: Gabby Pahinui

Brian Mansfield

Chirgilchin

Throat singing/overtone singing/höömeï

Formed 1996, in Tuva. Based in Tuva.

Ondar Mongun-ool, vocals, morin-khuur, doshpulur (plucked lute), chantzy (three-stringed fiddle); Aidysmaa Kandan, vocals, tungur (shaman's drum); Tamdyn Aldar, vocal, igil (two-stringed horse-hair fiddle). (All members are from Tuva.)

Formed in the wake of a minor "throat-singing" craze in world-music circles that began in the early 1990s and was galvanized by the group Huun-Huur-Tu, Chirgilchin are a young band of throat-singers from the tiny Central Asian steppe land of Tuva, an isolated region controlled by the Soviet Union prior to that government's collapse. Throat-singing, also known as "overtone" singing or höömeï, is an amazing vocal technique employed by Asian peoples in regions such as Mongolia, Tibet, and Tuva. By carefully forming the mouth and tongue into certain configurations, throat-singers are able to produce two or more tones at one time, sounding out what is in essence an entire chord without instrumental aid. The result ranges from low abdominal growls to high, clear, whistling overtones with an exhilarating, disembodied quality. Chirgilchin's first CD, The Wolf and the Kid, assisted by Huun-Huur-Tu member Alexander Bapa on guitar and production duties, is a promising debut, but whether it turns out to be a one-time artifact of the throat-singing fad remains to be seen.

what's available: The only Chirgilchin recording to date, The Wolf and the Kid ♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1996, prod. Alexander Bapa), embodies the simple animist spirit and love of the natural world that make Tuvan music so appealing. "Teve-Khaya (Camel Rock)" and "Kara Duruya (Black Crane)," like many Tuvan songs, express love for a special place in the landscape or reverence for the domestic and wild creatures that are still an important part of Tuvan life. Some tracks, like "Darlaashkkyn (Freedom Song)," with its minimalist, staccato string backing, or the eponymous "Chirgilchin (Mirage)," with an unusual chanted vocal, have a slightly modern flavor, while others, like "Majalykta chylgymny (Lyric Song)," have a folk-song melodic structure that seems to date from the Soviet era.

influences:

◀◀ Huun-Huur-Tu, Russian folk music

see also: Huun-Huur-Tu

Jeffrey Muhr

Stella Chiweshe

Mbira

Born c. 1946, near Harare, Zimbabwe. Based in Harare, Zimbabwe and Berlin, Germany.

Stella Chiweshe plays the mbira (thumb piano), an instrument that has deep spiritual and cultural meaning for the Shona people of Zimbabwe. When Chiweshe was born, Zimbabwe was still under British colonial rule and called Rhodesia. Colonial authorities, with the aid of Christian missionaries, had banned the mbira, and people who played it publicly were persecuted. Chiweshe also had to deal with the chauvinism of male musicians who insisted that the mbira and the drum were "men's instruments." Luckily, Chiweshe had an uncle who was an mbira master, and when he saw how serious she was about the music, he taught it to her. The mbira is used chiefly in possession rituals—where the voices of the dead communicate with the living through its music—as well as weddings, funerals, dances, processions, political gatherings, and parties. In recent times the mbira has also moved onto the international concert circuit. Before Chiweshe, female musicians got little respect and were seldom paid, but her success and that of others led to the formation, in 1990, of the Women Musician's Advisory Group.

In 1974, during the war of liberation, Chiweshe released her first single, a song to help bolster the spirit of the freedom fighters. In the next six years she released 24 popular singles, including "Kasahwa," which went gold. She also played at all-night ceremonies while holding down a day job as a housekeeper. After independence in 1980, she became a full-time musician and performer with the National Dance Company of Zimbabwe, touring Africa, Asia, Australia, and Europe. She was a special guest artist on Thomas Mapfumo's first European tour, and soon put together her own group, Earthquake, which included marimbas, electric bass, and a Western drum kit. In 1984 she began recording for the world market with Germany's Piranha label, and sometimes adds electric guitars and keyboards to her sound. She has gotten some criticism for combining secular and sacred music, and for her commercial success overseas, but with the possible exception of Thomas Mapfumo and the Bhundu Boys, Chiweshe remains Zimbabwe's best-known musical ambassador.

what to buy: The British version of Chiweshe's first Piranha album, Ambuya? ♪♪♪♪♪ (Globestyle, 1988, prod. Hijaz Mustapha), is easier to find than the German version, and despite the backing of worldbeat irregulars 3 Mustaphas 3's rhythm section—Sabah Habas Mustapha, bass; Houzam Mustapha, drums—it's a solidly traditional set. The mbira and marimba lines are mesmerizing, and Chiweshe's poignant vocals float above the mix like the calming voice of a departed ancestor. A solid overview of Chiweshe's recording career, the compilation The Healing Tree ♪♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1998, prod. Hijaz Mustapha, Colin Bass, Michael Kurzawa, Stella Chiweshe) includes tracks from her four Piranha albums.

the rest:
Chisi ♪♪♪♪♪ (Piranha, 1988)
Kumusha ♪♪♪♪♪ (Piranha, 1989)
Shungu ♪♪♪♪♪ (Piranha, 1990)

influences:
⏮ Dorothy Masuka

see also: 3 Mustaphas 3

j. poet

Harry Choates

Cajun, western swing

Born December 26, 1922, in Rayne, LA, USA. Died July 17, 1951, in Austin, TX, USA.

Cajun music during the 1920s and early 1930s was dominated by the sounds of the diatonic accordion. But the strains of hillbilly, swing, and western swing that were coming in over the airwaves began changing that. Fiddler Harry Choates rode the crest of this changing taste right out of the bayous to the Grand Ole Opry. His light, fiddle-based style slowly evolved from traditional Cajun tunes to a sound indistinguishable from western swing. The move away from Cajun music meant the increased use of English lyrics, and a much wider audience than any prior Cajun musician had found. Choates was a groundbreaker who prepared the way for later Cajun crossover artists like Jimmy C. Newman and Doug Kershaw.

what to buy: Fiddle King of Cajun Swing ♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1993, prod. Chris Strachwitz) contains the classic recordings of Cajun and western swing Choates made for Goldband records. It does not include his 1946 hit "Jolie Blon," but it has just about every other one he scored. His band features the wonderful steel work of Julius "Papa Cairo" Lamperez, a true Cajun original.

the rest:
Original 1946–1949 Recordings ♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1982)
Five-time Lobster ♪♪♪ (Krazy Kat, 1990)

influences:
⏮ Dennis McGee, Bob Wills, Hackberry Ramblers, Wallace Cheese Read

⏭ Jimmy C. Newman, Doug Kershaw

Jared Snyder

Emma Christian

Manx traditional

Born 1972, on the Isle of Man. Based on the Isle of Man.

The Isle of Man is an independent island nation of 70,000 people situated in the Irish Sea between Ireland, Scotland, and England, whose Tynwald (parliament) boasts an impressive 1,000-year history. The wild and beautiful Manx landscape—as seen in the film Waking Ned Devine—has inspired many people over the centuries, from the original Celtic inhabitants, to the later Norse/Viking invaders who settled there, right up to today's descendants of these earlier peoples.

The Manx language, which is quite similar to Irish and Scots Gaelic, came close to extinction in the 1970s, but is now enjoying a revival and is finally being taught in the schools again. The island's best-known exports include the Bee Gees (via Australia) and folk-rock diva Christine Collister, each from the more modern end of the musical spectrum, but traditional Manx music is also undergoing a healthy period of rediscovery in recent years. Singer, harper and recorder player Emma Christian has been instrumental in getting the traditional voice of Man heard once more, both on the island and overseas.

Born and raised in a remote farming community in the north, Christian grew up in an environment conducive to her future career, her storytelling father's family being one of the big musical dynasties of the island. She learned many songs from her mother as a child, and her grandfather made her simple wooden pipes from samplings growing in the wetlands. She took up the recorder with a passion, and left Man as a teenager to spend five years at Chetham's School of Music in Manchester, England. Christian went on to earn a degree in Anglo-Saxon, Norse, and Celtic from Cambridge University in 1993. By the following year she had taken up the harp to accompany her singing. She'd always sung for fun—under the influence of her mother and island elders like Walter Clarke, as well as Scottish Hebridean singers—but that year, she gave her first professional concert and released her album Beneath the Twilight. Soon, she was performing in such locations as Edinburgh Castle and the medieval Palace at the Tower of London. Over the years candle-lit concerts at castles, churches, cathedrals, and even caves have become one of her fortes.

While recorder and harp are less common on the Isle of Man than, say, fiddle, Christian has adapted her chosen instruments to Manx music, rather than the other way around. Her alternately mournful and sprightly recorder-playing recalls both wooden flute and tin whistle. While her amazing voice and harp have been compared to Loreena McKennitt, that's a superficial association at best: Christian comes from within the tradition, and her spiritual and meditative performances, inspired by the Manx landscape as much as by any particular singer, have an assured authority all their own. In 1996 Christian cofounded the Isle of Music Festival, a showcase for Celtic and roots music held at the spectacular Peel Castle, on an islet off the west coast of Man, during the annual Tynwald Weekend in early July. This festival draws top musicians from around the Celtic diaspora and as far away as South Africa. She also hosts a radio show of the same name on Manx Radio, which goes out live over the internet (http://www.manxradio.com).

worth searching for: Available as an import, Beneath the Twilight ♪♪♪♪ (Manx Celtic, 1994, prod. Steve Coren) is the only full album Christian has released so far. It's a nicely annotated, artfully constructed tapestry of voice, harp, and recorder, surveying 18 beautiful Manx songs and instrumentals. All of the singing is in Manx, but Christian has no problem overcoming language barriers when it comes to communicating feeling. Within a few listens, several of the songs (e.g., "Ushag Veg Ruy (Little Red Bird)") sound like timeless classics one has always known. For more instant gratification in the domestic record bins, four tracks from this release can also be found on Celtic Voices: Women of Song (Narada, 1996), and one is on the compilation The Celtic Lullaby (ellipsis arts . . . , 1997), which is reviewed in this book's Compilations section. Christian's appearances unavailable elsewhere can be found on other albums with less-than-optimal production values: She contributed four new tracks to Celtic Christmas (Saydisc, 1996, prod. Gef Lucena), five new tracks to Celtic Songs of Love (Beautiful Jo, 1997, prod. Tim Healey), and one live performance to Celtic Music—Live from Mountain Stage (Blue Plate, 1997).

influences:
Clannad, Enya, June Tabor

John C. Falstaff

Kaouding Cissoko

See: Afro Celt Sound System, Baaba Maal, Ernest Ranglin

The Clancy Brothers & Tommy Makem /Tommy Makem & Liam Clancy /Robbie O'Connell

Irish traditional and neo-traditional

Formed March 17, 1956, in New York, NY, USA. Disbanded 1990.

Pat Clancy, vocals; Tom Clancy (died 1990), vocals; Liam Clancy, vocals, guitar, concertinas (1956–75); Tommy Makem, vocals, banjo, guitar, whistle (1956–69); Bobby Clancy, vocals (1975–90); Robbie O'Connell, guitar, vocals (1975–90). (All members are from Ireland.)

The Clancy Brothers and Tommy Makem, along with Sean Ó Riada and the Chieftains, are the most important figures in the renaissance of Irish folk music over the last half century. They have spawned thousands of imitative groups, sold millions of recordings, and sparked a renewed interest in Anglo-Irish folk song both in America and in Ireland. Tom and Pat Clancy, from Carrick-on-Suir, in Tipperary, were out-of-work actors during the early 1950s, living in Cleveland and looking for a new start somewhere else. After deciding their old car wouldn't make the trip to California, they headed for New York City instead and hooked up with both younger brother Liam and Tommy Makem, a fine singer from Armagh and the son of legendary vocalist Sarah Makem. They formed a group and began performing at late-night coffee houses in Greenwich Village—their first gig was on St. Patrick's Day, 1956—and were soon making a name for themselves in New York's nascent folk scene. With a style firmly based on the Weavers' lusty sing-along arrangements and a natural stage presence from their time in the theater, the musicians became favorites at concert appearances and released two albums on their own Tradition label. Following a now-legendary appearance on The Ed Sullivan Show in 1961 (they played for 16 minutes when a scheduled guest took ill), they were signed to Columbia Records and soon became icons among the Irish both in the U.S. and back home. Their natural warmth and easy, singable versions of Irish folk songs earned them converts everywhere they performed. They were soon touring extensively and recording constantly, becoming the best-known exponents of Irish traditional music in the world. Their early albums consisted almost entirely of Irish standards presented in a lusty style with simple accompaniment. Later, the group began to feature their own songs and a more produced sound which didn't always work but sometimes resulted in music that was among their best. After 13 years of records and tours Makem left the group in 1970 to pursue a solo career. Liam left in 1975, replaced by youngest brother Bobby, and the outfit sank to the level of an oldies group, recording for smaller labels and returning to the Irish pubs they had left behind 15 years before. Although the original group reunited for occasional tours and an album during the 1980s, their days at the forefront of Irish music were long-since over. The death of oldest brother Tom in 1990 signaled the final end, though occasional versions of the Clancy Brothers still record and tour today.

Tommy Makem and Liam Clancy formed a duet during the mid-'70s, releasing several albums together. The duo performed fewer of the traditional Irish songs that had made the Clancy Brothers famous, instead concentrating on the work of young lesser-known songwriters. These tasteful albums were very popular with fans of the older group, and introduced such then-unknown songwriters as David Mallett, Eric Bogle, and Gordon Bok, among others, to a new generation of folk fans. Carrying the family tradition to another generation in his own way, Clancy nephew Robbie O'Connell (a latter-day member of the original group) established a well-received solo career, bridging old and new Irish music's audiences and stylistic tastes.

The Clancy Brothers & Tommy Makem reintroduced traditional Irish music, sung honestly, to Irish-American audiences. Before their Ed Sullivan appearance Irish music in the U.S. was for the most part a syrupy, idealized view of "dear old Ireland" written by Tin Pan Alley hacks and bearing little relation to the real thing—which carried somewhat painful associations for Irish Americans seeking to assimilate. The Clancys and their success made true Irish culture acceptable again in the American branch of the diaspora, and led the way for the great revival of Irish music in the U.S. during the '70s and '80s. The group's commercial acceptance across the Atlantic carried weight in Ireland, where people inspired by the Clancys began to look more closely at their own musical heritage. The later explorations of deeply traditional Irish music by Sean Ó Riada, the Chieftains, and those who followed them was made easier by the Clancy Brothers & Tommy Makem's pioneering efforts. There are many things the group did poorly or didn't do at all. They were mediocre musicians at best, and they largely ignored the great traditions of Irish-Gaelic song and traditional dance music. But despite these criticisms, they have done more to raise the profile of traditional Irish music than any other group of the last 50 years, and for that they deserve high praise.

what to buy: The Clancys' live recordings from the early 1960s found them in full flower. Relaxed and comfortable in front of audiences and brimming with good songs, the group made a number of great concert albums during their classic early period. In Person at Carnegie Hall ♪♪♪♪ (Columbia, 1964/1991, prod. Robert Morgan) is as good a starting point as any. Featuring Dominic Behan's moving "Patriot Game," a great children's cape breton music

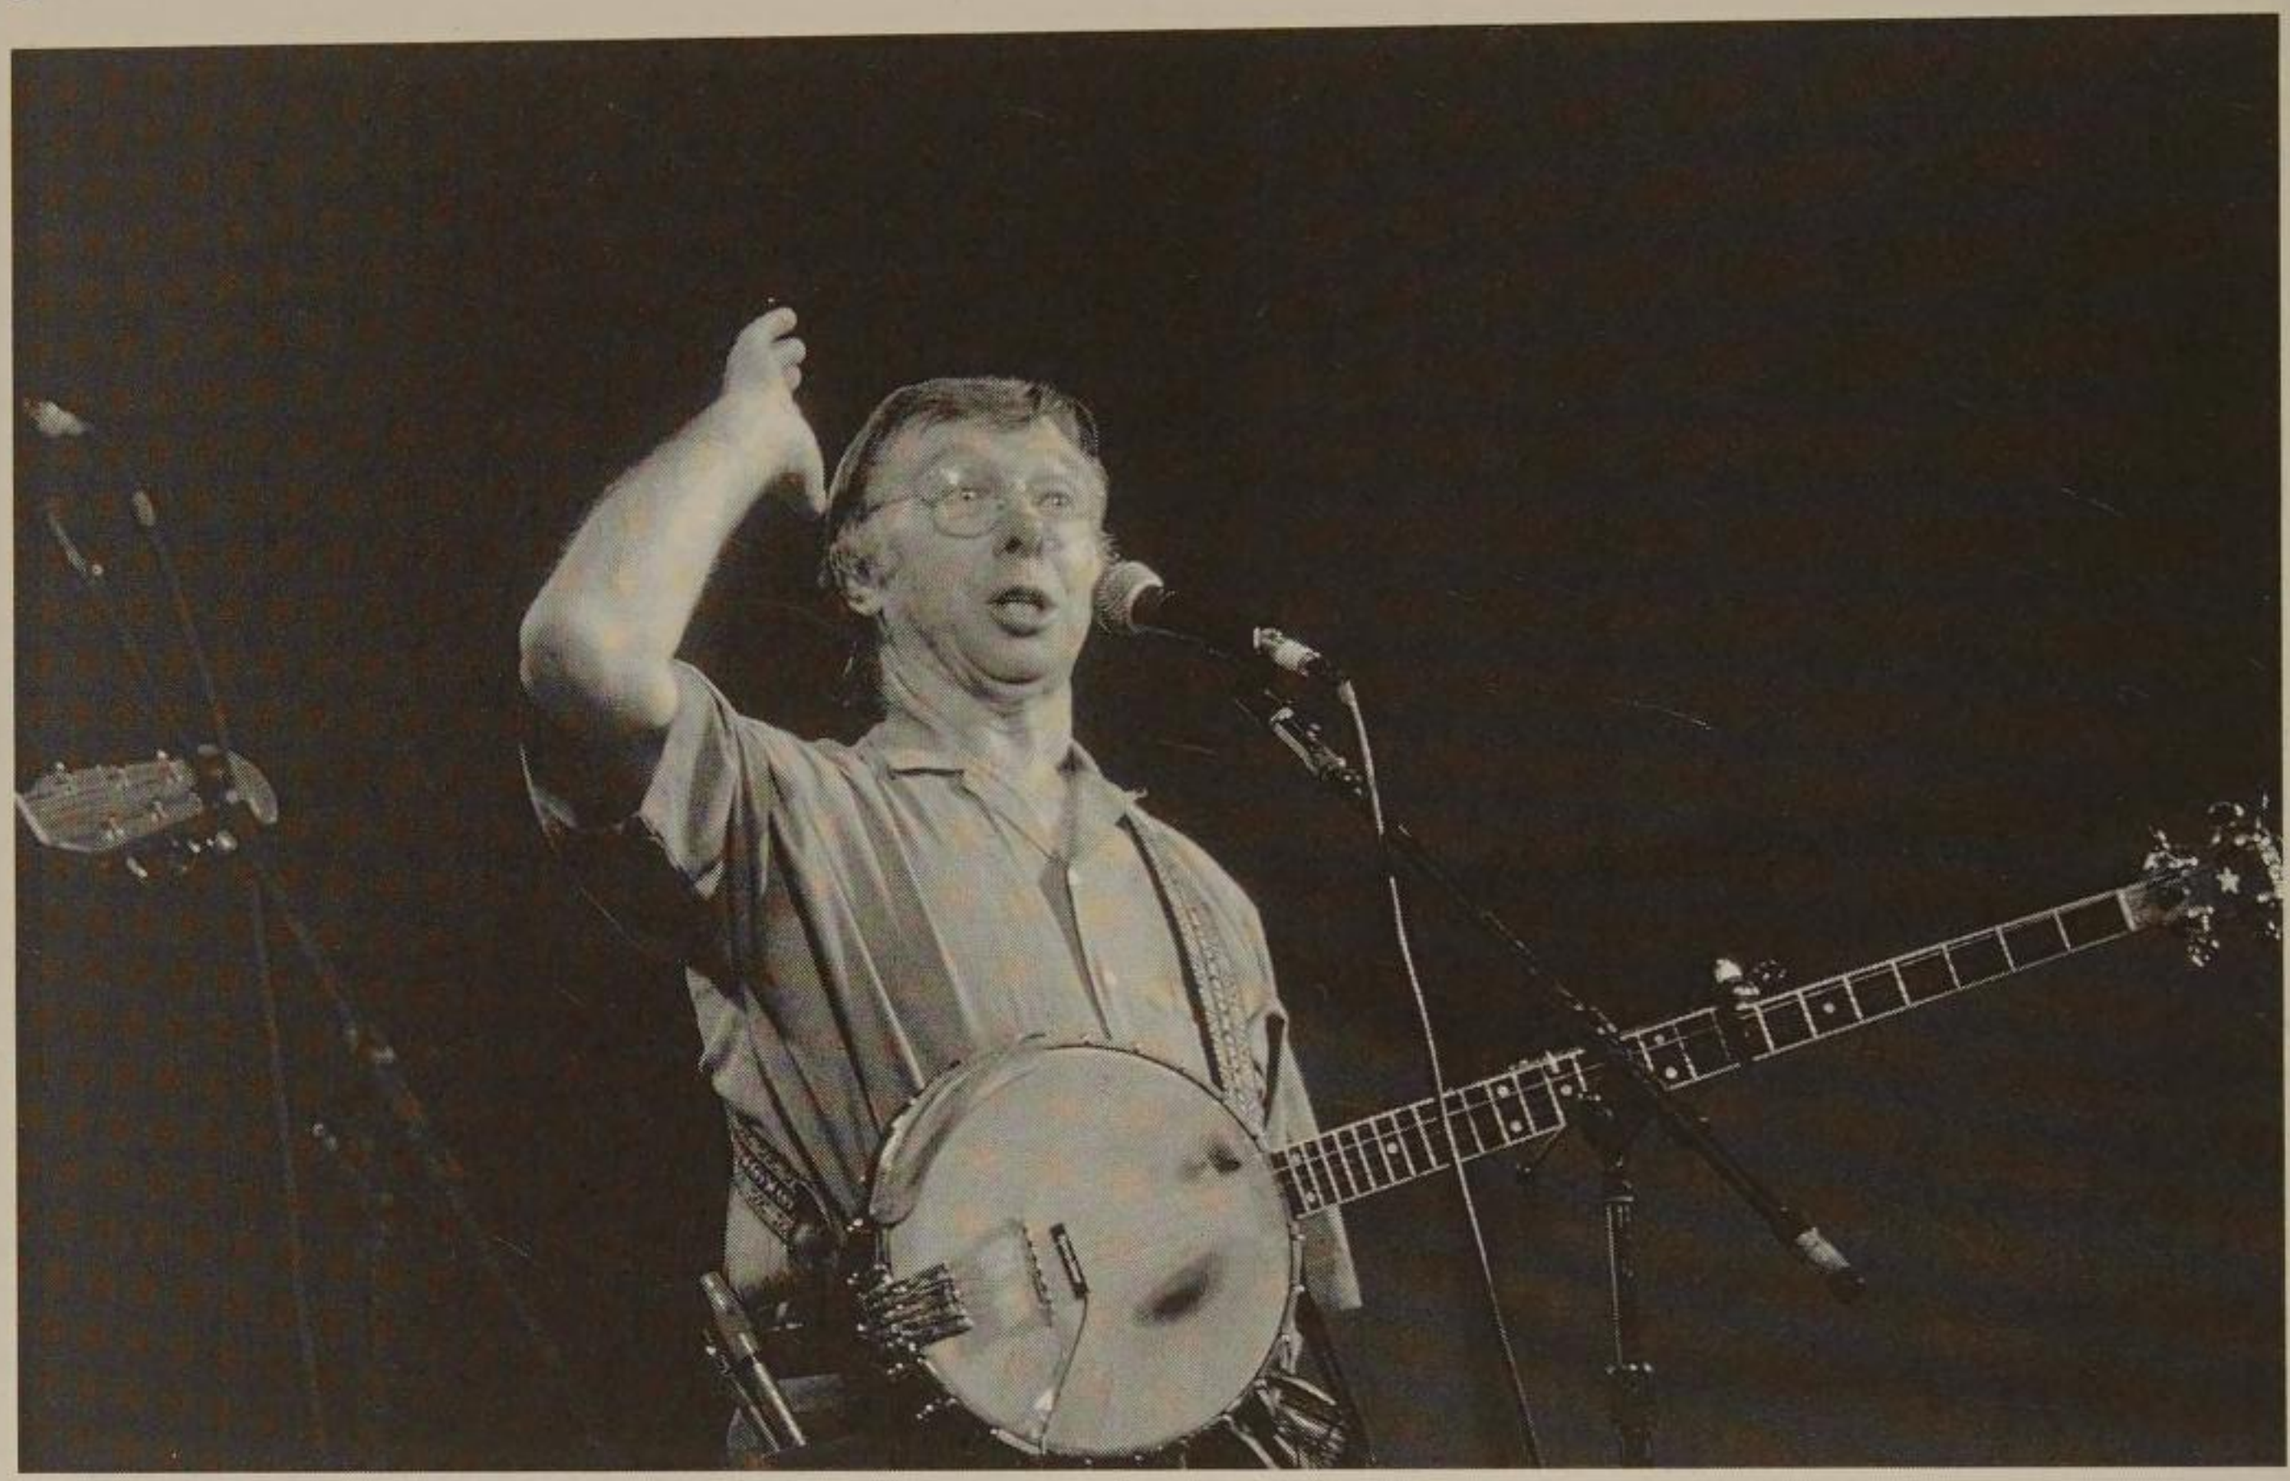
Cape Breton music is characterized by an almost frenetic urgency, an ornate and driving beat, and strong and genuine feeling. There is a distinct sense of the people's roots that comes across in their music, drawing on their Scottish heritage. Distinguished by the strong bowing of the fiddlers and the emotional delivery of the singers, Cape Breton stands alone in its musical "guts." This is likely influenced strongly by Cape Breton step dancing—also believed to have Scottish roots, and a tradition so alive and well that no musician in the area would dream of learning to play without also learning to dance. The beats of the dance and the pulse of the music go hand-in-hand.

Cape Breton gets thrown in with Celtic culture, based on the people's origins in northwestern Nova Scotia or "New Scotland"—so named because its Scottish settlers found the landscape so hauntingly familiar. These immigrants were highly secluded from the influences of outsiders, which has created a geographical time-capsule, presenting a glimpse of what Scotland might be like had it not been constantly invaded and affected by the English, the Scandinavians, and others. Some scholars believe that Cape Breton music is much closer to that of the original Scottish culture than what is found in Scotland today.

Jo Hughey Morrison

160 the clancy brothers



Tommy Makem, sometime member of the Clancy Brothers

medley, and plenty of up-tempo favorites like "Reilly's Daughter" and "Johnson's Motor Car," the album captures the group at their accessible best. The recording is available as an individual CD and in a package with In Concert ♪♪♪♪ (Columbia, 1991) and Luck of the Irish ♪♪♪♪ (Columbia, 1992, prod. various), two other fine early-1960s albums. The Makem and Clancy Collection ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1980/1992, prod. Archie Fisher) is a well-chosen compilation of Tommy Makem and Liam Clancy's post-Clancy Brothers recordings. Featuring the two Eric Bogle songs "No Man's Land" (called "Willie McBride" on the album) and "The Band Played Waltzing Matilda," as well as a haunting version of "Ar Eirinn ne Neosainn Ce Hi" sung by Liam, this is a good introduction to the duo's 1970s folk albums.

what to avoid: Irish Drinking Songs ♪ (Columbia, 1993, prod. Lawrence Cohn) is a compilation that manages to reduce both the Clancys and the Dubliners to a bunch of drunken buffoons. Yes, both groups sang drinking songs, and both groups are closely identified with the juice of the barley, but to present solely that side of their music is to resurrect a stereotype that has haunted the Irish for centuries both at home and abroad. Folklorist Mick Moloney, to his credit, deals somewhat with the ambivalence of many Irish towards drink in his liner notes, but by and large the compilation is a celebration of boozing that seems more than a little heavy-handed in the 1990s. That and the harsh, abrasive sound quality on about half the tracks make for an eminently avoidable listening experience.

the rest:

Come Fill Your Glass with Us ♪♪♪♪ (Tradition, 1957/1998)
Clancy Brothers & Tommy Makem ♪♪♪ (Tradition, 1958/1996)
The Rising of the Moon: Irish Songs of Rebellion ♪♪♪♪ (Tradition, 1959/1998)
Lark in the Morning ♪♪♪ (Tradition, 1960/1996)
(With Lou Killen) Greatest Hits ♪♪ (Vanguard, 1973)
(With Robbie O'Connell) Clancy Brothers with Robbie O'Connell ♪♪♪ (Vanguard, 1982/1991)
Reunion ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1984)
Greatest Hits (Vanguard, 1987)
Live! (Vanguard, 1987)
(With David Hammond) Irish Traditional Folk Songs (Legacy, 1993)
Irish Songs ♪♪♪ (LaserLight, 1993)
Irish Songs of Rebellion ♪♪♪ (LaserLight, 1993)

(With Tommy Makem) Irish Songs of Drinking and Rebellion (Legacy, 1994)
Tunes 'n' Tales of Ireland ♪♪ (Folk Era, 1994)
(With Tommy Makem) Best of the Clancy Brothers (Legacy, 1994)
Wrap the Green Flag ♪♪♪ (Columbia, 1994)
Ain't It Grand Boys: Unissued Gems ♪♪♪ (Columbia, 1995)
(With Tommy Makem) Greatest Irish Hits (Sony, 1995)
Older but No Wiser ♪♪♪ (Vanguard, 1995)
(With Tommy Makem) Home to Ireland: 28 Irish Favorites (Madacy, 1996)
(With Tommy Makem) 28 Irish Pub Songs (Madacy, 1996)
(With David Hammond) The Clancy Brothers and David Hammond (K-Tel, 1996)
(With David Hammond) Irish Folk Song Favorites (Madacy, 1996)
Christmas with the Clancy Brothers ♪♪♪♪ (Columbia, 1997)
(With Tommy Makem) Songs of Ireland and Beyond (Columbia, 1997)
Finnegan's Wake ♪♪♪ (Sounds of the World, 1998)
(With David Hammond) The Great Clancy Brothers and David Hammond ♪♪♪ (Goldies, 1998)
Irish Revolutionary Songs ♪♪♪ (Legacy, 1999)

worth searching for: A Spontaneous Concert Performance ♪♪♪♪ (Columbia, 1961, prod. Robert Morgan) was the Clancys' Columbia debut and is currently available only on cassette. A solid set, featuring accompaniment by Bruce Langhorne and Pete Seeger on guitar and banjo respectively, the album introduced a number of songs that would be longtime favorites for the Clancy Brothers and their fans. "Finnegan's Wake," "Reilly's Daughter," and "Jug of Punch," all Clancy standards, make their first appearance on this record. The atmosphere is relaxed, the audience in fine voice, and the performers comfortable before an audience made up largely of their friends. This is an essential album and would be in the "what to buy" section were it currently available on CD. Home Boys Home ♪♪♪♪ (Columbia, 1968, prod. Teo Macero) matched the Clancys with Columbia's great producer Teo Macero (whose prestigious credits also include Miles Davis's Kind of Blue), finally allowing their songs to be framed in less rudimentary settings. This is a landmark collection of Clancy material, featuring the first appearance of Tommy Makem's classic "Four Green Fields" as well as his beautiful version of "The Bard of Armagh." Macero's use of harp, concertina, and fiddle shades these songs beautifully, providing a subtlety that the Clancy Brothers never had again. It's out of print, regrettably, but used copies are available.

solo outings:

Liam Clancy:
Liam Clancy ♪♪♪ (Vanguard, 1989)
The Dutchman ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1993)
Irish Troubador ♪♪♪♪ (Vanguard, 1999)

Tommy Makem and Liam Clancy:
Tommy Makem and Liam Clancy ♪♪♪♪ (Blackbird, 1976/Shanachie 1992)
We've Come a Long Way ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1989)
Live at the National Concert Hall ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1991)
Two for the Early Dew ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1992)
In Concert ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1993)

Robbie O'Connell:
The Love of Land ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1989)
Never Learned to Dance ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1993)
Close to the Bone ♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1977)
Humorous Songs Live! ♪♪♪ (Celtic Media, 1997)

Clancy, O'Connell & Clancy:
Clancy, O'Connell & Clancy ♪♪♪♪ (Helvic, 1998)

Moloney, O'Connell & Keane:
Kilkelly ♪♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1992)
There Were Roses ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1992)

influences:
◀◀ The Weavers, Sarah Makem
▶▶ The Dubliners, Wolfe Tones, Fureys, the Pogues

see also: The Dubliners, Joanie Madden, Tommy Makem, Mick Moloney, Áine Uí Cheallaigh

Tony Ziselberger

Clannad

Celtic/New Age

Formed late 1960s, in County Donegal, Ireland. Based in Ireland.

Máire Brennan, vocals, harp, keyboards; Ciaran Brennan, vocals, basses, guitar, piano/synth; Paul Brennan, vocals, flute, whistles (1970–89); Padraig Duggan, mandolin, harmonica, guitar, vocals; Noel Duggan, guitar, vocals; Enya Brennan, keyboards, vocals (1980–82). (All members are from Ireland.)

Clannad took their act to Ireland, and later the U.S., in a totally unconventional way. Siblings Máire, Ciaran, and Paul Brennan teamed up with their twin uncles Padraig and Noel Duggan to form a band. They wanted to play music that echoed the sounds they had grown up hearing in their corner of Ireland. The Brennans' father owned a tavern where he performed, and would send them onstage to give him a break between acts. They sang in Gaelic, which was not at all popular with the locals back then. And they took traditional tunes and arranged them for an entire band—also not the "thing to do" at that time. Their big break came when they won first place (and a contract with Philips Records) at the local Letterkenny Folk Festival in 1970. It took several years to complete the album, however, because of a disagreement over the use of Gaelic lyrics on it. The group won out in the end, and thus a legend in contemporary traditional music was born.

Clannad's music has gone through substantial changes over the group's lifetime. Working together, experimenting with new instrumentations and sounds, they evolved a new-age style (winning a Grammy in that category for 1998's Landmarks and once including in their ranks the Enya), visiting various pop and rock stops in between. Their best-known song in the U.S. is "Theme from Harry's Game," which first appeared on a British TV show during the early '80s, later won Billboard's World Music Song of the Year award, and was picked up for the movie Patriot Games. Despite the group's changes over the years, you can still hear the rugged hills and warring political factions of their homeland through the music's dark tone and spiritual melodies.

what to buy: For those unfamiliar with Clannad's music, the best place to start is Magical Ring ♪♪♪ (Tara, 1983, prod. Richard Dodd). This is where the group makes the biggest transition from the "traditional" to the contemporary, largely with their original "Theme from Harry's Game," which combines voices and synthesizers in a modern and wholly original sound. Macalla ♪♪♪½ (RCA, 1985, prod. Steve Nye) is a lush musical offering of mostly original compositions, while more traditional material can be found on Dulaman ♪♪♪♪♪ (Blackbird, 1976/Shanachie, 1988, prod. Nicky Ryan), a recording with rich Gaelic songs and delightful Irish rhythms. Clannad 2 ♪♪♪♪½ (Blackbird, 1974/Shanachie 1988, prod. Dónal Lunny) is steeped in wonderful Irish tradition.

what to buy next: Clannad also has a plethora of compilations, all of which, of course, include "Harry's Game." The best of these is Celtic Collections: Clannad ♪♪♪½ (K-Tel, 1996), which truly shows Clannad's wide scope, from the classic traditional "Nil Sen La" to the highly synthesized "In a Lifetime." The main problem with this album is the lack of liner notes or information about the group, leaving new fans to find their own way to more by Clannad. A better presentation can be found on Rogha: The Best of Clannad ♪♪½ (RCA/BMG, 1997, prod. Ian Kimmer), which is a nice retrospective, though it only covers material from Magical Ring to the present. Clannad in Concert ♪♪♪♪½ (Blackbird, 1979/Shanachie, 1982, prod. Nicky Ryan) is an excellent live recording from the early era.

what to avoid: Whether you are a fan of Clannad's earlier or more contemporary style, Sirius ♪½ (RCA/BMG, 1988, prod. Greg Ladanyi, Russ Kunkel) is an Americanized rock departure for the band; only folk fans with heavy rock leanings are likely to appreciate it. Unless you are interested only in samplings of Clannad's music—or, conversely, want to collect everything in print—the other compilations aren't worth the money. PastPresent ♪♪ (RCA/BMG, 1989, prod. various) spans the time from their first modern venture with Magical Ring to Sirius. Themes woof! (Celtic Heartbeat, 1995, prod. various) combines a large assortment of movie and TV music Clannad has recorded over the years, including a very sappy version of Joni Mitchell's "Both Sides Now" and the overly dramatic love song from the latest Last of the Mohicans film, "I Will Find You." Neither Clannad: The Ultimate Collection ♪♪♪ (BMG, 1997) nor Clannad: An Díolaim ♪♪♪ (Music Club, 1998) holds anything of interest that isn't found somewhere else.

the rest:
Crann Úll ♪♪♪♪ (Tara, 1980)
Fuiam ♪♪♪ (Tara, 1982)
Legend ♪♪♪½ (RCA, 1984)
Atlantic Realm ♪½ (BBC, 1989)
Anam ♪♪ (RCA, 1991)
Banba ♪♪ (BMG, 1993)
Lore ♪♪♪ (Atlantic, 1996)
Landmarks ♪♪♪½ (Atlantic, 1998)

worth searching for: Lovers of Clannad's more traditional work will enjoy the live album Ring of Gold ♪♪♪♪ (Celtic Music, 1986). If anyone finds the out-of-print Clannad ♪♪♪♪ (Philips, 1973), buy it even if you don't want it! It is a collector's item, as the original master tapes have reportedly been lost.

solo outings:
Máire Brennan:
Máire ♪♪ (Atlantic, 1992)
Misty Eyed Adventures ♪♪ (Mesa, 1995)

influences:
◀◀ Pentangle, Bothy Band

▶▶ Enya, Loreena McKennit, Sarah McLachlan, Capercaillie

see also: Enya

Jo Hughey Morrison

Johnny Clarke

Roots reggae

Born January 1955, in Kingston, Jamaica. Based in Kingston, Jamaica.

Johnny Clarke has one of the purest, most moving tenor voices in reggae, and his music, be it a cover of Peter Tosh's "I'm the Toughest" or his own anthemic hits like "Rockers Time Now" and "Prophesy a Fulfilled," is always rich with sweet soul and deep sufferation. During the late 1970s Clarke was just as popular in Jamaica as Bob Marley, Gregory Isaacs, and Dennis Brown, though he is almost unknown in the United States and only developed a cult following in England. Clarke grew up in Whitefield Town, a rough black neighborhood in Kingston, and dropped out of school at 17 to pursue a recording career. His first single, "God Made the Sea & Sun," wasn't a hit, but he did have luck in a series of local talent shows, appearing with other soon-to-be-stars like the Mighty Diamonds. Producer Rupie Edwards heard him at a show in Bull Bay and cut several tunes with him, including "Don't Go" and "Everyday Wondering," which were fairly successful in the U.K.. When Edwards left Jamaica for England shortly thereafter, Clarke began recording for Bunny Lee, who was looking for a singer to give Dennis Brown some competition. Clarke's first hit, "None Shall Escape the Judgment," was an accident. He was supposed to sing backing vocals on the track, which was written and performed by Earl Zero (Earl Johnson). But when it arrived for mixing, Zero's vocals had been somehow erased, so it was quickly re-cut with Clarke singing lead. The tune's fast rise was due both to this switch and to the drumming of Carlton "Santa" Davis, whose prominent hi-hat cymbal riddims Lee manipulated to produce a spacey, sci-fi sound.

Clarke followed up "None Shall Escape" with dozens of his own roots rock compositions and well-received covers of other R&B and rocksteady standards. In 1975 he took a shot at international success by signing with Virgin Frontline and recording Rockers Time Now and Authorized Version, two of the strongest roots rock albums of the 1970s. Clarke's records swamped the competition in Jamaica, but did poorly in England. In the late '70s, when Bunny Lee began concentrating on getting a British distribution deal for his back catalog, he neglected his singers, including Clarke. Clarke himself briefly lived in England in the 1980s, recording for Mad Professor, Jah Shaka, and Fashion, without notable success. He retired from the music biz for a while, but staged a comeback in 1992 with Rasta Nuh Fear. This time out he has concentrated more on the performing side, and his appearances at clubs and festivals have been getting raves from both critics and fans. His latest CD is 1997's Rock with Me.

what to buy: The stunning Authorized Rockers ♪♪♪♪♪ (Virgin Frontline, 1991, prod. Bunny Lee) includes all the tracks from the landmark Rockers Time Now and Authorized Version albums. Lee's production is amazing, with the riddim section of drummer Carlton "Santa" Davis and bassist Robbie Shakespeare pushing the envelope on every track. Clarke's voice has never sounded sweeter or purer than it does on these albums, which are packed with roots rock classics that rival the militant fire and melodic power of Marley's best work.

what to buy next: Dreader Dread 1976–78 ♪♪♪♪ (Blood & Fire, 1998, prod. various) is a fine compilation of Clarke's early work, but lacks the cohesive power of the Virgin sets.

the rest:
Moving Out ♪♪♪½ (Total Sounds, 1975)
Johnny Clarke ♪♪♪½ (Clock Tower)
Rock with Me Baby ♪♪♪½ (Clock Tower)
No Woman No Cry ♪♪♪½ (Total Sounds, 1975)
Don't Stay out Late ♪♪♪½ (Paradise)
Rock with Me ♪♪♪ (1997)
Enter into His Gates with Praise ♪♪♪½ (Trojan Sounds)

influences:
⏮ Bob Marley, Dennis Brown, Slim Smith

⏭ Cocoa Tea

see also: Sly & Robbie

j. poet

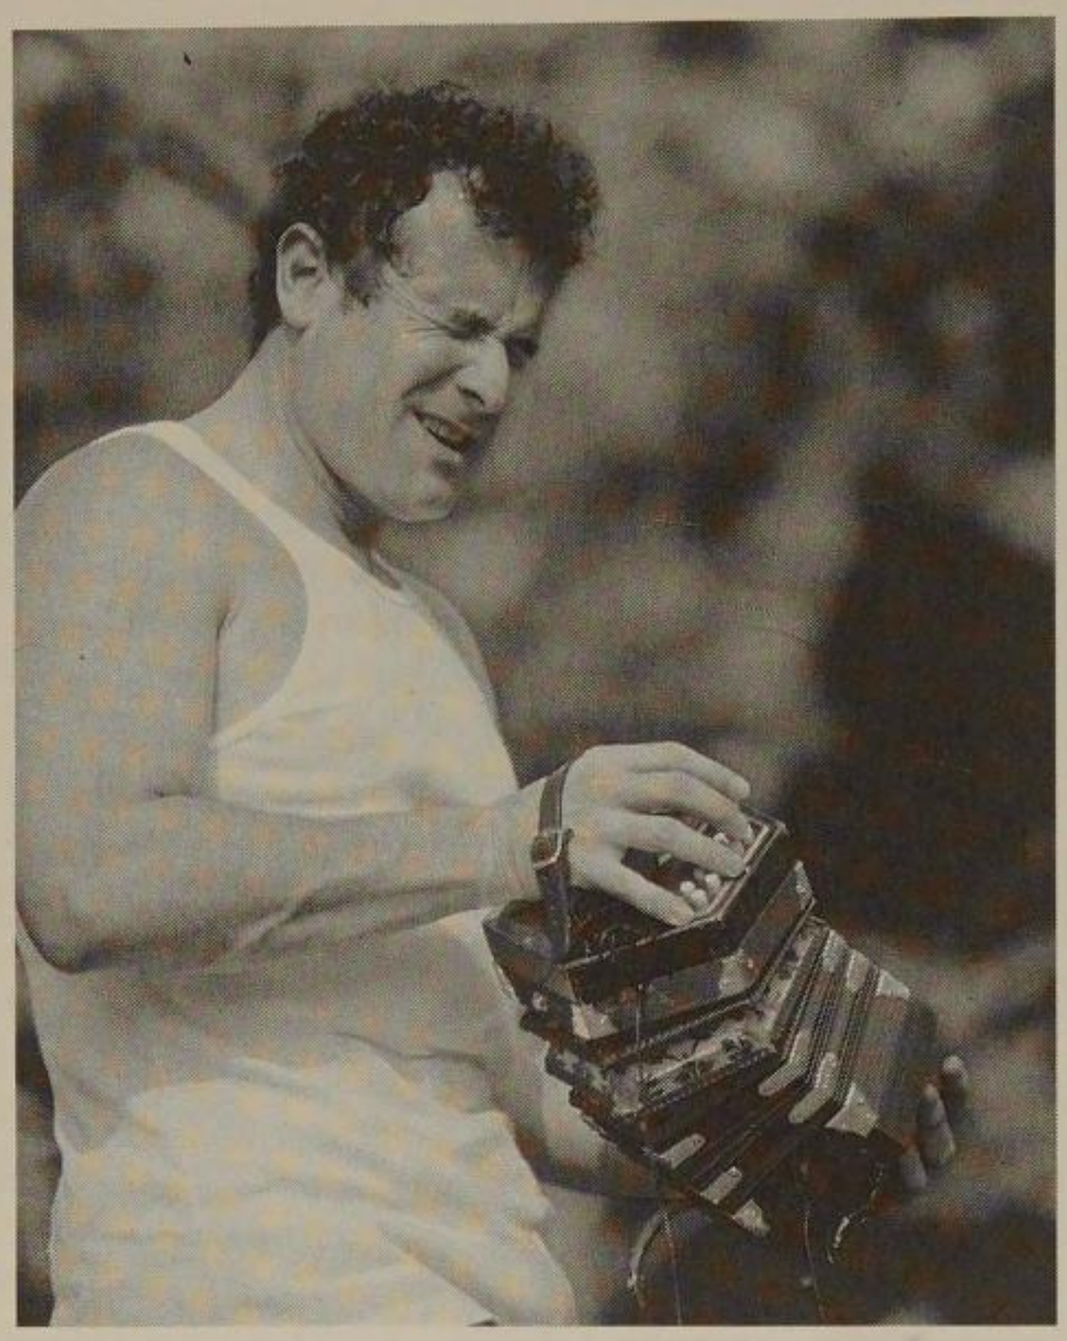
Claudia

Traditional Mestizo-Zapotecan song

Born in Mexico. Based in Mexico.

Claudia's musical experience started early, beginning at age nine with study in a small percussion orchestra under Maestro Cesar Tort. Next came an apprenticeship singing—as well as playing Mexican and South American pop music on guitar—with Maestra Esther Echevarria. Claudia then studied at the Centro de Arte Guitarristico (School of Guitar Art), and participated in the workshops of Mario Arturo Ramos and Amparo Rubin, with the latter of whom she composed and produced the music for El Abuelo y Yo, a Mexican television series. Little of this extensive training and accomplishment could have helped predict the exploration of her homeland's native peoples with which she would eventually gain her most widespread acclaim. Now internationally respected, Claudia has recorded a well-received album of traditional music freshly interpreted, and recently performed live at 1998's prestigious MIDEM Festival in Cannes, France.

what's available: From Mexico comes the lovely, mud-covered Claudia on the cover of her debut album Xquenda ♪♪♪♪ (Milan Entertainment, 1997, prod. Claudia), pronounced "sh'kenda" and translating as "my other me." The album contains indigenous Mexican melodies about life and death from the Isthmus of Oaxaca, Mexico. Claudia and company thrill with a variety of these traditional songs, including a fragment of a lullaby that has almost been forgotten today ("Gasisi Nana"), a Zapotecan song for survivors to bid deceased loved ones farewell ("Guendanabani Xhianga Sicaru"), and even a wedding song with an analogy (meant to go over children's heads!) of the lost virginity and hidden sexual relations of a couple before their marriage ("Pora Gule Bicu Huiniˆ"). Liner notes transcribe the lyrics in phonetic renditions of the Zapotecan language, with Spanish, English, and French translations. Each musician has formidable chops and the trio (Claudia on vocals, Ángel Chacón on guitars, and Rafael Gonzáles on percussion) work together in passionate and plaintive manners, creating an outlet for tradition to survive in the modern word. Claudia's voice is clear and strong, and there are overdubs enabling her to harmonize with herself. The guitars are lush and lovely, making you want to question the number of fingers Señor Chacón possesses. Percussion is spare but intense, popping up as rhythmic punctuation to set the pace of a story. Claudia sums up the combination: "In a very fortunate union, the guitar weaves a mantle with the sounds of the earth, to cover us with the voice of the heart, which, once again, appears as a most valuable instrument."



Johnny Clegg

worth searching for: Claudia states that Xquenda was inspired by an investigation of the ethnomusicological holdings at Mexico's National Institute of Anthropology and History. One reference used is Violeta Torres Medina's research project "Songs of Life and Death in the Isthmus of Oaxaca," the catalog number of which, if you happen to be planning a vacation to the archives of Mexico, is Serie Inah 025.

influences:

⏮ Maestro Cesar Tort, Maestra Esther Echevarria, Mario Arturo Ramos, Amparo Rubin, Botellita de Jerez

Stacy Meyn

Johnny Clegg & Savuka /Juluka

Zulu- and mbaqanga-influenced pop

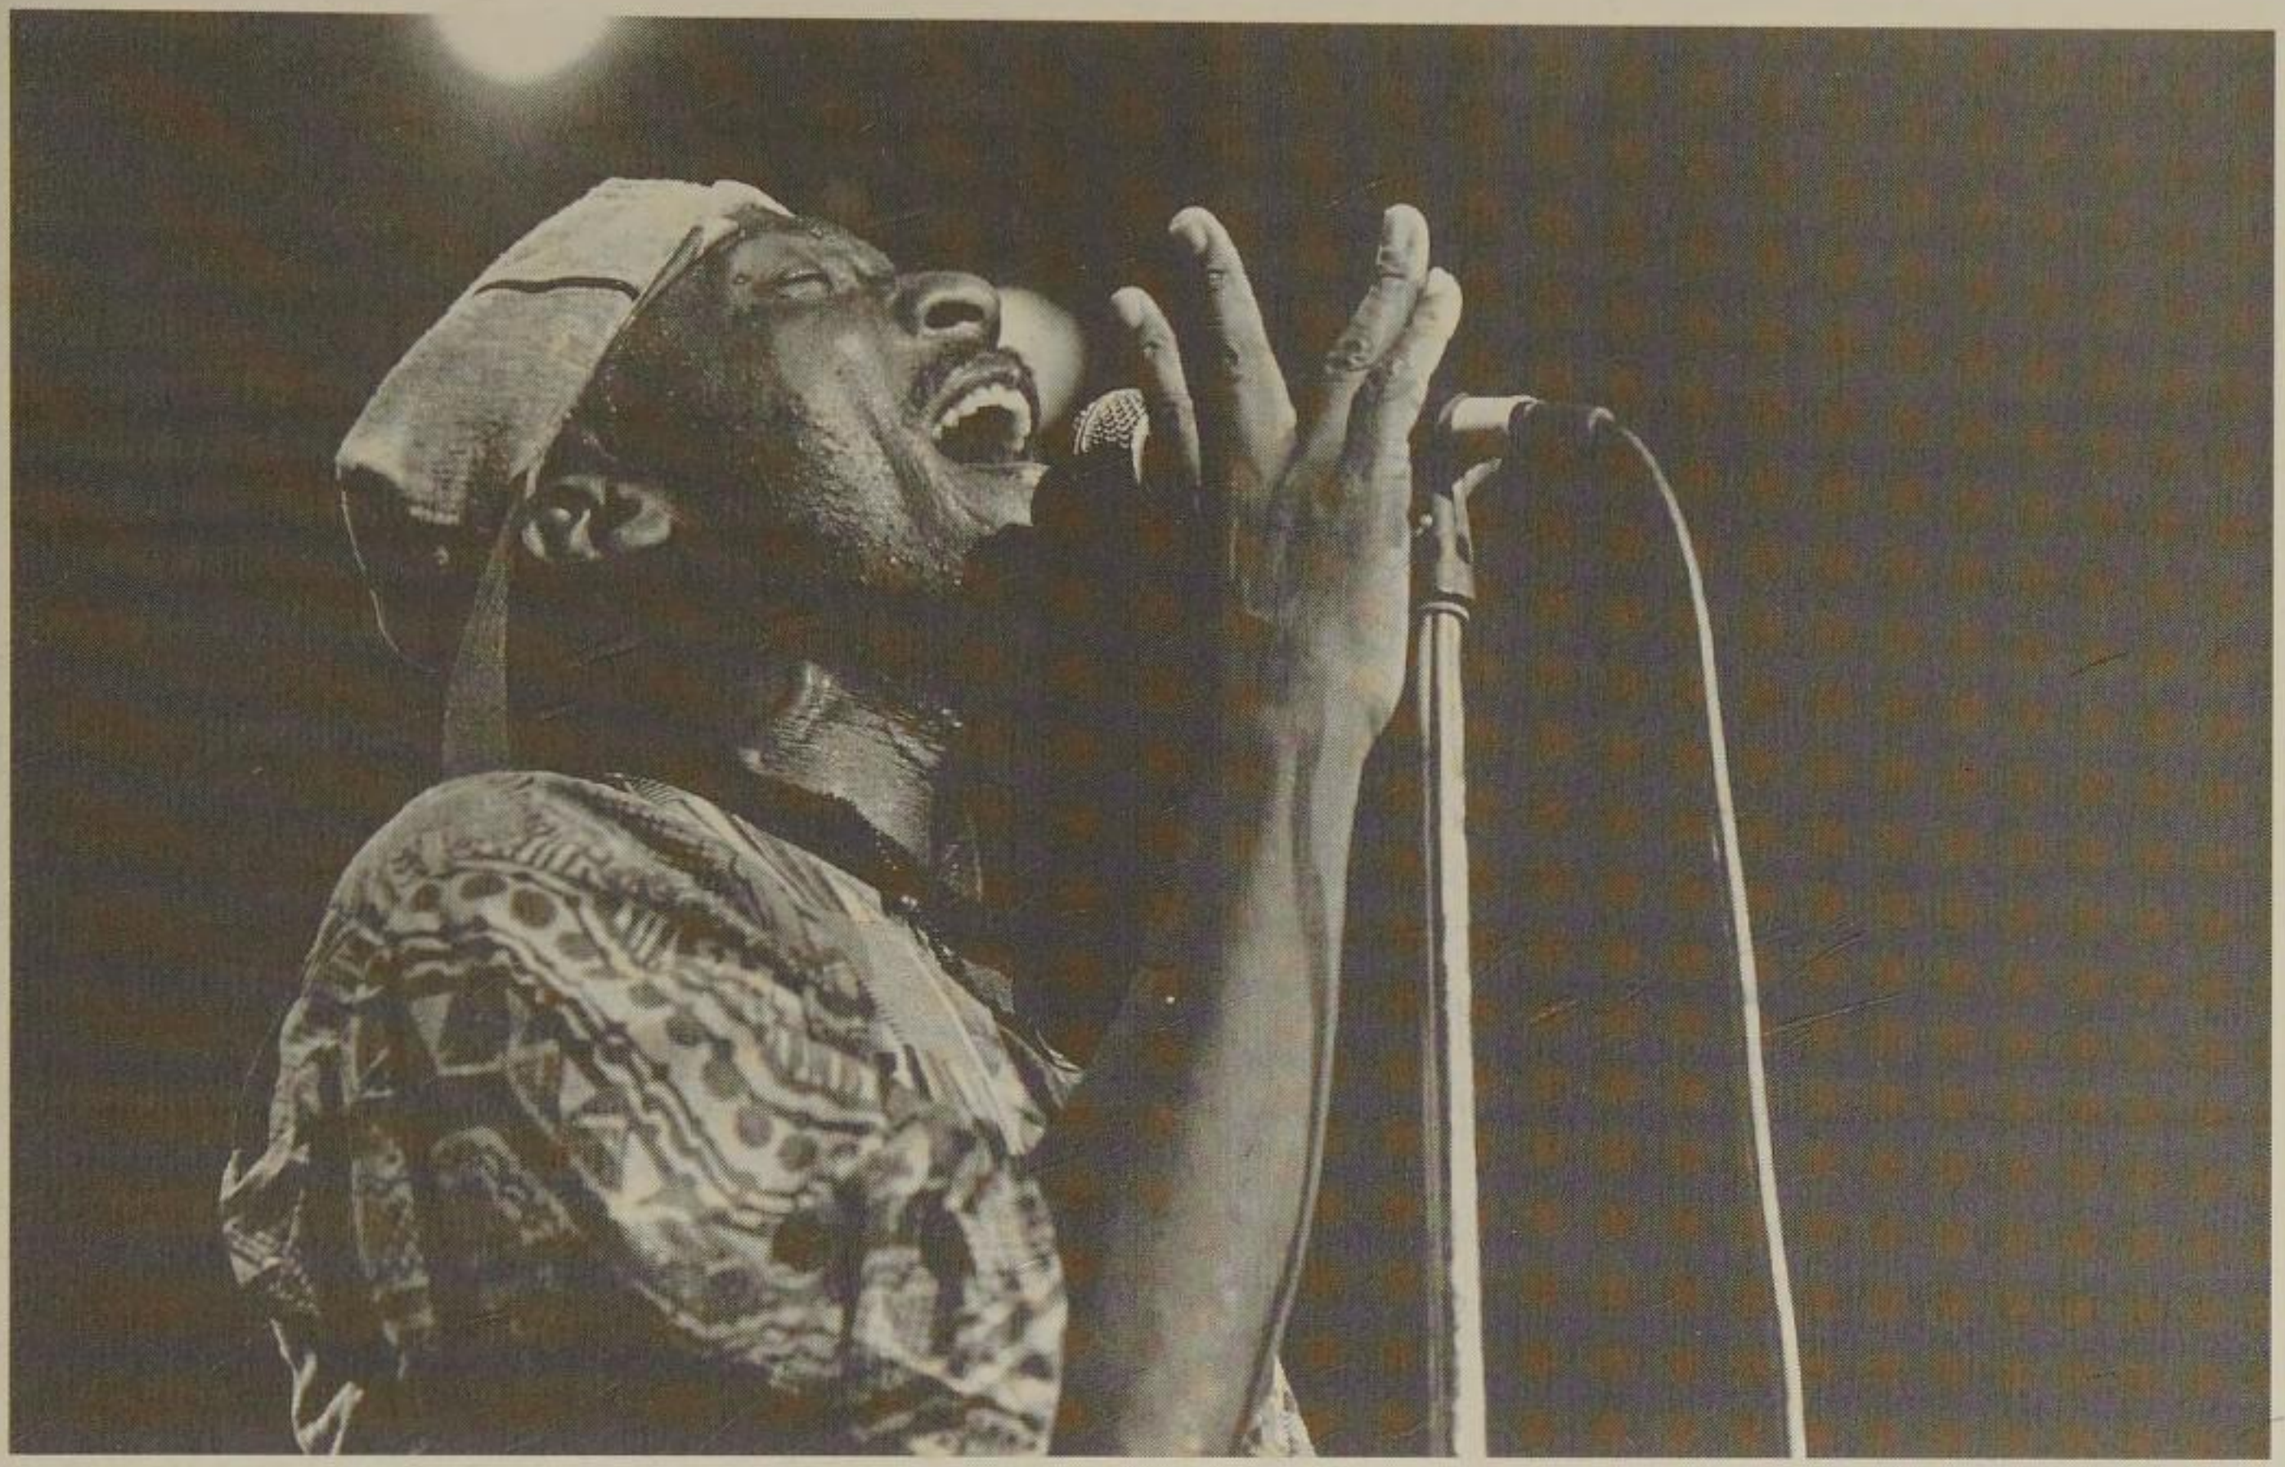
Johnny Clegg born June 7, 1953, in Rochdale, England. Based in South Africa.

Johnny Clegg & Savuka (1986–95): Johnny Clegg, vocals, guitar, mouth bow; Steve Mavuso, keyboards; Keith Hutchinson, keyboards, saxophone, flute; Derek De Beer, drums, percussion; Solly Letwaba, bass; Dudu Zulu, percussion. Juluka (1979–85, 1996): Johnny Clegg, vocals, guitar, mouth bow; Derek De Beer, drums, percussion; Sipho Mchunu, vocals, guitar, concertina; Gary Van Zyl, bass, percussion (1981–85); Scorpion Madondo, flute, saxophone (1982–85); Cyril Mnculwana, keyboards (1983–85); Glenda Millar, keyboards (1982–85).

Born in England but raised in Zimbabwe and South Africa, Johnny Clegg learned Zulu dancing at an early age and, depending on which version of the story you believe, he met Sipho Mchunu either when Mchunu heard about this white boy who could dance like a Zulu, or when Clegg, already a lecturer in anthropology, was sought out by Mchunu because of Clegg's reputation as a hotshot guitarist. The first story maintains that the two met as teenagers around 1970 and worked together for nine years before hooking up with producer/impresario Hilton Rosenthal. The second one likely would indicate that they had only worked together for a little while before they started making records in 1979. Either way, the idea of a white man and a black man coleading a South African band was a political statement in itself, and in some ways became more important than their novel melding of South African mbaqanga or "township" music, Western pop/rock, and Zulu chants. By 1981 the duo had put together a backup band, and before long Juluka's colorful and energetic performances made it a hot concert draw—and brought its members into direct conflict with the racist practices of South Africa's apartheid government. By 1982 the band was wowing audiences in Britain, and soon after, Juluka was signed to a major U.S. label. Commercial success never came, and after the group broke up, Clegg returned as sole leader of a new ensemble, Savuka. Blander and more formulaic than Juluka, Clegg and Savuka also became a serious concert attraction worldwide, but their albums never really rose above the level of stylish professionalism, and the group was dropped by Capitol after 1993's Heat, Dust & Dreams. Meanwhile, Clegg and Mchunu have at one point reunited for some concerts and are reportedly planning a new Juluka album.

what to buy: Both groups are the subject of greatest-hits compilations. A Johnny Clegg & Juluka Collection ♪♪♪½ (Putumayo, 1996, compilation prod. Dan Storper) provides a nice initiation to Clegg's international pop style. In My African Dream: The Best of Johnny Clegg & Savuka ♪♪♪½ (Priority, 1994, prod. various) contains 16 tracks, several previously unreleased. More energetic and a bit more focused than Clegg and Savuka's earlier work, their Cruel, Crazy, Beautiful World ♪♪♪½ (Capitol, 1989, prod. Hilton Rosenthal, Bobby Summerfield) in some ways parallels the rising tide of optimism that was about to overtake South Africa when the album was released.

what to buy next: Highlighted by Juluka's South African breakthrough hit, "Impi," African Litany ♪♪♪½ (Rhythm Safari, 1982/1991, prod. Hilton Rosenthal) offers a view of the earlier band just as it was about to make the jump from national to international status.



Jimmy Cliff

what to avoid: Tame and somewhat disappointing coming after the breakup of Juluka, Savuka's debut, Third World Child ♪♪♪ (Capitol, 1987/Gold Rush 1996, prod. Hilton Rosenthal), is fairly pleasant but unremarkable.

the rest:

Juluka:

Ubuhle Bemvelo ♪♪♪ (Rhythm Safari, 1982/1991)
Scatterlings ♪♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1983)
Stand Your Ground ♪♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1984)

Johnny Clegg & Savuka:

Shadow Man ♪♪♪♪ (Capitol, 1988)
Heat, Dust & Dreams ♪♪♪ (Capitol, 1993)

Johnny Clegg:

Anthology N/A (Connoisseur/Stern's, 1999)

influences:

- Mahlathini & Mahotella Queens, Ladysmith Black Mambazo, the Police, Men at Work, Aswad
- Paul Simon (circa Graceland), Dave Matthews Band, Rusted Root

Bob Remstein

Jimmy Cliff

Reggae

Born April 1, 1948, in St. James, Jamaica. Based in Jamaica.

Jimmy Cliff shot to international stardom in 1971 with his lead role in the movie The Harder They Come and his contributions to its all-star soundtrack, which still stands as one of the primary textbooks of Reggae 101. However, he had been recording since the early 1960s, making some of the first reggae sounds heard outside of Jamaica. Working with famed producer Leslie Kong, Cliff had a handful of hits on the island, leading to more far-reaching success with "Wonderful World, Beautiful People" in 1969. After The Harder They Come Cliff was ostracized by the Jamaican community, perhaps jealous over his newfound stardom or merely insulted by his conversion from Rastafarianism to Islam. The sad truth is that for all the liberating forces at play during Cliff's moment in the sun, he's never been able to translate them into consistent music or attain that level of success again. Instead, he opted for a light MOR pop-soul approach that culminated in a two-album collaboration, The Power and the Glory and Cliff Hanger, with Kool & the Gang during the first half of the 1980s. Besides nabbing a Grammy for Cliff Hanger (so keyboard-laden it could be the Footloose soundtrack), Cliff appeared in Club Paradise with Robin Williams and added seven songs to its soundtrack in 1986, although neither generated a wider audience for the singer.

what to buy: Perhaps the best quick indoctrination into 1970s reggae, The Harder They Come ♪♪♪♪♪ (Island, 1972, prod. various) is Cliff's crowning glory—a taut and yearning soundtrack filled with top-notch performances from all artists involved. Cliff's efforts on the title track, "Sitting in Limbo," "You Can Get It If You Really Want," and, most of all, "Many Rivers to Cross," remain timeless and moving as all classics do.

what to buy next: One of his more consistent studio albums, Wonderful World, Beautiful People ♪♪♪♪ (A&M, 1970, prod. Larry Fallon, Leslie Kong) paved the way to superstardom with its title track, the protest of "Vietnam" (which drew high praise from Bob Dylan), and the foreboding "Time Will Tell."

what to avoid: Cliff's records of late have a disturbing lightness, and although Hanging Fire ♪♪ (Columbia, 1988, prod. Khalis Bayyan, I.B.M.C., Jimmy Cliff) is really not much better or worse than the bulk of his more recent releases, there's a sinking feeling that he may break into "Let's Hear It for the Boy" at any moment. Such mediocrity might not be so unsettling had he not once reached such greatness.

the rest:
In Concert: The Best of Jimmy Cliff ♪♪♪ (Reprise, 1976)
Special ♪♪ (Columbia, 1982)
The Power and the Glory ♪♪♪ (Columbia, 1983)
Reggae Greats ♪♪♪ (Mango, 1985)
Cliff Hanger ♪♪ (Columbia, 1985)
Images ♪♪♪ (Cliff, 1991)
Struggling Man ♪♪♪ (Mango, 1993)
Live 1993 ♪♪♪ (Lagoon Reggae, 1993)
Samba Reggae ♪♪ (Lagoon Reggae, 1995)
Super Hits ♪♪♪♪ (Columbia Legacy, 1997)
Live & in the Studio ♪♪♪ (Jamaican Gold, 1998)
Humanitarian (PGD/Eureka, 1999)

worth searching for: Although it's a hit-and-miss soundtrack, Marked for Death ♪♪♪ (Delicious Vinyl, 1990) contains some stirring Cliff numbers. The ominous "John Crow" is stronger than anything he's done during the past 10 years. Shout for Freedom ♪♪♪ (BMG/Milan, 1999), an intriguing reworking of earlier material with star soukous bands from Central Africa, is an ambitious stylistic realization of reggae's oft-prophesied Motherland reunion. Unfortunately, substandard recording quality doesn't fulfill the listener nearly as well.

influences:
⏮ Toots & the Maytals, Desmond Dekker, Bob Marley
⏭ UB40, Third World, General Public, Pinchers

see also: Joe Higgs

Allan Orski

Cocoa Tea

Dancehall reggae, ragga

Born Calvin Scott, 1960, in Clarendon, Jamaica. Based in Kingston, Jamaica.

In Jamaica's competitive dancehalls, the shelf-life of most performers is two to three years at best. Cocoa Tea has survived and thrived for over 15, primarily due to his captivatingly sweet voice and his much-admired ability to ride rough ragga (digital-reggae) rhythms like a rodeo champ. To be sure, his creamy-smooth melodies are an oddity in a market where intensely percussive chat is the norm. His debut, Rocking Dolly, barely predated the digital age and is a rare document of his gifted vocals backed by a live band—the terrific Roots Radics. In 1989 Cocoa's reputation spread beyond the island when he teamed with Home T and Shabba Ranks on "Pirate's Anthem," which became an underground London danceclub hit. After London's longtime pirate radio station KISS-FM was granted a broadcast license, the song was the first one played on the air and became an "anthem" too for this progressive broadcaster. Cocoa's collaborations with cutting-edge ragga producers like Philip "Fatis" Burrell, Gussie Clarke, Steely & Clevie, and most recently Bobby Digital (no relation to Stateside rapper RZA's alter-ego) have consistently been received with enthusiasm in the dancehall, though a reluctance to travel has no doubt limited his audience. Still a bit of a roots throwback with his dreadlocks and devotion to Rastafarianism, Cocoa Tea's songs have always been more informed by his faith and his vision of justice than most artists of his genre. In 1991 his thoughtful opposition to the Gulf War manifested itself in "No Blood for Oil," from Riker's Island. Given the title, the song is surprisingly subtle and logical in its protest, and—perhaps more important to the dancehall "massive" who made it a hit—it makes you rock so! Cocoa has also distinguished himself by rarely engaging in "slackness," ragga slang for sexually explicit lyrics—a staple in today's dancehalls. He is without a doubt one of the most enduring and purely melodic singers of reggae's digital age.

what to buy: Rocking Dolly ♪♪♪♪ (RAS, 1985, prod. Henry "Junjo" Lawes) includes the two hits that launched Cocoa's career—the title cut and "I Lost My Sonia." The Roots Radics prove that organic rhythms—in particular their rhythms—kick the computer's ass. On the other hand, over a decade later, Cocoa Tea proves he can conquer even the toughest, tensile digital beats on the exceptional Israel's King ♪♪♪♪ (V.P., 1996, prod. Philip "Fatis" Burrell), which also features Dean Fraser's vital tenor saxophone work.

what to buy next: With Home T and renowned deejay Shabba Ranks along for the ride, Holding On ♪♪♪♪ (V.P., 1989, prod. Augustus "Gussie" Clarke) is one of the finest examples of "combo"-style ragga—sound clashes between soulful singers and hard-core, gravel-voiced deejays. This set includes "Pirate's Anthem" and an adrenaline-pumped version of MFSB's Philly-soul hit "Your Body's Here with Me."

the rest:

Sweet Sweet Cocoa Tea ♪♪♪ (Blue Mountain, 1986)
The Marshall ♪♪♪ (Jammy's, 1986)
Cocoa Tea ♪♪♪ (Firehouse, 1986)
(With Tenor Saw) Clash ♪♪♪ (Witty, 1987)
Riker's Island ♪♪♪ (V.P., 1991)
(With Home T and Cutty Ranks) Another One for the Road ♪♪♪ (Greensleeves U.K., 1991)
20 Tracks of Cocoa Tea ♪♪♪ (Sonic Sounds, 1991)
Authorized ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1992)
I Am the Toughest ♪♪ (V.P., 1992)
Kingston Hot! ♪♪ (RAS, 1992)
One Up ♪♪♪ (V.P., 1993)
Tune In ♪♪♪ (Greensleeves U.K., 1994)
Can't Live So ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1994)
Sweet Love ♪♪ (RAS, 1995)
Come Love Me ♪♪♪ (V.P., 1995)
Good Life ♪♪♪ (V.P., 1996)
Ras Portraits ♪♪♪ (RAS, 1997)
Early Days 1984–1986 ♪♪♪ (Corner Stone, 1999)

worth searching for: Available only as an import, Come Again ♪♪♪♪ (Dynamic, 1987, prod. Henry "Junjo" Lawes) is all uplifting melodies and heavy beats. Cocoa ingeniously integrates the tune of "Santa Claus Is Coming to Town" on the joyous title cut. Roll back the rug and prepare to rub-a-dub!

influences:

- Ken Boothe, Alton Ellis, Freddie McGregor, Brook Benton, King Sporty
- Finley Quaye, Home T

see also: Luciano, Freddie McGregor, the Roots Radics, Shabba Ranks

Todd Shanker

celtic music in brief

Celtic music encompasses a wide geography, including Scotland, Wales, Ireland, Nova Scotia, Brittany, Galicia, Cornwall, and the Isle of Man. The ancient Celts or their ancestors settled these lands, making a home and a heritage in each. This one historical link has led to the contemporary cultural association of these areas in the mind of the masses. But it is perhaps unfortunate that the strong musical traditions of the Celtic world are tossed into one stylistic melting pot, for each area's traditional music has its own distinctive flavor. Welsh music, for instance, is characterized by strong vocal harmony and the love of theme and variation, while the Irish tradition includes a strong melodic line and a tendency to ornament this melody heavily. So it is actually difficult to describe what makes Celtic music "Celtic." There is a common pool of instruments, including bagpipes, harp, and fiddle. But above all it is probably the people's still-shared history; a deeply emotional connection to their heritage shines through the music of the Celts.

Jo Hughey Morrison

Robert Tree Cody

Native American flute and song

Born in USA. Based in AZ, USA.

Usually made from cedar, the Native American flute is an ancient instrument used by indigenous cultures of the American plains and woodlands. Called siyotanka by the Lakota people, this flute was used by young men to court the affections of young ladies in camp. It was also played to provide soothing music during times of quiet and relaxation. R. Carlos Nakai, Al Jewer, Andy Vasquez, and other Native flutists have risen to prominence in the past 20 years for their unmatched ability to use the flute to emulate the human voice in tone and character, expressed in sweet pitch and slow-to-sprightly tempo. Robert Tree Cody is an artist well worthy of their company. Born of Dakota-Maricopa heritage, Cody has appeared throughout the United States and Europe as a dancer, singer, and flutist. A prize-winning traditional dancer and an honored whistle carrier, he is well-known on the powwow circuit as Tree Cody Red Cedar Whistle. As a counselor and educator, Cody has taught students at all levels about the folklore, crafts, music, and traditional ways of the Native American people, and participates in the artist-in-residence programs of the Arizona Commission on the Arts. He is married to noted Assiniboine-Yankton Sioux-Mohave singer Marlene Cody, and has four boys.

what to buy: While almost anybody can produce some type of sound from a cedar flute, it is notoriously difficult to play really well. Native American flutists must achieve a clarity of mind, purity of heart, and singleness of purpose before picking up the instrument, as it is the depth and breadth of emotion found in the music produced that ranks a player as either gross amateur or artiste. It is clear from his recordings that Cody is one of this century's most talented players in the latter category. Dreams from the Grandfather: Native American Songs for Flute & Voice ♪♪♪♪ (Canyon, 1993, prod. Robert Doyle) artistically demonstrates the close relationship between singing and instrument as inspired by Kokopelli, a mysterious figure of legend whose hunchbacked, flute-playing form decorates hundreds of rock walls and ruins throughout the Southwest. Featuring Lakota lullabies, an adaptation of a Cherokee stomp dance, and the joyful prayer "Zuni Dawn," this album also includes a version of "Sky City," an homage to the song's legendary original recording by the great Navajo singer Ed Lee Natay in 1951. A gorgeous melding of voice and flute, it describes the celestial wonders of the titular Acoma pueblo and its people.

what to buy next: In collaboration with non-Native artists Rob Wallace (synthesizer) and Will Clipman (percussion), Cody brings to life the legend of the White Buffalo ♪♪♪♪ (Canyon, 1996, prod. Robert Doyle): Long before the Europeans invaded North America, a drought reduced animal populations and the indigenous peoples were starving. Two hunters seeking food for their people met a beautiful young woman who floated as she walked. One hunter attempted to defile her and was turned to a pile of bones; the other returned to his camp to announce her coming. The mysterious woman gave the people a sacred pipe, showed them how to pray, and taught them about the value of women, children, and buffalo. Before she left, she told the people she would return; as she walked away, she rolled over four times and eventually transformed into a white buffalo. Shortly after Cody, Wallace, and Clipman began working on this album, Miracle, the first white buffalo in over six decades, was born in Janesville, Wisconsin. For many Native peoples this was a powerful and positive sign of great portent, as well as the fulfilled promise of the legend. The music is therefore both suitably reverent and celebratory, an aural portrait of a people whose past has been renewed through spirit so that humankind and nature can again come into harmony.

the rest:
Young Eagle's Flight ♪♪♪½ (Canyon, 1991)
(With Rob Wallace & Tony Redhouse) Maze ♪♪♪♪ (Canyon, 1998)

influences:
Doc Tate Nevaqueya of the Comanche, Ed Lee Natay of the Navajo

PJ Birosik

Shirley Collins /Shirley & Dolly Collins /Etchingham Steam Band

English folk

Shirley Collins born July 5, 1935, in Hastings, Sussex, England. Dorothy (Dolly) Collins born March 6, 1933, in Hastings, Sussex, England; died September 22, 1995, in Balcombe, West Sussex, England. Etchingham Steam Band formed c. 1974, in Etchingham, Sussex, England; disbanded c. 1975. Shirley Collins based in Brighton, East Sussex, England.

Etchingham Steam Band: Shirley Collins, vocals, hobby horse; Vic Gammon, vocals, concertina, melodeon, banjo; Ian Holder, accordion; Ashley Hutchings, acoustic bass guitar, vocals, tambourine; Terry Potter, mouth organ. (All members are from England.)

Shirley Collins is one of Britain's greatest folk singers. Her lilting, wavering soprano epitomizes the spirit of British folk music: unpolished but full of magic and grace. Collins first gained attention as a singer when she worked with seminal folklorist Alan Lomax on his collection of southern U.S. ballads, many of which have antecedents in Great Britain and Ireland. Her own debut album, False True Lovers, was released in 1959. Sister Dolly joined her as accompanist and arranger for The Sweet Primeroses, released in 1967. Shirley's work on Harvest, a label known for progressive rock, indicated the growing fusion of traditional and contemporary elements in British music. It was a fusion to which she herself contributed directly by recording with (and marrying) traditionalist/trailblazer Ashley Hutchings. After their divorce she retired from music, only to reappear during the late 1980s. Collins has both reinforced and pushed the bounds of tradition throughout her career, singing parodies with Les Barker's Mrs. Ackroyd Band, introducing early instruments in work with David Munrow and Phil Pickett, and collaborating with Davey Graham on the landmark folk fusion album Folk Roots, New Routes.

what to buy: Shirley Collins & the Albion Band's No Roses ♪♪♪♪½ (BBC, 1971/Mooncrest, 1991) is unquestionably a folk-rock album, thanks largely to the presence of such Fairporters and Steeleyes as Richard Thompson, Simon Nicol, Maddy Prior, and Dave Mattacks. In fact, 25 of Britain's best musicians of the time worked on the album, making it essential for any fan of the genre. The most chilling selection is "Murder of Maria Marten," based on the same 19th-century case that inspired Tom Waits's "Murder in the Red Barn." For an unplugged experience, try the eponymous Etchingham Steam Band ♪♪♪♪½ (Fledg'ling, 1995). In the liner notes to this lone album from the band, Collins recounts how she simulated the sound of English traditional morris dancers onstage by sewing bells to her children's hobby horses and shaking them (losing many bells per performance). This band was formed during the power cuts of the mid-1970s as a low-tech performing outfit; their one album brings together recordings from various concerts and is a lighthearted ramble through Britain's thicket of dance music, ballads, and wassails.

worth searching for: Collins, then "Shirley Hutchings," is an important part of the group effort Morris On ♪♪♪♪½ (Island, 1972/Hannibal, prod. John Wood). She sings on two tracks, "The Willow Tree" and "Staines Morris," adding class and delicacy to an otherwise rollicking, testosterone-fueled collection. Phil Pickett, sending liner-note readers to the unabridged dictionary, plays such artifacts of the modern and medieval arsenals as recorders, shawms, curtal, cornett, and cittern on Shirley and Dolly Collins' For As Many As Will ♪♪♪♪½ (Topic, 1978/Hokey Pokey, 1993, prod.

Tony Engle), but one of the best tracks is a moving cover of Richard Thompson's "Never Again" with Shirley on vocals and Dolly on piano. This album, available as an import from U.K.-based Fledg'ling Records, was the last of the three the Collins sisters did together, and it's a fitting tribute to Dolly's sensitive keyboard work and arrangements. Other out-of-print gems from the sisters include Love, Death, and the Lady ♪♪♪♪♪ (EMI, 1974) and The Sweet Primeroses ♪♪♪♪ (Topic, 1967). At present the best place for the Collins catalog—and a great source for British folk in general—is the aforesaid Fledg'ling Records, P.O. Box 547, London SE26 4BD, United Kingdom; beekeeper@fledgling.demon.co.uk.

influences:

◀◀ Jean Ritchie, Young Tradition

▶▶ Kate Rusby, Eliza Carthy

see also: Fairport Convention, Ashley Hutchings, Steeleye Span

Pamela Murray Winters

Willie Colon

Salsa, Latin jazz

Born April 28, 1950, in Bronx, NY, USA. Based in Mexico City, Mexico.

You could say trombone player, bandleader, and producer Willie Colon is an institution, but that suggests a resting on laurels that he doesn't ever stay still long enough for—think of him more as a foundation, continually reinvesting in and reinvigorating the New York salsa and Latin jazz scenes of which he's been in the forefront for more than three decades. To the Anglo masses just beginning to "discover" Latin music at century's end, Colon is perhaps best known for his high-profile work on David Byrne's career-redefining 1989 Latinesque album Rei Momo. But to his legions of Spanish-speaking fans and longtime international music listeners he's known as the recipient of more than 11 Grammy nominations and counting, with sales of over 10 million to his credit worldwide—not to mention his prestigious Chubb fellowship from Yale University in 1995, and his citation as one of Hispanic Business magazine's Most Influential Hispanics in the United States the following year.

The grandson of Puerto Rican immigrants, Colon was taught his earliest songs by his grandmother. Though he studied trumpet at the age of 12, he switched to the trombone within two years. After directing the 14-piece Latin Jazz All-Stars, Colon signed a recording contract with seminal salsa label Fania in 1967. His debut album, El Malo, featured vocalist Hector Lavoe and included the hits "Jazzy" and "I Wish I Had Watermelon." These successes portended the acclaim and stature to come, as Colon went on to record with such influential artists as New York-born percussionist Tito Puente, Cuban songstress Celia Cruz, Puerto Rican cuatro (folk guitar) player Yomo Toro, and Panamanian vocalist Ruben Blades. In general it's an international pantheon Colon was inducted into with the same seeming effortlessness displayed in his impassioned playing and incisive compositions and arrangements. In particular, Blades makes a fitting partner; not only have he and Colon recorded together periodically—winning a Grammy for Canciones del Solar de los Aburriodos in 1982—but Blades's outspoken activism (including his almost-successful run at the Panamanian presidency in 1994) finds a kindred spirit in Colon.

Colon's songs were banned by Nicaraguan president Samoza in the 1970s and he was arrested several times in Central and South America for his political views. Unbowed by these hostilities, he has remained civically involved Stateside. In 1993, after performing at President Clinton's inauguration, Colon turned down an invitation to become a member of the President's Committee on the Arts and Humanities in order to devote his attention to running in the New York state primary for a congressional seat in the 17th District. A former chairperson of the Association of Hispanic Arts, Colon was the first minority to serve on ASCAP's national board. To the sorrow of his many hometown fans—and perhaps the delight of many public officials—he announced his relocation to Mexico City at a 1998 concert in Central Park. Enthusiasts can keep in touch via www.williecolon.com, through which the ever forward-looking Colon has begun to give some albums their initial, exclusive release.

what to buy: Discarding the Eddie Palmieri–influenced two-trombone sound of his early albums, Colon took a dynamic, hard-bopping approach with The Good, the Bad, the Ugly ♪♪♪♪ (Fania, 1975, prod. Willie Colon). Colon's last album with vocalist Hector Lavoe, it created a uplifting, youth-oriented direction for modern salsa.

what to buy next: Colon's first collaboration with future Latin superstar Blades, Matiendo Mano ♪♪♪♪ (Fania, 1977, prod. Willie Colon) not only represents a historic meeting of musical minds but remains a dance-inspiring masterpiece.

best of the rest:

Guisando ♪♪♪½ (Fania, 1969)
Asalto Novideno ♪♪♪½ (Fania, 1972)
The Big Break ♪♪♪½ (Fania, 1976)
Siembra ♪♪♪♪ (Fania, 1978)
Solo ♪♪♪½ (Fania, 1980)
Canciones del Solar de los Aburridos ♪♪♪♪ (Fania, 1983)
Top Secrets ♪♪♪½ (Fania, 1989)
Illegal Aliens ♪♪♪½ (Fania, 1990)
Color Americano ♪♪♪½ (CBS, 1990)
Honra y Cultura ♪♪♪½ (CBS, 1991)
El Malo ♪♪♪½ (Fania, 1991)
49 Minutes ♪♪♪½ (Fania, 1992)
Altos Secretos ♪♪♪½ (Fania, 1992)

Willie Colon

Corazon Guerrero ♪♪♪½ (Fania, 1992)
Deja Vu ♪♪♪½ (Fania, 1992)
El Baquine de Angelitos Negros ♪♪♪½ (Fania, 1992)
Last Fight ♪♪♪½ (Fania, 1992)
The Best ♪♪♪♪ (Sony, 1992)
Grandes Exitos ♪♪♪½ (Fania, 1992)
Super Exitos ♪♪♪½ (Fania, 1992)
Hecho in Puerto Rico ♪♪♪½ (Fania, 1993)
Willie & Tito ♪♪♪♪ (Vaya, 1993)
Best, Vol. 2 ♪♪♪♪ (Sony, 1994)
Lo Mato ♪♪♪½ (FNA, 1994)
El Juicio ♪♪♪½ (FNA, 1994)
Trans la Tornenta ♪♪♪½ (Sony, 1995)
Brillantes ♪♪♪½ (Sony, 1996)
Fania All-Stars ♪♪♪♪ (Sony, 1997)
Mi Gran Amor ♪♪♪♪ (Madacy, 1999)

influences:

◀◀ Mongo Santamaria, Tito Puente, Eddie Palmieri, Gato Barbieri

▶▶ Ruben Blades, Yomo Toro

see also: Ruben Blades, Celia Cruz

Craig Harris

The Congos

Roots reggae

Formed 1975, in Kingston, Jamaica. Disbanded 1983. Re-formed 1995. Based in New York, NY, USA.

Cedric Myton, vocals (1975–83; 1995–present); Roydel "Congo Ashanti Roy" Johnson, vocals (1975–80; 1997–present); Watty Burnett, vocals (1976–80; 1995–present); Devon Russell, vocals (1983); Lindbergh Lewis, vocals (1995–97). (All members are from Jamaica.)

The Congos' hauntingly beautiful lyricism casts an array of mystical beams and shadows which together reveal spectral glimpses of Jamaica and Rastafari's past and future. Add Lee Perry's sweltering, funky, jungle-dense production on the group's 1977 masterpiece, Heart of the Congos, and the mighty vocal potion of Cedric Myton (falsetto), Roydel Johnson (tenor), and Watty Burnett (baritone) conjures up a musical and cultural index of both the history and potential of the African diaspora. Heart of the Congos is that exceedingly rare album that is both timeless and forever timely.

Myton began his career with the Tartans, a vocal group in the proto-reggae rocksteady style that had one hit, "Dance All Night" (1967) on the Merritone label. The group's ensuing singles, "Coming on Strong" (Caltone) and "Far beyond the Sun" (Treasure Isle), were equally moving but not big sellers. Myton then recorded some sides with fellow ex-Tartan Devon Russell, including "What a Sin Thing" and "Short up Dress." From there, he formed the Royal Rasses with the great Prince Lincoln Thompson; the group's superb "Kingston 11" is a radiant musical journey into Jamaican ghetto life. In 1975 the cultural deejay Big Youth introduced Myton to Roydel Johnson. At the time, Johnson's rich textural chanting was a key element of both Ras Michael's legendary nyahbingi (ritual Rasta) band/commune the Sons of Negus, and the undervalued Brother Joe & the Rightful Brothers, with whom Johnson recorded the devout Rasta anthem "Go to Zion" in 1973. The Congos formed soon after Myton and Johnson's meeting, the band's classic core almost completely in place.

With the help of producer Lee "Scratch" Perry—Johnson's old elementary school friend—the Congos released their hungry and heavy first single, "At the Feast." In 1976 Watty Burnett's reverberating baritone was added to the Congos' soulful and sepulchral choir. A year later Perry was at the height of his powers after releasing a series of distinctive albums recorded at his candle-lit, graffiti-emblazoned Black Ark studio—including Max Romeo's War inna Babylon, the Upsetters' Super Ape, and the Heptones' Party Time, all for Island Records. However, just as Scratch prepared to record the Congos' long-planned and painstakingly conceived debut, Island refused to release his wonderfully weird and walloping solo album, Roast Fish, Collie Weed, and Cornbread. Scratch's revenge was to withhold Heart of the Congos from Island and release it on his own Black Art label. Meanwhile, the group believed that Perry had deprived them of money and recognition, so they signed a multi-record deal with CBS's French subsidiary. Unfortunately, the Congos' subsequent series of albums sounded uninspired compared to their challengingly intense debut. Ironically, the fact that Heart of the Congos was widely considered to be Perry's most awe-inspiring production—combined with the record's lack of major-label distribution and the inferior mix on at least five different small-label reissues—rapidly led to international demand for the original pressing. And when Perry set the Black Ark ablaze in the midst of a nervous breakdown, reducing his sanctified studio to nothing but glowing embers and smoking ashes, reggae lovers' search for the already-fabled Black Ark production only intensified.

Johnson left the Congos in 1980 and released a number of solid albums under the name Congo Ashanti Roy. Myton re-formed the group in the mid-'90s with Burnett and ex-Tartan Lindbergh Lewis. In 1997 Johnson sang backup on the group's Natty Dread Rise Again, and returned as a full-fledged member for the recently released Revival. Truth be told, the Congos have never come close to equaling their astonishing debut. Heart of the Congos is virtually unmatchable because the soaring, majestic vocals—emanating from the Black Ark's Temple of Zoom, as Perry occasionally called it—were seemingly moored to this planet not by gravity, but by will, as if the Congos' magnificent shibboleths had emerged from another realm to provide inspiration to the earthbound.

conjunto alma jarocha

what to buy: The essential issue of Heart of the Congos ♪♪♪♪♪ (Black Art, 1977/Blood & Fire, 1996, prod. Lee "Scratch" Perry) contains definitive, restored mixes of Congos classics such as "Fisherman," "Congoman," and "Ark of the Covenant," alongside the equally divine "La La Bam-Bam" (with unforgettable background harmonies by the Heptones and Gregory Isaacs), "Children Crying," and "Solid Foundation." A bonus disc features a mind-expanding remix of "Congoman" along with a wicked dub version called "Congoman Chant," both of which were originally released on the obscure 12" EP Island Black Swan; also included on the extra disc are "Bring the Macka Back" and "Noah Sugar Pan"—the amazing dubs of "Fisherman" and "Ark of the Covenant"—which were originally released as B-sides on Scratch's Upsetter and Black Art labels, respectively. Throughout both discs Perry's Echoplex reverb unit, Mutron phase-shifter, and way-out mooing-cow samples provide hallucinatory smoke-and-mirror effects. The backing band is simply outstanding: the Meditations provide multiple additional layers of vocal harmonizing; Ernest Ranglin lavishes his mesmerizing lead guitar onto nearly every song; and the terrific Upsetters are the rhythmic foundation undergirding the vocals, with Sly Dunbar on drums, Boris Gardiner on bass, and Winston Wright on organ. But ultimately, it is the Congos' meticulous tone shading, intricate melodic ornamentation, and subtly bent pitches that prove that Scratch was—despite his wont to cultivate sonic anarchy—a man who loved the human voice. His passionately detailed aural choreography indicates that he knew he was working with some of the finest singers he would ever have the privilege of recording. The blended timbral magic on Heart of the Congos is vocal artistry at its finest.

what to avoid: Natty Dread Rise Again woof! (RAS, 1997, prod. Cedric Myton, Yvonne Myton) is a reggae disaster area to be avoided by everyone but crazed Congos completists. Most of the songs are musically featherweight, with sappy, virtually meaningless, new-agey lyrics. And on the cuts that could have been vital, obnoxious synthesizers continually intrude like fluorescent Magic Marker scrawlings on an otherwise exquisite Impressionist painting. Also steer clear of a less expensive but inferior version of Heart of the Congos (Black Art, 1977/V.P., 1995), minus the bonus CD and plus abhorrent sonics.

the rest:
Image of Africa ♪♪♪½ (CBS, 1979/V.P., 1994)
Congos Ashanti ♪♪♪½ (CBS, 1980/V.P., 1995)
Face the Music ♪♪ (CBS, 1983/V.P., 1995)
Revival ♪♪♪♪½ (V.P. 1999)

worth searching for: Arkology ♪♪♪♪♪ (Island, 1997, prod. Lee "Scratch" Perry) is a three-disc compilation of Perry's work inside the Black Ark studio and is a must-own for any reggae enthusiast. For Congos fans there's the added bonus of "Don't Blame on I" and "Feast of the Passover," two great cuts by the group rendered with the eerie passion of doomed spirits wailing dread prophecies in the night, and which are otherwise as rare as the cinders of the torched Black Ark. Perry's Open the Gate ♪♪♪♪½ (Trojan, 1989, prod. Lee "Scratch" Perry) is stuffed with swashbuckling Black Ark rarities and only a cut or two overlaps with Arkology. Besides the inclusion of Scratch's riveting account of the depression that eventually led him briefly into pyromania, "City Too Hot," Congos lovers will rejoice, as the double-disc collection includes a funhouse-mirror version of "Nicodemus" and two outstanding vocal performances from Watty Burnett: "Open the Gate" and "Rainy Night in Portland."

solo outings:
Congo Ashanti Roy:
Sign of the Star ♪♪♪ (Pre, 1981)
Dub X Perience ♪♪♪½ (On U Sound, 1981)
Level Vibes ♪♪♪ (Sonic Boom, 1985)
Big City ♪♪ (Red Arrow, 1994)
Light up the City ♪♪ (Jah Power, 1995)

influences:
◀◀ The Abyssinians, Lee Perry, Ras Michael & the Sons of Negus, Big Youth, Prince Lincoln Thompson, Bob Marley, the Maytals

▶▶ Adrian Sherwood, Dub Syndicate, African Headcharge, Bim Sherman, Annette Brisset, Black Uhuru, Culture, Mikey Dread, Gregory Isaacs, Jah Shaka, Linton Kwesi Johnson, Prince Allah

see also: Gregory Isaacs, the Meditations, Lee "Scratch" Perry, Ernest Ranglin, Sly & Robbie

Todd Shanker

Conjunto Alma Jarocha

Jarocho

Formed in Mexico. Based in Mexico.

Isidoro Gutiérrez Ramon, jarana, lead vocals; Tirso Velásquez Córdoba, harp; Emilio Córdoba Córdoba, jarana; Inez Rivas Herrera, jarana, lead vocals; Rufino Velásquez Córdoba, harp; Daniel Valenica, requinto. (All members are from Mexico.)

People of the fertile, naturally rich area of Mexico's main port of Veracruz are known as the jarochos. The historical role Veracruz plays as the gateway to Spain made the jarochos one of the Mexican regional groups most tied to old-world Hispanic culture. Their music was developed by nonprofessionals in the 1920s. Played mostly by full-time musicians today, it reflects the influences of Spain in its choice of instruments, language, harmonic and rhythmic framework, verse types, and song forms. But the music is definitely Mexican, forged to suit the players' own preferences. Conjunto Alma Jarocha leader Isidoro Gutiérrez Ramon was a resident of the small town of Boca del Rio, just south of Veracruz. The son of a musician, he worked as a carpenter and fisherman before following in his father's footsteps. His musical partners are neighbors, friends, or cousins from nearby towns.

what's available: Despite some severe liner-note confusion over personnel, the string and vocal performances on Conjunto Alma Jarocha: Sones Jarochos ♪♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1979/1994, prod. Chris Strachwitz, Dan Sheehy) hold a quaint charm. These are farmers, charcoal-makers, ranchers. Their confident vocals and instrumentals are practiced and polished as they draw from Spanish influences (heard particularly in the guitar playing) and Mexican call-and-response vocal style. Valencia's solo performance on "El Pajaro Carpintero" shows his masterful technique on the guitar-like requinto; he's both flamboyant and skilled, simultaneously picking melody and accompanying bass notes. Another delight is Rufino Velásquez Córdoba's fast-picked, swirling harp solo on "Siquisrí." If you haven't heard music from this part of Mexico before, it's a rare, ear-pleasing treat—especially their version of one of the oldest songs in the canon, a widely popular number you might be familiar with: "La Bamba." Should you want to sing along, Spanish-English translations are included in the 23-page liner booklet.

influences:

◀◀ Lino Carillo, Táchin Córdoba

▶▶ Ritchie Valens

Nancy Ann Lee

Conjunto Bernal

Conjunto, norteño

Formed c. 1955, in Texas, USA. Disbanded late 1970s.

Paulino Bernal, vocals, accordion; Eloy Bernal, vocals, 12-string guitar; Ruben Perez, vocals, bass, drums. (All members are from USA.)

Conjunto Bernal is considered one of the best bands in the history of Tex-Mex music. Born and raised in dire poverty in the town of Raymondville, deep in south Texas, group founder Paulino Bernal was an accomplished accordionist by the time he had to quit school in the seventh grade to help his family survive. His parents divorced and Bernal's mother moved to Kingsville, where Paulino, his brothers, and three sisters were forced into migrant farm work to support the family. Paulino's first instrument was a guitar his mother bought for the boys. Teaching himself to play, he earned enough money performing in the cantinas to help buy food for the family. Inspired by accordionists of the '40s and '50s he heard on the radio, Paulino dreamed of playing that instrument as well, and began practicing on one his friend received as a gift. His brother Eloy was given a 12-string guitar and the brothers soon launched their musical careers together in 1952, when they and a drummer friend were hired to play at a dance in a nearby town. Well-received, they were invited back repeatedly and began playing other towns in the area—including Alice, home of the influential Ideal Records, which through the recommendation of producer Armando Marroquin first recorded the band as backup session players.

The Bernals got their chance as headliners in March 1955, on a career-launching 78 rpm single that included the country song "Mujer Paseada (Traveled Woman)" on the front and the romantic bolero "Desprecio" on the flipside. Afterward, El Conjunto Bernal made numerous recordings for Ideal between 1955 and 1960. They toured the Southwest and beyond, playing to packed houses. Inspired by Arizona bandleader Pedro Bugarian, who featured El Conjunto Bernal with his orquesta, Paulino branched out from the simple ranchera style of conjunto (a name for Tex-Mex music as well as a general term for Latin ensembles) to a more sophisticated, arranged orchestral form. Around 1960 Marroquin terminated his relationship with Ideal Records, but El Conjunto Bernal remained with him as he recorded them for his new label, Nopal. The band soon relocated to McAllen in the Lower Rio Grande Valley, across the border from Mexico. Paulino began working with Victor Gonzalez, cofounding the label Bego and releasing some of Conjunto Bernal's most innovative work. In the late 1960s Paulino sold his interest in Bego to Gonzalez and founded Bernal Records, which produced many hits. However, by this time Paulino had given up performing to handle the administrative duties of show business: running the record company and hosting a regional TV music show. Other accordionists would carry on his tradition of excellence, while Paulino's problems with alcohol and drugs affected his career until 1972 when he became a born-again Christian. Clean and sober, he resumed his career as an accordionist. In the service of his faith, he started Bernal Christian Records, under which he continued to develop his style.

what to buy: Two delightful albums from the Arhoolie label, part of their Tejano Roots series, are available in the U.S. and best represent the Conjunto Bernal during their Ideal years. The biggest value is Mi Unico Camino (My Only Path) ♪♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1992, reissue prod. Chris Strachwitz). Jam-packed with 24 vocal and instrumental tracks, the album brightly showcases the talents of Conjunto Bernal's musicians. Their well-blended harmonies and happy-time melodies in the Tex-Mex tradition display the finesse of their peak recording years for Ideal, when they made hits such as "Mi Unico Camino" (a tune included here and featured as the opening song in the John Sayles film Lone Star) and "Sentimiento y Rencor." Paulino's deft accordion playing is prominently featured throughout, but is especially notable as he expertly navigates hastened polkas. Just as enjoyable are the swooping, two-step tempos of the ranchera-style songs such as "Mi Borrachera," and the nicely blended vocals on about half of the tunes. Original LP-release numbers and dates are given, but alas no lyrics or title translations. However, such omissions shouldn't detract from your enjoyment of this splendid, roots-rich music.

what to buy next: Without repeating any of the tracks from Mi Unico Camino, 16 Early Tejano Classics ♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1997, reissue prod. Chris Strachwitz) beguiles the listener with more ranchera-style songs, polkas, and boleros recorded for Ideal. Featuring the Bernal brothers with additional vocal accompaniment on some tracks, this album is an equally high-quality and engaging CD that kicks off on the first two tracks (the ranchera title tune and "Neto's Polka") with Paulino Bernal in vocal duets with singer Carmen Marroquín. Paulino's accordion prevails throughout on melodies, and while Eloy gets no solo moments in the spotlight, he provides stable rhythmic support on guitar and joins his brother for some charming vocal duets. The Bernal polkas are evocative, and their boleros—especially the catchy "Por La Misma Senda"—a jolt.

influences:

⏮ Narciso Martinez, Don Santiago Jimenez, José Alfredo Jimenez

⏭ Los Tigres del Norte, Los Cadetes del Norte, Linda Ronstadt, Vicente Fernandez, Chavela Vargas

Nancy Ann Lee

Conjunto Céspedes

Son, Afro-Cuban jazz

Formed 1981 as Trio Céspedes in Oakland, CA, USA. Based in Oakland CA, USA.

Gladys "Bobi" Céspedes (Cuba), vocals, clave; Guillermo Céspedes (Cuba), tres, piano, arranger; Jesús Díaz, percussion; Rahsaan Federicks, bass, percussion; Wayne Wallace, trombone (1991–95); Raul Navarrete, trombone; Chris Cooper, violin, guitar; Eric Rangel, timbales; Mara Fox, trombone; Julius Meléndez, trumpet; Jeff Lewis, trumpet; Oscar Soltero, bongos; Rob Holland, bass (1991–95). (All members are from USA unless otherwise noted.)

Conjunto Céspedes—a family-run Afro-Cuban dance band fronted by Gladys "Bobi" Céspedes and her brother Guillermo—were one of Oakland's best-kept secrets until they signed with Xenophile Records in 1993. Xenophile's muscle launched the band's international career, establishing Bobi as a diva to watch and Guillermo as a world-class composer and arranger. Guillermo began his musical training on the violin at age seven, while he was still in Cuba. "I was more drawn to the classical guitar," he says, "but everyone in the family played guitar, so it wasn't considered a 'real' instrument." When he was 11, Guillermo and Bobi were shipped off to the States to escape Castro's revolution. He finally revisited Cuba in 1979, and when he played some of the songs he'd been composing for friends, the reaction was so positive that he moved to Oakland to join his sister Bobi, who was already singing in Cuban folkloric groups. They started Trio Céspedes with their uncle Luis, and again the reaction was positive. Within a year, the group had added horns, percussion, and piano. "We play son, a working-class kind of dance music, but with a more African slant than many bands, although it's not a conscious part of what we do," Guillermo says. "These rhythms came from Africa, and were passed down for generations, but it's not something we think about when we play, although that connection is an important part of what we are, both as musicians as well as personally. We stay true to the folkloric brand of son and rumba, like the rhythms of los Muñequitos de Matanzas. I don't like to criticize other musicians, but the rhythms of salsa romantico are predictable. We like complicated melodies and rhythms that will challenge the dancers."

what to buy: While none of the Conjunto's albums captures the incredible energy of their concerts, Vivito y Coleando ♪♪♪♪ (Xenophile, 1995, prod. John Santos) comes closest with its deep African percussion and raw live energy.

the rest:

Una Sola Casa ♪♪♪½ (Xenophile, 1993)
Flores ♪♪♪♪ (Xenophile, 1998)

influences:

⏮ Beny Moré, Los Muñequitos de Matanzas, Arsenio Rodriquez, Celia Cruz, Los Van Van

j. poet

Ry Cooder /Buena Vista Social Club

Rock, blues, folk, worldbeat

Born March 15, 1947, in Los Angeles, CA, USA. Based in California, USA.

Ry Cooder's guitar-playing contemporaries—Jimmy Page, Jeff Beck, and Eric Clapton among them—progressed in typical directions, alternating between blues, pop, and rock as they grew older. Cooder turned instead to other civilizations, collaborating throughout the '90s with Indian musician V.M. Bhatt, West African guitarist Ali Farka Touré, and a group of Cuban artists known as the Buena Vista Social Club. Cooder, who started his career playing blues and folk songs in the early '60s, never intended to become a rock 'n' roll superstar; he slowly developed his skills and built his reputation as a thorough musicologist and reputable session musician. He was in a few bands early on, including one with soul singer Jackie DeShannon, another with fellow blues fanatic Taj Mahal (the short-lived but influential Rising Sons), and a third with the musical mad genius Captain Beefheart around 1967. (He also sat in on the Rolling Stones' Let It Bleed sessions, claiming to have come up with the famous "Honky Tonk Women" riff.) Cooder's many solo albums, particularly 1976's Chicken Skin Music and 1974's Paradise and Lunch, have a raw, refreshing sense of humor, and they're almost always rooted in '50s rockabilly and harder-than-they-sound guitar licks. Never willing to stick to one style for very long, though, Cooder's interests have lurched from said rockabilly, to Tex-Mex, to Hawaiian "slack-key" guitar music, and he's expanded his breadth with each new incarnation.

what to buy: Cooder didn't just experiment with exotic styles on Buena Vista Social Club ♪♪♪♪½ (World Circuit/Nonesuch, 1997, prod. Ry Cooder), or even incorporate them into his own music the way Paul Simon did on Graceland. Instead, he submerged himself in Cuban culture, plugging into an impeccable group of Cuban musicians including singer-guitarist Santiagueran Eliades Ochoa, singer Ibrahim Ferrer, and pianist Ruben Gonzalez. Cooder barely even gives himself top billing on the album, obviously preferring to showcase his peers' talents and the group's quality as a whole. He picked the right time to defer the spotlight, as some of the Social Club's banner members were only breaking through still-frosty U.S./Cuban relations to become Stateside stars in their '70s and '80s. This project rode the crest from a floodgate opened in that cultural wall by slightly earlier showcases for too-long silenced greats like the Afro-Cuban All-Stars, and to the delight of music lovers the tide hasn't been turned back since. The Club's triumphant follow-up, featuring most of the first disc's players but focusing on a particular virtuoso vocalist, was subsequently released as Buena Vista Social Club Presents Ibrahim Ferrer ♪♪♪♪½ (World Circuit/Nonesuch, 1999, prod. Ry Cooder). Cooder's collaborations with Bhatt on A Meeting by the River ♪♪♪♪ (Water Lily Acoustics, 1993, prod. Kavichandran Alexander) and with Touré on Talking Timbuktu ♪♪♪½ (Hannibal, 1994 prod. Ry Cooder) were his first major explorations of world music. The latter album, in a still-unsurpassed success story, reigned for 25 weeks at #1 on the Billboard world-music chart, and earned a Grammy.

what to buy next: Cooder's early solo albums are much more conventionally Western than his recent material, but many of them are impeccably played and surprisingly funny. Paradise and Lunch ♪♪♪♪½ (Reprise, 1974, prod. Lenny Waronker, Russ Titelman) includes the heartwarming "Mexican Divorce" and a fun, definitive version of "Ditty Wa Ditty." Chicken Skin Music ♪♪♪♪ (Reprise, 1976, prod. Ry Cooder) predated Simon's Graceland by incorporating Tex-Mex accordion hero Flaco Jimenez (who helps with a killer "Stand by Me") and Hawaiian slack-key guitarist Gabby Pahinui into Cooder's more American-sounding rock 'n' roll. Both Into the Purple Valley ♪♪♪½ (Reprise, 1972, prod. Lenny Waronker, Jim Dickinson), with its Johnny Cash, Woody Guthrie, and Jackie Wilson songs, and Bop till You Drop ♪♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1979, prod. Ry Cooder), with the brilliantly weird "Down in Hollywood," showcase Cooder's fun-loving history-of-rock side. The two-disc Music by Ry Cooder ♪♪♪♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1995, prod. Ry Cooder, Joachim Cooder) is a thorough collection of Cooder's movie music, so it saves you the trouble of combing through his uneven soundtrack albums.

what to avoid: Cooder's experiments and ambitions occasionally backfire, especially on the tedious Jazz ♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1978, prod. Ry Cooder, Joseph Byrd), which has interesting ideas—like a cover of the 1880 folk song "The Dream"—but nothing else to recommend it. He sounds plain bored on Get Rhythm ♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1987, prod. Ry Cooder), despite the presence of old friend Jimenez and the always-unusual Van Dyke Parks. Also not up to snuff is his solo debut, Ry Cooder ♪ (Reprise, 1970, prod. Van Dyke Parks, Ry Cooder).

the rest:
Boomer's Story ♪♪♪½ (Reprise, 1972)
Show Time ♪♪♪½ (Warner Bros., 1977)
Borderline ♪♪½ (Warner Bros., 1980)
The Slide Area ♪♪½ (Warner Bros., 1982)
Alamo Bay ♪♪ (Slash, 1985)
Blue City ♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1986)
Geronimo: An American Legend ♪♪♪½ (Warner Bros., 1993)
Trespass ♪♪♪½ (Sire, 1994)

worth searching for: Check the video stores for Wim Wenders's by-turns sensitive and sizzling documentary, Buena Vista Social Club. The film includes superb concert performances, fascinating footage of present-day Cuba, and affecting portraits of these stars' late-blooming artistic vindication. In a related note, Cooder's soundtracks go in and out of print quickly; the better collections are Paris, Texas ♪♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1984, prod. Ry Cooder), Johnny Handsome ♪♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1989, prod. Ry Cooder), The Long Riders ♪♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1980, prod. Ry Cooder), The Border ♪♪♪½ (Backstreet, 1981)—featuring interesting collaborations with John Hiatt, Freddie Fender, and the long-lost Sam Samudio—and the much-maligned Crossroads ♪♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1986, prod. Ry Cooder), a terrible movie that nonetheless features great pure-blues slide work with Cooder and fellow string enthusiast and world-music impresario David Lindley.

solo outings:
Eliades Ochoa:
Sublime Illusion N/A (Higher Octave, 1999)

Omara Portuondo:
(With Chucho Valdés) Desafíos ♪♪♪♪ (Nubenegra/Alula, 1997/1998)

influences:
⏮ Elmore James, Charlie Christian, Mississippi Fred McDowell, Tampa Red, Rolling Stones, Jimi Hendrix, Buddy Guy, Taj Mahal

Sonny Landreth, Bonnie Raitt, Rory Block, Daniel Lanois, Robbie Robertson

see also: V.M. Bhatt, Kevin Burke, the Chieftains, Ruben Gonzalez, Flaco Jimenez, Shoukichi Kina, Gabby Pahinui, Pahinui Brothers, Ali Farka Touré

Steve Knopper

Jesse Cook

New flamenco, new age

Born November 28, 1964, in Paris, France. Based in Toronto, Ontario, Canada.

Flamenco is usually thought of as an art for the mature, developed musician, but Jesse Cook began playing in the style at age three, following along with his mother's records on a toy guitar. The family lived in France and Spain when Jesse was young, and there he was exposed to an atmosphere rich in art, music, and varied cultures. Though when the family moved back to Canada Cook began formal music studies (first in Toronto, then in New York and Boston), the flamenco music of his childhood haunted him, and he returned to Spain to seek out and learn from the guitar masters of Andalusia and Cordoba. But his hybrid instincts seemed to assert themselves in contrast to whatever setting he'd place himself in; not content to become "just" a master of classical flamenco style, he returned again to Canada and found employment as a composer for dance, multimedia, and television, working in genres ranging from classical to rap. And sure enough, he then felt the pull of what would be his true love: compositions melding the structure and soul of flamenco (or, more precisely, Cook's own hybrid concept and term "rhumba flamenca") with world percussion. In a truly 20th-century development, this new flamenco music was selected to be played as background on the Canadian TV Guide Channel. Response to that exposure was so great that Cook decided to record his first album.

what to buy: Two qualities separate Cook's recordings from the pack of new flamenco artists currently filling the new-age charts: his strong melodic sense, which he uses in the service of musical adventure, and his ability and willingness to integrate technology into his work. He also continues his quest to introduce "rhumba flamenca" to other aspects of world music, assisted on Vertigo ♪♪♪♪½ (Narada, 1998, prod. Jesse Cook) by the contributions of guests like jazz vocalist Holly Cole, zydeco master Stanley Dural Jr., a.k.a. Buckwheat Zydeco, and classical cellist Ofra Harnoy. The thing that keeps Cook's music fresh and outstanding is his expansive vision of folk tradition, which is evident on his earlier albums, Tempest ♪♪♪♪ (Narada, 1995, prod. Jesse Cook) and Gravity ♪♪♪♪ (Narada, 1996, prod. Jesse Cook). He explains it this way: "Though sometimes the music produced is a completely new hybrid, my goal is always to make these unions sound so organic that they're almost familiar, as if a lost folk tradition was rediscovered."

influences:

Peter Gabriel, Al de Mieola, Paco de Lucia

see also: Buckwheat Zydeco

Kerry Dexter

Andy Cooney

Traditional Irish, country, pop, devotional

Born in Long Island, NY, USA. Based in northeastern USA and Nashville, TN, USA.

A youthful singer/songwriter with a warm, assured delivery and boyish good looks, Andy Cooney is a major attraction on the Irish-American music circuit. One of nine children and a performer at family and church gatherings from the age of five, he turned professional at 17 and fronted for Paddy Noonan's band until launching a solo career in the late '80s. Cooney's music is a lushly produced, carefully wrought synthesis of traditional Hibernian balladry, American pop, Catholic mysticism, and (lately) big-hat country. His sad and wistful self-penned tunes evoke much Irish spirituality without the compensating grace of Irish humor. Hailed by the New York Times as "Irish-America's native son," Cooney is a busy live performer who tours steadily and plays cruises, weddings, and festivals throughout the U.S.

what to buy: Cooney's latest, Irish Influence ♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1997, prod. Michael Smith, Randy Hauser), demonstrates his maturing vocal range and a new infatuation with country music. Recorded with Catherine Coates, the album's highlights are "Galway to Graceland," a Richard Thompson cover; and "Immaculate Heart," a delicate common-man prayer to the Blessed Virgin done with light country overtones. Devotees of old-school Irish sentimentality should check out Boston Rose and Other Irish Favorites ♪♪♪½ (Rego, 1989, prod. Noel Healy, Andy Cooney), which contains Cooney's stylings of songs like "Rose of Tralee," "I Will Take You Home Again, Kathleen," and "Danny Boy."

what to buy next: Cooney's collaboration with noted composer/songwriter Phil Coulter should have resulted in a better album than Home Away from Home ♪♪♪ (Rego, 1994, prod. Phil Coulter, Andy Cooney, Joanie Madden). Still, Cooney does do yeoman work with such Coulter originals as the title track and "Wait till the Clouds Roll By," and at least one couplet from "The Town I Loved So Well" ("There was music there/In the Derry air") is howlingly funny—all the more so (if a cruel, guilty pleasure) for its composer's unsuspectingly tear-jerking intentions.

the rest:

Vows, Prayers, and Promises ♪♪♪ (Rego, 1991)
A Collection of Irish Hits ♪♪♪ (Rego, 1992)
The Auld Christmas Waltz ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1996)

influences:
Phil Coulter, Garth Brooks, Bono

see also: Phil Coulter

Ron Garmon

J.P. Cormier

Cape Breton fiddle and song

Born January 23, 1969, in Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, Canada. Based in eastern Canada.

In both his words and his music, J.P. Cormier evokes the sea and the wind of his birthplace: Cape Breton, on the Atlantic coast of Canada. However, he is one of those artists who had to leave his home to find it. After a childhood learning bluegrass guitar, Cormier started playing the fiddle when he was 16. He also moved to the southern U.S. and began a successful career as a country sideman, working with some of that genre's most respected names, including Travis Tritt, Hal Ketchum, Pam Tillis, and Mark O'Connor. While living in Nashville, J.P. and his wife, noted traditional piano player Hilda Chiasson Cormier, recorded Return to the Cape, an album of Cape Breton fiddle music. It reopened a need in J.P. to express his cultural identity in music, which led him and Hilda to move back to Cape Breton. Going home enabled J.P. to further his own songwriting, and concentrate on the music he grew up with.

what's available: Cape Breton is a place where many cultures mix—French, Scots, Irish, English, and Miqmak Indian. All are concerned with wresting a living and a life from the sea, their constant challenge and companion. Though Another Morning ♪♪♪♪ (Borealis, 1997, prod. Paul Mills, Bill Garrett) is not specifically a maritime album, you can almost hear the creak of the wood and feel the salt tang of the coastal wind as you listen to Cormier's words and fiddle evoke tales of life on northern shores. There is a noteworthy guest appearance by Canadian folksinger and producer Sylvia Tyson singing harmony on "The Blackbird."

influences:
Joe Cormier, Tony Rice, Winston Fitzgerald, Chet Atkins, Doc Watson

Kerry Dexter

Sheryl Cormier

Cajun

Born March 15, 1945, in Grand Coteau, LA, USA. Based in Crowley, LA, USA.

Although Cleoma Breaux Falcon had recorded back in the 1920s, there were still no female Cajun band leaders. While it was not uncommon for women to play music at home or to know the old traditional ballads, it is only recently that a woman could both play accordion and lead a popular band. The woman who epitomizes this change is Sheryl Cormier. She was the oldest of four children and started playing the Cajun accordion at age seven. Her father, Andrew Guilbeau, was the leader of the Sunset Playboys and her mother was the drummer. Sheryl occasionally played with the group, but gave it up when she married Russell Cormier. But even after her son was born she got back to sitting in and playing a little on weekends with different bands. Her own initial band included her husband on vocals and her son Russell Jr. on drums. This is the outfit on her first album, La Reine de Musique Cadjine (The Queen of Cajun Music). Not satisfied with leading a group of male musicians, she also put together the first all-female Cajun band. Regardless of gender, her sound is that of the classic Cajun dance band and her popularity continues unabated.

what to buy: La Reine de Musique Cadjine (The Queen of Cajun Music) ♪♪♪♪ (Swallow, 1990, prod. Lee Lavergne) was Cormier's first LP, and has additional cuts added for the CD release. There's a solid dance sound and a strong Aldus Roger influence, which you can particularly hear on "Louisiana Waltz" by Roger himself. "Laccasine Special" and "Valse de Pont d'Amour" demonstrate that Cormier has the chops to handle tunes associated with the seminal Iry Lejeune. Her husband Russell shares the vocal duties with Ivy Dugas.

what to buy next: Sheryl Cormier and Cajun Sounds ♪♪♪ (Swallow, 1992, prod. Lee Lavergne) exhibits more of the real Cajun dance sound that Cormier can get out of a band. There are standards like "Bosco Stomp" and tunes with a more country sound, which is not uncommon in the repertoires of modern Cajun groups. A solid record to dance around the living room to.

influences:
Aldus Roger, Sundown Playboys, Paul Daigle

Kristi Guillory, Magnolia Sisters

see also: Joseph Falcon & Cleoma Breaux Falcon, Iry LeJeune, Aldus Roger

Jared Snyder

Cornershop

Punjabi pop

Formed 1992, in London, England. Based in London, England.

Tjinder Singh, vocals, guitar; Ben Ayres, guitar; Avtar Singh, guitar; Anthony Saffery, sitar, keyboards; Nick Simms, drums; Pete Hall, percussion. (All members are from England.)

Musical innovation these days is all about pastiche, and which styles a band chooses to blend is sometimes more critically important than how well they blend them. Illustrating this phenomena nicely is Cornershop, whose attempted fusion of Indian music (sitars, wind instruments, lyrical chants) and contemporary pop has legions of rock writers all in a tizzy. In truth, "Brimful of Asha," the band's only hit single to date, is bereft of those highly touted subcontinental soundscapes (though it does pay tribute to Asha Bhosle, diva of "Bollywood" soundtracks and darling of those same hipster critics). Cornershop does two things well: writing solid pop songs and spacing out on sitar drones. Though it's getting better at both, the group has yet to fully integrate the two ideas. Initially known more for its strong anti-racist politics than its music, Cornershop enjoyed a rise that was, at the start, a sign of the times. British pop culture was entering into a minor infatuation with Eastern culture in general (the screen adaptation of The Buddha of Suburbia aired on the BBC during the fall of 1993), creating a somewhat sympathetic ear and nurturing atmosphere. The band eventually improved enough to catch the notice of the patron saint of polyethnic music, David Byrne, who signed them to his Luaka Bop label in 1995. But in the wake of newfound outsider stardom, band leader Tjinder Singh spoke about concentrating more on a dance-music side project called Clinton. Go figure.

what to buy: When I Was Born for the 7th Time ♪♪♪½ (Luaka Bop, 1997, prod. Tjinder Singh) was a critical favorite of 1997 largely due to the unbelievable leap in tightness and tonality it took from its predecessor. The album moves nimbly between mid-fi jangle pop and polyrhythmic sitar drones, all laced with DJ scratches, synthesizer swells, and electronic dubs to mark the times. "Sleep on the Left Side" and "Brimful of Asha" are irresistible singles, and "When the Light Appears Boy" features the poetry and the voice of Allen Ginsberg. But Singh's cover of "Norwegian Wood," sung in Punjabi, is more of a novelty than a visceral experience.

what to avoid: Woman's Gotta Have It ♪½ (Luaka Bop, 1996, prod. Tjinder Singh) veers abruptly between sitar drones with Punjabi rants laid over funky rhythmic tracks, and angry lo-fi guitar rock. "Wog" gets the best of both worlds, combining great percussion with muted guitar jangles. "Looking for a Way Out" comes off like a simple, solid indie-pop song with stripped-down melodies. Most of the album's vocals are not in English.

worth searching for: Hold on It Hurts (Merge, 1995, prod. Tjinder Singh) is an out-of-print album on an independent label that shows early signs of what Cornershop would become.

influences:

⏮ George Harrison, David Byrne, the Velvet Underground

Isaac Josephson

Gal Costa

MPB (Brazilian Popular Music)

Born 1945, in Santo Amaro, Bahia, Brazil. Based in Bahia, Brazil.

With the ever-present flower at her temple, Gal Costa led her generation in discreetly questioning political authority, and became the voice of the protest songs and the offbeat poetry and psychedelia that was the Tropicalismo movement. Born in the town of Santo Amaro, Bahia, she became fast friends with schoolmates Caetano Veloso and Maria Bethânia. When Caetano met Gilberto Gil, the foursome formed a circle of intense creativity that soon had them touring Brazil as the Doces Barbaros. They played to a generation that was hungry for freedom, ignoring the censure of the military government. When Veloso and Gil were exiled, Costa interpreted the lyrics they sent home.

As a solo artist Costa sought out new songwriters and fresh ideas. She was first to discover the talent of Luiz Melodia, recorded Roberto and Erasmo Carlos, and maintained strong ties to the Jovem Guarda rock movement. Over all, though, she embraces her Bahian roots; her renditions of Dorival Caymmi's ballads and of Carnival hits like Morais Moreira's "Festa do Interior" were instant classics, and have stayed with her throughout her career. Costa's rich, unforgettable voice, with its expansive range, is at once mysterious and personable. This voice is not the understated elegance of the bossa nova divas, but an exuberant celebration of the dark and the light, the full range of emotion that is Musica Popular Brasileira. Expressing the buoyant innocence of "Baby" or the haunting remoteness of "Vapor Barato," it will never cease to electrify.

what to buy: A quick intro to Costa's music can be obtained in an album that recaps many of her greatest hits—Acustico ♪♪♪♪♪ (BMG Brazil, 1997, prod. Mazzola) is from the MTV Brazil Unplugged series, and extracts near-perfect sound from the exquisite live performance.

what to buy next: Tropical ♪♪♪♪½ (PolyGram, 1979, prod. Guilherme Araujo, Roberto Menescal) was for a long time considered her greatest album. It includes, among other crucial tracks, the chorinho dance tune "Noites Cariocas" by Jacob do Bandolim. Her older material tends to be preferable, but her recent records (often more easy to find) also provide a complex and sensitive listening experience. Sorriso do Gato de Alice ♪♪♪♪ (BMG Brazil, 1993, prod. Jaques Morelenbaum) has some wonderful ballads, including Djavan's "Serene" in English. Funk and acoustic samba alternate to give downtown dissonant touches. On Mina de Agua No Meu Canto ♪♪♪½ (BMG Brazil, 1994, prod. Arto Lindsay) Gal interprets songs by Chico Buarque and Caetano Veloso; it has sublime moments as well as some over-the-top string-section stuff. Aquele Frevo Axe ♪♪♪♪ (BMG Brazil, 1998, prod. Celso Fonseca) draws from her two main homegrown cultural influences (as the title's listing of styles suggests), Northeastern and Bahian. The title track is actually a drop-dead-beautiful samba.

Gal Costa

best of the rest:
(With Caetano Veloso) Domingo ♪♪♪♪♪ (PolyGram Brazil, 1967)
Gal ♪♪♪♪ (PolyGram Brazil, 1969)
Legal ♪♪♪♪ (PolyGram Brazil, 1970)
Fatal–Gal a Todo Vapor ♪♪♪♪½ (PolyGram Brazil, 1971)
Cantar ♪♪♪♪½ (PolyGram Brazil, 1974)
Gal Canta Caymmi ♪♪♪♪½ (PolyGram Brazil, 1975)
Doces Barbaros ♪♪♪♪½ (PolyGram Brazil, 1976)
Caras E Bocas ♪♪♪♪ (PolyGram Brazil, 1977)
Agua Viva ♪♪♪♪ (PolyGram Brazil, 1978)
Tropical ♪♪♪♪½ (PolyGram Brazil, 1979)
Aquarela do Brasil ♪♪♪½ (PolyGram Brazil, 1980)
Fantasia ♪♪♪½ (PolyGram Brazil, 1981)
Baby Gal ♪♪♪½ (PolyGram Brazil, 1983)
Profana ♪♪♪ (PolyGram Brazil, 1984)
Bem Bom ♪♪♪♪½ (BMG Brazil, 1986)
Meu Nome E Gal/My Name Is Gal ♪♪♪♪½ (Verve, 1990)
Rio Revisited ♪♪♪♪ (PolyGram Brazil, 1992)
Gal ♪♪♪ (BMG Brazil, 1992)
Lua de Mel Como o Diabo Gosta ♪♪♪ (BMG Brazil, 1994)
Brazilian Collection ♪♪♪♪½ (PolyGram Latino, 1998)

worth searching for: As rereleases get more prevalent, any of the above-mentioned albums may suddenly become more available. Definitely also watch for Gal Costa ♪♪♪♪½ (PolyGram Brazil, 1968), her first solo album. The arrangements, daring for the time, showcase a voice that is still not totally polished, but bursting with energy. India ♪♪♪♪♪ (PolyGram Brazil, 1973) was censored for Gal's skimpy clothing in the cover photo. The songs validate the folkloric in bright, sparse arrangements. Vinyl only, but it is available through the internet.

influences:
Daniela Mercury

see also: Maria Bethânia, Djavan, Gilberto Gil, Caetano Veloso

Mara Weiss, Nego Beto, and Marty Lipp

Phil Coulter

Celtic, new age, pop, easy listening

Born February, 1942, in Derry, Northern Ireland. Based in Bray, Ireland.

Arguably one of the most beloved and multidimensional musicians to emerge from Ireland, Phil Coulter has made his mark as a wide-ranging songwriter, producer, arranger, and performer. In 1965 Coulter penned his first hit, "Terry," for the Irish pop band Twinkle. He also wrote several songs for the Irish rock band Them—early musical home to a singer of some passing repute himself named Van Morrison. In the late '60s Coulter formed a writing partnership with Bill Martin and wrote perhaps his most famous work, "Puppet on a String," for nowadays not-so-famous singer Sandy Shaw. In the '70s Coulter wrote and produced several hits for Scottish bubblegum band and ex-next-Beatles the Bay City Rollers, including "Summerlove Sensation," "All of Me Loves All of You," and "Remember (Sha La La)." Notwithstanding these high-profile, low-concept endeavors, Coulter has throughout his career continued to work in the traditional Irish folk vein as well. In the '80s and '90s he recorded a slew of amazingly uniform discs that might best be called traditional Celtic new-age mood music. Well-respected behind the scenes—as producer, songwriter, and pianist—Coulter has worked with such artists as Sinéad O'Connor, Morrison, the Chieftains, the Furey Brothers, and James Galway. With the last-named he has of late been making some of his most serjous bids for authentic Irish-traditional posterity.

what to buy: Phil Coulter & His Orchestra: The Live Experience ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1996, prod. Phil Coulter) captures Coulter the entertainer at his most electric, eclectic, and indulgent. Recorded live at the Concert Hall in Limerick, Ireland, Coulter and his orchestra play an unusual MOR mix of traditional Irish folk, popular standards, and the artist's own compositions. Represented are sentimental arrangements of "The Derry Air," "The Ballad of William Bloat/I'll Tell Me Ma," and "Mo Ghile Mear." Coulter's own tunes include "The Town I Loved So Well," "Scorn Not His Simplicity," "The Old Man," and "Steal Away." In the middle of that Coulter runs through a strange medley of Henry Mancini pieces ("The Pink Panther," "Moon River," "Baby Elephant Walk") as well as Aaron Copeland's "Hoedown."

what to buy next: Celtic Horizons ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1996, prod. Phil Coulter) is only one of several Coulter collections (see below) that spotlight his cozy interpretations of traditional music, be it Irish, Scottish, American, or some derivation thereof. Here the tunes are Irish and include "Planxty Irwin," "Tears on the Heather," "The Road to Glenaan," and "Toward the Mist."

the rest:

Scottish Tranquility ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1984)
Sea of Tranquility ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1984)
Christmas ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1985)
Classic Tranquility ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1989)
Serenity ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1989)
Forgotten Dreams ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1989)
Words and Music ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1990)
Peace and Tranquility ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1990)
Touch of Tranquility ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1992)
Recollections ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1993)
American Tranquility ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1994)
Celtic Collections ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1997)
(With James Galway) Legends ♪♪♪½ (BMG/RCA Victor, 1997)
(With James Galway) Winter's Crossing ♪♪♪♪ (BMG/RCA Victor, 1998)

influences:

Irish traditional music, Tin Pan Alley, the Clancy Brothers

Planxty, the Furey Brothers, Van Morrison, Sinéad O'Connor, the Chieftains

see also: Andy Cooney, James Galway

Andrew BeDell

Coupé Cloué

Cuban-influenced compas

Born Jean Gesner Henri, c. 1925, in Haiti. Died January 29, 1998, in Port-au-Prince, Haiti.

During a remarkable career as a professional soccer player, Jean Gesner Henri earned the nickname Coupé Cloué, which translates roughly as "cut and nail," a tribute to his speed and prowess. After his soccer-playing days were over, his guitar-playing and singing days began, with Trio Sélect. Coupé Cloué took the dance-band compas direct style of the popular Nemours Jean-Baptiste and compacted it by using more percussion and no horns, creating some of the most African-sounding music to come out of the Caribbean. During the rule of the Duvaliers, he delivered many sly messages about the life of the average Haitian that made him a hero of the common people, despite his also being a favorite of the tontons macoutes (when the police asked you to play, you played). With his shaved head and regal bearing, he became known as Roi Coupé, the king of compas. More acoustic and tropical than later artists who followed his lead, Coupé Cloué's music remains very popular with older Haitians—and anyone with a sense of history.

what to buy: L'Essentiel ♪♪♪♪ (Mini, 1990, prod. Fred Paul) is full of acknowledged classics like "Fem'm Kolokinte" and other characteristic loping jams with the long spoken-word sections that wryly and ribaldly endeared him to Creole speakers (and will make you wish you were one if you aren't already).

what to buy next: Et Ensemble Sélect ♪♪♪½ (Mini, 1998, prod. Fred Paul) sounds almost Cuban at times, with a strong line of rumba accentuated by hand drums and intricate call-and-response vocals. Just try to keep from moving when this one's on!

best of the rest:
The Preacher ♪♪♪ (Mini, 1989)
The World of Coupé Cloué ♪♪♪ (Mini, 1991)
Absolument ♪♪♪ (Mini, 1997)
Back to Roots: Le Roi Coupé En Cote D'Ivoire ♪♪♪ (Mini, 1998)

worth searching for: Most of the material on the English import Maximum Compas from Haiti ♪♪♪♪ (Earthworks, 1992, prod. various) is on the albums listed above—but not necessarily in the same versions. A rewarding listen, compiled with the label's signature care.

influences:
◀◀ Nemours Jean-Baptiste
▶▶ Rara Machine

see also: Nemours Jean-Baptiste

Hank Bordowitz

Coyote Oldman

International flute

Formed 1981, in Oklahoma City, OK, USA. Based in USA.

Michael Allen, flute, composer; Barry Stramp, flute, composer, engineer. (Both members are from USA.)

The duo Coyote Oldman began when Michael Allen met Barry Stramp at a crafts fair in Oklahoma, before widespread demand for Native flute music had been sparked by the recordings of R. Carlos Nakai and Kevin Locke. To pool their shared musical interests they formed the group, the name of which is a transposition of that of a Native American trickster spirit, Oldman Coyote. Allen had studied ancient Native flutes in museums and often built his own, while Stramp was experienced not only in traditional flute but also electronic processing of music. Both men have studied and performed on other kinds of flutes as well, including the Japanese shakuhachi. While they still often employ flute styles of other regions, their work as Coyote Oldman is Native American-based. Allen is the traditionalist, often performing on decades-old instruments, while Stramp will manipulate the sound electronically to add another dimension to the duo's work. Stramp has also recorded a solo album and played with the group Satori, in which he performs on Eastern styles of flute.

what to buy: In Beauty I Walk: The Best of Coyote Oldman ♪♪♪♪ (Hearts of Space, 1997, prod. Coyote Oldman) gathers past and current explorations by the duo, with a strong selection of Native American-flavored tunes. There's also a collaboration with Chinese singer Hui Cheng, and a percussion-driven electronic meditation performed on bass flutes—which, as the most recent track on the album, may suggest the direction of the band's next experiment.

the rest:
Tear of the Moon ♪♪♪ (Coyote Oldman, 1987)
Landscape ♪♪♪ (Coyote Oldman, 1988)
Thundercloud ♪♪♪½ (Hearts of Space, 1990)
In Medicine River ♪♪♪½ (Coyote Oldman, 1992)
Compassion ♪♪♪ (Perfect Pitch, 1993)
The Shape of Time ♪♪♪ (Coyote Oldman, 1995)

influences:
◀◀ Ancient Native American flute builders ▶▶ Cuzco

Kerry Dexter

Steven Cragg

Worldbeat, didgeridoo, trance music

Born in Brighton, Sussex, England. Based in England.

Steven Cragg notes that "I do not especially consider myself a musician, but more of a collager of sound." His earliest musical experiences included banging drums around a campfire; he tried playing sitar but "it had too many notes." He now performs primarily on didgeridoo—the ancient Aboriginal Australian tubular drone instrument easily mistakable for a synthesizer—"with percussion and a variety of studio instruments thrown in for good measure." Cragg has been playing the "didg" for 10 years, drawing inspiration from investigations into indigenous spirituality, the paranormal, and aboriginal world culture; this has included living in a cave in the French Pyrennees—considered sacred sites steeped in Cathar and Templar history—for three months. Cragg regularly visits other such sites around the world to "absorb the magic that is," playing his didgeridoo "to invoke the spirits." While busking on European street corners in the late 1980s Cragg produced two homespun demos of his didg improvisations, leading to many festival, stage, radio, and television appearances. Since emerging from obscurity, Cragg has organized the internationally recognized Glastonbury Festival's Didgeridoo Convention for four consecutive years, with participation growing from five to over 70 players; he helpfully reports that "last year, the stage was bending under the combined weight of us all . . . and was wet from dribble too!" Cragg quips that he used to rave a lot, but since the scene has died down in the U.K. he has to make his own scenes. Many contemporary dance groups have used his music to accompany performances, and Cragg has contributed his talents to an ad shown in British movie theaters that benefits the nonprofit anti-fur group Lynx. He tours constantly as a solo act and, with frequent collabora-

craobh rua

tor Phil Thornton, has performed at the Isle of Man's Greenpeace Week celebration. His good works include participation in other nonprofit concerts and recordings; a percentage of his royalties from the Tibetan Horn album is contributed to Tibetan people's organizations. He has also performed in crop circles at the request of internationally renowned circle-phenomena investigators, noting that "I ended up making corn cookies" as a result of trying to duplicate the complicated grain patterns through sonic vibrations produced on the didg. Crossing over to music as therapy, he has given didgeridoo sound massages, "which are also powerful to receive . . . a completely different experience of the instrument." To help promote awareness and understanding of the potential of his chosen instrument, Cragg presents countless demonstrations and workshops to both adults and children around the world.

what to buy: Cragg explains that "didgeridoo playing means that one is constantly chanting, performing an aspect of [the spiritual concept of] 'pranayama' and being vibrated down to a cellular level along with the hypnotic sound we all love. The didg is a voicebox that amplifies who you are." Nowhere is this more evident than on Cragg's solo debut, Discovery ♪♪♪♪ (New World Music, 1997, prod. Steven Cragg). On it he utilizes Australian didgeridoo, Tibetan horn and crystal bowls, African talking drum, Native American rainmaker, a variety of Asian gongs and bells, other ethnic percussion, and minimal electronics to sound-sculpt a compelling and transcendent aural excursion into the ancient future. Punctuated with aboriginal chant by the Bayaka Pygmy peoples of Africa, the sheer variety of tones and rhythmic patterns Cragg produces from a termite-hollowed tree branch are amazing in their own right, let alone in comparison to the synthesized sounds they readily recall. The song "Summerstreams" begins with slow galactic waveforms and liquid-toned cycles that gradually transmute into a consciousness-expanding tool of unparalleled proportions; unbelievably as it seems, this track was created solely on the didg. Finally, let's not forget Discovery's trippy cover art; a friend suggested it looked like Cragg was taking a hit from the biggest bong in the world—but it's a giant didgeridoo!

what to buy next: Early in his career Cragg was invited to participate on Thornton's Initiation ♪♪♪ (New World Music, 1990, prod. Phil Thornton), and the duo's resulting chemistry sparked a series of shared projects, including the international best-selling album Tibetan Horn ♪♪♪♪ (New World Music, 1992, prod. Phil Thornton). After its release, Tibetan Horn was turned into a performance-art theater show which ran in London from 1993–94; at another end of the cultural spectrum, several tracks from the album helped launch the 1994 Spring-Summer Flyte Ostell collection during British Fashion Week festivities. Sure to enthrall but as-yet unavailable for review, Cragg's second solo outing, En-Trance (New World Music, 1999, prod. Steven Cragg), features deep trance rhythms from around the world interpreted for didgeridoo and ethnic instruments.

worth searching for: The two 1990 self-released demos that Cragg first used to catch the ear of musical powers-that-be, Tales of the Eucalyptus Tree and Chant of the Eucalyptus, are worth discovering by you, too.

influences:

- Steven Kent, Peter Gabriel "and all of his RealWorld recordings"
- British techno, jungle, and ambient

PJ Birosik

Craobh Rua

Irish traditional

Formed 1985, in Belfast, Northern Ireland. Based in Belfast, Northern Ireland.

Brian Connolly, banjo; Desy McCabe, uilleann pipes, whistles (1985–91); Michael Cassidy, fiddle (1986–present); Frankie Totten, guitar, vocals (1986–89); Jim Byrne, guitar, vocals (1989–97); Jim Delaney, bodhrán (1989–91); Mark Donnelly, uilleann pipes, whistles (1992–97); Diarmaid Moynihan, uilleann pipes, whistles (1997–99); Patrick Davey, flute, uilleann pipes, whistles (1999–present); Aaron Jones, bouzouki, guitar, vocals (1997–present). (All members are from Ireland.)

Craobh Rua started life as a duo in the mid-1980s in Belfast, and by the time their first album appeared at the start of the '90s, they had expanded to feature a classic mix of pipes, whistle, fiddle, banjo, mandolin, vocal, guitar, and bodhrán (Irish frame drum). They were very much in the mold of some of the Irish traditional supergroups of the '60s and '70s, and their youth, energy, passion, and feeling for the material gained them a sizable following far from home, especially in Scotland, Brittany, and Italy. Within a few years they had also cracked some of the main festival circuits in the USA. By carefully pacing their development—an approach born of both artistic discretion and persistent day jobs—Craobh Rua turned out three further albums of stellar piping, fiddling, and banjo picking on a fine array of instrumentals and songs, mostly in Irish with the occasional Scots item thrown in for good measure. Jim Byrne's warm, engaging vocals and guitar seemed effortless and perfectly complemented the instrumental work. Following the release of their fourth album in 1997, the band's extensive activities were putting increasing demands on members' time, and both Byrne and piper Donnelly bowed out. Singer Aaron Jones (ex-Seelyhoo) and Cork piper/composer Diarmaid Moynihan soon joined Connolly and Cassidy to reconstitute the quartet. If Craobh Rua can maintain the musical authority it established for itself during the '90s, it deserves to be one of the better-known Irish acts in the business.

what to buy: Both Soh It Is ♪♪♪♪ (BTB/Lochshore, 1997, prod. Brian Connolly, Jim Byrne) and the wonderfully titled No Matter How Cold & Wet You Are as Long as You're Warm & Dry ♪♪♪♪ (BTB/Lochshore, 1995, prod. Brian Connolly, Jim Byrne) are superb examples of an Irish style somewhere between the Chieftains (way back when they were still passionate) and the Bothy Band, with consummate Dubliners-influenced banjo and Andy Irvine-reminiscent vocals as the icing on the cake. The recording and production are also first rate.

what to buy next: The More That's Said the Less the Better ♪♪♪ (BTB/Lochshore, 1992, prod. Brian Connolly, Jim Byrne) and Not a Word about It ♪♪♪ (BTB, 1990) provide more of the same, with perhaps a little less polish and maturity.

worth searching for: The band also appears on the early '90s albums The Shetland Sessions Vol. I (Lismor) and The Shetland Sessions Vol. II (Lismor).

influences:

⏮ The Dubliners, the Chieftains, Planxty, the Bothy Band

John C. Falstaff

Crasdant

Welsh traditional

Formed 1998, in Wales. Based in Wales.

Robin Huw Bowen (England), triple harp; Andy McLauchlin (England), flute, whistle, pibgorn (Welsh hornpipe); Stephen Rees (Wales), fiddle, accordion, whistle, pibgorn; Huw Williams (Wales), acoustic guitar, stepping.

Crasdant is a new folkloric supergroup that sees legendary triple harp ambassador Robin Huw Bowen and guitarist Huw Williams team up with longtime North Wales resident Andy McLauchlin and former Ar Log member Stephen Rees for lyrical and articulate all-instrumental explorations of traditional Welsh music. A good part of their mission is to help highlight the virtues of instrumental music in a market so often dominated by singers. Williams—best known outside Wales as part of a singer-songwriter partnership with brother Tony that has supplied English folk-rock heavyweights Fairport Convention and many others—is also a leading exponent of Welsh step dancing, being the author of the only book in print on the subject, and here he lets his feet as well as fingers do the talking. Rees is a lecturer in music at the University of Wales in Bangor, and McLauchlin has been playing in local folk and dance bands for years. The group is a welcome addition to the growing ranks of artists who succeed in artfully blending step-dance with music, both on stage and in the studio.

what's available: Crasdant ♪♪♪♪ (Sain, 1999, prod. Bryn Jones, Crasdant) is a true delight: lovely lacey textures of harp, accordion, flute, whistle, and fiddle interweave effortlessly around a fine collection of hornpipes, marches, slip jigs, and slow airs, occasionally augmented by sprightly step dancing. Grace and charm are the order of the day here, and great notes are provided on the tunes, which is hardly surprising considering the scholarship of the bandmembers.

influences:

⏮ Ar Log, Kevin Burke's Open House

see also: Ar Log, Robin Huw Bowen

John C. Falstaff

Elvis Crespo

Merengue, salsa, tropical, Latin dance

Born July 30, 1971, in New York, NY, USA. Based in Puerto Rico.

Elvis Crespo was born in New York City, but so much of his time since has been spent in Puerto Rico that he recently found it wise to take brush-up English lessons as his star began rising in the international market. Crespo first performed as a member of the popular Grupo Mania. Now, as a solo artist during a Stateside "Latin pop" boom that has many Spanish-speaking or bilingual stars moving more toward English vocals, Crespo has set sales records internationally with original songs performed entirely in Spanish. Many of these buyers are Spanish speakers, of course, but others who don't understand the lyrics respond to the driving merengue/salsa blend of the melodies. Recently he recorded a Spanglish version of his hit song "Suavamente" for the soundtrack of the U.S. film Dance with Me (because, Crespo says, that's the way the kids talk these days), and more English-language excursions seem to be in his future. Either way, that future seems to be bright.

what's available: Pintame ♪♪♪½ (Sony, 1999, prod. Luis A. Cruz) and Suavamente ♪♪♪½ (Sony, 1998, prod. Luis A. Cruz) are lively snapshots of Crespo's original, merengue-based style, and he gets songwriting credit for all the songs on both albums. Club dance remixes with accentuated bass, performed in a slightly slower tempo than traditional Latin merengue, have been done for Suavamente and are likely in the offing for Pintame as well. The soundtrack album Dance with Me ♪♪♪ (Sony, 1998, prod. various) also provides a different look at Crespo's music.

influences:

⏮ Grupo Mania

Kerry Dexter

1/8/4 andrew cronshaw

Andrew Cronshaw

Anglo-Celtic/international fusion

Born April, 18, 1949, in Lytham St. Annes, Lancashire, England. Based in London, England.

Andrew Cronshaw is a true renaissance man. First, he records and tours in his own right as a virtuoso adept in the instruments of many lands, including electric and acoustic chord zithers, marovantele, kantele, gu-cheng, clavichord, flutes, ba-wu, concertina, whistle, shawm, and steel pans. (This instrumental diversity has its stylistic counterpart on his albums, which feature distinctive and radical reworkings of traditional material from England, Scotland, Ireland, Galicia [the Celtic area of Spain], and Finland.) Second, he is a coveted accompanist, having guested on sessions for albums by Suede, B.J. Cole, Scott Walker, Pascal Gaigne, and D. Hall & Rain. Third, he's appeared on the soundtracks for G.I. Jane and The Dybbuk of the Holy Apple Field. And last but not least, he's also developed an excellent reputation as a producer, with credits including Abyssinians by June Tabor; The Wild West Show by English singer-songwriter Bill Caddick of Home Service; No More to the Dance by the Silly Sisters (Tabor and Maddy Prior); and The Man in the Moon Drinks Claret by Pyewackett. But it doesn't stop even there. Cronshaw's musical work—particularly his attendant exploration of several regions' folk traditions—has led him down yet another avenue: journalism. He's contributed to the required-reading English magazines Folk Roots and Gramaphone, and has completed the Nordic, Portuguese, and Baltic sections for the second edition of the highly regarded Rough Guide to World Music. In the '90s Cronshaw developed an especial interest in Finland, producing albums by two Finnish artists, Salamakannel and Nikolai Blad, and using several Finnish musicians on his own 1993 recording The Language of Snakes. Cronshaw has begun work on his next CD, which will consist entirely of Finno-Ugrian material (that body of culture including parts of Hungary and Russia as well as Finland), and is being recorded in the country which has of late inspired him so much.

what's available: The Language of Snakes ♪♪♪♪♪ (Special Delivery, 1993, prod. Andrew Cronshaw) is filled with Cronshaw's distinctive arrangements of tunes from various traditions. He uses unusual combinations of instruments, and changes original rhythms to create his unique musical visions. For example, "Baile de Procesion" (from Galicia) starts off with a shimmering zither, then the bass clarinet joins in while fiddles fill out the middle. Harmonica adds yet another texture to the overall mix. Very atmospheric. Cronshaw gets funky with the clavichord on the Scottish piece "Do Chrochaidh A Thoill Thu" while sprightly fiddle and bass clarinet wail away in unison! There's also a simple but beautiful arrangement of the Irish air "Apple Praties" wherein Cronshaw plays the main melody on whistle and is backed by Ric Sanders on violins. The helpfully titled The Andrew Cronshaw CD ♪♪♪♪♪ (Topic, 1989, prod. Andrew Cronshaw, Gary Lucas) compiles the entire The Great Dark Water LP and all but two tracks of Till the Beasts Returning, thus preserving two fine but rare albums. This set proves that Cronshaw's approach, while adding new influences over the years, has remained consistent. Again you'll find unusual arrangements of traditional source material, such as the radical version of "The Blacksmith," which is basically a theme-and-variations treatment of the song's main melody line. Tempos shift, different instruments carry the tune, and there's a wild passage where the principal theme is played by zither and fiddle while a piano adds rhythm accents. You'll find no other version of "The Blacksmith" like this, guaranteed!

influences:

- Robert Fripp, Brian Eno, the Chieftains, Alan Stivell, numerous traditional folk sources
- Loreena McKennitt

see also: Home Service, Maddy Prior

Ken Roseman

Celia Cruz

Salsa

Born in Havana, Cuba. Based in Cuba, Mexico, and USA.

Celia Cruz is the quintessential singer in her genre, considered by many to be the "Queen of Salsa," a feminine icon in a notoriously macho field. She has been performing for well over four decades, but just how many years past those two-score is a matter that remains Cruz's well-guarded secret. Her voice transcends age, however, and while not quite as flexible in the 1990s as it was during her artistic heyday in the early '50s, Cruz has proven that she still carries surprising vocal power. In 1950 Cruz became the lead singer for la Sonora Matancera, one of the leading Cuban orchestras of the day. This was the start of her "classic" period, when she was cementing her reputation as the most popular female singer in Cuba. Her recordings from the time she spent with that band (until 1965) were originally released through Seeco Records and some have been reissued through Palladium and PolyGram Latino. It was also during her tenure with Sonora Matancera that Cruz and the band left Cuba for a tour that never made it back to their homeland, applying for residency in the U.S. when they were able to secure a long-term gig at the Hollywood Palladium. Ironically, Cruz fell somewhat from commercial favor from the mid-1960s through the early '70s as her audience turned to newer Latin styles like bugálu. But by the mid-1970s she was making the climb back into popularity, with a performance at Carnegie Hall in 1973 and a series of releases with Johnny Pacheco that were big sellers in the Hispanic community. By the late 1980s her role as "Queen of Salsa" was the real deal. She received an honorary doctorate in music from Yale in 1989, and her album with Ray Barretto Ritmo en el Corazón won a Grammy Award in 1990, the same year her star appeared on the Hollywood Walk of Fame. Continuing the high profile since, she has also been seen in the films The Mambo Kings and The Perez Family. Cruz's later albums on RMM still carry some Latin-jazz punch, but in general they target salsa fans—and in her case there are as many to be targeted as ever.

what to buy: Canciones Premiadas ♪♪♪♪½ (Palladium, 1994) is a collection of Cruz's classic performances with la Sonora Matancera, originally released on Seeco. She is in marvelous voice and the band is an amazingly flexible instrumental ensemble. Certain aspects of the music may sound dated but, to keep things in perspective, so do the early Ella Fitzgerald sides with Chick Webb—which don't have nearly as much raw power and assurance as is heard from this top Latin act at the height of its popularity. Cruz has managed to remain the ruling diva of salsa by changing her style just enough to accommodate the latest recording techniques and keep pace with the younger singers in today's market. Irrepetible ♪♪♪♪ (RMM, 1994, prod. Willy Chirino) was a 1996 Grammy nominee for Best Tropical Latin Performance, and is a pretty good sample of Cruz's recent recordings. The material is more pop-oriented in some ways, but the musicians and arrangers working with her are more than capable of making Cruz sound contemporary without dampening the vocal fire that makes her "The Queen." The rhythm riffs on "La Guagua" and "Cuando Cuba Se Ababe de Liberar" still have the deep Afro-Cuban roots that no amount of production work can weaken. Recorded between 1951 and 1965, 100 Percent Azucar: The Best of Celia Cruz con la Sonora Matancera ♪♪♪♪♪ (Rhino, 1997, prod. Rogelio Martinez) covers roughly the same time period as Canciones Premiadas ♪♪♪♪½ (1994, Palladium), but, due to Rhino/Atlantic's wide distribution network, is more likely to be found in stores. The former's sonics have been well mastered and it includes more material, another reason some listeners may turn to this collection as a primer for Cruz. The liner notes by Nina Lenart (who coproduced the compilation with Alan Geik from the original sides by Martinez) are informative. Another recent album by the Queen, Mi Vida Es Cantar ♪♪♪♪ (RMM, 1998, prod. Isidro Infante), leads off with a blast and settles into a high-speed—forgive the pun—cruise. It simmers and rocks with nary a note hinting of the Social Security payments the singer might be receiving. Timbales player Luisito Quintero is magnificent throughout, as are the arrangements of producer/pianist Infante.

what to buy next: La Dinamica Celia Cruz ♪♪♪½ (Palladium, 1991) features yet more material from the Seeco vaults with Sonora Matancera accompanying Cruz. From the first song ("Tamborilero"), this album is a primer on Afro-Cuban rhythms, with mambos, rumbas, merengues, sones, and even a cha-cha-cha generating heat. The sound is a bit cheesy but the music is loads of fun. Cruz swears she's a devout Roman

chinese classical music

China's classical music is significant for its long heritage (some 3,000 years), its austere beauty, and its radical differences from Western orchestral music. Unfortunately, it is also characterized by its increasing absence, as the generations alive prior to the cultural purges of 1911 and 1949 pass away. The introduction of European scales and the standardization of the music, along the lines of the Russian forms to which China once looked to "modernize" its orchestras, have sped up the demise of a vast and precious art.

What does remain of the indigenous version may jar on ears unfamiliar with the pentatonic scale, odd time signatures, and different pitches. Unlike the Western pursuit of dense harmonies and instrumental interplay, the Chinese perform as a group of individuals. Each player tells a musical story. They improvise and explore subtle timbres and pitches, adding their own idiosyncratic embellishments to traditional compositions. Typical instruments include variations on the qin (Chinese zither) and dizi (bamboo flute), and large percussion ensembles. Previously supported by royalty, classical musicians are now paid by the state and provided steady university jobs. Good examples of their work are offered by China: Time to Listen ♪♪♪♪ (ellipsis arts . . . , 1998) and The Hugo Masters: An Anthology of Chinese Classical Music ♪♪♪♪♪ (Celestial Harmonies, 1992) (each reviewed in this book's Compilations section), and a variety of collections on the French label Ocora.

Opera has had an easier time surviving, despite a mere eight operas—or ballets—being permitted performance between 1966 and '76, the years of the "cultural revolution." Opera is popular enough that the Chinese enjoy reciting their favorite excerpts. An extensive repertoire and hundreds of regional styles exist, the most famous being that of Beijing.

David Poole

joe cuba

Celia Cruz

Catholic but she somehow recorded Homenaje a los Santos ♪♪♪½ (PolyGram Latino, 1994), an album for Seeco that uses texts from the Afro-Cuban Santería faith in praise of the various Orishas (deities). It's an aural curiosity that works, because recognizing the basic Yoruba rhythms behind the music is the ticket to a fuller understanding of Latin jazz and salsa. Pairing Cruz with other Latin music superstars is a commercial no-brainer, but Duets ♪♪♪♪ (RMM, 1997, prod. Ralph Mercado) succeeds artistically too, and reflects positively on the professionalism and creativity of all involved. Guests include Willie Colon, Tito Puente, Oscar D'Leon, and Johnny Ventura, but the most interesting twists combine Cruz with the Hispanic rock group Los Fabulosos Cadillacs ("Vasos Vaclos") and Brazilian singer/ songwriter Caetano Veloso ("Soy Loco por ti America").

best of the rest:

(With Ray Barretto) Ritmo en el Corazón ♪♪♪½ (Fania/Charly, 1988)
The Best of Celia Cruz ♪♪♪½ (Sony, 1994)
Las Guaracheras de la Guaracha ♪♪♪ (PolyGram Latino, 1994)
Mi Llaman la Reina (They Call Me the Queen) ♪♪♪ (Laserlight, 1996)
Fania All-Stars with Celia Cruz ♪♪♪½ (Sony, 1997)

influences:

◀◀ Graciela

▶▶ Gloria Estefan, India

see also: Ray Barretto, Willie Colon, Oscar D'Leon, Wyclef Jean, Los Fabulosos Cadillacs, Johnny Pacheco, Patato, Tito Puente, Caetano Veloso

Garaud MacTaggart

Joe Cuba

Mid-century Cuban-American dance pop

Born Gilberto Calderon, 1931, in New York, NY, USA. Based in USA.

Joe Cuba led a Cuban jazz sextet in New York in the late 1950s, recording several best-sellers based on the arrangements of Nick Jimenez and fueled by the vocals of Cheo Feliciano. The vibraphone was the group's dominant instrument as they played danceable mambo and bolero sounds identified with the preeminent New York Latin music of the decade.

what's available: Joe Cuba Sextet ♪♪♪ (Tico) may be difficult to find, but it's an authentic example of the group's typical—and very popular—sound.

influences:
Tito Puente, Eddie Palmieri

Kerry Dexter

Cuba L.A.

Salsa

Formed 1998, in Los Angeles, CA, USA. Based in Los Angeles, CA, USA.

Danilo Lozano, flute, director; Luis Conte, congas; Harry Kim, trumpets; Raymundo Olivera, trumpet; Carlos Puerto, bass; Orestes Vilato, timbales; Ilmar Gavilan, violin; Alberto Salas, piano; Mitch Sanchez, bongos. (Members are from Cuba and USA.)

"The richness of Cuban music is in the rhythm, and the basis of the rhythm is the drum," says Danilo Lozano, flautist and "leader" of the sessions that produced Cuba L.A. Unlike many salsa albums recorded primarily for the Anglo market, the percussion on this work is way out front, putting timbalero Orestes Vilato, bongero Mitch Sanchez, and conguero Luis Conte on an equal footing with the rest of the band. "When Narada contacted me about this project, they said they wanted it done 'live,'" Lozano says. "Which is what we did." Lozano picked compositions everyone knew, and inspiration flowed freely throughout the short, three-day session. "What was most affecting to me is that we had three generations of Cubans and Cuban Americans, guys who have lived here all their lives and guys who just came over in the last couple of years, and we made beautiful music, each of us probing the roots in our own way."

Lozano's own roots go deep. His father, Rolando Lozano, recorded with Orquesta Aragon in the '50s, and after coming to the U.S. played with Tito Puente, Mongo Santamaria, and Cal Tjader. Lozano Jr. is a musician, musicologist, folklorist, and teacher of ethnomusicology at Whittier College in L.A., balancing his playing with his day job. "It's important to remember the contribution of folkloric and popular artists is not less important than the music conceived for the concert hall. Cuban culture is extremely musical. There is popular dance music, but there's also folkloric forms, guitar music, a whole panorama of regional and local styles that have emerged and developed, many of them in danger of dying out. With musical education programs taking the beating they're taking at present, it's important to be at an institution of higher learning, so I can give something back to the community, and help preserve the roots for the next generation."

what's available: "We were all in the studio together, and there were no arrangements, just a pure descarga [jam session]," Lozano recalls of the charged sessions which produced Cuba L.A. ♪♪♪♪½ (Narada, 1998, prod. Danilo Lozano, Rich Denhart). "Sometimes we'd start with an idea, like on 'El Manisero,' which is led by Llmar Gavilan [on violin]. Nobody's ever played violin on that before, so he took the lead and we all followed. And on 'Almendra' we tuned Luis Conte's congas so he could play the melody as well as the rhythm. It's a danzon [dance number], but we dropped the introduction and went right into the montuno [call-and-response] section." The sweet, swingin', non-stop jam session he's describing is well-captured on Cuba L.A., which should put to rest the notion that L.A.'s salsa scene is in any way softer than New York's.

influences:
Orquesta Aragon, Tito Puente, Mongo Santamaria

see also: Orquesta Aragon, Tito Puente, Mongo Santamaria

j. poet

¡Cubanismo!

Afro-Cuban jazz, son

Formed 1995, in Havana, Cuba. Based in London, England, and Havana, Cuba.

Rotating recording and touring lineups which have included: Jesús Alamañy, trumpet, arranger; Alfredo Rodríguez, piano; Tata Guines, percussion; Miguel Aurelio Diaz, percussion; Orlando Valle, flute; Carlos Puerto Jr., bass; Efraim Rios, tres, coros; Jorge Luis Rojas, lead vocals; Yosvany Terry Cabrera, sax; Emilio Del Monte, timbales; Carlos Alvarez, trombone; Carlos Godines, percussion; Leonardo Castellini, sax; Luís Alamañy Jr., trumpet; Luis Varzaga, coros; Julian Oviedo, bongos; Manuel Mirabal, trumpet; Roberto Guillot, percussion; Dave Pattman, bongos; Fernando Ferrer, lead vocals; Rolo Martinez, lead vocals; Adalberto Lara, trumpet; Youre Muñiz, trumpet; Ignacio Herrera, piano; Sergio Luna Longchamp, trombone; Alfredo Thomson, tenor sax; César López, alto sax; Pancho Amat, tres, coros; Adalberto Hernandez, bongos; Tómas Ramoz Ortiz, congas; Yaura Muñiz, trumpet; Javier Zalba, sax, baritone sax; Fernando Juan de la Cruz, lead vocals; Lázaro Miguel Rodriguez, coros; Manuel Rojas, coros; Davide Giovannini, coros; Félix Baloy Jr., coros. (All members are from Cuba.)

Jesús Alamañy, arranger and leader of ¡Cubanismo!, has been playing trumpet since he was a child; he studied at Cuba's Conservatorio Amadeo Roldan at 13 and joined the brass section of Sierra Maestra, the group credited with invigorating the traditional Cuban son, at 16. "I learned to play traditionally with Lazaro Herera, the oldest trumpeter in Cuba, and already had a lot of experience in nonprofessional bands, so I was not intimidated," Alamañy says. For over a decade his fiery trumpet was part of the Sierra Maestra sound, and their popularity awakened a new generation of Cuban musicians to their musical heritage. "Sierra Maestra was both classical and nostalgic," Alamañy explains. "The son is the root of Cuban music, but it had been forgotten. We kept the original ideas and rhythms, but opened it up, creating a new era of dancing music." In 1992 Alamañy left Sierra Maestra and Cuba to pursue his own music in London. In December of '94, he organized a descarga (jam session) in Paris for conga legend Patato Valdez, inviting the cream of Cuba's session players. Hannibal Records head Joe Boyd attended and was impressed enough to invite Alemañy to produce a descarga in Havana; the sessions were recorded and became the first iCubanismo! album. It was so successful that Alamañy was able to take most of the band on the road, where—between subsequent triumphant albums and member-shufflings—they've been searing dance floors and blowing minds ever since.

what to buy: Of Jesús Alamañy's iCubanismo! ♪♪♪♪♪ (Hannibal, 1996, prod. Joe Boyd) Alamañy remembers, "The recording was all acoustic, to achieve the traditional sound of the son-montuno, guaracha-son and other traditional styles. Although we had never played together before, and didn't have time to rehearse, we worked like a family from the first." Alamañy arranged the tunes, but left room for his bandmates to shine, with the percussive attack of pianist Alfredo Rodriquez and Carlos Puerto Jr.'s staccato bass lines particular standouts. "I had a sound that had been in my head since I was a child," Alamañy says. "A balance of what's happening on the street with the rhythmic, harmonic, and melodic strengths of my Cuban cultural identity." The recorded result is blazing musicianship from start to finish, with three generations of Cuban masters.

what to buy next: The band's third outing, Reencarnacion ♪♪♪♪♪ (Hannibal, 1998), kicks off with a searing percussion-driven cover of Electro Rosell's "El Plantanal de Bartolo" and never lets up. The two descargas "Jamming in Nijmegen" and "En Las Delicias" show the band at its fiery best, but there isn't a single weak track in the set.

the rest:
Malembe ♪♪♪♪½ (Hannibal, 1997)

influences:
⏮ Harry James, Maynard Ferguson, Septeto Nacional, Sierra Maestra, Son 14, Beny Moré

see also: Patato, Sierra Maestra

j. poet

Culture

Roots reggae

Formed 1975, in Kingston, Jamaica. Based in Kingston, Jamaica.

Joseph Hill, lead singer; Albert Walker, harmony vocals; Kenneth Days, harmony vocals. (All members are from Jamaica.)

Joseph Hill, one of the great roots reggae singers, started drumming and doing backup vocals with Studio One session band the Soul Defenders in 1969. His first single as a lead singer, produced by Coxsone Dodd in the early 1970s, was a solo outing called "Take Me Girl," though it was released under the name the Neptunes. He also cut "Behold the Land" for Dodd, but grew disillusioned by the music business. He dropped out and joined a Rastafarian commune in the hills outside of Kingston. In 1976 his cousin Albert Walker visited him and suggested they form a singing group. Vocal trios like the Mighty Diamonds, the Pioneers, the Heptones, and Justin Hinds & the Dominoes were setting the charts on fire, so Hill took the bait. With Walker's brother Kenneth Days they began rehearsing; Hill sang lead and wrote the songs, while Walker and Days provided sweet, soulful harmonies. They auditioned for Joe Gibbs as the African Disciples, but Morris Wellington, one of Gibbs's top arrangers, suggested the more Rastfarian name of Culture, a reference to the African roots all Rastas feel are the basis of their religion. The band's first session, backed by Sly Dunbar, Robbie Shakespeare, Tommy McCook, and other now-famous studio heavies, produced a sizable hit with "See Dem a Come," an expression of militant defiance. But the best was still ahead. Hill had an apocalyptic vision of the final judgment that inspired the lyrics of "When Two Sevens Clash," the next single and title track of Culture's first album. People took Hill's vision so seriously that on July 7, 1977, the day the sevens clashed, Kingston ground to a halt, with many people staying home awaiting the final judgment. The album was a major hit; Warner Bros. released it in England and by the time Shanachie brought it out in the U.S. in 1988 it was legendary, a reggae milestone seldom duplicated.

This success led to international tours, a deal with Virgin's Front Line logo, and Harder Than the Rest, another militant classic. Joe Gibbs also began releasing outtakes from the Two Sevens sessions, flooding the market with titles by the band, but they all did well and the trio played to sold-out houses in Europe and England. By the early 1980s the music biz was changing, and in Jamaica dancehall's computerized riddims and rap vocals had supplanted roots reggae as the dominant force. Front Line crashed and burned, and when a Hill solo outing went unreleased, the group threw in the towel. But in 1986 Hill decided to reform the group. The trio teamed up with Sly & Robbie and the Roots Radics band, taking some of the more popular dancehall riddims and recasting them in a roots mold for In Culture, a strong comeback effort. While it's unlikely they will ever record another set with the impact of Two Sevens Clash, the trio continues to produce standout roots albums, marked by killer riddims (played by real musicians), solid lyrics, smooth harmonies, and Hill's still soul-stirring vocals.

what to buy: Simply put, Two Sevens Clash ♪♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1988, prod. Joe Gibbs, Errol Thompson), originally released in Jamaica on Gibbs's JGR label in 1976, is one of the greatest reggae albums ever recorded. Hill's apocalyptic visions and militant lyrics are driven by his scratchy tenor, a voice that's instantly recognizable for its soul and sufferation. Walker and what to buy next: Combolo ♪♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1988, prod. S.E. Pottinger) is one of Culture's best post-reunion sets. "Mrs." Pottinger, although not widely recognized outside of Jamaica, is one of the island's best producers, known for her booming bass sound and inventive percussion tracks. Hill is in fine voice here, with a selection of strong tunes marked by his usual passion and the band's sharp, understated backing.

Days provide angelic harmonies, and the killer production of Gibbs and Thompson, full of echo, delay, and dubwise mixing, gives the music the impact of an atom bomb.

best of the rest:
'Nuff Crisis ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1988)
Good Things ♪♪♪½ (RAS, 1989)
In Culture ♪♪♪½ (Jamaica Gold, 1990)
International Herb ♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1990)
Harder Than the Rest ♪♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1992)
Baldhead Bridge ♪♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1993)

influences:
- The Wailers (pre-Island Records), Delphonics, Justin Hinds & the Dominos, Mighty Diamonds
- Black Uhuru, Wailing Souls, Ziggy Marley & the Melody Makers

see also: The Roots Radics, Sly & Robbie

j. poet

Johnny Cunningham

Scottish folk, rock, new age

Born August 27, 1957, in Portobello, Scotland. Based in Boston, MA, USA.

Johnny Cunningham is among the most talented and exciting artists in contemporary Scottish music. He has, over the past 25 years, infused this somewhat hidebound style with a much-needed burst of energy and creativity. After a brief childhood in a musical family where he was surrounded by accordionists and pipers, Cunningham left home at age 14 to make his way as a professional musician. Moving from one squalid Edinburgh flat to another, he met up with like-minds Gordon Jones and Bob Thomas and the trio eventually formed Silly Wizard. After several personnel changes and years of destitution, the band took off, becoming a mainstay of the Scottish folk revival and performing all over the world. Their driving dance tunes and sweet songs helped to shake the cobwebs off of Scottish music during the '70s and '80s, and led to a long run of tours and albums. Since leaving Silly Wizard Cunningham has performed with Relativity, Nightnoise, and the rock band Raindogs. He has toured as a solo artist and as a member of the Celtic Fiddle Festival, in addition to production work for numerous artists. Largely self-taught, he draws inspiration from those he grew up around and has avoided the Scottish fiddle scene with its restrictive emphasis on written collections and classical techniques. When pressed to choose a musical influence, Cunningham names Tommy Potts, the Irish fiddler who, on his album The Liffey Banks, pulled, pushed, and stretched traditional Irish music as far as it would go without breaking. Cunningham is the same type of musician, well schooled in the traditional roots but carrying the music forward to new places.

what to buy: Peter and Wendy ♪♪♪♪½ (Alula, 1997, prod. Johnny Cunningham) is by far the most important, serious, and developed work of Cunningham's career. Written as the music for the Mabou Mines Theater Company's production of the 1911 J.M. Barrie novel of the same name, Cunningham's music successfully weds the sound of traditional Scottish music to the dramatic stage. Although the score is all original, the foundation of Cunningham's composition is strongly traditional, liberally borrowing forms, progressions, and even whole sections of tunes from the repertoire. In order to bring his musical ideas to their fullest fruition, Cunningham surrounded himself with the cream of Irish-America's musicians including Seamus Egan, Solas accordionist Mick McAuley, harpist Jay Ansill, and heavenly singer Susan McKeown. The result is a masterful soundtrack at once contemporary and venerable, full of beautiful playing and heartfelt singing. Sold in an attractive box with a lavish full-color book inside, the packaging reflects the exceptional care and effort that went into this production.

what to buy next: Kevin Burke, Cunningham, and Christian LeMaître's The Celtic Fiddle Festival ♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1993, prod. Johnny Cunningham) features Cunningham alongside Irish master Burke and Breton fiddler LeMaître. In a program split between solos and group playing, the three push each other forward, all showing off their awesome technique and mastery of related yet different styles. Highlights include Burke's set of three reels from County Clare; Cunningham's sweet "Mist-Covered Mountains of Home"; and the trio's ferocious attack on two French-Canadian reels, "The Dionne" and "The Mouth of the Tobique." The tasteful accompaniment by guitarist John McGann allows each of the fiddlers to shine to the fullest. This is a great album for any fan of the instrument, and an excellent introduction to its many sounds and styles for the fan-to-be. Fair Warning ♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1983, prod. Johnny Cunningham, Vincent Moos) is a fine Scottish fiddle album, featuring some nice reel sets and a few beautiful slow airs. Accompanied by uilleann piper Tim Britton and guitarist Zan McLeod among others, Cunningham's playing is always solid but lacks a little of the fire of his Silly Wizard days. The highlights are the slow air "Logan Water" and the closing set of reels.

what to avoid: The Soul of Christmas: A Celtic Music Celebration with Thomas Moore ♪♪ (Upaya, 1997, prod. Johnny Cunningham) is a two-CD set containing one disc of new-age guru Thomas Moore discussing the nature of Christmas and one disc of some well-known carols performed in a Celtic/new-age style. The musical passages feature Cunningham and many of the same musicians from the Peter and Wendy album as well as Kathy Mattea, Cathie Ryan, and vocalist Liam Tiernan. The songs are warm and comfortable but wanting for vigor, especially those from Tiernan, whose languid delivery slows everything it touches to an uncomfortable, glacial crawl. The instrumental settings are also slow and new-agey for the most part, allowing only rare flashes of brilliance from some usually stunning performers (the one exception being a somewhat rousing "In Exelcis Deo" featuring, refreshingly but not surprisingly, Cunningham on fiddle). The most conspicuous tracks have to be Cunningham's vocal (!) rendition of the carol "I Saw Three Ships," and his recitation of a couple of poems. Notwithstanding its sub-par overall musical quality, the set is handsomely packaged in a thick book containing Moore's discussion in essay form with some attractive, homey illustrations.

the rest:

(With Kevin Burke and Christian LeMaître) The Celtic Fiddle Festival: Encore ♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1998)

worth searching for: Cunningham's first solo album, Thoughts from Another World ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1982), is now out of print. It's a slightly surreal recording, but indicative of his musical restlessness and willingness to experiment.

influences:

⏮ Aly Bain, Chuck Fleming, Tommy Potts

⏭ Old Blind Dogs, Shooglenifty, Alisdair Fraser

see also: Kevin Burke, Phil Cunningham, Kornog, La Muscagña, Susan McKeown, Tríona Ní Dhomhnaill, Nightnoise, Cathie Ryan, Silly Wizard, Solas

Tony Ziselberger

Phil Cunningham

Scottish traditional and contemporary

Born January 27, 1960, in Portobello, Scotland. Based on the Isle of Skye, Scotland.

Phil Cunningham is a tremendous musician, composer, arranger, and producer who has been at the very center of Scottish music for close to 30 years. An outstanding accordionist, whistle player, and keyboardist, Phil got his start with Silly Wizard, which produced the high-energy recordings of traditional jigs, reels, and songs that jump-started Scottish music in the '70s and '80s. After that group's demise, Phil and his brother John joined with Micheal Ó Domhnaill and Triona Ní Dhomhnaill to form Relativity, the sedate, somewhat experimental sound of which would be a precursor to many of the more ethereal Celtic bands of the 1990s. Since Relativity's break-up, Phil has recorded and toured as a solo artist and with Shetland fiddler Aly Bain; written his first classical composition, The Highlands and Islands Suite; and produced countless albums for artists ranging from folk-rockers Wolfstone to singer Connie Dover to Irish-traditional giants Altan. He currently lives on the Isle of Skye where he and his wife Donna run a recording studio.

what to buy: Cunningham's second solo project, The Palomino Waltz ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1989, prod. Phil Cunningham), is a wonderful display of his writing and playing skills. He claims composer's credits on six of the album's nine tracks and writes variations for another. Among his outstanding originals are the beautiful "Donna's Waltz"—now a standard at sessions everywhere—and the sad slow air "The Ross Memorial Hospital." A lyrical album with three other slow airs and a set of waltzes to recommend it, the CD showcases Cunningham's underrated whistle playing alongside his justly admired accordion work. For fans of the latter on killer dance tunes, there are a few sets of reels and some tricky strathspeys in which his accordion dazzles. This is a well-produced album, with tasteful electric keyboards—also played by Cunningham—augmenting but not upstaging the tunes, and some nice guest appearances from fiddler Bain and piper Finlay MacRae.

what to buy next: Airs and Graces ♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1984, prod. Phil Cunningham, Neil Ross) was Cunningham's first solo recording, and shows off his awesome accordion playing to great effect. Another platform for Cunningham's own tunes, this one features his famous air "Miss Rowan Davies" and a whole bunch of memorable reels, among them "Andy Stewart's" and "Hogtie's Reel." In addition to the accordion, instruments played by the multitalented Cunningham include whistle, keyboards, guitar, and cittern. The accompaniment is a little more traditional than on his second recording, with the synthesizer used more selectively and sparingly, and the piano and guitar filling the gaps.

what to avoid: As any connoisseur of Scotch whiskey will tell you, there's something to be said for blends, but the true treasures are found among the single malts where the individual character of the whiskey stands out. So it is with duets between Bain and Cunningham. When this unprecedented pair recorded The Pearl ♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1995, prod. Phil Cunningham) expectations ran high. After all, here were two of the kings of Scottish music working together, pushing each other to greater and greater heights. Shetland-born Bain is a master fiddler with a host of rare tunes who can alternately rev it up on the reels and make you cry with the airs. Cunningham also stirs it up or tones it down with the best of 'em, plays everything, and writes all those beautiful tunes of his own. So how come this record never gets going? The reels are all solid, the slow pieces are pretty, but outside of a reprise of "The Pearl," which Phil wrote and recorded back in his Silly Wizard days, nothing stands out. These guys are both masters, but they seem to hold each other back, settling for a pleasant middle ground when they could have truly pushed the edges. As is the case with fine Scotch whiskey, stick with the solos and leave this disappointing blend alone.

the rest:
(With Aly Bain) The Ruby ♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1998)

worth searching for: Against the Storm (Shanachie, 1984) is a now-out-of-print album featuring Phil and his brother John. It sports some tasty playing, and Shanachie's reluctance to reissue it is a mystery. Phil also has a tunebook, The Phil Cunningham Collection, Vol. 1, which includes many of his fine compositions.

influences:
⏮ Jimmy Shand

⏭ Shooglenifty, Wolfstone, Old Blind Dogs, Karen Tweed

see also: Altan, the Boys of the Lough, Johnny Cunningham, Triona Ní Dhomhnaill, Silly Wizard, Andy M. Stewart, David Wilkie

Tony Ziselberger

Cusan Tan

See: Robin Huw Bowen

Dadawa

Chinese classical, new age

Born 1970, in Guangzhou City, China. Based in Shanghai, China.

Dadawa's Sister Drum was one of the fastest-selling Mandarin albums in the history of mainland China, and the first CD from the People's Republic to be released internationally. The global reception may have seemed a direct reply to the singer's own diverse tastes. "At seven, I auditioned for the National Choir and performing with them exposed me to a lot of different music," she explains. "In the '80s pop music from Taiwan and Hong Kong entered China, and later music from America and England. I loved that influence, especially the blues and rock. Whatever I could find, I listened to."

In 1990 Dadawa entered the Fourth Grand Prize Young Singers TV Contest, winning with the song "A True Story." But Dadawa was not satisfied with the life of a pop celebrity. "People come from all over China, and winning is seen as the path to stardom, but for me, singing was a labor of love, so even though I won, I didn't want to sign with any of the government- or privately owned record companies. I decided to seek my own path." For Dadawa that path led to the back roads of China, where she traveled on her own to sample "different ways of life." Her decision puzzled the local press. "They wrote stories that said 'Famous Singer Disappears,'" Dadawa recalls. When Dadawa returned from the sojourn she contacted the composer He Xuntain, whom she'd met after winning the contest. Along with his brother Xunyou they recorded Yellow Children, "a mix of pop and classical, Chinese and Western." The album did well, but the musicians wanted to try something more adventurous.

"[He Xuntain] had always been interested in Tibet. He had collected hundreds of Tibetan folk songs, and his brother had lived and worked in Tibet for many years. They asked me to travel to Tibet with them. We were looking for inspiration, and didn't intend to document or incorporate any Tibetan music into what we did. Many artists use Chinese folk music and folk art and try to mix it into pop music. That was not our intention, but when I visited there, it opened something in me. It created a sound, a feeling that I knew I would have to express." That feeling evolved into the seven songs on Sister Drum through two years of intense trial-and-error studio work. "When we came back from Tibet, each of us wrote one song. We tried to work without following any particular technique. We recorded many sample songs, some of them using nearly one hundred tracks, but to preserve the quality of the human voice the singing was recorded without editing." Sister Drum was released on the mainland in 1995 but was largely ignored by the official, government-run newspapers until the album began selling overseas. Then there were cautious articles praising the singer, while sidestepping the issue of China's ongoing efforts to destroy the people and culture of Tibet, the land Dadawa and her collaborators unhesitantly stated was their inspiration.

Since her Chinese name of Zhu Zheqin is difficult for most non-Chinese people to pronounce, Dadawa decided to create an enigmatic nom de musique that has "no translation. It doesn't belong to any language. In every country they think it means something different. In Japan and Taiwan there are words that sound like it, but 'dada' is a basic sound in every language. In every race everybody can pronounce this. I'm very sensitive to sound, but there's no explanation for how I made this name. Dadawa symbolizes the concept of going back to basics, before there is a language barrier or preconceptions to get in the way of communication."

what's available: The soaring soundscapes and lush textures of Sister Drum ♪♪♪½ (Nonesuch, 1996, prod. He Xuntain) mix ambient/new age synth drones, neo-Classical melodies (both Western and Chinese), and an almost subliminal bass throb that slowly connects listeners to the meditative pulsation of the Universal Heart. He Xuntain has devised his own system of musical notation, different from both classical Chinese and Western music, although eminently listenable. The album has a big, open feel, with thundering percussion and angelic overdubbed harmonies that are symphonic in tone. The critic who described Dadawa as "a Chinese Enya" wasn't far off the mark. Voices from the Sky ♪♪♪♪♡ (Nonesuch, 1998, prod. He Xuntain) is more folky and less self-conscious—and less Western-sounding—than its predecessor, though one of the instrumental interludes on "Seven Drums" could have come straight out of the Blue Ridge Mountains.

influences:
⏮ Cui Jian, Tan Dun

j. poet

Ustad Zia Mohiuddin Dagar /Z.M. Dagar

North Indian Classical, Hindustani

Born March 14, 1929, in Udaipur, India. Died September 28, 1990, in Bombay, India.

At his death, Zia Mohiuddin Dagar was the preeminent performer on the ancient rudra vina and a master of dhrupad, the centuries-old chant practiced by Dagar's ancestors in the Mughal courts. Though steeped in the tradition of his 19-generation musical family, Dagar broke with that tradition by reviving and performing solo on the vina, an instrument previously used only for accompanying singers. Dagar was known also for redesigning the neck, strings, and gourds of the vina, a precursor to the sitar, for enhanced sound and greater tonal stretch. Dagar's playing style was contemplative and deeply mesmerizing, based as it was on slow-moving dhrupad, and he generally performed only with tambouras (four-stringed drone instruments), adding a sense of austerity to his timeless sound world.

what to buy: Todi, Ahir Lalit, Panchamkauns ♪♪♪♪♡ (Raga Records, 1998, prod. John Wilton) is a live recording of Dagar with two tamboura players at the University of Washington in 1981. In "Todi" and "Ahir Lalit" Dagar adheres to his usual slow development and very, very gradual acceleration, but he ends both pieces playing at a slightly faster tempo than usual. Raga Shudda Todi ♪♪♪♪♡ (Nimbus Records, 1994, prod. Robin Broadbank) is classic Z.M. Dagar; slow, patient, and endless in a wash of tamboura drone. A relaxing, steady pulse gradually develops in the Jor and Jhala movements of this late-morning raga, bringing it to a close.

the rest:
Raga Yaman ♪♪♪♪ (Nimbus Records, 1991)

influences:
⏮ Dabir Khan, Sadaq Ali Khan
⏭ Bahauddin Dagar, Nancy Lesh

David Paul

I.K. Dairo

Juju

Born Isaiah Kehinde Dairo, 1930, in Offa, Nigeria. Died February 7, 1996, in Efon-Alaiye, near Akure, Nigeria.

Multi-instrumentalist and vocalist I.K. Dairo was one of the fathers of modern juju, a heavily percussive, phenomenally popular dance music of Nigeria. Adding accordion and talking drum to the traditional juju lineup and incorporating vocal harmonies from Nigeria's Christian churches, Dairo created his own unique style.

The son of a carpenter, Dairo first played on a drum built for him by his father. Although in adult life he would work as a barber, construction worker, and clothes merchant, Dairo was a frequent performer with juju bands in the early 1950s. Forming his own outfit, Morning Star Orchestra (later known as the Blue Spots), Dairo—who played talking drum, guitar, and accordion—recorded his first singles in 1958. The original members of the group—which included a guitarist, bass player, three singers, and four drummers—stayed together throughout Dairo's career.

The artist reached his peak in the 1970s, when his recordings in the aftermath of the Nigerian Civil War established juju as the dominant sound in his native country. Dairo was even awarded an MBE (Member of the British Empire) from the Queen of England, the only African musician ever to receive this distinction. In the late '70s, Dairo retired from performing to manage clubs and hotels in Lagos; during the '80s, he served a ministry in the Cherubim and Seraphim churches; and in 1990, he recorded his first album in 15 years, I Remember. By the time he left this world six years later, he had returned to music in a way that well honored the legacy he had established, and added to the one he would leave behind.

what to buy: Dairo's comeback album I Remember ♪♪♪♪♡ (Music of the World, 1991, prod. I.K. Dairo) reunited him with the Blue Spots, and despite the long hiatus, he showed he was still capable of producing dance-inspiring music.

what to buy next: Dairo's early recordings are sampled on the anthology The Glory Years ♪♪♪♪ (Original Music, 1991, prod. I.K. Dairo).

the rest:
Definitive Dairo ♪♪♪♪ (Xenophile, 1971/1996)
Ju Ju Master MBE ♪♪♪♪♡ (Original Music, 1990)

I.K. Dairo

1 9 4
george dalaras

I.K. Dairo & His Blue Spots ♪♪♪½ (Original Music, 1991)
Ashiko ♪♪♪½ (Xenophile, 1994)

influences:
◀◀ Ojoge Daniel, Oladele Oro
▶▶ King Sunny Adé, Ebenezer Obey

Craig Harris

George Dalaras

Rembetiko, laiko

Born in Pireaus, Greece. Based in Pireaus, Greece.

George Dalaras has risen to become Greece's first modern-day music heavyweight. Born into his vocation (Dalaras's father was a bouzouki player), his love of music came from the rembetiko style—a Greek urban-blues form that endured censorship from the 1930s through the 1970s to emerge as a national standard-bearer—which he admired from an early age. He was discovered at the still early age of 16 playing guitar and singing in Athens, and in 1969 released his self-titled debut album. Since then, Dalaras's repertoire has grown to enormous proportions, in both solo work and collaborations with national and international artists. He has recorded with the likes of Al Di Meola, Paco de Lucia, and Nana Mouskouri, and has shared the stage with Peter Gabriel and Bruce Springsteen. Upon the fall of dictatorship in the 1970s, Dalaras, free of censorship, released his groundbreaking double album Ta Rembetika (The Rembetiko Songs), which was the first "official" record of the genre to go platinum. Throughout his career, Dalaras has revived the styles of traditional Greek folk with a modern edge; incorporating laiko (the term for popular music) into his works, he has managed to appeal to a mass audience. In addition to putting his own words to music, Dalaras has worked with renowned poets such as Yannis Ritsos and Odysseus Elytis (a practice common in the rembetiko style), elevating the spoken word with his guitar playing. His passionate vocals speak of the hardships of the underdog, a theme woven into the fabric of Greek society. His active social awareness, prominently including his crusade to expose the invasion of Cypress by Turkey in 1974, won him the John F. Kennedy prize in 1994. His tireless recording and renowned live performances have earned him the title "the Bruce Springsteen of Greece." He has forever changed the landscape of modern Greek music, enjoying a crossover success rivaled only by Nana Mouskouri and projecting a youthful spirit second to none.

what to buy: George Dalaras started making his many significant contributions even before he became a star in his own right. He was one of the vocalists on composer Apostolos Kaladias's Mikra Asia ♪♪♪♪♪ (1973), which helped usher in mass acceptance for the rembetiko style. Following Kaladias's footsteps, Dalaras released Ta Rembetika ♪♪♪♪♪ (EMI/Minos, 1975), a double album filled with a passion many feel is still unsurpassed. His sorrowful vocals make this a must-have for any Dalaras fan. Moving toward a broader thematic palette, Dalaras's acute awareness of social and political issues came to fruition with To Radar ♪♪♪♪ (EMI/Minos, 1981). This release also marked a stylistic change for Dalaras, who here expanded his choice of instruments and made his music more up-to-date and accessible. The later progression of Dalaras's musical modernization can be heard on Min Milas Min Gelas Kindinevi Ellas ♪♪♪♪ (EMI/Minos, 1989), on which his band adds keyboards and various percussion instruments. The title track is politically charged, warning Greece not to forget about the hardships of war and never to make light of them. Dalaras's tour in support of this album was one of his most successful. The retrospective A Portrait ♪♪♪♪ (Hemisphere, 1998, prod. various) serviceably surveys the artist's hits while steering clear of his experiments.

what to buy next: Some of Dalaras's most impressive releases have been collaborations. Working with world-renowned artists, he has brought the influence of Greek culture to the international masses. Live Recordings with Paco de Lucia ♪♪♪♪½ (EMI, 1986) is beautiful, with Dalaras accompanying this amazing flamenco musician well. Dalaras also matched instruments with renowned guitarist Al Di Meola on Latin ♪♪♪♪ (EMI, 1987); their subtle and competent duet work embodies the soul of Latin culture and achieves a most unusual and impressive collaboration.

what to avoid: Dalaras's discography is extensive, with variations in sound quality to match; beware of "best of" compilations not put out by the EMI/Minos label.

worth searching for: Y Ta Tragoudia K' Ego Fteo ♪♪♪♪♪ (EMI/Minos, 1993) is a must-have reissue of Dalaras's early 7-inches plus unreleased tracks. The recording quality may not be up to par with the better-produced albums that would follow, but the artistic quality and amazing historical value make this essential. Also worth searching for is Dalaras's work with poet Yannis Ritsos on Ta Deca-Octo Llanatragouda Tis Pikris Patridas ♪♪♪♪½ (EMI/Minos, 1974). His collaboration with modern Greek poet Nikos Kavadias transports the listener to exotic lands and times through sailors' voyages of the 19th century on Grammes Ton Orizondon ♪♪♪♪ (EMI/Minos). Another of Dalaras's cross-cultural albums worth owning is his work with Argentinean composer Ariel Ramirez, Missa Criola ♪♪♪½ (1989), recorded live in the Catholic Church of Athens and delivering a powerful liturgy. Dalaras's interpretations of Greek life from the 1930s through the 1950s are beautifully expressed on Vammena Kokkina Mallia ♪♪♪♪ (EMI/Minos, 1993). The title of the album—in English, "Dyed Red Hair"—is taken from a popular TV series of same name. And last but not least, Dalaras accompanies poet Odysseus Elytis while he recites his epic "Axion Esti," which has become one of the seminal works of modern Greek culture, on Sinavlia Ston Palas ♪♪♪♪½ (EMI/Minos 1988).

influences:

Stavros Kouyountzi, Mikis Theodorakis, Christos Nicopolous

Dimitris Mitroopanos, Haris Alexiou, Pavlos Sitheropoulos

see also: Paco de Lucia

Helen Giano

Dalom Kids

See: Daniel Tshanda

Jackie Daly

Traditional and modern Irish folk

Born June 22, 1945, in Kanturck, County Cork, Ireland. Based in Ireland.

Accordionist Jackie Daly is among the most widely known performers in the distinctive Sliabh Luachra style of Irish music. Closely associated with the wild, hilly region between Counties Kerry and Cork, the Sliabh Luachra style is music for set dancing, marked by strongly rhythmic fiddle and box playing and a reliance on polkas and slides, as opposed to the reels and jigs more common to the rest of Ireland. Daly grew up in this region, learning music from his father and from local masters Jim Keefe and Sean Lynch. He developed a rhythmic accordion method well suited to the Sliabh Luachra style, and won the All-Ireland title in 1974. After a short stint playing with fiddler Seamus Creagh, he was asked to join the folk supergroup De Dannan in 1975. He toured with them for close to 10 years, appearing on some of the storied band's finest recordings. Then, in 1986, he joined Kevin Burke, Andy Irvine, and Arty McGlynn to form Patrick Street, with whom he continues to tour and record. Daly has also been a member of Arcady and has toured widely with fiddle player Maire O'Keefe.

what to buy: Although the music of Kerry is now well known to Irish music fans, this was by no means the case in 1977, the year Music from Sliabh Luachra ♪♪♪♪♪ (Topic, 1977/Green Linnet, 1992, prod. Tony Engle) was originally issued. Here was a revelation: a powerful young box player with a collection of tunes largely unknown outside of his hometown, playing with verve and drive in a style different from every other accordion player of the time. Featuring a great collection of slides and polkas from his native Sliabh Luachra, along with some fine slow airs, the album has lost none of its appeal in the intervening decades, and was rightly among the first four titles issued by Green Linnet in its Celtic Classics series. For serious fans of Irish music this is required listening.

what to buy next: Eavesdropper ♪♪♪♪ (Mulligan, 1981/Green Linnet, 1981, prod. Kevin Burke, Jackie Daly), a duet album made with Kevin Burke in 1979, features some of the closest duet playing one is likely to hear, with sparse guitar or piano accompaniment (or none at all) and an eclectic repertoire of lesser-known tunes. Among the latter, a beautiful arrangement

ethno-techno

It's no surprise that certain types of techno have earned the subgenre moniker "trance," for the cathartic rhythms of this modern sound recall the ancient roots of that healing state of mind in the music of tribal cultures spanning the globe. Although the developing trend of fusing ethnic traditions with techno's hypnotic beat has only recently begun to gain steam in the mainstream, the movement's beginnings can be traced to the landmark 1981 album My Life in the Bush of Ghosts, which merged future Luaka Bop label founder David Byrne's fascination with world music and Brian Eno's technocentric bag of tricks, creating a dense, danceable mixture of the ancient and the futuristic. Artists ranging from Peter Gabriel to Bill Laswell and former PiL bassist Jah Wobble would dabble in ethno-techno experiments in the late '80s and early '90s, but the first group to make such fusions their raison d'etre was Transglobal Underground, whose sound borrowed liberally from African, Indian, Middle Eastern, Jamaican, and Latin music traditions, while focusing primarily on getting bodies onto the dance floor. A variety of like-minded artists soon followed suit, including Loop Guru, Dr. Didj, Trance Mission, Banco De Gaia, and Talvin Singh, but it was a more mainstream French studio project, Deep Forest, that produced the first Top 40 ethno-techno hit back in 1992 by combining pulsating tribal beats with pygmy chants. Now a staple sound that can be heard everywhere from film soundtracks to television commercials, ethno-techno promises to draw the Global Village closer together in the new millennium, bringing George Clinton's dream of "One Nation under a Groove" to fruition at last.

see also: Badawi, David Byrne, Deep Forest, Dr. Didg, Brian Eno, Peter Gabriel, Bill Laswell, Talvin Singh, Abdel Ali Slimani, Trance Mission, Transglobal Underground, Jim Wilson (sidebar) with guitar of an uncommon version of "The Blackbird" stands out. Cork flute player Conal ó Gráda guests on a few tracks, and so does Paul Brady on piano.

Bret Love

worth searching for: Jackie Daly & Seamus Creagh ♪♪♪♪ (Gael-Linn, 1977, prod. Jackie Daly, Seamus Creagh) is another outstanding album from Daly, this time playing duets with the fine fiddler who shares its title. Ably accompanied by bodhrán (Irish frame drum) player Colm Murphy, the boys tear through another prime set of instrumental dance tunes and one song. This is a great collection of music, and for fans of the Sliabh Luachra style, it is essential. When you've recorded a classic in your first attempt in the studio, and then you join De Dannan for The Mist Covered Mountain and The Star Spangled Molly —arguably the two finest albums that group has made—and then you go and form Patrick Street, and finally join Arcady, what happens if you next make an album that's just okay? Well, Many's a Wild Night ♪♪♪ (Gael-Linn, 1995, prod. Jackie Daly) is the answer. It's not a bad collection of tunes; the playing is good, if a little lacking in fire, and the production is the best of any of his solo albums. It's a solid effort that merely pales a bit in comparison with the formidable competition discussed above. Both Jackie Daly & Seamus Creagh and Many's a Wild Night are imports, but they can occasionally be found on this side of the Atlantic.

influences:

⏮ Dennis Murphy & Julia Clifford, Padraig O'Keefe, Johnny O'Leary

⏭ The Smoky Chimney, Sliabh Notes, Maire O'Keefe

see also: Arcady, Kevin Burke, De Dannan, Alec Finn, Andy Irvine, Patrick Street

Tony Ziselberger

Olu Dara

World-inflected jazz and blues

Born 1941, in Natchez, MS, USA. Based in New York, NY, USA.

Olu Dara is a genuine American artist, and a treasure. An estimable and earthy cornetist, singer, guitarist, songwriter, and musical theater composer, he has recorded and performed with such diverse talents as Art Blakey's Jazz Messengers, Brian Eno, James Blood Ulmer, Taj Mahal, Material, and Cassandra Wilson. Dara grew up in Natchez, Mississippi, and began performing at the age of 7, playing trumpet for women's clubs. He also immersed himself in painting, drawing, dancing; anything to do with the arts. At 18 he left college and joined the navy, traveling the world. He played in every kind of outfit the navy had to offer—marching bands, small jazz groups, big bands—on duty and off. And, of course, he picked up on the music of all the countries he visited throughout Europe, Africa, and the Caribbean. In 1963 Dara landed in New York City. He set music aside for a while, but got the bug again and joined up with Art Blakey and the Messengers, touring nonstop. In the 1970s he fell into the downtown music scene and played and recorded with such avant garde musicians as David Murray, Sam Rivers, Henry Threadgill, and Julius Hemphill. In the 1980s Dara formed his own outfits, the seven-piece Okra Orchestra and the four-piece Natchezsippi Dance Band. Not to be tethered to one artistic outlet, Dara also works extensively in African American theater and dance, serving as composer and musical director for such acclaimed dramas as August Wilson's The Piano Player. He also continues to work on projects based on the life of writer Zora Neale Hurston. After performing and recording for more than 35 years and appearing on more than 50 albums by other artists, Dara finally made one of his own in 1998—and it was worth even this long a wait.

what's available: In the World: From Natchez to New York ♪♪♪♪♪ (Atlantic, 1998, prod. Yves Beauvais, Olu Dara) is Olu Dara's first album, believe it or not. And it's darn near perfect. Dara is a sophisticated yet down-home chef, combining Delta blues, jazz, calypso, reggae, rap, Nigerian juju, and other American, African, and Caribbean spices for one flavorful, subtle dish. Dara and his band—Kwatei Jones-Quarty and Ivan Ramirez on guitars, John Abrams on sax, Rudy Herbert on Hammond B-3 organ, Alonzo Gardner on bass, Richard James on congas, and Greg Bandy on drums—recorded it all in three days, creating an experience that's not often captured on record. The opening track, "Okra," is an old favorite from Dara's live shows, as is "Harlem Country Girl." Dara romps through the sensuous but funny "Your Lips" with the refrain "Your lips, your lips, your lips . . . are juicy." Numbers from his theatrical work include "Young Mama" and "Rain Shower." On the topical song "Jungle," Dara is joined on vocals by his son Nas, the famous hip-hop artist.

influences:

⏮ Robert Johnson, Louis Armstrong, Bessie Smith, Ornette Coleman, Art Blakey, Dizzie Gillespie, James Blood Ulmer

⏭ Taj Mahal, Cassandra Wilson, Nas, Madeleine Peyroux

Andrew BeDell

Alan Dargin /Reconciliation

Didgeridoo fusion, worldbeat

Dargin born in Northeast Arnhem Land, Australia. Reconciliation formed 1992, in Australia. Based in Toronto, Ontario, Canada.

Alan Dargin, didgeridoo, Celtic horn, clap sticks; Simon O'Dwyer, Celtic horn; Phillip Conyngham, didgeridoo, Celtic horn, clap sticks; Maria Cullen, bodhrán, pennywhistle. (All members are from Ireland except where noted otherwise.)

Dargin was born and raised in an Aboriginal tribe in Northeast Arnhamland, Australia. When he was five years old, his grandfather began teaching him didgeridoo (the now world-popular droning blown instrument) and eventually passed his own on to his grandson. "My grandfather's didgeridoo is 107 years old," Dargin says. "It's made from a variety of bloodwood that has been extinct for 80 years." Traditionally the didgeridoo is made from a branch of a tree that has been naturally hollowed out by ants. It is played in tribal ceremonies and social gatherings to accompany singers. "I learned many secrets from my grandfather," Dargin says, "but you can only be taught so much by others. You also have to listen and learn by yourself. I've taken a traditional instrument and adapted it to modern music. I play [the didgeridoo] like a jazz horn, playing in any beat or rhythm. It has a very powerful bass tone, and in an ensemble it can fill up all the holes and make the sound full, which is probably why it has so much potential for world music." Dargin has toured Australia, Europe, Asia, and the U.S., both as a solo artist and as a member of Reconciliation, a group he cofounded with Simon O'Dwyer and Maria Cullen to combine Celtic and Aboriginal music. In 1988 O'Dwyer had discovered that the Bronze Age Celtic horn, an instrument long thought "unplayable," could in fact be played with the same techniques as the didgeridoo. O'Dwyer had three horns made, based on ones in the collection of the National Museum of Dublin. In 1992, while touring Australia to demonstrate the Celtic horn, he met Dargin, and after an evening of experimentation, they decided on an ongoing collaboration.

what's available: On Reconciliation ♪♪♪♪ (Natural Symphonies, 1993, prod. Reconciliation) Cullen's bodhrán (Irish frame drum) and Dargin's clap sticks lay the foundation for extended improvisations on didgeridoo and Celtic horn. There are jigs and reels played with an Aboriginal slant, and some traditional Aboriginal tunes given a Celtic treatment. The Celtic horns have an eerie high end that's a perfect counterpart to the booming bottom of the didgeridoo. Bloodwood ♪♪♪½ (Natural Symphonies, 1993, prod. Michael Atherton) features Dargin's didgeridoo, the guitar and synth of Michael Atherton, and a few guests on occasional sax, bass, and drums. The music is ambient, funky, and folky by turns, but mostly a showcase for Dargin's amazing chops.

influences:

◀◀ Yothu Yindi

▶▶ Trance Mission

j. poet

Dark City Sisters

Late marabi, early mbaqanga

Formed mid-1950s, in Johannesburg, South Africa. Disbanded mid-1960s (original lead singer still occasionally performs in Johannesburg with all-new lineup). Based in Johannesburg, South Africa.

Rotating, largely undocumented membership, principally including Joyce Mogatusi, lead vocals.

In late-'50s Johannesburg, the jazz-inspired marabi style still lit up the illegal township nightspots known as shebeens. This was the heyday of the Dark City Sisters, perhaps the country's most popular vocal group prior to the 1964 dawn of the Mahotella Queens. Late-marabi acts like the Dark City Sisters continued to imitate American swing jazz, but they had dropped pianos and banjos in favor of electric guitars, and where a scarcity of horns had once forced bands to use pennywhistles—in the style called kwela—postwar bands took full advantage of an influx of new instruments, and any outfit worth its salt had a swinging horn section.

The Dark City Sisters—named for Alexandra Township, the "dark city"—began as session singers at EMI, but came to be a solid unit with a distinct sound. At the start of their hit "Sekusile," a rooster crows, followed by a gentle, brush-driven swing groove with an unadorned guitar riff, and then the bell-clear voice of the group's leading lady Joyce Mogatusi. The tune heats up with doo-wop–like backing vocals—in Zulu, of course. All the elements of the coming mbaqanga style can be found in this group's songs—the deep, downbeat pulse, the sunny female vocal harmonies, and the chattering double-stop guitar outings. Mbaqanga guitar pioneer Marks Mankwane called the Dark City Sisters' lead guitarist Armand Memele "my guitar hero." Mahlathini, the famed "groaner" who would go on to serve 30-plus years with the Mahotella Queens, started out with the Dark City Sisters. And Ray Phiri, founder of Stimela and guitarist on Paul Simon's Graceland, got his start as a boy dancing for the Dark City Sisters. This is history, no doubt about it, but the work still stands up well, evidence of an enormously creative period in one of Africa's most productive musical capitols.

what to buy: Dark City Sisters and Flying Jazz Queens ♪♪♪♪½ (Earthworks, 1993) is the only collection of Dark City Sisters tunes you're likely to find. Luckily, it's a gem, fascinating for what it reveals about township music's roots, and just plain delightful to hear.

influences:

◀◀ Spokes Mashiyane, Alexandra Black Mambazo

▶▶ Mahlathini & Mahotella Queens

see also: Mahlathini & Mahotella Queens

Banning Eyre

Krishna Das

Worldbeat kirtans

Born in USA. Based in Los Angeles, CA, USA.

The belief that chanting the name of God can dissolve the boundaries between the mundane and the transcendental is shared by many cultures. In India, the singing of mantras and

paban das baul & sam mills

kirtans is an art form, and each devotee is encouraged to bring his or her own musical knowledge to this practice. Das grew up with the typical American interest in jazz, blues, and rock, but a meeting with Ram Dass in 1969 opened his eyes and heart to a different way of being. Das left his old life and went to India where he lived with his guru, Neem Karoli Baba, from 1970 to 1973. While he was studying with Baba he met Mitchell Markus and Jai Uttal, and began discussing the possibility of bringing some spiritual light into the American music business. Although it took almost 20 years, the result of those conversations was Triloka Records, which was founded in the summer of 1990 and has since become a leader in the world-music and Native American genres. In between producing, playing, and singing on various ethno/techno/trance recordings, Das has found time to record his own brand of multi-culti devotional music.

what to buy: On One Track Heart ♪♪♪♪ (Triloka, 1996, prod. Krishna Das, Jai Uttal, Jim Wilson), Das has created mellow musical settings for some of the oldest poems known to (wo)man by combining Indian ragas and Western scales, sitars and twangy surfadelic guitar. Some tracks are fairly traditional, but turning "Hara Mahadeva Shaambo" into a smooth bit of Indian Motown and playing the "Hare Krishna" mantra as a loping country & western ballad are acts of quirky genius.

the rest:
Pilgrim Heart ♪♪♪ (Triloka, 1998)

influences:
George Harrison, Tulku

see also: Jai Uttal

j. poet

Paban Das Baul & Sam Mills

Traditional Baul folk music, worldbeat

Formed 1990, in London, England. Based in London, England.

Paban Das Baul (born 1961, in West Bengal, India), vocals, percussion, samples; Sam Mills (born 1963, in London, England), keyboards, guitar, samples, vocals.

Bauls are traditional wandering musicians, known to be holy men, gurus, and poets. Their songs have been handed down for generations and are said to awaken people to their own inner light. Paban began singing and playing music as a child and wandered with his father, a martial arts champion who would wrestle strangers for money. He was initiated into the oral traditions of the Baul brotherhood at age 14 by Subol Das Baul. As a young man he met and played with black American artists who were visiting India, including Clarke Terry and Big Joe Williams. In 1980 Paban began traveling through Europe singing on the streets, in clubs, and at festivals. Mills was born in London and got his first professional exposure in 23 Skidoo, a rock band that became so progressive they left rhythm and melody behind. When Mills first heard Baul music it turned his head around and he wound up traveling to and living in Bengal for several years. He met Paban in 1988 and in 1990 they began experimenting together, leading to the recordings on Real Sugar. "Baul music has never been confined to a single caste," Mills says. "It stands outside classical Indian tradition but has a motivating, rhythmic way of reaching across boundaries and creating a resonance for anyone receptive to it, regardless of their background."

what's available: On Real Sugar ♪♪♪♪ (Island, 1997, prod. Paban Das Baul, Sam Mills, Fritz Catin, Mimlu Sen), Paban's gruff vocals highlight nine smooth tracks that combine Indian rhythms and instruments with elements drawn from calypso, modern rock, and dance clubs.

solo outings:
Sam Mills:
(With Tama) Nostalgie N/A (RealWorld/Narada, 1999)

influences:
Shelia Chandra, Fun-Da-Mental, Najma

see also: 23 Skidoo

j. poet

Daude

MPB (Brazilian Popular Music)

Born Maria Walderlurdes Costa de Santana Dutilleux, in Salvador da Bahia, Brazil. Based in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil.

Like those in the bossa nova and Tropicalismo movements before her, Daude has synthesized "foreign" rhythms with Brazilian ones. Often tagged as a Brazilian rapper, Daude sees herself simply as a maker of pop music who happens to come from Brazil. "I want my music to be known all over the world, not as world music but as Daude," she said in one interview. On the other hand, she is quick to point out that she is Brazilian and that that goes a long way toward defining her music. On her self-titled first album, for example, she performs a rap-like duet with Miguel Bezerra on "Quatro Meninas." But it is not really rap; it is an updated version of the northeastern style called repente—albeit with some electronic muscle behind it. Daude's musical education began during her childhood in the Candeal neighborhood of Salvador da Bahia. Her father was in the military but had another, more creative side, as a music teacher and saxophone player. He was, in Daude's words, "very serious but very irreverent—crazy, but in a good way." Her father was responsible for exposing her to a wide array of music: samba, soul, big-band jazz—and he was also a mentor to a young boy in the neighborhood who would later change his name to Carlinhos Brown and found the innovative group Timbalada. Daude's name was given to her by her brother, who couldn't pronounce her real name of Walderlurdes. After her family moved to Rio, Daude took music lessons, then went into musical theater. The first time she hit the stage, she recalls, "I thought: 'This is exactly what I want to do.'" Well, not exactly. She would eventually begin singing in small clubs, developing a repertoire and a network of music-business connections. One of the most important ones she made was Celso Fonseca, who plays guitar with Gilberto Gil. He introduced Daude to her Brazilian record company and went on to produce her first album and, with Soul II Soul's Will Mowat, part of her second. Daude eventually signed with the California-based Tinder Records to distribute her albums outside Brazil; then, with tours of the U.S., Japan, and Europe, she began laying the foundation for her dream of becoming known around the globe.

Daude

what to buy: Daude ♪♪♪♪♡ (Tinder, 1997, prod. Celso Fonseca) is heavily influenced by hip-hop, reggae, and dance music, though several songs use Brazilian rhythms as a foundation.

the rest:
Veu Vava: Remixes by Will Mowat ♪♪♪♡ (Tinder, 1997)
Daude 2 N/A (Tinder, 1999)

influences:
Carlinhos Brown, Gilberto Gil, Soul II Soul, David Bowie

see also: Timbalada

Marty Lipp

Shaun Davey

Irish traditional, neo-traditional, and orchestral

Born 1948, in Belfast, Ireland. Based in Dublin, Ireland.

Keyboardist and self-taught composer Shaun Davey has been writing for TV, film, and theater since the mid-'70s, starting with advertising jingles but soon turning to the concert orchestra as a vehicle for some grander visions. Drawing on significant events in Irish history for subject matter, and using prominent Irish soloists—especially uilleann piper Liam O'Flynn and singer Rita Connolly—Davey has written a series of ambitious large-scale works that have been performed throughout the concert halls of Europe, North America, and Australia, including the prestigious Royal Festival Hall and Albert Hall in London and the Sydney Opera House.

200 shaun davey

It all started with The Brendan Voyage (1980), a landmark suite for orchestra and uilleann pipes, based on intrepid English sailor Tim Severin's book of the same name. It tells the tale of St. Brendan and his rumored sixth-century voyage in a small leather-covered boat (represented by ace piper O'Flynn) across the Atlantic (represented by the orchestra) to the New World. While Severin had just demonstrated the possibility of such a daunting trip via the icy waters surrounding the Faroes, Iceland, and Newfoundland, with this innovative score Davey demonstrated the possibilities of combining traditional Irish instruments with a concert orchestra via warm, evocative writing.

The Pilgrim (1984) was decidedly Pan-Celtic, and concerns the spread of Christianity throughout the Celtic regions during the Dark Ages. It uses a large cast: orchestra, traditional musicians, solo singers, and Welsh and Cornish choirs. As first released it was edited down from the larger Lorient Festival Suite, commissioned for the 1983 Lorient Festival in Brittany; getting all of this onto a single LP was not easy, even with the help of talented coproducer Bill Whelan. The CD from 1991 presents a longer, totally different recording taken from a 1990 concert in Glasgow and sees the suite substantially reorganized and improved.

Granuaile (1985) also features O'Flynn, Connolly, and orchestra, and tackles the tale of the extraordinary 16th-century female chieftain and sea captain Granuaile (Grace O'Malley), who ruled the waves off the west of Ireland in the time of Elizabeth I. Davey returned closer to home for his next opus, The Relief of Derry Symphony (1990), commissioned by the Derry City Council to commemorate the infamous 1689 siege of that city, in which 15,000 people died. While the siege only served to cement divisions among the people of the north of Ireland—divisions which persist to this day—the symphony was conceived as an attempt to depoliticize this aspect of shared history, and performers from both sides of the community came together for its debut in Derry city.

As a producer Davey has worked on numerous solo recordings by Connolly (the pair married in the 1980s) and O'Flynn, as well as sessions by Sonny Condell, Stockton's Wing, and others. His extensive theater writing includes music for productions at Dublin's Abbey and Gate Theatres and the Royal Shakespeare Company in Britain, and he has done film scores for Irish and British TV, as well as the big screen, the latter putting him on the world map like never before with his soundtrack for the recent Waking Ned Devine.

what to buy: The Brendan Voyage ♪♪♪♪ (Tara, 1980, prod. Shaun Davey) was a true parting of the waters in Irish music: Liam O'Flynn's exquisite piping takes on a full orchestra for an imaginative recounting of a small boat's long journey through hostile seas in search of a distant land. This was a bold new idea—both for Sr. Brendan and for Davey—and much of the writing (like the trip, no doubt) is memorable. One minor complaint: the occasional bass guitar and drum accompaniment sounds awkward and dated today. Granuaile ♪♪♪♪ (Tara, 1985, prod. Shaun Davey) was written to showcase the talents of Rita Connolly, whose lovely voice is joined here by piper O'Flynn, a 22-piece chamber orchestra, Helen Davis on harp, Dónal Lunny on bouzouki and bodhrán (Irish frame drum), and Noel Eccles on percussion. "Ripples in the Rockpool" (which Connolly has also rerecorded on a solo album) is one of several highlights; the song is now in the official Irish school syllabus.

what to buy next: The Pilgrim ♪♪♪♪ (Tara, 1991, prod. Shaun Davey) on CD is a new recording of a suite originally issued on LP in 1984. Diverse Celtic images are conjured up by Irish and Welsh harps, a Scottish pipe band, uilleann pipes (O'Flynn), Galician (Spanish Celtic) pipes, Breton (French Celtic) bombardes (bagpipes), a 120-member choir, and the same solo singers who were on the original release, Iarla O Lionaird and Rita Connolly. The mature and dignified Relief of Derry Symphony ♪♪♪♪ (Tara, 1990, prod. Shaun Davey, Brian Masterson) is performed by the Ulster Orchestra and various pipe bands, with Davey's usual collaborators, Connolly and O'Flynn, each making one contribution. Perhaps the least traditional of Davey's albums, it is also one of the finest orchestral works to emerge in Ireland for some time. The soundtrack to Waking Ned Devine ♪♪♪½ (London, 1998, prod. Shaun Davey), like the film itself, is light, lively, and lots of fun. With a crack team that includes fiddler Nollaig Casey, piper/whistler John McSherry, guitarist Arty McGlynn, and singers Connolly, Liam O'Maonlai, and the Voice Squad, Davey romps through a clutch of traditional-sounding tunes that can easily stand on their own apart from the film, even if several of them do bear a distinct resemblance to the work of Riverdance composer Bill Whelan. The main theme from the film, the Waterboys' "Fisherman's Blues," is also on the CD.

worth searching for: The High Kings of Tara (Tara, 1980) compilation contains the rare Davey track "Pride of the Herd," featuring a very young Connolly.

influences:

- Seán Ó Riada, the Chieftains, Planxty, Liam O'Flynn, Alan Stivell, Bill Whelan
- Rita Connolly, Bill Whelan, William Jackson

see also: Dónal Lunny, Liam O'Flynn, Bill Whelan

John C. Falstaff

Davka

Klezmer

Formed 1993, in Berkeley, CA, USA. Based in Berkeley, CA, USA.

Daniel Hoffman, violin; Moses Sedler, cello; Adam Levenson, doumbek, zarb, Remo frame drum. (All members are from USA.)

This trio of conservatory-trained musicians uses klezmer music as a foundation but is taking it in exciting new directions by emphasizing stringed instruments and adding Arabic percussion to their playing. Their blend of Jewish music, classical romanticism, jazzy improvisation, and driving Arabic rhythm makes them unique in the ranks of modern klezmer-inspired musicians. Daniel Hoffman, one of the group's founding members, has been interested in Jewish cultural music since he began playing. He formed the San Francisco Klezmer Experience for the American Conservatory Theater's production of Schlemiel the First, has played with many other artists including the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band and Alicia Svigals, and directs the Traveling Jewish Theater's Wednesday-night Jewish Music series. Cellist Moses Sedler is a long-time member of Ancient Future, one of the oldest world-music/new age instrumental ensembles, while percussionist Peter Maund has studied Indian tabla drum at the Ali Akbar College of Music in Marin, as well as folklore and ethnomusicology at UC Berkeley. The trio that became Davka got together to jam on Jewish melodies and Arabic rhythms and slowly developed their own style of improvised music. The pace is usually slow to mid-tempo, giving much of the material a pensive feeling, but the musical interchange is lively and they've been known to break into a hora on occasion.

what's available: Playing klezmer-esque melodies with an Arabic backbeat as the band does on Davka ♪♪♪♪ (Interworld, 1994, prod. Ben James) shows how close the roots of these musical traditions are. All three players are classically trained, and their versatility and restraint gives this set plenty of melancholy tension. Their second set, Lavy's Dream ♪♪♪♪ (Interworld, 1996, prod. Ben James), is more energetic and free-ranging than the debut, an album full of dark colors and somber soul.

influences:

◀◀ Epstein Brothers, Klezmorim

see also: Ali Akbar Khan, the Klezmatics

j. poet

De Dannan /De Danann

Irish traditional

Formed 1974, in Spiddal, County Galway, Ireland. Based in Galway, Ireland.

Frankie Gavin, fiddle, viola, flute, tin whistle, piano, vocals (1974–present); Alec Finn, bouzouki, guitar, keyboards (1974–present); Charlie Piggot, banjo, melodeon, tin whistle (1974–82); Johnny "Ringo" McDonagh, bodhrán, bones (1974–present); Dolores Keane, vocals, flute (1974–75, 1985–88); Johnny Moynihan, vocals, bouzouki, mandolin, tin whistle (1976–79); Jackie Daly, accordion (1980–82); Maura O'Connell, vocals (1981–82); Mary Black, vocals (1983–87); Martin O'Connor, accordion (1983–88); Caroline Lavelle, cello (1987–88); Eleanor Shanley, vocals (1988–92); Aidan Coffey, accordion (1988–94); Colm Murphy, bodhrán, bones (1988–present); Adele O'Dwyer, cello (1988–90); Tommy Flemming, vocals (1994–present); Derek Hickey, accordion (1996–present). (All members are from Ireland.)

If Planxty and the Bothy Band could be called the Beatles of Irish traditional music, then De Dannan would have to be its Rolling Stones. For not only has this Galway-based band been extremely prolific and adventurous in its choice of repertoire and its arrangements, it has also shown remarkable longevity for a folk outfit, rivaling the Chieftains as an Irish musical institution. Over a quarter-century and counting, De Danann (now spelled De Dannan) has gone through numerous changes in its lineup, in the process launching the careers of several of today's best-known Irish folk vocalists. Yet the band has kept the straight-ahead, live-session sound of its beginnings. All along, fiddle player extraordinaire Frankie Gavin and subtle bouzouki accompanist Alec Finn have remained the driving force behind that sound. Raised in a musical family, Gavin was a precocious fiddle and flute virtuoso who was still in school when the band came together at Galway-area sessions. Yorkshire-born Finn was involved in the Dublin blues scene in the 1960s before he moved to Spiddal, County Galway, and was given a bouzouki with which he started to frequent local Irish music sessions. There he met Gavin, Kerry banjo and melodeon player Charlie Piggot, and master of the bodhrán (Irish frame drum) and bones (like it sounds) Johnny "Ringo" McDonagh. When a few professional engagements came their way, the lads became a band. They recorded their first album in 1975 with the help of singer Dolores Keane, a neighbor of Gavin. However, Keane left soon after the album came out to perform with her husband John Faulkner. Former Sweeney's Men and Planxty member Johnny Moynihan became the band's singer for a time, appearing on its second LP, Selected Jigs, Reels and Songs, in 1978. By the time The Mist Covered Mountain came out two years later, the band had again lost its frontperson—the album's vocal tracks were of traditional Connemara singers—but gained a great instrumentalist in the person of Kerry accordion player Jackie Daly. It wasn't long before the band members were able to talk singer Maura O'Connell into joining, just in time to record The Star Spangled Molly, their first truly successful album. True to form, however, the band soon lost half of its lineup when Piggot, O'Connell, and Daly left in rapid succession. Piggot was disabled in a freak accident and could no longer play, O'Connell was more interested in pursuing a career in country music, and Daly needed a change. Gavin and Finn found accordion wizard Martin O'Connor and singer Mary Black to replace them, and the new lineup produced the memorable Song for Ireland in 1983. When they recorded Anthem two years later, they asked Dolores Keane if she would sing "Let It Be" on it. Somehow she ended up recording a duet with Black and was back in the band in no time. This may well have been the band's finest lineup, yet it proved to be an embarrassment of riches. There was too much talent to go around, both instrumentally and vocally, and not enough time in concert sets to accommodate it all. Black left the band in 1987. At about the same time, Gavin recruited cellist Caroline Lavelle after a chance encounter on the streets of London, and the band went on to release the nostalgic Ballroom, using the new spelling "De Dannan" for its name. Another major change in the lineup occurred the very next year, as the band recorded A Jacket of Batteries in 1988 with Leitrim singer Eleanor Shanley, Aidan Coffey on accordion, Colm Murphy on bodhrán and bones, and cellist Adele O'Dwyer replacing Lavelle. Minus O'Dwyer, the same band recorded 1/2 Set in Harlem in 1991, continuing their experimentation with contemporary songwriters' material and adding gospel and klezmer musicians to their unlikely stew. Although De Dannan's fate has seemed uncertain since, as various members dropped out or pursued solo projects, the band toured extensively in 1994 with a new singer, Tommy Flemming, and a new cassette entitled World Tour 1994—Studio & Live Recordings. In 1996, with Coffey replaced by accordionist Derek Hickey, De Dannan put out Hibernian Rhapsody, named after the band's intricate instrumental arrangement of Queen's rock anthem "Bohemian Rhapsody." However epic, it doesn't seem to be a finale just yet.

202 de dannan

what to buy: As De Danann was without a designated singer when The Mist Covered Mountain ♪♪♪♪ (Gael-Linn/Shanachie, 1980, prod. De Danann) was recorded, the band opted to include vocal tracks by two prominent exponents of Connemara sean-nós ("old-style") singing, Seán Ó Conaire and Tom Pháidín Tom, the latter just months before his death at age 85. Despite good intentions, the juxtaposition of their typically unaccompanied, rhythmically free style of singing with the band's bouzouki and whistle accompaniments often sounds at odds. However, the strength of the album is in the exciting instrumentals spun by Gavin, Piggot, and newly recruited Kerry accordionist Jackie Daly. The spectacular opening and closing sets of jigs into reels and the arrangement of seminal 18th-century composer Turlough O'Carolan's "Mr. O'Connor" are among the best instrumental tracks of the band's recorded output. The Star Spangled Molly ♪♪♪♪½ (Ogham/Shanachie, 1981, prod. De Danann, Nicky Ryan) is De Danann's salute to Irish American music of the 1920s and 1930s and to Gavin's favorite performers of the period, the Flanagan Brothers and Sligo fiddler James Morrison. Despite Maura O'Connell's reservations about performing Irish songs, this album established her as a powerful singer and her name is forever associated with the delightful Irish American stage songs "Maggie" and "My Irish Molly-O." Frankie Gavin also sings on "I'm Leaving Tipperary," one of the more joyous Irish emigration songs, borrowed from a 78 by the Boston-based Dan Sullivan's Shamrock Band. The instrumental tracks, featuring once again the tight playing of Gavin and Daly, are as energetic as ever. In the Flanagan Brothers' "New Irish Barn Dance," the instrumentation, adding piano accompaniment and hammered dulcimer touches, brilliantly captures the tune's music-hall character, while other medleys of reels and jigs echo performers of long ago: John McKenna, P.J. Conlon, John Kimmel. Oddly enough, probably the best-known track on the album, even if totally irrelevant to its theme, would have to be De Danann's famous arrangement of the Beatles' "Hey Jude," in which the melody gets transformed into a hornpipe. The die-hard De Danann fan may want to acquire the CD version recently put out by K-Tel Music as De Danann (K-Tel, 1996), as it includes two additional tracks, one instrumental and one vocal, which were originally released just as a single. The stunning voice of Mary Black is one reason Song for Ireland ♪♪♪♪½ (Cara/Sugar Hill, 1983, prod. Nick Bicât, De Danann) remains one of the band's most memorable albums. Black shines on the much-copied title song, Stephen Foster's classic "Hard Times," and "Live Not Where I Love," while Gavin is the vocalist on the Irish American stage song "Barney from Killarney." There are gems as well among the instrumentals, most of which were recorded while Daly was still in the band. Of the ones to which Daly's successor, Martin O'Connor, contributed, the opening "Arrival of the Queen of Sheba (In Galway)," based on Handel's sinfonia from his oratorio Solomon, is such a rollicking tour de force that one may start thinking the composer would have enjoyed it that way. The Best of De Danann ♪♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1987) is an excellent anthology based on the band's first four albums. In particular, it includes some tracks from De Danann's first two LPs, De Danann and Selected Jigs, Reels and Songs, both no longer available.

what to buy next: On Anthem ♪♪♪½ (Dara, 1985, prod. John Dunford, Alec Finn, Frankie Gavin), Mary Black and Dolores Keane share vocal duties, and, not surprisingly, this is the first De Danann album to give equal time to vocal and instrumental tracks. Black's voice is perfectly suited for the emotionally charged "Johnny I Hardly Knew Ye" and "Paddy's Lamentation." On the strength of their earlier success with "Hey Jude," the band asked Keane to sing on another Beatles classic, "Let It Be." Gavin and O'Connor continue to work their instrumental magic on medleys of traditional dance tunes, noteworthy new-but-stylistically-traditional compositions like Gavin's own three-part jig "The Wren's Nest," and "Ríl an Spidéal," a set of reels by Leitrim fiddle and piano player Charlie Lennon. A sequel of sorts to The Star Spangled Molly, Ballroom ♪♪♪½ (WEA/Green Linnet, 1987, prod. De Dannan) celebrates the music of the Irish and Irish American dancehalls of earlier decades. Pioneer musicians like John Kimmel and Eleanor Neary are remembered through dance tunes they recorded or composed, while Dolores Keane invites us to the waltz with her renditions of classics like "Teddy O'Neill," "The Sweet Forget-Me-Not," and the closing medley starting with "The Stone Outside Dan Murphy's Door." A touch of exoticism is provided by a medley of "Jewish Reels," learned from New York klezmer musician Andy Statman. A Jacket of Batteries ♪♪♪ (Harmac/Green Linnet, 1988, prod. various) introduced us to a new group of talented musicians: accordionist Aidan Coffey, who proves a worthy successor to Daly and O'Connor; singer Eleanor Shanley; and drummer Colm Murphy. For better or for worse, it also gave a definite impression that the band had settled on a formula: throw in a few jigs and reels, a piece of classical music ("The Rambles of Bach"), a Beatles song ("Eleanor Rigby"), and a mixture of traditional and contemporary songs. Still, there are good moments, for instance the reel medley of "Sailing In" (Charlie Lennon) and "Alice's Reel" (Frankie Gavin), or Shanley's passionate rendition of the classic "Carrigfergus." De Dannan's latest, Hibernian Rhapsody ♪♪♪ (The Bee's Knees, 1995/Shanachie, 1996, prod. De Dannan), shows that despite the passing of years Finn and Gavin can still find talented musicians—this time accordionist Derek Hickey and singer Tommy Flemming—willing to join the band. Hickey proves up to the task as Gavin's new "straight man," although the band's virtuosic but pointless instrumental arrangement of Queen's "Bohemian Rhapsody" is among the least interesting tracks. The intense singing style of Tommy Flemming suggests a comparison with that of Mary Black, but recent live appearances by the band show that the new combination works better there than on record. It's worth noting that the Bees Knees release and the Shanachie release are slightly different; the former contains the songs "The Water Is Wide" and "Fios Na Siochanna" and the instrumental "Do It in Jig Time," but does not have the song "Captain Jack" (composed by Meg Davis but not credited) and the instrumental "Sean McGuire's," which are on the U.S. version. So the Irish version has 16 tracks, the U.S. 15.

what to avoid: 1/2 Set in Harlem ♪♪½ (The Bee's Knees/Green Linnet, 1991, prod. Arty McGlynn, Frankie Gavin, Alec Finn), which follows to some extent the formula of A Jacket of Batteries, is De Dannan's most adventurous album to date. However, the inclusion of gospel singers on tracks like "Operator" and of klezmer-style clarinet and horn on a set of Irish hornpipes ends up sounding more incongruous than dynamic.

worth searching for: The first two De Danann albums, De Danann ♪♪♪♪ (Polydor, 1975, prod. Dónal Lunny) and Selected Jigs, Reels and Songs ♪♪♪♪½ (Decca, 1978, prod. Carsten Linde, Nicky Ryan, De Danann), are not currently available. They remain among the band's very best and are well worth searching for. On De Danann, which was available on CD from Polydor for a short while, classic instrumental tracks like the jig medley "Tripping up the Stairs," featuring Finn's fine bouzouki harmonies, or Gavin's fiddle solo on "The Gold Ring," are almost eclipsed by Dolores Keane's sean-nós vocals on songs like "The Rambling Irishman" or "The Shores of Lough Bran." Selected Jigs, Reels and Songs had a similar effect to that of the Bothy Band's 1975 album in that musicians would learn each and every tune on it to play at live sessions. The opening set of jigs into reels, "Tom Billy's"; the medley of Wren tunes played on three whistles; and the beautifully crafted counterpoint of bouzoukis and mandolins on "Carolan's Draught" are among the most memorable instrumental moments of this album. Johnny Moynihan's contribution will be remembered for his wonderful renditions of songs like "The Flower of Sweet Strabane" and "Barbara Allen." A few live tracks recorded in Germany in 1989 by the Jacket of Batteries lineup can be found on Ireland ♪♪♪♪ (WDR, 1993, prod. Christian Scholze, Jean Trouillet, Jan Reichow), perhaps more interesting for its recordings of Frankie Gavin with piper Liam O'Flynn and of the band Altan.

solo outings:

Alec Finn:
Blue Shamrock ♪♪♪½ (Cross Border Media/Celtic Heartbeat, 1994)

Jackie Daly:
Jackie Daly and Séamus Creagh ♪♪♪♪½ (Gael-Linn, 1977)
Music from Sliabh Luachra ♪♪♪♪ (Topic, 1977/Green Linnet, 1992)
(With Kevin Burke) Eavesdropper ♪♪♪♪ (Mulligan/Green Linnet, 1981)
Many's a Wild Night ♪♪♪½ (Gael-Linn, 1995)

Martin O'Connor:
The Connachtman's Rambles ♪♪♪♪ (Mulligan, 1979)
Perpetual Motion ♪♪♪½ (Claddagh, 1990)
Chatterbox ♪♪♪½ (Dara, 1993)

Colm Murphy:
An Bodhrán ♪♪♪½ (Gael-Linn, 1996)

influences:

- The Flanagan Brothers, James Morrison, John McKenna, Dan Sullivan's Shamrock Band, Planxty
- Arcady, Altan, Dervish, Patrick Street, Four Men and a Dog, Skylark see also: Arcady, Mary Bergin, Mary Black, the Black Family, Jackie Daly, John Faulkner, Alec Finn, Frankie Gavin, Dolores Keane, Maura O'Connell, Planxty, Andy Statman, Sweeney's Men

Philippe Varlet

Tony de la Rosa /El Conde (The Count)

Conjunto

Born 1931, in Sarita, TX, USA. Based in southern Texas, USA.

Tony de la Rosa began playing the accordion in a country band in south Texas before he was 14, but he soon saw that conjunto, that danceable mix of Spanish, Mexican, German, and American country music that pervades the border region, was his calling. In the 1950s, de la Rosa revolutionized conjunto and shaped much of its post–World War II sound by adding drums and electrifying the bajo sexto (12-string bass guitar) in his group. This sparked a new dance, the tachuachito, and led to conjunto bands playing larger rooms with a now-amplified sound. De la Rosa semi-retired some years ago, but he still tours the dancehalls and festivals of south Texas when his health permits—with some extra energy no doubt supplied by a 1998 National Heritage Fellowship from the National Endowment for the Arts, recognizing his lifetime contribution.

what's available: Three discs of Tony de la Rosa's music are readily available: Atotoniclo ♪♪♪½ (Arhoolie, 1964/1995, prod. Chris Strachwitz), Así Se Baila en Tejas ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1991, prod. Carl Finch), and Es Mi Derecho ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1995, prod. Carl Finch). Each of them contains recordings of the lively dance-directed music de la Rosa enjoys and in which he became a pioneer. During his heyday in the 1950s and '60s, more than 75 discs bearing de la Rosa's name were issued on regional labels, and at this writing there is talk of reissuing some of these. Tony de la Rosa's work is also represented in a number of collections, including Arhoolie's Tejano Roots series and Rounder's Conjunto! Texas-Mexico Border Music, each of which is reviewed in this book's Compilations section.

influences:

⏮ Narciso Martinez

⏭ Flaco Jimenez

Kerry Dexter

Paco de Lucia

Flamenco

Born Francisco Sanchez Gomez, December 21, 1947, in Algeciras, Cadiz, Spain. Based in Spain.

A melodic fluidity has placed Paco de Lucia in the forefront of contemporary flamenco. In addition to more than a score of solo albums, de Lucia has recorded with such world-renowned guitarists as Al Di Meola, John McLaughlin, and Larry Coryell. According to McLaughlin, de Lucia "just might be the world's most inspired guitarist."

Born in Algeciras, a small town on the Mediterranean Sea in southern Spain, de Lucia inherited his love of music from his father, Antonio, and older brother, Ramon. Under his father's training, de Lucia spent much of his childhood studying flamenco guitar. Making his professional debut on Radio Algeciras at the age of 12, de Lucia placed first in a major competition at the Festival Concurso Internacional Flamenco de Jerez de la Frontera two years later. In 1962, de Lucia and his brother received a special award at the same festival for their duet "Los Chiquitos de Algeciras." The following year, de Lucia became a featured accompanist for Jose Greco's dance company.

Moving with his family to Madrid in 1964, de Lucia began performing regularly at a flamenco club opened by his father. Together with his brother and Ricardo Modrego, de Lucia recorded two albums in 1965. He also recorded with singer Fernandez Diaz and saxophonist Pedro Iturralde. In 1967, de Lucia toured with Festival Flamenco Gitano and recorded his first solo album, Fabulosa Guitarra de Paco de Lucia. After traveling to Brazil, de Lucia began incorporating elements of the bossa nova into his highly skilled style of flamenco. Released in 1969, Fantasia Flamenco showcased de Lucia's unique musical hybrid.

Performing his American debut concert at Carnegie Hall in 1970, de Lucia joined with American jazz guitarists Al Di Meola (Return to Forever), John McLaughlin (Mahavishnu Orchestra, Shakti), and Larry Coryell to record two groundbreaking guitar albums in the late 1970s. After forming a sextet in 1981, de Lucia balanced appearances with the band, trio performances with J.M. Banders and J.M. Canizores, and collaborations with American jazz pianist Chick Corea. In 1989, de Lucia teamed with operatic tenor Placido Domingo as well. De Lucia's sextet was expanded in 1991 with the addition of dancer and percussionist Manuel Soler. De Lucia recorded an album, Concierto De Aranjuez, with Orquesta de Cadaques the same year, and has also composed and performed on such film soundtracks as Sevillanas, Carmen, The Hit, and La Sabina.

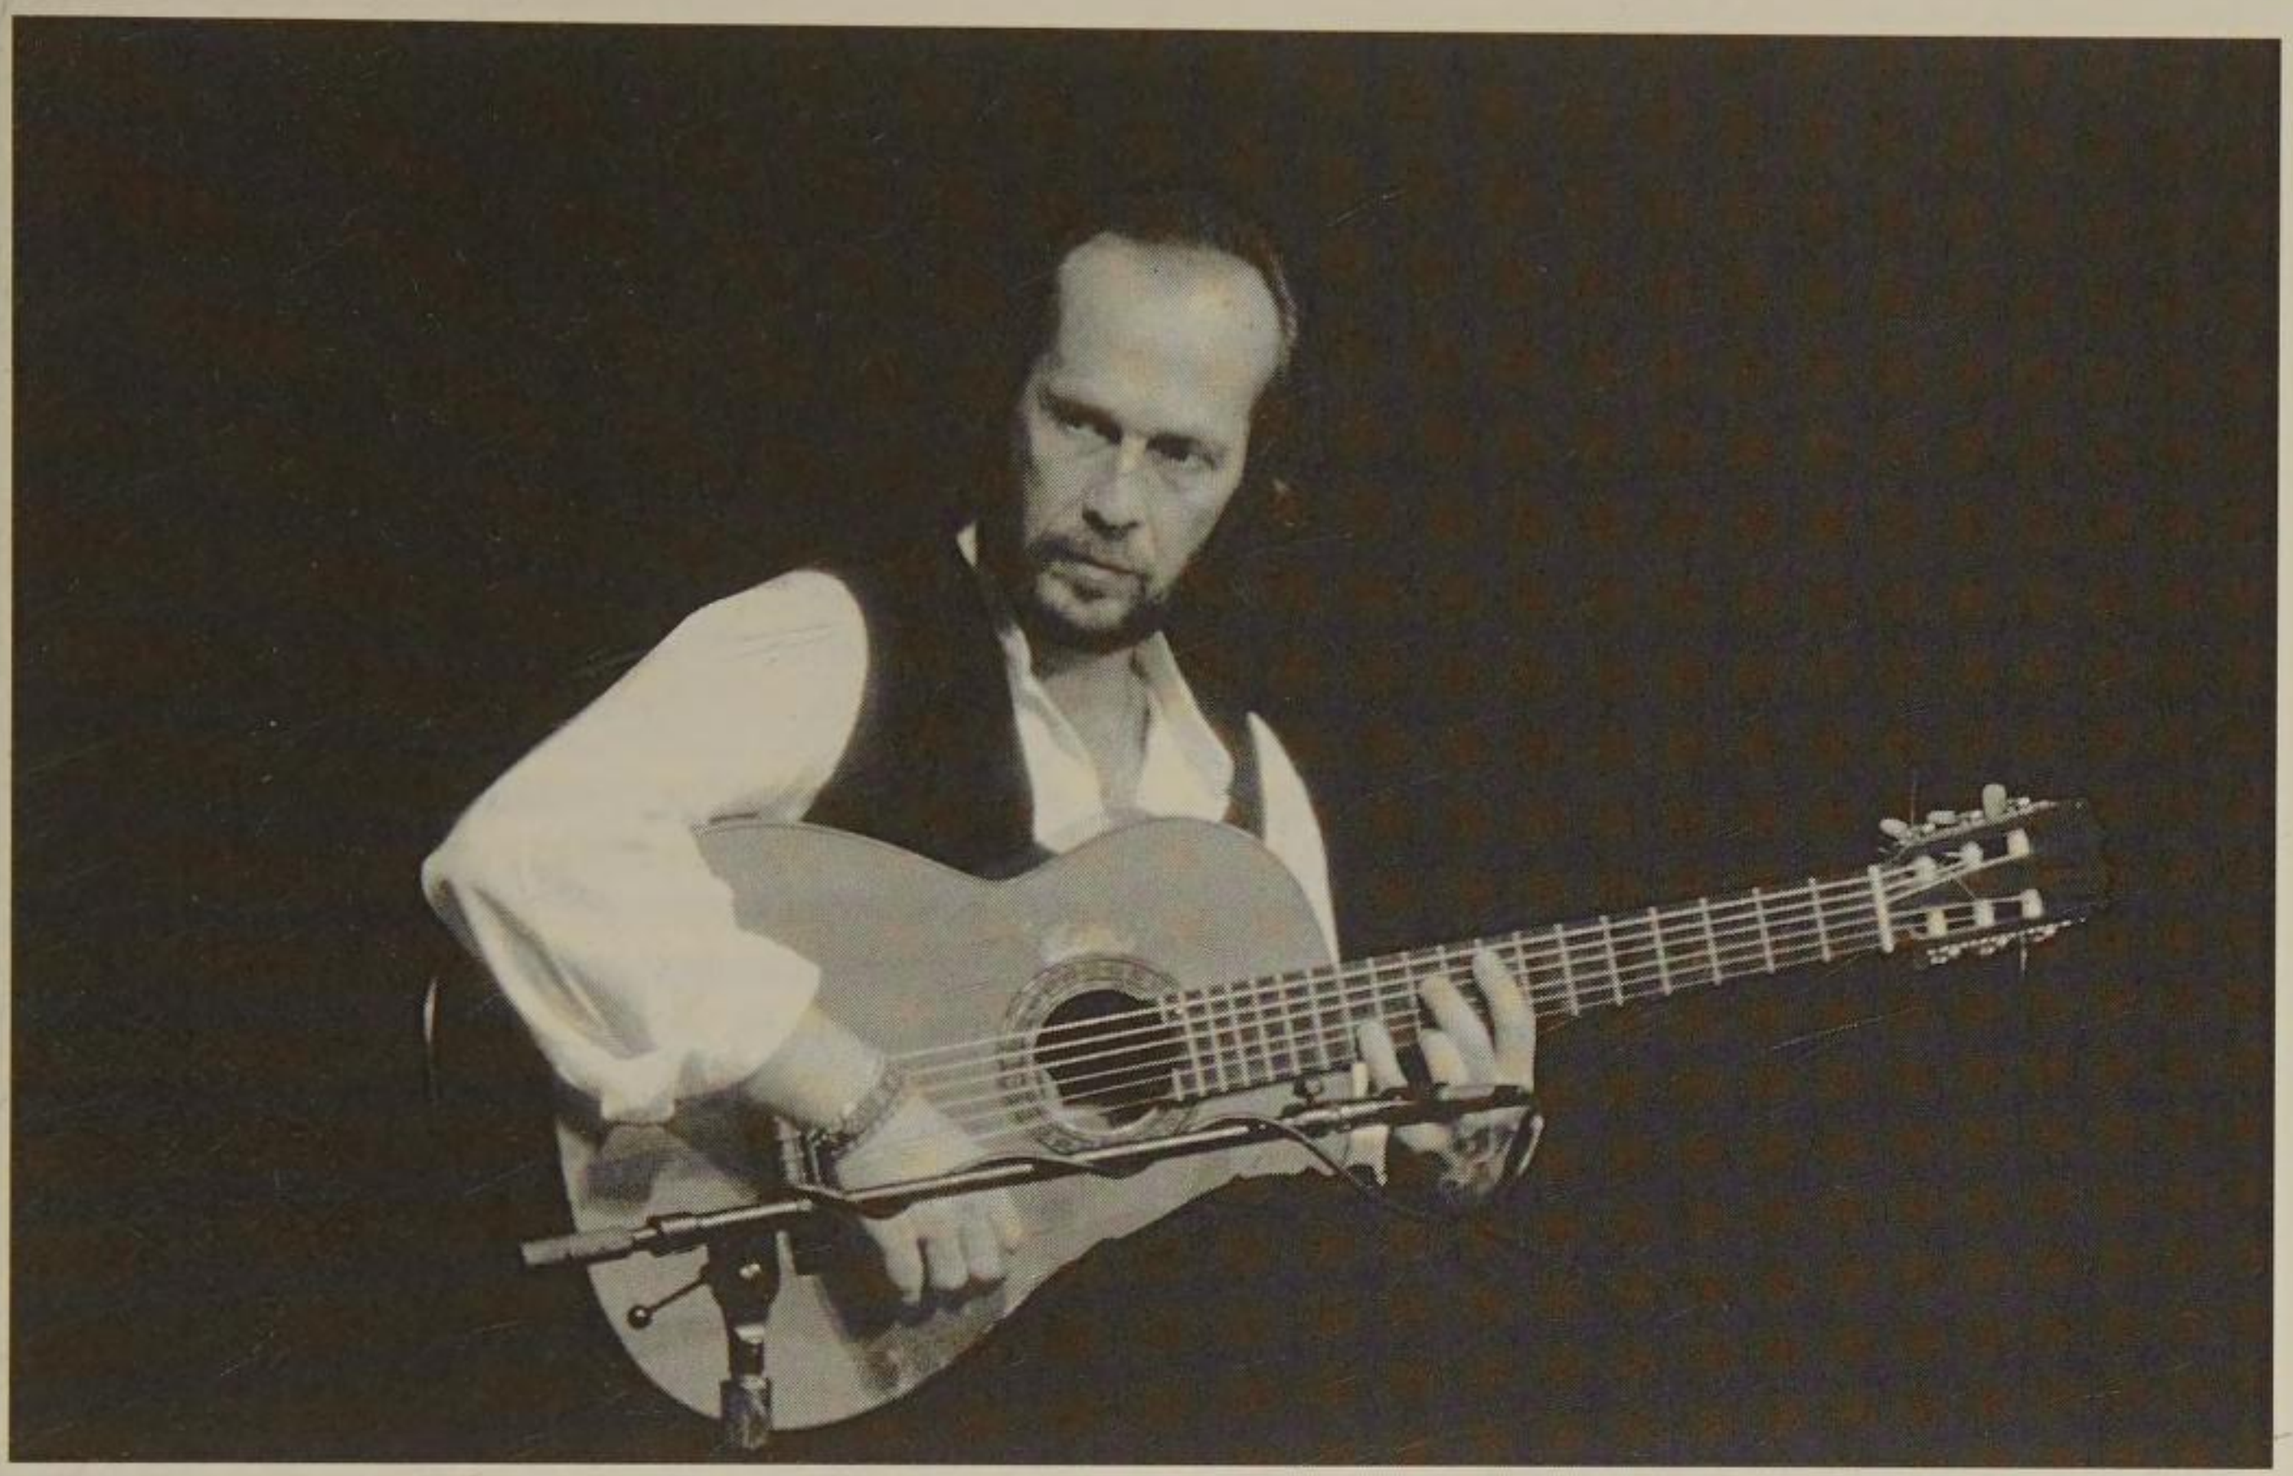
what to buy: Recorded 15 years after their first collaboration, Guitar Trio ♪♪♪♪♪ (PolyGram, 1996, prod. Paco de Lucia, John McLaughlin, Al Di Meola) reflects the continued evolution of de Lucia and American guitarists Di Meola and McLaughlin. Sharing solos and offering one another an unwavering accompaniment, the three guitarists explore the full vocabulary of their instruments.

what to buy next: De Lucia successfully returned to the pure Flamenco sounds of his earliest work on Sirocco ♪♪♪♪½ (Verve, 1987/Polydor, 1991, prod. Paco de Lucia).

best of the rest:

Fabulosa Guitarra de Paco de Lucia ♪♪♪♪½ (Verve, 1967/1984)

Castro Marin ♪♪♪♪ (PolyGram, 1981)



Paco de Lucia

Entre Dos Aguas ♪♪♪♪½ (Polydor, 1986)
Solo Quiero Caminar ♪♪♪♪ (Polydor, 1986)
Los Mejores Guitarras ♪♪♪♪ (Kubaney, 1990)
En Vivo ♪♪♪♪ (Alex, 1991)
Zyryab ♪♪♪♪ (Verve, 1992)
Concerto de Aranjuez ♪♪♪♪½ (PolyGram, 1993)
Live in America ♪♪♪♪½ (Philips, 1994)
Dos Guitarras Flamencas En America Latina ♪♪♪♪½ (PolyGram, 1994)
Duende Flamenco ♪♪♪♪ (PolyGram, 1994)
Hispanoamerica ♪♪♪♪ (PolyGram, 1994)
Anthology of Flamenco Songs ♪♪♪♪ (Iris, 1996)
Anthology of Flamenco Songs, Vol. 2 ♪♪♪♪ (Iris, 1996)
Anthology of Flamenco Songs, Vol. 3 ♪♪♪♪ (Iris, 1996)

worth searching for: Released in Japan, 4 CD Box Set ♪♪♪♪½ (Alex, 1987, prod. Paco de Lucia) is a compendious and satisfying anthology of previously released tracks.

influences:
⏮ Egberto Gismonti, Baden Powell, Antonio de Lucia
⏭ The Gipsy Kings, Al Di Meola

see also: George Dalaras, Camarón de la Isla

Craig Harris

Dead Can Dance

Gothic/world fusion

Formed 1983, in London, England. Disbanded 1998.

Lisa Gerrard (Australia), vocals, yang ch'in, percussion; Brendan Perry (England), vocals, guitars, whistles, bouzouki, percussion; Robert Perry (England), bagpipes, whistles, bouzouki, percussion (1987–98); John Bonnar (Wales), keyboards, vocals, percussion (1987–98); Ronan O'Snodaigh (Ireland), percussion, vocals (1993–98); Lance Hogan (Ireland), guitars, percussion, vocals (1993–98); Peter Ulrich (England), percussion (1995–98).

Few bands have undergone such drastic stylistic evolutions as Dead Can Dance did over the course of a 15-year career. Usually associated with the modern gothic scene, the group was one of the first signed to Ivo Watts Russell's elite 4AD label, and along with similar groups like Cocteau Twins and Clan of Xymox, the synth-driven moodiness of their early work would ultimately help to establish 4AD's distinctive sound. But by the late '80s, the group's core members, Lisa Gerrard and Brendan Perry, had begun to shrug off the gothic stereotypes, incorporating a number of unique influences into their style, including French poetry (their second album, Spleen and Ideal, was directly inspired by Charles Baudelaire), baroque instrumentation, Eastern European chants, and medieval madrigal songs. As they reached the end of their first decade together, the duo began taking an even broader interest in the traditional music of various world cultures, and 1993's Into the Labyrinth found them using a wide variety of ethnic instrumentation, with Gerrard's ethereal vocals showing increasingly strong Arabic and Indian influences. By 1994, Dead Can Dance had found a way to resolve all of these disparate artistic elements into a remarkably seamless whole, with Gregorian-style chants and European folk nestling comfortably against Middle Eastern melodies and throbbing tribal percussion, sometimes all within the same song. Unfortunately, as Perry and Gerrard continued to evolve artistically, Dead Can Dance's releases became ever more sporadic, thanks in large part to the sheer geographical distance between them—Perry had relocated to an island off the coast of Ireland, while Gerrard had returned to her Australian homeland. In 1995, Gerrard emerged with her first solo album, The Mirror Pool, and although the band would go on to one more album and tour in 1996, the release of her second solo effort in 1998 ultimately spelled the end of one of music's most exotic and eclectic partnerships.

what to buy: Despite its radical stylistic changes over the years, the quality of Dead Can Dance's releases remained remarkably consistent, but their last album together, Spiritchaser ♪♪♪♪♪ (4AD, 1996, prod. Brendan Perry, Lisa Gerrard), is a paradoxically great place to start. Their most collaborative effort ever, these eight epic compositions reference everything from Native American poetry and Vodun (Haitian "voodoo") invocations to the Beatles' "Within You without You," all flowing together to create a hypnotic, transcendental masterpiece that seems to exist in its own time and place, evoking the best of heaven and earth simultaneously. Nearly as rapturous is Toward the Within ♪♪♪♪½ (4AD, 1994, prod. Guy Charbonneau), an exquisitely beautiful concert recorded live at Santa Monica's Mayfield Theatre, featuring fan favorites like "Yulunga (Spirit Dance)" and "The Wind That Shakes the Barley" alongside spellbinding new (and largely improvised) compositions like "Rakim" and "Desert Song," plus a chilling cover of Sinéad O'Connor's "I Am Stretched on Your Grave."

what to buy next: Although it doesn't boast the myriad ethnic influences of their later work, Aion ♪♪♪♪½ (4AD, 1990, prod. Dead Can Dance) highlights the band's artistic progression from gothic/baroque scene-leaders to willfully experimental innovators with strong medieval ties. With far less reliance on synthesizer sounds than most of their mid-'80s efforts, the field chants, maypole dances, and stunning vocal arrangements of this, their fourth album, were harbingers of even greater things to come for the pan-cultural duo.

the rest:
Dead Can Dance ♪♪♪ (4AD, 1984)
Spleen and Ideal ♪♪♪½ (4AD, 1985)
Into the Realm of a Dying Sun ♪♪♪½ (4AD, 1987)
The Serpent's Egg ♪♪♪♪ (4AD, 1988)
Into the Labyrinth ♪♪♪♪ (4AD, 1993)
A Passage in Time ♪♪♪½ (Rykodisc, 1994)

worth searching for: The 77-minute Toward the Within live concert video may be a little difficult to track down these days, but with 14 beautiful songs and interview footage with both Gerrard and Perry, it's a must-have for any Dead Can Dance devotee. Also worth searching for is the program from their 1996 world tour to support Spiritchaser, with an inserted CD single called "Sambatiki," which would ultimately prove to be the group's last recording together.

solo outings:
Lisa Gerrard:
The Mirror Pool ♪♪♪♪ (4AD, 1995)
(With Pieter Bourke) Duality ♪♪♪½ (4AD, 1998)

influences:
- Cocteau Twins, Bauhaus, Le Mystère des Voix Bulgares, Gregorian chants, Mickey Hart
- Enya, Deep Forest, Enigma, Adiemus, Miranda Sex Garden

Bret Love

Déanta

Irish traditional

Formed 1987, in Portglenone, County Antrim, Northern Ireland. Disbanded 1998.

Kate O'Brien, fiddle, viola (1987–98); Eoghan O'Brien, guitar, harp (1987–98); Mary Dillon, vocals, harp, keyboards, guitar (1987–98); Clódagh Warnock, bouzouki, fiddle, bodhrán, percussion (1987–98); Paul Mullan, flute, tin whistle (1987–94); Deirdre Havlin, flute, tin whistle (1994–98); Rosie Mulholland, keyboards, fiddle (1994–98). (All members are from Ireland.)

Déanta (meaning "done" or "complete" in Gaelic) is one of a handful of bands from Northern Ireland to have gained some recognition in the Irish traditional music scene. They came together in the early 1980s, when the O'Briens, Clódagh Warnock, and a few others entered the Gael-Linn Slógadh competitions—also a launchpad for the famous Donegal band Clannad some years before. As Déanta, they began to attract attention during a tour of the United States shortly after the release of their first, eponymous album in 1990. At the core of the band were siblings Kate and Eoghan O'Brien, who anchored the instrumental sound, and lead singer Mary Dillon, whose stunning voice won her two All-Ireland titles. Warnock contributed to the texture of the accompaniments with bouzouki and percussion, while flute players Paul Mullan (on the first album) and Deirdre Havlin (on the next two) joined in with fiddler Kate O'Brien for the instrumentals. An unusual aspect of the band is that its members all held day jobs and remained part-time musicians, touring very little and playing instead at large festivals now and then. Unfortunately, the unavoidable pressures of such an arrangement seemed to have finally taken their toll when the band announced its breakup early in 1998. This ending was all the more unhappy in that, despite their part-time status, Déanta had become one of Green Linnet's best-selling bands. The delightful music they created together makes this a surprise but no mystery. Their material was carefully chosen and brilliantly arranged, often composed by band members as with most of the dance tunes on their final album, Whisper of a Secret. And even when they played such dance tunes, these musicians seemed more interested in bringing out beauty and refinement than going for speed and drive. A most pleasing change of pace, literally.

what's available: Déanta ♪♪♪♪ (Spring, 1990/Green Linnet, 1992, prod. Steven Cooney, Déanta) is a short CD with only nine tracks, but most of them are gems. Dillon sings beautifully on "The Green Fields of Canada" and "Dark Iniseoghain," but it is the band's arrangement as well as her performance that makes "Willie Taylor" the essential track on this album. Instrumentals like the energetic "Flight of the Termite," featuring Kate O'Brien's own "Katie's Reel," or the elegant "Harp Airs," composed by Dillon and Eoghan O'Brien, are especially enjoyable. Ready for the Storm ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1994, prod. Neil Martin) was Déanta's first album for Green Linnet and featured the two then-new members—Deirdre Havlin, a most worthy successor to Paul Mullan, on flute and whistle, and Rosie Mulholland on keyboards and fiddle. They give a great boost to the instrumentals by increasing the possibilities for timbral and textural shadings. Once again, the emphasis is on new compositions, by band members and other respected musicians like Chicago fiddler Liz Carroll or Sligo/Roscommon flute player Josie McDermott. Although Dillon does well on Dougie MacLean's "Ready for the Storm" and on "The Lakes of Pontchartrain"—a courageous choice considering the song was previously recorded by none other than Planxty and Paul Brady—her singing of Alastair McDonald's "Culloden's Harvest" and the traditional "The Benedy Glen" are the album's showstoppers. Déanta's latest, Whisper of a Secret ♪♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1997, prod. Neil Martin), continues very much in the same vein but takes it up a

gamelan

In Java and Bali, each village used to have its own percussion orchestra, or gamelan. These ensembles, some still extant today, consist of up to 40 musicians playing a variety of drums, metallophones, gongs, and other instruments to create a rich tapestry of sound quite unlike that of any other large orchestra. Those instruments are themselves collectively referred to as a gamelan, and its elements are generally all similar in design and fashioned from the same materials, usually bronze and wood. In addition to the percussion instruments, which are tuned to a uniform pitch, the orchestra's musical texture is filled out by wooden flutes, zithers, and fiddles, and typically joined by vocalists and dancers. The gamelans originated in Java prior to the 15th century, reaching their heyday in the 19th century when they were a prominent fixture of the Javanese royal courts. The orchestras' importance diminished following the nation's independence in 1945, but they still play at festivals and music schools, on the radio, and in several of the remaining royal courts. Performances usually take place in conjunction with drama, dance, and other forms of artistic expression.

Gamelan spread to Bali in the 15th century, when many of the rulers of Java fled there after the Muslim conquest of their land. In Bali, the form has taken two rather different courses. The kecak includes a chorus of vocalists chanting and dancing in imitation of the island's monkey population. A more widespread manifestation of Balinese gamelan is in the Hindu temples, with some manner of the music performed in the religious ceremonies of almost every village.

In recent years, interest and participation in gamelan has diminished as the youth of both countries have discovered Western rock and pop. Too often, contemporary gamelan performances are done for tourist groups, and the original cultural and religious significance of the practice is neglected. Consult the Compilations section of this volume for some gamelan recordings of good fidelity—both sonic and social—to the genuine article.

Michael Parrish

notch. Havlin's flute playing has become even more impressive, and her duets with Kate O'Brien are all the stronger for it. The two continue to produce superb new tunes—including "Beaujolais in Boston" and "Jimmy's Trip to Clonmel" from the opening track—and perform them at an appropriately relaxed pace for melodies that deserve savoring. Mary Dillon's singing is as exquisite as ever, particularly on "Willie and Mary" and on Andy Stewart's "Where Are You," and is well served by the band's sparse but intensely musical arrangements.

influences:

⏮ Ann O'Brien, the Chieftains, Planxty, the Bothy Band, Clannad

⏭ Altan, Dervish

Philippe Varlet

Deep Forest

Worldbeat

Formed 1992, in Paris, France. Based in France.

Eric Mouquet, keyboards, programming; Michel Sanchez, keyboards, programming.

Not a band, per se, Deep Forest is the work of two French musicians who sample ethnic music and then combine these exotic sounds into world-music/dance hybrids. At times their CDs can be fascinating to hear, but they carry with them a stigma that no politically responsible listener can, or should, ignore. Just because these two Western Europeans bought the rights to the vocal samples they manipulate doesn't make their cut-and-paste modernizations any less odious. And just because their own press materials acknowledge that Deep Forest albums aren't intended to be "ethnically correct" doesn't make their inherent disrespect toward the cultures they sonically plunder any more forgivable. In defense of Deep Forest, it must be noted that some of the vocal parts they employ were recorded specifically for their CDs. It's up to the listener to decide what's most important.

what to buy: Although the group's debut is not as consistent or varied as its third album, Deep Forest ♪♪♪ (Epic, 1992, prod. Dan Lacksman) is the one to buy first, largely because it includes two "hits," the Peter Gabriel–influenced title track and the alluring "Sweet Lullaby."

what to buy next: The group's most accomplished musical collage, Comparsa ♪♪♪½ (550 Music/Sony, 1998, prod. Deep Forest) uses more Latin American vocal samples than African ones. As always with Deep Forest, however, let your conscience be your guide.

what to avoid: Despite the vocal contributions of Hungarian folk star Márta Sebestyén, Boheme ♪♪ (550 Music/Sony, 1995, prod. Eric Mouquet, Michel Sanchez) embodies the worst aspects of designer world music. It won a Grammy, but that says more about the Grammys than it does about the album.

influences:

⏮ Enigma, Peter Gabriel, African Pygmy folk melodies

see also: Márta Sebestyén

Bob Remstein

Desmond Dekker

Rocksteady

Born Desmond Decres, July 16, 1943, in Kingston, Jamaica. Based in Jamaica.

Desmond Dekker became one of Jamaica's best-selling performers with his song "Israelites," an international hit in 1969. Dekker's compelling vocals and the rocksteady (proto-reggae) rhythms of his band, the Aces, made the song Jamaica's first gold record. The younger brother of George Decres, who recorded with the Pioneers, and Sister Pauline, who joined with vocalist Derrick Morgan on the hit duet "You Never Miss Your Water," Dekker sang with a church choir as a youngster. Although he had realized a calling to music, Dekker was unable to interest a record company until demanding an audition with producer and label owner Leslie Kong in 1962. Kong was so impressed by Dekker's audition that he quickly contracted Dekker to record the single—and prompt Jamaican hit—"Honor Your Father and Your Mother." Dekker penned several songs, including "Rude Boy Train" and "Intensified," that later proved fruitful for other artists, and he was instrumental in getting Bob Marley to sign with Kong's label. Although Dekker continued to work with Kong through the 1960s, problems arose when Kong became absorbed with the career of Barbadian vocalist Jackie Opel. Shortly after Marley left to work with Clement "Sir Coxsone" Dodd, Dekker agreed to work with Duke Reid. Their collaboration, however, was never consummated, as Dekker succumbed to Kong's pleading that he return.

Dekker's first international hit was not in fact "Israelites," but "007 (Shanty Town)," which reached the top of Jamaica's charts in 1967. Released in England, the song went to #12 on the British hit parade (and was later featured in the legendary reggae film The Harder They Come). Dekker extended his success the following year, when his "Intensified" placed first in Jamaica's annual Independence Festival song competition. "Israelites" itself was initially released as "Poor Me, Israelites" in 1968. When the song failed to reach the charts, Graeme Goodall, Kong's U.K. representative and the managing director of Pyramid Records, remixed the master tapes and reissued the result as the "Israelites" the world would know and love—and send to the top of the charts in England, Canada, Sweden, West Germany, Holland, and South Africa, and the #9 position in the U.S. (The song would later be known to even more people through the films Drugstore Cowboy and Miami Blues.)

Although Dekker's followup single, "A It Mek," failed to chart in the U.S., it reached #7 in England. Dekker's last chart entry, "You Can Get It If You Really Want," reached #2 in the U.K. but failed to break the top 100 Stateside. Nonetheless, following the success of "Israelites," Dekker disbanded the Aces. Although he continued to tour as a soloist, he faded into obscurity as reggae replaced rocksteady as Jamaica's dominant sound. His career suffered further in the aftermath of Kong's death in 1971, but in the late '70s it was temporarily buoyed by the British ska revival (which harkened back to yet another stylistic predecessor of reggae). Signing with Stiff Records, Dekker released two albums—Black and Dekker in 1980 and Compass Point in 1981—and later joined forces with British ska band the Specials for King of Ska in 1991 and King of Kings in 1994, a legend of reggae's beginnings and some giants of its aftermath respectively enjoying a third and second wave.

what to buy: Twenty of Dekker's recordings are reprised on Rockin' Steady: The Best of Desmond Dekker ♪♪♪♪ (Rhino, 1992, prod. Leslie Kong). In addition to the hit version of "Israelites," the album spans from Dekker's first single, "Honor Your Father and Mother," in 1963, to early-'70s favorites like "You Can Get It If You Really Want" and "Reggae Recipe."

what to buy next: Recorded at the height of the British ska revival, Black and Dekker ♪♪♪♪ (Stiff, 1980, prod. Robert Palmer), Dekker's first album on the Stiff label, featured turbo-charged, punk-inspired renditions of his best-known tunes.

the rest:
This Is ♪♪♪ (Trojan, 1969)
Israelites ♪♪♪♪ (UNI, 1969)
You Can Get It ♪♪♪ (Trojan, 1970)
Double Dekker ♪♪♪♪ (Trojan, 1974)
Sweet 16 Hits ♪♪♪♪ (Trojan, 1978)
Compass Point ♪♪♪♪ (Stiff, 1981)
Profile ♪♪♪ (Teldec, 1981)
Original Reggae Hitsound ♪♪♪♪ (Trojan, 1985)
20 Golden Pieces ♪♪♪♪ (Bulldog, 1987)
Official Live & Rare ♪♪♪♪ (Trojan, 1987)
Greatest Hits ♪♪♪♪ (Street Life, 1988)
The Best of & the Rest Of ♪♪♪♪ (Action Replay, 1989)
(With the Specials) King of Ska ♪♪♪ (Trojan, 1991/Varese Sarabande, 1998)
Music Like Dirt ♪♪♪ (Trojan, 1992)
Shanty Town Original ♪♪♪ (Drive Archive, 1994)
Action! ♪♪♪ (Lagoon, 1994)
(With the Specials) King of Kings ♪♪♪♪ (Trojan, 1994)
Moving Out ♪♪♪ (Trojan, 1996)
Archive ♪♪♪♪ (Rialto, 1996)
First Time for a Long Time ♪♪♪ (Trojan, 1997)
The Original Rude Boy ♪♪♪ (Music Club, 1997)
Intensified ♪♪♪♪ (Lagoon, 1997)
Israelites: 20 Greatest Hits ♪♪♪♪ (Sound Solution, 1997) Writing on the Wall ♪♪♪♪ (Trojan, 1998)

influences:
⏮ The Skatalites, Jimmy Cliff, Bob Marley
⏭ The Specials, Third World, UB40, the English Beat

see also: The Specials

Craig Harris

Dan Del Santo

Worldbeat

Born in TX, USA. Based in Austin, TX, USA.

Del Santo, a longtime Austin bandleader, claims to have invented the term "worldbeat" (though he's not the only one). His big band, founded in the late 1980s, combines various Latin, African, and Caribbean strains into tunes with solid grooves and politically charged lyrics.

what's available: Off Your Nyash ♪♪♪ (Flying Fish, 1990, prod. Dan Del Santo, Slim Heilpern) was an early example of the coming worldbeat boom, including tunes that touch on reggae, Zimbabwean chimurenga, and other international styles.

influences:
⏮ Joe Higgs, Thomas Mapfumo
⏭ Looters, Paul Simon

j. poet

Geno Delafose

Cajun, creole, zydeco

Born February 6, 1971, in Eunice, LA, USA. Based in Duralde, LA, USA.

Geno Delafose started playing frattoir (washboard) in his father John's band the Eunice Playboys—joining older brothers Tony and John Jr.—at the age of seven. As time went by Geno graduated to drums and then to warming up the crowd on accordion before his father came on. By 1992 he was sharing much of the on-stage accordion time with his father, and when John Sr. died in 1994, Geno was ready to take over leadership of the band. He plays in a more tuneful and traditional style than almost any of his peers, with definitely less of a rock influence and more of a Cajun one. Having been the Playboys' drummer and frattoir player both, he knows what constitutes a great beat—and with the help of his cousin Germaine Jack's excellent drum work, the band always provides.

Geno Delafose

what to buy: The music on La Chanson Perdue ♪♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1998, prod. Scott Billington) is like Geno himself: tall, well-mannered, and graceful. No other young zydeco musician comes to mind who would be willing to explore his Creole roots as deeply as Delafose does on this record. Old-time Creole music revolves around the interplay between button accordion and fiddle; for this recording Geno recruited fiddlers Steve Riley and Dirk Powell to duet with him on several tracks. A number of the album's selections, like "Jolie Bassette/Quo Faire" and "Chere Ici, Chere la Bas," are famously associated with the Creole musicians Canray Fontenot and "Bois Sec" Ardoin. Geno brings these tunes to life and shows that they have a role to play into the new century. Geno's other band, French Rockin' Boogie, refreshes the remaining half of the CD, proving that you can look forward and look back at the same time.

what to buy next: Although it's rare for a studio recording of zydeco music to capture the passion and feeling of the live band experience, That's What I'm Talking About! ♪♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1996, prod. Scott Billington) comes very close. This may not be the hottest zydeco in terms of sales, but it is about as good as unadulterated Creole zydeco music gets. From the opening of "Geno's Two Step," this band just kicks. They acknowledge the popularity of the newer sounds, like Beau Jocque's, but stay very much in the Eunice Playboys tradition Geno grew up in; they do, however, evoke some of the Creole swing that Boozoo Chavis seems to pull off so effortlessly. This CD covers several of John Delafose's tunes and all are excellent; even Geno's obligatory soulful ballad "Teardrops" (complete with B3 organ) fits right in. There are no frills and no wasted notes here—just the pure sound of this band doing what they do best. French Rockin' Boogie ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1994, prod. Scott Billington) tries too hard to be more than it needs to be. Maybe it's the horns, or maybe it's just Geno feeling his way out from the long shadow of his father on this first solo effort. This is still a very good zydeco record, maybe just not a great Delafose record.

influences:

◀◀ Clifton Chenier, Amédée Ardoin, Marc Savoy

▶▶ Keith Frank

see also: John Delafose & the Eunice Playboys, Steve Riley & the Mamou Playboys

Jared Snyder

John Delafose & the Eunice Playboys

Zydeco

Formed 1980, in Eunice, LA, USA. Based in Eunice, LA, USA.

John Delafose (born April 16, 1939, in Duralde, LA, USA; died September 17, 1994, in Lawtell, LA, USA), accordion, vocals, frattoir; Geno Delafose, drums, accordion, vocals; Tony Delafose, bass; John Delafose Jr., frattoir, drums; Charles Prudhomme, guitar; Joseph Prudhomme, bass; Germaine Jack, drums, frattoir. (All members are from USA.)

John Delafose and the Eunice Playboys played zydeco the way it's meant to be played—with a hard-driving, stripped-down beat that makes you wish you were in a smoky dancehall in south Louisiana with a bunch of other crazies whose feet can't stop. As with many other zydeco outfits, the Eunice Playboys are family. A big name since the mid-'70s, John Delafose formed the band with sons Geno, John Jr., and Tony and cousin Germaine Jack (in addition to the guitar and bass combination of Charles and Joseph Prudhomme—brothers, though not of John's). A certifiable accordion legend, John played a traditional style not unlike the better-known Clifton Chenier. The Playboys' repertoire runs from the customary French-sung waltzes, to wild dance numbers with nasty grooves, to country heartbreakers.

what to buy: Pere et Garcon Zydeco ♪♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1992, prod. Scott Billington) is a great collection of Delafose-penned numbers, new takes on zydeco classics, and a couple of country tunes thrown in for a lagniappe. John and Geno split accordion duties on this disc, recorded live in the studio. The roughness of some of the cuts doesn't take away from the fun, it only adds to the immediacy. The set includes the traditional "Mon Coeur Fait Mal," "Watch That Dog," "Down in Texas Way," and "Grand Mamou"; John's originals range from "My Little Dog" (a classic itself) to "Go Back Where You Been" and "Friday Night Waltz"; and the Playboys give a whole new spin to Don Gibson's "I Can't Stop Loving You." Blues Stay Away from Me ♪♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1993, prod. Scott Billington) is worthwhile just for the Linda Barry cover art. The Eunice Playboys swing across this record, showing that great Creole music is about subtle syncopation and moving the beat around—not the bone-crunching double-clutching that dominates now. The album features John Delafose's fiddle on a couple of tunes, with the accordion duties again shared between himself and Geno.

what to buy next: Joe Pete Got Two Women ♪♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1988, prod. Chris Strachwitz) contains the classic title track and several other of Delafose's genre-defining tunes. It features an earlier version of the Eunice Playboys, when Geno and Tony enthusiastically drove the music on drums and frattoir, the always-solid Prudhomme brothers locked into tight grooves, and John Delafose laid out the accordion and vocal lines on top. It might slip and sway a little, but it always swings.

the rest:
Zydeco Man ♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1980)
Uncle Bud Zydeco ♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1982)
Heartaches & Hot Steps ♪♪♪½ (Maison de Soul, 1984)
Zydeco Excitement! ♪♪♪½ (Maison de Soul, 1984)

worth searching for: Delafose and the boys appear prominently on some live zydeco compilations, including Zydeco Live! Vol. 2 (Rounder, 1989) and Stomp Down Zydeco (Rounder, 1992). On Tribute to John Delafose (Deep South Records, 1995, prod. Tony Delafose), directed by John's son Tony, a number of zydeco stars take turns interpreting and honoring his father's music, including C.J. Chenier, Buckwheat Zydeco, and Terrance Simien.

influences:
- Alphonse "Bois Sec" Ardoin, Amédée Ardoin, Clifton Chenier, Boozoo Chavis, Canray Fontenot
- Chris Ardoin, Buckwheat Zydeco, Chubby Carrier, Geno Delafose, Keith Frank, Zachary Richard

see also: Geno Delafose, Willis Prudhomme

Jared Snyder and Andrew BeDell

Issac Delgado

Timba, salsa

Born 1963, in Havana, Cuba. Based in Havana, Cuba.

Every young vocal music needs a Marvin Gaye . . . a cat who can ride the rhythm, change the beat, swagger and cry, get deep and slyly wink. In the go-for-yours immediacy of today's timba (next-generation Cuban salsa) youth, vocalist Issac Delgado is an oasis of verdant emotionality. Gifted with the same sharp, piquantly Everyman tenor as Stateside salsa greats Hector Lavoe and Rubén Blades, Delgado definitely keeps the Cuban hometown crew starvin' fo' mo' like Marvin. Raised in a family of music professionals—his mother Lina Ramirez founded the descarga ("jam session") band Las Mulatas De Ramme—Delgado's formative years were full of exposure to Frank Emilio Flynn and other pioneers of '50s filin (bolero amped by the blues); salsero Tito Gomez; and, from up north, recordings by NYC's Fania All-Stars, Cheo Feliciano, and Willie Colón. In 1978, Delgado had his first-ever professional gig—with childhood spar/now-acclaimed pianist Gonzalo Rubalcaba—in the band Proyecto. Steadily clocking props via residences with the Panchito Alonso Orquesta, Grupo Galaxia, and the Cabaret Tropicana (the Cotton Club of tourist Cuba), the vocalist cashed in big-time in '88 when he joined super group NG La Banda. Both sides were the better after the brief, three-year association—Delgado-sung hits bigged-up the band's profile; he became a pop star. Since venturing out with his own orquesta in '91, he's become the premier male vocalist in contemporary Cuban music. Politically banned from U.S. airwaves for most of the decade, Delgado's voice was still heard, ironically, through hit covers of his songs by el Norte–based Dons like El Canario, Johnny Rivera, and Ray Sepulveda. Gradually, through a stream of U.S.-indie-licensed compilations, a new recording on Stateside Latin powerhouse label RMM (Otra Idea), and two instantly legendary NYC summer-of-'97 concerts, Issac Delgado cracked the mango curtain on his own merit. This is the next major voice in international salsa.

what to buy: Just because it's closest to where he's at right now, Otra Idea ♪♪♪♪ (RMM, 1997) is the first-priority purchase. A potentially risky hook-up of Puerto Rican salseros and Cuban timberos, Otra Idea is svengali-ed into transcendence by Issac's charismatic chants on burners like "Pá Que Te Salves."

what to buy next: Recorded in Caracas, Venezuela, in '93, Con Ganas ♪♪♪♪½ (QBADISC, 1994, prod. Gonzalo Rubalcaba) is wall-to-wall with Issac Delgado Moments like the subtle whisper-to-a-croon catharsis midway into "Dime Tu Lo Que Sabes." For those who like their Cuban soul unsweetened.

the rest:
Donde La Hora ♪♪♪½ (QBADISC, 1994)
El Año Que Viene ♪♪♪½ (QBADISC, 1996)

sandy denny

influences:

Tito Gomez, Cheo Feliciano, Pete "El Conde" Rodriguez

Adalberto Alvarado, Manolín, El Médico de la Salsa

see also: NG La Banda

Tom Terrell

Sandy Denny

Folk, Anglo-Celtic folk-rock, singer-songwriter

Born January 6, 1947, in London, England. Died April 21, 1978, in London, England.

Sandy Denny may have been the greatest female pop vocalist England ever produced. It's especially sad, then, that her career path was uneven and cut short. Denny began singing in London folk clubs in the mid-1960s during the "folk revival" that also spawned Simon and Garfunkel, the various Steeleyes and Fairports, and many others. Her repertoire then blended traditional English and Irish folk songs like "The Handsome Cabin Boy" with covers of songs by friends like Paul Simon and Jackson C. Frank. Her clear, bold voice brought her gigs as a member of the Strawbs (formerly the Strawberry Hill Boys) and later Fairport Convention. She may be best remembered for her music with Fairport, though she was in the group for less than 4 years (1968–69, 1974–75). Her work alongside Trevor Lucas (later her husband) in the band Fotheringay produced one excellent album and swelled her following to the point that Melody Maker readers twice voted her Britain's top "girl singer." She was a gifted composer with a keen ear for poetry; like Joni Mitchell, she undoubtedly influenced many singer-songwriters of the confessional/cryptic school, for better or worse. Her best-known and most often covered composition is "Who Knows Where the Time Goes?," recorded by Judy Collins among others. Pulled between the quiet joys of home and the love of performing, between solo and group work, and between the gusts of her own moody spirit, Denny never received the acclaim she deserved in her lifetime. Her death at 31, from a cerebral hemorrhage, solidified her legend. Still, her music at its best transcends the clichés of her era and the limits of her iconic status.

what to buy: The North Star Grassman and the Ravens ♪♪♪♪½ (Island, 1971, prod. Sandy Denny, Richard Thompson, John Wood) has an enigmatic cover photo showing Sandy as an alchemist—and indeed, on this album, everything she touches has a glimmer of gold. Some of her finest compositions are here, including the antiwar song "John the Gun"; the stirring, strange "Late November"; and the eerie "Next Time Around," which may have been written about ex-lover Jackson Frank. It also shows Denny having fun: dueting with Richard Thompson on Dylan's "Down in the Flood" and taking a rockabilly turn on "Let's Jump the Broomstick." The album also includes one of Sandy's few non-Fairport- or Fotheringay-related recordings of a traditional song, "Blackwaterside," with Thompson on accordion.

what to buy next: Check out The Best of Sandy Denny ♪♪♪♪½ (Hannibal, 1987, prod. Joe Boyd, Trevor Lucas) to decide where to go next in your exploration of Denny's music; it's a good overview of her all-too-brief career. Either of her other two in-print solo albums, Like an Old Fashioned Waltz ♪♪♪♪ (Island, 1973, prod. Trevor Lucas, John Wood) and Rendezvous ♪♪♪♪ (Island, 1977, prod. Trevor Lucas), is a good bet. The former album has some charming big band–era covers and "Solo," one of her finest compositions, while the latter includes "Gold Dust," a California rock–style song that suggests that, had Sandy lived, her music may have taken on a more American sound. To more fully appreciate yet another worthy purchase, it's best to first discuss one you should avoid: while One Last Sad Refrain ♪♪½ (Nixed) documents Denny's final major concert in 1977, the dismal technical quality saps all of the nuances from what should be a rich, intriguing listening experience. A better choice is the recent release of the same show as Gold Dust: Live at the Royalty ♪♪♪♪ (Island, 1998, prod. Trevor Wyatt), although fans have complained about the "enhancements" made by adding additional backing vocals and electric guitar. (In the interest of full disclosure: I like the liner-note essay in this CD, but then again, I wrote it.)

the rest:

Sandy Denny and the Strawbs ♪♪♪½ (Sonet Dansk Grammofon A/S, 1973/Hannibal, 1991)

The Original Sandy Denny ♪♪♪½ (Mooncrest, 1978/1991)

Who Knows Where the Time Goes? ♪♪♪♪♪ (Island, 1985)

worth searching for: At presstime, Denny's finest album, Sandy ♪♪♪♪♪ (Island, 1972, prod. Trevor Lucas), was out of print in the U.S. It's the one that ought to have made Denny a star, a classic singer/songwriter–style collection, with peerless vocals capped by Denny's a cappella rendition of the Richard Farina composition "The Quiet Joys of Brotherhood." The BBC Sessions 1971–73 ♪♪♪♪♪ (Strange Fruit, 1997) was available for four months by mail order before being pulled. It's Denny at the peak of her powers and in stripped-down settings that showcase her songwriting and singing without any distracting production touches. It's flawed; it's uneven; it's brilliant. The Attic Tracks, 1972–1984 ♪♪♪♪½ (Raven, 1995, prod. various), credited to "Sandy Denny, Trevor Lucas & Friends," is a wonderfully eclectic collection of Denny rarities, including a marvelous cover of Little Feat's "Easy to Slip"; a portion of the proceeds from this album goes to Denny's heirs.

influences:

Anne Briggs, Dave Swarbrick, Bob Dylan, Joni Mitchell

Linda Thompson, Natalie Merchant, Mary Black, Dolores Keane, Vikki Clayton, Susan McKeown, Lisa Moscatiello

see also: Fairport Convention, Trevor Lucas, Richard Thompson

Pamela Murray Winters

Dervish

Irish traditional

Formed 1988, in Sligo, Ireland. Based in Sligo, Ireland.

Liam Kelly, flute, tin whistle (1988–present); Shane Mitchell, accordion (1988–present); Martin McGinley, fiddle, viola (1988–90); Brian McDonagh, mandolin, mandola, bouzouki, guitar (1988–present); Michael Holmes, bouzouki, guitar (1988–present); Cathy Jordan, vocals, bodhrán (1990–present); Shane McAleer, fiddle, viola (1990–present). (All members are from Ireland.)

With an unlikely name that conjures the Middle East rather than rollicking jigs and reels, Dervish is one of the most exciting traditional bands to emerge from Ireland in years. It combines the amazing instrumental virtuosity of precursors like the Bothy Band, De Dannan, or Altan with tastefully arranged and beautifully sung Irish- and English-language songs reminiscent of Planxty. One particularly appealing aspect of the Dervish sound is its members' remarkable tightness, resulting from years of playing together at informal pub sessions—or, in the case of flute player Liam Kelly and accordionist Shane Mitchell, playing together since childhood. When the pair were in high school, they formed a band called Poitín and had a moment of fame when they won first place at a festival and subsequently appeared on the popular Irish TV program The Late Late Show. While in college, they linked up with bouzouki player Michael Holmes and later met Brian McDonagh, a former member of the band Oisín during the late 1970s. At the request of the Sligo-based Sound Records label, the foursome agreed to cut an album, for which they secured the services of fiddle player Martin McGinley. Released in 1989, their debut under the name Dervish, The Boys of Sligo, started getting attention, and what was supposed to be a one-time deal began to look more promising. The band decided to add a singer to the lineup and contacted Roscommon-born Cathy Jordan, whom they knew to be terrific even though she hadn't had much exposure to traditional music. Jordan has proven herself up to the task and become one of the most respected singers on the Irish traditional music scene. Not long after her arrival, County Tyrone fiddle player Shane McAleer replaced McGinley, who was working with another band as well as for the BBC. The new lineup's first release, Harmony Hill, won critical acclaim and quickly made Dervish one of the most sought-after bands in Ireland. Despite an intensive touring schedule, the band managed to bring out another album, Playing with Fire, which topped the Irish folk music charts for several months. The release of Dervish's albums in the United States in 1995 was followed by several American tours, with appearances at major festivals. A fourth album the following year, At the End of the Day, was named the Hot Press Trad/Folk Album of the Year. Dervish's latest, a fantastic double-CD recorded live in Palma, Majorca, attests to the band's superior musicianship and performing abilities—and even more hearteningly, to their staying power.

what to buy: Harmony Hill ♪♪♪♪½ (Whirling Discs, 1993/Kells Music, 1995, prod. Brian McDonagh) is puzzling in an unusual way: it is difficult to believe that a lineup's first album can be so good. But this one is dazzlingly so, from the first set of jigs, "Apples in Winter," to the great reel set "The Green Mountain," to Jordan's brilliant renditions of songs as diverse as the lilting "The Ploughman" and the heartbreaking "A Stór Mo Chroí." On the very aptly titled Playing with Fire ♪♪♪♪½ (Whirling Discs/Kells Music, 1995, prod. Brian McDonagh), Dervish continues its superlative brand of traditional music, so much so that it's difficult to recommend some tracks over others. Jordan is once again astonishingly good, and equally comfortable on songs in Gaelic like "Maire Mhor" and "Pheigin Mo Chroi" (the band's designated sing-along in concert), sad tales of love and loss like "Johnny and Molly," or the amusingly grandiloquent poetry of "Cailin Rua." Each instrumental track is as exciting as the next, played with all the fire one could ever ask for.

what to buy next: The cover artwork of At the End of the Day ♪♪♪♪½ (Whirling Discs/Kells Music, 1996, prod. Brian McDonagh), a striking panoramic photograph of a pub with the musicians having a session in the corner, pulls you in irresistibly for yet another magnificent album. The instrumental work is as good as ever, with Swedish band Väsen appearing as guests on one of their compositions. This time around, Jordan's selection of songs leans more toward the slower and melancholic, as with "For Ireland I Won't Tell Her Name," and even the tragic, as with the famine song "Lone Shanakyle"—all performed from the heart. Dervish's latest, Live in Palma ♪♪♪♪½ (Whirling Discs, 1997/Kells Music, 1998, prod. Brian McDonagh), is an outstanding collection of 22 tracks (plus introductions) on two CDs, featuring the band's best songs and instrumental medleys from its previous three studio albums, performed at a concert in Palma, Majorca.

worth searching for: Dervish's all-instrumental first album, The Boys of Sligo ♪♪♪½ (Sound, 1989, prod. Jim Lockhart), is well worth looking for. McGinley's fiddle playing, more straightforward than McAleer's in some ways, has that same northern energy and crispness to it. And while there are still rough edges, one can hear the pieces falling into place, particularly the band's ideas about varying the texture by changing the combinations of lead and accompanying instruments.

influences:
Planxty, the Bothy Band, Oisín
De Dannan, Altan

see also: Väsen

Philippe Varlet

Det Syng

Scandinavian folk

Formed 1987, in Norway. Based in Norway.

Eli Storbekken, vocals; Sinikka Langeland, vocals; Halvor Håkanes, vocals; Agnes Buen Garnås, vocals; Anne Marit Jacobsen, vocals. (All members are from Norway.)

A group of well-known Norwegian folk singers got together to record tunes that have "wandered"; all their songs can be found in the traditions of several Nordic countries.

what's available: The world-music genre is particularly rich in albums that showcase the wonders of the human voice, and Ballader På Vandring ♪♪♪½ (Grappa Norway, 1997) is one of them. There is some spare kantele (zither), but most of the songs are a cappella showcases for the four women and one man in the group. There are ghostly cries that sound like wives calling out for dead husbands, slow mournful ballads, sprightly dance tunes, lullabies, and laments.

influences:
Slinkombas, Tone Hulbaekmo, Arve Moen Bergset

j. poet

D'Gary

Malagasy folk and popular music

Born 1961, in Tananarive, Madagascar. Based in Betroka, Madagascar.

D'Gary is one of Madagascar's most important folk musicians. He bases his style on the traditional music of the island's southern ethnic groups, the Bara, Atandroy, Vezo, and Masikoro. By traveling throughout the nation and collecting songs usually played on traditional instruments like the valhia, marovany, kabosy, and lokanga and transposing them to guitar, he developed an unusual and highly individual style. D'Gary uses 11 different tunings and plays only with the thumb and index finger of his right hand. Even more amazingly, D'Gary learned to play on borrowed instruments, too poor to buy his own. After he participated in the sessions for A World Out of Time, a groundbreaking collection recorded by Henry Kaiser and David Lindley to introduce Madagascar's artists to more of the world, Kaiser sent D'Gary his first guitar as a gift. His impressive playing on that album led to recording deals with several European and American labels, who all marveled at his technical brilliance. D'Gary would like to make a living as a professional musician, but in a culture where everyone plays music, and everyone is poor, this transition may prove difficult.

what to buy: On Horombe ♪♪♪♪½ (Stern's, 1995, prod. D'Gary) D'Gary's folk/dance band, Jihé, turns in a pleasing set marked by the leader's shimmering lead guitar and a subtle rhythm section. The music is definitely Malagasy (the adjectival form of Madagascar), but every so often a hint of Hawaii or Louisiana floats through the mix to give you an unexpected jolt. D'Gary shows his traditional side on Mbo Loza ♪♪♪♪♪ (Indigo, 1992, prod. Label Bleu), a set that features his immense fretboard skills, supported by a small female chorus.

solo outings:
Dama & D'Gary:
The Long Way Home ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1993)

influences:
Mama Sana, Rakoto Frah, Voninavoko

j. poet

Abdoulaye Diabaté

Bambara traditional pop

Born 1952, in Cinzana Gare, Mali. Based in Koutiala, Mali.

When young Abdoulaye Diabaté was coming of age in the 1960s, his native Mali was bursting with musical activity. The country's communist-leaning government took a strong interest in culture, and supported the development of local bands and artists through biannual national music contests and state-funded ensembles. Diabaté was born to a family of griots—traditional praise singers and musicians—and though his parents did not play music professionally, he learned to sing at his mother's side, and played drums at weddings and other ceremonies from boyhood.

In 1974, he began his professional career singing in a series of bands, including the Orchestre Regionale de Segou and Coule Star, a band from Sikasso that distinguished itself in the 1976 biannual competition. Diabaté's keening voice and energized stage presence earned him plenty of notice, and inevitably, in 1986, he began making his own recordings and leading his own band. Mali's local music scene had long been dominated by the music of the Manding people, one of the most pervasive ethnic groups in West Africa. From the start, Diabaté decided to emphasize the rhythms, melodies, and stories of the Bambara people. In terms of language and culture, similarities outweigh differences between the two groups, but their musical traditions are quite different, owing to the Bambara reliance on a five-note (pentatonic) scale. Diabaté's rocking, bluesy compositions have served him well with the public ever since. His band puts on an exceptional stage show featuring guitars, horns, percussion, and athletic dance routines, sometimes performed in full hunter's regalia.

Diabaté has recorded in various settings, acoustic and electric. In 1996, after releasing a highly produced session recorded in Paris, he pledged to get back to roots, and made his next record in the Malian capitol, Bamako. "We've forgotten something," he said at the time. "Malian music has been tending towards modernism, and it has lost some of its real African color and originality. I needed to return to the source, and valorize the real African music, not add too many electronics. Our power is our folklore. The people in the bush need to accept what we do." The resulting record has yet to be released internationally, but whatever marketing is to follow, musically, at least, Diabaté has come home.

what's available: Djiriyo ♪♪♪½ (Stern's Africa, 1995) compiles tracks from three local Malian cassette releases. The selection includes both acoustic tracks and rather slick electric ones. Overall, a great introduction to a significant West African artist. Kassikoun ♪♪♪ (Syllart/Melodie) represents earlier work recorded in Paris. Production tames the music too much at times, but there are still a number of worthwhile tracks.

influences:

⏮ Rail Band, Super Biton

⏭ Lobi Traore

Banning Eyre

Sékouba "Bambino" Diabaté

Manding pop music

Born 1963, in Siguiri, northern Guinea. Based in Paris, France, and Conakry, Guinea.

Sékouba "Bambino" Diabaté has one of the purest, strongest singing voices in Africa. Raised squarely in the tradition of the Manding people's griots (oral historians), Diabaté learned to sing the stories and lineages of all the families in his region with a voice that could unlock the deepest of emotions in his listeners. In 1972, when Guinea's popular music scene benefited from a government bent on promoting culture, Diabaté moved from ceremonial settings to fronting pop bands. Earning so much attention at such a young age, he was soon tagged with the name "Bambino," and it stuck.

In the 1980s, Diabaté began singing for Bembeya Jazz, the most popular and influential of all Guinea's great dance bands. This job took him all over Africa, to seven European countries, and, in 1989, to the U.S. He became a headliner in 1990, and his second solo record, Le Destin, sold 160,000 copies in Guinea during its first three months on the market. Diabaté has

irish step dancing

An unmistakable part of Irish folk culture is step dancing, the fast-paced, joyous, and athletic style that provides stunning visual accompaniment to speedy musical performances of jigs, reels, and hornpipes. Step dancing derives its name from the eight-measure musical phrases, also called "steps," that are tied to the repeated movements within the dance. Although written records of Irish dances only date back to the 1500s, it seems likely that they originated much earlier, and the styles we are familiar with today are an amalgam of steps that are also common to French, Scottish, and British dancing.

In the mid-18th century, the tradition of roving dance masters teaching their own distinctive tunes and steps began. During that century and the next, step dancing flourished and diversified, with dancing schools being established for the first time in Counties Kerry, Cork, and Limerick. The form was boosted further at the end of the 19th century, when the Gaelic League was founded with the intention of perpetuating Irish culture.

In the 20th century step dancing has advanced and evolved, with more elaborate costumes and steps appearing. Once a primarily male activity and the purview of adults, step dancing gradually became much more common among females and began to be taught to young children. Dancers were initially barefoot, adopting soft shoes in the early part of the century. Use of hard-tipped shoes, resulting in the now-familiar percussive tapping generated by a speedy practitioner, has only become widespread in the last 30 years or so.

Today step dancing is a mainstay of Irish culture both in the motherland and the U.S., where schools are burgeoning and new steps and styles have rapidly developed. With the advent of Michael Flatley and Riverdance, the form has "stepped" out of its cultural confines to be embraced by just about everyone.

Michael Parrish

made a specialty of singing about the problems and concerns of lovers, hardly surprising fare for a pop singer. But for a griot, expected to draw lessons from the great events of history, plain love songs would never do. Diabaté has garnered a fanatical following with his probing explorations of delicate areas of social custom, particularly in questioning the restrictions on marriage in his society.

In 1996, Diabaté was invited to sing two guest spots on an album by Africando, a group combining veteran West African singers with some of the best New York Latin musicians. His very personal update of the Manding/Latin connection (stemming from the African continent's longstanding admiration of Cuba and Puerto Rico's once-removed African music) brought him new attention, and the next year, he recorded his most varied and elaborately produced album to data, Kassa. Its enthusiastic reception made Diabaté one of the most closely watched West African singing stars worldwide.

what's available: Le Destin ♪♪♪♪ (popular african music, 1992, prod. Sabine Froese) proved a groundbreaking recording in Guinean pop, in that it defied increasingly electronic production norms and relied mostly on traditional instruments. Kassa ♪♪♪♪ (Stern's Africa, 1997, prod. Syllart) finds Diabaté moving ahead stylistically, while leaving none of his traditional chops behind. Five producers and a number of foreign collaborators liven the mix.

worth searching for: Africando's Gomba Salsa ♪♪♪♪ (Stern's Africa, 1996, prod. Alain Josse, Ibrahima Sylla) features Diabaté's sensational Latin-ized version of a modern Manding classic—one that accentuates the advancement of tradition he embodies: "Apollo," a griot song honoring the '60s space missions.

influences:

⏮ Sory Kandia Kouyaté, Bembeya Jazz, Mory Kanté, Salif Keita

see also: Africando, Bembeya Jazz

Banning Eyre

Toumani Diabaté

Malian kora instrumental music

Born 1965, in Bamako, Mali. Based in Bamako, Mali.

Toumani Diabaté's father, Sidiki Diabaté, was known as the "king of the kora" (21-string harp-lute). He left his birthplace in the Gambia—the spiritual center of West African kora music—and moved to Mali some time before that country's independence in 1960. There, amid the crush of cultural activity that blossomed in the new nation, Sidiki played a key role in shaping modern Malian kora music. Toumani was born to this legacy, and by the age of five, had begun to play a seven-string version of the instrument. At 13, Toumani performed on the full-sized kora with the Koulikoro Ensemble at Mali's biannual musical competition, and the group was judged the best traditional orchestra.

From there, Toumani cut his own road. He made his first professional recording, Kaira, in London in 1987. The record broke with convention by including no singer and no other instruments. This raised eyebrows, but it also revealed Toumani as a phenomenal player by any standard. The following year, he recorded with the Spanish "new flamenco" group, Ketama. Filled out with British bassist Danny Thompson, the resulting ensemble, Songhai, explored connections between flamenco and Toumani's ancestral Manding styles that made their first album a hit in the world-music market. They recorded a follow-up in 1994. In between those efforts, Toumani recorded with a Japanese string section and heavy electronics in a formation dubbed the Symmetric Orchestra, while, back in Bamako, he launched an instrumental trio featuring masters of the other major melodic instruments in the arsenal of his griot (oral historian) heritage—Basekou Kouyaté on the banjo-like ngoni, and Keletigui Diabaté on the wooden-slatted, xylophone-like balafon. Despite many projects and an obviously busy schedule back home, Toumani joined Malian superstar Salif Keita in the North American Africa Fête touring festival in the summer of 1998, and returned to do the same with world-blues adventurer Taj Mahal in 1999. Toumani is, without a doubt, one of the most talented and adventurous instrumentalists in Africa.

what to buy: Kaira ♪♪♪♪♪ (Hannibal/Rykodisc, 1988) is Toumani's calling card. His personalized solo kora renditions of Manding classics are both technically masterful and abundantly musical. Djelika ♪♪♪½ (Hannibal/Rykodisc, 1995) features the instrumental trio of Toumani Diabaté, Basekou Kouyaté, and Keletigui Diabaté. It meanders some, but at its best, it does show the fire this outfit is capable of delivering.

what to buy next: Songhai ♪♪♪♪½ (Hannibal/Rykodisc, 1990) captures the spontaneous exuberance of a great musical meeting—the Manding kora and flashy new flamenco. Songhai 2 ♪♪♪♪ (Hannibal/Rykodisc, 1994) is more sophisticated than the original, but not quite as inspired.

the rest:

(With Taj Mahal) Kulanjan ♪♪♪♪♪ (Hannibal, 1999)

(With Ballake Sissoko) New Ancient Strings N/A (Hannibal, 1999)

influences:

⏮ Sidiki Diabaté, Batourou Sekou Kouyaté, Amadou Bansang Jobarteh

⏭ A generation of young, mostly unrecorded kora players

see also: Taj Mahal

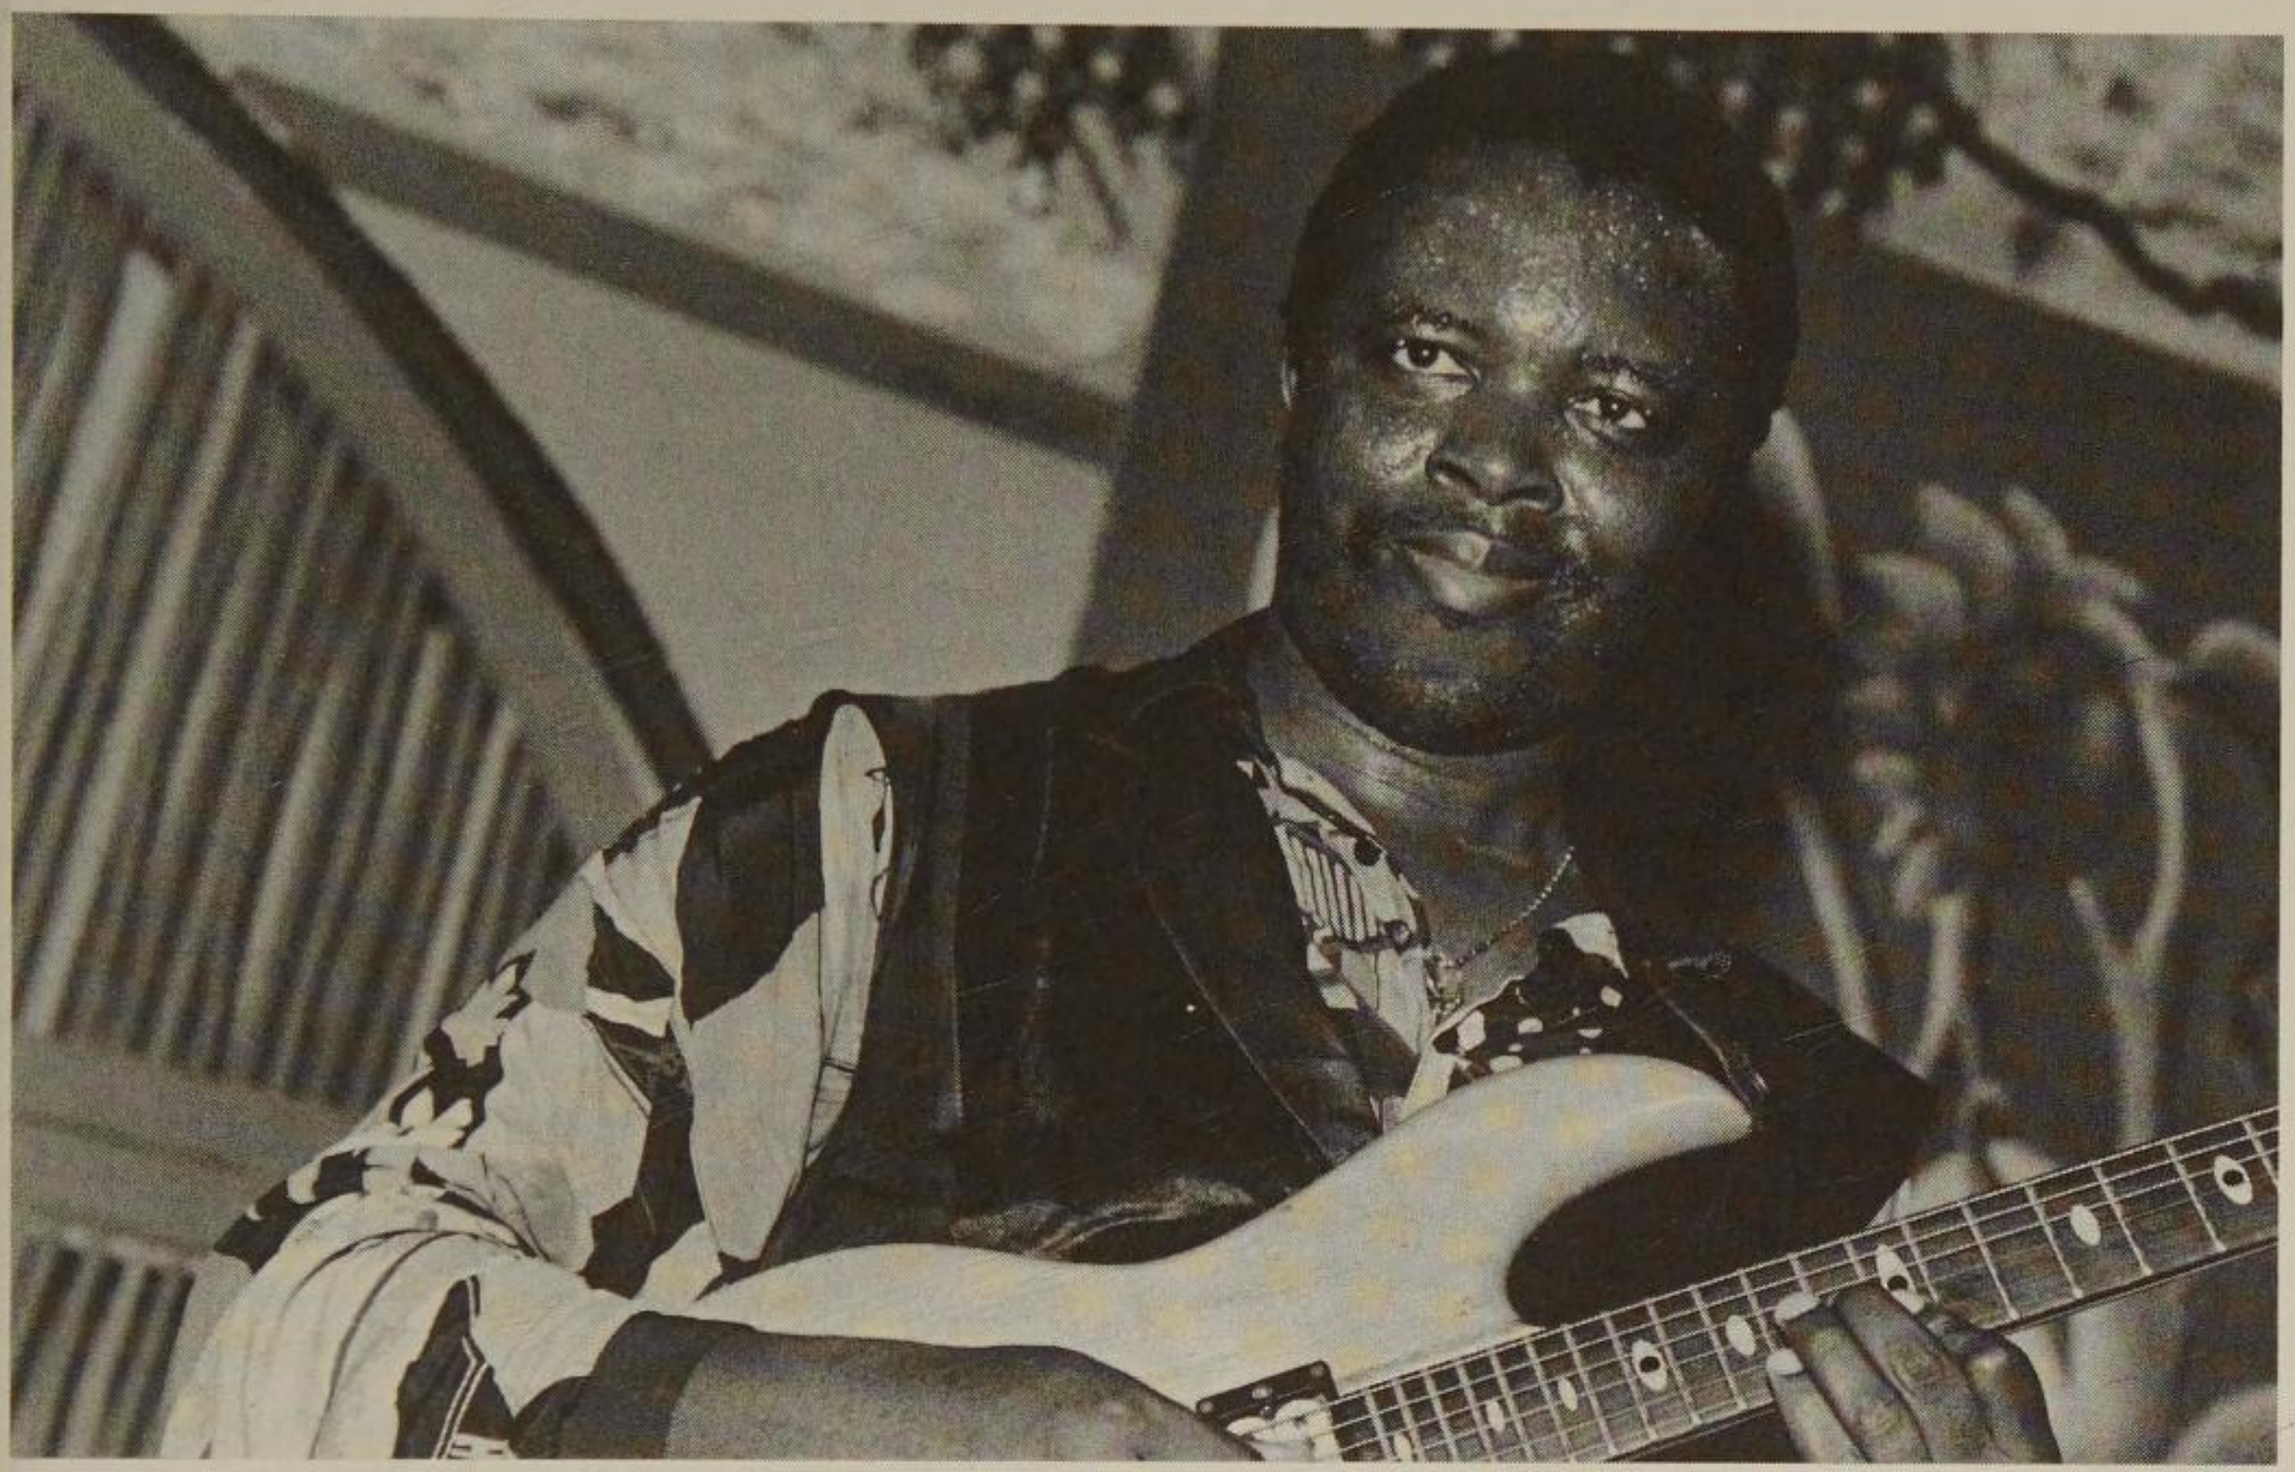
Banning Eyre



Diblo Dibala

Alpha Yaya Diallo

Pan-African pop

Born in Conakry, Guinea. Based in Vancouver, B.C., Canada.

With acclaimed musicianship as his passport, composer, singer, and guitarist Alpha Yaya Diallo has tread the international stage and now leads one of Canada's most popular worldbeat outfits. Diallo's father was a traveling doctor who exposed his son to the various tribal rhythms of Guinea, as well as the music of Cape Verde, Senegal, Cameroon, and Cuba. When Diallo began playing, all these currents flowed effortlessly into his music, giving his style a bright cosmopolitan feel. During Diallo's teen years, his father was based in the Malinke region of Faranan, one of Guinea's most musically diverse subcultures. It was there he started teaching himself the guitar, imitating the rippling sounds of the kora (African harp-lute) and the Arabic-influenced flute melodies of his own Fula tribe. He was soon sitting in with bands like Bembeya Jazz National and Cameroon Stars. He also learned balafon (xylophone), drums, and flute. In 1989 Diallo moved to Finland and hooked up with Fatala, a band from Guinea that had just been signed to Peter Gabriel's RealWorld label. Diallo toured the globe with Fatala, winning raves for his flashy guitar work. When the band played in British Columbia, Diallo jumped ship and started his own.

what's available: Aduna—The World ♪♪♪♪ (Tinder, 1998, prod. Alpha Diallo), Diallo's American debut, combines the best tracks of his two Juno-nominated Canadian albums. Diallo uses both acoustic and electric guitars, and his playing is always subtle and understated, each note ringing clear as a bell—even when playing the percussive syncopated leads that mark the fretwork of most African guitarists. This impressive disc includes "Gogha," on which Diallo plays his guitar with the gentle quality of a kalimba (thumb piano); "Dewe," which combines the rhythms of black and Arabic Africa; and "Debo," a quiet acoustic guitar showcase that mixes bluesy bent notes with subtle flamenco flourishes. The Pan-African pop groove of The Message ♪♪♪♪½ (Wicklow, 1999, prod. Kevin Finseth) shows an artist who's fully capable of giving Senagalese worldbeat titan Baaba Maal a run for his money, with Diallo having the advantage of a North American home base. Indeed the Senegalese influence is more noticeable here, and there are touches of soukous (African rumba), mbalax (the electrified Afro-Caribbean fusion popularized by Youssou N'Dour), and Cuba in the mix. The production has a tougher edge than The World, and every track hits with plenty of power, from horn-driven rave-ups like "Africa" to the more folkloric "Fatumata Diallo" and "Duniya," both of which feature kora master Boubacar Diabaté.

worth searching for: As captured on Fatala: Gongoma Times ♪♪♪♪ (WOMAD, 1988/RealWorld, 1993, prod. Yacouba "Bruno" Camara), Diallo's former musical family—though unfortunately not including him on this particular release—were a percussion ensemble with the young soprano voice of Mabinty Sahko adding luster to the dense poly-rhythms of talking drum, goblet drum or djembe, and balafon. Here they kick up a feisty party noise, distinct from much Guinean pop by the lack of guitar, or even kora, which may surprise fans of other exemplars like Mory Kanté or Bembeya Jazz. Fatala's only string instrument is the bolon, a harp arched over three strings. Formed in 1981 by percussionist/vocalist Yacouba "Bruno" Camara, who left Guinea for Paris in the '60s—introducing many Europeans to the delights of African percussion while no doubt broadening his style—the ensemble draws on traditional Guinean folk music, but with the Pan-African palette of their famous alumnus Diallo. This remains their only recording, and it rewards a search.

influences:
⏮ Mory Kanté, Jali Musa Jawara, Fatala

j. poet and David Poole

Diblo Dibala /Loketo /Matchatcha

Soukous

Dibala born in Balupa Kasay, Congo (formerly Zaire). Loketo formed 1986; disbanded 1991. Matchatcha formed 1992. Based in Paris, France.

Loketo: Diblo Dibala, lead guitar; Aurlus Mabele, vocals; Mimi Kazidonna, second lead guitar; Mack Macaire, drums; Konba Belklow, percussion; Miguel Yamba, bass. Matchatcha: Diblo Dibala, lead guitar, leader; Komba Mafwala Bellow, drums; J.P. Kinzaki (France), second lead guitar; Miguel Yamba, bass (studio); Felico, bass (touring band). (All members are from Congo except where noted.)

Diblo Dibala is one of the finest players on the Afro-Parisian world-music scene, a guitarist, songwriter, arranger, and producer of prodigious proportions. Since he burst onto the African pop music landscape in the early '70s, sharing lead guitar chores with Franco in the legendary band TPOK Jazz, Diblo has been a trendsetter. Besides the dozens of albums he's recorded with his own outfits Loketo and Matchatcha, he has written, produced, and played on more than 60 albums for other artists and with the Kanda Bongo Man band. Currently he's interested in adding new sounds to his palette, including the folkloric music of Balupa Kasay (the region of his birth) and some of the licks he's heard from the American rock and blues artists he's been listening to.

Diblo speaks little English, but his friend and manager Alex Boicell fills in the blanks. "Soukous is the most popular dance music in Congo, and most of West Africa," Boicell says. "It's based on traditional music and drum patterns from Zaire, Cuban music—especially the rumba—and other African and American black music styles. Cuban music was, of course, founded on the African rhythms the slaves brought to the New World."

As John Storm Roberts documents in his book The Latin Tinge (Oxford University Press, 1979), the rumba returned to Africa in the '50s, mostly on early 78 rpm records, and it caused a sensation. Since the mixture of Cuban and West African rhythms that had evolved in the Caribbean wasn't tied to any particular West African country or ethnic group, it had potential for universal appeal. Pre-independence Congolese bands started out playing covers of Cuban hits with their own rhythmic adaptations, but the introduction of the electric guitar in the early '60s really accelerated the evolution of the music. The Africans combined the phrasing of the Cuban horn sections with local folkloric techniques to come up with the flowing improvisations that remain the music's trademark.

Until the '80s, an African rumba would start with a slow vocal and instrumental prelude; then the tempo would increase until the music got very hot, very fast. "When Diblo began playing with Kanda Bongo Man," Boicell says, "they decided to drop the introduction and go right into the hot section, the kind of music now called soukous." Young people, who were beginning to find musicians like Franco a bit old-fashioned, made Diblo one of Congo's most popular musicians.

"Diblo got interested in the guitar when he was 12," Boicell says. "His next-door neighbor took [Diblo] under his wing, and after a couple of lessons he consumed every book on guitar playing he could find. At 15 he was leading a small band, and his playing attracted Franco, Congo's top guitarist and band leader. In Congo they have contests where players can challenge each other to duels. Franco challenged Diblo—who was just a boy, remember—and he was so impressed that he offered him a job in his band."

In 1979 Kanda Bongo Man lured Diblo away from Franco. They relocated to Paris and Kanda's success there can be traced in part to Diblo's sparkling fretwork. Boicell recalls: "The first record they cut together was Iyole. When the DJs in Kinshasa heard it they went crazy; nobody had ever played that fast before." Even though his guitar playing had made him a near-legend in Paris and most of Africa, Diblo wasn't content. In 1986 he left Kanda Bongo Man and formed Loketo with singer Aurlus Mabele. "When Diblo and Aurlus put the band together, they wanted to do something modern, but they didn't want to lose the traditional flavor, so the music remained pure. Even with [Diblo's latest project] Matchatcha there are always tunes based on folk songs and proverbs; songs about what is happening in the village, songs that speak to the needs of the people."

One of the main criticisms of soukous is that "it all sounds the same," a cliché that Boicell says is partially true for two reasons. One is that the albums are mixed to appeal to the DJs back home, so the kick drum is put so far out in the mix that it often obliterates the intricate rhythmic patterns the drummer is laying down. The other reason is that musicians like Rigo Star, Diblo, and Matchatcha drummer Komba Mafwala Bellow are so popular that many bands hire them to produce and play on their sessions. "Some musicians have a 'fast food' mentality," Boicell said. "Rather than develop their own style, they hire Diblo or Rigo. But when it comes to reproducing the sounds of their record in public, they have to hire someone else to copy what these players did for them in the studio."

what to buy: The Afro-Parisian scene turns out a dizzying amount of music, and available releases by Diblo and the other top session players/producers come and go like the tides. Matchatcha ♪♪♪♪♪ (AfricMusic France, prod. Diblo Dibala), the first album by Diblo's new band, was an instant and major hit, showcasing his amazing chops and the breakneck rhythms of his partners. The album has also been seen under the title of Laissez Passer, one of its biggest hits. Kanda Bongo Man's Amour Fou ♪♪♪♪♪ (Hannibal, 1988, prod. Kanda Bongo Man) is the album that introduced Diblo to the world; a first-rate collection by one of the Congo's great vocalists, backed by the new king of the soukous guitar.

the rest:

Loketo:
Super Soukous ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1989)
Soukous Trouble ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1990)
Extra Ball ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1991)

influences:
- Franco, Tabu Ley Rochereau, Johnny Bokelo, Zaiko Langa Langa
- Rigo Star

see also: Franco, Juan Luis Guerra, Pépé Kallé, Kanda Bongo Man, Rigo Star

j. poet

Manu Dibango

Jazz, makossa, worldbeat

Born February 10, 1934, in Cameroon. Based in Cameroon and Paris, France.

In the 1940s and '50s, jazz gained popularity across Africa through prized recordings and the visits of Louis Armstrong, Duke Ellington, and Dizzy Gillespie. Numerous jazz bands sprang up from Algiers to Johannesburg, but it wasn't until 1960, when an exciting alto saxophonist named Manu Dibango propelled the band African Jazz out of Zaire (now Congo), that respect was gained. Within six years, Dibango was playing to a small but loyal following of natives and expatriates in Paris. In 1972, Atlantic released his album Soul Makossa in the U.S., and the title tune instantly became an anthem, dominating America's pop/soul airwaves as well as the discotheques. "Soul Makossa" was truly massive; though more of a jazz-funk jam than a makossa (Cameroonian pop) beat, the song also had a major influence on the emerging salsa scene (check out Dibango with the Fania All Stars on their 1976 album Live at Yankee Stadium, Vol. 2). Since Dibango's 1974 Atlantic swan song Makossa Man, he has played jazz festivals, toured the world many times, and released more than 20 albums on both import and domestic labels (scoring another international hit with 1985's "Abele Dance"). Today, the seemingly ageless Manu Dibango is still starring on the global stage, and his retirement seems a blessedly long way off.

what to buy: Soul Makossa ♪♪♪♪ (Atlantic, 1972) is Dibango's declaration of world conquest. In addition to the burning title tune, it boasts exotic moods and grooves aplenty ("New Bell" is a funky example). Gone Clear ♪♪♪♪ (Mango, 1980, prod. Geoffrey Chung) is a beguiling mix of African, R&B, and reggae grooves thanks to the presence of folks like Sly & Robbie, Jocelyn Brown, Crusher Bennett, and Randy Brecker.

what to buy next: Electric Africa ♪♪♪ (Celluloid, 1985, prod. various) includes "Abele Dance" and is Manu al electrique, kinda like computer makossa funk. Live 91 ♪♪♪½ (Stern, 1991, prod. Manu Dibango) is a bumping set recorded at Paris's legendary Olympia. From the spirited cover of Serge Gainsborough's reggae-fied "La Marseillaise" spoof, "La Javanaise," to MC Mello's hip-hop freestyle flow on "Jam Rap Makossa," Dibango and crew are on fire.

what to avoid: The guest list on Wakafrika ♪♪ (Giant, 1994, prod. George Acogny) is impressive—Peter Gabriel, Youssou N'Dour, Sinéad O'Connor, Ladysmith Black Mambazo—but they steal too much focus from Dibango's performance.

the rest:
Afrijazzy ♪♪♪½ (Enemy, 1994)
Bao Bao ♪♪♪ (MIL Multimedia, 1996)

Manu Safari N/A (Tinder, 1999)
Come Closer N/A (Tinder, 1999)

worth searching for: Dibango's outstanding guest appearance on the Fania All Stars' Live at Yankee Stadium, Vol. 2 ♪♪♪♪½ (Fania, 1976) has to be heard. He also makes a worthwhile visit on Angélique Kidjo's Logozo ♪♪♪♪♪ (Mango, 1991/1992).

influences:
⏮ Wes Montgomery, John Handy, Junior Walker
⏭ Fela Kuti, Eddie Palmieri, Hugh Masekela

see also: Les Go de Koteba, Johnny Pacheco

Tom Terrell and Gary Graff

Diga Rhythm Band

Worldbeat

Formed as Tal Vadya, 1973, in San Rafael, CA, USA. Re-formed as Diga Rhythm Band, 1975. Re-formed as Rhythm Experience, 1984. Based in San Rafael, CA, USA.

Zakir Hussain (India), tabla, folk drums, tar; Mickey Hart (USA), traps, gongs, timbales, timpani; Jim Loveless (USA), marimbas; Jordan Amarantha, congas, bongos; Vince Delgado (USA), dumbek, tabla, talking drum; Ray Spiegal (USA), vibes; Tor Dietrichson (USA), tabla; Aushim Chaudhuri (India), tabla; Arshad Syed (India), duggi tarang, nal; Joy Schulman (USA), tabla; Peter Carmichael (USA), tabla.

Zakir Hussain put together a drum group at the Ali Akbar College of Music in 1973. The troupe was called Tal Vadya and gave students a chance to perform in public. Mickey Hart joined in 1975, and the outfit changed its name to Diga Rhythm Band. They recorded one classic self-titled album in 1976.

what's available: The 1976 date documented on Diga Rhythm Band ♪♪♪♪♪ (Rykodisc, 1988, prod. Mickey Hart) was digitized by Mickey Hart in 1988, and the sound is breathtaking. Hart brings his Afro/Arabic/rock influences—and his buddy Vince Delgado—to the group, and the result is a shimmering web of percussion with the tensile strength of a suspension bridge cable.

influences:
⏮ Olatunji, Ustad Alla Rakha, Ray Baretto ⏭ Balafon Marima Ensemble

see also: Mickey Hart, Zakir Hussain, Ali Akbar Khan

j. poet

Henri Dikongué

Pan-African pop

Born c. 1968, in Cameroon. Based in Paris, France.

Henri Dikongué has already made a big impact in Europe, where his album C'est La Vie hit #1 on the world-music chart. Back home in Cameroon, he's not only famous, he's notorious. His debut album, Wa (You), tossed verbal and musical darts at Cameroon's military regime and dealt with weighty matters like racism and the day-to-day hardships of post-colonial life brought on by economic imperialism. "I was frustrated—an angry young man—when I wrote my first album," Dikongué says. "Even today, many musicians from the older generation are chained to the past. They live in a self-imposed ghetto of dance music and happy lyrics, partially because in most African nations you risk so much criticizing the government. My generation was born in Africa, but we live all over the world, so we have a more international outlook." Dikongué's own global outlook influences his musical approach as well as his lyrical stance. Like many of the sounds being created by a new generation of African pop artists that includes Sally Nyolo, Ismaël Lô, and Wasis Diop, C'est La Vie tips its hat to the international cadences of the African Diaspora by embracing reggae, samba, salsa, soul, and jazz as well as the expected Cameroonian rhythms of makossa and bikutsi. Dikongué's music isn't all up-tempo, however; it's evenly balanced between smooth dance grooves and ballads. Dikongué's use of tempos that balance traditional African rhythms with classical European harmonies and structure make his slower material sound like a breath of fresh air. Tunes like "Ndotu (Sorrow)" and "Na Tem Ité Idaba (In My Dreams)" showcase Dikongué's acoustic guitar and ride understated rhythm tracks that combine African, American, and European elements in a way that takes them in a subtle new direction—perhaps the first inklings of what the international pop of the next century will sound like.

what's available: Dikongué's international debut, C'est La Vie ♪♪♪♪ (Tinder, 1998, prod. Gilles Fruchaux), kicks off with "Ndol'asu," a Latin-flavored tune that includes a fiddle passage that could be Stephane Grappelli sitting in with a charanga band. "Na Teleye Owa Ngea" combines the swing of Caribbean soca and the hard rhythms of bikutsi (Cameroon's brand of rock 'n' roll), while "A Muni (Man)" addresses spousal abuse with an ironic lyric and a melange of West African dance styles including makossa, high life, and soukous.

worth searching for: Wa (You) ♪♪♪♪ (Buda Musique France, 1995), Dikongué's first album, is full of solid grooves and scathing political commentary; it made him a cause célèbre back home, and a rising star on the French world-music scene.

influences:
⏮ Sam Fan Thomas, Francis Bebey, Les Veterans

j. poet

Vieux Diop

Afro-jazz fusion

Born in Senegal. Based in New York, NY, USA.

Vieux Diop emigrated from Senegal to New York in 1983 and brought along the music of his homeland with a missionary fervor. Though his sonic-ambassador role was self-appointed, there isn't an audience since that hasn't granted him diplomatic recognition on the spot. In addition to memorable work as a sideman holding his own with such historic world-music names as Babatunde Olatunji and Youssou N'Dour, he has racked up impressive credentials in the free-jazz realm with the Myth World Rhythm Troupe and in the worldbeat registry with Spirit Ensemble. Perhaps his biggest of many contributions to the Stateside appreciation of international sounds is as a popular world-music radio personality, a university lecturer/performer, and an outreach artist for New York City's public schools, introducing thousands of young people to the music of Africa through the prestigious Juilliard Performing Arts Program for Schools at New York's Lincoln Center. Somehow he also found time to record a well-regarded solo album in the mid-'90s.

what's available: Vieux Diop (Via Jo) ♪♪♪♪ (Triloka, 1995, prod. Brian Keane)—helpfully subtitled with the approximate English pronunciation of the composer/lead-singer/multi-instrumentalist's name—is a tasteful and listenable debut, melding American jazz and African polyrhythm in supple and pleasantly surprising ways, with pastoral detours that show how the "ambient" aesthetic was at work on the continents of color long before it acquired the terms or technology we know today.

worth searching for: Diop recorded an earlier band project of Caribbean-flavored West African music, Deeso (Alebrije, 1994), on a local label before the majors got the message.

influences:

◀◀ Youssou N'Dour, Babatunde Olatunji, Miles Davis

Adam McGovern

Wasis Diop

Pan-African pop

Born in Dakar, Senegal. Based in Paris, France.

Composer/guitarist Wasis Diop may be Senegalese, but he considers himself an international musician and uses African, Caribbean, Arabic, Asian, black American, and European elements in a seamless manner that will appeal to listeners no matter where they come from—musically or geographically. Diop's use of international colors (a bagpipe here, a vocalist singing in the style of classical Japanese opera there) has produced a smooth, cosmopolitan version of Afropop.

"In this life, nothing is static," Diop says. "The only danger is to not adapt, to not travel, to stay in one spot, musically or spiritually. Despite the history of colonization, Africa has stayed open to Western ideas. When we listened to Black American music, for example, we listened to it as if it came from our culture, from our lost cousins. When I grew up, Black American music was the most listened-to music, and after loving it for years, we're sending this music back to America, so now maybe Americans will lend an ear to Africa, and it will give them new ideas."

"Growing up, music was the only game we had," Diop continues. "So everybody played music; every child was a musician. But the day you decide to be a professional musician things change. My family didn't accept it. There is a proverb they used to tell me: 'He who has a noble spirit listens to music, but doesn't play it.' So I was a young man before I began my career." After moving to Paris—allegedly to go to university—Diop put together a band called West African Cosmos, a jazzy instrumental combo that toured Europe several times and recorded one album for CBS France. "Eventually we hired a singer who was into reggae, which got me interested in going to Jamaica." On his first day there, Diop met famed dub auteur Lee Perry. "Lee Perry came up to me and said that he could tell I was from Africa. He asked me to come to his studio, the Black Ark, to play on some of the dub tracks he was working on. Every morning he would read to me from the Bible, and tell me stories about Africa. I added guitar to some of the songs, but every night there were deaths on the road outside—it was difficult to live with that."

In 1990, Diop began working with Amina Annabi, a pop singer with strong roots in her Moroccan culture. He wrote "C'est le Dernier Qui a Parlé Qui a Raison (It Is the Last One Who Speaks Who Is Right)" for her and the song won the Eurovision Song Contest in 1991. Amina's manager introduced Diop to Tasuaki Shimizu, a Japanese sax player who was moving in the direction of high-concept international pop à la Ryuichi Sakamoto. Diop played on Shimizu's album, joined his band, and toured Japan for two years. After returning from Japan, Diop's career went into overdrive. "My brother, Djibril Diop Mambety, directed a film called Hyenes, an adaptation of Friedrich Durrenmatt's La Visite de la Vielle Dame." Durrenmatt's play is a scathing indictment of the way the capitalist system breeds greed, corruption, and class warfare. PolyGram released Diop's soundtrack for Hyenes before the film, feeling the music could stand on its own. They also signed Diop as a solo artist.

"When I write, I'm inspired by the traditions of Africa. In each region the melodies are completely different from the next region, and sometimes it's difficult to transpose the melodies I'm hearing in my head; trying to resolve these difficulties can produce a new sound. In the end, everything I do is based on something I've heard before; but in music, the past, the present, and the future can exist in the same moment. Musicians never invent anything new, but reassemble sounds they've heard before to let them survive, to carry them on. That's the alchemy of the artist."

dissidenten

what's available: On No Sant ♪♪♪♪ (Triloka, 1995, prod. Wasis Diop, Yasuaki Shimizu), Diop's alchemical inventions include Afro-Parisian blues, South African doo-wop, Senegalese reggae skank, and a ritual song performed by Yande Kodou Sene, one of Senegal's most respected traditional female singers. The basic groove is undeniably African, but Diop's interest in Jamaican, Japanese, North American, and European music gives the proceedings a decidedly international slant. Toxu ♪♪♪♪ (Triloka, 1998) is another fine Afropop album that features Diop's transformation of Talking Heads' "Once in a Lifetime" into a traditional African chant, as well as "Father to Son," which combines Senegalese and Afrikaans (white South African) folk music for an implicit message of universal brotherhood.

worth searching for: The Hyenes ♪♪♪♪ (Mercury France, 1993) soundtrack combines synthesizer washes, hand drumming, and traditional singing to create a deep, dream-like atmosphere.

influences:

⏮ Youssou N'Dour, Talking Heads, E.T. Mensah

⏭ Sally Nyolo, Henri Dikongué

see also: Amina, Lee "Scratch" Perry

j. poet

Dissidenten

Arabic worldbeat

Formed 1980, in Berlin, Germany. Based in Berlin, Germany.

Uve Mullrich, guitar, bass, sitar, keyboards; Marlon Klein, keyboards, bass, djembe, percussion; Freido Josch, sax, flute. (All members are from Germany.)

Mullrich, Klein, and Josch, the key trio of the ever-shifting musical collective known as Dissidenten, first collaborated in the 1970s group Embryo. They played avant garde jazz/rock, ran their own indie label, and staged many large, free (in both senses of the word) music festivals. In 1983 the trio spent a year living and working at the palace of Maharaja Bhalkrishna Bharti of Gondagoan in Madya Pradesh, India; it was there that they laid plans for their first album, Sahara Electric, a collaboration with Algerian rai singer Cherif M. Lamran. This fusion of rai (Algerian pop) and rock became one of the first worldbeat "hits" in Europe. As for the band's strategy of recording in Arabic, Mullrich explains: "Much of the world loves American and British pop, yet doesn't understand the words, so why not make music in Arabic? This is the language you find around the corner in Paris or Berlin. In Berlin there are 200,000 Turks alone, and their relationship to European music is analogous to the influence blacks had on American rock and roll. Anywhere in the world, you can put on a radio and hear Bulgarian chants, rai, Celtic folk, Greek bouzouki music, funk, John Coltrane. There's no reason to limit yourself."

what to buy: The idea of fusing rock and rai is a good one—both styles thrive on attitude and confrontation—but the band is clearly still feeling its way on Sahara Electric ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1988, prod. Marlon Klein). The production is minimal, which gives the music an unfinished quality that's part of its appeal. Basing their world fusion on the Arabic continuum, rather than the African, shows promise, but this is still more Western than Eastern.

what to buy next: The dissidents take an interesting side trip to India for one of their most polished albums, Jungle Book ♪♪♪½ (Triloka Worldly, 1993, prod. Marlon Klein). The production is glossy, and members of the Karnataka College of Percussion add considerable authenticity to the rhythm tracks.

best of the rest:

Live at the Pyramids ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1989)
Out of This World ♪♪♪ (Sire, 1989) Instinctive Traveler ♪♪♪ (Blue Jackel, 1998)

influences:

⏮ 3 Mustaphas 3, Khaled see also: Karnataka College of Percussion

j. poet

Djavan

Brazilian, worldbeat

Born Djavan Caetano Viana, 1950, in Maceio, Alagoas, Brazil. Based in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil.

Djavan is one of the most popular singer/songwriter/guitarists in Brazil and was noted for his "global pop" sound even before the term gained currency outside of his country. His unique jazz-tinged phrasing, unexpected melodic shifts, and willingness to tackle Brazil's social and racial inequalities in his lyrics have made him a unique artist: a singer who doesn't fit neatly into any one category.

Djavan began singing and playing guitar in primary school, inspired by American pop music. "I began singing along to the records of Elvis, Sinatra, Billie Holliday and Duke Ellington. I got a guitar for a gift and taught myself. The first time I sang in public was for a school show. I did a song by Augostinho Dos Santos." Djavan ran away from home at the age of 16, when his parents told him he was going to be shipped off to a military academy. "My father was a soldier," Djavan says. "He said he wouldn't support me if I was going to play music." Djavan was able to make his way to Rio de Janeiro, where he began playing in nightclub bands "doing tourist music." He was also composing his own songs, getting some session work and contributing music to several novelas—wildly popular Brazilian TV soap operas—which helped him get his compositional chops up to speed.

After placing a few tunes with artists like Roberto Carlos and Maria Bethânia, Djavan landed a contract with Sigla and recorded his first album, A Voz E O Violao De Djavan (The Voice and Guitar of Djavan). Even at this early stage, his work was full of global influences. "I used all the music I loved; folkloric, classical, African, jazz, the Beatles." The success of A Voz E O Violao De Djavan led to a contract with EMI Brazil, for which he recorded three albums—Djavan, Alumbaramento, and Seduzir—with three hit singles, prompting a jump to Sony Brazil. His first two outings for that label, Luz and Lilas, continued his winning streak; the latter was one of the biggest import albums of 1984 in the U.S. The two recordings also elevated Djavan to superstar status in his home country, though his financial success didn't shield him from all the vagaries of that country's social structure. "Brazilians say the society is color blind, but people of African descent still have more social and economic problems and less access to education. After I had became popular, I went into a music store in Sao Paulo to buy a piano. When I told them I would pay for the instrument with cash, they called the police, who asked me where I got the money. They wanted to see my papers and refused to believe a 'nigger' could make that much money playing music."

what to buy: Flor de Lis ♪♪♪♪½ (Sound Wave, 1990, prod. Guto Graça Mello) is 1976's landmark A Voz E O Violao De Djavan with a new title and cover art. It's a romp from start to finish, with all the elements that made Djavan a star—sharp melodies, wonderful phrasing, and percolating Afro-Brazilian rhythms—already in place.

what to buy next: The compilation Djavan ♪♪♪½ (Columbia, 1985) contains tracks from the two Brazilian albums that boosted Djavan's star even higher, Luz and Lilas. Rather than culling the best songs from each album, however, the record company apparently chose to pull the tracks they thought were most likely to catch the ear of the American public. A good introduction, but the material flows better on the originals, which can easily be found in the import section of most large record stores.

best of the rest:
Seduzir ♪♪♪♪ (EMI Brazil, 1981)
Bird of Paradise ♪♪♪ (Columbia, 1987)
Djavan & Alumbaramento ♪♪♪½ (World Pacific, 1992)

influences:
⏮ Gilberto Gil, Caetano Veloso, Martinho Da Vila

⏭ Marisa Monte, Daniela Mercury

see also: Virginia Rodrigues

j. poet

Djur Djura

Traditional Berber, worldbeat

Born c. 1945, in Ifigha, Algeria. Based in Paris, France.

Djur Djura takes her name from Mount Djurdjura, a landmark near her village of Kabylia in Algeria. Djura is a noted writer and filmmaker, a compelling singer/composer, and an outspoken supporter of women's rights. Unhappily her fame does not sit well with her family, and she has endured several life-threatening physical attacks by her brother, who has vowed to kill her for breaking with Berber tradition.

Djura has faced hardship all her life. Her mother, who had wanted a boy child, left the baby to starve. One of Djura's grandfather's wives took her in and nursed her. Djura's family is Berber. They have their own language and customs, including a tendency to "protect" women against the secular world. This mindset has caused her many problems over the years.

In 1950 Djura's father took the family to Paris to seek work. He was imprisoned for supporting the Algerian Liberation Movement, and after his release he beat Djura and her mother. Djura enrolled in a performing arts school, where she was offered a role in an upcoming TV series, but her father refused his permission. To escape her father's wrath (and an arranged marriage), Djura fled to Algiers with her brother, Mohand. But when she was offered a job as a journalist with Algerian radio and television, he locked her in a room for five months. Mohand was also afraid that his sister was becoming too intimate with his friend Oliver. Djura's father arrived in Algeria and moved her back to her home town of Ifigha, where she immersed herself in Berber folklore and music with the aid of the village women. Her father next moved her back to Paris, where she was kept locked up until Oliver helped her escape. She worked days and went to film school nights, and she eventually persuaded her mother to leave her father, which led to her brother Mohand's threat to kill her. Mohand attacked her and slashed her face shortly thereafter.

In 1976 Djura began doing readings of some of the poems she'd written about her life, and, encouraged by the response, formed a group with two of her sisters and musicians from North Africa, France, and America. Her music, while based on the Berber songs and chants she grew up with, also contains European and Anglo/American pop flourishes.

what's available: The collection Voice of Silence ♪♪♪♪½ (Luaka Bop, 1993, prod. Hervé Lacroix), compiled by David Byrne, includes material from four French albums, Asirem, Groupe de Femmes Algériennes, Groupe de Femmes Algériennes: A Yemma, and Le Défi. The band, put together with the help of Boudjema Merzak, conductor of the Algerian Radio and Television Orchestra, has been trained in Berber music and provides oscar d'leon

Oscar D'Leon

a beautifully understated accompaniment to Djura's fragile vocals. The music ranges from the singing and handclapping styles common to Berber women's music to more classically orchestrated pieces. The lyrics usually deal with the day-to-day realities of women's lives.

influences:
⏮ Cheikha Remitti

j. poet

Oscar D'Leon

Salsa, tropical

Born c. 1950, in Venezuela. Based in Caracas, Venezuela.

Oscar D'Leon spent years as a part-time musician in Caracas, Venezuela, working in a car factory and driving a cab, saving his money to fund a full-time music career. In the early '70s he had his first hit, "Pensando en Ti," with a band he had organized, Dimension Latina. Subsequently he founded the group Salsa Mayer and then created Oscar D'Leon y su Orquesta. Today that 19-piece group (which now includes D'Leon's sons as well) performs often in the U.S., where a highlight of the show is D'Leon's energetic playing of his white baby grand piano.

what's available: En New York ♪♪♪½ (Musart, 1998) is a live recording with the band's current configuration, aptly illustrating why it's said of D'Leon that he was born a Venezuelan with a Cuban soul. Exitos con la Critica ♪♪♪ (Musart, 1996) offers a trip through D'Leon's history as an arranger and bandleader, spotlighting his trademark use of a trombone-section backline and his agile singing style. Navidad con Oscar D'Leon ♪♪♪ (Musart, 1994) is salsa music for an island holiday.

influences:
⏮ Beny Moré, Celia Cruz, Cuban salsa

see also: Celia Cruz, Tito Puente

Kerry Dexter

Dr. Didg

Experimental dance-rock

Formed 1993, in London, England. Based in London, England.

Graham Wiggins, didgeridoo, keyboards, melodica, percussion; Mark Revell, guitar (1993–98); Dave Motion, guitar (1998–present); Ian Campbell, drums, percussion. (All members are from England.)

Dr. Didg is the nickname of Dr. Graham Wiggins, who earned the sobriquet by testing out the didgeridoo—Aboriginal Australia's now-famous droning tubular instrument, organically derived but sonically synthesizer-like—in his physics lab. While playing the didgeridoo for money on the streets of England to support his education at Oxford, Wiggins met another local busker, guitarist Martin Cradick, and the two joined forces to form Outback, a relatively influential world-music fusion group noted for introducing the didgeridoo to Western audiences. When that band broke up in 1993, Wiggins and Outback drummer Ian Campbell began experimenting in a live context with a technique known as "live sampling," in which Wiggins performs a riff on didgeridoo, samples it, then loops it on digital delay, gradually adding more layers to create a trippy effect well-suited to Dr. Didg's eclectic brand of ethnic-influenced dance/rock fusion. Although much less traditional in nature than Martin Cradick's current project, Baka Beyond, Dr. Didg is far more accessible, exploring an improvisational sound that will appeal equally to fans of the Grateful Dead (with whom Wiggins was invited to perform in 1993) and Aboriginal rockers Yothu Yindi.

what's available: Although less organic than the group's debut, Seritonality ♪♪♪½ (Hannibal, 1998, prod. Graham Wiggins) is the more fully realized effort, with hypnotic, multi-layered grooves whose danceable appeal is difficult to deny. Guitarist Mark Revell is in fine form on songs like the live "Son of Tut," his melodies providing a nice modern contrast to the primal power of Wiggins's phenomenal didg work. Out of the Woods ♪♪♪½ (Hannibal, 1994, prod. Graham Wiggins) is an equally enjoyable excursion that more accurately reflects the group's beginnings as street performers, with fewer effects, samples, and synthesizers and more straightforward songwriting.

influences:

David Hudson, Yothu Yindi, Grateful Dead, Material

see also: Baka Beyond

Bret Love

Doctor Ganga

See: Orlando Owah

Dr. Loco's Rockin' Jalapeño Band

Tejano rock, worldbeat

Formed 1987, in Palo Alto, CA, USA. Based in San Francisco, CA, USA.

Dr. Loco (José Cuéllar), sax, lead vocals, leader; Glenn Appell, lead trumpet, flugelhorn; Carlos Camplis, timbales (1987–94); Mario Barrera, timbales (1994–present); Chris Gonzalez Clarke, guitar, tres; Jesus Covarrubias, keys, accordion (1987–94); Hadley Louden, keyboards (1994–97); Daniel Martinez, keyboards (1997–present); Carlos Montoya, bass; David Stephens, trombone trump; Dean Boysen, trumpet; Mark Rendón, drums, congas (1987–94); Joe Brigandi, drums (1994–present); Sammy Dries-Daffne, congas (1987–94). (All members are from USA.)

José Cuéllar, alias Dr. Loco, the crazy Chicano with the sweet swingin' sax and ultraviolet smile, leads one of the tightest, hardest party bands in the San Francisco Bay Area. With a cannon that spans six decades and several continents, the Jalapeños provide the uninitiated with an introduction to the Latin styles that have become the building blocks for much North American pop music, at times sounding like the soundtrack for a course in Latin Music 101—a fantasy that isn't far from the truth. "In the early '80s, I was teaching at Stanford University and put together a lecture I called 'The History of Chicano Music.'" Cuéllar's stage grin isn't an act and is even more infectious when he's talking to you, one-on-one; he smiles and bobs his head in time to an invisible music that only he can hear and fills in his story with expressive hand gestures and peals of delighted laughter. "I played records by Benny Moré, the first great Cuban superstar of the '40s and '50s; Tejano hits; things by Santana and Los Lobos; Freddy Fender's early stuff; everything. It went over so well, I had to repeat it and began wondering what it would be like to play some of this stuff live, so the students could get a real feel for it."

Cuéllar asked around campus and found plenty of students and teachers with musical chops to spare. His first group, Dr. Loco's Original Corrido Boogie Band, played everything from '60s Tejano classics to merengue and covers of Santana's acid-drenched Latin hits. By the time Cuéllar, who has a Ph.D. in anthropology, was offered a job as head of the Chicano studies program at San Francisco State, most of his band mates had graduated and they moved north with him. With a few changes in the lineup, the group was reborn as Dr. Loco's Rockin' Jalapeño Band. "We devised a five year plan, to see how far we could go," Cuéllar says. "And we've been able to do what we set out to do, which is to preserve, explore, and expand upon our bilingual, bicultural experience as Mexican Americans. We do songs in English, Spanish, and Spanglish, although most of our tunes are bilingual. Growing up in San Antonio, I knew from an early age how creative you can be with two languages at your disposal. It allows you to derive many meanings from the

japan: the taiko tradition

The taiko (both a specific instrumental name and a general genre heading) is the traditional drum of Japan, and can range in size from small, hand-held snares to the huge o-daiko, which is typically carved from the largest tree that can be found and often weighs more than 1,000 pounds. The taiko's most prominent proponent is the Japanese ensemble Kodo, whose name literally means "heartbeat"; it is said that the sound of the taiko resembles a mother's heartbeat as felt in the womb, and that babies are often lulled to sleep by the drum's thunderous vibrations. Before 1981, when Kodo began its mission to introduce the taiko to audiences around the world, the instrument was little-known outside of Japan, where it was primarily used in formal ceremonies and royal court performances. The latter is easy to understand, as taiko presentations are usually elaborately organized, with just as much importance placed on the visual as the musical. Now that Kodo has received worldwide acclaim for its seemingly eternal "One Earth Tour," taiko drums are experiencing a small surge of popularity in America, where some university ensembles are beginning to experiment with their primal, powerful sound.

see also: Kodo

Bret Love

same word, to pun in two languages and to create new words. The kids I hung with would invent words, then try to get our friends to use them, to see how far they'd go. In a sense that's what I'm still doing with the band, combining cultures, mixing politics and dance music into a postmodern potpourri that everyone can relate to."

what to buy: Barrio Ritmos & Blues ♪♪♪½ (Loco, 1998, prod. Greg Landau) is Loco's latest, and, in line with his earlier releases, a solid primer of Chicano styles—Latino R&B ballads, corridos, blues, funk, salsa, and the Neville's "Look-ka Py Py," played with a Latin twist to the second line rhythms. Contact Loco at P.O. Box 410023, San Francisco, CA 94141-0023, locoline@drloco.com. Loco's funky and folky approach to the Latino songbag provides plenty of street grit to Puro Party! ♪♪♪½ (Flying Fish, 1995, prod. Wayne Wallace).

the rest:
Movimiento Music ♪♪♪½ (Flying Fish, 1992)

influences:
◀◀ Bob Wills, Bill Dogget, Thee Midniters, Little Joe, Santana, Los Lobos

j. poet

Dr. Nico

Soukous

Born Nicholas Kasanda in Zaire (now Congo). Died 1985, in Brussels, Belgium.

Buckaroo Banzai's credo "No matter where you go, there you are" is in full effect when you talk about the African Diaspora sector of world music. Check the scenario: Over time, African slaves in the Caribbean and the Americas remake/remodel ancient rhythms, melodies, and instruments in their New World images. Twentieth-century recording technology becomes the linkage free-zone where Brazilian samba, African American blues/jazz, Cuban son/rumba/mambo, and Trinidadian calypso meet, discover common roots, share secrets, make new magic. Said recordings flip back to the Motherland, inspiring new hybrids of music: jump blues into highlife, James Brown into Fela Kuti, Cuban rumba into Congolese soukous. . . . No matter where you go, there you are indeed.

The rumba equation is a particularly apt example of the theory. It's a no-brainer, really: Congo is the former "Belgian Congo"; in slavery days many Congolese were shipped to Cuba; '40s and '50s rumba records rocked Congo's radios, parties, and bands because it was an amped-up/jazzed-up reincarnation of traditional Congolese maringa music. By the end of the '50s, every successful dance band in Kinshasa (the capital city) played mostly cha-cha-chas, boleros, and rumbas. Original material was a commercial no-no until Le Grand Kalle (Joseph Kabasele) & African Jazz brought on the New Sound with their 1960 megahit "Independence Cha Cha." Fittingly, this tribute to the brand-new nation of Zaire also introduced a new Zairian dance music—soukous. In soukous (literally, "shake"), rhythm shifts, melodic flow, lyrical nuance, chromatic extrapolation, jam improvisation, everything is centered around the guitarist's groove/mood swings. "Independence Cha Cha" was soukous's Big Bang, and when the smoke cleared, African Jazz's teenage prodigy Dr. Nico stood chilling in a French-cut suit, the undisputed grand architect of soukous guitar. A lyrically ethereal, melodically balletic, rhythmically whimsical, throw-breakdowns-to-the-break-a-dawn kinda guy, Nico blew up. Mid-decade he formed his own band, Africa Fiesta. Now a top-ranking solo act, Nico raised the bar and topped the charts when he hired singer/composer Tabu Ley Rochereau. By the time Rochereau split in the early '70s, Dr. Nico's stuff signified as old-school square, no match for either the P-Funk-like 20-piece rockestra viscerality of Franco and TPOK Jazz or the exuberantly over-the-top soukous soul of Rochereau's Afrisa International. Dr. Nico continued to record albums (mostly two-to-four tracks of extended jams) into the early '80s, but he never got back to the Big Show. In 1985, Dr. Nico died of AIDS in a Brussels hospital.

what's available: Unless you have access to an African music store, 1-800-find-a-CD, or the Internet, Dr. Nico recordings are gonna be tough to come by. That said, these imports are kinda sorta available: 1966/1967/1968 ♪♪♪♪½ (African Music, 1995); L'African Fiesta Vol. 1 ♪♪♪½ (Sonodisc, 1994); L'African Fiesta Vol. 2 (1962–1963) ♪♪♪½ (Sonodisc, 1994); and L'African Fiesta, Vol. 4 (1967–1969) ♪♪♪½ (Sonodisc, 1994).

influences:
◀◀ Guy Warren, Bola Sete, Le Grand Kalle & African Jazz

▶▶ Kanda Bongo Man, Loketo (Diblo Dibala), Papa Wemba

see also: Franco, Tabu Ley Rochereau

Tom Terrell

John Doherty

Irish traditional

Born c. 1895, in Ardar, County Donegal, Ireland. Died January 23, 1980, in Ballyshannon, Ireland.

If any one musician can be said to embody the traditional music of his native area, John Doherty would be that musician for Donegal. The youngest of nine children, Doherty's earliest musical influences came from his father, Micker Mór, as well as his uncles of the McConnell family. Because of Donegal's proximity to Scotland, Doherty was also exposed to the strong fiddle traditions of J. Scott Skinner and William Murdoch. His virtuosity was recognized at an early age, subsequently making him much sought after to play for local dances while still in his teens. Since the early nineteenth century the Dohertys had been widely regarded as one of the main families of traveling musicians in Northern Ireland, and John was no exception. At a time when tinsmithing and fiddling were two fortunate traits to possess in the villages of Donegal, he excelled at both, and was a welcome addition to each community in which he would stop. According to most accounts of Doherty's life, he traveled a regular route, staying in each locale a week or two. By day he would ply his trade as a tinsmith, and at night he would teach tunes and play local dances and house parties. Part of John Doherty's fame owed to a recording career more prolific than many of his contemporaries—a career all the more impressive for the fact that he rarely left his native Donegal. Almost without exception the recordings of Doherty were made by folklorists who came to Donegal seeking him. By the early '50s Doherty had become well known not only for his repository of fiddle music but also for his rich wealth of local folklore. American Alan Lomax came calling in 1951, followed by Peter Kennedy in 1953, and the Irish Folklore Commission in 1957. When the '60s came around and the Donegal of Doherty's youth began to change, he traveled less frequently, choosing to stay in the places most familiar to him. Doherty's overall geographic preference led many to mischaracterize his playing as being definitive of the Donegal tradition. But Doherty's style was more unique, his frequent travels introducing him to a wide variety of community-based fiddling forms from which he kept elements he liked while discarding those that he didn't. His playing featured equal parts Scottish and Irish influences, but rolled into a style so individualistic that it even differed from that of members of his own family. His death in 1980 left a hole in Irish fiddling that will never be filled—but a legacy from which a whole new musical generation takes inspiration and from which all listeners can take comfort.

what to buy: The Floating Bow—Traditional Fiddle Music from Donegal ♪♪♪♪♪ (Claddagh, 1996, prod. Dermot McLaughlin) is culled from recordings of Doherty made between 1968 and 1974. As if more than 50 minutes of wonderfully vibrant fiddling weren't enough, the 32-page booklet includes a comprehensive career history, two pages of photographs, and detailed notes on each track. As is Doherty's trademark, this is all solo unaccompanied fiddle music, albeit running the gamut from flowing reels like "Bonnie Kate" to a masterful imitation of the highland pipes on "The Eniskillen Dragoons." Doherty's brilliance is especially captured on the final track, his fiddle going from the lonesome Gaelic air "Maidin Fhómhair" into a lyrically vibrant rendition of "Miss McLeod's Reel," which, in his hands, is pure magic.

what to buy next: John Doherty—The Celebrated Recordings ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1997, prod. David Hammond) is a vivacious collection of Doherty's music recorded at an informal 1974 session that took place in Glencolmcille, Donegal. The over-67-minute recording is full of Doherty's distinctive unaccompanied fiddling, replete with the triplets and double stopping for which he was renowned in his native country. Bundle and Go ♪♪♪♪ (Topic, 1984/Green Linnet, 1993, prod. Tony Engle) was recorded when Doherty was well into his 80s, a fact only significant for understanding how brilliant this man's fiddling was even at such an advanced age. Still, while by no means a bad recording, this doesn't stand up to the quality of music and rich liner notes of The Floating Bow.

worth searching for: Several of Doherty's better recordings are either only available on cassette or LP or are out of print entirely, but all are well worth tracking down. His self-titled album on the Comhaltas Ceoltóirí Éireann label, as well as The Star of Donegal and Pedlar's Pack, both on the Bristol, England–based Folktracks label, rate among his finest works. Doherty was also featured in two television documentaries. The first, Fiddler on the Road, was made by Ulster Television, and the second, simply titled John Doherty, features American folk icon Pete Seeger and was made by Folktracks. For a comprehensive look at the fiddling tradition in Donegal—including a detailed history of the Doherty family—Caoimhín MacAoidh's book Between the Jigs and the Reels (Drumlin Publications, Nure, Manorhamilton, County Leitrim, Ireland) is an insightful examination into a rich musical culture.

influences:

- Mickey McConnell, Alec McConnell, J. Scott Skinner
- Altan, Paddy Glackin, Robbie Hannan, Liz Doherty, Vincent Campbell, Tommy Peoples

see also: Paddy Glackin

Cliff McGann

Felix Dolan

Irish traditional

Born March 13, 1937, in Bronx, NY, USA. Based in New York, NY, USA.

If you were to track down any Irish musician in the New York area and ask who would be his or her choice of a piano player, Felix Dolan is the name you'd almost always hear. Dolan began playing the instrument at age 14, though by then he was already well accustomed to the Irish tunes he had heard from his mother, an accordion player from County Mayo. Dolan had also learned that instrument from her and would play it at local sessions. As his experience with the piano increased, he was encouraged by other musicians to accompany them. The piano displaced the accordion in his life, and he soon had a regular gig as the accompanist for two of New York's finest, Paddy Killoran and Frank McCarthy. By the time the 1960s rolled around Dolan was a prominent member of the now-famed New York Ceili Band, in which his piano was the musical cement for fiddlers Andy McGann, Paddy Reynolds, and Larry Redican, as well as Paddy O'Brien's accordion and Jack Coen's flute. He remains an active accompanist and session man, and has played with nearly every great Irish musician to have lived in or passed through New York City in the last century.

what to buy: Warming Up ♪♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1993, prod. Seamus Connolly, Martin Mulhaire) is a brilliant recording of straightforward Irish traditional instrumentals from accordionist Martin Mulhaire, fiddler Seamus Connolly, and flute player Jack Coen, in the East Galway–East Clare style. The three musicians combine for some inspired solos, duets, and trios, all brilliantly backed by the unequaled piano playing of Dolan. Give Us Another ♪♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1994, prod. Joe Derrane) was the long-awaited return to recorded Irish music for Boston-based accordionist Joe Derrane. Derrane, responsible for some of the century's most influential tracks of Irish accordion while still a teenager in the '40s and '50s, had virtually disappeared from Irish music altogether. On his triumphant comeback, Derrane's only choice for musical accompaniment was Felix Dolan's brilliantly understated piano playing.

what to buy next: A Tribute to Michael Coleman ♪♪♪♪ (Shaskeen, 1966/Green Linnet, 1994, prod. various) was originally recorded in 1965. Featuring button accordionist Joe Burke, fiddler Andy McGann, and Dolan, this homage to arguably the most influential Irish fiddler ever to have lived has become one of the classics of the genre. Traditional Flute Music in the Sligo-Roscommon Style ♪♪♪½ (Cló lar-Chonnachta, 1996) is a fine recording featuring Dolan accompanying Irish flute player Catherine McEvoy.

worth searching for: The documentary film From Shore to Shore (Cherry Lane Productions) gives a magnificent look at the musical context within which Dolan has spent most of his life. Its examination of Irish traditional music in New York City through the use of archival footage and black-and-white photos is simply phenomenal, and it gives a panoramic survey of the legacy's current heirs through appearances by New York–based musicians like Eileen Ivers, Andy McGann, and Jerry O'Sullivan as well as Dolan.

influences:

Paddy Killoran, Michael Coleman, Dan Sullivan

Brendan Dolan, Donna Long

see also: Eileen Ivers, James Keane, Andy McGann

Cliff McGann

Dordan

See Mary Bergin

Connie Dover /Scartaglen

Celtic folk

Born in USA. Based in USA.

Scartaglen was an acoustically oriented American band that performed ballads and instrumentals from Ireland, Scotland, and England, as well as original compositions that were heavily inspired by Anglo-Celtic traditions. They released three albums, all of which are now out of print. During a band hiatus in 1991, Connie Dover traveled to Scotland and recorded her first solo album with a cast of great Scottish and Irish musicians. Since Scartaglen's demise, Dover has continued to develop her solo career. She recorded two more solo albums with Phil Cunningham (formerly of Silly Wizard) producing, and she performs live in a duo with fellow Scartaglen alum Roger Landes, with guest spots on public radio's famed A Prairie Home Companion being just one chapter in their emerging success story.

what to buy: Since all three Scartaglen albums are out of print, Dover's and the others' solo efforts will have to do, but they do well. Dover's three recordings—Somebody ♪♪♪♪½ (Taylor Park Music, 1991, prod. Phil Cunningham), The Wishing Well ♪♪♪♪ (Taylor Park Music, 1994, prod. Phil Cunningham), and If Ever I Return ♪♪♪♪ (Taylor Park Music, 1997, prod. Phil Cunningham)—are all fairly similar in tone. Cunningham surrounded Dover with a fine cast of sympathetic musicians, including himself on keyboard and pennywhistles, Aly Bain of Boys of the Lough on fiddle, Christy O'Leary on uilleann pipes, and Manus Lunny on guitar, bouzouki, and bodhrán (Irish frame drum). Most of the selections are traditional ballads from Scotland or Ireland, with occasional surprises like the lovely French song "La Fontaine" on If Ever I Return.

worth searching for: Scartaglen ♪♪♪ (Kicking Mule, 1984, prod. Scartaglen), The Middle Path ♪♪♪½ (Castle Island, 1987, prod. Scartaglen), and Last Night's Fun ♪♪♪½ (City Spark Records, 1992, prod. Tom Mardikes) are all nice recordings and worth searching out. Band members Michael Dugger and Roger Landes have kept busy with At Early Dawn ♪♪♪♪ (Lopitha, 1996) and Dragon Reels ♪♪♪♪ (Ranger Music, 1997), respectively.

influences:

Maddy Prior, Phil Cunningham, Silly Wizard, Planxty, Boys of the Lough, Dwight Yoakam

Loreena McKennitt, Dervish, Seelyhoo, Altan

see also: The Boys of the Lough, Silly Wizard

Ken Roseman

Mikey Dread

Reggae, dub, deejay

Born Michael Campbell, 1948, in Port Antonio, Jamaica. Based in Kingston, Jamaica.

Combining righteous Rasta messages with love songs and a wry sense of humor, deejay Mikey Dread changed the sound of Jamaican radio and went on to apply his distinctive style to his own recordings. Listening to the island airwaves in the late '70s, you might have heard the goofy dreadlocked deejay also known as Michael Campbell playing heavily mixed versions of roots-rock reggae winners like "Parrot Jungle," "Robbers Roost," and "African Anthem." Toasting over the instrumental mix, Campbell added catchy lines like "You don't steal/you don't gamble/talking 'bout mankind/Michael Campbell." His show featured "cultural" music, that is, home-grown reggae with Rastafarian themes that stood out from the American music then dominating Jamaica's broadcast time. The show was hot, and Campbell soon started recording singles for producer Lee Perry with the same improvised feel. Though Campbell still occasionally releases his own music, he has come full-circle as an impresario of emerging talent with his own label, Dread at the Controls.

what to buy: For a taste of the radio shows that made Campbell famous, check out African Anthem Dubwise ♪♪♪♪♪ (Dread at the Controls, 1978/Big Cat, 1997, prod. Michael Campbell), a bizarre deejay mix with Campbell chanting over instrumental tracks, which he mutates along with his voice, using heavy reverb. The radio jingles, goofy samples, and boasts have been kept intact, with women attesting "You make me feel so goooood." Beyond World War III ♪♪♪♪ (Dread at the Controls, 1979/Heartbeat, 1989/Big Cat, 1997) offers one-love Rasta anthems like "Break Down the Walls" interspersed with spoken prophecies like "World War III," in which Campbell's pacifist warnings sound disorientingly like Barry White.

what to buy next: Once you've come through the zany world of Campbell's radio persona, you can explore his love songs on the twofer S.W.A.L.K./Rockers Vibration ♪♪♪½ (Heartbeat, 1989, prod. Michael Campbell), where the bearded Casanova sings about losing his girl on the title track (which stands for "sealed with a loving kiss"), while Rockers Vibration spotlights his production skills on positive songs by Sugar Minott, Michael Israel, and the Ovationz. Campbell's calls to action always sound uplifting and empowering, and Pave the Way ♪♪♪½ (DEP, 1985/Heartbeat, 1990, prod. Michael Campbell) balances socially conscious commands like the title one with sound advice like "Relax Enjoy Yourself." Lorna Dawkins's sexy jingles typify Come to Mikey Dread's Dub Party ♪♪♪ (ROIR, 1995, prod. Michael Campbell), a more light-hearted album than earlier releases, with vocals playfully cut up and mixed among synthesizer effects, only slightly compromised by unimaginative drum-machine programming.

what to avoid: African Anthem Revisited ♪♪ (RAS, 1991, prod. Michael Campbell) is a second-rate dub mix by Jim Fox of the similarly named album above, not to be confused with the excellent original.

influences:

⏮ Lee "Scratch" Perry, King Tubby, Jah Stitch

⏭ Bounty Killer

see also: Sugar Minott, Junior Murvin, Lee "Scratch" Perry

David Poole

Paquito D'Rivera

Afro-Cuban jazz

Born June 4, 1948, in Havana, Cuba. Based in USA.

If there is a singular musician carrying on the legacy of Dizzy Gillespie's pioneering mid-'40s melding of Afro-Cuban rhythms and jazz, it is bandleader and reeds player Paquito D'Rivera. In Cuba, he was influenced by his father, a classical saxophonist who introduced his son to the recordings of Charlie Parker. Inspired at a young age by the music of American jazz musicians Parker, John Coltrane, and Lee Konitz, D'Rivera later added rhythms from his native Cuba and blended them into bopped-up, romantic, salty, sensuous sounds. The young prodigy entered the Havana Conservatory in 1960 to pursue classical studies and by his mid-teens was playing professionally. D'Rivera joined the Orquesta Cubana de Música Moderna in 1967, and with some of its members formed Irakere, an 11-piece band that played a sizzling mixture of jazz, rock, classical, and traditional Cuban music. Irakere performed in the U.S. at the 1978 Newport Jazz Festival as well as others worldwide, causing a sensation that resulted in a historic March 1979 concert in Cuba that featured an array of American pop artists performing alongside the island's best musicians. The event was documented on two albums, Havana Jam and Havana Jam II. More albums with Irakere followed in 1979 and 1980. While on tour in Spain with them in 1980, D'Rivera defected. He eventually settled in New York and within three years was playing in the most prestigious clubs and concert halls and touring Europe with Dizzy Gillespie himself. Throughout the 1980s he continued performing, recording, and touring globally with his own groups; his first albums as leader, Paquito Blowin' in 1981 and Mariel in 1982, solidified his reputation in the United States. As well as recording as a sideman with McCoy Tyner, Hendrik Meurkens, Claudio Roditi, Arturo Sandoval, Bobby Sanabria, Richie Cole, the Caribbean Jazz Project, and many others, he has chalked up a significant number of richly diverse albums as a leader for Columbia, Chesky, Messidor, Candid, and TropiJazz. D'Rivera's broad-based performances and recordings continue to brilliantly straddle the fence between his native Cuban rhythms and modern American music. After performing regularly in Gillespie's United Nation Orchestra (UNO), founded in 1988, D'Rivera took over the band's leadership upon its originator's death in 1993. D'Rivera has also made several recordings with his Havana–New York Music Ensemble, of which Danilo Perez (another UNO member) is pianist/musical director.

what to buy: Paquito D'Rivera Presents: Forty Years of Cuban Jam Session ♪♪♪♪½ (Messidor, 1993, prod. Götz A. Wörner, Paquito D'Rivera, Brenda Feliciano), a gathering of 23 Cuban players from all over the world, developed from a party to honor two veteran Cuban-jazz reed players, Gustavo Mas and José "Chambo" Silva. Not only do you get a broad sampling of Cuban rhythms and melodies, but the liner booklet contains a brief history of the origin of American jazz and its impact on Cuban rhythms. This 11-selection Cuban descarga (jam session), recorded in Miami in February 1993, features leader D'Rivera playing clarinet and alto saxophone on six tunes, accompanied by a flexible rhythm section that includes Horacio Hernández and Rogelio Rivero (drums, timbales), and Rigo Herrera and Victor Valdés (percussion). Among many fine soloists is trombonist Leopoldo "Pucho" Escalante, who shines on "Despojo (Exorcism)," a powerful Yoruba-inspired percussive number performed with the full ensemble. This is a wonderfully loose and captivating album that loyally retains a musical tradition. D'Rivera and trumpeter Arturo Sandoval, former members of the groundbreaking Orquesta Cubana de Música Moderna and the innovative Irakere, mix it up with exciting side players on Reunion ♪♪♪♪♪ (Messidor, 1991, prod. Götz A. Wörner, Uwe Feltens). Fluent in Afro-Caribbean rhythms, bassist David Finck, guitarist Fareed Haque, percussionist Giovanni Hidalgo, pianist Danilo Perez, and drummer Mark Walker add panache to this nine-tune session. D'Rivera soars, Sandoval singes. It's a scorching session all the way, featuring Mario Bauza's classic Cubop number "Tanga" as well as tunes by Chucho Valdes (leader of Irakere) and members of this group. Haque contributes two parts (and solos elegantly) on a sweet, three-part Latin-American suite that also highlights D'Rivera's fluid clarinet mastery. A Night in Englewood ♪♪♪♪½ (Messidor, 1993, prod. Götz A. Wörner, Paquito D'Rivera, Brenda Feliciano) finds D'Rivera at the helm of the UNO on an excellent session featuring his strong arrangements of nine Afro-Cuban jazz selections. Some of the best soloists in the business are spotlighted, and ensemble playing is topnotch, tight, and gorgeously textured. Guest artists on this fiery tribute to Dizzy Gillespie include Claudio Roditi (trumpet), Slide Hampton (trombone), Dave Samuels (marimba, vibraphone), and Raul Jaurena (bandoneón). Filling Gillespie's shoes is not an easy task, yet on this disc, under D'Rivera's leadership, the band carries on the Afro-Cuban jazz tradition with matchless vitality and inventiveness. D'Rivera's clarinet artistry predominates on Tico! Tico! ♪♪♪♪½ (Chesky, 1989, prod. David Chesky, Paquito D'Rivera), a session with his Havana–New York Music Ensemble that often expands the traditional Cuban rhythms and themes with modern thrusts. D'Rivera's clarinet playing is gorgeously romantic, and his alto and tenor sax improvs allow him to occasionally erupt into the fiery explosiveness for which he's noted. Latin-jazz pros Danilo Perez (piano), David Finck and Nilson Matta (both bass), Portinho (drums), and others assist in various small group settings. D'Rivera's excellent reading of the title tune, made famous by Carmen Miranda in the 1940s, stands out but isn't the only highlight among 12 originals by Leo Brouwer, D'Rivera, Perez, and other composers. There are many peak moments. Percussively flavored throughout, Havana Café ♪♪♪♪♪ (Chesky, 1992, prod. David Chesky, Paquito D'Rivera) is a jaunty, modern meld of Afro-Cuban rhythms and jazz improvisations built in 10 tunes mostly by band members. Former Dizzy Gillespie associates Ed Cherry (guitar) and Danilo Perez (piano) enhance this magnificent 1991 studio session with the Havana–New York Music Ensemble. Featuring bassist David Finck, guitarist Fareed Haque, drummer Jorge Rossy, and percussionist Sammy Figueroa, it remains one of D'Rivera's freshest sounding, most vigorous CDs, with everyone adding fiery flair to cohesive, edgy proceedings that lean more toward the modern than the traditional.

what to buy next: After two Heads Up recordings with the Caribbean Jazz Project, D'Rivera makes his solo debut for the label with 100 Years of Latin Love Songs ♪♪♪♪½ (Heads Up, 1998, prod. Bob Belden), a collection of 10 sweet songs of Latin American origin featuring the leader at his melodious, mellow best, playing clarinet and saxophones often accompanied by strings. The enhanced CD includes historical background on each song, a video of D'Rivera's recording sessions, and a "tour" revealing fascinating facts about each Latin American nation represented in the music. Along with the educational and entertaining CD-ROM aspects, this is an elegant, must-own session designed for laid-back listening, for slow dancing to south-of-the-border rhythms, or as music to enhance romancin'. A jazz tribute to the Cuban tradition, Portraits of Cuba ♪♪♪♪½ (Chesky, 1996, prod. David Chesky, Carlos Franzetti) features D'Rivera collaborating with arranger Carlos Franzetti, who conducts a 14-member orchestra enhanced by guest soloists. Rivera shines in the spotlight playing clarinet and soprano and alto saxophones. Franzetti's familiarity with D'Rivera's stylings empowers him to create elaborate, dense, Gershwin-like charts full of excitement, dreamy colors, and the beauty and passion of Cuba. A Taste of Paquito D'Rivera ♪♪♪♪ (Columbia, 1981–86/Legacy, 1994, prod. various) is a 12-tune compilation from D'Rivera's Columbia albums after he settled in the United States, featuring tracks that demonstrate his fluent, fervid expressions on both alto saxophone and clarinet. In a mix of standards and originals, he is assisted by a who's-who of Afro-Cuban jazz, including bassist Eddie Gomez, drummer Ignacio Berroa, trumpeter Claudio Roditi, pianist Hilton Ruiz, and other specialists who play with flawless ardor. The modern orchestral version of Gillespie's "Manteca" features D'Rivera playing both alto sax and clarinet and also spotlights Claudio Roditi (trumpet) and Michel Camilo (piano). The Caribbean Jazz Project ♪♪♪½ (Heads Up, 1995, prod. Caribbean Jazz Project) showcases a collaborative unit led by Dave Samuels, D'Rivera, and Andy Narell, all veteran jazz players/composers. An invigorating session of 11 originals by the co-leaders, this album features a range of music from modern contemporary jazz with Caribbean beats to a seductive, traditional bolero. D'Rivera (clarinet, alto saxophone), Samuels (vibraphone/marimba), and Narell (steel pans) add spicy Caribbean flavor to their jazz, energized by a solid rhythm section and creative percussionists.

what to avoid: If you're not a huge jazz fan and desire more authentic Cuban rhythms, avoid Paquito D'Rivera & the United Nation Orchestra Live at Manchester Craftsmen's Guild ♪♪♪½ (Blue Jackel, 1997, prod. Marty Ashby, Jay Ashby). This 10-tune disc features mostly unknowns, captured at a live February 14, 1997, performance. Unfortunately, it lacks the sparking energy of the UNO Englewood date.

the rest:
Manhattan Burn ♪♪♪½ (Columbia, 1987)
La Habana-Rio Conexion ♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1992)
(With Bebo and Chucho Valdes) Cuba Jazz ♪♪♪♪ (TropiJazz, 1996)
(With Caribbean Jazz Project) Island Stories ♪♪♪♪ (Heads Up, 1996)

worth searching for: To hear how well D'Rivera works with a singer/pianist in a small group setting, seek out Come on Home ♪♪♪♪♪ (Columbia, 1995, prod. Frank Zuback), a robust nine-tune CD by pianist Valerie Capers and her trio. D'Rivera guests on four tracks of this pleasing album, weaving his alto sax lines around Capers's piano melodies or her vocals, and adding particular passion to her torchy love ballad "Out of All (He's Chosen Me)." He also joins leader-pianist Bebo Valdes on Bebo Rides Again ♪♪♪♪½ (Messidor, 1995, prod. Paquito D'Rivera), a tribute to the many other talented musicians who have fled Cuba. Valdes was an important figure in Cuban music before his own flight in 1960, and this November 1994 German studio session was his first recording in 34 years. The 11 tunes—mostly varied, danceable Cuban originals by Valdes—are performed by 10 musicians who deliver a unified, bubbling Cuban-jazz session, with stand-out solos from D'Rivera, trumpeter Diego Urcola, conguero Patato, and guitarist Carlos Emilio Morales. Bebo was 76 when this session was recorded and his piano technique remains vibrant (one can hear where his son, pianist Chucho Valdes, got his chops). An exciting sampler containing "the finest contemporary Latin music" (no lie!), United Rhythms of Messidor ♪♪♪½ (Messidor, 1994, prod. various) features 13 tracks, compiled by Michael Barth, from albums by the label's top performers in Latin jazz: D'Rivera, the late band leader Mario Bauzá, flutist/soprano saxist Jane Bunnett, the late bandoneón player Astor Piazzolla, jazz pianists Gonzalo Rubalcaba and Jesus "Chucho" Valdes, percussionist Giovanni Hidalgo, and more. There's no question about the caliber and authenticity of the Latin beats from these musicians. D'Rivera performs on "Tanga," "Blues for Astor," and "Despojo." If you're into Latin jazz, you've probably heard some of the tunes before or already own the albums; if not, then this enjoyable CD, covering a broad cross-section of Latin styles, serves as a fine entree.

influences:
Mario Bauzá, Bebo Valdes, Chico O'Farrill, Benny Goodman, Charlie Parker, Dizzy Gillespie, John Coltrane, Lee Konitz

see also: Mario Bauzá, Jane Bunnett, Cachao, Irakere, Patato, Astor Piazzolla, Tito Puente, Arturo Sandoval, Bebo Valdes, Chucho Valdes

Nancy Ann Lee

The Drummers of Burundi

East African drumming

Formed in Burundi. Based in Burundi.

Baranshakaje Antime, percussion; Ntirandekura Côme, percussion; Mpfayokurera Joachin, percussion; Nkunzimana Nazaire, percussion; Mbazumutima Adelin, percussion; Bacanamwo Joseph, percussion; Ncurira Laurent, percussion; Sindaharaye Dinatien, percussion; Masabarakiza Joseph, percussion; Mpitabavuma Juvénal, percussion; Nahimana Placide, percussion; Congera Alchedes, percussion; Ndayarinze Aquilin, percussion; Cimpaye Déogratias, percussion; Ntakarutimana Benoît, percussion; Mboninyeretse Diminique, percussion; Habonimana Marc, percussion; Mpitabakana Vital, percussion; Nyambikiye Pasteur, percussion; Mpitabakana Marc, percussion. (All members are from Burundi.)

The Drummers of Burundi are not so much a contemporary band as an ongoing national institution, which has been performing in Burundi for centuries and around the world since the 1960s. In Burundi, drums are much more than mere musical instruments; they're viewed as sacred objects and were once reserved solely for ceremonial use, such as proclaiming important events and celebrating the planting or harvesting of the crops. Perhaps through these close ties with the country's primary industry, agriculture, the drums have acquired a symbolic association with fertility—the skin is equated with a baby's cradle, the tuning pegs with the mother's breast, the body of the lucky dube

Drummers of Burundi

drum to the womb. But although the origins of Burundi's musical traditions remain shrouded in mystery, the Drummers' awe-inspiring live performances today carry less ritualistic significance and are seen more as an exuberantly expressive form of entertainment. In the '80s the "Burundi Beat" was co-opted by a number of Western musicians, most prominently Adam Ant, so it seemed appropriate when Peter Gabriel signed the Drummers of Burundi to his RealWorld label in 1992. These days, the Drummers are rivaled only by Japan's Kodo as the world's most powerful and invigorating live performers.

what's available: The Drummers of Burundi are first and foremost an in-person experience; with jerky movements, fantastic leaps, and war-like stomping, their performances are as much showcases for acrobatic agility as forums for exhilarating music. But their only Western release, Les Tambourinaires Du Burundi ♪♪♪♪ (1992, RealWorld, prod. Yorrick Benoist), is a fine document of the audio portion, capturing 30 uninterrupted minutes of sound and fury. Made up of 41 traditional rhythms augmented only by ecstatic shouts of enthusiasm, this extremely intense recording is unlikely to be fully appreciated by anyone unimpressed by the visceral power of thunderous drumming. Percussion fans, however, will find the trance-like rhythmic syncopation invigorating.

influences:
Adam Ant, Bow Wow Wow, Mickey Hart

Bret Love

Lucky Dube

African reggae

Born 1967, in Ermelo, Eastern Transvaal, South Africa. Based in South Africa.

Lucky Dube is one of South Africa's most successful artists. With a multi-octave voice and a high-spirited dancing style inspired by the Zulu culture, Dube has adopted the reggae of Jamaica for songs that lash out against political and social oppression and celebrate spiritual inspiration.

Born to an unwed mother in Ermelo, a small village near Johannesburg, Dube was raised by a grandmother, an aunt, and an

lucky dube

Lucky Dube

2 3 4 the dubliners

uncle. His talents for music were obvious from an early age, and by the time he reached his ninth birthday Dube was singing regularly in church, school, and bars. After forming a high-school rock band, Sky Way, Dube raised money to buy instruments by writing and performing a stage play. Though the group enjoyed a regional hit, "Zulu Soul," they soon disbanded. Dube's first break came when he joined the Love Brothers, a mbaqanga (South African traditional/rock township music) band in which he met his future manager and producer, Richard Siluma. When this band broke up too, Dube began performing as a soloist, with a debut album, Lengane Ngeyetha, released in 1983.

In time Dube switched from the mbaqanga music of his homeland to a Bob Marley– and Peter Tosh–influenced reggae. Although he played most of the instruments on his early albums, Dube formed a band, the Slaves, featuring nine musicians and three singers, shortly after releasing a rap single, "Help My Krap," in 1986. The following year, Dube's album Think about the Children became the first South African reggae recording to be certified gold. His next album, Slave, sold more than 300,000 copies in 1989. A year later, Dube's album Prisoner achieved double platinum status. After having toured Europe and the U.S. in 1989, Dube performed in Australia and Japan as the opening act for Peter Gabriel in '91, and in '92 became the first South African to play the definitive Reggae Sunsplash Festival in Jamaica. Dube was featured in a semi-biographical film, Getting Lucky, in 1984, and at this rate his life and career will provide ample material for a sequel.

what to buy: In addition to Dube's greatest hits, Serious Reggae ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1996, prod. Richard Siluma) includes alternate takes and new tunes, including a reggae-ized treatment of Foreigner's mid-'80s pop hit, "I Want to Know What Love Is"(!).

what to buy next: Taxman ♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1997, prod. Richard Siluma) showcases Dube at his most romantic. While the hard reggae sounds of his earlier albums are softened by the addition of a pianist and female chorus, Dube's soulful vocals remain effective.

the rest:
Slave ♪♪♪½ (Shanchie, 1989)
Prisoner ♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1990)
Captured Live ♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1991)
House of Exile ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1992)
Victims ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1993)
Serious Reggae Business ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1996)
Trinity ♪♪♪½ (Polydor, 1996)

influences:
⏮ Bob Marley, Peter Tosh
⏭ Burning Spear, Third World

Craig Harris

The Dubliners

Modern and traditional Irish folk

Formed 1962, in Dublin, Ireland. Based in Ireland.

Ronnie Drew, vocals, guitar (1962–74; 1979–96); Luke Kelly (died 1984), vocals, guitar, banjo; Barney McKenna, tenor banjo, mandolin, vocals; Ciaran Bourke, vocals, guitar, tin whistle (1962–74); John Sheahan, fiddle, tin whistle, concertina (mid-1960s–present); Eamonn Campbell, guitars, mandolin, vocals (late 1980s–present); Sean Cannon, vocals, guitar (1984–present); Jim McCann, vocals, guitar (1974–79); Bobby Lynch, vocals, guitar (mid-1960s); Paddy Reilly, vocals, guitar (1996–present). (All members are from Ireland.)

In the history of Irish music, no group has created and maintained its niche as effectively as the Dubliners. At the beginning of "the ballad boom," that heady time during the early '60s when the Clancy Brothers made "folk songs" a meaningful category that ordinary people could relate to and take pride in, the Dubliners began their own career. While the Clancys were well-scrubbed returned Yanks from rural Tipperary, decked out in matching white Aran sweaters, the Dubliners were hard-drinking backstreet Dublin scrappers with unkempt hair and bushy beards, whose gigs seemed to happen by accident in between fist fights. But their street credibility, their undeniable talent, and their honest love of the music has kept them going and made them some of the most famous Irishmen in the world.

The Dubliners started in 1962 as the Ronnie Drew Group. Drew had recently returned to Ireland from Spain, where he had been teaching English and learning to play the guitar. He brought this new musical talent to bear on the Irish song tradition, and gathered around himself a core of terrific entertainers and musicians. Barney McKenna, a great tenor banjo picker, provided instrumental firepower. All-around showman Ciaran Bourke added second guitar, sweet creaky vocals, and tin whistle. And Luke Kelly, an intense singer and five-string banjo player who had served his time on the English folk club scene, was the band's most impressive vocalist. Kelly suggested the band's name be changed to the Dubliners. After a single Dubliners album for the Transatlantic label, Kelly departed for England. He was replaced by Bobby Lynch, who also brought along his musical partner, fiddler John Sheahan. When Kelly returned to replace Lynch in 1966, Sheahan stayed on as the group's most impressive traditional instrumentalist. This five-piece lineup of Drew, Kelly, Bourke, McKenna, and Sheahan became famous in 1967 through a song called "Seven Drunken Nights," originally recorded for an album called A Drop of the Hard Stuff, which was later re-titled The New Dubliners, and later still re-christened Seven Drunken Nights (it first appeared on the Major Minor label). "Seven Drunken Nights" was released as a single, but when the official media banned it for bawdiness it looked ready to languish in obscurity for good. Luckily for the Dubliners, it was picked up by the pirate station Radio Caroline and given saturation airplay, shooting to #5 on the British pop charts, launching the Dubliners to stardom, and making them a household word across Ireland, Britain, and the world.

The Seven Drunken Nights lineup lasted eight years, and despite always being on the verge of breaking up (Drew, Kelly, and McKenna fell out every other night or so), it was only severed by a major tragedy: in 1974, Bourke suffered a brain hemorrhage on stage that left him unable to perform. Bourke's condition, and a doctor's warning, caused Drew to examine his lifestyle and decide to leave the Dubliners as well. Drew was replaced by Jim McCann, and the band continued to perform all over the world. Drew did eventually return to the group (in 1979), and all went smoothly until tragedy struck again in 1984. Luke Kelly, whose soaring vocals defined the Dubliners' sound as surely as anything, died that year of a brain tumor. He was replaced by Galway singer Sean Cannon, who had been filling in off and on during Kelly's illness. A few years later, Eamonn Campbell signed on, playing guitars and mandolin. In 1987, this lineup of the Dubliners teamed with the Pogues to record "The Irish Rover," which became their biggest hit ever and introduced them to a whole new generation.

The latest change in the Dubliners was the departure (once again) of Ronnie Drew, in 1996. He was replaced by the great entertainer Paddy Reilly. One thing to take note of regarding this important band: the Dubliners have made many studio albums and many live albums, and have repeated the same "greatest hits" with some frequency in their recordings. Because of international licensing arrangements, many of their albums have been released more than once, by different labels, under different titles, and bearing different covers. In addition, an enormous number of Dubliners compilation albums have appeared, drawing on most of the original material. The result is that, especially where CD reissues are concerned, there are a lot of different albums with a relatively narrow selection of songs, and it's often difficult to tell the origin of any given track. Always compare any Dubliners album you contemplate buying with ones that are already in your collection, or you will quite likely wind up taking home the same songs over and over.

what to buy: Original Dubliners, 1966–1969 ♪♪♪♪♪ (EMI, 1993) captures the excitement of the best-known Dubliners lineup. It collects four albums from the Dubliners' early days onto two CDs. Typically, the four original LPs were released at various times with various titles, but their best-known monikers were Seven Drunken Nights, Seven Deadly Sins, More of the Hard Stuff, and Whiskey on a Sunday. It should be said that, contrary to what the sleeve notes claim, these were not the first albums the Dubliners recorded, but it was these albums that established the Dubliners as an enduring presence and not a one-hit wonder. The EMI set includes memorable and influential interpretations of many great songs, including Kelly's renditions of traditionals like "Whiskey in the Jar," "The Rising of the Moon," "Black Velvet Band," "Poor Paddy on the Railway," "A Nation Once Again," and "Gentleman Soldier." Kelly also sings three songs by his friend and mentor Ewan MacColl, "The Traveling People," "Shoals of Herring," and "Net Hauling Song," as well as many Scottish songs that he picked up during his years in Britain. For his part, Drew contributes some of the racier, bawdier, boozier material: "Seven Drunken Nights," "Poor Old Dicey Riley," "Quare Bungle Rye," "Whiskey on a Sunday," "The Parting Glass," and "A Pub with No Beer" are all supplied by him. Bourke sings a few as well, though his voice was weaker and creakier than those of his bandmates. "Darby O'Leary," "All for Me Grog," "Drink It Up, Men," "Mrs. McGrath" (a parody of the traditional song, based on his own life), and "The Limerick Rake" are all sung by Bourke. Many sets of instrumentals, including a memorable version of "O'Carolan's Concerto," are led by McKenna and/or Sheahan. All of these are classic tracks that would irrevocably change the way the world saw Irish music. In the collection of any lover of the genre, there will always be room for these albums—albums that in many ways started it all.

what to buy next: The Dubliners' 1992 anniversary double CD, 30 Years a-Greying ♪♪♪♪ (RTE, 1992, prod. Eamonn Campbell, Phil Coulter), features the then-current lineup of Drew, McKenna, Sheahan, Cannon, and Campbell, along with guest musicians ranging from Rory Gallagher to the Hothouse Flowers. Even the famous Scottish comedian Billy Connolly, who got his start as a banjo-wielding folkie, does a lead vocal on the album, singing his own ironic and effective song "I'm Asking You Sergeant, Where's Mine?" A similar release from 1987, Celebration ♪♪♪½ (Baycourt, 1987, prod. Eamonn Campbell), teams the Dubliners up with the Pogues, Paddy Reilly, Christy Moore, and others. It contains the hit single "The Irish Rovers" by the Dubliners and the Pogues. One of the best LPs from the Jim McCann years, A Parcel of Rogues ♪♪♪½ (ARC, 1976, prod. Earl Gill), is available on CD. It's quite short but features some beautiful songs, including McCann's rendition of "Kellyburn Brae," a humorous (if misogynistic) ballad. Luke Kelly brings in a lot of his Scottish-influenced folk-club material and shows his debt to Ewan MacColl on the title track. One curious note: although most sources suggest that Ciaran Bourke did not perform on this album, he is pictured on the front cover. Since the CD reissue contains no list of the musicians or notes of any kind, the question is open to interpretation. If you want to hear a good live Dubliners show, Live in Carre, Amsterdam ♪♪♪½ (Spectrum, 1985, prod. Reinoud Weidema, Rob Smaling, Tom Steenbergen) captures a lovely concert during Luke Kelly's final tours with the group. An unusual touch is that this disc features both Kelly and Sean Cannon, who filled in for Kelly during his illnesses and replaced him permanently after he died. Some of the nicest songs on this disc, like "The Waterford Boys," come from Cannon. Kelly, while his fatigue and illness are perceptible, still sings strongly and communicates beautifully with the audience. Castle Communications recently released a compilation made from Transatlantic's early Dubliners material (these were the Dubliners' very first albums) entitled The Definitive Transatlantic Collection ♪♪♪ (Castle, 1997, prod. Nathan Joseph). The tracks, most of which were recorded live, sound a little tentative compared to the EMI recordings, but they're very much worth having. Many of the songs did not appear on the band's later EMI outings or their live LPs, so this is some of the more unusual material out there. For the self-respecting fanatic, a compilation called Complete Dubliners ♪♪♪♪ (Earache, 1997, prod. Nathan Joseph) collects their entire Transatlantic output onto two CDs.

what to avoid: Two budget-priced CDs are available from K-Tel Records, The Dubliners ♪♪ (K-Tel, 1996) and The Best of the Dubliners ♪♪ (K-Tel, 1996). These are decent collections, but you get what you pay for; they're so short that both together would have fit on a single CD.

influences:

- The Clancy Brothers and Tommy Makem, Ewan MacColl
- The Johnstons, Planxty, the Pogues, Christy Moore

Steve Winick

The Dynatones /The Dyna-Tones

Polka

Formed 1968, in Buffalo, NY, USA. Based in Buffalo, NY, USA.

Key members have included: Dave "Scrubby" Seweryniak (1968–present) vocals, concertina, accordion; Larry Trojak (1968–82, 1986–89) vocals, drums; Mark Trzepacz (1980–81, 1990–present), vocals, trumpet, cornet, keyboards. (All members are from USA.)

"The Dynatones" is a pretty popular name for a band. As this book goes to press, a blues-based group, a wedding band, and a polka ensemble all play proudly under the same banner, with not a copyright lawsuit in sight. The Buffalo, New York–based Dynatones of this entry came together while drummer/founder Larry Trojak was still a student in high school. The original members knew each other from playing in various wedding groups and formed an ensemble known as the Casinos specifically to play polkas instead of the usual nuptial material. Back then, though, they did have to change their name because of another, more established "Casinos." Taking inspiration from a then-defunct polka group that used to record on Lil' Wally Jagiello's Jay-Jay Records and that was in less of a position to raise a fuss, they rechristened themselves the Dyna-Tones (losing the hyphen somewhat later) and released Larry Trojak's Dyna-Tones on Eddie Blazonczyk's Bel-Aire Records.

The other main member of the band, concertina player Dave "Scrubby" Seweryniak, joined just before their first gig and quickly became the focus for the manic synergy that evolved between the Dyna-Tones and their audience. While Blazonczyk was Trojak's hero and the band tried to copy the classy professionalism of Blazonczyk's Versatones, Scrubby's admiration for Lil' Wally's controlled abandon added an edge to the Dyna-Tones that helped differentiate them from the rest of the competition. Scrubby's line of patter and raucous antics on stage have attained legendary status, and he is the only member of the band to be elected to the I.P.A. (International Polka Association) Hall of Fame.

Under the dual leadership of Trojak and Seweryniak, the Dyna-Tones became one of the hottest young acts on the polka circuit. They also became known for their willingness to expand the boundaries of the form, much as Blazonczyk had before them. Concept albums were all the rage in pop music during the late 1970s, and Trojak decided to write something similar. The result was Chapter VII, an album that took the life of Christ and gave it a polka spin. While he has since been praised for his groundbreaking efforts, Trojak was later told by an official of the album's label that it was perhaps the worst-selling LP they'd ever released.

Nonetheless the Dyna-Tones' overall popularity remained high, but despite this they were still a part-time band, with most of the members having to hold down day jobs. Trojak wanted to make the group a full-time affair but didn't feel he was receiving the necessary commitment from the rest of the band, and, in 1982, left the group he had founded. A tumultuous series of lineup permutations, departures, and rejoinings settled down into the unhyphenated band's current incarnation, led by Mark Trzepacz. In their post-Trojak era, the Dynatones are a straight-ahead polka band, delving less into the kind of experimentation that characterized earlier editions of the group. This version of the band still includes Scrubby as the prime focus for audiences, but their more mainstream approach to the genre has led to a Grammy nomination (for When the Band Plays a Polka in 1991) and increased bookings. Trojak is now living in a suburb of Minneapolis, Minnesota, where he has a business doing public relations writing for industrial accounts.

what to buy: Most of the early Dyna-Tones albums are only available on tape or vinyl, which makes Vintage Dynatones ♪♪♪♪♪ (World Renowned Sounds, 1995, compilation prod. Ron Schafer) such an important release. Its 23 cuts include material from Live Wire, Down at the Friendly Tavern, and others—practically every noteworthy early project but Larry Trojak's religious magnum opus Chapter VII. Charles Keil, in his book Polka Happiness, called Live Wire ♫♫♫♫♫ (World Renowned Sounds, 1982, prod. the Dyna-Tones) "the polka equivalent of B.B. King's Live at the Regal." This album, available only on cassette and vinyl, captures the Dyna-Tones in concert playing some of their most popular (and requested) songs, including "Zosia Polka," "Life of a Drunk Polka," and the "Kuku Oberek." It was also named Album of the Year in 1982 by the I.P.A., and remains Dynatones fans' all-time favorite.

what to buy next: Undoubtedly the most unique recording in the Dynatones catalog, and Larry Trojak's most ambitious experiment, is Chapter VII ♫♫♫♫½ (World Renowned Sounds, 1980, prod. the Dyna-Tones), the polka concept album about the life of Christ. A spoken prologue and epilogue bracket lyrics about Jesus' birth, crucifixion, and resurrection with side trips for "John the Baptist" and "The Last Supper." While the polka mass is now a standard feature at polka festivals, this album rarely got the airplay its surprisingly lively tunesmithing deserved. Where's Your Portki?/Where's Your Pants? ♫♫♫♫ (Ethnic World Records, 1998, prod. the Dynatones) features one of the best lineups the group has had in a while, with Scrubby and Trzepacz alternating on lead vocals. The title tune was a big hit on polka radio shows around the country, but the band's new version of "Scrubby's Polka," though solid, is lacking the drive of the classic rendition heard on Vintage Dynatones.

best of the rest:

Six Million Dollar Band ♫♫♫♫ (World Renowned Sounds cassette, 1975)

Down at the Friendly Tavern ♫♫♫♫ (World Renowned Sounds cassette, 1976)

When the Band Plays a Polka ♫♫♫♫ (World Renowned Sounds cassette, 1990)

25th Anniversary Tour ♫♫♫½ (Sunshine, 1993)

worth searching for: The Dynatones act as accompanists on Ania Meets the Dynatones ♫♫♫½ (Sunshine, 1995, prod. Ania Piwowarczyk, Mark Trzepacz), which pairs them with Ania Piwowarczyk, a vocalist/composer from Hamilton, Ontario, Canada. On Live at Holy Toledo Polka Days '97 ♫♫♫♫ (Sunshine, 1997, prod. Joe Zalewski), Scrubby plays concertina on three tunes, and he and Trzepacz appear as guest vocalists with Toledo Polkamotion. Although not as ecstatic a live date as the Dyna-Tone's Live Wire, this album is a lot of fun and perhaps the best 1990s example of a polka show in full swing. Scrubby's on-stage banter before "Raz Dwa Trzy" is a stone gas, and totally reflective of how this charismatic frontman can corral a concert audience.

influences:

⏮ Eddie Blazonczyk, Ray Budzilek, L'il Wally Jagiello, Marion Lush

⏭ Brave Combo, City Side, Toledo Polkamotion

see also: Edward "Eddie" Blazonczyk

Garaud MacTaggart

E

Eastern Eagle Singers

Powwow

Formed in Nova Scotia, Canada. Based in Nova Scotia, Canada.

Brian Knockwood, drum, vocals; Ivan Knockwood, drum, vocals; Gary Knockwood, drum, vocals; Colin McDonald, drum, vocals; Mark McDonald, drum, vocals; Jason McDonald, drum, vocals; Billy Joe Meuse, drum, vocals; David Meuse, drum, vocals; Mike Sack, drum, vocals; Nathan Sack, drum, vocals; Sam Greer, drum, vocals; Simon Nevis, drum, vocals; Darren Myo, drum, vocals; Scott Taylor, drum, vocals; Jonathan Marshall, drum, vocals. (All members are from Canada.)

Founded by Brian Knockwood, the Eastern Eagle Singers are one of the youngest drum groups on the powwow trail. Some of the older singers criticize them for playing what traditionalists call "rock 'n' roll powwow music"—that is, incorporating modern elements into traditional Indian singing and drumming. The Eastern Eagle Singers do sound modern and somewhat "less Indian" than their predecessors, and write some tunes with a verse/chorus structure that makes them more accessible to mainstream ears than the oldtimers, but non-Natives won't confuse them with the latest alt.rock rave.

what's available: Traditionally Yours ♫♫♫♫ (SOAR, 1996, prod. Douglas Spotted Eagle) offers powerful drumming and singing, most of it with a Western verse/chorus structure that makes this a good beginner's album for non-Natives who want to understand powwow music.

influences:

⏮ Grayhorse Singers, Assiniboine Jr., Black Lodge Singers

j. poet

Echoes of Incas

Andean folk, Latin American, worldbeat

Formed in Los Angeles, CA, USA. Based in Los Angeles, CA, USA, and in Mexico.

Cesar Regino, bombo, shakers, percussion; Rigoberto Delgado Castillo, zamponas, quenas, quenachos, mosenos, ronrroco, charango; José Delgado Castillo, chango, ronrroco, ocarinas, percussion; Alejandro Mora, electric bass; Emmanuel Mora, acoustic guitar; Eduardo Avila Costa, acoustic guitar; Arturo Garcia Orozco, guitar, flute, samponas, percussion; Gilberto Reyes, Peruvian box; Gregorio Bobadilla, quena, samponas; Kambiz Pakandam, guitar; Long John Oliva, congas, bongos; Cesar Hernandez, electric bass, sonajas; Konrad Rhee, guitar, charango, flute; Roberto E. Duenas, flute, samponas, charango; Luis Felipe Gonzales, acoustic and electric bass.

Echoes of Incas is a general banner that unites a rotating honor roll of some of Latin America's best players, with only a few of the above-listed members playing on more than one release. Rather than creating a weakness, the band's shifting roster of members hailing from Mexico, El Salvador, Peru, Venezuela, and Cuba—not to mention Iran and the USA—makes for a complex and heady blend of influences that uniquely flavors the outfit's primary Andean folkloric focus. Formed in the early 1990s in Southern California to play festivals, fairs, and university gigs, the band also shares members with a similar performing group, Ah-Kin.

what to buy: Peruvian flute-and-percussion albums have been solid sellers at museum shops, nature stores, and record chains for many years, but often the music is amateurishly produced, uses low-quality instruments, and features strident, discordant blasts of sound unfriendly to the untrained ear. Not so on Sacred Valley ♪♪♪♪ (EarthTone, 1996, prod. Arturo G. Orozco), in which Echoes of Incas present compelling ritual dances drawn from traditional Andean spiritual practices. Focusing on the traditional bamboo pan flutes commonly called sikus, the multi-tempoed tunes are thematically linked to the natural world by use of environmental sounds. Supporting arrangements for Latin ethnic guitars and percussion add color, rich textures, and uplifting beats. With foot-tapping appeal, the whirling rhythms and enthusiastic melody lines beckon one to join in the celebration.

what to buy next: Nothing revitalizes a group more than recording a new album after a lengthy tour; it's as if the energy of the audience has been magically transferred to the musicians, and then on to tape for all to enjoy. Andean Nights ♪♪♪♪ (EarthTone, 1998, prod. Cesar Regino) features electrifying performances on a variety of pan flutes, Latin guitars, and ethnic percussion instruments, mixed with sounds of nature. Of particular note is the breathless "Cabalgando," which captures the heady joys of galloping on horseback across the high mountain plains. The soaring, shamanic rhythms of "Mujer Aguila (Eagle Woman)" and the intriguing dance of "Caminto a Nazca (Road to Nazca)" are also admirable examples of how traditional influences and contemporary sounds can meld successfully into a wondrous listening experience.

the rest:
Ventana al Sol ♪♪♪ (EarthTone, 1995)

influences:
◀◀ Los Incas
▶▶ Ah-Kin

PJ Birosik

Eden's Bridge

Pop Celtic, contemporary Christian and devotional

Formed late 1990s, in Yorkshire, England. Based in northern England.

David Bird, guitar; Sarah Lacy, vocals; Richard Lacy, bodhrán; John Large, bass. (All members are from the U.K.)

A forensic psychologist, a recording engineer, a city planner, and an industrial chemist—this doesn't seem a very likely set of backgrounds for a quartet who create contemporary Celtic Christian music. However, driven by their wish to combine their Celtic pride with their Christian faith, these four joined together as the group Eden's Bridge.

what's available: Celtic Psalms ♪♪♪ (StraightWay/EMI Christian, 1997, prod. Richard Lacy) and Celtic Worship ♪♪♪ (StraightWay/EMI Christian, 1997, prod. Richard Lacy) both display an interesting pop/Celtic/Christian fusion and, in the original tunes and arrangements, skillfully evoke the basic Celtic-music sense of place and style. The wavelength this band is on provides an interesting contrast and complement to that of the groundbreaking various-artists collection Celtic Spirit, which is reviewed in this book's Compilations section.

influences:
◀◀ Michael Card, Amy Grant, the Chieftains

Kerry Dexter

Eek-a-Mouse

Reggae

Born Ripton Hylton, 1957, in Kingston, Jamaica. Based in Jamaica.

With the ability to incorporate a wide variety of vocal effects into his singing, and a passion for draping witty costuming on his 6'6" frame, Eek-a-Mouse was one of the originators of "sing-jay" or "toasting," the reggae hybrid that mixed singing and dee-jaying. The Boston Globe referred to him as "the Al Jarreau of Reggae," while the Village Voice compared his unique, self-described "bong gong giddy mem giddy hoy" style of singing to "a tonal roller coaster." A native of Kingston's Trenchtown neighborhood, Eek-a-Mouse, who took his name from a race horse, began singing in elementary school. By his teens he had acquired a reputation as talented vocalist. Although he recorded his debut singles in 1974, he didn't score his first hit until 1981, when his tune "Wa Do Dem" reached the top of the U.K. charts. Performing an unscheduled opening slot at the Reggae Sunsplash Festival the same year, he took the event by storm, earning fan fervor, a two-night booking for the following year, and his first American record contract in 1982. Eek-a-Mouse made his movie debut in the 1991 film New Jack City, and remains a favorite with connoisseurs of clever word-play and serious waist-windin'.

what to buy: The Best of Eek-a-Mouse ♪♪♪♪ (Greensleeves, 1987, prod. various) is a thorough examination of his greatest hits, while the Live at Reggae Sunsplash ♪♪♪½ (Genes, 1984) collection captures Eek-a-Mouse during his groundbreaking performance at reggae's premier music festival.

the rest:
Skidip ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1982)
Wa Do Dem ♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1982)
The Mouse and the Man ♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1983)
Assassination ♪♪½ (RAS, 1984)
Mouseketeer ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1984)
The King & I ♪♪♪ (RAS, 1985)
The Very Best ♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1987)
Mouse-A-Mania ♪♪½ (RAS, 1988)
Eek A Nomics ♪♪♪ (RAS, 1988)
U Neek ♪♪½ (Island, 1991)
Black Cowboy ♪♪½ (Explicit, 1996)
RAS Portraits ♪♪♪ (RAS, 1997)

influences:
⏮ Black Uhuru, Yellowman
⏭ Half Pint, Maxi Priest

Craig Harris

Seamus Egan

See: Solas

Hamza El Din

Nubian folk and classical music

Born 1929, in Nubia (now Egypt). Based in Oakland, CA, USA.

Hamza El Din is a giant; an international emissary of Nubian culture and an artistic pioneer in the recording of world music. His 1963 Vanguard album Music of Nubia was the first recording of Afro-Arabic music to be distributed to the Western market, and he is widely acknowledged as the planet's premiere player of the oud (the prototypical lute). He also created modern Nubian music, while preserving his people's ancient traditions.

Hamza El Din grew up in a family that would be called middle class by American standards. He was raised in the countryside, but received city schooling when he was a boy. Nubia, the kingdom once called "The Gateway to Africa" by Westerners, today lies underwater in Southern Egypt and Northern Sudan, flooded by the Aswan High Dam. "When I got to Cairo to study

klezmer

Originating in Eastern Europe, klezmer was a form of Jewish folk music including fast dance tunes and more reflective pieces. It was influenced by the music of Jewish prayer and of other Eastern European cultures. Klezmer was brought to North America in the late 19th and early 20th centuries by immigrant musicians who continued to ply their trade in their new home. In fact, klezmer recordings were issued by U.S. companies from the 1910s through the '50s, though the genre's prominence declined as Jews' enthusiasm to assimilate into the broader culture grew. But in the '70s a serious klezmer revival began when young musicians discovered these older recordings. Since then the klezmer movement has developed in several distinct strands. There have been bands like the Klezmorim and Kapelye, who prefer a traditional approach with the old records as their springboard. The 11-member Klezmer Conservatory Band takes a more theatrical tack, featuring dramatic vocalizing by Judy Bressler. And then there's the progressive wing, led by New York City's marvelous Klezmatics, who fuse traditional klezmer styles with modern jazz, rock, and world-music influences. Other bands charting new directions include (regardless of their name!) Brave Old World, who incorporate jazzy improvisation and classical music's finesse into their sound, and the New Orleans Klezmer All-Stars, whose klez-rock is guaranteed to get a party started. For a superb picture of klezmer and its evolution, check out In the Fiddler's House ♪♪♪♪½ (Angel, 1995), a collaboration between violin master Itzhak Perlman and kindred klezmer re-discoverers from a younger generation; Klezmania: Klezmer for the New Millennium ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1997), a sampler of new-school klezmer tracks; and Klezmer Music: A Marriage of Heaven & Earth ♪♪♪♪ (ellipsis arts . . . , 1996), a lush package with cuts by performers from the United States, Germany, and Canada.

Ken Roseman

hamza el din

engineering, I realized my country would vanish when the High Dam was built." El Din felt the need to warn his people, "and since we were an oral culture, I picked up the oud." At first El Din composed in the Arabic style, "to write songs about the Dam and the effect it would have," but "Middle Eastern music didn't fit the taste of my people, so I began to collect traditional music. That's how modern Nubian music came out."

El Din couldn't read or write music, so he made up his own system of notation. He spent the next three years wandering his homeland collecting traditional music. "I owned an oud, a saddle, a pair of saddlebags, and a donkey. Half of the saddlebag had papers and pens, the other side donkey food." Despite the difficulty, El Din found the work a joy, "because of the great variety of music. I discovered a lullaby for a child is even different between two sisters in the same family." El Din returned to Cairo to study classical Arabic music, "but when I played for my people they said 'You sound like an Egyptian.' So I learned to play for the Nubian taste." Despite his growing interest in music and Nubian folklore, El Din was still considering an engineering career when he experienced an inspirational and pivotal moment. "I was sitting alone on a sand dune with my oud, and a soft wind of the desert hit the strings. Behind me, in the distance, I could hear a singer, and the wind hit the strings of the oud just so, and made a chord that was in harmony with his voice, like the echo of a music from far away. I said to myself, I've got to see how far I can follow this invisible music."

El Din continued his studies in classical Arabic music, and after graduation was offered a scholarship at the Academy of St. Cecelia in Rome. It was there that El Din began his life's work, a synthesis of Arabic, Nubian, and Western music. "From Western music I learned to create sophisticated compositions; from the East, rhythms, scales, and improvisation; but I don't use Western or Eastern techniques as much as I use their philosophy to aid my own compositions, which are in Nubian style." Near the end of his schooling in Rome, El Din met Gino Foreman, who maintained connections in New York City's folk world. "In New York Gino introduced me to Bob Dylan and Joan Baez. Joan took a recording I had made to Vanguard." Music of Nubia, El Din's first album, is credited with creating modern Nubian music.

"By the time I got back home," El Din says, "the Aswan High Dam had been built and I was homeless, so I took the world as my village. Because of the records, I graduated to teacher, to lecturer in Arabic and Nubian music, as well as performer. I have gone from Nubia to Japan to Vienna to California. I never stay in one place very long, but when I do, my address is the Bay Area, California." El Din also has strong ties to Japan. "In the East, the Japanese biwa is a descendant of the oud, as is the Chinese pipa. I planned to spend a year in Japan studying the biwa, but found Japanese culture so interesting I stayed 15 years." El Din's wife, who doubles as his business and road manager, is Japanese, and he has made many recordings for Japanese labels. These include Muwashshah, a tribute to the legendary Ziryab, an African slave who escaped from the court of Baghdad to become one of the most influential composers in the history of Arabic music. "Ziryab lived in the time of Harona Rashid in Baghdad," El Din explains. "He was owned by a court musician named Abrihim el Musoly, and employed as a slave companion to his son. Ziryab sat there while el Mosoly's son had his lessons, and became educated. In time, el Musoly's son became the court musician, but he knew Ziryab was an even better musician, so he gave him a choice: to be a slave and stop playing music, or play music and die. Ziryab escaped to Spain, and became the most important musician of the court in Andalusia. He founded the Arab Music Conservatory in Cordoba, and invented muwashshah ('the veil'), which swept through the Arabic world, even Iraq. Muwashshah is a short song form that teaches the student how to sing maquims, the scales Arabic music is based on; they're used to warm up the voice before concerts. That's why it's called muwashshah, a veil before the voice, like the hand you use to cover your mouth when you yawn."

Although his career began when he lost his home, El Din embraced the world and became a citizen of the planet, a musician who has played with symphony orchestras and composed for radio, television, and the concert stage, tireless in his efforts to keep the traditions of his beloved Nubia alive. "If you ask my nationality I say I'm Nubo-Egypto-Italio-Americano-Japanese, because I've lived in all those countries long enough to love them. I lost the sense of security you have when you're home—when you're in a strange land you walk on a thin wire if you want to stay safe—but I gained a lot. There is a Nubian proverb, 'Who lives sees, who walks sees more,' and my work has given me friends in every city around the world."

what to buy: Escalay—The Water Wheel ♪♪♪♪♪ (Nonesuch, 1968, prod. Robert Garfias) is an early world-music classic, reissued on CD in 1997, showcasing El Din's unique oud style. The album contains three lengthy improvisations: the title track by El Din; "I Remember," a song Mohamed Abdel Wahab composed for Umm Kulthum; and "Song with Tar," a traditional Nubian folk melody. At the time of its release, Escalay summed up the past, present, and future of Nubian music.

what to buy next: Muwashshah ♪♪♪♪♪ (JVC, 1996, prod. Hamza El Din, Tohru Ueda, Soh Fujimoto) is another album that proves good music is universal; El Din and three of his Japanese students create the sound of an Egyptian string orchestra by tuning down a synthesizer and overdubbing a few violin parts. ("When I played this music for an Egyptian conductor I know,

hamza el din

Hamza El Din

he refused to believe the musicians were Japanese," El Din laughs.) The album is marked by El Din's understated oud playing, warm vocals, and strong symphonic sense of melody.

the rest:
Eclipse ♪♪♪♪ (Rykodisc, 1988)
A Wish ♪♪♪♪ (Sounds True, 1999)

influences:
⏮ Traditional Nubian folk music

see also: Sandy Bull

j. poet

El-Funoun

Palestinian folk

Formed 1979, in Ramallah in the occupied West Bank. Based in Ramallah in the occupied West Bank.

Muhammed Ata, artistic director; Muhsen Subhi, buzuq, oud, percussion; Thafer Al-Tawil, qanun; Mohammed Amin, bass, percussion; Raid Al Kobary, nay; Abu Ashraf, shabbabah; Abu Steif, mijwiz; Najah Atiyeh, vocals; Safa Tamish, vocals; Nidaa Hajali, vocals; Ali Awad, vocals; Mohammed Yacoub, vocals. (All members are Palestinian.)

Recently introduced to Western audiences by noted world-music aficionado Dan Rosenberg, who discovered their music while visiting the West Bank to write a story on the Palestinian arts scene, El-Funoun—whose full name in Arabic means "Palestinian Popular Arts Troupe"—is a group of singers, dancers, and musicians dedicated to reviving regional folklore as an affirmation of Palestinian identity. The popular ensemble has managed to thrive for 20 years under the most adverse conditions, including travel restrictions, border closings, frequent arrests of its members, and bans on its public performances, at times rehearsing in whispers to avoid detection by Israeli patrols. The Israeli government has long considered El-Funoun's Arab-influenced work subversive, and even some Palestinians protested against the group, claiming that their contemporary topics defied Palestinian traditions. Still, as the group's artistic director Muhammed Ata has said: "Despite the suffering and the pain, music and dance must continue . . . to express our emotions, resistance, and hopes."

what's available: Because of the political struggles in their native land, only one of El-Funoun's recordings has been made available in the United States. Zaghareed ♪♪♪♪ (Sounds True, 1999, prod. El-Funoun), whose title means "ululations," or wails of joy, uses the music of a traditional Arab ensemble to tell the tale of a woman who dreams of being able to choose her own lover despite her parents' plans for an arranged marriage. The 17 folksy tracks walk us through this decidedly modern story, from the villagers' pleading with the bride's father to accept her choice of a husband, to the final adornment of the bride. It's a spellbinding musical journey, and a compelling introduction to a little-known culture rich in historic traditions.

worth searching for: Although the album was later banned by the Israeli government, in 1988 El-Funoun made Sharar (Arabic for "spark"), a tape of songs dedicated to the Palestinian uprising, with lyrics that reflected various aspects of the struggle and its martyrs. Despite the arrest of the group's then-artistic director Suheil Khouri and the confiscation of thousands of contraband cassettes, the songs became underground anthems of defiance for Palestinians, and you may still be able to find bootleg copies in select Arabic music stores.

influences:
⏮ Mustapha Al Kurd, Al Ashiqeen, Fairuz, Marcel Khalifa

Bret Love

Eliane Elias

Brazilian and international jazz

Born March 19, 1960, in Sao Paulo, Brazil. Based in New York, NY, USA.

Eliane Elias is a powerful two-handed linear pianist whose fleeting lines are punctuated with chords and varied by altering dynamics, diverse phrasing ideas, and a wide range of moods and emotions. She's also a soft-toned singer in the style of Astrud Gilberto, an earlier Brazilian vocalist who first gained notice in the 1960s for her cool-tone singing in seminal jazz-samba groups led by Stan Getz, Antonio Carlos Jobim, and João Gilberto. Elias began classical piano studies in Brazil at age 10, and two years later was considered an accomplished classical pianist. She pursued further studies at a school run by the jazz-oriented instrumental group the Zimbo Trio, the Centrol Livre de Apremdizagem Music, or Free Center of Music Apprenticeship. She began as a student and wound up teaching by the age of 15. Inspired by jazz pianists Herbie Hancock and Chick Corea, she began blending Brazilian rhythms with jazz, performing simultaneously in local jazz and bossa nova clubs. Bassist Eddie Gomez heard Elias play in Paris and recommended she move to New York, which she did in 1981. Elias became a member of the group Steps Ahead two years later. After leaving that outfit in 1984, Elias performed and recorded with her husband, jazz-fusion trumpeter Randy Brecker. She made her debut as a leader in 1986, signed with the Blue Note label in 1989, and toured with her trio. Elias not only understands how to make great music, but has the wisdom, confidence, and perseverance to keep it happening.

what to buy: There's no question that Elias knows her Jobim, and three albums of Jobim music are among her best from a world-music perspective. Artfully mining her native rhythms makes The Three Americas ♪♪♪♪♪ (Blue Note, 1997, prod.

eliane elias

Eliane Elias

Eliane Elias) one of her most authentic ventures after 10 mostly jazz-focused albums. Elias takes new chances on 10 originals and two Jobim classics, melding influences of Central and South America with North American jazz. She's a powerful lyrical pianist who has demonstrated on previous recordings that she can imaginatively stretch out. On this disc, Elias displays her keyboard prowess (and occasionally sings in cool bossa style) as she artfully merges and shifts among various Brazilian beats, Cuban rhythms, Argentinean nuevo tango, and straight-ahead jazz—sometimes in the same tune! Such diversity is served well by Elias's cohesive core companions, bassist Marc Johnson and drummer Satoshi Takeishi, and her special guests, flutist Dave Valentin, accordionist Gil Goldstein, violinist Mark Feldman, guitarist Oscar Castro-Neves, and percussionists Manolo Badrena and Café, among others. On Eliane Elias Sings Jobim ♪♪♪♪♪ (Blue Note, 1998, prod. Eliane Elias) Elias's gentle, sweet, sotto voce singing is reminiscent of Astrud Gilberto (especially on the Gilberto-associated "Girl from Ipanema"). With great artistry and intimacy, Elias delivers 16 lush Jobim classics, accompanied by musicians familiar with Brazilian rhythms (and jazz): Michael Brecker (tenor saxophone), Oscar Castro-Neves (acoustic guitar), Marc Johnson (acoustic bass), Paulo Braga (drums and bongos), and guest percussionist (on one tune) Café. The musicians perform in varied settings, including two especially lovely guitar-voice duet tracks, "Falanda de Amor (Speaking of Love)" and "Pois é" (starring Elias and Castro-Neves); trios (the best of which is the romantic, straight-ahead jazz ballad "Forgetting You"); and quintets (including "A Felicidade," featuring Brecker). If you adore the graceful, lilting rhythms of the Stan Getz "jazz samba" era, Elias's soothing vocals, and Jobim's gorgeous songs, you'll find this album a most satisfying listen.

what to buy next: In the company of bassist Gomez, drummer Jack DeJohnette, and percussionist Nana Vasconselos, Elias leads a stunning all-instrumental tribute to Jobim on Eliane Elias Plays Jobim ♪♪♪♪½ (Blue Note, 1990, prod. Eliane Elias, Randy Brecker), an 11-tune album that ranks among her best. Merging her jazz sensibilities with native Brazilian rhythms, Elias eloquently performs Jobim classics such as "Agua de Beber," "Passarim," "Dindi," "One-Note Samba," and more. Gomez is gorgeously in his element, and DeJohnette is painterly in his expressions. This is an engaging and memorable album, worth the price for the leader's lush version of "Don't Ever Go Away" alone.

what to avoid: As with many of her early albums listed in the "best of the rest" section below, Elias brilliantly leans more to the jazz side of improvisation. So don't be misled by the titles of Fantasia ♪♪♪♪♪ (Blue Note, 1992) and Paulistana ♪♪♪♪♪ (Blue Note, 1993, prod. Eliane Elias). Both of these albums, while holding allure for die-hard jazz fans, offer little to attract those seeking concentrated Brazilian themes. Even the latter album, with a track featuring Brazilian composer Ivan Lins singing a duet with Elias on his smooth, modern ballad "Illuminandos," doesn't tender the appeal of her most recent recorded tributes to Jobim.

best of the rest:
Cross Currents ♪♪♪♪ (Denon, 1988)
So Far So Close ♪♪♪♪ (Blue Note, 1989)
Illusions ♪♪♪ (Denon, 1990)
A Long Story ♪♪♪♪ (Blue Note, 1991)
Solos and Duets ♪♪♪♪ (Blue Note, 1995) Best of Eliane Elias ♪♪♪ (Denon, 1995)

influences:
Bud Powell, Keith Jarrett, Art Tatum, Herbie Hancock, Chick Corea, Ivan Lins, Antonio Carlos Jobim

Nancy Ann Lee

Alton Ellis

Reggae, rocksteady, ska

Born 1944, in Kingston, Jamaica. Based in London, England.

Alton Ellis is one of the most expressive and distinctive singers Jamaica has ever produced. With nearly 40 years in music, Ellis displays versatility so impressive that he is widely known as the godfather of rocksteady and reggae. Ellis began his career during the formative years of ska in the late '50s. He became one of the first singers ever to be recorded in Jamaica when he voiced a handful of tracks with Eddie Perkins for producer Clement "Coxsone" Dodd. Most notable of these sides was the hit "Muriel," a doo-wop/mento (Jamaican roots-music) prison ballad backed by the superb Clue J. and the Blues Blasters. In the early '60s Ellis recorded such ska-rchers as "Rum Bumpers" (with a young John Holt) and "Ska Beat" for producer Vincent "Randy" Chin.

But as the charging, horn-pumped rhythms of ska relaxed into the more seductive, spare, bass-heavy music called rocksteady, Ellis's voice moved to the forefront. Some claim Ellis's "Cry Tough" and "Girl I've Got a Date" were the first rocksteady songs; at the very least, his "Do the Rocksteady" was the first song title to use the genre's label. All three are classics. This was a time when ratchet-wielding "rude-boys" were wreaking havoc at soundsystem dances across Kingston. While many artists voiced admiration for the fearlessness of the "rudies," Ellis opposed the violence from the very beginning in "Cry Tough" and "Dance Crasher." In doing so, Ellis experienced an artistic and personal revelation that led to some of the most elegant and alluring music ever made in Jamaica. As he explains in the essential text Reggae Routes: "I [decided to] . . . go back to more loving sounds. . . . I was always personally inclined to be a more loving type of person. . . . I feel it more and express it more. I think it's in my nature. . . . And most of these songs are a story I'm telling about my life—it's personal."

Ellis's epochal mid-'60s recordings for Duke Reid at his acoustically vibrant Treasure Isle studios were the cream of the rocksteady era. Backed by the cool, sublime sounds of ex-Skatalite Tommy McCook and his band the Supersonics, Ellis proved he was one of the keenest observers of romance and heartbreak on such hits as "Just Another Girl," "Can't Stand It," "Ain't That Loving You," "Breaking Up," and his goose-bump-raising cover of the Delfonics' "La La Means I Love You." Ellis was so inspired during this period that he would compose late into the night, often falling asleep at the studio piano. He also recorded stellar sides at the equally legendary Studio One, including "I'm Just a Guy," "Can I Change My Mind?," "Let Him Try," and "Willow Tree."

As the sweet melodies and "gidgy gidgy boom" of rocksteady (as the Heptones' Leroy Sibbles described it) changed into reggae's faster, chugging beats, cavernous basslines, and yearning lyrics, Ellis proved his mettle: 1970's Sunday Coming is one of the pivotal albums in reggae history. Ellis's emotional wounds from past love lost brought a more soulful, profoundly melancholy ache to his vocals, which were punctuated with astonishing falsettos. Simply put, the album captures longing personified. Ellis also recorded two influential culture-conscious roots-reggae anthems with producer Lloyd "The Matador" Daley—"Back to Africa" and "Deliver Us"—both backed by the glorious harmonies of the Heptones. Throughout the decade Ellis continued to record hit songs for producers such as Prince Buster ("Since I Fell for You"), Clancy Eccles ("Feeling Inside"), Henry "Junjo" Lawes, Winston Riley ("I'll Be Waiting"), Joe Gibbs, and Keith Hudson ("Big Bad Boy"). In the '80s, Ellis relocated to London and recorded some fine and quite rare singles with King Jammy and Fashion Sounds. In 1994, the Jamaican government recognized his estimable contributions to the island's music by awarding him, on National Heroes Day, the Order of Distinction.

what to buy: The indispensable Cry Tough ♪♪♪♪♪ (Heartbeat, 1993, prod. Duke Reid and Sonia Pottinger) is a remastered version of Ellis's Mr. Soul of Jamaica ♪♪♪♪♪ (Treasure Isle, 1975), which itself was a compilation of almost all of his sweet rocksteady sides for Duke Reid. This is rocksteady defined—captivating melodies and sensual bass-heavy rhythms made for dancing, singing along, and if you're lucky, falling in love. Sunday Coming ♪♪♪♪½ (Heartbeat, 1995, prod. Clement Dodd) is a cleaned-up reissue of the stunning Studio One release from 1970. This is reggae before it became a music designed for chanting down Babylon or listening amidst a cloud of ganja smoke. Beyond the slew of gorgeous Ellis originals, there are intensely personalized covers of Brenda Holloway's "You Make Me So Very Happy," the Guess Who's "These Eyes," and the Royalettes' "Gonna Take a Miracle." The entire album is backed by Sound Dimension, the amazing Studio One session band that included such reggae luminaries as ex-Skatalite Roland Alphonso, Leroy Sibbles, and one of this globe's greatest guitarists, Ernest Ranglin.

what to buy next: Because it contains Ellis's finest rocksteady sides for Studio One, Sings Rock & Soul ♪♪♪½ (Studio One, 1966, prod. Clement Dodd) is a perfect counterpart to the Treasure Isle hits on Cry Tough. It includes classics like "I'm Still in Love with You" (which became the basis for Althea & Donna's "Uptown Ranking") and "I'm Just a Guy" (versioned wonderfully by Michigan & Smiley as "Rub a Dub Style" in the early '80s). The Best of Alton Ellis ♪♪♪♪ (Studio One, 1968, prod. Clement Dodd) is the man at his reggae prime. This album collects such hits as "Set a Better Example," "Still Trying," and "Breaking Up Is Hard."

the rest:
Still in Love ♪♪½ (Trojan, 1977)
Showcase ♪♪ (Studio One, 1980)
My Time Is Right ♪♪♪ (Trojan, 1990)
Soul Groover ♪♪♪½ (Trojan, 1990)
(With his sister Hortense Ellis) At Studio One ♪♪♪ (Heartbeat, 1993)
Reggae Valley of Decision ♪♪½ (House of Reggae, 1997)

worth searching for: Randy's—17 North Parade ♪♪♪♪ (Pressure Sounds, 1997, prod. Clive Chin) contains one of the hardest-to-find Ellis singles—his hypnotic and nearly unrecognizable cover of the Cornelius Brothers' and Sister Rose's "It's Too Late (To Turn Back Now)." With conviction that would be rare for anyone but Alton Ellis, he reveals that he is so deeply in love that—as the powerlessness of the freefall takes hold—he is feeling a disturbing sense of regret. To top it off, he's backed by the dynamo Now Generation rhythm section. And in case you're wondering, the rest of this collection of Clive Chin–produced reggae is top-notch and chock full of rarities.

influences:
- Curtis Mayfield, Jackie Edwards, Owen Gray, Sam Cooke, Lord Creator, the Delfonics
- Lloyd Charmers, Freddie McGregor, Cocoa Tea, Junior Brown, Maxi Priest

see also: Jackie Mittoo, Ernest Ranglin, the Skatalites

Todd Shanker

Emilio

See: Emilio Navaira

The English Beat /General Public

Two-tone, ska

Formed 1978, in Birmingham, England. Disbanded 1983.

The English Beat (1978–83): Andy Cox, guitar; Everett Morton, drums; David Steele, bass; Dave Wakeling, guitar, vocals; Ranking Roger, vocals, percussion (1979–83); Saxa, saxophone (1979–82). General Public (1984–87, 1994–present): Dave Wakeling; Ranking Roger; Micky Billingham, keyboards, vocals (1984–87); Horace Panter, bass (1984–87); Kevin White, guitar (1984–85); Stoker, drums (1984–85); Gianni Minardi, guitar (1986–87); Mario Minardi, drums (1986–87); Michael Railton, keyboards, programming, vocals (1994–present); Wayne Lothian, bass (1994–present); Dan Chase, drums (1994–present); Norman Jones, percussion, vocals (1994–present).

One good thing to come out of the racial strife that engulfed England during the late '70s and early '80s was the two-tone movement, a cluster of racially mixed bands dedicated to uniting British youth through song and dance. Followers of the music, which was a hybrid of punk rock and Jamaican ska, sported black-and-white clothing and short hair, as did the musicians. Among the best and most important of these bands was the English Beat, known simply as the Beat everywhere but in America due to trademark concerns. The Beat, which formed in 1978, released its first single in 1979, Smokey Robinson's "Tears of a Clown," on the 2-Tone record label owned by another key band in the movement, the Selecter. The single went to #6 on the British charts and featured the frenetic saxophone work of veteran Jamaican musician Saxa, who had played with the Beatles and the ska stars Desmond Dekker and Prince Buster. Saxa later joined the band full time, as did Ranking Roger, a young Birmingham percussionist whose specialty was toasting (melodic chanting). The Beat generated a string of U.K. hits, including "Hands Off . . . She's Mine," "Mirror in the Bathroom," "Best Friend," and the politically charged "Stand Down Margaret," which pleaded for "peace, love, and unity" as well as the departure of the British prime minister. The Beat enjoyed a loyal following in the U.S., too, scoring its biggest hits with 1982's "I Confess" and "Save It for Later." The band broke up in 1983, resulting in two new outfits. Cox and Steele formed Fine Young Cannibals, while Wakeling and Ranking Roger became General Public. Wakeling and Roger split up in 1988 after a falling out but have since re-formed General Public, enjoying a hit remake of the Staple Singers' "I'll Take You There" in 1994, when it was featured in the film Threesome.

what to buy: I Just Can't Stop It ♪♪♪♪♪ (Sire, 1980, prod. Bob Sargeant) is the English Beat's debut album and one of the best records of the '80s. Mixing Chuck Berry–like guitar sounds, Beach Boyish harmonies, sizzling sax lines, and Caribbean rhythms, this spellbinding record sounds as good today as it did two decades ago. Special Beat Service ♪♪♪♪½ (I.R.S., 1982, prod. Bob Sargeant) is the English Beat's third record and features the band's best-known singles in the U.S., "Save It for Later" and "I Confess," as well as the verbal acrobatics of Ranking Roger and guest Pato Banton in the delightful "Pato and Roger Ago Talk."

what to buy next: Wakeling and Roger's first effort as General Public, . . . All the Rage ♪♪♪♪ (I.R.S., 1984, prod. General Public, Gavin MacKillop, Colin Fairley), has harder edges than anything the Beat did. The two excellent singles from the record, "Tenderness" and "Never You Done That," have a distinctly Motown feel.

what to avoid: The English Beat compilation What Is Beat? ♪♪½ (I.R.S., 1983, prod. Bob Sargeant, the English Beat, Mike Hedges, David Peters) provides some answers to that question, but earlier records offer a clearer picture.

the rest:
The English Beat:
Wha'ppen ♪♪♪♪ (I.R.S., 1981)

General Public:
Hand to Mouth ♪♪♪½ (I.R.S., 1986)
Rub It Better ♪♪♪ (Epic, 1995)

The International Beat:
The Hitting Line ♪♪♪ (Triple X, 1986)
Dance Hall Rockers ♪♪♪½ (Magnum America, 1996)

worth searching for: The Beat Goes On (I.R.S., 1991) features some of the English Beat's biggest hits as well as songs by Fine Young Cannibals, Wakeling, Ranking Roger, and the International Beat.

solo outings:
Ranking Roger:
Radical Departure ♪♪♪ (I.R.S., 1988)

Dave Wakeling:
No Warning ♪♪♪ (I.R.S., 1991)

influences:
- Prince Buster, Desmond Dekker, Smokey Robinson, Sly & the Family Stone
- Barenaked Ladies, Dave Matthews Band, Rancid, Sublime, Save Ferris, No Doubt

William Hanson

Séamus Ennis

Irish traditional

Born May 5, 1919, in Jamestown, County Dublin, Ireland. Died October 5, 1982, in Naul, County Dublin, Ireland.

A colorful and charismatic personality, a masterful performer on the Irish uilleann pipes, a singer, storyteller, and collector, Séamus Ennis was a father-figure to a generation of Irish pipers and a giant of Irish traditional music. Like other traditional players, Ennis was raised into the music. His father, James, was a piper who performed on radio broadcasts and records with the Fingal Trio in the early 1930s, and the Ennis house in Jamestown was often visited by musician friends. Although not through formal training, Séamus learned his piping from his father. After spending a few years with Colm Ó Lochlainn's Three Candles Press, Ennis was hired by the Irish Folklore Commission in the early 1940s to collect songs in the west of Ireland. In 1947, he moved on to work for Radio Éireann, then for the BBC in London in 1951, traveling all over Britain and Ireland to record traditional music for his show As I Roved Out. By all accounts, Ennis was very successful in establishing a strong rapport with traditional players and singers, who saw him as one of their own. While in London, Ennis recorded his first album, The Bonny Bunch of Roses, for the American label Tradition. Also from that period, a couple of recordings of Ennis's piping are included on the 1965 Folkways album Irish Music in London Pubs. By 1958, his work with the BBC having ended, Ennis returned to Ireland and resumed his collecting for Radio Éireann. He continued to travel and perform throughout the 1960s, appearing at the Newport Folk Festival in 1964. In the early 1970s, as the Irish folk music revival came into full swing, Ennis and fellow piper Liam O'Flynn, soon to become famous as a member of the group Planxty, were sharing an apartment in Dublin. Visiting Ennis there was American folksinger Patrick Sky, who had become enamored with the pipes and who later produced Forty Years of Irish Piping, an album containing recordings Ennis made at that time. During that period, Ennis's piping was also featured on the Topic LP The Wandering Minstrel and on two LPs produced for Tara, The Pure Drop and The Fox Chase. By the late 1970s, Ennis returned "home" to North County Dublin. Despite health problems, he continued to make regular appearances to the end, even playing at the Willie Clancy Summer School a few months before his death.

what's available: On the pioneering The Bonny Bunch of Roses ♪♪♪½ (Tradition, 1959/Rykodisc, 1996, prod. Robin Roberts), recently reissued on CD, Ennis presents an excellent selection of airs and dance tunes—played on pipes or whistle—and songs learned during his collecting trips. Ennis's instrumental Tara LPs, reissued as the two-CD set The Best of Irish Piping ♪♪♪♪ (Tara, 1995, prod. Séamus Ennis), are a monument to the art of Irish piping. Of particular interest is Ennis's 13-minute rendition of "The Fox Chase," a descriptive piece complete with galloping horses and barking hounds. From the same period, The Wandering Minstrel ♪♪♪♪ (Topic, 1974/Green Linnet, 1993, prod. Tony Engle) is also entirely devoted to the pipes.

worth searching for: Irish Music in London Pubs ♪♪♪ (Folkways, 1965, prod. Ralph Rinzler, Barry Murphy), recorded live in the London pubs frequented by Irish musicians, is still available on tape from the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, D.C. Although Séamus Ennis only appears on two tracks and the sound quality is less than optimal, the album is interesting for the presence of Sligo fiddle player Michael Gorman and street singer Margaret Barry. The first album released on the Green Linnet label, Forty Years of Irish Piping ♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1977, prod. Patrick Sky) is a poorly documented collection of disparate recordings from various times and sources, yet remains a classic well worth searching for. Available from Radio Telefis Éireann (RTE) in Dublin, The Séamus Ennis Story ♪♪♪ (RTE, 1988, prod. Julian Vignoles) assembles on two cassettes four radio broadcasts featuring interviews of Ennis's friends and relatives, as well as music from the master. From the same source, the recent The Return from Fingal ♪♪♪♪ (RTE, 1997, prod. Peter Browne) is an outstanding collection of recordings made by Radio Éireann and RTE over a 40-year period. Especially interesting are several renditions of sean-nós ("old-style") melodies, both sung and played on the pipes.

influences:

⏮ James Ennis (Séamus Mac Aonghusa), Mary McCabe, Patsy Touhey, Nicholas Markey, Patrick Ward

⏭ Liam O'Flynn, Willie Clancy

see also: Liam O'Flynn, Planxty

Philippe Varlet

Brian Eno

Art rock, ambient, minimalism, electronica, world fusion

Born Brian Peter George St. John le Baptiste Eno, May 15, 1948, in Suffolk, England. Based in St. Petersburg, Russia.

Best known as the father of "ambient" music, that once-derided form of aural wallpaper that is now embraced by a new generation of electronic auteurs and their growing legions of fans, Brian Eno has also been present at some pivotal moments in world-music history. Equally influenced by a rock 'n' roll-broadcasting American Armed Forces Radio station in childhood, and a conceptual-art education in young adulthood, Eno made the first of many highly visible marks merging these two muses in the art-rock ensemble Roxy Music. He kept his hand in the avant-pop game with his eccentric and visionary solo recordings, and collaborations with Robert Fripp, John Cale, and many others. Some of those others were U2—whose acclaimed, best-selling albums The Unforgettable Fire, The Joshua Tree, and Achtung Baby also furthered Eno's own experimental agenda in the mass marketplace—and David Bowie and Talking Heads, with each of whom he helped usher in the "worldbeat" era. The American mainstream's appreciation of international musics—such as it yet is—can be largely traced to the snapshot multiculturalism of Bowie and Eno's Lodger album in 1979, which in turn inspired Eno to plunge into the global sidestream with David Byrne (on the Africa-sampling My Life in the Bush of Ghosts) and then with all the Talking Heads (on the heavily Africa-influenced Remain in Light, recorded afterwards but released first). The rest—with Byrne's eventual founding of the Luaka Bop label to promote more and more of the "real thing"—has been worldbeat history in the making. Eno has sustained his fascination with and advocacy of cultures outside his own (he once notoriously defined European classical as "music minus Africa"), producing and collaborating with such artists as Geffery Oryema and Baaba Maal and providing a Foreword to the world-music tome Rhythm Planet, in between lecturing on conceptualism, collaborating with Laurie Anderson and Peter Gabriel on a postmodern theme park, publishing the memoir-of-sorts A Year with Swollen Appendices, designing screen-savers, and generally holding his place for the First Renaissance Man of the 21st Century award.

what's available: Eno and Byrne's My Life in the Bush of Ghosts ♪♪♪♪ (Sire, 1981, prod. Brian Eno, David Byrne) is the one from Eno's headline-billed albums that you want to start with for world-music purposes, though any of the production/co-creation jobs with Bowie and the Heads mentioned above is an essential—if, from some standpoints of "authenticity," controversial—purchase. For a more sweeping overview of all the worlds Eno has visited, try the two-box retrospective helpfully titled Box I ♪♪♪♪ (Virgin, 1993, prod. Brian Eno) and Box II ♪♪♪♪ (Virgin, 1993, prod. Brian Eno). Box I surveys art-meets-pop songs from throughout Eno's solo career, including such witty masterpieces as "Seven Deadly Finns," "Baby's on Fire," and "No One Receiving," and tracks from the previously unreleased album My Squelchy Life. Box II focuses on Eno's minimalist and ambient instrumentals.

influences:

⏮ The Velvet Underground, John Cage, Lamonte Young, Baaba Maal

⏭ Talking Heads, David Byrne, David Bowie, Jah Wobble, Geffery Oryema, Baaba Maal, U2, the Contortions, the Orb, Mogwai

see also: David Bowie, Michael Brook, David Byrne, Farafina, Baaba Maal, Geffery Oryema, Talking Heads

Adam McGovern and Craig Harris

Luis Enrique

Salsa romantico

Born 1962, near Managua, Nicaragua. Based in Miami, FL, USA.

Luis Enrique was 16 when he moved to Los Angeles from a small Nicaraguan agricultural community. "At that time, there was a lot of terrorism, on both sides. No young man was safe, no matter what his politics." L.A. proved a shock to a country boy from Nicaragua, but Enrique learned fast. "I realized two things: some people didn't like Latinos, but everybody loves you if you're in a band." In his teen years Enrique sang and played drums in local bands as he devoured music: records by the Fania All-Stars, bebop, American rock, R&B, country music, even the Bee Gees—all the sounds that show up in his own compositions. Enrique's first professional group, Mañana Es Hoy, "played acoustic instruments. We took poems from the great Latin poets and created melodies for them. We took the music we knew, from Cuba, Peru, Bolivia, or wherever, and mixed them together." Enrique moved on to a charanga band called Versailles; when that distinctive violin and flute-driven style became popular on the East Coast in the late '70s, the band moved to Miami. After Versailles broke up, Enrique put together a demo of his own material to shop around, and signed with Sony Discos. His first album was a commercial disappointment, but his next, Amor y Alegría, went platinum. Enrique's salsa is propelled by sizzling Afro-Caribbean rhythms, while his singing combines the soulfulness of an R&B singer with the smoothness of a pop balladeer. In 1990 Enrique's Mi Mundo earned Latin-category Grammys for Best Single, Best Song of the Year, Best Album of the Year and Best Male Vocalist—an unprecedented quadruple sweep—and his next, Una Historia Diferente, topped the Latin charts for another three months. In the early 1990s Enrique reigned as the king of salsa romantico, and though younger salseros and the Rock en Español movement have eclipsed his dominance, he continues to record compelling albums.

what to buy: Mi Mundo ♪♪♪♪½ (Sony Discos, 1989, prod. Luis Enrique), Enrique's best album and the one that installed him as a superstar, offers strong production, a solid selection of material, and kicking rhythm tracks. This is also one of the albums that defined the romantico style.

the rest:

Amor de Medianoche ♪♪♪ (Sony Discos, 1987)
Amor y Alegria ♪♪♪♪½ (Sony Discos, 1989)
Luces del Alma ♪♪♪♪ (Sony Discos, 1990)
Una Historia Diferente ♪♪♪♪ (Sony Discos, 1991)
Dilema ♪♪♪♪½ (Sony Discos, 1993)
Luis Enrique ♪♪♪ (Sony Discos, 1993)
Genesis ♪♪♪♪ (Sony Discos, 1996)

influences:

◀◀ Ruben Blades, Hector "Lavoe" Perez, Cheo Feliciano

j. poet

Enya

Celtic ambient vocal

Born Eithne Ní Bhraonain, May 17, 1961, in Gweedore, County Donegal, Ireland. Based in Ireland.

"Heavenly" is the best way to describe Enya's ethereal voice. The Irish singer/songwriter/instrumentalist paints wide-open soundscapes reminiscent of the New Age genre, but more melodic, and heavily based in the Celtic folk music that formed much of her early singing career. After her start in the Irish band Clannad—which featured her older brothers and sisters—Enya hooked up with producer Nicky Ryan and lyricist Roma Ryan to write several film and television scores for the BBC. This trio reached the pinnacle of pop success in 1988 with the CD Watermark, selling more than four million copies worldwide. On the four successful CDs that followed, Enya's dreamy arrangements float alongside musical imagery, lyrical poetry, and mesmerizing vocals. Enya has created a new instrument with her voice—and, appropriately, her fans have made her one of the most successful recording artists of all time.

what to buy: Watermark ♪♪♪♪♪ (Reprise, 1989, prod. Nicky Ryan) presents a superb collection of tone poems interwoven with ethereal vocal lines sung in Gaelic, Latin, and English. The dreamy instrumental title piece overdubs piano with lush orchestration. "Storms in Africa" carries the listener to a far-away country, while the Gaelic "Na Laetha Geal Moige" exudes the warmth of home. In "Exile," Enya defines a spiritual journey: "My light shall be the moon, my path/the ocean, my guide the morning star." This is high-quality music by a distinctive artist, compelling countless replays. The Celts ♪♪♪♪ (Reprise, 1992, prod. Nicky Ryan) draws on Enya's twin Catholic and Celtic heritages to present an instrumental soundtrack with lingering historical and spiritual overtones. "The Sun in the Stream" is inspired by the legend of the Salmon of Knowledge, in the grove of nine wise hazel trees where the sacred River Boyne flowed. The gentle nuances of "Fairytale" tell the story of the fairy king Midir and his love for the beautiful princess Etain: a dreamy ambiance reflects the characters' great love, jealousy, and endurance. "Boadicea," meaning "Victorious," portrays the queen of the Iceni tribe who led a successful rebellion against the Romans, but eventually poisoned herself following a military defeat. Enya's use of her voice as a musical instrument is particularly strong in this collection, and the historical liner notes direct the listener's impressionistic response. Paint the Sky with Stars: The Best of Enya ♪♪♪♪ (Reprise, 1997, prod. Nicky Ryan) showcases the artist's greatest hits along with two new tracks: "Only If" and the title song. Most notably, "Caribbean Blue" assimilates yet another cultural paradigm into Enya's style, the exuberance of the tropics—a pleasant change of taste in an already eclectic artistic palette. This worthwhile collection provides a good opportunity to sample Enya's portfolio.

what to buy next: Shepherd Moon ♪♪♪½ (Reprise, 1991, prod. Nicky Ryan) utilizes the same basic formula of trance and mysticism as Watermark, but somehow seems less engaging. Nonetheless, the tranquillity of "Angeles," "Evacuee," and "Marble Halls" will soothe the seasoned listener. Awash in synth strings, "Caribbean Blue" is this album's gigantic worldwide pop hit, while "How Can I Keep from Singing?" is Irish folk music at its best. Numerous songs in Gaelic lend additional mystery to this worthy collection. The Memory of Trees ♪♪♪½ (Reprise, 1995, prod. Nicky Ryan) engages Enya's trademark style, but again lacks the spark of Watermark. Perhaps her preexisting popularity explains this CD's Grammy for Best New Age Album. Notably, though, "Anywhere Is" is a joyous, spiritual anthem to confusion and indecision. And Enya's lyrics, in English, Spanish, Latin, and Gaelic, leave much room for personal interpretation by her mono-lingual American followers.

worth searching for: Although the Canadian import Enya Collection ♪♪♪½ (MSI/WEAC, 1986, prod. Nicky Ryan) is a three-CD set repackaging previous recordings, its 64-page booklet will entice the avid follower. Frog Prince Soundtrack ♪♪♪ (Karussell, 1989, prod. Nicky Ryan) is a British import recalling Enya's professional roots in television and movie scores. The EP Oiche Chiun (Silent Night) ♪♪♪♪ (Reprise, 1992, prod. Nicky Ryan) features three tracks (10 minutes total): "Silent Night" sung in Gaelic, "Oriel Window," a characteristically ethereal piano instrumental, and "S Fagaim Mo Bhaile," a Gaelic song. If the holiday season finds you dreaming of a dreamy Christmas, check out the Canadian import Christmas EP ♪♪♪ (MSI/WEA, 1986, prod. Nicky Ryan). Finally, Interview (BAKTABAK, 1986, prod. Nicky Ryan) is another British import—without the distraction of melody and harmony—for those seriously interested in Irish Catholicism, Celtic mysticism, and pop idolatry.

influences:

⏮ Claude Debussy, Erik Satie, Clannad

⏭ Mary Black, Loreena McKennitt, Dee Carstensen, Björk, Brian Eno, the Cranberries

see also: Altan, Clannad

Art Wojtowicz

Epstein Brothers Band

Klezmer, Hasidic dance music

Formed 1940s, in New York, NY, USA. Based in Miami, FL, USA.

Max Epstein, clarinet; William Epstein, trumpet; Julius Epstein, drums; Isidore "Chi" Epstein (died 1986), sax; Danny Rubinstein, sax; Peter Sokolow, piano; Pat Merola, bass. All members are from the USA.

The Epstein Brothers were klezmer superstars before most people ever heard of the former term and before the latter even existed. All the brothers were born on the Lower East Side of New York City, and all played music from an early age, although their Russian émigré parents were not themselves musical. Max was a professional fiddler by age 12, earning money playing along with films in silent movie houses, and later taught himself clarinet and sax. His music leaned toward the traditional and he was one of the few American-born players who could sit in with the senior klezmorim from the Old World. Many of the tunes he knows were learned from elder European Jewish musicians. In the 1930s, Max attended NYU and earned a degree in music education while working for the Warner Bros. studio band and playing nightclub gigs. Willie turned pro at 15, playing in "show bands" in the Catskill resorts north of New York. By the 1950s he was subbing in Jewish theater bands and recording with his brother "Chi," backing comedians like Micky Katz and Benny Bell. Julie was playing with Max by the time he was 17, but also played in Dixieland bands and swing orchestras. At the height of his career he was performing 40 jobs a week for 20 different bandleaders. The Epsteins began playing klezmer in earnest after WWII, when Holocaust survivors flooded into New York City. They formed the Epstein Brothers Orchestra in the late '40s to great acclaim. By the early '70s the brothers had retired and moved to southern Florida, although Max still practiced every day and Julie started his own big show band to play at Jewish retirement homes. Strangely enough, it was interest from a German label specializing in Jewish music that brought the Epsteins together to play and record klezmer again. The revival led to their acknowledgment as elder statesmen by the current generation of young klezmorim—and a National Heritage Fellowship from the National Endowment for the Arts in 1998.

what's available: The Epsteins and their sidemen count more than three centuries of experience among them, but on Kings of Frelekh Land ♪♪♪♪♪ (Wergo/Weltmusik, 1995 prod. Joel Rubin, Rita Ottens) they play like young lions who've just discovered the power of music; these guys were tearing the roof off the sucker before George Clinton was a twinkle in his father's father's eye.

influences:

⏮ Naftule Brandwein, Dave Tarras, Sholem Secunda, Abe Schwartz Orchestra

250 kudsi erguner

The Klezmorim, Klezmatics, Andy Statman

j. poet

Kudsi Erguner

Ottoman classical, Turkish Sufi, Turkish fusion

Born February 4, 1952, in Istanbul, Turkey. Based in Paris, France.

One of Turkey's most prolific recording artists, Kudsi Erguner is widely recognized among Western audiences as a master of the Turkish ney, the reed flute that steers the languorous, hypnotic music of the Mevlevi Sufis, best known for their ecstatic whirling dervish ceremonies. Born in 1952, Kudsi is the eldest son of Ulvi Erguner, the last great master in a line of ney players and Mevlevi disciples stretching from Kudsi's grandfather, Suleyman Erguner (d. 1953), back to Seyh Yusuf Dede (d. 1670). During the long reign of the Ottoman Empire, tekkes, or Mevlevi houses, in Istanbul, Konya, and elsewhere functioned as schools for the best Ottoman art-musicians and repositories of compositions and techniques refined over generations by Sultans and Sufis alike. Kudsi and his brother Suleyman, also an excellent ney player, are the direct heirs to this remarkable cultural legacy. Both also learned from some of the great post-Ottoman musicians who flowed in and out of the government-run Istanbul Radio Orchestra—modern Turkey's secular answer to the tekke and seraglio (Sultan's palace)—which Ulvi Erguner directed for many years. Instrumentalists and singers famous for their improvisational finesse, such as Yorgo Bacanos, Udi Hrant, Necdet Yasar, and Necati Tokyay, all spent long evenings playing in the Erguner home, a private salon environment that still produces and preserves some of the best Turkish music—to the consternation of tourists in search of good live performances in Istanbul.

Kudsi absorbed Mevlevi Sufi traditions at a young age by performing with his father in dervish ceremonies. Unlike more orthodox forms of Islam, Mevlevi Sufism embraces the spiritual power of music and dance, teaching that the soul, encumbered by earthly flesh and thus separated from God, can achieve a mystical reunion with the divine through meditative rituals: the whirling of the dervish, whose every body movement is aligned with the stars; the long music cycles with their Pythagorean bearings; the slow rhythm of frame-drums; and above all the transporting sounds of the ney, heavy with breath, which the poet Rumi compared to "the words of a wise man and a lover of God." Even without its spiritual gloss, this is haunting, powerful music, and Kudsi Erguner has for over 20 years performed on or produced many of the best recordings of Mevlevi Sufi music available. In 1975, after a five-year stint as an Istanbul Radio musician, Kudsi moved to Paris, where he studied architecture and musicology, and in 1981 founded Mevlana, an institute for the study of Sufi classical music and teachings. Envisioning himself as an archivist rather than a guru, Kudsi set out to recreate the rich Ottoman historical context in which Sufi culture had flourished before being cut at the roots by the revolutionary fiats of Turkish nationalists in the 1920s.

Mevlevi music and music of the court (both seraglio and harem) were the spiritual and secular counterparts in Ottoman art-music, and historically inseparable until the 18th century. Both were centered in Istanbul among the pan-ethnic, scholarly Ottoman elite. Mevlevi and court composers, several of whom were Vienna-sieging Sultans, mutually contributed to the development of extraordinary music cycles or fasils made up of delicate preludes (pesrevs), art songs (sharkis, a.k.a. sarkis), improvisations (taksims), and codas (saz semais), memorized and regenerated decade after decade. Ottoman music drew on an enormous variety of rhythmic cycles (from two to 120 beats) and offered one of the most elaborate and sustained developments of the modal system, known as the makam. Based on the use of untempered intervals (as many as 53 notes to an octave), a given mode or makam provides a melodic pattern of notes with its own characteristic ascending and descending motifs that course through an entire fasil. Developed in performance, where their vitality depended on the unique interpretations of each ensemble musician, makams historically were rarely written down. Thus the paradoxical fate of modern efforts to revive Ottoman music, which had been suppressed, along with Sufi brotherhoods, by nationalist government officials in the 1920s: on the one hand, attempts to preserve older compositional forms were hampered by a lack of written texts, and on the other hand the very insistence on having musicians learn and perform from notated scores (in Western-style conservatories and radio orchestras) smothered the improvisational genius underlying Turkey's musical forms. How to reconnect Turkey's music to its past without the ingrained ties of familial, religious, and imperial genealogy—such is the dilemma of many musicians in Turkey today. Ulvi Erguner responded to this problem in the 1950s by transcribing forgotten makams and fasils and by pushing for recognition of older classical repertoire at Istanbul Radio. Kudsi's work has been equally determined. In 1988 he founded the Fasl Ensemble, later named the Kudsi Erguner Ensemble, which through numerous recordings and concerts has striven to resuscitate both authentic Ottoman performance practice, with its fluid interplay of refined composition and improvisation, and a broad range of repertoire, from the songs of the 13th-century Sufi poet Yunus Emre to works of the late-19th-century Armenian composer Kemani Tatyos.

In the last few years several ensembles based in Istanbul have also turned their attention to the vast canvas of Ottoman art-music, but the Kudsi Erguner Ensemble, recording most often on accessible French, German, and American labels, has done the most to expose Western listeners to an astounding classical music heritage quite unlike their own. Not simply a purist, Kudsi has been a key player in the cross-cultural world-music scene as well, contributing to the soundtracks of Peter Brook and Peter Gabriel; performing ney solos in various operas, ballets, and theater pieces; and most recently recording a fusion album with European jazz musicians.

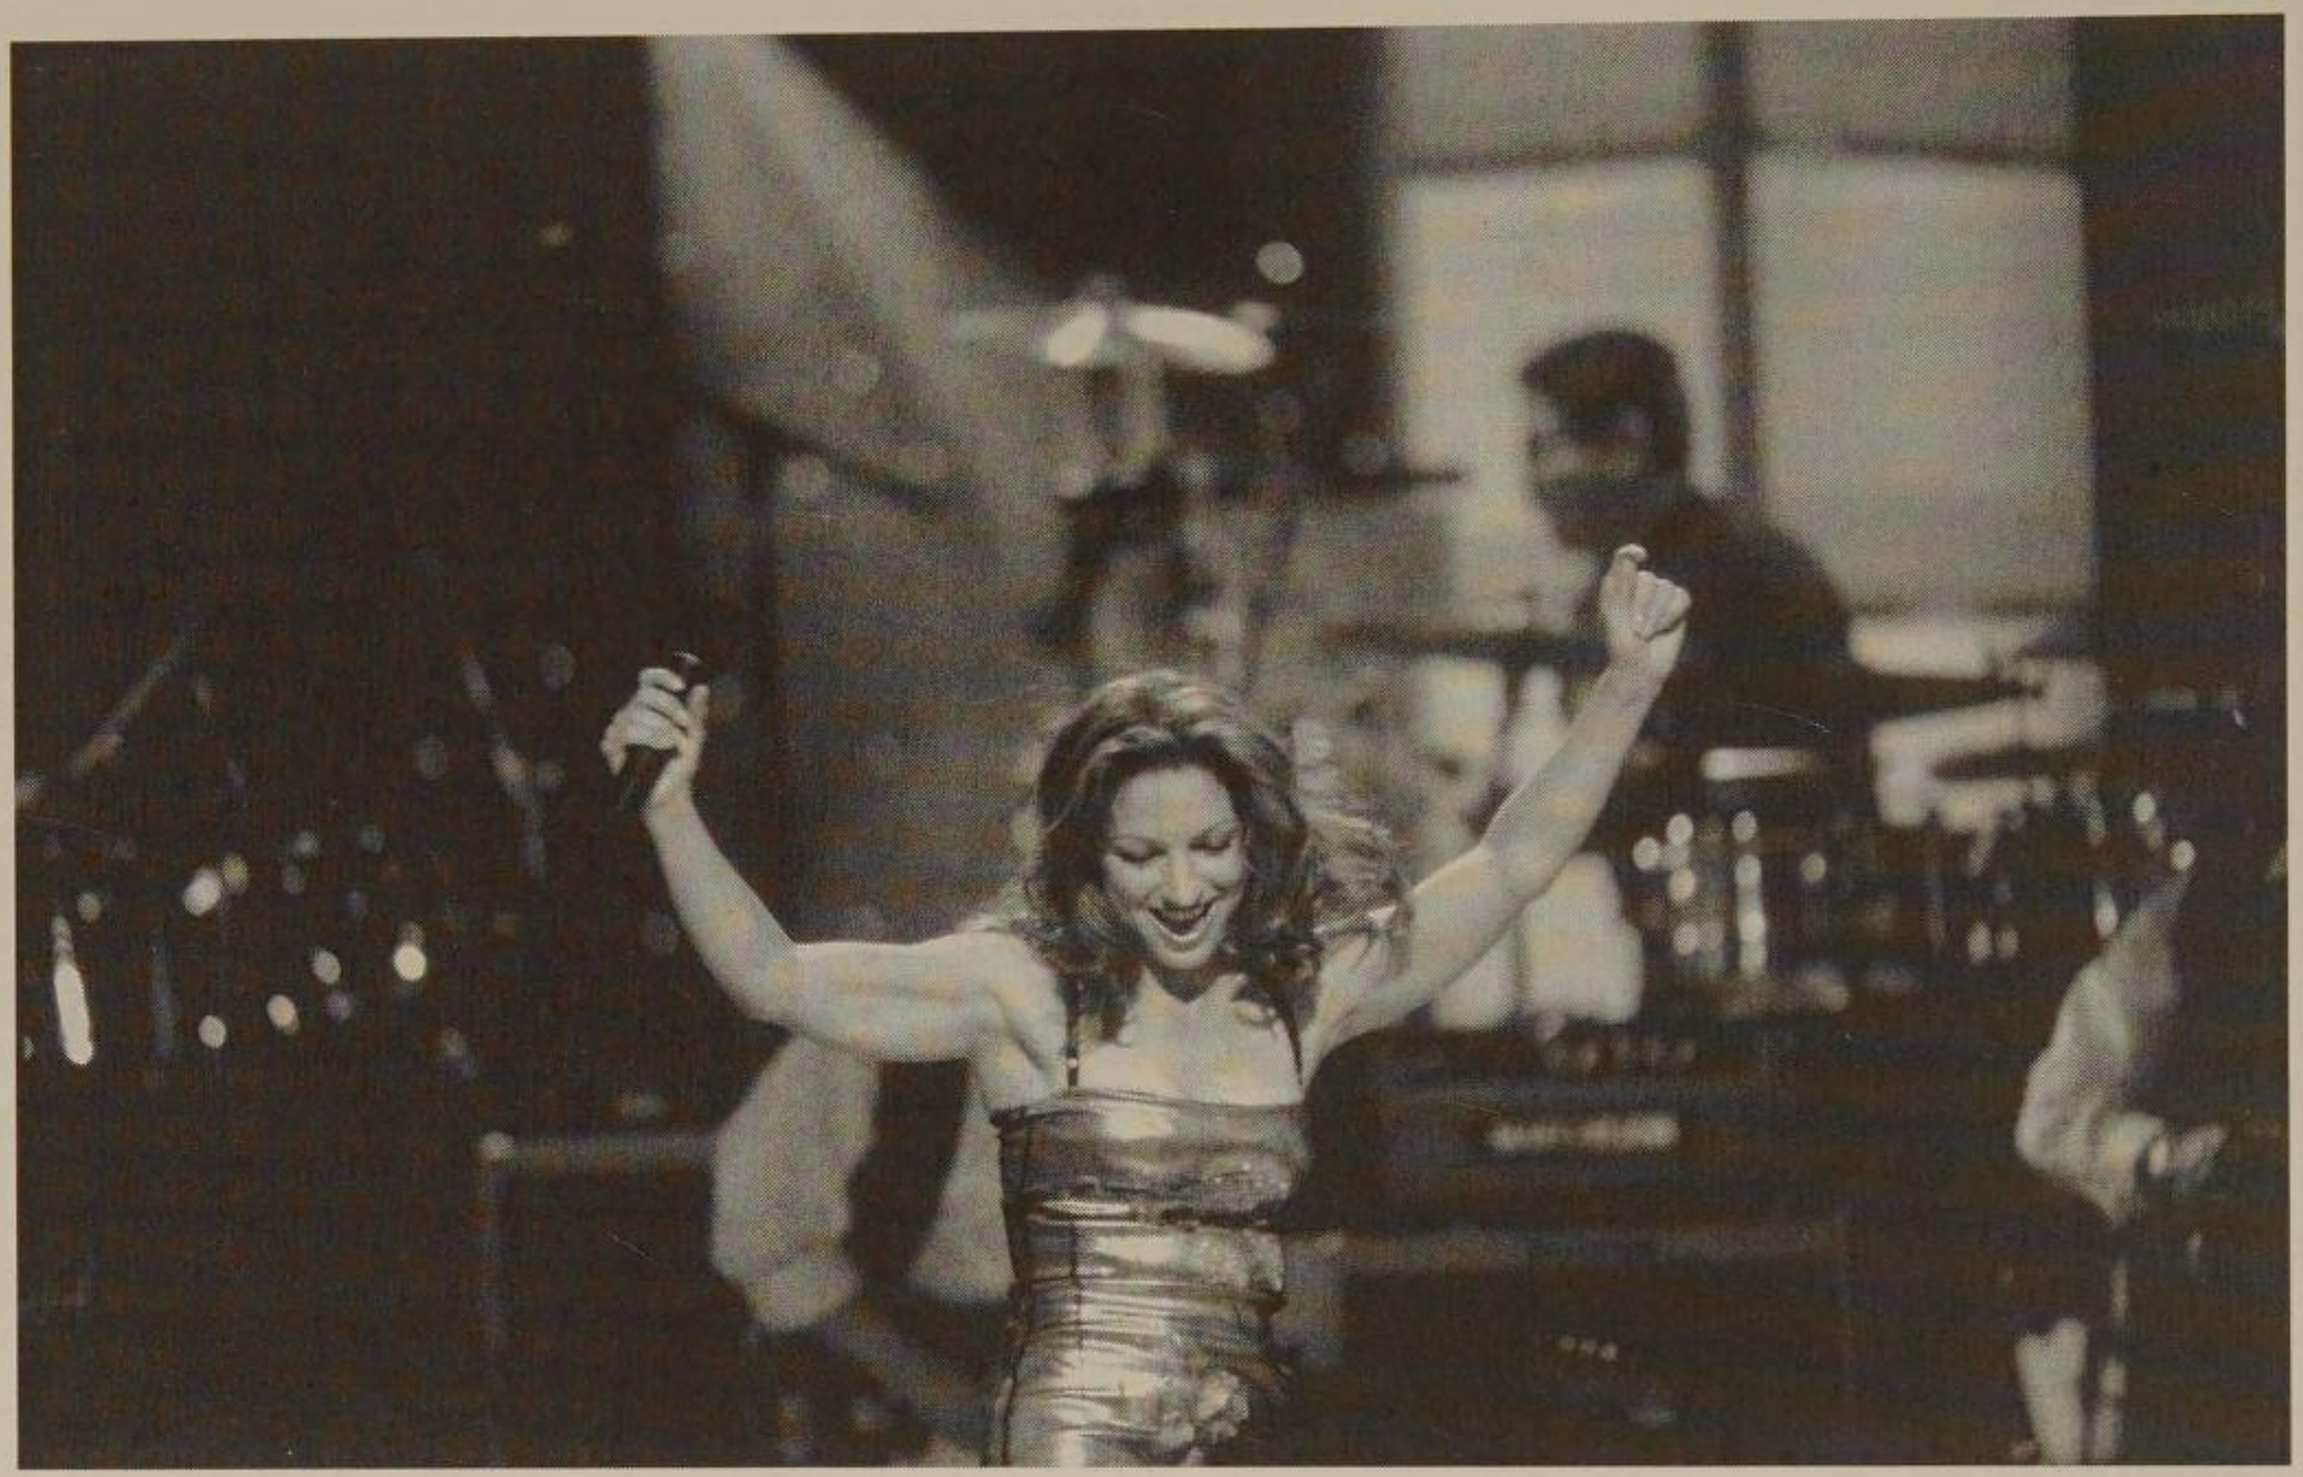
what to buy: Kudsi Erguner has performed on more than 40 CDs and LPs. Quintessential among these, and one of the best introductions to the ney and Sufi music generally, is Sufi Music of Turkey ♪♪♪♪♪ (CMP, 1990, prod. Kurt Renker, Walter Quintus), featuring the spare, haunting sound of ney and frame-drum, performed by Kudsi (both instruments) and his younger brother Suleyman Erguner (the former one). Suleyman is an extraordinary ney player in his own right, an Istanbul Radio musician with an extensive discography, and he brings out the most inspired playing in Kudsi. Listen for the taut weave of the two neys, the way a subtle line of notes falls away from one and is instantly echoed and reworked by the other. Such musical telepathy, along with the intricate solo taksims, make other ney and dervish recordings seem academic by comparison. Fasl: Musique de l'Empire Ottoman ♪♪♪♪♪ (Auvidis Ethnic, 1990, prod. Kudsi Erguner) features the Kudsi Erguner Ensemble and includes the ney, kemenche (spiked fiddle), ud (lute), kanun (plucked zither), and def and bendir drums, as well as a male and female chorus. This is one of the best recorded reconstructions of an entire Ottoman music suite (fasil), an assembly of musical forms (pesrevs, sharkis, and saz semais to name a few) unified within the itinerary of a single makam (mode)—here, hidjaz houmayoun. Though the anti-Ottoman meddling of Turkish music nationalists sealed their fate, the continuity of such interwoven suites had already begun to erode as early as the 18th century, with the beginnings of Westernization. Further weakened by the popularity of light urban music in the 19th century, such cycles finally imploded as the gramophone swept the Middle East, with its attention span the size of a wax cylinder. The fasil was never so much a pure form as an accretion of styles and composers centuries apart. Here composers range from the Mevlevi Veli Dedi and Sultan Abdoul Aziz to the great 20th-century singer Sadettin Kaynak, who succeeded Kudsi's great-grandfather as the muezzin (one who calls the faithful to prayer) of the Yevus Selim mosque in Istanbul. Tatyos Efendi ♪♪♪♪♪ (Traditional Crossroads, 1996, prod. Harold Hagopian) showcases the classical repertoire of a single great composer, Kemani Tatyos, whose late-19th-century pesrevs and saz semais have become standards of the classical literature. In keeping with the infiltration of Western instruments in 19th-century ensembles, here the violin replaces the kemenche and the clarinet is introduced. Their capacity for flashy brilliance is put to good use on this album, with its hearty sampling of short taksims by Kudsi and Suleyman Erguner and other Istanbul musicians drawn from the Radio Orchestra. The short, lyrical violin taksims of Baki Kemanci (tracks 5 and 13) are well worth the price of the entire CD. The taksims are equally stunning on Tatyos Efendi: Vocal Masterpieces ♪♪♪♪♪ (Traditional Crossroads, 1996, prod. Harold Hagopian), particularly the opening ney improvisation, as elegiac and yearning as in any dervish ceremony. Tatyos's superb sharkis—love songs that became the most popular of high art forms in Turkey—are passionately interpreted by the female vocalist Melihat Gülses. The very first collection of sharkis recorded with period instruments is another wonderful Erguner Ensemble production, Sharki: Love Songs of Istanbul ♪♪♪♪ (CMP, 1991, prod. Kurt Renker, Walter Quintus). Featuring difficult works of 19th- and 20th-century composers, this is a less immediately accessible album, but the ardent voice of Nesrin Sipahi, one of the initiators of the return to Turkish classical music in the 1950s, fluently expresses the deranged and devotional sorrow of lost love. Gazel: Classical Music of the Ottoman Empire ♪♪♪♪♪ (CMP, 1991, prod. Kurt Renker, Walter Quintus) focuses on the elegant, multi-lingual poetic form known as the gazel, a vehicle for love poems throughout the Middle East that was adapted by the Sufis and their Sultan devotees for the expression of spiritual love. The three passionate singers heard here are all Imams in various Istanbul mosques.

what to buy next: Psaumes de Yunus Emré ♪♪♪♪ (Al Sur, 1996, prod. Michel Pagiras) resurrects compositions inspired by the 13th-century Sufi poet Yunus Emre and offers a minimalist but dramatic treatment of Sufi lyricism, featuring only ney, drum, and a male vocalist. L'Orient de l'Occident ♪♪♪♪ (Al Sur, 1994, prod. Festival d'Ete de Barcelone) claims to be an exploration of the historical connection between Eastern and Western styles—Ottoman Sufi and flamenco music—in the Andalusian region of modern Spain. But this seems like a thin archival patina on what is fundamentally a popular world-fusion album that stands up well without any pretexts. One is most likely to come away noting the difference between the tones of protest and supplication in flamenco and Ottoman vocal styles, both of which are powerfully represented here. Peshrev & Semai of Tanburi Djemil Bey ♪♪♪♪ (CMP, 1991, prod. Kurt Render, Walter Quintus) pays homage to one of the first and greatest Turkish musicians whose compositions were disseminated and dissected through recordings. Djemil (a.k.a. Cemil) Bey's virtuosity on the tanbur (long-necked, fretted Turkish lute), captured on over 100 cylinder recordings and 78s before his death in 1918, has been the benchmark for countless modern musicians. The Kudsi Erguner Ensemble is well-staffed for this production and the solos are especially strong.

kudsi erguner



Gloria Estefan

what to avoid: With its canonical title and picture of Kudsi Erguner on the cover, Ottoman Classical Music ♪ (Al Sur, 1992, prod. Niglo des Chants) would seem like an obvious Erguner project to pull from the bin, but this duet album is dominated by the amateur playing of one of Kudsi's French students, the tanburist Gilles Andrieux. Far better to seek out the legendary tanbur recordings of Djemil Bey for a satisfying experience of that instrument, or the mesmerizing ney collaborations of Kudsi and his brother for the cream of Kudsi's duet work.

best of the rest:
The Turkish Ney ♪♪♪½ (Auvidis/UNESCO, 1990)
Whirling Dervishes from Turkey ♪♪♪½ (Arion, 1991)
Oriental Dreams ♪♪½ (Playasound, 1991)
Chemins ♪♪♪ (Al Sur, 1997)
Sufi Flutes ♪♪♪♪ (JVC, 1997)
Le Concert de Nanterre ♪♪♪½ (Al Sur, 1998)
Ottomania: Sufi-Jazz-Project N/A (Act, 1999)

worth searching for: For serious ney devotees, two Kudsi Erguner recordings issued only on LP are consistently mentioned as some of his best work: Meditation on the Ney (Philips, 1978), a solo album featuring a series of taksims, and Sufi Music & Unrecorded Songs of the 15th Century (GREM, 1980), which recreates part of a Sufi invocation ceremony. For the casual listener who likes the ney but doesn't give a wit about Ottoman music, there are the atmospheric soundtracks to several movies, good and bad, set against generic Middle Eastern backdrops. Mahabahrata ♪♪♪½ (RealWorld, 1990, prod. Peter Brook) draws the Turkish ney (along with the Aboriginal Australian didgeridoo drone instrument and the Japanese taiko drums) into a retelling of the Hindu epic. A potentially disjointed concept actually becomes a very thoughtful, creative world-fusion album, without the electronic overkill of so many RealWorld records. Passion Sources ♪♪♪♪ (RealWorld, 1993, prod. Peter Gabriel) is in essence the commercial sampler of the musicians heard on the Peter Gabriel–masterminded soundtrack for Martin Scorsese's The Last Temptation of Christ. The Sheltering Sky ♪♪♪ (Virgin, 1991, prod. Ryuichi Sakamoto) is basically a continuous film score with exotic flute sounds thrown in, and is likely to disappoint Erguner fans as much as the movie disappoints fans of the novelist Paul Bowles; it's much more worthwhile to hunt down the best video store in town and rent Peter Brooks's Meetings with Remarkable Men, filmed in Afghanistan in 1976, which not only includes some sharp ney playing but features Kudsi Erguner himself in a cameo role.

influences:

Ulvi Erguner, Yorgo Bacanos, Udi Hrant, Necdet Yasar, Sadettin Heper

see also: Anouar Brahem, Udi Hrant

Cynthia Rogers

Victor Essiet

See: The Mandators

Gloria Estefan /Miami Sound Machine

Latin pop

Born Gloria Fajardo, September 1, 1957, in Havana, Cuba. Based in Miami, FL, USA.

Simply put, Gloria Estefan has terrific pipes that were co-opted—with consent—away from Miami's Cuban dance scene into the blander but phenomenally successful realm of middle-of-the-road pop. The Cuban native, who fled that country's revolution with her family and moved to the U.S. when she was two, started out fronting the Miami Sound Machine, a former wedding band led by her husband, Emilio Estefan Jr., whose south-of-the-equator polyrhythms provided an interesting mainstream pop alternative during the mid-'80s. It didn't last long; as Estefan's voice grew from chirpy to assured, the Miami Sound Machine moniker gradually disappeared from the album covers in order to showcase the singer. In 1990, when a tractor-trailer hit Estefan's tour bus, she suffered a fractured vertebrae that required months of rigorous rehabilitation; but a year later, she was back in action, singing "Coming out of the Dark," a song inspired by the accident, to #1. Give Estefan this much: she's no producer's tool, writing many of her own lyrics and checking off on the creative decisions. If only one of those decisions would be a return to the those irresistible club grooves . . . .

what to buy: Eyes of Innocence ♪♪♪½ (Epic, 1984/1989, prod. Emilio & the Jerks) contains only one minor hit, "Dr. Beat," but the Miami Sound Machine's debut is an intoxicating blend of Caribbean rhythms. You won't find anything from that album on Greatest Hits ♪♪♪♪½ (Epic, 1992, prod. Emilio Estefan) but you do get her best, a largely upbeat collection that includes "Conga," "Rhythm Is Gonna Get You," and "Get on Your Feet."

what to buy next: Gloria! ♪♪♪ (Epic, 1998, prod. various) brings back some of the percolating spirit of the early Miami Sound Machine, blending Caribbean rhythms with South Beach disco beats, though with nary a hint of industrial or techno styles. But "Don't Release Me," her collaboration with Wyclef Jean of the Fugees, shows she's not ignorant of current musical affairs.

what to avoid: Estefan can probably sing lots of songs very well. Why'd she pick the ones on Hold Me, Thrill Me, Kiss Me ♪½ (Epic, 1994, prod. various)?

the rest:

Into the Light ♪♪ (Epic, 1981)
Primitive Love ♪♪♪ (Epic, 1985)
Let It Loose ♪♪♪ (Epic, 1987)
Cuts Both Ways ♪♪½ (Epic, 1989)
Mi Tierra ♪♪♪ (Epic, 1993)
Christmas through Your Eyes ♪♪½ (Epic, 1993)
Abriendo Puertas ♪♪½ (Epic, 1995)
Destiny ♪♪ (Epic, 1996)

worth searching for: Estefan's guest vocal on the song "Africa" from Arturo Sandoval's Dayon (GRP, 1994, prod. Arturo Sandoval, Richard Eddy) is terrific.

influences:

Carmen Miranda, Tito Puente, Herb Alpert & the Tijuana Brass, Aretha Franklin, Donna Summer

Debbie Gibson, Celine Dion

see also: Albita, Chayanne, Arturo Sandoval

Gary Graff

The Ethiopians

Roots reggae

Formed 1966, in Kingston, Jamaica. Based in Kingston, Jamaica.

Leonard Dillon, vocals (1966–present); Stephen Taylor, vocals (1966–1975); Aston "Charlie" Morris, vocals (1966–1968); Melvin "Mellow" Reid, vocals (1968–1977). (All members are from Jamaica.)

Leonard Dillon is the wisdom-blessed seer of roots-reggae pioneers the Ethiopians. Impressed by the cushioned warmth of Dillon's expressive voice, Bob Marley bandmate and later solo legend Peter Tosh introduced Dillon to producer Coxsone Dodd in 1965. Even on his earliest Wailers-backed singles with Dodd ("Sufferers on the Land," "Beggars Have No Choice," "Icewater," and "Bullwhip"), recorded under the name King Sparrow, Dillon exhibited an expansive vision of music, a vision that embraced the ideals of united humanity in his Rastafarian faith. At the same time, Dillon's folksy, proverb-fortified songs were the essence of the hard-working man's struggle to grasp joy and knowledge from even the toughest of situations.

Given that the Ethiopians influenced an entire era of Jamaican roots music, perhaps it is the humble, understated nature of Dillon's voice and lyrics that has kept this group from receiving the recognition they deserve. Whatever the case, the Ethiopians' catalog is one of the sweetest, most utterly enjoyable in all of reggae. After the group formed, their first sides included the exceptional "Gonna Take Over Now" and "(I'm a) Free Man" for Dodd. In 1967, Dillon himself produced "Train to Skaville," a tune that, despite the title, was really a grooving rocksteady classic that surprisingly charted in the U.K. That same year, the group recorded two rare singles for Lee Perry—"Cut Down" and "Not Me." The band's work for Sonia Pottinger's Gayfeet label is rocksteady as fine as it comes, with "Do It Sweet," "The Whip," "Stay Loose Mama," and the wonderful "Train to Glory" all scoring big on the island. Evoking the classic children's story The Little Engine That Could and committing themselves to the long haul, Dillon and company released the never-give-up anthem "Engine 54" with Lloyd "The Matador" Daley. This led to a fruitful association with Carl "Sir J.J." Johnson and a string of reggae gems, including "Well Red," "Everything Crash," "Hong Kong Flu," and "Hang On, Don't Let Go." The group also recorded superior reggae sides for a number of other top-notch producers, including Duke Reid ("Pirate," "Mother's Tender Care"), Derrick Harriott ("No Baptism"), Vincent Chin ("Sad News," "Rim Bam Bam"), Rupie Edwards ("Solid as a Rock"), and Bob Andy ("The World Is Love"). This relentless string of strong tunes ceased when Stephen Taylor was killed in a car accident in 1975. After a period of heavy mourning, Dillon returned with the traditional, Rastafarian-themed Slave Call, a fine record propelled by intricate nyahbingi ritual drumming and subtly imbued with echo and reverb by eccentric producer Niney the Observer.

Under the unwavering guidance of Dillon, the Ethiopians still occasionally record, and many of their rare singles have been reissued on various outstanding compilations. Dillon's frail, graceful, deeply soulful voice, perceptive lyrics, unerring ability to structure elaborate harmonies, and consistent flow of important ideas gleaned from his own and his country's experiences, have assured the Ethiopians a lasting legacy—and one that should be explored by any music lover. Leonard Dillon and the Ethiopians are truly the embodiment of the Jamaican maxim, "Who feels it, knows it."

what to buy: Engine 54—Let's Ska and Rocksteady ♪♪♪♪½ (Jamaican Gold, 1968, prod. various) is one of the most celebrated rocksteady albums. The metaphor of the train as a strong engine for the unity and progress of disenfranchised, ghetto-suffering people the world over is used by Dillon on a holy trinity of classic cuts—the title song, "Train to Skaville," and "Train to Glory." The entire album is backed in cool, elegant fashion by Tommy McCook and the Supersonics, and the vintage liner notes include instructions on how to do the "rocksteady" dance and fall "under the spell" of this enchanting, exultant music. The Original Reggae Hitsound ♪♪♪♪½ (Trojan, 1986, prod. various) and The World Goes Ska ♪♪♪♪ (Trojan, 1992, prod. various) are two superlative compilations with no overlap. Together, they provide an awe-inspiring musical documentary of the Ethiopians and include all of the above "train" hits alongside such favorites as "Rim Bam Bam," "Do It Sweet," and "Stay Loose Mama." Also highly reggae-mended are Clap Your Hands ♪♪♪½ (Lagoon, 1992, prod. Carl Johnson) and Sir J.J. and Friends ♪♪♪♪ (Lagoon, prod. Carl Johnson). These collections of prized Sir J.J. Johnson–produced songs include the marvelous "Everyday Talking," "Well Red," "The Selah," and "Everything Crash" (one of the best musical documents of Jamaica's internal chaos just a few years after independence, and the first song without sexually suggestive lyrics to be banned from airplay on the island).

what to buy next: Along with Count Ossie's Grounation, the aforementioned Slave Call ♪♪♪♪ (Heartbeat, 1977, Winston "Niney the Observer" Holness) is one of the best recorded examples of Rastafarian nyahbingi drumming, featuring a dense six-drum congregation that provides intricate rhythmic lattice-work. Dillon's "Ethiopian National Anthem," "Obeah Book," and "Nuh Follow Babylon" marked his triumphant return to form after nearly two years of seclusion. Owner Fe De Yard ♪♪♪½ (Heartbeat, 1994, prod. various) is an object lesson on how to reissue music. This is a collection of nearly 20 years of top-drawer Ethiopians rarities like "One Heart" (1969), "So You Look Pon It" (1974), and "Let Me Blow My Smoke" (1985), with the added bonus of detailed liner notes, including a recent informative interview with Leonard Dillon that sheds much light on this gentle soul.

the rest:
Reggae Power ♪♪♪♪ (Trojan, 1969)
Woman Capture Man ♪♪♪½ (Trojan, 1970)
Everything Crash ♪♪♪½ (Studio One, 1980)
Open the Gate of Zion ♪♪♪ (G.G., 1980)
Dread Prophecy ♪♪♪ (Nighthawk, 1986)
Leonard Dillon on the Road Again ♪♪½ (Heartbeat, 1991)
Tuffer Than Stone ♪♪♪½ (Roots & Culture, 1999)

influences:
⏮ Peter Tosh, Drumbago, Laurel Aitken, Owen Gray, Derrick Morgan, Toots Hibbert, Lee Perry.
⏭ Culture, the Gladiators, the Mighty Diamonds, Burning Spear, Black Uhuru, Junior Byles, the Congos, Junior Murvin, Garnett Silk

Todd Shanker

Étoile de Dakar

Senegalese rumba, mbalax

Formed 1960, in Dakar, Senegal. Based in Dakar, Senegal.

Youssou N'Dour, vocals; El Hadji Faye, vocals; Eric M'Backe N'Doye, vocals; Alla Seck, vocals, maracas; Badou N'Diaye, solo guitar; Alpha

Senyni Kanta, rhythm guitar, Kabou Gueye, bass; Assane Thaim, tama (Senegalese talking drum); Matar Gueye, tumbas; Abdou Fall, timbales, Rane Diallo, saxes; Diogomaye, sax; Marc Sambat, trumpet. (All members are from Senegal.)

It is not an exaggeration to say that modern Senegalese pop music would not have existed without the band that evolved into Youssou N'Dour's Étoile de Dakar. Over the course of its two-decade heyday, it was the training ground for dozens of famous musicians. Étoile de Dakar transformed the Cuban music that had been at the root of Senegalese pop before Liberation and turned it into something uniquely Senegalese, and vastly different from the African rumba of the Congo, soukous.

Étoile de Dakar began as the Star Band in 1960, created by Ibra Kasse, owner of Dakar's Miami Club, when he combined and hired the best musicians from two rival bands—Guinea Band de Dakar, who played mostly Cuban covers, and Star Band de Senui, known for their powerful electric guitar work. Senegal had just gained independence from France, and the musicians were looking for a sound that would be truly Senegalese. They began to add indigenous rhythms and folk instruments to the lineup, including the tama and sabar, Senegalese talking drums. As the group sound developed and began attracting listeners, musicians splintered off to form variants (Super Star Band and Star Number One), but the original Star Band soldiered on.

In 1975, a 16-year-old Youssou N'Dour joined the Star Band, and his musical vision transformed their sound. In 1978 they recorded an album with N'Dour on lead vocals, and soon after that N'Dour broke away from the Miami Club, taking several members of the band with him, including tama player Assane Thiam, the man whose innovative drumming laid the foundation for N'Dour's later success. When N'Dour translated the band's name back into French, they became Étoile de Dakar, and began calling their music mbalax, the word for rhythm in N'Dour's tribal tongue, Wolof. In Senegal the music business was still evolving, and cassettes, the main recorded medium, were manufactured quickly, mainly to draw crowds to a band's live gigs, where they made the majority of their money. N'Dour and Étoile de Dakar recorded a series of cassettes and albums that made them so popular, in 1983 N'Dour moved the group to Paris, where he began to pursue his international career.

what to buy: The sound on the reissued Absa Gueye ♪♪♪♪ (Stern's Classics, 1993, prod. Étoile de Dakar) is spotty, but there's no denying the power of the music; the Cuban and Congolese influences are present, but every so often they fall away to give you a hint of what N'Dour soon accomplished.

what to buy next: The final disc in the classic Étoile series, Khaley Étoile ♪♪♪♪ (Stern's Classics, 1998, prod. Touba Auto Cassette), cut in 1982, presents Youssou N'Dour and guitarist Badou Gueye in full command of their powers; N'Dour's vocals are superb, Gueye's guitar constantly amazes, and the band has moved out of the shadow of Cuban music to establish the sound that dominated Senegalese music for the rest of the 1980s.

music as healing

Though the idea of music as a healing tool is associated with the current new-age movement, it is in fact a relatively universal belief, with roots dating back thousands of years to a number of ancient cultures. According to Pat Moffitt Cook, a musicologist and expert on the subject, "Throughout the ages, by trial and error, selected sounds and rhythms developed into tools for diagnosing and curing illness. Sophisticated breathing patterns evolved together with prayerful chants and sacred healing songs. The songs cure, petition benevolent deities, invite spirit possession, and induce states of ecstasy." Today, similar healing traditions are still practiced in a variety of cultures, including the ojhas of India, the Ayahuasca shamen of Peru, the peyote shamen of Mexico, the medicine men of various Native American tribes, the jhankri of Nepal, and the priestesses of Haitian Vodou. Perhaps the most well-known of these rituals is the leela, a serene healing ceremony practiced by the Gnawa of Morocco, wherein music is used to purge a spirit that has brought on illness, infertility, or other affliction. These ceremonies typically last for seven days, and as the percussion-heavy music drones in repetition, participants may enter a trance as they find themselves possessed by healing spirits—a startling but impressive sight. This phenomenon could explain why some people in the West seem to feel a particular natural high while dancing to the similar serial rhythms of techno. To hear a variety of trance-music traditions from around the world, check out Cook's fantastic collection Shaman, Jhankri & Néle ♪♪♪♪♪ (ellipsis arts . . . , 1997), or the equally fascinating compilations Trance 1 ♪♪♪♪♪ (ellipsis arts . . . , 1995) and Trance 2 ♪♪♪♪♪ (ellipsis arts . . . , 1995).

Bret Love

the rest:
Lay Suma Lay ♪♪♪♪ (Stern's Classics, 1994, Prod. Étoile de Dakar)
Thiapathioly ♪♪♪♪ (Stern's Classics, 1996, Prod. Étoile de Dakar)

influences:
⏮ Guinea Band de Dakar, Star Band de Senui
⏭ Youssou N'Dour, Baaba Maal, Étoile 2000, Star Band One, Super Star de Dakar

see also: Youssou N'Dour

j. poet

Eunice Playboys

See: John Delafose & the Eunice Playboys

Cesaria Evora

Morna, coladeira

Born August 27, 1941, in Mindelo, Sao Vicente, Cape Verde. Based in Cape Verde.

Cape Verde was essentially a bunch of rocks off the coast of Africa until the Portuguese transformed it into a depot for the slave trade in the 15th century. Over time the commerce in human flesh declined and the colony fell victim to cycles of famine and drought. By the mid-20th century, Cape Verde was extremely poor, and many of its people were migrating to other countries in search of work. It is against this backdrop that Cesaria Evora grew up. Her father and his cousin (Francisco Xavier da Cruz, a.k.a. B. Leza) used to tour the bars of Mindelo singing for tips. At the heart of their material were the indigenous mornas and coladeiras, which blend elements of bluesy Portuguese fado with subtle African rhythms. The morna is slower-paced and employs more fatalistic lyrics, while the comparatively upbeat coladeira is, in some ways, akin to the Brazilian samba. Evora was joining her father and his cousin on their circuit of dives when she was in her early teens, and by 1961 had made a number of successful appearances on local radio shows. She stopped singing during the early 1970s to raise a family.

Evora didn't return to music until 1985, when she was invited to Portugal by the singer Bana and a women's association to make her first record, Tchitchi Roti. But her career didn't really take off until 1988, when a young Frenchman with Cape Verdean bloodlines, José da Silva, convinced Evora to come to Paris where she recorded La Diva aux Pieds Nus for his label, Lusafrica. The album and her concerts were a small success with the Cape Verdean expatriate community in Paris, which made it possible for 1990's Distino di Belita. Mar Azul was then released in 1991 and marked the beginning of a definite upward swing for Evora. French radio stations started playing the album, her concerts throughout France began selling out, and the French press raved about her roughly honeyed voice. By the time the spectacularly successful Miss Perfumado came out in 1993, Evora had toured France, Belgium, and Portugal, and her career as an international star was in full swing by the end of 1995. Her concert tours spanned the globe, her album Cesaria Evora was nominated for a Grammy (an honor she has now received three times), and Pol Cruchten cast her as the mother of the protagonist in his film Black Dju. The government of Cape Verde was so pleased by her success as their unofficial ambassador that they even awarded her a diplomatic passport.

what to buy: It's easy to see why Miss Perfumado ♪♪♪♪♪ (Lusafrica, 1992/Nonesuch, 1998, prod. José da Silva) is Cesaria Evora's best-selling album internationally and her third Grammy-nominated one Stateside. "Sodade" was the big hit, and deservedly so, but the political message behind "Cumpade Ciznone," the wry humor of Ramiro Mendes's "Angola," and the worldly-wise narration of "Barbincor" prove that there is more to morna and coladeira than the stereotypical infinite personal sadness.

what to buy next: The title tune for Mar Azul ♪♪♪♪ (Lusafrica/Melodie, 1991/Nonesuch, 1999, prod. José da Silva) was written by B. Leza and remains one of the most exquisite performances in Evora's repertoire. Paulino Viera's harmonica and Luis Morais's clarinet playing bring to the song echoes of smoky nights in Paris cafes, which may explain why French audiences were so receptive to her concerts and this album. The rest of the disc meets the high expectations this song raises. When Evora's album Cabo Verde ♪♪♪♪ (Lusafrica/Nonesuch, 1997, prod. José da Silva) earned her second Grammy nomination in three years, it signaled that the American record industry was taking note of her ability to sell product. Happily, the album was worth the honor and more. The personnel for the sessions is consistent with the rest of Evora's catalog, excepting jazz wizard James Carter, who contributes tenor saxophone riffs to "Coragem Irmon."

the rest:
La Diva aux Pieds Nus ♪♪♪½ (Lusafrica/Melodie, 1988)
Distino di Belita ♪♪♪½ (Lusafrica/Melodie, 1990)
Les Plus Belles Mornas de Cesaria ♪♪♪♪½ (Lusafrica/BMG France, 1994)
Cesaria Evora ♪♪♪♪ (Lusafrica, 1994/Nonesuch, 1995)
Café Atlantico N/A (BMG/RCA Victor, 1999)

worth searching for: Live albums sometimes present sonic drawbacks, but they also can capture the loving give-and-take between a gifted performer and her audience. Cesaria Evora Live à l'Olympia ♪♪♪♪ (Lusafrica/Melodie, 1996, prod. José da Silva) is well-recorded, and the song selection covers material from La Diva aux Pieds Nus through Miss Perfumado, with a few rarities tossed in.

Cesaria Evora

influences:
◀◀ Cabo Verde Show, Amália Rodrigues
▶▶ Fantcha

see also: Bana, Fantcha

Garaud MacTaggart

Chaba Fadela

Rai

Born February 5, 1962, in Algeria. Based in Paris, France.

Despite the difficulties of being a female artist in a conservative Muslim country, Chaba Fadela carved out a successful niche for herself in the early days of pop-rai. Rai (a rebellious vernacular music) had always been controversial, with the older generation of Bedouin singers, both male and female, singing improvised verses about sex, alcohol, and street life. By the late 1970s producer Rachid Baba Ahmed, who had a 24-track studio in Tlemcen, was revolutionizing the style's sound by recording with synthesizers, drum machines, and electric guitars, and adding elements of funk, reggae, dub, and eventually hip-hop to the mix. When he connected with Chaba Fadela he found the passionate voice he needed to take the music to the next level. Fadela had already become well known for her performances at clubs and weddings as a featured member of Boutaïba S'ghir's group, with a rugged and emotional style that was perfect for the rough-and-tumble songs she was singing. When Fadela cut "Ana Ma H'Lali Ennoum (I Don't Like to Sleep)" in 1979, rai hit a new level of popularity and technical excellence. Fadela became the first star of the modern rai era and brought the music to international attention when she cut "N'sel Fik (You Are Mine)," a duet with her husband Cheb Sahraoui, in 1983. "N'sel Fik" became the most popular song in the history of the genre; it was also the lead track of Rai Rebels, the 1988 EarthWorks compilation that introduced rai to the West, and was the title track of an album Fadela and Sahraoui cut for Island U.K. that same year. In the late 1980s, as political and religious violence in Algeria escalated (Rachid Baba Ahmed and another hit rai vocalist, Cheb Hasni, were eventually both gunned down for making music some considered sacrilegious), Fadela and Sahraoui fled to Paris with their children, where they have continued to perform as a duo and spread the gospel of rai.

what to buy: On You Are Mine ♪♪♪♪♪ (Mango, 1988, prod. Rachid Baba Ahmed), Ahmed, the Phil Specter of rai, compliments Fadela's dramatic vocals with serpentine keyboard lines, funky backbeats, and synth accents that give these performances a relentless rhythmic drive.

what to buy next: Ahmed's production balances the traditional and the modern on Hana Hana ♪♪♪♪♪ (Mango, 1989, prod. Rachid Baba Ahmed), making this duet album by Fadela and Sahraoui another high-water mark of pop-rai.

the rest:
(With Cheb Sahraoui) Walli ♪♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1997)
(With Cheb Sahraoui) Maních Mana ♪♪♪♪½ (Blue Silver, 1997)

influences:
◀◀ Cheikha Remitti

j. poet

Fairport Convention

English folk-rock

Formed 1967, in London, England. Disbanded 1979. Re-formed 1985. Based in the "folk-rock belt" near Banbury, Oxfordshire, England.

Primary but not complete list includes: Simon Nicol, guitar, vocals; Ashley Hutchings, bass, vocals (1967–69); Judy Dyble, recorder, autoharp, vocals (1967–68); Richard Thompson, guitar, vocals (1967–71); Iain Matthews, guitar, vocals (1967–68); Martin Lamble (died 1969), drums (1967–69); Sandy Denny (died April 21, 1978), piano, vocals (1968–69, 1974–75); Dave Swarbrick, fiddle, vocals (1969–79); Dave Mattacks, drums, keyboards (1969–74, 1985–98); Dave Pegg, bass, mandolin, vocals (1970–present); Jerry Donahue (USA), guitar, vocals (1972–75); Trevor Lucas (Australia) (died February 4, 1989), guitar, vocals (1972–75); Bruce Rowland, drums (1974–75); Martin Allcock, guitar, bouzouki, keyboards, vocals (1985–97); Ric Sanders, fiddle (1985–present); Chris Leslie, guitar, fiddle, vocals (1997–present). (All members mentioned are from England, except where otherwise noted.)

One of Fairport Convention's traditional songs, "Sir Patrick Spens," tells of a man who gets reluctantly pressed into service as a seaman and drowns. Conversely, the story of Fairport Convention is the story of a group of misfits, geniuses, and drinking buddies who manage to become a band—and stay afloat for 30 years and counting. The saga began when some London schoolboys got together at Simon Nicol's parents' house, which was called Fairport, and decided to start a band. They invited a couple of other local characters to join, including librarian Judy Dyble. The band was "discovered" when Joe Boyd, an American impresario who ran the UFO Club in London, heard them and was staggered by the skill of the teenage guitarist, Richard Thompson, on an extended solo during "East West." After the band made its first album, Dyble left and Ashley Hutchings brought in another girl singer, the folk circuit's Sandy Denny. It was Denny who brought the first folk influences to the band; she had many arrangements into which the boys were able to work themselves, and such songs as "A Sailor's Life" began making electrified appearances on Fairport set-lists. The band enjoyed modest success until a 1969 van crash killed the drummer, Martin Lamble, and left the remaining members physically and emotionally wounded. They found a new drummer, Dave Mattacks (who played jazz and knew nothing about folk music), brought in traditional fiddler Dave Swarbrick, and retired to a country house, where in a few months Liege and Lief was born.

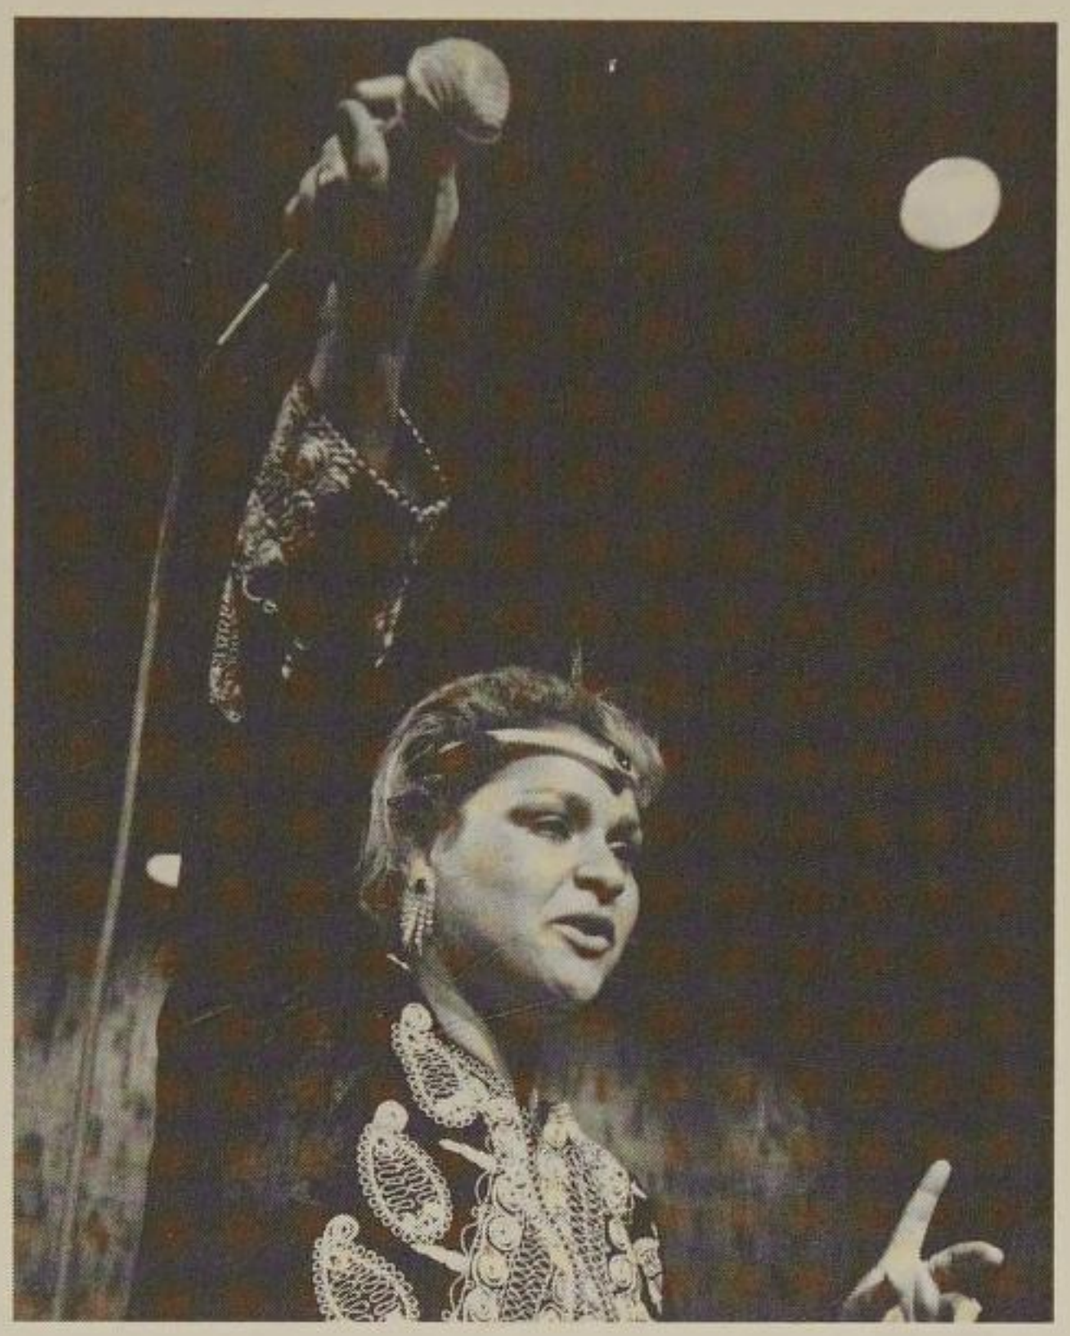
The resultant concerts were a massive success; the sound Fairport achieved on that album, strongly grounded in English traditional music, was radical and highly intriguing. However, Liege and Lief split the band. Hutchings left to delve more deeply into traditional sources, while Denny left to concentrate on songwriting. The remaining members continued on the satisfying, if highly uncommercial, folk-rock path, through various personnel changes (including Thompson's departure and Denny's return). By the end of the 1970s, Swarbrick, the only remaining early member, was nearly deaf from his electric violin. The band (which was then, and briefly, called simply "Fairport") was laid to rest. When the reunions started, a strange thing happened: the returning members found that they really enjoyed their own music. By 1985, Fairport Convention was back. The band still holds a yearly reunion at Cropredy, Oxfordshire, near the homes of many members. Numerous other outfits, including Fairport contemporaries Steeleye Span, Pentangle, and the Incredible String Band, have combined rock and folk elements with great success; in North America, Bob Dylan and the Band have followed similar muses. Few, if any, have been able to generate the long-term affection and spirit that Fairport created and sustains.

what to buy: What We Did on Our Holidays ♪♪♪♪♪ (Hannibal, 1968, prod. Joe Boyd) brings together the band's past and future. It's a microcosm of their interests, with compositions by Denny ("Fotheringay") and Thompson ("Tale in Hard Time" and "No Man's Land"); covers of Bob Dylan ("I'll Keep It with Mine") and Joni Mitchell ("Eastern Rain"); electric arrangements of traditional songs ("Nottamun Town" and "She Moved Through the Fair"); middle-of-the-road pop ("Book Song"); an instrumental (Simon Nicol's coda "End of a Holiday"); and best of all an anthem (the Thompson-penned "Meet on the Ledge") that's sung at nearly every Fairport concert. Each member is in top form, and Denny is dazzling. Liege and Lief ♪♪♪♪♪ (A&M, 1969, prod. Joe Boyd) is perhaps Fairport's most significant album, for it most fully developed the electric folk format for which the band is best known. Thompson and Swarbrick's "Crazy Man Michael" caps off the album brilliantly; it's a song for the ages. Jewel in the Crown ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1995, prod. Fairport Convention) is the best offering from Fairport's longest-lived lineup (Nicol/Pegg/Mattacks/Allcock/Sanders).



Chaba Fadela

what to buy next: House Full ♪♪♪♪♪ (Hannibal, 1986, prod. Joe Boyd, Frank Kornelussen) documents Fairport's first all-male lineup on its American tour, where the band members allegedly drank so much they ended up owing money to the venues rather than being paid. Thompson's timid vocals are touching in light of the powerhouse he's become. Swarbrick is front and center with deft fiddling and charming singing. Expletive Delighted! ♪♪♪ (Varrick, 1986) showcases the instrumental wizardry of the Nicol/Pegg/Mattacks/Allcock/Sanders lineup.

best of the rest:
Fairport Convention ♪♪♪½ (Polydor, 1968)
Unhalfbricking ♪♪♪♪♪ (Hannibal, 1969)
Full House ♪♪♪♪½ (Hannibal, 1970)
Gladys' Leap ♪♪♪½ (Varrick, 1985)
Heyday ♪♪♪♪½ (Hannibal, 1987)
Five Seasons ♪♪♪♪ (Rough Trade, 1990)
Who Knows Where the Time Goes (Green Linnet, 1998)

worth searching for: Rising for the Moon ♪♪♪♪ (Island, 1975, prod. Glyn Johns) is largely a Sandy Denny album, and it contains three of her finest compositions: "Stranger to Himself," "After Halloween," and "One More Chance." Swarbrick and Donahue provide outstanding support. The Cropredy Box ♪♪♪½ (Woodworm, 1998, prod. Dave Pegg, Simon Nicol) is essential for completists and provides a flavor of the Cropredy reunion festivals. Recorded live in 1997, the three-disc set offers a chronology of the band's development, with present and former members (including the Breton singer Dan Ar Braz) and a variety of guest performers (including an audience of 20,000 on "Danny Boy"). Fans will enjoy the unexpurgated recording of a notorious April Fool's phone prank—which results in the album's warning label: "Parental Guidance: Explicit Swarbrick." The video documentary It All Comes 'Round Again (1987, prod. Paul Kovit) tells the band's story through the late 1980s. Wonderful historical footage shows the early lineup on Top of the Pops, the highly hirsute Full House boys with "Now Be Thankful," and the Trevor Lucas–fronted band singing "Polly on the Shore." Interview sequences deftly reveal the personalities associated with the band: diffident, introspective Thompson; imperious, eloquent Hutchings; former fan Sanders; and droll Pegg, cigarette always at the ready. The documentary also includes the only video footage of Sandy Denny that is commercially available.

influences:

⏮ The Byrds, Jefferson Airplane, the Band, Bob Dylan, the Watersons

⏭ New St. George, Mad Pudding

see also: Dan Ar Braz, Ian Campbell Folk Group, Shirley Collins, Sandy Denny, Ashley Hutchings/Albion Band, A.L. Lloyd, Trevor Lucas, Ralph McTell, Steeleye Span, Dave Swarbrick, Richard Thompson

Pamela Murray Winters

Joseph Falcon & Cleoma Breaux Falcon

Cajun

Formed in Louisiana, USA.

Joseph Falcon (born September 28, 1900, in Rayne, LA, USA; died November 29, 1965, in Crowley, LA, USA), one-row diatonic accordion, drums, vocals; Cleoma Breaux Falcon (born May 27, 1906, in Crowley, LA, USA; died April 9, 1941, in Crowley, LA, USA), resonator guitar, vocals.

Joe Falcon and Cleoma Breaux went into the temporary recording studio that Columbia had set up in a downtown New Orleans hotel on April 27, 1928, and made the first commercial recordings of Cajun music. His "Allons a Lafayette" was played on Victrolas in the streets of the small prairie towns of Southwest Louisiana. Cleoma is the only Cajun woman musician who recorded in the 1920s and early '30s. The combination of her resonator guitar and his solid button accordion created a sensation, and both were excellent singers as well. Cleoma is reported to have been the creator of the most famous Cajun song, "Jolie Blonde," having taught it to her brother Amédée Breaux for his recording session.

what to buy: A compilation of remastered recordings of early Cajun music, Abbeville Breakdown ♪♪♪♪♪ (Columbia, 1990, prod. Lawrence Cohn) was released as part of Columbia Records' Roots and Blues series. This collection includes two great performances by Cleoma Breaux: "Prenez Courage," which is a rewrite of the Hawaiian standard "Aloha Oe," and the bluesy "Quand Je Suit Partis pour Texas." Joe Falcon is represented by "Poche Town" and the great unaccompanied "Aimer et Perdre." There are also excellent recordings of Cleoma's brothers, the Breaux Freres.

what to buy next: Cajun Dance Party: Fais Do Do ♪♪♪♪♪ (Columbia, 1994, prod. Lawrence Cohn) is the second release of old Cajun material in the Roots and Blues series. It has four excellent sides of Cleoma Falcon, including the extremely influential "Mon Coeur T'Appelle," which may be the best-known song among Cajuns after "Jolie Blonde." "Le Vieux Soulard et Sa Femme" was the first recording of an ancient French song about a drunk and his wife that has continued to be recast and recorded by everyone from Dewey Balfa to Boozoo Chavis.

the rest:

Live at a Cajun Dance ♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1997)

worth searching for: The LP Cleoma B. Falcon: A Cajun Music Classic ♪♪♪♪♪ (Jadfel, 1983, prod. Johnnie Allen) brings together many of the important records that Cleoma Falcon recorded with Joe Falcon. Listen to her growl through "Leve Tes Fenetreas Haut" sounding like a Cajun Bessie Smith, or her own "Crowley Waltz," written after almost drowning in the Hudson River. Powerful music from a pioneer woman musician.

influences:

⏮ Dennis McGee, Leo Soileau

⏭ Michael Doucet, Iry LeJeune, Mark and Ann Savoy, the Magnolia Sisters

Jared Snyder

Fania All-Stars

See: Johnny Pacheco, Larry Harlow

Fantcha

Morna, coladeira

Born Francelina Durão Almeida October 14, 1965 in Mindelo, Sao Vicente, Cape Verde. Based in New York, NY, USA.

Fantcha was born in the neighborhood of Mindelo called Laginha, which is also home base for superstar Cesaria Evora. Her family was musical and as a child she began singing with her brothers, who played homemade guitar and cavaquinho (a ukulele-like instrument). Her father had deserted the family, so she was working by the age of 10, when she was invited to join the Flores de Mindelo Carnival company. As in Brazil, Carnival is an important social event; companies often practice all year for their Carnival performances. Ti Goi (Gregorio Goncalves), a well-known Verdean composer, was the musical director of Flores de Mindelo and recognized Fantcha's talent. He provided free singing lessons to encourage her. A few years later, he introduced Fantcha to Cesaria Evora. Evora invited the younger singer to visit her home, where she learned much about style and technique. When a club named The Piano Bar opened in Laginha, it became a favorite hangout for Evora and one night she invited Fantcha to open a show for her. This experience made Fantcha even more determined to become a singer. In 1988 she traveled to Lisbon to record with Bana, who was also the first producer to record Evora, but when the album came out Bana retained all the rights to it; Fantcha made nothing. Soon after that, Evora invited Fantcha to open for her again, on a tour of Holland and France; Jose da Silva, Evora's manager and head of her record label, invited Fantcha to continue the pairing on a further tour of the USA. Fantcha decided that the large Cape Verdean community in America offered her the best opportunities, and she settled in New York City. Her 1998 debut, Criolinha, was widely praised by critics in America, Europe, and Cape Verde, and her future as an important artist seems assured.

what's available: Criolinha ♪♪♪♪½ (Tinder, 1998, prod. Bau) was produced by Cesaria Evora's musical director, and his arrangements add a sparkling polish to the recording. Fantcha tends to favor coladeiras, tunes with a bouncy, calypso-like rhythm, but she also tries her hand at a couple of mornas, and when her tear-soaked vocals wash over you, it's easy to see why her earnest soulfulness captured Evora's attention.

influences:
⏮ Cesaria Evora, Bana
see also: Bana, Cesaria Evora

j. poet

Farafina

African traditional and contemporary

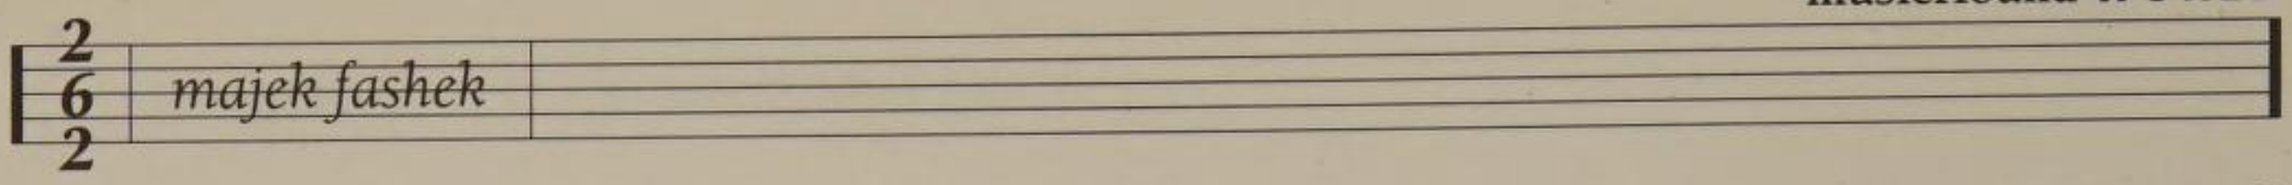
Formed 1978, in Bobo-Dioulasso, Burkina Faso (formerly Upper Volta). Based in Burkina Faso.

Mahama Konaté, balafon (xylophone), vocals (1978–93); Paco Yé Adama, djembé (goblet drum), drums, vocals (1987–93); Soungalo Coulibaly, flute, maracas, drums, vocals (1987–present); Tiawara Keita, tama ("talking drum"), soukou (violin), doudoum'ni, kora (1987–98); Seydou Ouattara, bara (calabash) (1987–93); Yaya Ouattara, djembé, vocals (1993–present); Beh Palm, bara (1987–98); Baba Diarra, balafon, doudoum'ba (bass drum) (1987–present); Souleyname Sanou, dance, maracas, doudoum'ni, doudoum'ba, vocals (1987–present); Bakari Traoré, balafon, kora, bara, vocals (1993–98); Seydou Zon, soukou, vocals (1993–98); Mamadou Diabate, kora, vocals (1998–present); Harunna Koita, keyboards, vocals (1998–present); Dedougou Dambele, tama, kenke'ni, bara (1998–present); Salif Kone, balafon, djembé, bara (1998–present). (All members are from Burkina Faso.)

Playing in the tradition of the ensembles that backed the griots (oral historians) in West Africa for centuries, Farafina is a polyrhythmic percussion outfit that builds its pulsating sound with a pair of balafons (xylophones) and a variety of drums and shakers. Formed in 1978 by Mahama Konaté, Farafina's members come from Bobo-Dioulasso, the musical center of southern Burkina Faso. The group had already toured quite a bit in Europe before their first recorded work—Flash of the Spirit, a collaboration with trumpeter John Hassell—was released in 1988. Shortly after, they recorded their first album on their own, Bolomakoté. Between occasional follow-ups, Farafina has continued to tour extensively and, in the experimental spirit that informs their work along with the traditional one, to contribute to such atypical projects as Ryuichi Sakamoto's Beauty and the Rolling Stones' Steel Wheels.

what to buy: Ironically, Farafina's first recording represented a radical departure from their basic sound. Flash of the Spirit ♪♪♪♪♪ (Intuition, 1988/1995, prod. Daniel Lanois, Brian Eno, John Hassell) builds a compelling "ambient" atmosphere that is subdued yet invigorating. Made in collaboration with avant-garde composer and horn player Hassell, the disc finds Farafina creating a backdrop for his processed trumpet explorations, while electronic pioneer Brian Eno builds a shimmering soundscape using the group's rhythms as a palette. Farafina's first album alone, Bolomakoté ♪♪♪♪♪ (Intuition, 1988, prod. Michael Schaer, Paco Yé Adama, Vera Brandes), captures the thundering strength of their music, with visceral and complex interlocking rhythms and percussive melody pounded out on the balafons. This is nowhere better captured than on "Patron Mousso," an instrumental with showcase solos that moves with incredible speed and intensity.

what to buy next: Faso Denou ♪♪♪♪ (RealWorld, 1993, prod. Bill Cobham, Daniel Lanois, Heinz Dill) is a bit more relaxed and subdued than Bolomakoté. On Nemako ♪♪♪½ (Intuition, 1998, prod. Michael Schaer, Thierry van Roy), the group moves into a pop context, adding electronic keyboards, guitar, and bass. While the drumming still shows plenty of vigor and style, the addition of elements from outside the band's accustomed arena really does not add much to the overall effect.



influences:
African drumming tradition

see also: Brian Eno, Ryuichi Sakamoto

Jeffrey Muhr

Majek Fashek

African reggae

Born Majekodunmi Fasheke in Benin City, Nigeria. Based in Lagos, Nigeria.

Many African artists have taken reggae's message of unity and spiritual revolution to heart. The work of Bob Marley in particular has become a touchstone for those wishing to send a clear message to the powers that be; many Africans see reggae as a link in a worldwide chain joining the people of the African Diaspora. Nigeria's Majekodunmi Fasheke, known to his fans as Majek Fashek, took up Marley's challenge to become one of Africa's most popular reggae singer-songwriters. Fashek's mother said her son was "born with rhythm." After graduating from college, he formed his first band Jah Stix, but it was Fashek's charisma that brought in the crowds. In 1988 he became a "solo" performer and put together a backing group called Prisoners of Conscience, modeled on the Wailers; in concert the band's six percussionists add multi-layered Pan-African accents to the music, dropping bits of juju, highlife, and zouk to the basic reggae beat. "In Nigeria we call this music kpangolo music, not reggae," Fashek said in a recent interview. "It's similar to a rhythm children beat out on tin cans in Nigeria, so I consider it African music." In 1989 Fashek's solo debut, Prisoner of Conscience, won the Nigerian version of the Grammys for Best Reggae Artist, Best Artist, Best LP, and Best Musical Track. The album has sold more than 250,000 copies in Nigeria and two singles from it, "Send Down the Rain" and a cover of Bob Marley's "Redemption Song," stayed in the Top 10 for more than a year. According to legend (and press kit), Fashek ended a year-long drought in Nigeria when he performed "Send Down the Rain" at a benefit for struggling farmers and brought forth a thundering rainstorm. Since his debut, Fashek has recorded two more albums, Spirit of Love (which he calls "a mix of reggae and African rock 'n' roll") and Rainmaker (which has a slight hip-hop influence).

what to buy: Spirit of Love ♪♪♪♪½ (Interscope, 1991, prod. Little Steven) was recorded in New York and Los Angeles, perhaps with visions that Fashek could replace Marley in the hearts of the record-buying public. The band is solid, with sharp horn arrangements and killer drumming that mix the best of Jamaica and Nigeria. Fashek's Marleyisms have never sounded better, and Little Steven supplies an unobtrusive rock 'n' roll polish. Prisoner of Conscience ♪♪♪♪ (Mango, 1989, prod. Lemmy Jackson) is reggae inna African stylee, with plenty of percussion accents that underscore the African origins of the familiar reggae one-drop riddims; a landmark set.

the rest:
Rainmaker ♪♪♪½ (Tuff Gong, 1991)

worth searching for: I and I Experience ♪♪♪♪ (CBS, 1990), recorded between American record deals, is widely considered one of his best. Look for it on cassette in specialty record shops if you visit the continent.

influences:
Bob Marley, Sonny Okosun, Lucky Dube

j. poet

Fatala

See: Alpha Yaya Diallo

John Faulkner

Irish traditional

Born 1943, in Oxford, England. Based in Kinvara, County Galway, Ireland.

John Faulkner might be best known as the musical partner of Irish singer Dolores Keane, but he is a formidable musician in his own right whose talent is vastly underrated. In the 1960s Faulkner was a member of Scottish folksinger Ewan MacColl's Critics Group, with whom he toured extensively (as he also did with Irish group De Dannan, formerly known as De Danann, and with Keane, to whom he was also married for some time). The multi-talented Faulkner is a master of stringed instruments (including the guitar, Irish bouzouki, and fiddle), and plays a wide array of others as well, including the hurdy-gurdy. While still quite active in Irish music circles, his main work consists of composition and production for both the record industry and for film and television through his Kinvara-based studio, Absolute Music.

what to buy: The fine recording Kind Providence ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1986, prod. John Faulkner) displays Faulkner's multi-instrumental skills as he plays everything on the album, including bouzouki, guitar, fiddle, and hurdy-gurdy. His lovely voice is also featured on this inspired collection of songs from the British Isles and beyond.

what to buy next: Nomads ♪♪♪½ (Clo-Iar Connachta, 1992, prod. John Faulkner) is on a wonderful Irish label known for its great recordings of sean-nós ("old-style") Gaelic song. Half of the recording is a concept album concerning the infamous Highland Clearances of Scotland (forced evacuations of peasantry by landowners in the 18th and 19th centuries that led to mass emigration). Brokenhearted I'll Wander ♪♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1979, prod. P.J. Curtis) and Farewell to Eirinn ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1981, prod. John Faulkner, Dolores Keane, Seumas O'Neill, Carsten Linde) are two of the best recordings from the fruitful musical partnership of Keane and Faulkner. On Brokenhearted I'll Wander they are joined by fiddler Kieran Crehan and piper Éamonn Curran for an excellent collection of songs and instrumentals. Farewell to Eirinn is another remarkable set dealing specifically with the subject of Irish emigration to America.

pura fé

Ulali

the rest:
Solid Ground ♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1993)
Sail Og Rua ♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1995)

worth searching for: Faulkner's work in television led to his involvement with the two-part 1975 documentary Passage West, a joint BBC and CBC television production. It examines the endless wave of emigration from the British Isles to North America in the 19th century, and Faulkner's music is featured prominently.

influences:
⏮ Joe Heaney, Tommy Peoples, Mairtin Byrnes, Willie Clancy, Ewan MacColl

⏭ Sean Keane

see also: De Dannan, Dolores Keane, Ewan MacColl

Cliff McGann

Pura Fé /Ulali

Native American vocal

Pura Fé born in USA. Ulali formed in North Carolina, USA. Based in North Carolina, USA.

Pura Fé (Tuscarora/Cherokee), vocals; Soni Moreno-Primeau (Aztec/Maya), vocals; Jennifer Kreisberg (Tuscarora/Cherokee), vocals.

Pura Fé is Native American, a member of the Tuscarora and Cherokee tribes of the southeastern United States. She comes from a family of singers, with her grandmother singing gospel and her mother and sister performing opera. Politically, she's been active on Native American and women's issues. She appears often to lend her music and that of her group, Ulali, to conferences and festivals. The three women of Ulali share Native American background as well as wide experience in the arts. Fé is a dancer who has studied with Martha Graham, Moreno-Primeau has acted on Broadway, and Kreisberg has studied music at Hartford College.

what's available: Caution to the Wind ♪♪ (Shanachie, 1995, prod. James McBride, Danny Weiss, Gerard Harris) is Pura Fé's first solo disc. She's got an expressive voice, and one of her interests is incorporating the connections among jazz, blues, and African American music with her Native background. Musically, she does this successfully, but lyrically her songs on this disc don't succeed, reaching neither the bluesy sincerity of Rita Coolidge's work or the insightful cultural intertwining of Tish Hinojosa's pop songs. She's forging her own path, not following either of these artists, but she has not yet found the way to make her original statement of roots connect in the pop genre as they have. With Ulali, Fé's work, while often fusing elements of other musics, is usually more strongly Native-focused. She writes many of the songs the group performs, and they frequently appear on soundtracks such as Smoke Signals ♪♪♪ (TVT, 1998, prod. Beth Rosenblatt) and in compilations such as Smithsonian Folkways' Heartbeat: Voices of First Nations Women (reviewed in this book's Compilations section). Their albums include two 1997 self-produced releases, Mahk Jchi and Lessons from the Animal People. A highly regarded performance was also captured on the cassette Ladies Choice by the American Indian Community House of New York.

influences:
◀◀ Rita Coolidge

see also: Robbie Robertson

Kerry Dexter

Jose Feliciano

Latin pop

Born September 10, 1945, in Lares, Puerto Rico. Based in USA.

Blind at birth from congenital glaucoma, Feliciano became a pop sensation in the late 1960s. Moving easily between flamenco, soul, jazz, and softer pop, between English-language and Spanish-language recording, Feliciano has been a notable performer for more than three decades. Born in Puerto Rico, Feliciano came with his family to Spanish Harlem in the early '50s. His first "instrument" was a tin cracker can which he used to back up his also-musical uncle. A prodigy, Feliciano taught himself to play the concertina at age six and effortlessly moved on to accordion and guitar soon afterward. When he first heard rock 'n' roll, he was inspired to add singing to his talents. To help support the family, Feliciano quit school at age 17 and spent the remainder of his teenage years busking at the same Greenwich Village coffeehouses that produced Bob Dylan. After an appearance at the Newport Jazz Festival, he released a pair of albums that showcased his supple vocals and flamenco-influenced fretwork—The Voice and Guitar of Jose Feliciano and The Fantastic Feliciano —and then a set of Spanish-language LPs. But Feliciano's name first loomed truly large in 1968, when his cover of the Doors' "Light My Fire" hit #1, and his stylized version of the national anthem at the World Series in Detroit stirred controversy. The following year, his "Light My Fire" seemed to be everywhere, and Feliciano was everywhere else, releasing three new albums, charting with a cover of Tommy Tucker's "Hi Heeled Sneakers," and netting a Grammy for Best New Artist.

Continuing to release English- and Spanish-language albums, Feliciano recorded the holiday standard "Feliz Navidad," hit the charts occasionally (most notably with the theme song to the Freddie Prinze sitcom Chico and the Man), and guested on records by performers as diverse as Michael Nesmith, Joni Mitchell, Minnie Riperton, and John Lennon. Then, in 1998, Feliciano enjoyed an echo of his heyday, seeing his album Senor Bolero go platinum and its first single, "Me Has Echado Al Olvido," hit #1 in New York. An overdue resurgence in a career that's far from over, these honors merely contributed to the stats on Feliciano's 40+ gold and platinum records, 16 Grammy nominations (most recently, in fact, for Senor Bolero), six Grammys, and five-time placement as Guitar Player magazine's annual Best Pop Guitarist. The only artist to win Grammys in two languages and an icon to culture-crossing successors like Ricky Martin, Feliciano has a PBS special, a documentary, an instructional guitar video, a line of custom-made Jose Feliciano Model guitars, and the first Jose Feliciano's restaurant (in Las Vegas) in the works. Still, the majority of his more than 50 albums are out of print, leaving mostly greatest-hits collections readily available—but there's a lot to fill them with, and material for more no doubt on the way.

what to buy: Feliciano! ♪♪♪♪½ (RCA, 1968, prod. Rick Jarrard) is the album that took the nation by storm, proving that Feliciano's Latin-jazz take on pop standards (including "Light My Fire," "California Dreaming," "Don't Let the Sun Catch You Crying," and a pair of Beatles songs) had mass-market appeal.

what to buy next: Souled ♪♪♪♪ (RCA, 1969) is almost the equal of its illustrious predecessor, with a smash cover of Tommy Tucker's "Hi Heeled Sneakers" (which Feliciano had originally recorded on his 1964 debut) and a jaunty take on Bob Dylan's "I'll Be Your Baby Tonight." . . . On Second Thought ♪♪♪½ (32 Records, 1996) is a greatest-hits collection with a twist—rather than simply compiling Feliciano's biggest and best, it includes rerecordings of 25 of his best-known songs.

what to avoid: Escenas De Amor ♪♪ (Motown, 1982) is typical of Feliciano's lesser '80s work—it's soft Latin pop, overtly romantic, with none of the strength and power of his best albums.

best of the rest:

El Sentimiento, La Voz Y La Guitarra ♪♪♪½ (RCA, 1967/RCA International, 1991)
The Christmas Album ♪♪♪♪ (RCA, 1970)
Tu Inmenso Amor ♪♪♪ (EMI, 1987/EMI Capitol, 1996)
All Time Greatest Hits ♪♪♪ (BMG/RCA, 1988)
Light My Fire ♪♪♪♪½ (BMG/RCA, 1992)
Mis Mejores Canciones—17 Super ♪♪♪½ (EMD/EMI Latin, 1993)
Americano ♪♪♪♪ (PGD/Rodven, 1996)
Exitos Y Recuerdos (EMI Special Products, 1996)
Passion of Feliciano ♪♪♪ (BMG, 1997)
Senor Bolero ♪♪♪♪ (BMG/U.S. Latin, 1998)
El Amor De Mi Vida—Masterpieces ♪♪♪ (Fuel 2000, 1998)

worth searching for: Joni Mitchell's Court and Spark ♪♪♪♪♪ (Asylum, 1974, prod. Joni Mitchell) is one of the folk singer's finest albums, and her best-selling effort. It also has a raft of guest stars, including Robbie Robertson, David Crosby, Joe Sample, and Felicano, who contributes electric guitar.

influences:

⏮ Carlos Puebla, the Beatles, Bob Dylan, Tito Puente, João Gilberto, Laurindo Almeida

⏭ War, Santana, Gloria Estefan, Ricky Martin, any other Latino act of the last several decades

Ben Greenman, Christina Fuoco, and Stephen Vilnius

Fernhill

Contemporary Anglo-Celtic folk

Formed 1996, in Wales. Based in Wales.

Julie Murphy (England), vocals; Andy Cutting (England), button accordions; Ceri Rhys Matthews (Wales), guitar, clarinet; Jonathan Shorland (Wales), pastoral oboes, flutes, whistle, clarinets, bagpipe.

Though only together for a short time as yet, Fernhill have already made quite a splash. Not only is their musicianship impeccable, but their mix of Welsh, English, French, and Breton (French Celtic) influences is exceptional. They've recorded two full-length CDs and toured in England and Wales—and, more excitingly from the 21st century fusion standpoint, in Norway, East Africa, and Southern Africa. On their 1996 visit, Fernhill collaborated with native musicians in Uganda; in 1998 they played in Swaziland and Mozambique. The busy members of Fernhill are also involved with several side projects—vocalist Murphy is working on a solo CD featuring duets with Martin Simpson (guitar), Nigel Eaton (hurdy-gurdy), and fellow Fernhillians Cutting and Matthews; Matthews and Shorland have recorded two albums of Welsh pipe music; and Cutting has recorded with the Two Duos Quartet and is working on a solo album.

what's available: Ca'nos ♪♪♪♪½ ("Night Field") (Beautiful Jo, 1996, prod. Tim Healey, Fernhill) shows how dynamic and rich a native american pop

Native American music has experienced phenomenal growth in the past decade, due in part to a tribal population boom, and in part to mainstream interest in traditional flute music sparked by the new-age crossover of R. Carlos Nakai, Kevin Locke, and Robert Mirabal.

The first Native American recordings were made in the early part of the 20th century, as folklorists began using Thomas Edison's invention to document the music of "primitive" people for the general society. Native musicians themselves saw the new media's potential for cultural bonding, and began making recordings aimed at Native listeners. There have long been Native artists in the mainstream—jazzman Don Cherry was half Cherokee, as was Jimi Hendrix, and the Band's Robbie Robertson is Mohawk—but they usually worked within the confines of what Nakai ironically calls "the greater culture." Today Native people are visible in every aspect of the music business, making music that's distinctly Indian.

Walela (Rita Coolidge, Priscilla Coolidge, and Lisa Satterfield), Sharon Burch, and Joanne Shenandoah combine Native, rock, and folk influences in a way that makes traditional Native sounds more accessible to non-Native ears. Joy Harjo, a saxophonist, best-selling poet, and professor at the University of New Mexico, has created a style that could easily fit onto the playlists of lite-jazz, Native, worldbeat, and Americana broadcasts. Casper Loma-Da-Wa (a.k.a. Lomayesva), a Hopi from Arizona, sings in a Jamaican patois as thick as a jungle vine and mercilessly indicts Babylon for its sins with a powerful combination of roots reggae, dancehall skanking, and Native chanting. There are also Native rappers like Litefoot and Robbie Bee; rockers like Kashtin, an Innuit duo that sounds a bit like R.E.M.; singer-songwriters like Jay Begaye and A. Paul Ortega; and ritual peyote ceremony singers like Primeaux & Mike. With today's music buyers' expanding interest in inter-cultural exchange, the time is right for Native artists to finally start getting the respect, and commercial recognition, they deserve.

j. poet

purely acoustic recording can be. Cutting's accordion and Shortland's woodwinds interweave brilliantly on the instrumental passages while Matthews's guitar provides rhythmic accents. And Murphy has an incredible voice; she fits in with the players as easily on fast numbers as slow ones, and sounds great singing in Welsh, English, French, or Breton. She also brings a jazzy exuberance to many of the faster songs. But on Fernhill's second CD Llatai ♪♪♪♪♪ (Beautiful Jo, 1998, prod. Fernhill) Murphy really wails, particularly on "Pontypridd." The Breton influence has also become more fully integrated into the total Fernhill sound; several tracks mix Breton dance rhythms with Welsh lyrics and melodies for a surprisingly good fit. "Gladez and Katell," an original composition by Shorland, is purely instrumental and serves mostly as an accordion/clarinet duet until guitar joins in for a little added rhythmic pulse. Llatai also includes a version of the English ballad "Blacksmith" that's quite distinct from the well-known Steeleye Span arrangement. Fernhill take the song a lot slower, and the acoustic setting (accordion, guitar, flute) creates a completely different, more reflective mood.

influences:

◀◀ Sandy Denny, Maddy Prior, Blowzabella, Alan Stivell

▶▶ Tanteeka

Ken Roseman

Filé

Cajun

Formed 1983, in Lafayette, LA, USA. Based in Lafayette, LA, USA.

Members have included: Ward Lormand, accordion, vocals; David Egan, piano, vocals; D'Jalma Garnier, fiddle, guitar, banjo, vocals; Kevin Shearin, bass; Peter Stevens, drums. (All members are from USA.)

The waltzes and two-steps of southwest Louisiana's Cajun music are given a modern twist by accordionist and lead vocalist Ward Lormand and his band Filé. While its roots are in the same squeezebox-and-fiddle tradition as the Balfa Brothers and Beausoleil, the group has incorporated elements of rock, R&B, and New Orleans jazz. Its best-known tune remains the 1989 Cajun-ized interpretation of Richard Thompson's "Two Left Feet." Lormand, who grew up in Ossun, a small French-speaking town northwest of Lafayette, and bassist Kevin Shearin, a native of New York State, formed Filé shortly after leaving the Cajun-rock band Cush-Cush in 1983. Filé's debut album was literally a live one—Live at Mulate's, recorded during a performance at the Cajun nightclub. The expressive fiddling of Minnesota-born D'Jalma Garnier, a former student of Cajun fiddler Canray Fontenot, has been an important part of Filé's sound since the early 1990s, and the band continues to be anchored by drummer Peter Stevens, who joined in 1984, and pianist David Egan, a member since 1991.

what to buy: The title track of 2 Left Feet ♪♪♪ (Flying Fish, 1989, prod. Eugene Foster, Filé) is a Cajun-polka treatment of Richard Thompson's tune and remains Filé's claim to fame.

what to buy next: Filé's latest effort, La Vie Marron ♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1996), was dedicated to the memory of Cajun fiddler Canray Fontenot, who not only inspired the band in general, but taught the idiosyncrasies of Cajun music to Filé's Garnier.

the rest:

Cajun Dance Band ♪♪♪ (Flying Fish, 1987)

influences:

◀◀ Beausoleil, the Balfa Brothers, Richard Thompson

▶▶ Wayne Toups & ZydeCajun, the Basin Brothers

see also: Balfa Brothers, Beausoleil, Canray Fontenot

Craig Harris

Film Orchestra of Shanghai /Film Symphony Orchestra

Chinese orchestral music, Buddhist music, Taoist music, Chinese healing music

Formed in Shanghai, China. Based in Shanghai, China.

Chen Da-Wei, producer; other musicians uncredited.

Working as the senior composer of the Film Symphony Orchestra, Chen Da-Wei has written music for movies, television, and dozens of recordings. Among his works, The Flying Fairy and The Great River Flows to the East were awarded the second and third prizes respectively in the 1984 National Music Contest in China. Members of the Film Orchestra of Shanghai (a name used interchangeably with the outfit's other one) also perform in the Shanghai Chinese Traditional Orchestra.

what to buy: The Film Symphony Orchestra is perhaps best known for its Buddhist Series, in which it performs what is known as "Sanskrit music," a form of Indian sacred chant accompanied by simple ceremonial instruments to glorify and eulogize Buddha and Bodhisattvas. In this vein, The Sound of Bell Emitted in the Evening from an Ancient Temple ♪♪♪♪♪ (Wind Records, 1991, prod. Chen Da-Wei) won the Mainland China Ethnic Music Award in 1991. The music itself is of utmost tranquillity, uplifting mind and spirit. After being introduced to and accepted by the Chinese, these Buddhist forms made much impact on Chinese traditional music.

what to buy next: The Film Orchestra of Shanghai as led by Mr. Chen has also recorded several albums of Chinese Taoist music; this is best exemplified by Three Purities ♪♪♪♪ (Wind Records, prod. Chen Da-Wei). Taoist music is strongly influenced by regional folk music, and serves an important role in ceremonial rituals. The function of Taoist music is to stimulate sympathy and pity from the myriad gods and heavenly rulers through the playing of bells, sonorous stones, drums, pipes, string instruments, and wooden temple blocks carved in the shapes of fishes. In the six-volume Therapeutic Music series, Mr. Chen was influenced by the famous Yellow Emperor's Classic of Internal Medicine; written between the first and third centuries B.C., it is the earliest tome to recommend healing of ailments through music, thus forming the basis for all sound-healing work now gaining popularity in the West. An Dun/Calming the Emotions ♪♪♪♪½ (Wind Records, 1991, prod. Chen Da-Wei) is an excellent example of the potent effect music has on the subtle energies of the human body.

the rest:

Jing Zhe/Awakening Insects—Spring ♪♪♪ (Wind Records)
Mang Zhong/Beard of Wheat—Summer ♪♪♪ (Wind Records)
Bai Lu/Frosty Dew—Autumn ♪♪♪ (Wind Records)
Da Xue/Great Snow—Winter ♪♪♪ (Wind Records)
Sheng Hua/Invigorating the Spirit ♪♪♪ (Wind Records)
The Jeweled Hall of Great Hero ♪♪♪♪ (Wind Records)
The Verse of Repentance ♪♪♪♪ (Wind Records)
Bowing and Making Vow Through Reciting the Name of Buddha ♪♪♪♪½ (Wind Records) Welcoming Guests from Heaven ♪♪♪♪½ (Wind Records)

influences:

◀◀ Buddha, Yellow Emperor

▶▶ Shanghai Sanskrit Orchestra, Shanghai Sanskrit Chorus

PJ Birosik

Alec Finn

Irish traditional

Born in Yorkshire, England. Based in Spiddal, County Galway, Ireland.

A long-time resident of Ireland's west coast, Yorkshire-born Finn moved to Dublin in the early '60s, where he became involved in that city's vibrant blues scene. Upon moving to Spiddal in County Galway, Finn began to play the Greek bouzouki at local traditional Irish sessions. Out of these informal sets grew the nucleus of the seminal Irish band De Dannan, formerly known as De Danann, which also included Frankie Gavin, one of Ireland's most talented fiddlers. Gavin and Finn have been and remain the nucleus of a band that has seen its fair share of personnel changes over the years, including a host of great female vocalists like Dolores Keane, Mary Black, Maura O'Connell, and Eleanor Shanley. Finn's innovative use of the Greek bouzouki within De Dannan has influenced a whole generation of young accompanists, and helped bring widespread acceptance of the instrument within the tradition. Over the years he has also recorded with a lengthy who's who of Ireland's finest traditional musicians.

what to buy: De Dannan's Mist Covered Mountain ♪♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1980) is the band's earliest recording still in print, and demonstrates the instrumental prowess of Gavin, Charlie Piggot, and accordionist Jackie Daly, all backed by Finn's subtle bouzouki. Frankie Gavin & Alec Finn ♪♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1994, prod. Richard Nevins, Daniel Micheal Collins) was Gavin's first recording outside of De Dannan, and was recorded in Greenwich Village while the band was on a U.S. tour. Like much of Shanachie's Masters of Irish Music series this CD reissue, originally recorded in 1977, isn't up to today's sound standards, and the length is a paltry 31 minutes. Despite that, Gavin's fiddling is brilliant and Finn's trademark bouzouki accompaniment is represented in all its glory. Feadóga Stáin ♪♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1992, prod. Michéal Ó Héidhin) is the debut solo recording by Ireland's first lady of the tin whistle, Mary Bergin. It features some of Finn's finest work as an accompanist and that, factored in with Bergin's brilliance on her instrument, makes this one of the seminal works in Irish traditional music.

what to buy next: Blue Shamrock ♪♪♪½ (Celtic Heartbeat, 1994, prod. John Faulkner, Alec Finn) is Finn's 1994 solo debut, and a beautifully evocative collection of 10 traditional Irish airs played on guitar and bouzouki. While enjoyable for its lush arrangements and new-age sensibility, it does not stylistically typify the superb work Finn has done as a member of De Dannan or as the accompanist for Bergin, Gavin, and others.

influences:

◀◀ Planxty, Johnny Moynihan

▶▶ Niall Ó Callanáin, Ciaran Curran, Roger Landes, Robin Bullock

see also: Mary Bergin, Mary Black, Jackie Daly, De Dannan, Frankie Gavin, Dolores Keane, Maura O'Connell

Cliff McGann

Firewater

Indie rock, klezmer

Formed 1995, in New York, NY, USA. Based in New York, NY, USA.

Tod Ashley, vocals; Duane Denison, guitar; Yuval Gabay, drums; Kurt Hoffman, saxophone, accordion; Jennifer Charles, vocals; Jim Kimball, drums; Dave Ouimet, piano; Hahn Rowe, violin. (All members are from USA.)

Firewater stands out from the alternative pack by its use of world music, dabbling just enough to open the ears of a rock audience without alienating them. The fusion is often seamless, with styles from klezmer to tango well adapted to the indie genre. Firewater is overflowing with alt.rock alumni—from Jesus Lizard, Soul Coughing, Jon Spencer Blues Explosion, Mule, Laughing Hyenas, Hugo Largo, and Foetus—who seem to be having a lot of fun exploring styles other than rock. Frontman "Tod A." from Cop Shoot Cop sings in a hoarse and boozy rasp on most tracks; imagine the Pogues' Shane MacGowan interpreting the Nirvana songbook. A.'s vivid metaphors evoke a seedy underworld populated by desperate, lonely characters; "going down like a pederast in a boy's school," "creeping like a spy on broken glass," you get the idea. And the musical idea is quite general indeed, with a mix of American gospel and Celtic jig on "Knock 'Em Down," a German-style brass band on "El Borracho," and the adaptation of a Soft Cell electrobeat (!) on "So Long Superman," while "Another Perfect Catastrophe" envisages a klezmer band tangoing around A.'s invitation to a life of crime. Hopefully, as the post-grunge audience grows older, its curiosity will be sated by more ensembles as eclectic and accessible as Firewater.

what's available: Its debut Get off the Cross (We Need the Wood for the Fire) ♪♪♪½ (Jet Set, 1996, prod. Doug Henderson, Tod A.) is more straight-ahead indie rock with a Celtic flavor. The follow-up The Ponzi Scheme ♪♪♪♪ (Cherry/Universal Records, 1998, prod. Doug Henderson, Tod A.) draws on wider-ranging influences. From the opening saxophone of "Ponzi's Theme" you're into a klezmer take on James Bond.

influences:

◀◀ The Pogues, Oyster Band, Klezmatics, Talking Heads, Soft Cell, Nirvana

David Poole

Archie Fisher

Scottish folk

Born in Glasgow, Scotland. Based in Scotland.

The product of a musical household, Archie Fisher has become one of the seminal figures of the Scottish folk revival. He was born in Glasgow, to a Gaelic-speaking mother and a police inspector father, both of whom sang all the time. He has seven sisters, who acted, he says, as "a catchment area for fellow musicians," but also as an audience and as singing partners. During the early 1960s, Archie and his sister Ray spent some time in a skiffle band before recording their first sides of Scottish music in 1963. They were joined by their parents and sisters on a 1965 release credited to "The Fisher Family." When Ray married and moved away, Archie began to establish himself as a top songwriter, guitarist, and vocalist. By the late 1960s, he had made many appearances on television shows, including the popular Here and Now, and on BBC Schools Radio, where his original songs were used as illustrations of themes of industrialization. Many of his compositions became part of the Scottish folk repertoire through these appearances. During the 1970s he toured with Irish performers Tommy Makem and Liam Clancy, and arranged and produced several of their albums. During the 1980s, he toured and recorded as a duo with Canadian singer and instrumentalist Garnet Rogers. In addition to his career as a performer, Fisher has been an important organizer and presenter of traditional music. From 1988 to 1992 he directed the Edinburgh Folk Festival. He produced radio features and documentaries for BBC Radio Tweed in southern Scotland, and eventually launched the BBC show Traveling Folk, which he has hosted for more than a decade.

what to buy: Sunsets I've Galloped Into ♪♪♪♪ (Red House, 1988, prod. Garnet Rogers) is a collection of recently written songs, some from Fisher's pen and some from others'. Fisher's own pieces include "The Shipyard Apprentice," a song he wrote during the 1970s, and "The Black Horse," a recitation, or, as he puts it, a "song without a melody." Songs by others include Graham Miles's "Yonder Banks," Kieran Goss's "All That You Ask Me," and Stewart MacGregor's "The Presence," all fine tunes that sound great in Fisher's smooth baritone. A few traditional songs round out the package. The sound is fuller and more produced than on Fisher's previous albums, owing to the presence of piano, bass, and synthesizers as well as guitars, flute, and fiddle, played by accompanists Garnet Rogers and David Woodhead.

what to buy next: The landmark LP The Man with a Rhyme ♪♪♪♪♪ (Folk-Legacy, 1977/1997, prod. Sandy Paton) has recently been reissued on CD. It features mostly traditional songs and a few new ones written in the traditional mold. It contains Fisher's classics "The Witch of the West-Mer-Lands" and "Dark-Eyed Molly," which were made famous in folk circles by Stan Rogers. Among the traditional songs, "The Wounded Whale," which Fisher put together from versions noted in whalers' logbooks, is particularly interesting, as are the two Jacobite songs "Twa Bonnie Maidens" and "Welcome Royal Charlie." The love song "Helen of Kirkconnell Lea" was recorded at the original sessions but did not fit on the LP version; it is included here as a bonus track. In addition to his own guitar, Fisher is accompanied by the Ladies of the Lake: Wendy Grossman (concertina, banjo, dulcimer), Kathy Westra (cello), Lani Herrmann (fiddle), Ann Mayo Muir (flute), and Lorraine Lee (dulcimer). Fisher's Topic LP from 1976, Will Ye Gang, Love ♪♪♪½ (Topic, 1976/Green Linnet, 1993, prod. Tony Engle, Tony Russell), has been reissued in the Green Linnet Celtic Classics series. It too features Fisher's gentle voice and guitar performing traditional songs of various types as well as songs he wrote himself. Among the former, one song was learned from Jeannie Robertson, but most seem to have drawn on the great collections of Gavin Greig and Dean Christie. An especially interesting one is a work song once sung by oyster-dredgers, the lyrics of which are obtuse but beautiful. Among the originals, "Lindsay" is one of Fisher's best-known "traditionalesque" numbers, while "Men O' Worth" deals with the contemporary problems of the shift from a farming and fishing economy to an industrial one in Northeast Scotland. In addition to Fisher's guitar, Allan Barty plays fiddle and mandola, and John Tams adds melodeons.

the rest:
Archie Fisher ♪♪♪ (Celtic Music, 1968)

worth searching for: The Fisher Family ♪♪♪♪ (Topic, 1965) is a collector's item, an LP featuring Archie and his sisters Ray, Cilla, and Audrey, as well as his parents. Off the Map ♪♪♪♪ (Snow Goose Songs, 1986) is a live album of Archie with Garnet Rogers, and it's one of his best collections of traditional and original songs.

influences:
⏮ Ewan MacColl

⏭ Stan Rogers, Garnet Rogers, Ray Fisher, Cilla Fisher

see also: The Clancy Brothers and Tommy Makem/Tommy Makem and Liam Clancy

Steve Winick

Frank Emilio Flynn

20th-century Cuban jazz, folkloric and popular music

Born April 13, 1921, in Havana, Cuba. Based in Havana, Cuba.

No dis to Buena Vista Social Club elder Reuben Gonzalez, but pianist/composer Frank Emilio Flynn is the last living link to the glory days (1930s–'50s) of the Cuban descarga (jam session), the orquesta típicas (small eight-to-10-piece bands), and the birth of Cuban jazz. Blessed with perfect pitch and big ears, precocious Emilio taught himself how to play piano at the age of 10. In 1932, he won an amateur contest held at the Teatro Nacional de la Habana (now Gran Teatro García Lorca, the equivalent of Carnegie Hall). Just as the piano opened up a new world to him, another world—of sight—closed in his 13th year. Undaunted, young Flynn assumed a double identity: music student-teacher at the Cuban Association for the Blind by day, leader of an islandwide orquesta típica broadcast on CMBG radio each night. Flynn's divine schizophrenia ended with his contributions to the early '50s filin ("feeling") movement. The filin pioneers reasoned that if you added blues harmonics to the 3/4 time of the bolero, you'd get an evolutionary cipher that could open up Cuban music as well as build a bridge to American jazz. Leading this new vanguard were the Frank Emilio Flynn Quintet and Loquibambia (which he directed). As the decade waned, Frank Emilio took concert stage. A renowned interpreter of Cuban classicists Ignacio Cervantes, Ernesto Lecuona, and Manuel Saumell, the pianist hit a career peak with his '64 performance of Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue and Concerto in F in front of the National Symphonic Orchestra. From the mid-'60s to today, Flynn has continued to make music, still part of history and the future.

what to buy: Frank Emilio Flynn has released three excellent albums on Milan Latino between '97 and '98. A Tiempo de Danzón ♪♪♪♪♪ (Milan Latino, 1998, prod. Jesus Flynn) gets a slight edge over the other two. It's basically Frank Emilio's lithe, fluid piano deftly guiding your archetypal danzón orchestra—two flutes, two violins, bass, kettledrum, guiro (scraper)—through fervid variations on classic jammies like Armando Romeu's "Cuba Mia" and Coralita Lopez's "Isora Club." Intoxicating memories of old-time danzón intensified by post-filin vapors . . . in simple terms, the old is young again. A Tiempo de Danzón seduces completely.

what to buy next: Featuring contemporary Cuban masters Miguel Angá, José Luis "Changuito" Quintana, and Orlando "Maraca" Valle (on tumbadora drum, bongo, and flute, respectively), Babarisimo ♪♪♪♪½ (Milan Latino, 1997, prod. Sylvia Rodriguez Rivero) showcases the most recent edition of Flynn's Los Amigos outfit. A spirited collection of self-penned song ("Gandinga, Mondongo y Sandunga"), filin-ized bolero ("Mi Ayer"), cha cha cha ("Scheherezada"), and sophisticated mambo ("Tony y Jesusito"), Barbarismo is both validation of Flynn's prescience and a passing of the descarga to the next generation of Cuban musicians. Just as illuminating is his solo-piano Tribute to Ersnesto Lecuona ♪♪♪♪½ (Milan Latino, 1997, prod. Frank Emilio Flynn). Arguably the greatest of Cuban composers (851 vocal, piano, stage, symphonic, and film works), Lecuona (1895–63) epitomizes the Cuban music spirit—Spain, Africa, Americas. (Fellini copped his "Siboney" for Amarcord and Nat King Cole rocked "Noche Azul" and "Estás en mi corazón".) In Flynn's piano you can hear past Iberian majesty ("Córdova"), and feel the faint memory of African paradise lost ("Danza Lucumí").

influences:
⏭ Chucho Valdes, Gonzalo Rubalcaba

Tom Terrell

Folk Scat

Vocalese, Bulgarian style

Formed 1989, in Stara Zagora, Bulgaria. Based in Stara Zagora, Bulgaria.

Kiril Todorov, director, vocals, fiddle, percussion; Mariana Vlaeva, soprano; Antoaneta Krumova, soprano; Diana Georgieva, alto; Todor Gerdjikov, tenor. (All members are from Bulgaria.)

Folk Scat was founded by Kiril Todorov, a renowned Bulgarian composer and conductor who had previously worked with everything from large chamber orchestras to small vocal ensembles. With songs consisting mainly of exquisitely arranged a cappella vocals and minimal musical accompaniment primarily in the form of traditional Bulgarian folk instruments, the group's most prominent influence seems to be the vocalese sound of jazz artists like Lambert, Hendricks & Ross, and Bobby McFerrin. But you can also hear Todorov's classical music background factored into the equation, as well as alto Diana Georgieva and soprano Antoaneta Krumova's backgrounds in Bulgarian folk music. Fans of Le Mystère des Voix Bulgares will hear similar sounds at work here, but Folk Scat's masterful modern compositions and dazzling harmonic arrangements of traditional folk songs fall much easier on Western ears.

Fong Naam

what's available: Folk Scat ♪♪♪♪♪ (Nomad, 1996, prod. Bob Haddad) is the group's only international recording to date, but it's a doozy, with spellbinding original tunes like "Ianinku" and "Chompilche" interwoven with bold arrangements of traditional Bulgarian songs like "Bre Petrunko," and even a frisky scat take on Beethoven's "Fur Elise" that would've had Ludwig swinging like a hepcat. Simply a must-have for fans of a cappella vocal music.

influences:

- ⏮ Bulgarian Radio Women's Choir, Ladysmith Black Mambazo, Manhattan Transfer, Lambert, Hendricks & Ross
- ⏭ Zap Mama

see also: Le Mystère des Voix Bulgares

Bret Love

Fong Naam

Pi phat, pinpeat, mahori

Formed c. 1982, in Thailand. Based in Thailand.

Boonyong Ketkhong, renat thum, renat ek (wood xylophones); Bruce Gaston (USA), khong wong yai (large gong circle); Lamoon Phuakthongkham, renat ek, renat kaeo (glass xylophone); Suwit Kaewkramon, pi ny (oboe), khlui (flute); Prasarn Wongwirojruk, grajapi (lute), khong wong lek (small gong circle), kim (dulcimer), saw duang (fiddle); Phin Ruangnon, glong kaek, glong song na, tapone, glong yao

(percussion); Somcharn Bunkert, glongtat, glong kaek, glong yao (percussion); Kaiwan Tilokavichai, percussion; Anant Narkong, percussion; Wirad Songkroh, vocals, saw sam sai (fiddle), grap (wood clappers). (All members are from Thailand unless otherwise noted.)

Perhaps Thailand's best "classical" music ensemble, Fong Naam is a guardian of Thai culture, its members brilliant instrumentalists and daring innovators. Founded by renat xylophonist Boonyong Ketkhong and American expatriate Bruce Gaston in the early 1980s, Fong Naam has helped to revitalize interest in traditional Thai music both within and outside the country through its stirring, expert performances in the pi phat and mahori configurations. These ancient ensemble forms, played in Thailand, Cambodia and Laos, use a seven-note equidistant scale and are percussion-based, with instruments like the ranat wood xylophone and the khong wong gong circle playing a central role, though the mahori ensemble puts more emphasis on the use of stringed instruments. Gaston, a music theorist, composer, and teacher who moved to Thailand in the early 1970s, has expanded "serious" Thai music by creating classically rooted compositions that draw upon regional Thai styles, Western classical and jazz music, while Ketkhong's rhythmic innovations with the renat have become a major influence on Thai orchestras.

what to buy: Almost as much for Gaston's useful notes on Thai music theory as for the quality of the music, the two-volume Fong Naam: Ancient-Contemporary Music from Thailand ♪♪♪♪ (Celestial Harmonies, 1995, prod. Bruce Gaston) is the best introduction to the group and to Thai music in general. In addition to typical pi phat tunes, some regional and unusual styles are included, such as the gentle floating strains of a northern Thai string ensemble on "Prasat Wai." We also hear an extended piece performed with the rare glass renat, an instrument which Fong Naam helped reintroduce to the musical scene. Jajakan: Music from New Siam ♪♪♪♪ (Nimbus, 1996, prod. Robin Broadbank, Bruce Gaston) finds the group in an experimental mode, using Western orchestral instruments and even synthesizer to produce a compelling hybrid. Lamoon showcases his mastery of the xylophone on the tremendous "Cherd Nawk."

worth searching for: Two very nice CDs, The Sleeping Angel ♪♪♪½ (Nimbus, 1991) and The Nang Hong Suite ♪♪♪♪ (Nimbus, 1992), have unfortunately gone out of print but are certainly worth finding. The encyclopedic six-volume survey Siamese Classical Music ♪♪♪♪ (Marco Polo) covers the history of various ensembles, especially the pi phat, in scrupulous detail. In print but difficult to find, it's probably easiest to order directly from the distributor, Naxos (please see this book's Record Labels appendix).

solo outings:

Bruce Gaston (with Takako Nishizaki):

Indra's Paradise: The Essence of Thai Music (Marco Polo, 1997)

Jeffrey Muhr

Canray Fontenot

Cajun, Creole, zydeco

Born October 22, 1922, in L'Anse Rougeau, LA, USA. Died July 29, 1995, in Welch, LA, USA.

With steel-blue eyes and a smile that could melt any heart, Canray Fontenot played the finest traditional Creole fiddle in Louisiana. Son of legendary accordionist Adam Fontenot, Canray grew up in a house that was constantly full of the area musicians coming to visit with his father. His wiry, bluesy fiddling deeply influenced the playing styles of later luminaries like Dewey Balfa, Michael Doucet, and Edward Poullard. He began working with the nephew of Amédée Ardoin, accordionist Alphonse "Bois Sec" Ardoin, but during the 1940s and early '50s led a string band that shared the stage with a very young Clifton Chenier. It was Chenier who persuaded Fontenot to return to music in the mid-'60s when he had given up on it. His songs "Les Barres de la Prison," "Bonsoir Moreau," and "Joe Pitre a Deux Femmes," among others, are still played in updated versions by many young zydeco bands.

what to buy: Louisiana Hot Sauce, Creole Style ♪♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1992, prod. Chris Strachwitz) is a compilation of Canray in a variety of settings, including duets with Michael Doucet, the Ardoin family, the Poullard Brothers, Freeman Fontenot, and Beausoleil.

what to buy next: Canray and Bois Sec stopped off in Washington, D.C., after a successful performance at the Newport Folk Festival and recorded Les Blues du Bayou ♪♪♪♪♪ (Melodeon, 1965, prod. Richard Spottswood). It catches them in their prime. The two never played a tune the same way twice, but there is no lack of authority in their execution.

the rest:

Louisiana Cajun French Music from the Southwest Prairies Vol. 2, Recorded 1964–1967 ♪♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1976)

Cajun Fiddle Styles, Vol. 1: The Creole ♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1988)

La Musique Creole ♪♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1997)

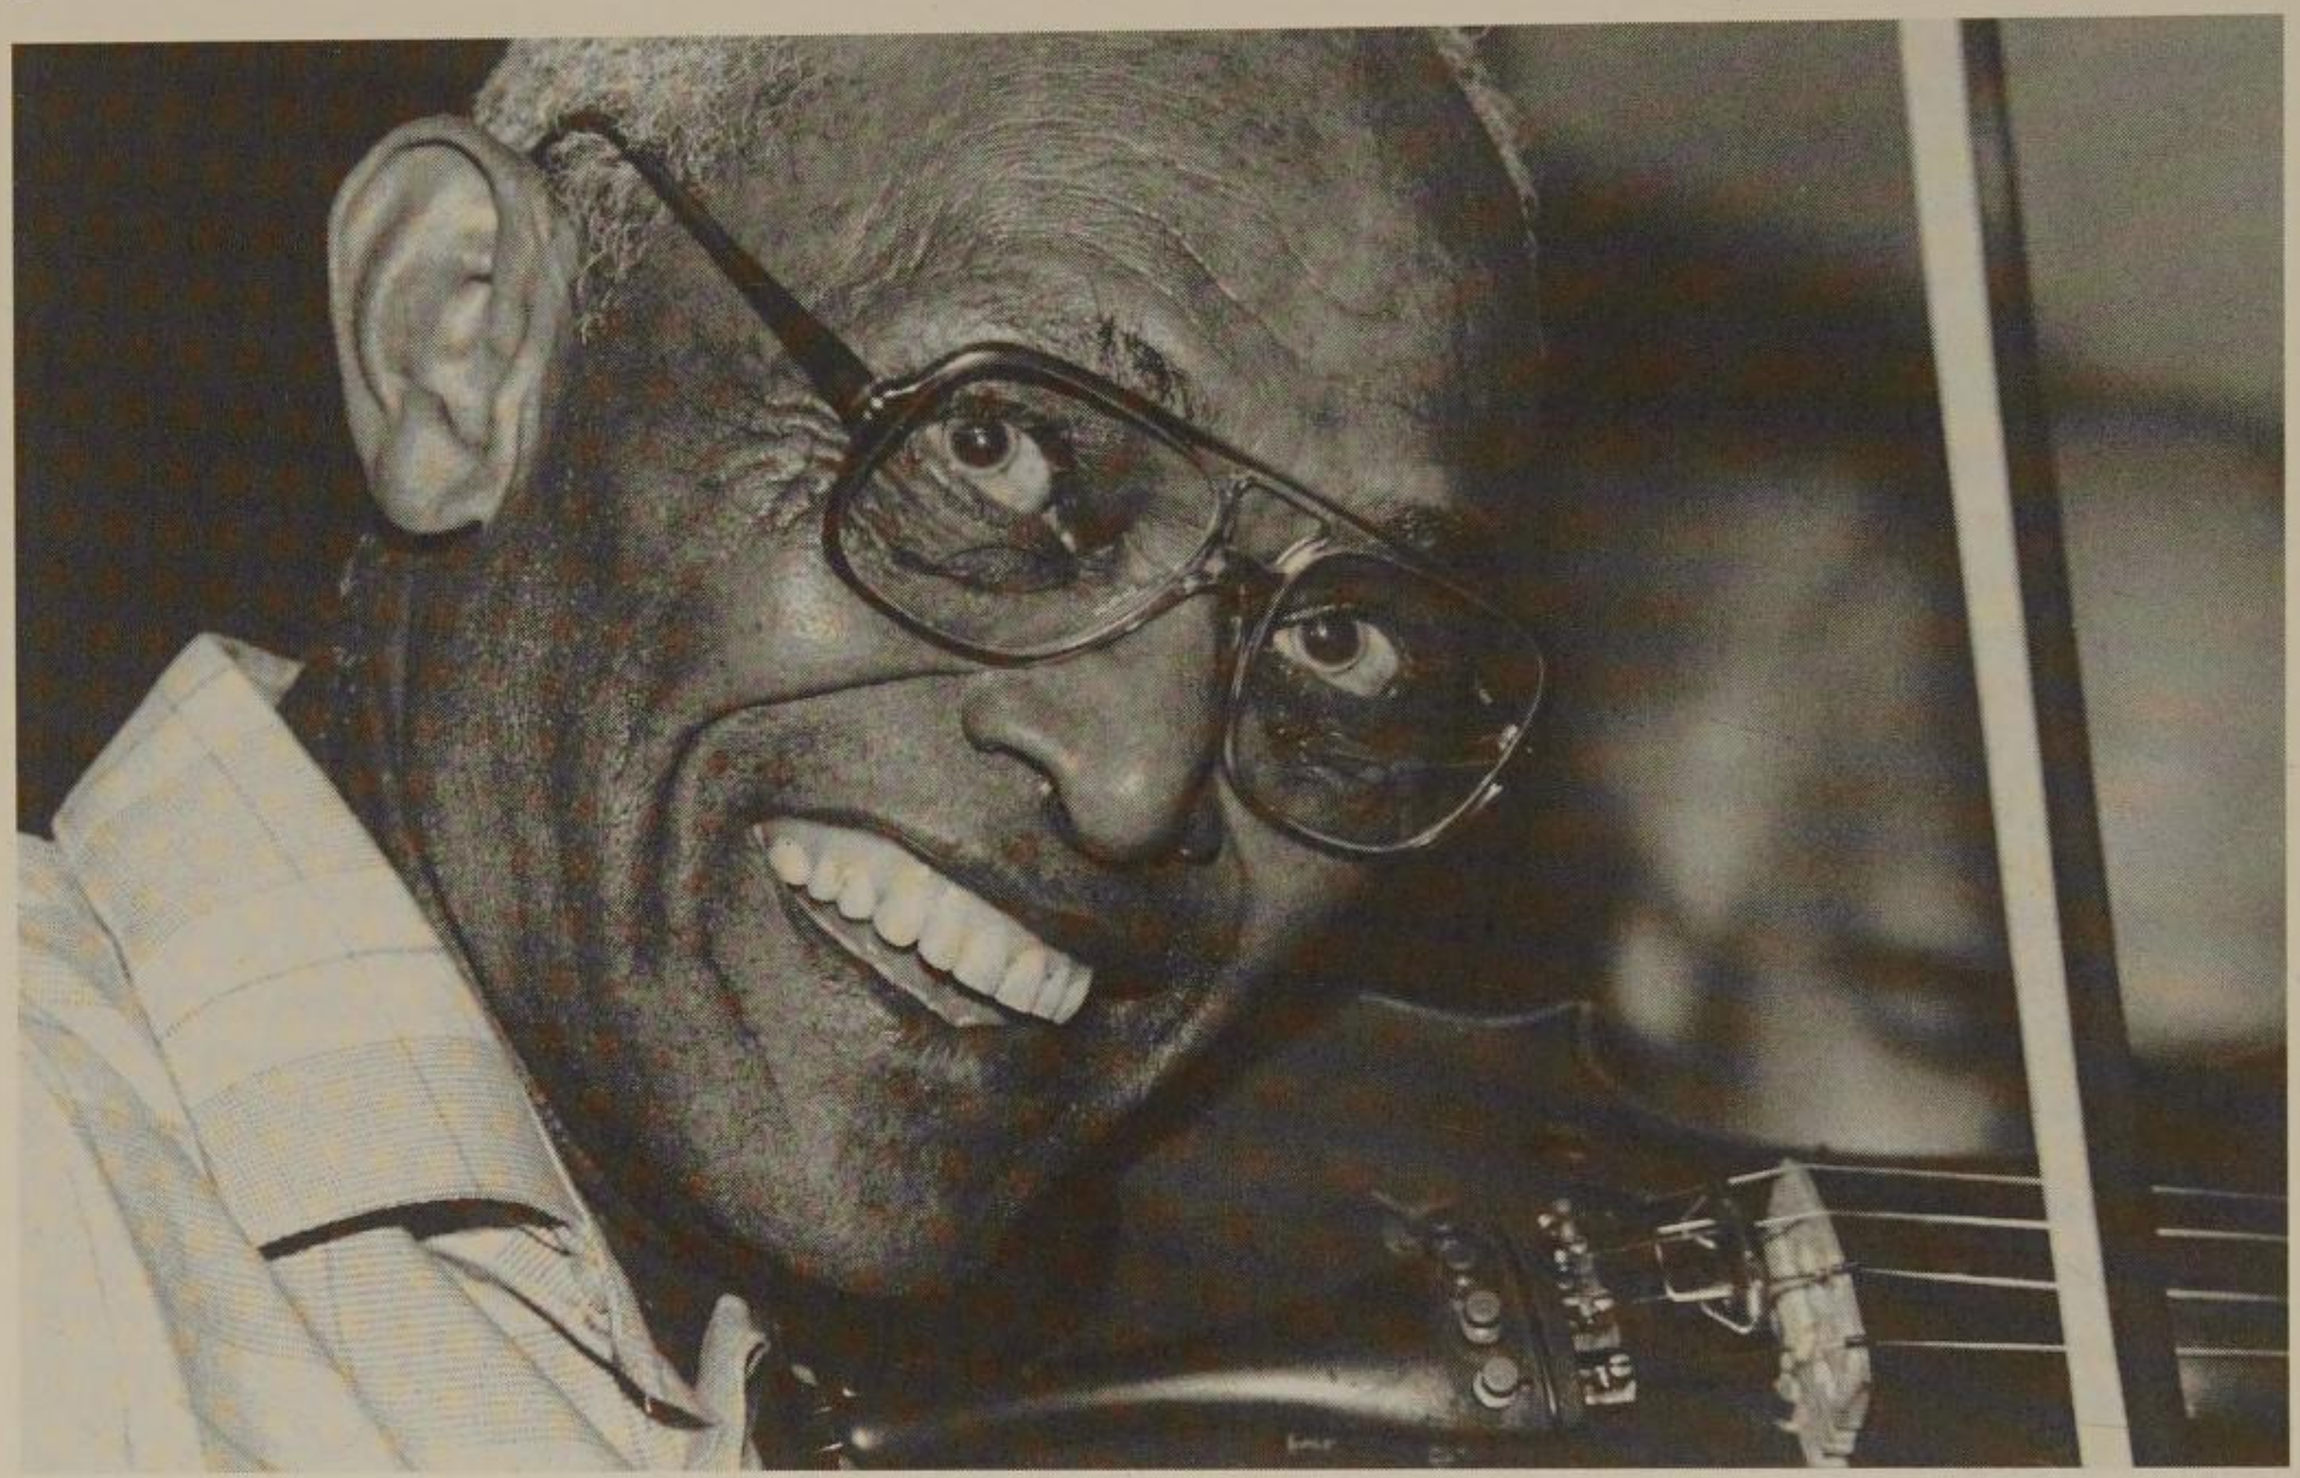
Les Haricots Sont Pas Salés: Legendary Masters of Cajun and Creole Music ♪♪♪♪♪ (Cinq Planetes, 1998)

worth searching for: Side Two of The Cajuns Vol. 1 ♪♪♪♪ (Gazell, 1973, prod. Sam Charters) features the Ardoin Brothers Orchestra with Canray Fontenot. These are the only recordings of Canray playing with Gustave Ardoin (son of Bois Sec), who died in a tragic accident. Canray considered his work with Gustave to be some of his finest.

influences:

⏮ Amédée Ardoin, Dennis McGee

⏭ Michael Doucet, Clifton Chenier, Balfa Brothers



Canray Fontenot

see also: Alphonse "Bois Sec" Ardoin, Amédée Ardoin, Balfa Brothers, Beausoleil, Clifton Chenier, Michael Doucet, Filé

Jared Snyder

Juan Carlos Formell

Cuban son, changui, bolero

Born 1964, in Havana, Cuba. Based in New York, NY, USA.

Though he's the son of a storied Cuban-music pioneer—the similarly named Juan Formell, leader of the legendary Los Van Van—when Juan Carlos Formell began seeking his own creative voice, he found that his country's political regime wouldn't allow him to express his folkloric roots as he wished. Reaching back to days before his father's groundbreaking style, the younger Formell's pre-Castro tastes were denounced as decadent—and Formell himself branded as subversive for his practice of yoga! Still, he managed to work as a well-respected sideman to Cuban greats Gonzalo Rubalcaba and Emiliano Salvador, and he appeared with the leading vocal group Cuarteto Tiempo. But he needed more for his music to be truly his. On a concert trip to Mexico he seized a slim chance and swam across the Rio Grande to the United States. At first his career in the new land consisted mainly of playing music for tips around the subway stops of New York City, but whatever the struggle, he was able to realize his artistic vision of Cuba as never before. Soon his talent was recognized and he began to get club gigs, formed the band cubalibre, and was signed to the adventurous U.S. world-music label Wicklow by its founder, Paddy Moloney of the Chieftains, who characterized Formell's work as "the roots of what we find so irresistible in Cuban music."

what's available: Songs from a Little Blue House ♪♪♪♪♪ (Wicklow/BMG, 1999, prod. John Fischbach) is named for the abode of Formell's grandmother in the Oriente province of Cuba (an area as rich in cultural history for the nation as it is in family history for the artist). The disc's original songs evoke an earlier time in Cuban music, using voice, percussion, and strings (rather than jazz-style horns) to conjure images of Cuban life. It's newly composed music in a timeless style. To hear Formell's pre-exile work with Cuarteto Tiempo, look for Cigar Music—Tobacco Songs from Old Havana ♪♪♪ (Traditional Crossroads, 1996, prod.

Harold G. Hagopian, Rachel Faro), a collection of songs about—and sung by the workers of—Cuba's most famous industry, including tunes written by the beloved Beny Moré.

influences:
Juan Formell, Orquesta Aragon, Los Van Van

see also: Los Van Van, Beny Moré

Kerry Dexter

Fortuna

Modern and traditional Ladino

Born Fortuna Safdié, October 22, 1957, in São Paulo, Brazil. Based in São Paulo, Brazil.

In the U.S., "theatrical" rockers have often faced a steep slope toward being accepted as musicians, but since much world music is based on (or still functions as) communal ritual—religious, social, etc.—neither its practitioners nor its publics subscribe to this schism between the visual and the aural. Fortuna, whose album sets are conceived as revues in her native Brazil, is no exception—but she is exceptional in every other way. Dressed like a bejeweled medieval icon come to life to deliver stately music of that period, and eventually costume-changing down to red-velvet eveningwear for torridly syncopated finales, Fortuna's shows are highly theatrical, while bracingly simple in their physical affects. Fortuna realizes that if you come to see a band at all, you might as well have something to see—but for much of the world, which hasn't yet had a chance to meet this should-and-will-be-famous diva in person, it's the music that has to mesmerize, and it does. Fortuna's fascination with her subject matter is infectious, introducing international listeners to the little-known Ladino sound. Ladino is the music of the Sephardic Jews of medieval Spain and Portugal (and their later diaspora throughout the Mediterranean, North Africa, and beyond), which offers another historical link in the cultural chain between the Middle East and the Iberian Peninsula—and a lively strain of "worldbeat" that's stood the test of centuries. Fortuna first encountered it while on a tour of Israel, reconnecting her with her roots and changing the course of her career. The sound is just the synthesis of hypnotic melodies, slow-build percussion and understated, sexy guitar you'd expect—but in Fortuna's hands it's still full of surprises.

what to buy: On La Prima Vez ♪♪♪♪♪ (Fortuna Produções Artísticas, 1993) Fortuna performs Ladino songs from Turkey, Morocco, Greece, the Balkans, and Spain (as well as a few of her own attentive compositions in the Ladino tradition), mostly in a sparse but quietly spectacular instrumental setting of woodwinds and flamenco guitar, with occasional accordion and sparing, atmospheric keyboards. In 21 songs over a mere 47 minutes, the band exhibits a bracing energy and maintains an impressive elegance, with Fortuna's bell-like voice equally capable of soulful soaring and melismatic pathos. True to the title song's theme of first love, this album brims with an exultant creativity and heart. A world-music classic which demands discovery. Cantigas ♪♪♪♪♪ (Fortuna Produções Artísticas, 1994) expands the odyssey to Yugoslavia and Syria, along with more masterworks from Morocco, Turkey, Greece, and Fortuna's own pen. Fortuna's vocals and original compositions have grown even further in assurance, and the album experiments with more insistent percussion; tasteful, evocative electronics; and revelatory, intertwined multi-tracked voices. Cantigas progresses from La Prima Vez 's exuberance to a lofty gravitas and seductive intensity, but is just as compelling in its own way. It is a testament to the breadth of both the Ladino canon and Fortuna's musical tastes that such a diversity of feeling can be achieved between albums drawn primarily from a finite repertoire.

what to buy next: Mediterrâneo ♪♪♪♪ (Fortuna Produções Artísticas, 1996) is sometimes a bit slower-paced than its predecessors, but always in a contemplative rather than lethargic way which may well appeal to those seeking a gutsier alternative to new-age music. One or two melodies veer toward sentimentality, but Fortuna's voice is never less than heavenly, and smokers like "Ay madre!", "Desde hoy la mi madre," "Dame tu fuerza," and "Me vaya kappará" are worth the price of the album—as is the Turkish/Balkan fusion "Bre Sarika, bre." (The latter area proves to be a particularly rich vein for this album's musical research, as also heard on "Yo hanino tu hanina" and "A la nana y a la buba.")

the rest:

Canções e Orações (Songs and Prayers) N/A (Fortuna Produções Artísticas, 2000)

worth searching for: You owe it to yourself to track down the above discs—the two current U.S. distributors are SISU Music c/o Chaim, (212) 779-1559, sisuent@earthlink.net; and Harmony Ridge c/o Mr. Jack Sutton, (800) 611-4698, www.hrmusic.com, hrmusic@hrmusic.com—but if you really can't wait, two killer tracks from Mediterrâneo appear on Putumayo World Music's splendid compilation Women of Spirit and its pretty-darn-good one Romantica. (The former is reviewed in this volume's Compilations section.)

influences:
Enya, Loreena McKennitt, Madredeus, Bill Douglas

Adam McGovern

Four Men & a Dog

Irish traditional, contemporary folk

Formed 1990, in Ireland. Disbanded 1997.

Cathal Hayden, fiddle, backup vocals; Kevin Doherty, guitar, lead vocals, backup vocals (1993–97); Gino Lupari, percussion, lead vocals, backup vocals; Gerry O'Connor, fiddle, banjo, backup vocals (1993–97); Mick Daly, guitar, banjo, vocals (1990–93); Donal Murphy, accordion (1990–92); Brian McGrath, banjo, mandolin, piano (1990–93). (All members are from Ireland.)

Four Men & a Dog were the unexpected highlight of the 1990 Belfast Folk Festival. Coming seemingly out of the blue, the newly formed group phenomenally blended the traditional dance music of Ireland with a diverse host of influences including bluegrass, swing, jazz, and rap. The band's initial incarnation included singer Mick Daly, accordionist Donal Murphy, and banjo player Brian McGrath. All three departed around 1993 and were replaced by Gerry O'Connor and singer Kevin Doherty. The instrumental core for the band's entire existence was fiddler Cathal Hayden, who had left the more traditional Arcady to join Four Men & a Dog, but with the addition of O'Connor they acquired arguably the finest banjo player to ever have emerged from Ireland. Also leading the way for the group since its heyday was bodhrán player/vocalist Gino Lupari, whose larger-than-life onstage presence was partially responsible for the band's success. Four Men & a Dog's final two recordings saw them gain increasing popularity in the U.K., which was due in part to their continual move away from their traditional Irish roots. Both Doctor A's Secret Remedies and Long Roads feature members of the Band, and were actually recorded in upstate New York at Band drummer Levon Helm's studio. Doherty's announcement that he would be leaving Four Men led the other members to take an extended hiatus and eventually call it quits in 1997. Doherty and O'Connor continue to play together, while Lupari has started a new London-based band called Beware of the Dog.

what to buy: Shifting Gravel ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1994, prod. Arty McGlynn) marked the addition of singer Kevin Doherty to the band following the departure of vocalist and folk stalwart Mick Daly. Doherty's songs brought a country influence, and although still overpowered by the fiery instrumental work of Hayden and O'Connor, his song styling had a cohesiveness to it that the band's debut album had been sorely missing.

what to buy next: The band's debut Barking Mad ♪♪♪½ (Topic, 1992, prod. Arty McGlynn) was voted Best Album by the English magazine Folk Roots in 1991, making Four Men the first Irish group ever to win the award. Much of their success was based on the instrumentals, which are stellar and make the already mediocre vocal songs seem even more so. Despite some shortcomings this is an interesting album, and a successful blend of a variety of influences.

worth searching for: Doctor A's Secret Remedies ♪♪♪½ (Transatlantic, 1995) and Long Roads ♪♪♪½ (Castle Communications, 1996, prod. Aaron Hurwitz) are both available in the United States as imports. As previously mentioned, on these final two albums the band showed a marked migration from their early Irish roots to a more modern, folk-influenced sound.

solo outings:

Cathal Hayden:

Handed Down ♪♪♪♪ (Rainbow Records)

Gerry O'Connor:

Time to Time ♪♪♪♪½ (Mulligan, 1991)

Myriad ♪♪♪♪ (Myriad Media, 1998)

influences:

⏮ Planxty, the Bothy Band, Paddy O'Brien, Seumas Connoly

see also: Arcady

Cliff McGann

Frå Senegal Til Setesdal

Worldbeat, international folk

Formed 1996 in Setesdal, Norway. Based in Setesdal, Norway.

Kirsten Bråten Berg (Norway), vocals, jews harp; Solo Cissokho (Senegal), vocals, kora; Kouame Sereba (Côte d'Ivoire), vocals, drums; Bjørgulv Straume (Norway), vocals, jews harp.

Most "worldbeat" we're familiar with relies on a fusion of various African styles with familiar Anglo-American ones that were drawn from the music that came to North America with the slaves—blues, rock, funk, rap, samba, son, and rumba. But this worldbeat quartet is half African and half Norwegian, and its sound is based on a fusion of Norwegian and Senegalese folk music, which sounds jarring—but, to ears raised on British and American folk styles, jarring in a pleasing way. Kirsten Bråten Berg got interested in folk music in 1970 and since then has been collecting and performing it all over Norway, both solo and as a member of the Arild Andersen Group. In 1995 she met two African musicians—Sereba from Côte d'Ivoire, and Cissokho from Senegal—who were now living in Norway, and suggested a collaboration. Bjørgulv Straume, another folk singer from Setesdal, completed the lineup. Frå Senegal Til Setesdal has become very popular on the folk circuit, performing at festivals and concert halls to rave reviews. All the members also have solo careers.

worth searching for: The mostly vocal Frå Senegal Til Setesdal ♪♪♪♪½ (Grappa Norway, 1997, prod. Hallvard Kvåle) introduces a new kind of worldbeat to Anglo-American ears. Norwegian folk singing has a swinging syncopation that's vaguely familiar to those of us raised on Celtic music, but it's also totally unique. The Norwegians sing some African songs, and the Africans arrange the Norwegian tunes, adding spare hand drum accents. The jews harps and African mouth bows supply an odd buzzing backbeat. This album is hard to find in the United States, but worth tracking down.

influences:
Myllarguten, Slinkombas, Hans W. Brimi

j. poet

Franco

Soukous

Born L'Okanga La Ndju Pene Luambo Makiadi, 1938, in Sona-Bata, Congo; died 1989.

Franco was a singer, composer, and bandleader, but it was his guitar playing that made him a legend ("The Sorcerer of the Guitar"), possibly the most important African musician of the 20th century. In his four-and-a-half decades in the limelight he cut hundreds of albums, singles, and cassettes with his mighty OK Jazz Band, and founded a whole new style of Congolese rumba.

Congo was under the colonial heel of Belgium when Franco was born in 1938, and the music of the country was undergoing a rapid transformation from rural folk forms to more internationally influenced popular music. Christian missionaries had introduced the idea of harmony singing, although some tribal groups had been using harmony in their vocal music for centuries. There was also a strong tradition of composing topical songs to deal with the trials of everyday life, a tradition Franco later drew on when composing his lyrics. Modern soukous began evolving in the 1940s when the international record companies started releasing Cuban albums in West Africa. The rumba, which was based on rhythms African slaves had carried to the New World, was particularly popular, and when it was reintroduced to Congolese musicians, they began incorporating its syncopation and Latin rhythms into their own styles of dance music. The horn sections and flutes of the rumba and charanga bands were replaced by guitars, and soukous was born.

Franco had shown interest in music from an early age, and his first guitar was a self-made conglomeration of tin cans and electrical wire. His father passed when Franco was 10 and he had to leave school to help his mother support his brothers and sisters. He got his first real instrument at the age of 11, and by the time he was 15 he was a popular session musician with a finger-picking style that amazed his peers and brought him lots of attention from the young women. Because of his popularity, Franco was able to persuade the owners of the studio he worked for to let him and his bandmates practice at home. (The studios at that time owned the instruments and jealously guarded their session players.) In 1956 Franco and a few of his friends left the recording studio to play at the OK Club. He called his new band OK Jazz, and within a year they were rivaling Dr. Nico's African Jazz band for chart supremacy. In fact, most modern Congolese guitarists owe a stylistic debt to one or both of these giants.

In 1960 Congo attained independence, and after a period of bloody civil war became one of the most stable and prosperous nations in Black Africa. Franco and OK Jazz became one of its most successful bands along with Dr. Nico's L'Orchestre Fiesta Sukisa and Rochereau's Fiesta National. As Africa threw off colonialism, Europe became hungry for authentic African culture and Franco, Rochereau and others began touring Europe and taking advantage of the power electric guitars gave them. International beats from the Caribbean and Europe also started creeping into the music, making soukous popular throughout the African continent and winning new converts in Europe as well. Franco's success enabled him to start his own music business empire. He employed hundreds of musicians, singers, and dancers, and encouraged them to get involved with side projects and spinoff bands—so long as they recorded for the master's record company, a not-unreasonable request since he paid for their food, clothes, instruments, and housing. An amazing number of people began their careers with Franco including Sam Mangwana, Mose Fan Fan, and Papa Noel, to name but a few.

During the turbulence of the 1960s Franco often sang about political issues, and his satirical takes on the ruling class were often banned (which only added to his popularity). In one case he was actually jailed, but the international outcry by his fans had him back on the streets in three days. In the 1970s Franco began writing more about interpersonal relationships, promoting a strict moral code, although he often used bawdy humor and double entendres to make his points about faithless husbands, wife beaters, and those who abused alcohol. He remained popular at home, but never was able to make the same leap abroad, partially because he'd become involved with the ruling clique and whenever they had a problem they asked Franco to compose a tune to help smooth things over. He also began composing songs about his favorite products and tributes to his richest fans, and while the themes smack of opportunism, the musical quality remained high. In 1987 Franco returned to social commentary with one of his most important songs "Attention na SIDA (Beware of AIDS.)" He died in 1989 after a long sickness that was rumored to be AIDS-related, an allegation his organization vehemently denies.

what to buy: There's not much info on the CD booklet, but the two-disc, 11-track 20e Anniversaire ♪♪♪♪♪ (Sonodisc) was originally released in 1976, during one of the creative peaks of OK Jazz. Incredible guitar work, angelic vocals, and slick production make this one a good starting place.

what to buy next: Originalité ♪♪♪♪♪ (RetroAfric, 1990) is the first disc of a six-part retrospective that tracks the career of Franco and his band from the mid-1950s to the early 1960s. Tunes are taken from 78 rpm discs and old LPs, but whatever the sonic limitations, the music remains transcendent.

worth searching for: Franco and OK Jazz recorded hundreds of albums, and provided backing tracks for dozens of singers like Sam Magwana. In the decade since his death, labels have been tracking down Franco's hits and rare tracks for release on CD. He and OK Jazz rarely made a poor recording, so almost anything with his name on it is worth owning. This list barely scratches the surface: Le Grande Maitre Franco ♪♪♪♪♪ (Celluloid, 1991); Tres Impoli ♪♪♪♪♪ (Sonodisc, 1984); Franco Joue avec Sam Mangwana ♪♪♪♪♪ (Grace); A L'Ancienne Belgique ♪♪♪♪♪ (Grace, 1984); For Ever ♪♪♪♪♪ (Melodie); Lettre à Monsieur le Directeur Général ♪♪♪♪♪ (Melodie); Merveilles du Passé 1957-1958-1959 ♪♪♪♪♪ (Sonodisc); Live in Europe ♪♪♪♪♪ (Sonodisc); En Colere: 1979/1980 ♪♪♪♪♪ (Sonodisc); Attention na SIDA ♪♪♪♪♪ (Sonodisc, 1987); Cooperation: 1980–1982 ♪♪♪♪♪ (Sonodisc, 1982); Disques d'Or et Maracas d'Or ♪♪♪♪♪ (Sonodisc).

influences:

⏩ Tabu Ley Rochereau, Diblo Dibala, Pablo, Quatre

see also: Diblo Dibala, Dr. Nico, Sam Mangwana, Tabu Ley Rochereau

j. poet

Alasdair Fraser

Scottish fiddle

Born May 14, 1955, in Clackmannan, Scotland. Based in Scotland.

Alasdair Fraser is one of the most well-traveled and sought-after fiddlers Scotland has ever produced. His fingers soar over the strings with finesse, while his bowing produces a sound so expressive you could almost swear his fiddle is singing. His great love of Scotland's traditional music shines through as he plays familiar reels, strathspeys, and airs that delight listeners around the world. Saying Fraser is an award-winning fiddler hardly does him justice. He won the Open Competition of the Scottish National Mod Fiddle Championship two years in a row, and has since won similar national Scottish-fiddling competitions abroad, including the United States' and Canada's. He has appeared on television programs such as CBS Sunday Morning, been heard on radio's A Prairie Home Companion, and played on the soundtracks of such movies as The Last of the Mohicans, and The Spitfire Grill. Fraser has performed and recorded with a variety of virtuosos, including Chris Norman, Tim Gorman, Jean Redpath, Itzhak Perlman, Twila Paris, and Derek Bell. He also excels at composition, as is especially evident on his album Dawn Dance. And he teaches his gift to a new generation of musicians at his two summer fiddle programs and his workshops at numerous Scottish festivals. In passing on the art of Scottish fiddling, Fraser uses his deeply felt Scottish heritage, his wry sense of humor, and his amazing ability to encourage others.

what to buy: On Dawn Dance ♪♪♪♪ (Culburnie, 1995), Fraser displays his amazing flair for composition. Made up entirely of originals, this is that rare album of new, traditionally based music that stands with the best of its models. Fraser is joined by a host of other excellent players, including Eric Rigler on bagpipes and Chris Norman on flutes, who perform beautifully together. Particularly inspired is "Independence Trail/Galen's Arrival," commemorating the birth of his son. This album won the INDIE Award for "Celtic Album of 1995."

what to buy next: The Driven Bow ♪♪♪½ (Culburnie, 1988, prod. Alasdair Fraser, Jody Stecher) is a delightful collection of traditional tunes from Scotland and Nova Scotia. Fraser teams up with guitarist Jody Stecher to recreate a portion of Scottish and Cape Breton history which invites listeners to get up and dance. Fraser surrounds himself with other standouts (including Rigler and Norman again) in the wonderful ensemble Skyedance. Their album Way Out to Hope Street ♪♪♪½ (Culburnie, 1997) features a delightful selection of mostly original tunes, beautifully arranged for fiddle, pipes, flutes, keyboards, bass, and percussion.

what to avoid: The North Road ♪♪ (Sona Gaia, 1989, prod. Billy Oskay, Alasdair Fraser, Paul Machlis) has more of a new-age feel than any of Fraser's other work, leaving it feeling a little hollow, despite some excellent tunes and performances.

the rest:

Portrait of a Scottish Fiddler ♪♪♪ (Brownrigg, 1984/Culburnie, 1996)
Skyedance ♪♪♪ (Culburnie, 1986)

influences:

⏪ Farquhar MacRae, Hector MacAndrew, Buddy MacMaster, Willie Fernie

⏩ Bonnie Rideout, Natalie MacMaster, Ashley MacIsaac

see also: Derek Bell, Itzhak Perlman, Jean Redpath

Jo Hughey Morrison

G

Peter Gabriel

Experimental pop, world fusion

Born May 13, 1950, in Cobham, England. Based in England.

In many ways, Peter Gabriel stands as one of worldbeat's main mentors. You won't actually find it in the bulk of his music, but as one of the benefactors behind both WOMAD (the World of Music, Arts, and Dance organization) and the RealWorld label, he's been a driving force in making world music accessible. It all began after he left Genesis in 1975 and started releasing his successful solo albums. In 1980 there was "Biko," the anthem to slain South African activist Stephen Biko (which eventually appeared on a compilation for Amnesty International, an organization with which Gabriel has remained active). In the middle of 1982, he and WOMAD director Thomas Brooman organized that group's first festival in England—and came close to losing shirt, shoes, and service, only to have Gabriel's former Genesis mates step in and restore solvency with a surefire one-off reunion concert. The year 1986 saw the inauguration of Gabriel's RealWorld studios in Box, near Bath, and a year later the RealWorld label got underway, with then-unknown but eventually renowned signings like Nusrat Fateh Ali Khan. One artist who didn't appear on the label but received massive boosts from Gabriel was Senegal's Youssou N'Dour, who toured and recorded with him. In 1989 Gabriel provided the soundtrack to Martin Scorsese's The Last Temptation of Christ, which in album form was titled Passion. This disc took all manner of world music as its source, as was acknowledged later the same year with a compilation of tracks from the artists and musics that had inspired it (Passion Sources). Gabriel has always been one to give credit where credit is due, and he did so again in 1993 when following up his successful Us album with the multi-artist Plus from Us collection. His tours have long featured world artists as both opening acts (like Papa Wemba) and band members (like Manu Katche), and he's used his name to draw people to WOMAD festivals around the world—although he's now stopped doing that, WOMAD having decisively regained and kept its shirt as a stand-alone brand. But perhaps more than anything else, it's the RealWorld label, in whose operation he's heavily involved, that is his biggest legacy. RealWorld has introduced many great acts from around the globe, taken chances, and helped propel people like the late Nusrat to international fame. In his own quiet way, Gabriel has been, and remains, a true champion of world music.

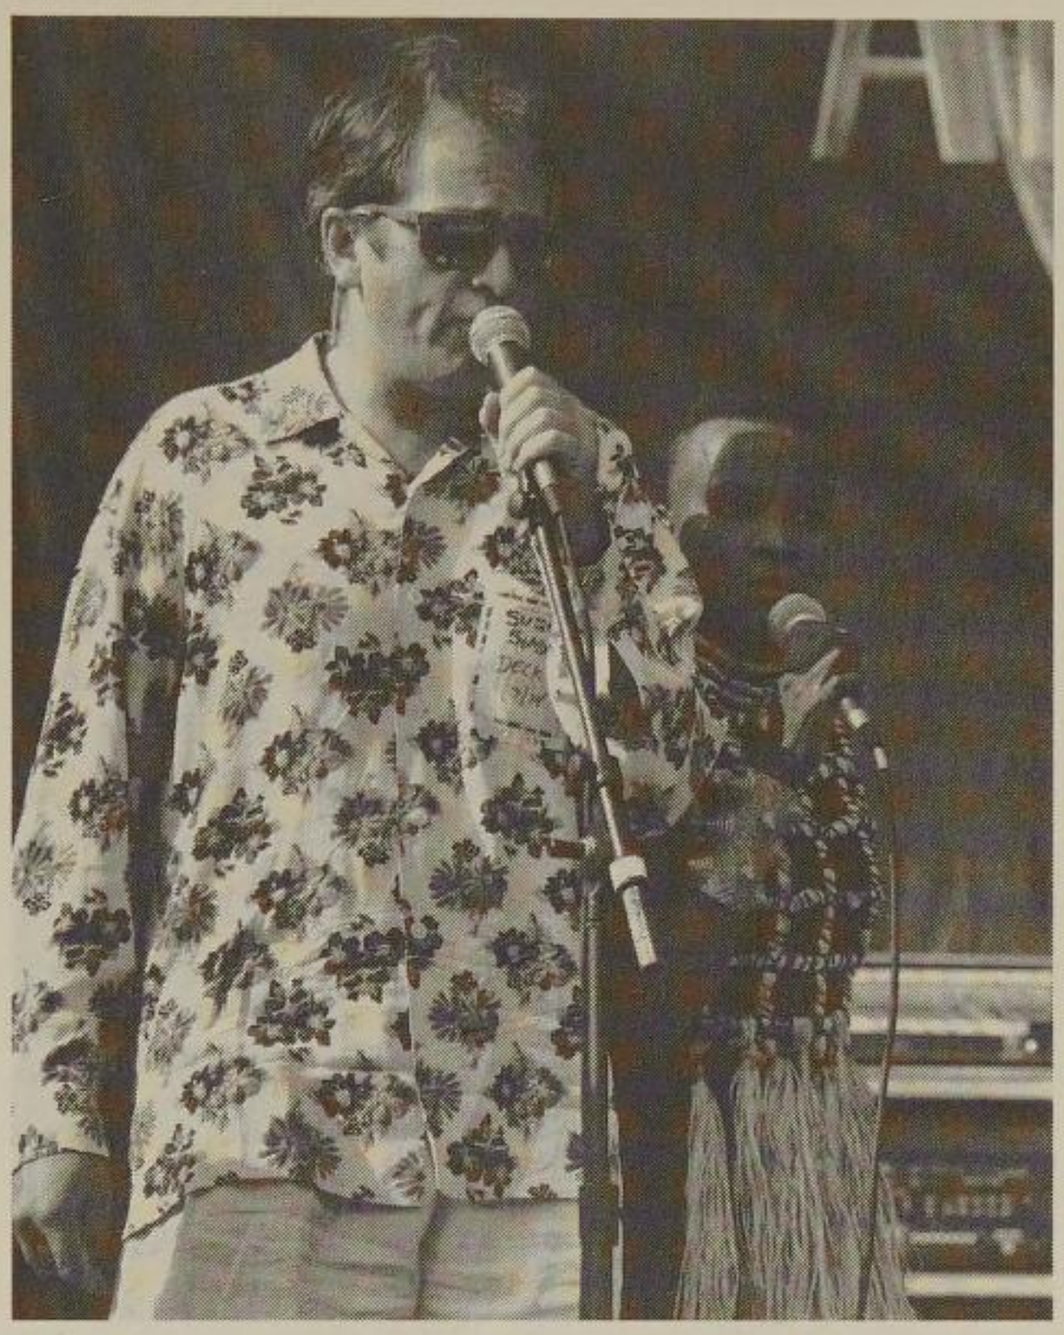
what to buy: He'd whetted the popular appetite with African/pop syntheses on Peter Gabriel ♪♪♪♪ (a.k.a. Security) (Geffen, 1982, prod. Peter Gabriel, David Lord), and Passion ♪♪♪♪ (Geffen, 1989, prod. Peter Gabriel) was where Gabriel really brought his obsession with—and knowledge of—world music into the open, whipping it smoothly into an atmospheric whole through clever use of the studio. Passion Sources ♪♪♪♪½ (RealWorld, 1989, prod. various) is the more real side of the coin, showcasing the music sources that he used for Passion and fully acknowledging the artists. Plus from Us ♪♪♪♪ (RealWorld, 1993, prod. various) does the same job, but covers slightly more Eurocentric territory.

the rest:
Peter Gabriel ♪♪♪♪ (Atlantic, 1977)



Peter Gabriel (l) with Angélique Kidjo

Peter Gabriel ♪♪♪♪ (Atlantic, 1978)
Peter Gabriel ♪♪♪♪ (Geffen, 1980)
Plays Live ♪♪♪ (Geffen, 1983)
Music from Birdy ♪♪♪ (Charisma, 1985)
So ♪♪♪ (Geffen, 1986)
Shaking the Tree ♪♪♪♪ (Geffen, 1990)
Us ♪♪♪½ (Geffen, 1992)
Secret World Live ♪♪♪ (Geffen, 1994)

influences:
- Otis Redding
- Youssou N'Dour, virtually every world-music fusion artist

see also: Manu Dibango, Youssou N'Dour

Chris Nickson

James Galway

International pop, classical, Irish traditional

Born December 8, 1939, in Belfast, Ireland. Based in Ireland.

Galway's accomplishments in the classical milieu are many and varied. Unfortunately, the world of classical music has a rather limited commercial appeal, and those musicians who rise to the top in it often feel compelled to reach out to pop audiences. But the refined style of such artists and their tendency to prefer well-groomed popular music usually means they have more resonance in the lounge sector than anywhere else. Galway's efforts outside the classical arena are interesting when they afford him the opportunity to display his playing prowess. Alas, not all of his pop offerings really do him justice and he often seems to sacrifice musical integrity for soothing pleasantries. His work with traditional Irish musicians such as the Chieftains shows off the down-to-earth side of his talent in the beautiful lyrical quality of the sad songs and the joyous spirit of more upbeat dance numbers. When Galway tackles film music, increasingly popular in his pop repertoire, he often generates new nuances and fresh interpretations (as on the excellent In the Pink album, which paired him with Henry Mancini). But in recent years he has demonstrated an unfortunate tendency to veer into the schlocky show-tune world of Andrew Lloyd Webber and straight-up adult-contemporary pop. The general lack of character in these milieus doesn't provide him with the substantive material that pushes his playing into top form, and his flute ends up sounding like a fluttering garnish atop the cloying, cloddish quasi-rock arrangements. To balance this less weighty material, there's always Galway's increasing forays into straighter Celtic music, and his selection (along with pianist/composer Phil Coulter) to perform at the ceremony where Irish leader John Hume received his Nobel Peace Prize for the accord in Northern Ireland.

what to buy: For purposes of this book, you want Galway's solid and growing catalog of Celtic-rooted outings. On In Ireland ♪♪♪♪ (RCA, 1987, prod. Ralph Mace, Paddy Moloney), a collaboration with Ireland's celebrated traditionalists, the Chieftains, Galway gracefully delivers such classics as "Danny Boy" and "When You and I Were Young, Maggie." The album was apparently recorded live with dancers participating, and the spirit of the dance is apparent. It's a pity there aren't more complete liner notes detailing the origins of these songs. Over the Sea to Skye ♪♪♪♪ (RCA Victor, 1990, prod. Ralph Mace, Paddy Moloney), a second collaboration with the Chieftains, is fiery and dreamy by turns; it's a vibrant musical history lesson, with a few links to Scotland—and one to China. Evocative of the desperation and hope on either side of past generations' mass emigration from Ireland to America, Galway's collaboration with Phil Coulter, Winter's Crossing ♪♪♪♪ (BMG/RCA Victor, 1998), is a widely loved musical quest along the roots and branches of the Celtic diaspora. Legends ♪♪♪½ (BMG/RCA Victor, 1997), by the same duo, is a pleasant and sentimental run-through of best-known Celtic standards, from "Danny Boy" to "Riverdance."

what to buy next: For the best of Galway's pop output, go with the film-score survey In the Pink ♪♪♪♪ (RCA, 1984, prod. Ralph Mace), on which Galway interprets Henry Mancini beautifully with themes as whimsical, poignant, distinctive, and colorful as the characters they complemented. Among the stand-outs: "The Pink Panther" and "Baby Elephant Walk," amusingly rendered by Galway on the petite pennywhistle. Galway's highbrow side is served well on The Lark in the Clear Air ♪♪♪½ (RCA Victor, 1994, prod. Ralph Mace), which finds him reunited with Japanese synthesizer-meister Hiro Fujikake, who generally restrains the new-agey tendencies that proved such an annoyance on Galway's previous collaborations with him. Primarily classical selections, these tracks offer simple, uncluttered vehicles for Galway—a reminder of his prowess as a classical player. And for a bit of everything, Greatest Hits ♪♪♪½ (RCA Victor, 1988, prod. various) is a convenient 20-track collection that neatly covers the range of Galway's pop repertoire, from film themes to traditional tunes, plus Rimsky-Korsakov's "Flight of the Bumblebee" and the Bee Gees' "I Started a Joke."

what to avoid: On The Wind beneath My Wings ♪♪ (RCA Victor, 1991, prod. Ralph Mace) Galway does the show-tune routine. The saccharine quotient is a bit high—"Send in the Clowns," "Memory," and "The Windmills of Your Mind" all on one album—and all the "nice" vibes make for a pleasant mood but don't really challenge him. The Enchanted Forest—Melodies of Japan ♪♪ (RCA Victor, 1990, prod. Ralph Mace) is a fanciful excursion that combines contemporary airs with traditional Japanese melodies. Unfortunately, the arrangements (heavy on synthesizers) lack the earthy feel of traditional instrumentation and often lapse into a kind of spacey new-age blandness.

the rest:
The Wayward Wind ♪♪♪ (RCA, 1982)
Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 ♪♪♪½ (RCA Victor, 1992)
Beauty and the Beast: Galway at the Movies ♪♪♪½ (RCA Victor, 1993)
Wind of Change ♪♪ (RCA Victor, 1994)
The Celtic Minstrel ♪♪♪ (RCA Victor, 1996)
Seasons ♪♪♪ (RCA Victor)
Greatest Hits, Vol. 3 ♪♪♪ (RCA Victor, 1998)

influences:
⏮ Jean-Pierre Rampal
⏭ Ian Anderson

see also: The Chieftains, Phil Coulter

Sandy Masuo

Gamelan Son of Lion

Indonesian, new music

Formed 1974, in Piscataway, NJ, USA. Based in New York, NY, USA.

The lineup has been very fluid over the years. A musicians' collective, they exchange instrumental roles within the group. The current members are: Barbara Benary; Daniel Goode; Mark Steven Brooks; David Demnitz; Patrick Grant; Darryl Gregory; Jody Kruskal; Laura Liben; Larry Simon.

After ethnomusicology studies in Indonesia, Barbara Benary built her own gamelan (tuned percussion) orchestra in 1974 out of materials that included steel keys, cans, and hubcaps. Although the instruments—a set of metallophones tuned to Indonesian slendro and pelog scales—looked as though they stepped out of a Harry Partch or John Cage fantasy, they reproduced the sound of their more elegantly fashioned Indonesian prototypes. Gamelan Son of Lion began as a student ensemble, an outgrowth of the ethnomusicology classes Benary went on to teach at Rutgers University's Livingston College in New Jersey. Fellow Livingston faculty members and contemporary composers Daniel Goode and Phil Corner joined in, and Gamelan Son of Lion became a professional, independent outfit in 1976.

Although Gamelan Son of Lion had primarily played traditional Indonesian compositions during its student ensemble days, Benary also added originals by her students to the programs. The professional ensemble still performs some traditional compositions, but the group's focus, both in performance and recording, has been on new music. Gamelan Son of Lion has debuted more than 100 pieces since its inception. In general, the pieces don't adhere to Indonesian compositional patterns and rhythms, but capitalize on the exotic (to Western ears) sound of the Indonesian scales and the liquid, trance-inducing sound of the hammers striking various keys and gongs. Indonesian flutes, electronic music, and Western instruments such as the clarinet and guitar are also added to the fusion. The group has performed music by experimental composers from Indonesia as well. Gamelan Son of Lion played at Expo '86 in Vancouver as guests of the Indonesian government, and visited Java in 1996. The group performs about a half-dozen to a dozen times a year, and its side ventures include collaborations with dance companies and other performance troupes.

what's available: Approaching its 20th year, Gamelan Son of Lion documented the diversity of pieces in its repertoire with New Gamelan/New York ♪♪♪♪ (GSOL Records, 1995, prod. Mark Steven Brooks). It comes very close to including the kitchen sink. David Simons's "Kebyar Leyak" uses an electronic sample of a wine goblet struck by a pencil to create a digital gamelan in order to evoke both Balinese poltergeists (leyak) and UFOs. Goode somehow reproduces the slendro scale with clarinet on the appropriately titled "Slendro Clarinet"—and subverts any Western expectations of music on that instrument. The title of Gamelan as a Second Language ♪♪♪½ (GSOL Records, 1996) sums up the intent of these six compositions by David Demnitz, a pidgin of new music and Indonesian instruments but not quite as eclectic as the earlier release. Both recordings are available through Gamelan Son of Lion, 167 Spring St., New York, NY 10012 USA.

worth searching for: Gamelan Son of Lion has rarely recorded, but their older releases are currently all available on cassette. The best place to start is with Gamelan in the New World, Vol. 1 ♪♪♪♪ (Smithsonian Folkways, 1979) and Gamelan in the New World, Vol. 2 ♪♪♪♪ (Smithsonian Folkways, 1980). Featuring compositions by Corner, Goode, Benary, Peter Griggs, and others, these collections, originally on vinyl, established the focus of Gamelan Son of Lion's Indonesian/new music fusion. Another two cassettes, Pieces for Gamelan Son of Lion ♪♪♪½

newfoundland music

Like its geographical location, the traditional music of the Canadian island province of Newfoundland has always been somewhat on the periphery. Settled by a wide variety of ethnic groups, Newfoundland produces music heavily reflective of its strong ties to the British Isles. The Avalon Peninsula on Newfoundland's eastern edge possesses strong Irish roots, while French traditions commingle with Scottish Gaelic ones on the island's west coast. The English song heritage remains Newfoundland's most vibrant attribute of folk culture, and was a drawing card for many well-known folksong collectors. The instrumental music of Newfoundland is social music, for dancing, and the button accordion reigns supreme. The island's modern fiddle tradition is based upon the playing of two main pioneers, Rufus Guinchard and Emile Benoit. During the 1960s and early 1970s, English folk-revival bands like Fairport Convention influenced the Newfoundland scene and, in the spirit of that seminal ensemble, outfits like Figgy Duff and the Wonderful Grand Band merged the traditional instrumental and vocal music of their own island with a rock 'n' roll sensibility. The influence of Figgy Duff in particular is readily apparent in the commercial success of Newfoundland's more contemporary Celtic-rock bands like the Punters and Great Big Sea.

see also: Great Big Sea, Jim Payne, Kelly Russell

Cliff McGann

(New Wilderness Audiographics, 1984) and Gamelan Son of Lion ♪♪♪♪ (New Wilderness Audiographics, 1985), are available from the group. The former consists of six pieces by Benary, and the latter is another eclectic assortment featuring works by Benary, Goode, Corner, Demnitz and others, as well as the ensemble composition "Gamelan NEA."

influences:

⏮ John Cage, Pauline Oliveiros, Karlheinz Stockhausen

⏭ Robert Fripp, Steve Reich, Rahayu Supanggah

Salvatore Caputo

Garcia Brothers

Traditional Native American

Formed c. 1965 in San Juan Pueblo, NM, USA. Based in San Juan Pueblo, NM, USA.

Jerry Garcia, drums, gourd rattles, bells, vocals; Santiago Garcia, drums, gourd rattles, bells, vocals; Peter Garcia, drums, gourd rattles, bells, vocals; Cipriano Garcia, drums, gourd rattles, bells, vocals. (All members are from USA.)

San Juan Pueblo is one of the oldest communities in North America. When the Spanish arrived in the 16th century, the Tewa people had already been living there for hundreds of generations. The invaders from Spain and later the United States tried to stamp out all Tewa cultural expression, which drove the Tewa to practice their ceremonies in secret, preserving them to this day. The Garcia Brothers are known as great singers and composers, and they have created ceremonial songs for most of their adult lives.

what's available: The stark beauty of the Tewa ceremonial songs on Songs of My People ♪♪♪♪ (Music of the World, 1994, prod. Bob Haddad, James Lascelles) is captured with state-of-the-art equipment, both live in the field and in the studio. Peter Garcia and Dr. Linda Goodman have written detailed liner notes that provide social and musical insights into Tewa ceremonial traditions.

influences:

⏮ Traditional Tewa music

j. poet

Carlos Gardel

Tango

Born Charles Romauld Gardés, December 1890, in Toulouse, France. Died June 24, 1935, in Colombia.

While the history of the great 20th-century musics is fraught with dynamic paradoxes, few are as deliciously ironic as the genesis of Argentine tango—and the story of why and how an expatriate French singer carried it from the barrios and bordellos of Buenos Aires to high-society ballrooms, cinema, and the great concert halls of Europe.

First of all, tango is immigrant music. Ten years before Carlos Gardel was born, Buenos Aires was inundated by thousands of poor folk from Spain, Italy, France, and Germany (in fact, German citizen Heinreich Band invented the accordion-like bandoneón, tango's core instrument). You can imagine the sociocultural malaise: fetid, overcrowded tenements, mean streets, ancient enemies nose-to-nose, violence, fear, paranoia, circle-of-poverty-forever-unbroken. In this shunned City of the Dead and Dying, the life-affirming hedonism of the brothel was a deeper saving grace to the pissed-off immigrants than any Sunday morning at Mass. The bordellos were free-zones of sex, drugs, and tango (the rock 'n' roll of its time). A roughneck rhythm mutation of Argentine milonga stateliness and dusky Cuban habanera roil, tango's original function was to inspire and accompany the strutting, slashing, pelvis-to-pelvis pas de deux macho-foreplay dances of the johns.

This was the netherworld that greeted French immigrant Mademoiselle Gardés and her three-year-old son Carlos when they docked in 1893. It was a hard-knock life that forced Carlos to hustle small change while most kids were in school. As he got older, the waif found steady odd-job work in bordellos. Drawn to the tango music, he began to hang out with the musicians. Soon, he joined in, rocking some very bawdy folk songs with a near-operatic, fervidly sensuous, emotionally transcendent baritone voice. This fusion of soul and body was crucial to tango's evolution. B.G. (Before Gardel), tango was a low-class, tawdry instrumental genre. A.G. (1917, the year of his first recording), tango ascended to universal soul music. Gardel's tango was indeed sexy, but it was also noble, humble, poetic, romantic, and urbane. From 1917 on, Gardel and tango never looked back.

As well as being a prolific writer of hit songs, the charismatic Gardel was the first real pop culture icon—proto-Valentino profile, gangster fedora, tailored suit, lounge-lizard cigarette—to blow up outta South America. In 1925 the prodigal son dazzled his homies from Gay Paree to Marseille. A bona fide superstar, Gardel reached global immortality after his 1934 acting/scoring Hollywood debut Tango on Broadway (his four previous films were Argentine). Sensing that 1935 would be his year of tango world domination, Gardel acted in and scored back-to-back flicks (El Dia Que Me Quieras and Tango Bar) and binge-recorded eight of his greatest songs (March 19–20, 1935). Three months and four days later, Gardel and his co-composer Alfredo Le Pera died in a plane crash over Colombia (ironically—and historically—Gardel's teenage protégé Astor Piazzola missed the flight). The tragedy only hastened his beatification as the patron saint of tango.

what to buy: Even though the majority of Gardel's catalog is currently import-only, the domestically released The Best of Carlos Gardel ♪♪♪♪♪ (Hemisphere, 1998) pretty much renders that situation moot. By cherry-picking 20 songs (including last-session gems "Volver," "El Dia Que Me Quieras," and "Amargura") from the master's peak era (1926–1935), this disc is pretty much his definitive one.

influences:

⏭ Astor Piazzola, Dino Saluzzi, Pablo Zeigler

see also: Astor Piazzolla

Tom Terrell

Garmarna

Modern Swedish folk

Formed 1990, in Sweden. Based in Sweden.

Stefan Brisland-Ferner, violins, viola, hurdy-gurdy, bowed harp, jew's-harps, background vocals, rhythm; Emma Hardelin, vocals, violin, flute; Jense Hoglin, drums, percussion; Gotte Ringqvist, lute, violin, bowed harp, jew's-harps, background vocals, rhythm; Rickard Westman, bouzouki, guitars.

Believe it or not, a Swedish performance of Hamlet was the inspiration for Garmarna. The traditional Swedish score planted a seed with Westman, Ringqvist, and Brisland-Ferner, and a week later the band was born. Within a year they were playing festivals and had added Hoglin to the band. In 1992, recording their first EP Garmarna, they brought in their friend Hardelin to expand the vocal possibilities. At first she was just a guest, then became a full-time member in 1993. On the strength of the EP the band toured Scandinavia. To that point the musicians had been playing traditional music on traditional instruments. Now they decided to incorporate samples into their sonic spectrum, mixing the very old and the very new in a dark marriage. The year 1994 saw the release of their debut album Vittrad (Crumbling Away), which was widely hailed as a true breakthrough in Swedish folk music, as if a subdued Nine Inch Nails had been transported back to the Middle Ages. The roots were decidedly Nordic, barren, and windswept, but the technology of loops and samples behind fiddles and hurdy-gurdies was something quite new, a folk-rock for the 1990s. It was a start, and the American release brought them attention in the United States and elsewhere. However, the walls really came down with the 1996 album Gods Musicians —which even made the charts in Sweden! Darker yet than its predecessor, if that were possible, it put all the pieces together in a still more organic way, highlighting the stark intensity of Hardelin's voice. The traditional base remained vital in the sound, but a number of the tracks were original compositions, ranging from the gorgeous to the very, very scary in the way that Garmarna seems to have established as its own.

what to buy: Vittrad (Crumbling Away) ♪♪♪♪ (Omnium, 1994, prod. Nicklas Holmgren, Hans Lebanzski, Garmarna) is a revelation of sound; this is where Ingmar Bergman's medieval vistas met cyberpunk. Gods Musicians ♪♪♪♪ (Omnium, 1996, prod. Sank) capitalizes on the magic—or sorcery as the case may be—lyrically dripping with gore as all the best folk music should. No big changes in the sound, but it all works even more smoothly. Further perfecting that sound on Vengeance ♪♪♪♪ (NorthSide, 1999), the band proves the end of the world still has quite a bright future.

solo outings:

Triakel (Emma Hardelin)

Triakel ♪♪♪♪ (NorthSide, 1998)

influences:

⏮ Traditional Swedish music

Chris Nickson

Djivan Gasparyan

Armenian folk

Born 1928, in Solag, Armenia. Based in Yerevan, Armenia.

Gasparyan is a master of the duduk, an Armenian double-reed wind instrument that has a sound similar to an oboe and is carved from apricot wood, which is said to give the instrument its unique timbre. He is self-taught, inspired by the folk music he heard in his youth. By age 20 he was playing with the Tatul Altounian National Song and Dance Ensemble. Gasparian became one of Armenia's best-known musicians after contributing to Peter Gabriel's soundtrack for The Last Temptation of Christ. Since then he has toured extensively and collaborated with the Kronos Quartet. He also teaches duduk at the Yerevan Conservatory.

what to buy: Apricots from Eden ♪♪♪½ (Traditional Crossroads, 1996, prod. Harold G. Hagopian) offers the fruits of traditional folk music from Armenia, played on duduk with dan duduk (drone) and d'hol (drum) accompaniment. These are dance tunes and slow folk songs, played with a melancholic minor-key bluesy-ness that's countered by Levon Arshakung's subtle percussion.

what to buy next: Ask Me No Questions ♪♪♪ (Traditional Crossroads, 1991, prod. Harold G. Hagopian) is a moving solo album of Armenian folk tunes drawn from the country's Christian and pagan traditions.

the rest:

(With Michael Brook) Black Rock ♪♪♪½ (RealWorld, 1998)

influences:

⏮ Muradian Ensemble

j. poet

2/8/2 dick gaughan

Djivan Gasparyan

Dick Gaughan

Scottish, Celtic

Born May 17, 1948, in Leith, Scotland. Based in Edinburgh, Scotland.

A handful of singers come to mind who just have "it," that elusive ability to resonate with the soul through the sheer sound of their voice. Nusrat Fateh Ali Khan, Sarah Carter, Umm Kulthum, Robert Johnson . . . certainly a list of this type must also include Dick Gaughan. Any discussion of the man's talents must begin with the voice. His fierce passion for Scotland and its people must follow a close second. After that one can list his skills as a composer, his devotion to the fight for social justice, his gift for finding and interpreting the songs of others, and his accomplishments as a guitarist.

Gaughan grew up in a close-knit community in the town of Leith (now part of Edinburgh). His father, an immigrant from Ireland, was a fiddler and speaker of the Irish language; his mother was a Scot, with a repertoire of songs from the highlands in both English and Gaelic. It was in this household steeped in song that Gaughan was raised. He began working as a professional musician in 1970. He was an early member of the Boys of the Lough and appears on their first album. He was a founding member of the Scottish folk-rock group Five Hand Reel. More recently he founded and produced the group ClanAlba. Gaughan is also interested in formal composition and has written music for several BBC TV films. As a passionate singer who wears his love of land on his sleeve, he is clearly the finest interpreter of traditional Scottish ballads known as the "Muckle Sangs" (the big songs). To them he bestows a power, warmth, and immediacy that brings life to these songs of great antiquity. He is also a master interpreter of Scotland's national poet, Robert Burns. His deep commitment to social justice is always present in his music, which has profoundly influenced younger performers such as Billy Bragg.

what to buy: Handful of Earth ♪♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1981, prod. Dick Gaughan) is simply a landmark recording. Gaughan is in perfect voice, and the balance between truly superb political commentary and traditional Scottish music is stunning. The incredible beauty Gaughan brings to Burns's "Now Westlin Winds" is enough to make the recording a must-have, but listen to the passion in "The Snows They Melt the Soonest" if you need a further example of Gaughan's gift. His versions of Leon Rossellson's "The World Turned Upside Down" and Ed Picket's "Workers Song" are as powerful performances of politically conscious material as you can find.

what to buy next: A Different Kind of Love Song ♪♪♪♪½ (Appleseed, 1997, prod. Dick Gaughan, Carsten Linde) is not of the magnitude of Handful of Earth, simply because it does not contain the traditional Scottish pieces to offset the social commentary. But so what? This is Dick Gaughan, and he could be singing "The Best of the Carpenters" and it would still be superb music. The passion is there throughout, from the amazing "Stand Up for Judas" through his introspective interpretation of Joe South's "The Games People Play." The Appleseed people have added a bonus version of "The World Turned Upside Down" and a great Scot love song, "Lassie Lie Near Me," that helps to bring a little balance for those overwhelmed by the overt political material.

the rest:

More Forever ♪♪♪½ (Leader, 1972)
Gaughan ♪♪♪♪ (Topic, 1978)
Andy Irvine and Dick Gaughan: Parallel Lines ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1983 /Appleseed, 1997)
Live in Edinburgh ♪♪♪♪½ (Celtic Music, 1985 /Appleseed, 1994)
True and Bold: Songs of the Scottish Miners ♪♪♪ (Struc, 1986)
Call It Freedom ♪♪♪½ (Celtic Musicm, 1989)
Sail On ♪♪♪♪ (Appleseed, 1996)
Redwood Cathedral ♪♪♪♪½ (Appleseed, 1998)

The Boys of the Lough

The Boys of the Lough ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1973)

worth searching for: And now for something completely different—a Dick Gaughan instrumental record: Coppers and Brass ♪♪♪♪½ (Topic/Green Linnet, 1977, prod. Tony Engle). This record shows us just what a skilled musician lies beneath that magnificent voice. It sets his string playing in a very traditional context, as Gaughan blazes through a set of reels, jigs, hornpipes, and marches.

influences:

⏮ Bill Broonzy, Woody Guthrie, Bert Jansch, Luke Kelley, Ewan McColl

⏭ Mary Black , Billy Bragg, Silly Wizard

see also: The Boys of the Lough, Andy Irvine

Jared Snyder

Frankie Gavin

Irish traditional

Born 1956, in Corrandulla, County Galway, Ireland. Based in Galway, Ireland.

Raised in a musical family of Northeast County Galway, just across Lough Corrib from the Connemara Gaeltacht (Gaelic-speaking area), Frankie Gavin grew up surrounded by traditional music to become one of Ireland's finest fiddle players. He is a supreme technician and can produce the most complex and intense fiddle music while remaining absolutely at ease on the instrument. One of his main sources of inspiration is the music of emigrant Irish performers who recorded in the United States during the 78 rpm era. In particular, Gavin credits Galway piper Patsy Touhey, Sligo fiddle player James Morrison, Leitrim flute player John McKenna, and the Flanagan Brothers, originally from Waterford, for expanding, through their recordings, his repertoire of techniques and tunes as well as the general flavor of his music. A remarkable solo artist, Gavin is perhaps better known as one of the founders of the long-lived Irish group De Danann (or De Dannan, as they spell it now). Gavin was still of school age when the band came together during the early 1970s in music sessions held around Spiddal, County Galway, then home of Gavin's longtime partner-in-crime, bouzouki player Alec Finn. After coming to the United States for the first time in 1976 to participate in the extraordinary festivities surrounding the bicentennial celebration in the nation's capital, the band toured again the following year, and on that occasion, Gavin recorded his first solo album for the New York label Shanachie. Being an outstanding flute and whistle player as well, Gavin was inspired to make a flute album, Croch Suas É—Up and Away, in 1983. His accompanist this time was Leitrim fiddle and piano player Charlie Lennon, whose excellent compositions in traditional style have become well known through Gavin's performances; in 1985 Gavin participated in the recording of Lennon's The Emigrant Suite, and again in his second suite, Island Wedding, recorded in 1991 for Radio Telefis Éireann (RTE). In the interim, Gavin produced one of his best albums and a landmark of Irish music when he recorded A Tribute to Joe Cooley in 1986 with accordionist Paul Brock. Gavin and Brock had first met Cooley and each other in 1973, shortly before the legendary accordionist's untimely death. Another outstanding solo album, Frankie Goes to Town, followed in 1991. That same year, Gavin was touring in France with an offshoot of De Dannan—accordion player Aidan Coffey and guitarist Arty McGlynn—when the trio was recorded during a concert in Paris. This exceptional document, released in 1994 as Irlande by the French world-music label Ocora, as well as the few 1984 tracks from German festivals made available on Ireland, show the kind of powerhouse performances De Dannan audiences have been rewarded with all these years. Although the full band released a new album in 1996, it appears Gavin is busy nowadays with all kinds of solo ventures. But as long as Gavin and Finn continue to play music together, no one will be surprised to see De Dannan get on the road once again.

what to buy: Traditional Music of Ireland ♪♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1977, prod. Richard Nevins, Daniel Michael Collins) was Gavin's first solo album, recorded during a De Dannan tour in the United States. The recording may show its age in the less-than-stellar sound quality, but Gavin's fiddle playing is riveting, and Alec Finn's trademark bouzouki accompaniment is just what's needed. Frankie Goes to Town ♪♪♪♪♪ (The Bee's Knees, 1989/Green Linnet, 1991, prod. Frankie Gavin), the first album to be released on Gavin's own label, could not be more aptly titled. Gavin, often performing duets with himself by doubling on second fiddle, viola, or flute, plays up a storm on a variety of old and newer tunes. Among the latter are some of Gavin's own compositions, as well as a good number of tunes by his favorite composer, Charlie Lennon, who happens to be his piano accompanist for most of the album. Irlande ♪♪♪♪½ (Ocora, 1994, prod. Radio France, Association Culture et Musique Irlandaises), available through Harmonia Mundi, is a live recording made in France in 1991 and featuring Gavin with Aidan Coffey (accordion) and Arty McGlynn (guitar). The pace is furious, yet the performance is incredibly tight, and the interplay between the musicians will make your head spin. This is truly superior musicianship at work, of the kind that can be heard whenever De Dannan appears in concert. And Gavin's opening remarks on styles of vocal encouragement to the musicians are priceless, even if probably lost on the original French audience.

what to avoid: An Irish Christmas ♪♪ (The Bee's Knees, 1992/Shanachie, 1996, prod. Frankie Gavin, Carl Hession), retitled Shamrocks and Holly—An Irish Christmas Celebration and credited to Frankie Gavin with the Carl Hession Orchestra for its U.S. release, contains very little Irish traditional music—namely, Tommy Coen's great reel "Christmas Eve"—and a lot of rather cheesy arrangements of Christmas standards.

worth searching for: Although only available in the United States as imports, Gavin's two albums on the Gael-Linn label are must-haves for Irish music devotees. Croch Suas É—Up and Away ♪♪♪♪½ (Gael-Linn, 1983, prod. Frankie Gavin, Charlie Lennon, Jackie Small) is officially Gavin's "flute album," even though he also plays fiddle, tin whistle, and even accordion on it—combining all of them on one track credited to "Frankie Gavin's Irish Orchestra"—with Charlie Lennon (piano) and Johnny "Ringo" McDonagh (bodhrán) accompanying. The playing is as good as it gets and the material reflects Gavin's main sources of inspiration: old tunes from the 78 rpm era and new compositions like those of Charlie Lennon. A Tribute to Joe Cooley ♪♪♪♪♪ (Gael-Linn, 1986, prod. Frankie Gavin) proves, if needed, that Gavin takes after James Morrison in more ways than one and that, like the great Sligo fiddler of the 1920s, he is an awesome duet player. His partner here is accordionist Paul Brock, of recent Moving Cloud fame, who shares with Gavin a passion for early recordings of Irish and Irish-American music, and their accompanist on piano is none other than Charlie Lennon, one of the best in the business. As it should be for a tribute to Joe Cooley, the famous accordion player from Peterswell, County Galway, the pace of the music is relaxed, so that the interplay of the two lead instruments can be savored in all its intricacies. Gavin was one of the guest musicians on Andy Irvine's excellent Rainy Sundays . . . Windy Dreams . . . ♪♪♪♪ (Tara, 1980, prod. Dónal Lunny). Gavin's performance of Tommy Coen's reel "Christmas Eve" is definitely one of the highlights of the album, as is the Bulgarian "Paidushko Horo" on which he plays fiddle and flute. Ireland ♪♪♪♪ (WDR, 1993, prod. Christian Scholze, Jean Trouillet, Jan Reichow), a collection of live recordings made in Germany, includes five tracks featuring Gavin solo or with Belfast flute player Desi Wilkinson and master uilleann piper Liam O'Flynn.

influences:

- Flanagan Brothers, John McKenna, James Morrison, Patsy Touhey
- John Carty, Paddy Glackin, Seán Kane, Tommy Peoples

see also: De Dannan, Alec Finn, Andy Irvine, Moving Cloud, Liam O'Flynn

Philippe Varlet

Gazoline

Zouk

Formed 1982 in Paris, France. Based in Paris, France.

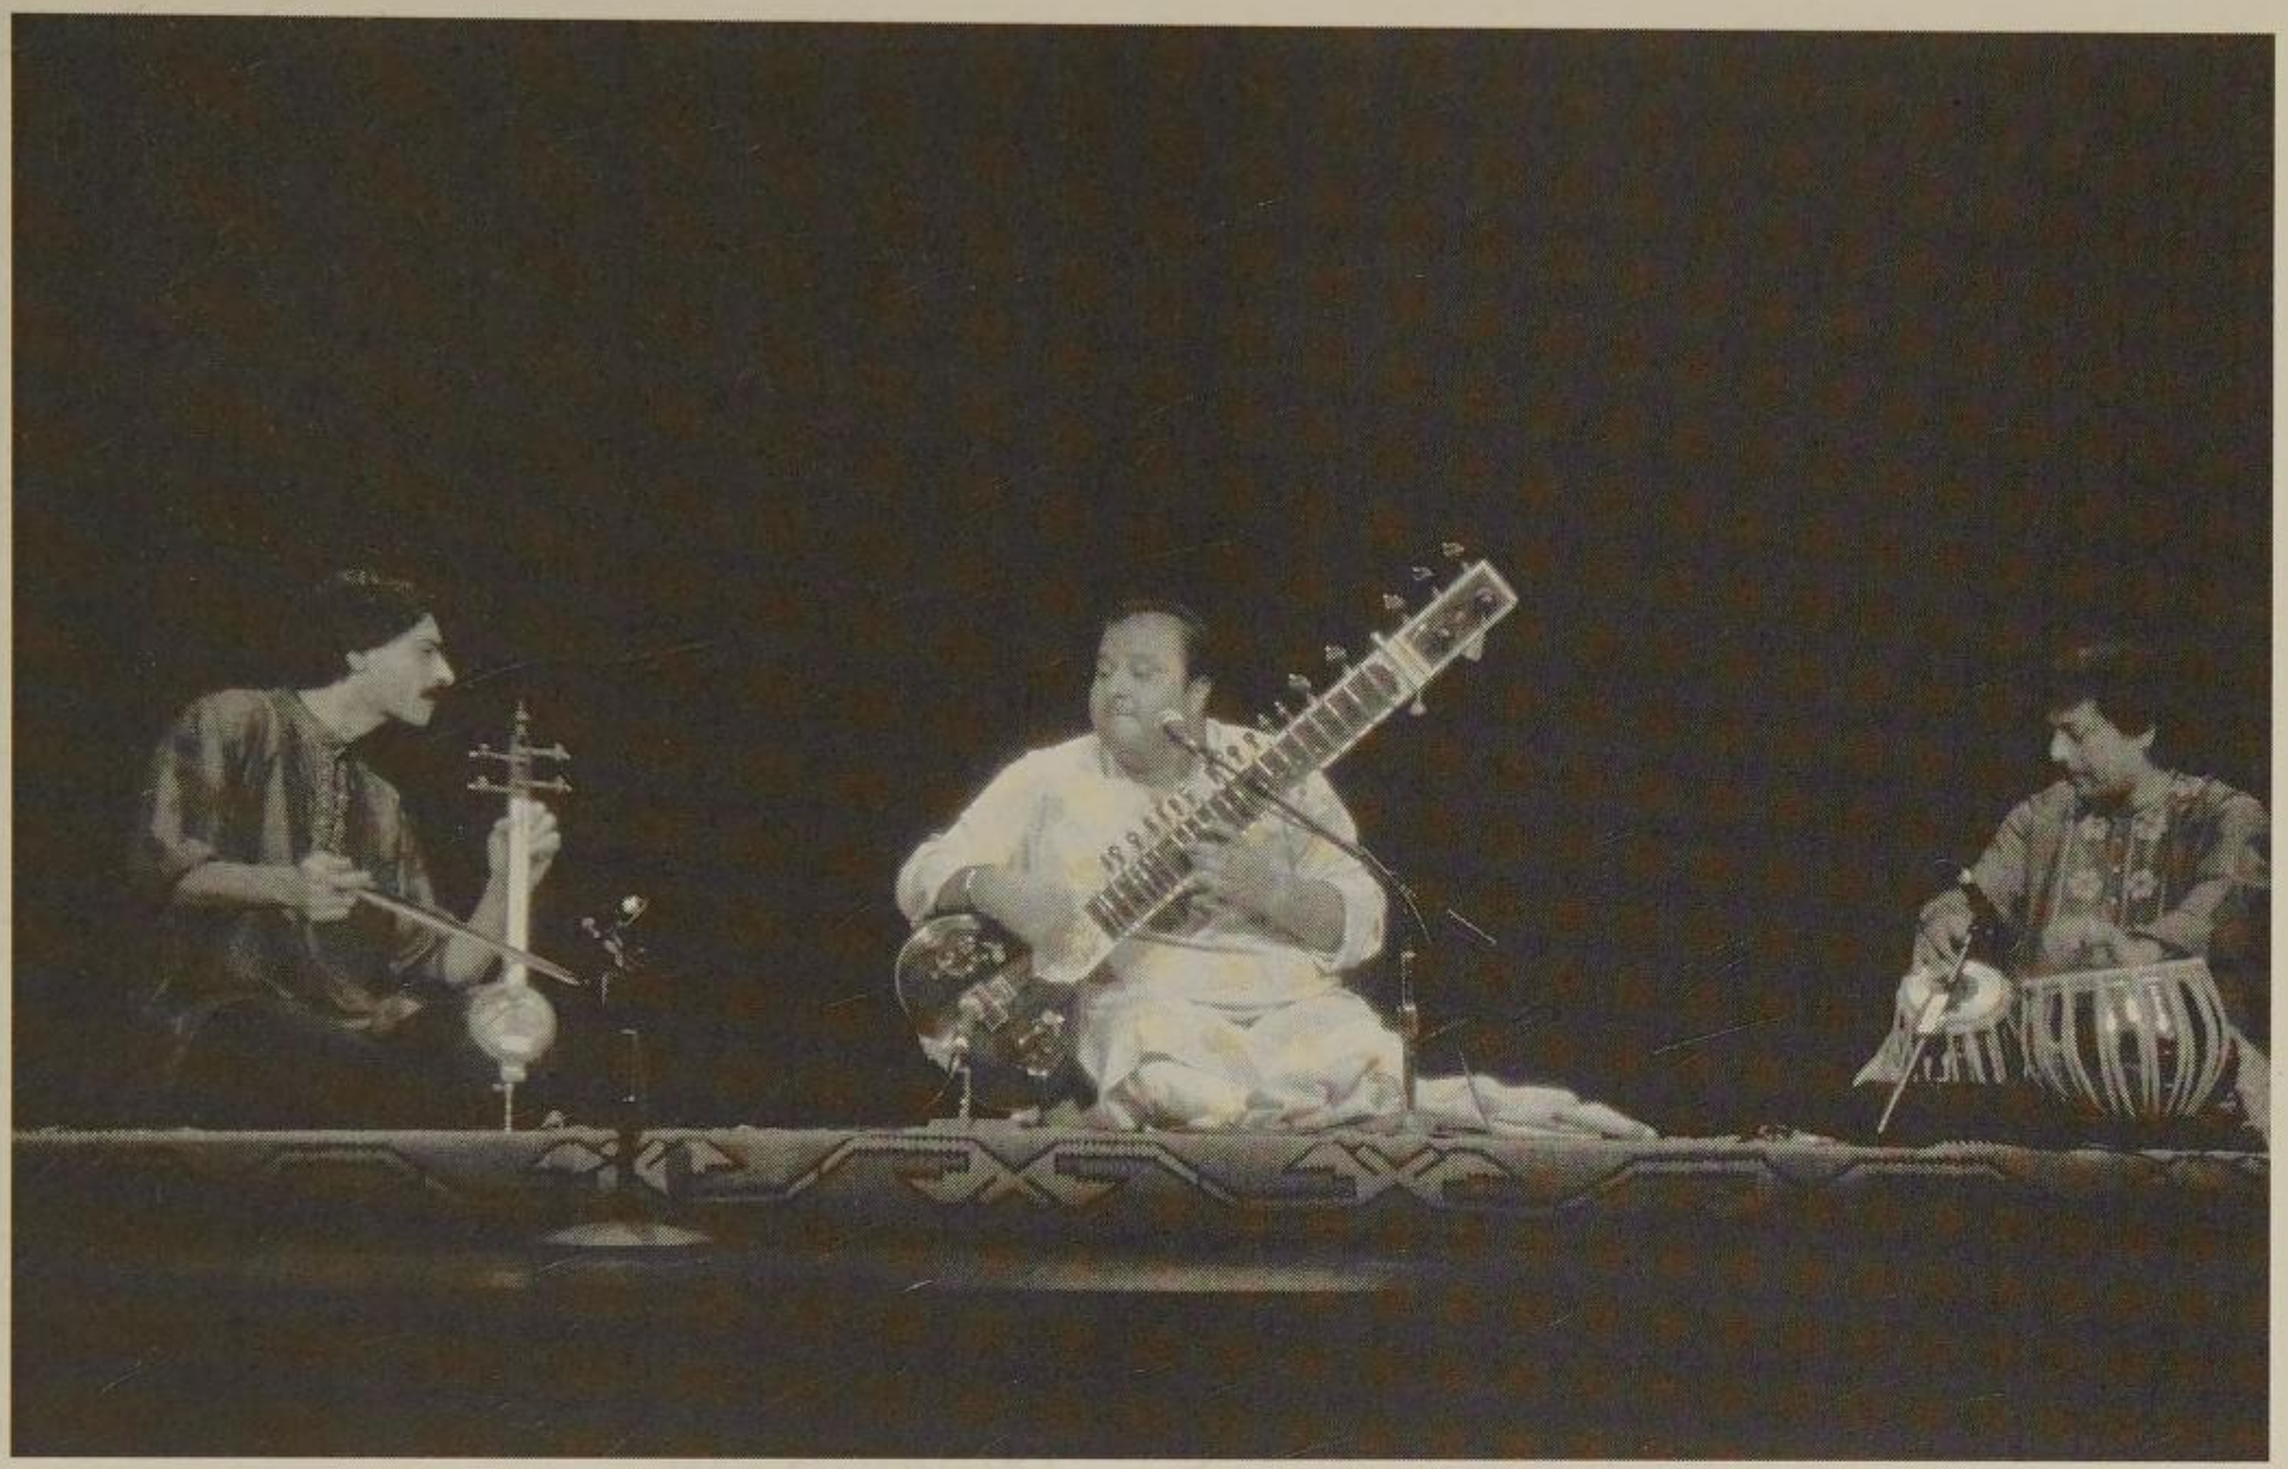
Pier Rosier (Martinique), lead vocals, leader; Marc L'Mira, bass, synthesizers, percussion, vocals; Alain Cebarec, vocals; Jerico Boura, drums, percussion; Philip Aubou, drums; Alain Joseph, guitar; Jean-Francois Kellner, guitar, vocoder; Frederic Legall, synthesizer; Jean-Cristophe Prudhomme, keyboards; Laurent Albert, percussion; Edith Lefel, vocals; Nicolas Guerret, tenor sax; Mark Sims, trombone; Christian Martinez, trumpet; Alain Hato, sax; Denis Leloup, trombone; Jean-Louis Damant, trombone; Eric Jiausserand, trumpet; Philipe Slominsky, trumpet.

Gazoline's founder, Pier Rosier, was born in Lamentin, Martinique, and grew up playing a style of Carnival music called Chouval Bwa. He moved to Paris to pursue his career, and when Kassav' took off in 1982 with a variation on Carnival music they called zouk, he put together Gazoline to play a less-produced, more-traditional version.

what to buy: Zouk Obsession ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1990, prod. Pier Rosier) is a greatest-hits compilation from one of the few bands that's been able to challenge Kassav"s domination of the zouk market. These six tracks are brimming over with energy, but the collection clocks in at a short 35 minutes.

the rest:

Pier Rosier ♪♪♪♪ (Sonodisc Frace, 1997)
Bidongaz ♪♪♪♪ (Melodie France, 1988)



influences:

◀◀ Vikings of Guadeloupe, K Percussion, Kassav', Experience 7

▶▶ Malavoi, Kwak

j. poet

Ghazal /Kayhan Kalhor

Indo-Iranian fusion

Ghazal formed 1996 in New York, NY, USA; Kalhor born 1963 in Tehran, Iran. Based in New York, NY, USA.

Kayhan Kalhor (Iran), leader, kamancheh (Iranian spike fiddle); Shujaat Hussain Khan (India), sitar; Swapan Chaudhuri (India), tabla.

Kayhan Kalhor, a traditionally minded Iranian musician, is a master of the kamancheh, a fiddle-like instrument with four strings believed to be the ancestor of all Arabic and European fiddles. He was born in Tehran, Iran, and began studying the instrument at the age of seven. He mastered Iran's formal classical music at an early age, including the system of radif and dastgahs, which resemble and are thought to predate the Indian system of ragas. He won national competitions of the kamancheh throughout high school, but after the Islamic Revolution he relocated, first to Italy and then to Canada. In 1990 he founded the Dastan Ensemble with vocalist Shahram Nazeri and two other young Persian musicians and has toured widely with them, performing folk, devotional, and classical music from Iran. The group won first prize at the 1991 Sacred Music Festival in Fez, Morocco. In the mid 1990s Kalhor moved again, to New York City, where he began a solo recording career. He also got the idea of forming a world-music fusion group after a performance by Shujaat Hussain Khan of India. When he was introduced to Khan by a mutual friend, they began rehearsing and were amazed at how seamlessly the two traditions fit together. Their debut album Lost Songs of the Silk Road received critical raves, and their performances together, with Swapan Chaudhuri lending his support on tabla, have been widely praised. At presstime they had just completed an as-yet untitled follow-up recording, planned for January 2000 release.

what to buy: Kalhor and Khan developed the pieces on Lost Songs of the Silk Road ♪♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1997, prod. Brian Cullman, Kayhan Kalhor) in the studio, starting with a single melodic phrase and exploring its possibilities according to the rules of their respective cultures. The music spins off into incredibly complex yet subtle directions, driven by the daring improvisations of the three soloists. As Night Falls on the Silk Road ♪♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1998, prod. Brian Cullman) is another tour de force journey from three master musicians. By plucking the strings of the kamancheh below the bridge, Kalhor is able to produce single notes that often provide a brilliant counterpoint to Shujaat Khan's sitar.

what to buy next: Scattering Stars Like Dust ♪♪♪♪ (Traditional Crossroads, 1998, prod. Harold Hagopian) is a "solo" outing by Kalhor, supported by the tombak (Iranian clay drum) of Pejman Hadadi. The piece is based on the dastgah chahargah and incorporates elements drawn for Persian classical and folkloric tradition. The enclosed booklet includes detailed notes on Persian music and its history.

influences:

◀◀ Ostad Ali A. Bahari, Baqer Khan, Hoisen Khan, Ravi Shankar

j. poet

Bikram Ghosh

North Indian classical

Born 1966, in Calcutta, India. Based in India.

Ghosh is one of the most promising young tabla (double hand drum) virtuosos on the scene today. He was born into a musical family and taught by his father, respected tabla player Pandit Shankar Ghosh, who in the 1960s was one of the first Indian musicians to travel to the United States (to perform with Ali Akbar Khan at the Ali Akbar College of Music). Spending part of his childhood in San Rafael, California, Bikram absorbed a variety of Western influences, and in addition to Indian classical music his training included playing in school bands and dabbling in non-Indian percussion instruments like the congas. But despite an interest in fusing Western and Indian musical forms, Ghosh's output has been primarily rooted in North Indian classical traditions, although he has also become noted as one of the few tabla players to master the South Indian karnatak style of drumming, thanks to his 11 years studying under mridangam virtuoso Pandit S. Shekhar. A nimble tabla player with a brilliant penchant for improvisation, Ghosh has become a favorite accompanist for Indian music legends like Ravi Shankar, Ali Akbar Khan, and Viswa Mohan Bhatt in recent years. But his most frequent collaborator is santur (hammered dulcimer) master Tarun Bhattacharya, with whom he has recorded several impressive albums.

what's available: Talking Tabla ♪♪♪♪ (Music of the World, 1997, prod. Bob Haddad, Randy Friel) may be of limited interest to those who aren't spellbound by masterful percussive feats, as the simple musical backdrops on these relatively short compositions grow fairly repetitive at times. But as a rare solo tabla recording, the album is simply stunning from a rhythmic standpoint, showcasing lightning-quick fingertips and a flawless knack for improvisation that led no less knowledgeable a critic than Ravi Shankar himself to proclaim, "I have not heard tabla so beautiful as Bikram's for a long, long time."

the rest:

(With Tarun Bhattacharya) Kirvani ♪♪♪♪½ (Music of the World, 1996)
(With Ravi Shankar) Chants of India ♪♪♪½ (Angel, 1997)
(With Anoushka Shankar) Anoushka ♪♪♪♪ (Angel, 1998)

worth searching for: Over the years, Ghosh has recorded a variety of hard-to-find and cassette-only releases with V.M. Bhatt, Ajoy Chakraborty, and Tarun Bhattacharya. Suffice it to say that every recording featuring any of these Indian music masters is well worth owning.

influences:

◀◀ Gyan Prakash Ghosh, Shankar Ghosh, Zakir Hussain, Ali Akbar Khan, S. Shekhar

see also: V.M. Bhatt, Tarun Bhattacharya, Ali Akbar Khan, Anoushka Shankar, Ravi Shankar

Bret Love

Gilberto Gil

Brazilian pop

Born Gilberto Passos Gil Morreira, June 26, 1942, in Salvador, Bahia, Brazil. Based in Rio de Janeiro.

Gilberto Gil has been at the forefront of Brazil's popular music since the mid-1960s. A skilled guitar player and expressive vocalist, Gil has brought the pop sounds of his native country to international success. Gil was raised by his mother and her family, and the sounds of local bands, street singers, and accordion player Cinezio had a profound effect on him as a youngster. By the age of three, he was already determined to become a musician. Originally pursuing this dream at an accordion academy, Gil switched to the guitar after hearing a bossa nova recording by João Gilberto on the radio. He then went on to perform with the band Os Desafinados (The Out of Tune), in addition to writing advertising jingles and appearing on local television.

As his musical career grew, Gil remained committed to his academic pursuits. Although he studied business administration at Bahia University, Gil was inspired by a music seminar he attended to branch into songwriting in a less anonymous genre than the ad tune. His first success came when Tris Baianas recorded his song "Bem Devagar (Very Slowly)" in 1962. The following year, Gil recorded a double EP, Sua M'Sica, Sua Interpretarro (His Music, His Interpretation). In 1964 he joined with Caetano Veloso, Maria Bethânia, Gal Costa, and Tom Zé to perform a revue, Nus, Por Ex-

Gilberto Gil

amplo (Us, For Example), at the Vila Velha Theater in Salvador. Gil presented his first solo show, Invent-rio, a year later.

Following his graduation from Bahia University, Gil accepted a job as a customs inspector for Gessy Lever in Sao Paulo. For the next few years, Gil worked during the day and hung out at night in music clubs. After meeting lyricist Capinan Torquato Neto, Gil agreed to a songwriting partnership. Reuniting with Veloso, Costa, Bethânia, and Zé, he also performed in another revue, Arena Canta Bahia. Gil then went on to become a regular presence on Brazilian television. In 1966 he appeared on O Fino Da Bossa, a show hosted by singer Elis Regina. Gil's performance of his song "Louvaca (Praise)" was so potent that he was offered a recording contract by the Philips label. Moving to Rio de Janeiro with his wife Belina and daughter Nora in 1966, Gil placed first in a prestigious International Song Festival with his tune "Minha Sinhora (My Lady)." Following the release of his debut album, Louvacao, in 1967, Gil was chosen to host a television show, Ensaio Geral.

In the late 1960s, Gil separated from his wife and began living with vocalist Nana Caymmi. Although the protest songs he was then writing made him popular amongst Brazil's Tropicalia movement (a Western-influenced groundswell of tradition-based rock), Gil's political stance upset the military dictatorship then in power. In 1969 he was arrested along with Veloso and imprisoned until being granted exile in England. While there, Gil was befriended by the country's leading rock artists. Able to return to his native country in 1972, he responded with an album, Expresso 2222, that included two Brazilian hits—"Back in Bahia" and "Oriente."

Gil collaborated and recorded a duo album with Brazilian vocalist Jorge Ben, Gil & Jorge, in 1975. The following year, he briefly resumed his partnership with Veloso, Costa, and Bethânia. With the release of his solo albums Realce (1978) and Nightingale (1979), Gil was acclaimed as a leading Brazilian jazz artist; his groundbreaking performance at the Montreux Jazz Festival was featured on the two-CD set Gil in Montreux in 1978. Although he based his sound on traditional Brazilian music and the bossa nova, Gil has consistently incorporated other influences. His rendition of Bob Marley's reggae classic "No Woman, No Cry," for instance, reached the top of Brazil's music charts and sold over 700,000 copies. The following year, he joined with reggae great Jimmy Cliff for a tour of Brazil. The pair later performed at the 1982 Montreux Jazz Festival, and Gil even recorded an album with accompaniment by Bob Marley and the Wailers, Raca Humana, which was made one year before Marley's death but released three years after. Gil's greatest hit came with the disco tune "Polio" in 1982, and a Best World Music Album Grammy was awarded him in 1999 for Quanta: Live Ao Vivo.

astrud gilberto

what to buy: Recorded in Los Angeles, Realce ♪♪♪♪ (Elektra, 1978, prod. Mazola) reinforced Gil's place in contemporary jazz and included his reggae-infused hit version of Bob Marley's "No Woman, No Cry." The softer, more intimate side of Gil's musical persona was showcased on Acoustic ♪♪♪½ (Atlantic, 1994, prod. Gilberto Gil).

the rest:
Gil & Jorge ♪♪♪½ (Verve, 1975)
Nightingale ♪♪♪½ (Elektra, 1979)
Extra ♪♪♪ (WEA Latino, 1983)
Dia Dorim Noite Neon ♪♪♪½ (WEA Latino)
Ao Vivo En Toquiro ♪♪♪ (Braziloid, 1988)
Soy Loco Por Tu America ♪♪♪ (Braziloid, 1988)
O Eterno Deus Mu Dansa ♪♪♪½ (WEA Latino, 1989)
Realce ♪♪♪½ (WEA Latino, 1989)
Parabolic ♪♪♪ (WEA Latino, 1991)
Minha Historia ♪♪♪ (Philips, 1993)
Concerto ♪♪♪ (Westwind, 1995)
Esoterica: Live in U.S. 1994 ♪♪♪½ (Whirlwind, 1995)
Gil/Bethânia/Veloso ♪♪♪½ (Iris, 1995)
Oriente: Live in Japan ♪♪♪½ (Westwind, 1995)
En Concerto ♪♪♪½ (WEA Latino, 1996)
Gente Precia Ver O Mar ♪♪♪ (WEA Latino, 1996)
Luar ♪♪♪ (WEA Latino, 1996)
Mestres Da MPB ♪♪♪½ (WEA Latino, 1996)
Mestres Da MPB, Vol.2 ♪♪♪½ (WEA Latino, 1996)
Rafavela ♪♪♪ (WEA Latino, 1996)
Indigo Blue ♪♪♪½ (Terrascope, 1997)
Quanta ♪♪♪ (Atlantic, 1997)
Quanta: Live Ao Vivo ♪♪♪½ (Atlantic, 1998)

influences:
◀◀ Sergio Mendez, Milton Nascimento, Flora Purim

▶▶ Jorge Ben, Ivan Lins

see also: Maria Bethânia, Gal Costa, Marlui Miranda, Elis Regina, Caetano Veloso, Tom Zé

Craig Harris

Astrud Gilberto

Bossa nova

Born March 30, 1940, in Bahia, Brazil. Based in Brazil.

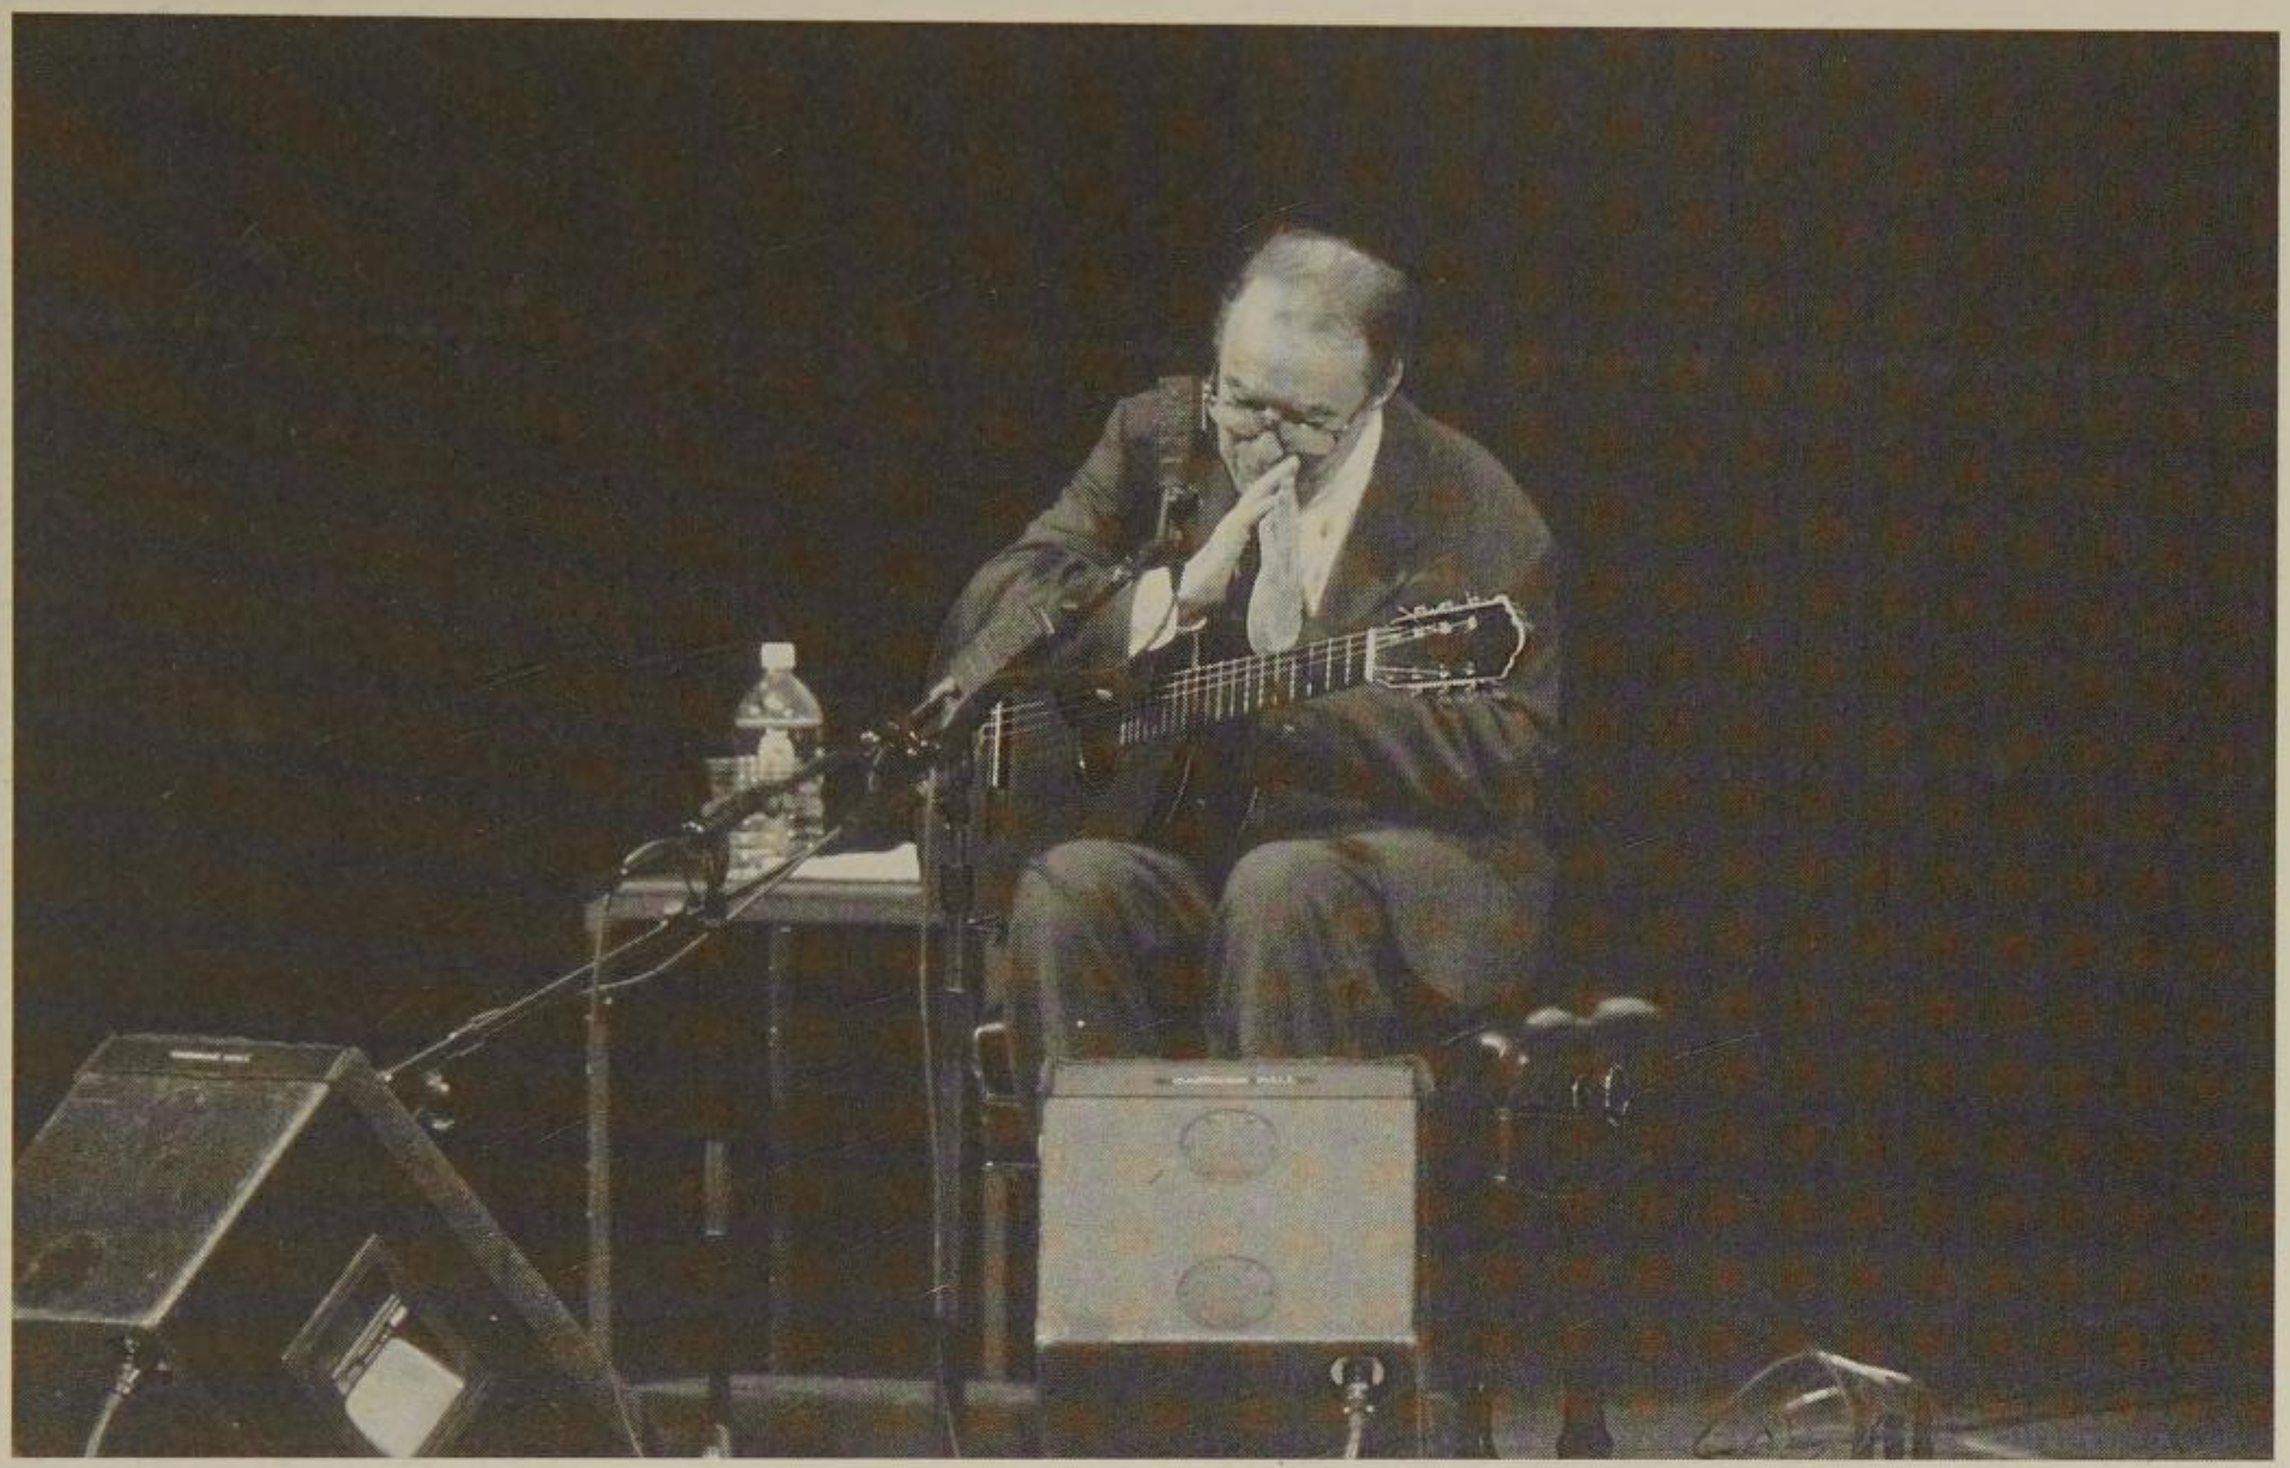
Gilberto is Brazilian music's Lana Turner, the accidental star. Married to the bossa-nova singer and guitarist João Gilberto, she was serving as an unofficial interpreter during a studio session for the legendary 1963 jazz album Getz/Gilberto, when a chorus of English was needed on Antonio Carlos Jobim's "The Girl from Ipanema." Her wistful evocation of Norman Gimbel's lyric supplanted her husband's Portuguese vocals on the single version—and made her an international sensation. At her best, she doesn't sound like a trained vocalist so much as a dreamy amateur, artless yet seductive. She had the same kind of sensual, South American appeal that mid-1960s National Airlines commercials were able to tap into, and is equally evocative of that era. She's most effective singing in her native Portuguese, especially the handful of songs—including "Corcovado" and "Vivo Sonhando"—written for her by Antonio Carlos Jobim and Gene Lees. In her later work much of that innocence is lost, and so is much of her allure. Her adaptations of show tunes and pop standards such as Tony Hatch's "Call Me" are to be avoided.

what to buy: Of her solo work, Verve Jazz Masters 9 ♪♪♪♪½ (PolyGram/Verve, 1994, prod. Creed Taylor) artfully combines studio sessions and live performances from 1964 and 1965, mostly off the mid-1960s LPs A Certain Smile a Certain Sadness, Look to the Rainbow, and The Astrud Gilberto Album with Antonio Carlos Jobim. It includes the haunting Carnegie Hall performance of "Ipanema" from October 9, 1964; an appealingly spare studio version of "Take Me to Aruanda" with Don Sebesky's orchestra; and an ethereal adaptation of Sammy Cahn's "Day by Day." Getz/Gilberto (20-Bit Master) ♪♪♪♪♪ (Verve, 1963/1987, prod. Creed Taylor) is the master session of the largest-selling jazz album ever recorded, a collaboration between jazzman Stan Getz and Gilberto's husband João, although Astrud's presence is limited. The sequel, Getz/Gilberto, Vol. 2 ♪♪♪♪ (Verve, 1964/1993, prod. Creed Taylor), was recorded at the 1964 Carnegie Hall concert.

what to buy next: Compact Jazz: Astrud Gilberto ♪♪♪♪ (PolyGram/Verve, 1987, prod. Creed Taylor) duplicates Jazz Masters 9's versions of many of Gilberto's better-known songs. It omits the lilting "Frevo," though, replacing it with "Summer Samba (So Nice)" from her Englewood Cliffs 1966 session with organist Walter Wanderley and others. The album also provides studio versions of "Ipanema" and "Corcovado" in place of the Carnegie Hall concert.

what to avoid: Beach Samba ♪♪ (PolyGram/Verve, 1993) has some cuts of interest, but it's not worth braving Gilberto as the Brazilian Vikki Carr, singing "It's a Lovely Day Today," "You Didn't Have to Be So Nice" (with her six-year-old son), and "Misty Roses."

best of the rest:
Plus James Last Orchestra ♪♪ (Verve, 1969)
Look to the Rainbow ♪♪ (Verve, 1987)
The Silver Collection: The Astrud Gilberto Album ♪♪♪½ (Verve, 1987)
Astrud Gilberto with Stanley Turrentine ♪♪ (CBS, 1988)
Jazz 'Round Midnight: Astrud Gilberto ♪♪♪ (Verve, 1996)



João Gilberto

worth searching for: The Girl from Ipanema: The Antonio Carlos Jobim Songbook ♪♪♪♪ (PolyGram/Verve, 1995, prod. various) includes the talents of Sarah Vaughan, Billy Eckstine, Ella Fitzgerald, Oscar Peterson, and Dizzy Gillespie, among others. Gilberto's contributions—the original album release of "Ipanema" and the standard versions of "Dindi" and "Agua de Beber"—hold their own among offerings by such luminaries.

influences:

⏮ Rosemary Clooney , Antonio Carlos Jobim, Walter Wanderley

⏭ Ann-Margret, Sade, Suzanne Vega

see also: João Gilberto, Antonio Carlos Jobim

Bruce Schoenfeld

João Gilberto

Bossa nova

Born June 1931, in Juazeiro, Brazil. Based in Brazil.

João Gilberto became interested in samba rhythms and American jazz while still a teenager. After moving to Rio de Janeiro in the early 1950s, he played on sessions for a variety of artists while working with Antonio Carlos Jobim to create the style of music later known as "bossa nova." (Gilberto's 1958 single of Jobim's "Chega de Saudade [No More Blues]" is considered the first song in the genre.) This "new wave" variation on samba reduced the crowded percussion work typical of the style in a manner similar to the development of "cool jazz" as a reaction to harder bop mannerisms. The main innovation contributed by Gilberto to this budding form were a style of guitar playing called violão gago, or "stammering guitar," and a simple, soft, intimate singing style in direct contrast to the powerful emoting in vogue at the time. By syncopating his voice with the rhythms generated by his guitar and a small rhythm section, Gilberto was able to build new harmonic patterns akin to chord progressions used in jazz. It was the latter development, no doubt in tandem with Jobim's sophisticated compositions, that made bossa nova so seductive to jazz musicians like Stan Getz and Charlie Byrd. After changing the face of Brazilian music forever in 1959 with the hugely influential album that included the Jobim masterpieces "Chega de Saudade" and "Desafinado (Out of Tune)," Gilberto, Jobim, and Gilberto's wife, Astrud, came to the States in 1963 so the latter two could record with Getz. The version they cut of Jobim's "The Girl from Ipanema," with Astrud as its inspired last-minute vocalist, was a massive hit in America, starting a U.S. bossa nova craze that lasted for a couple of years. The album they recorded with Getz is still a steady seller.

what to buy: The performances compiled on The Legendary João Gilberto ♪♪♪♪♪ (World Pacific, 1990, compilation prod. Ron McMaster, Matt Pierson) are at the core of a music revolution. The combination of Gilberto's gentle, somewhat restricted vocal range and his rhythmically sophisticated guitar playing with Jobim's songs and arrangements is beguiling, to say the least. The CD contains 38 songs in 75 minutes, in decent sound, from Gilberto's first three albums. First performances of masterpieces fill it: "Desafinado," "Samba de Una Nota Sô (One Note Samba)," and "Insensatez (How Insensitive)" are just a few. Except for a somewhat out-of-place version of "I'm Looking over a Four-Leaf Clover," which gives a foretaste of crimes committed in the name of bossa nova, this collection is solid. Getz/Gilberto ♪♪♪♪♪ (Verve, 1963/1987, prod. Creed Taylor) isn't the first bossa nova–influenced jazz album released in the United States, but it is the most influential—and quite deservedly so.

what to buy next: The music is marvelous, the performance is good, and (although this could be a drawback for some listeners) the audience is enthusiastic for Live in Montreux ♪♪♪½ (Elektra Musician, 1987, prod. João Gilberto). Luckily, they generally wait until these gently swaying classics have run their course before leaping into the participatory fray with appreciative applause. Gilberto recorded this concert in 1985, nearly three decades after the revolution Jobim and he had popularized. The material holds up well and the intimacy achieved by Gilberto and his guitar are pluses, but the performance is valedictory rather than revelatory. The wonders of modern recording technology paved the way for João ♪♪♪½ (Verve, 1991, prod. Mayrton Bahia, Carmela Forsin). Gilberto recorded the vocals and guitar parts in Brazil while the orchestration by Clare Fischer was added in Los Angeles. Had the folks at Verve left Gilberto alone to play his guitar backed up by some idiomatic percussion, this album might score higher. Fischer attempts to duplicate some of Jobim's orchestration from Gilberto's earlier albums, but the result is often a bit over the top. The finest touches place the vocals and rhythm over marvelous arrangements featuring clarinets and alto saxophones (as in "Little Rose"), where darkly wooded sounds highlight the lightness of Gilberto's singing. When Fischer drops his coverlet of strings over Gilberto's softly swinging vocals (as in "Malaga"), the songs verge on easy listening instead of art. Still, there is more than enough good stuff here to recommend, albeit with the orchestral caveat.

what to avoid: Gilberto's name is prominently featured on the cover of Brazil Samba Jazz, Vol. 1 ♪♪ (Orfeon), and the album can usually be found listed under his name in stores, but it is a collection of performances by more than just him. It isn't that bad a disc once you get over the disappointment of realizing it's not quite a Gilberto album, but the other groups found in the package (Tamba No. 4, Trio Orfeo Negro, and Octavio Henrique) are definitely not up to Gilberto's standards. By the way, he only has two cuts on this album, and the 17-song medley that closes it out is uncredited but definitely not sung by Gilberto.

the rest:
João Gilberto ♪♪♪ (Verve, 1973)
Amoroso/Brasil ♪♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1993)
Personalidade ♪♪♪½ (Verve, 1993)
Eu Sei Que Vou Te Amar: Ao Vivo ♪♪♪½ (Sony Latin Jazz, 1995)
Mi Historia ♪♪♪½ (PolyGram Latino, 1997)

influences:
- Elizete Cardozo, Miles Davis, Vinícius de Morais, Gerry Mulligan, Noel Rosa
- Chico Buarque, Charlie Byrd, Stan Getz, Gilberto Gil, Milton Nascimento, Caetano Veloso see also: Luiz Bonfá, Astrud Gilberto, Antonio Carlos Jobim, Herbie Mann

Garaud MacTaggart and Marty Lipp

The Gipsy Kings

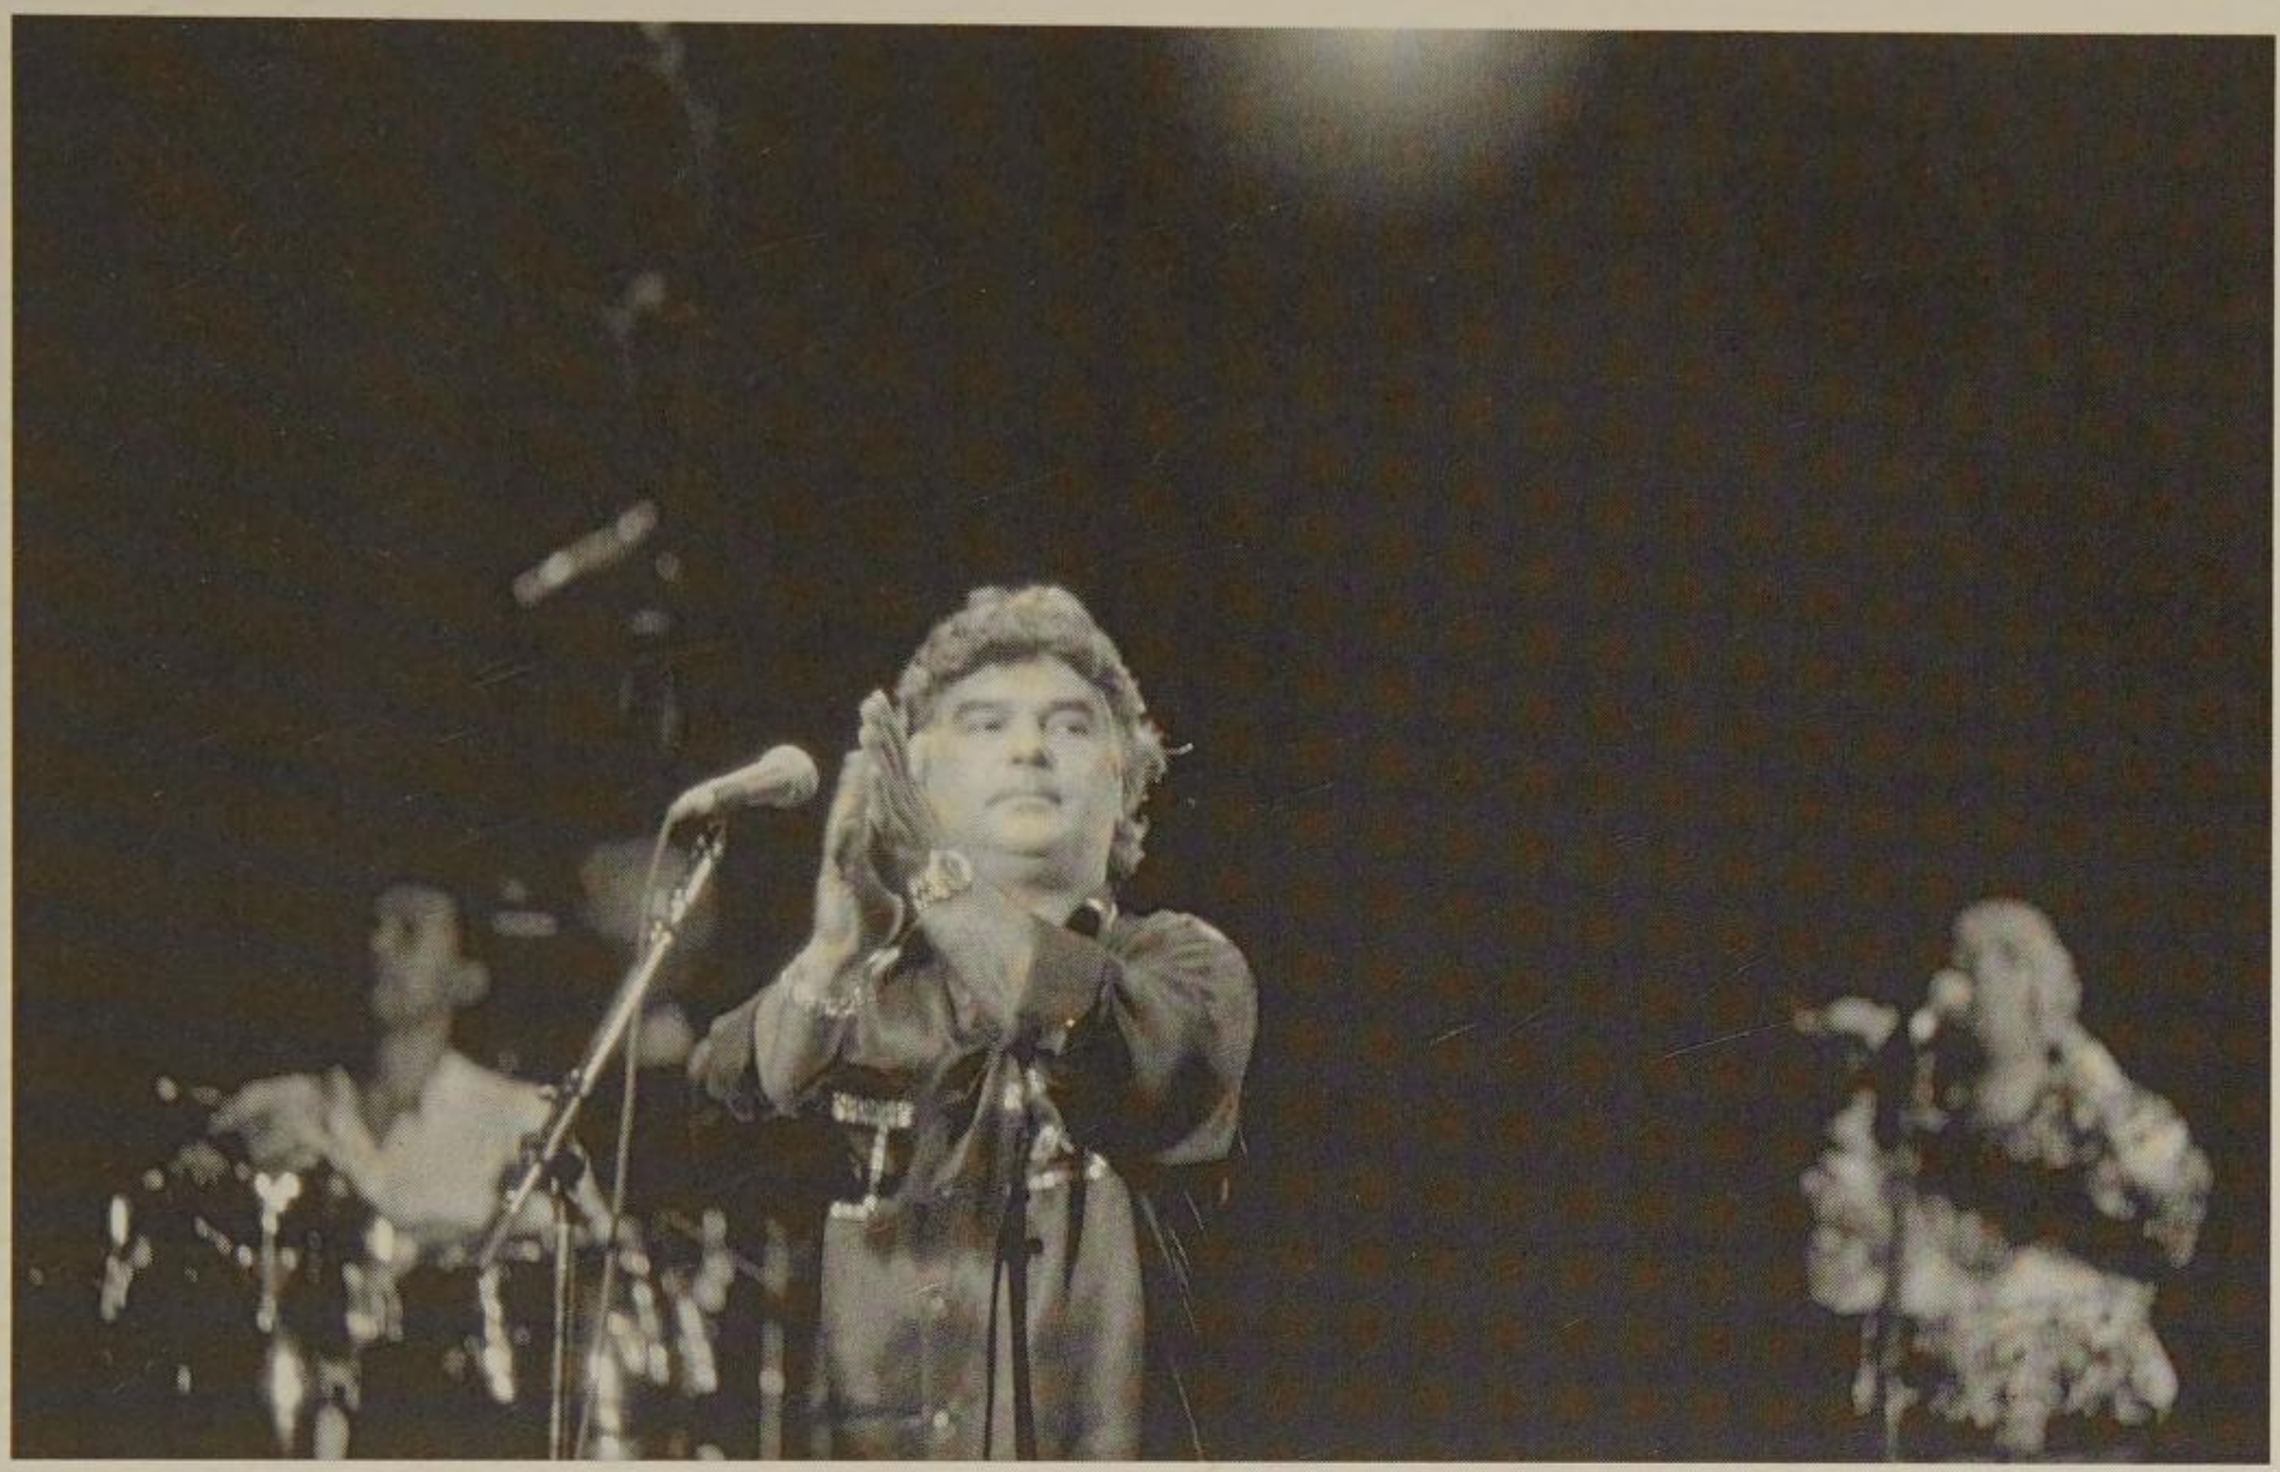
Flamenco, world fusion

Formed 1986, in southern France. Based in France.

Current members include: Nicolas Reyes, guitar, vocals; Andre Reyes, guitar, background vocals; Diego Baliardo, guitar, handclapping; Jacques "Paco" Baliardo, guitar; Tonino Baliardo, guitar; Jahloul "Chico" Bouchiki, guitar, handclapping; Marc Chantareau, percussion; Dominique Perrier, synthesizer; Gerard Prevost, synthesizer, bass. (All members are from France.)

With their powerfully strummed multi-guitar rhythms and enthusiastic singing in the Gitane dialect of southern France, the Gipsy Kings are one of the most successful world-music groups. In a little over a decade, they've sold more than 13 million records worldwide. The band is a joint labor of love by the Reyes Brothers, sons of famed flamenco vocalist Jose Reyes, and their cousins, the Baliardo brothers, sons of flamenco bandleader Manitas de Plata. These players fuse Spain's flamenco tradition with a contemporary vision and high-energy approach. The result is an irresistible dance music that critics have called "rumba flamenco."

Despite their strong musical heritage, the Reyes and Baliardo brothers grew up in poor Gypsy communities in Arles and



Nicolas Reyes of the Gipsy Kings

Montpelier, France. Their climb out of poverty began in the early 1980s when they performed traditional Gypsy music as Los Reyes. Although they released two albums, neither was commercially successful. Their first real break came when they teamed up with producer Claude Martinez and adopted a more modern approach. Their 1987 singles "Bamboleo" and "Djobi Djoba" established the Gipsy Kings as an international phenomenon. Signed by Sony in 1988, the group's self-titled debut under their new name reached the Top 10 in more than a dozen countries and spent 40 weeks on the U.S. charts. And the band's popularity has only continued to grow. Their retrospective, The Best of the Gipsy Kings, reached the top position on Billboard's world-music chart in 1995, and they've become perennial winners of the magazine's awards as Best World Music Artist and Best Latin Pop Artist. Now into their second decade of music-making, the band are seemingly everywhere; their song "Sin Ella" was featured in the 1993 film Restless, and they've starred in two programs produced by PBS: the 1996 documentary Tierra Gitana, and a 1997 video document of their performance at Washington, D.C.'s prestigious Wolf Trap venue.

what to buy: With 19 tracks from their earlier albums, The Best of the Gipsy Kings ♪♪♪♪♪ (Columbia, 1995, prod. various) is a thorough look at the evolution of the Gipsy Kings' music. Recorded during their 1991 "Este Mundo" tour, Live ♪♪♪♪½ (Elektra, 1992, prod. Gerard Prevost, Claude Martinez) captures the excitement of the Gipsy Kings' shows.

the rest:

Gipsy Kings ♪♪♪♪ (Elektra, 1988)
Allegria ♪♪♪½ (Elektra, 1989)
Luna de Fuego ♪♪♪½ (Elektra, 1989)
Mosaique ♪♪♪½ (Elektra, 1989)
Este Mundo ♪♪♪½ (Elektra, 1991)
Los Reyes ♪♪♪½ (FNA, 1994)
Love & Liberte ♪♪♪♪ (Elektra/Nonesuch, 1994)
Tierra Gitana ♪♪♪♪ (Nonesuch, 1996)
Compass ♪♪♪♪ (Atlantic, 1997)

influences:

⏮ Paco de Lucia, Pastora Pavon, Manitas de Plata

⏭ Ry Cooder, Al Di Meola

Craig Harris

Regis Gisavo

Girls of Angeli /Angelin Tytöt /Annel Nieddat

Modern joik

Formed 1982, in Angeli, Finland. Based in Angeli, Finland.

Ursula Länsman, vocals, drums; Tunni Länsman, vocals, drums; Ulla Pirttijärvi, drums, vocals (1982–1992). (All members are from Finland.)

The Girls of Angeli are Sami, formerly known as Laplanders or Lapps. The Sami are the indigenous people of northern Finland, Sweden, Norway, and Russia, a culture probably descended from the people who came into the area after the last ice age, about 5,000 years ago. Most Sami hunt and fish, raise reindeer, and migrate according to the seasons, although there are Fjeld Sami who farm (a fjeld is a round, treeless mountain that was left behind by the retreat of the ice-age glaciers), and Sea Sami who fish and farm. Sami have maintained settlements for centuries. The Sami have spiritual beliefs, but no word for "religion," which usually refers to the Christianity that was imposed on them. They believe in an alternate world, saivo, where everything is better than in the material world and where the dead continue to live. In our own plane, it is believed, everything is alive and has a soul, so people are expected to treat all life and every object with respect. The Sami believe some people can see into the future and visit the saivo to bring back the wisdom of the other world. The Sami have a vocal music called joiking that isn't singing, speaking, or chanting, but has qualities of all three, depending on the joik. Joiking is a method of purifying the self and creating harmony between the world we can see and the saivo, and it sounds at times like the singing of the Northern Plains tribes of North America.

The Girls of Angeli take their name from their home region in northern Finland. In 1982, after their class sang at a Sami festival in Utsjoki, the Länsmans and Pirttijärvi got serious about singing and bringing their traditional music to a wider audience. The Girls of Angeli have created new forms, including the joik-song, but also perform traditional joiks a cappella or with simple drum accompaniment. In 1992, after the trio released Dolla, Pirttijärvi left to pursue a solo career. Ursula and Tunni Länsman continued as a duo combining traditional joiking with rock, rap, and techno beats, hoping to introduce the world to their unique and beautiful culture.

what to buy: The New Voice of North ♪♪♪♪ (Finlandia Finland, 1998, prod. Sari Kaasinen), a selection from the three albums they recorded under the name Annel Nieddat, gives an excellent overview of the group's career. There are a couple of tracks with modern-rock-type embellishments, including the obligatory "rap" interlude, but most of this is more traditional, concentrating on the group's beautiful harmonies, call-and-response vocals, and indigenous drumming. There's an occasional bit of ambient window dressing à la Deep Forest, but it doesn't distract from the chilling strangeness of the joiks.

what to buy next: On Skeaikit ♪♪♪♪½ (Mipu Finland, 1995, prod. Kajasto) the Länsmans collaborate with guitarist Alfred Hakkinen and producer Kajasto for a collection that includes a bit of hip-hop, a blast of techno, some nice singer/songwriter–style acoustic guitar, and plenty of unearthly vocals by the principals.

the rest:
Dolla ♪♪♪♪½ (Mipu Finland, 1992)
Giitu ♪♪♪♪½ (Mipu Finland, 1993)

influences:
Nils-Aslak Valkeapää
Wimme

j. poet

Regis Gisavo

Malagasy traditional, jazz

Born in Tulear, Madagascar. Based in Paris, France.

Regis Gisavo learned to play the accordion as a child in Tulear, in the southwestern part of the island of Madagascar. Born into relative poverty among 12 siblings, Gisavo took to the instrument by the age of six and became so obsessed with it that his father destroyed his first one. Gisavo absorbed a variety of traditional and European styles through listening to other musicians and the radio. By his late teens he was touring in Madagascar and playing with established musicians like guitarist D'Gary. After winning a national music competition in 1990, Gisavo bought his own accordion and moved to Paris, where he began playing with jazz outfits like Bohe Combo. He pursued an impressively broad spectrum of musical opportunities, working with African ethno-punk bands like Les Têtes Brulées and eventually joining the wildly popular Corsican pop group O Muvrini. Although Gisavo was certainly enough of a musical virtuoso to blend into these cosmopolitan styles, he felt a certain lack of direction. A conversation with jazz accordionist Richard Galliano inspired Gisavo to revisit his Malagasy (the adjectival

polkas worldwide

The irresistible oompah beat of the dance music we have come to know as polka has proved a durable and hardy transplant to a variety of cultural landscapes, though it has found its most fertile soil in the United States. At first a pastime of Eastern European immigrants, polka grew to become one of the most popular music and dance styles in the American heartland. Through similar Eastern European migrations into Texas, it also became the backbone of conjunto music and several related Tex-Mex styles. Today polka is a diverse and rapidly evolving form, with such notable variants as the speedy Eastern style (144 beats per minute), and the slower Chicago style (only 120 beats per minute!) that originated with bandleader Walter "Lil' Wally" Jagiello. The unfortunately named "honky" style, which features concertina and horns, is an even slower variation on the Chicago mode. The Slovenian style—adopted by one of the music's biggest stars, the late Frankie Yankovic—built in twin accordions and saxophone. Another contemporary version, popularized by the Polka Family, is Massachusetts style, which incorporates Latin percussion touches and New Orleans–esque trumpet and clarinet ornamentations. Alternative polka comes from Denton, Texas's wild and wacky Brave Combo, who once recorded an album with Tiny Tim. The group blends rock and a galaxy of other styles in their unpredictable performances, but also plays straight polkas that would bring a tear to the eye of the most conservative purist. From its origin in Eastern Europe several centuries back, polka has gone on to become an enduring, worldwide phenomenon. The joyful strains of the music, the fast-paced, athletic steps, and the conviviality of the dances have captured the hearts (and feet) of an increasingly large and diverse audience.

see also: Edward "Eddie" Blazonczyk, Brave Combo, the Dynatones form of "Madagascar") roots. Gisavo began recording and performing in a stripped-down setting with masterful percussionist David Mirandon. The duo's performances are a showcase for Gisavo's jaw-dropping accordion technique and his deep, emotive vocals, with a repertoire emphasizing traditional Malagasy tunes and Gisavo originals.

Michael Parrish

what's available: A splendid blend of traditional Malagasy soul and smooth European jazz-pop, Mikea ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1997) mostly features just Gisavo and percussionist David Mirandon. Gisavo's driving playing and deep, otherworldly vocals make for a haunting, unique musical experience.

influences:
◀◀ D'Gary, Rossy

Michael Parrish

Egberto Gismonti

Classical/tribal/bossa nova fusion

Born 1947, in Carmo, Brazil. Based in Brazil.

Egberto Gismonti is a classically trained pianist, having studied in France with Nadia Boulanger and Jean Baralaque. Moving to Rio de Janeiro in 1968 brought Gismonti into contact with Antonio Carlos Jobim and the guitar music of Baden Powell, which firmed up the young artist's resolve to make a living with his music. He taught himself how to play a standard six-string guitar but soon found it to be inadequate for his musical vision. Gismonti moved on to a seven-string instrument before discovering that an eight-string guitar (for which he had to devise a whole new way of playing) would enable him to cover the wide range of sounds he wanted to employ. His latest recordings find Gismonti using 10- and 12-string guitars with unique tunings. In 1977 Gismonti, while working on a film project in the Amazon basin, was exposed to the music of the Xingu tribes. This had a profound effect on his future work. The combination of a classical European background, tribal music, and the urban Brazilian sounds of samba and bossa nova have made him one of the most unique performers in the world. Gismonti has recorded more than 50 albums in a wide variety of instrumental settings. He is also a well-known producer in Brazil, in addition to writing music for film, television, theater, ballet, orchestra, and chamber ensembles.

what to buy: ECM's selection of tracks for Works ♪♪♪♪♪ (ECM, 1994, prod. Manfred Eicher) gives you an interesting sample of Gismonti's prolific, wide-ranging catalog. There are cuts featuring his superb piano playing in a group or solo setting, as well as performances with Gismonti on guitar, again in group or solo presentations. The musicians appearing on this disc include saxophonist Jan Garbarek, percussionist Nana Vasconcelos, bassist Charlie Haden, and Gismonti's long-time associate, bassist Zeca Assumpção. Sanfona ♪♪♪♪♪ (ECM, 1981, prod. Manfred Eicher), a superb two-CD set, contains some of Gismonti's most beguiling and accessible music. The first disc features Gismonti and supporting trio Academia de Dança playing five longish tunes and one four-part suite. There is a lot of Gismonti's piano work, certainly more than one hears on his recent recordings. His keyboard style here hovers between Chick Corea and the sound clusters of Henry Cowell, with a little Villa-Lobos tossed in for good measure. The second CD focuses on Gismonti as a solo guitarist. With aural colors and lines weaving an impressive tapestry of sound, Gismonti's playing reveals some of his debt to Baden Powell's pioneering performances of the 1960s and early '70s, even as he breaks new ground with his specially built guitars.

what to buy next: Dança Das Çabecas ♪♪♪♪ (ECM, 1977, prod. Manfred Eicher) is the album that introduced Gismonti to U.S. audiences. Essentially a duet album with percussionist Nana Vasconcelos, Dança Das Çabecas was impressive for the sheer number of musical sounds the duo brought into play in what was essentially a Brazilian jazz album. With songs like "Quarto Mundo + 1" and the 12-minute "Tango," it was no wonder the record was nominated for album of the year by Stereo Review. Almost 10 years after their initial duet release, Gismonti and Vasconcelos recorded yet another fine album, Duas Voces ♪♪♪♪ (ECM, 1985, prod. Manfred Eicher). Gismonti's flute playing on "Tomarapeba" shows the influence of his studies of Amazon aboriginal music, an element not heard in the earlier recording.

what to avoid: Gismonti arranged some music by the Brazilian composer Heitor Villa-Lobos on Trem Caipira ♪ (EMI-Odeon, 1985, prod. Egberto Gismonti), but to little worthwhile effect. His piano playing on "Bachiana No. 5" is fine but the rest of the album could have been done by Isao Tomita or Wendy Carlos. The electronic trappings Gismonti drapes around this intriguing music give it the air of a kitschy soundtrack.

best of the rest:
Solo ♪♪♪♪ (ECM, 1979)
(With Charlie Haden and Jan Garbarek) Folk Songs ♪♪♪♪ (ECM, 1980)
(With Charlie Haden and Jan Garbarek) Magico ♪♪♪ (ECM, 1980)
Dança Dos Escravos ♪♪♪♪ (ECM, 1989)
Infancia ♪♪♪♪ (ECM, 1991)
Zig Zag ♪♪♪♪ (ECM, 1996)
Meeting Point ♪♪♪♪ (ECM, 1997)

influences:
◀◀ Baden Powell, Claude Debussy, João Gilberto, Antonio Carlos Jobim, Maurice Ravel, Heitor Villa-Lobos

see also: Nana Vasconcelos

Garaud MacTaggart

Gjallarhorn

Finnish-Swedish folk

Formed 1994, in Vaasa, Finland. Based in Vaasa, Finland.

Jenny Wilhelms, lead vocals, fiddles; Christopher Öhman, viola, fiddle, mandola, vocals; Jakob Frankenhauser, didgeridoo, percussion (1994–95); Tommi Mansikka-aho, didgeridoo, percussion (1995–present); David Lillkvist, percussion (1995–present). (All members are from Finland.)

Gjallarhorn hails from a Swedish-speaking region of western Finland, which means their main cultural heritage is Swedish. They sing in Swedish, and their overall sound is closer to that of edgy Swedish folk bands like Garmarna and Väsen (particularly because of the heavy beat supplied by two percussionists) than it is to Finnish groups like Värttinä. Most of Gjallarhorn's material is from traditional sources; in fact Wilhelms spends a lot of time researching old ballads at the Finlands Folkmusikinstitut in Vaasa. And like many ancient British Isles ballads, the Nordic songs performed by Gjallarhorn feature supernatural motifs like fairies, trolls, and witches. The name Gjallarhorn itself is taken from Nordic mythology—specifically, the horn belonging to the god Heimdal, through which messages were sent from the gods of Asgard to the human beings living on "Midgard."

what's available: Ranarop—Call of the Sea Witch ♪♪♪♪♪ (Finlandia, 1997, prod. Vincent Högberg, Gjallarhorn) is Gjallarhorn's only release so far. What's most striking about it is the incredibly powerful sound produced by a comparatively sparse lineup of voices, percussion, fiddles, mandola, and Australian didgeridoo. Most of the tracks on Ranarop have an incredible rhythmic drive provided by various kinds of hand percussion (no conventional drum kit is used), while voices and fiddles carry the melody lines. The effect of arrangements featuring full multipart vocal harmonies over percussion and didgeridoo, as on "Herr Olof," is remarkable—it's an unusual combination of softer and harsher sounds that grabs the listener right away. Wilhelms also serves as solo lead vocalist on most of the selections, and it's amazing to hear such a delicate soprano hold its own over the joyful apocalyptic din.

influences:

⏮ Hedningarna, Steeleye Span

⏭ Garmarna, Väsen

Ken Roseman

Paddy Glackin

Irish traditional

Born 1954, in Dublin, Ireland. Based in Dublin, Ireland.

With his strong County Donegal roots, it isn't a coincidence that Paddy Glackin is one of the finest practitioners of the northern style of fiddling, yet stylistically he goes beyond those roots to incorporate the influence of other great musicians he heard growing up in Dublin. Glackin's father was a fine fiddler himself, and because of that, Paddy's youth was filled with visits from some of Ireland's best musicians. One of them who had a profound effect on the boy's later career was renowned fiddler John Doherty, whom Paddy met when he was only 11—after which the fiddle seemed to dominate his life. As the popularity of traditional Irish music began to rise in the 1970s, so did Paddy's star within Irish-music circles. He was a member of the highly regarded Ceoltóirí Laighean and also became the first fiddler for the Bothy Band, arguably one of the most influential Irish outfits of the last 40 years. Even so, his time in the Bothy Band was short-lived, and he moved on to work on the esteemed Radio Telefís Éireann (RTÉ) radio program The Long Note. His work with RTÉ led him to be named Traditional Music Officer with the Dublin Arts Council, and he has continued, since leaving that position, to promote the music of his native Ireland through education and brilliant fiddle playing.

what to buy: The collaboration with piper Robbie Hannan The Whirlwind ♪♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1995, prod. Paddy Glackin, Robbie Hannan), originally released in Ireland under the title Séideán Sí, is a brilliant recording of some of the finest uilleann pipe and fiddle duets ever documented. There is nothing to stand in the way of these two master musicians, playing without further accompaniment. Both give stellar performances as they take solo turns between fiery duets, giving each musician time to showcase his singular talents. Hannon's very tight, very syncopated playing is full of ornamentation and stylistically brilliant. The "Dispute at the Crossroads/Jolly Tinker" set will leave listeners in awe of the duo's virtuosity.

what to buy next: In Full Spate ♪♪♪♪ (Gael-Linn, 1991, prod. Dónal Lunny) owes a lot to Glackin's love of northern musicians like fiddler John Doherty, but also illustrates the host of influences Glackin received growing up in Dublin. The omnipresent Dónal Lunny accompanies Glackin on bouzouki and bodhrán, and he is joined on one track by his brothers Seumas and Kevin—two fine fiddlers in their own right—and on another by his frequent musical partner Hannan.

worth searching for: Doublin ♪♪♪♪ (TARA) is a masterful duo recording featuring another frequent Glackin partner (and former Bothy Band–mate), uilleann piper Paddy Keenan. Tunes like the "Dublin Reel/Women of the House" set are musically out of this world, while Keenan gets to show his full command of his instrument on the slow air "Rosin Dubh." A lovely recording if you can find it.

influences:

⏮ John Doherty, John Joe Gardiner, Tom Glackin, Frank O'Higgins

⏭ Liz Doherty, Kevin Glackin, Seumas Glackin

see also: The Bothy Band, John Doherty, Robbie Hannan, James Keane, Dónal Lunny, Sean Ó Riada

Cliff McGann

Gladiators /Albert Griffiths

Reggae

Formed 1967, in Kingston, Jamaica. Based in Kingston, Jamaica.

Albert Griffiths, leader, lead vocals, guitar; David Webber, vocals (1960s); Errol Grandison, vocals (1960s); Clinton Fearon, vocals, bass (1970s–1980s); Gallimore Sutherland, vocals, guitar (1970s–1980s). (All members are from Jamaica.)

Albert Griffiths grew up singing and playing guitar, inspired by the records of Elvis and Chuck Berry as well as the talents of his uncle Aaron, who also played guitar and sang. Griffiths began his professional career as a backup vocalist for his friend David Webber. That combination didn't work, but a few years later Griffiths formed a harmony trio with Webber and Errol Grandison, and the Gladiators were born. Griffiths, Webber, and Grandison were working as stonemasons at the time, and they borrowed money from their boss to finance their first recording, "You Are the Girl." They were able to lease the track to WIRL Records, and the company put it out as the B-side of "Train to Skaville" by the Ethiopians. The Ethiopians' track became a smash and brought the Gladiators to the attention of Treasure Isle, but their songs for that label were only modestly successful.

In 1968 the band began recording for Coxsone Dodd's Studio One and cut "Hello Carol," the hit which established the Gladiators as a major act and Griffiths as a powerful new songwriter. In between recording his own tunes with his trio, Griffiths became a guitarist in the Studio One band, appearing on recordings by the Manchesters, Stranger Cole, and Burning Spear. In the early 1970s, Griffiths began exploring other options, cutting singles for Clive Chin and Lee Perry as well as Dodd. "Bongo Red," a smash hit from 1975, brought the Gladiators to the attention of Virgin Records, which was hoping to cash in on Island's success with Bob Marley. An alliance with that label yielded Trenchtown Mix Up, a roots reggae classic standing up to the best work of Marley, Culture, and other roots radicals. But in 1980, at the insistence of the label, the band recorded The Gladiators, a crossover attempt produced by Eddy Grant that fell flat. The next year Marley died, and without his charisma, the major labels decided that reggae's commercial viability was past. In the aftermath, the Gladiators and dozens of other artists lost their label deals. Undaunted, the band kept touring and releasing singles and albums for the Jamaican market. In the mid-1980s the Gladiators signed with Rounder's reggae subsidiary Heartbeat, and these musicians continue to make compelling music in a roots reggae stylee.

what to buy: The excellent compilation Dreadlocks the Time Is Now ♪♪♪♪ (Virgin Frontline, 1990, prod. Tony Robinson, Gladiators) makes the band's best work for Virgin in the 1970s available on CD for the first time. It includes nine tracks from their classic Trenchtown Mix Up set, as well as strong material from Proverbial Reggae, Naturally, Sweet So Till, and the "Pocket Money" single. Griffiths's soaring tenor and the band's tough riddims give these tracks a timeless quality.

what to buy next: While Griffiths never matched the militant fire of his early output, his more recent efforts are still filled with worthwhile music. A Whole Heap ♪♪♪ (Heartbeat, 1989, prod. Tony Robinson, Gladiators) includes all the tracks from Country Living and In Store for You and gives you a solid indication of where the band was at in the late 1980s.

best of the rest:

On the Right Track ♪♪♪ (Heartbeat, 1989)
Bongo Red ♪♪♪ (Heartbeat, 1998)

worth searching for: Most of Trenchtown Mix Up is preserved on Dreadlocks the Time Is Now, but the band's second Virgin outing, Proverbial Reggae ♪♪♪♪ (Virgin Frontline, 1978), is just as strong and has yet to get the digital treatment.

influences:

⏮ Burning Spear, Culture, Bob Marley, Mighty Diamonds

⏭ Abyssinians, Black Uhuru, Wailing Souls

j. poet

Ben Goldberg

Progressive jazz and klezmer

Born August 8, 1959, in Sycamore, IL. Based in California, USA.

Recipient of numerous National Endowment for the Arts (NEA) grants and a 1993 Goldie Award (the San Francisco Bay Guardian's annual creative-music honor), clarinetist Ben Goldberg is one of the leaders of the jazz/improv community in the Bay Area. He has led a variety of combos, including New Klezmer Trio, Junk Genius, Snorkel, and Brainchild (an undocumented but phenomenal large ensemble based on Goldberg's "spontaneous composition" concept of minimally directed, collective improvisation). His efforts have attracted NYC heavyweights like John Zorn and Marty Ehrlich. Tours abroad and appearances on the festival circuit, with a couple of showcases at the distinguished Vancouver Jazz Fest, have begun to spark an international buzz. While Don Byron is popularly credited as the most adept and adventurous clarinetist in contemporary jazz, a simple comparison of discographies casts Goldberg in a far more progressive light. With New Klezmer Trio, Goldberg was exploring "Radical Jewish Culture" long before Zorn coined the term for his Tzadik imprint (and Byron delved into the Music of Mickey Katz). His Junk Genius quartet reworks bebop classics with an up-to-the-minute approach that pushes toward the future. And a handful of new recordings in trio, quartet, and sextet configurations reveals an innovative composer/bandleader at the vanguard of creative improvised music. Jumping off from a deceptively simple notion—"Don't improvise, just play the song . . . do what needs to be done"—the clarinetist cuts to the core of what great jazz is all about.

what to buy: Masks & Faces ♪♪♪♪♪ (Nine Winds, 1991/Tzadik, 1996, prod. Ben Goldberg), the debut recording of New Klezmer Trio (with drummer Kenny Wollesen and bassist Dan Seamans) introduced the creative merger of traditional klezmer and forward-pushing jazz. Pre-Masada, pre-Byron-does-Katz, it marks a pivotal moment in the evolution of the art form. From the leader's "Statement of Themes on Contra-alto Clarinet," the sextet on Twelve Minor ♪♪♪♪♪ (Avant, 1997, prod. Ben Goldberg) dives into more than an hour's worth of frighteningly incisive extrapolation. Rob Sudduth is a melodic monster on tenor, and Miya Masaoka and Carla Kihlstedt have to be heard to be believed. On-edge arrangements explode the bebop handbook while respecting the essence of the songs of Junk Genius ♪♪♪♪♪ (Knitting Factory Works, 1996, prod. Ben Goldberg). An almost post-punk energy pumps locomotive tracks like "Tempus Fugit," "Koko," "Shaw Nuff," and the definitive "Bebop." To be sure, this ain't no Wynton Marsalis rehash. Here by Now ♪♪♪♪♪ (Music and Arts, 1997, prod. Ben Goldberg) is a vivid look at how Goldberg's tune-based aesthetic soars in the company of like-minded collaborators. Simple melodies are transformed with ingenuity and intensity without a superfluous note in the lot.

what to buy next: New Klezmer Trio's Melt Zonk Rewire ♪♪♪♪½ (Tzadik, 1995, prod. Ben Goldberg) expands the equation introduced on Masks & Faces. The mondo-"grunge" of Seamans's bass on "Feedback Doina" and Goldberg's clarinet blasted through a Fender amp on "Gas Nine" give klezmer's serpentine melodicism a welcome shock of hard-rock electricity. Light at the Crossroads ♪♪♪♪ (Songlines, 1997, prod. Marty Ehrlich, Ben Goldberg) is worth checking out if only for the tone of the woodwinds. Powerful improvising from all members of the quartet. Compositions are split between Ehrlich and Goldberg, with a nod to Wayne Horvitz on "Ask Me Later."

best of the rest:
What Comes Before ♪♪♪½ (Tzadik, 1997)

worth searching for: With a deliriously punchy "Salt Peanuts" anticipating Junk Genius, Goldberg and Kenny Wollesen's The Relative Value of Things ♪♪♪♪½ (33 1/4, 1992, prod. Ben Goldberg), a series of inspired duets self-released on Goldberg's literally in-house "label," offers a nascent glimpse of the Goldberg-Wollesen inventions to come.

influences:
- Ornette Coleman, Steve Lacy, Thelonious Monk, Charlie Parker
- John Zorn's Masada

see also: Klezmorim, Masada

Sam Prestianni

Gonzaguinha

Brazilian pop, samba

Born Luiz Gonzaga Jr., in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. Died 1991, in Parana, Brazil.

In Brazilian pop, Luiz Gonzaga Jr., a.k.a Gonzaguinha, occupied a place that could be compared to that of Ziggy Marley in reggae. Gonzaguinha's father, the late Luiz Gonzaga Sr., is considered the godfather of forró music (the accordion-led dance style from northeastern Brazil), and commanded the type of reverence in Brazil that Bob Marley enjoyed in Jamaica—and just like Ziggy Marley, Gonzaguinha was destined to be compared to his seminal father when he chose to follow in his footsteps. But Gonzaguinha, who himself died in a car crash in the Brazilian state of Parana on April 9, 1991, was very much his own man, and his melodic, jazzy style of Brazilian pop was as recognizable as his father's forró. Born in Rio de Janeiro, Gonzaguinha grew up in one of the city's poor favelas or shantytowns. The singer/guitarist/composer knew just how rough the lives of Brazil's poor could be, and his more sociopolitical lyrics often focused on their struggles with great insight and sensitivity. But Gonzaguinha wasn't strictly a political artist—he wrote and sang about love and sexuality as passionately as he did about the issues. He was incredibly popular in Brazil in the 1980s, and his songs were covered by major Brazilian vocalists such as Gal Costa, Fagner, and Maria Bethânia. Gonzaguinha recorded extensively in Brazil, but unfortunately only a few of his albums have been released in the United States. Those albums include 1990's E on World Pacific and Mestres Da MPB, which WEA Latina released Stateside in 1996.

what's available: E ♪♪♪♪½ (World Pacific, 1990, prod. Gonzaguinha), Gonzaguinha's U.S. debut, left the whole North American continent hungry for more. Gonzaguinha sings in Portuguese, but World Pacific provides English translations that show us just how sensitive and poetic a lyricist he can be. Some of the songs are quite issue-oriented (especially "Magica" and "Coracones Marginais"), and Gonzaguinha's reflections on the struggles of Brazil's underclass are quite poignant. But he is equally compelling when he sings about romance and sexuality on "Rai," "Tudo," and "Qualquer Situacao de Amor."

Of course, one doesn't need any liner notes to appreciate the richness of his singing—Gonzaguinha's charisma is hard to miss even if you don't understand a word of Portuguese.

influences:

⏮ Gilberto Gil, Luis Gonzaga, Caetano Veloso

Alex Henderson

Celina Gonzaléz

Afro-Cuban, salsa

Born 1928, in Jovellanos, Cuba. Based in Havana, Cuba.

Celina Gonzaléz grew up in a rural area of Cuba where traditions and musical rhythms brought to the island by African slaves remained strong. The young musician took in both of the island's major influences, blending Afro-Cuban musical patterns and Spanish lyrical forms in her work. With her husband, Reutillio Domiguez, she played musica campesina, a Cuban rural or country music–style salsa. Before the Cuban revolution, the duo developed a large following based on their strong vocal harmonies and basic guitar-and-percussion instrumentation. Their subjects were strongly populist (interspersed with music derived from Gonzaléz's devotion to the Santería faith). This caused them political problems at the time, but did not stop the couple from performing with a wide range of musicians and becoming known throughout the island and, eventually, in the rest of the Caribbean, New York, and South America. Gonzaléz was and remains a strong supporter of the ideals of the revolution, despite isolation from off-island performing opportunities imposed by Castro's government until recent years. Realignment of her career after her husband's death in 1971 saw Gonzaléz performing more often among larger ensembles, including trumpets and violins (particularly with her son's band, Campo Alegre). Although she maintains her Afro-Cuban and Santería base of ideas, Gonzaléz has evolved her sound to serve her cause of presenting the music in frameworks attractive to contemporary listeners.

what's available: The compilation Que Viva Chango ♪♪♪½ (Qbadisc, 1993) offers many examples of why Gonzalez's voice and style have made her an influential international musician. Santa Barbara ♪♪♪½ (Fonocaribe, 1996) is a reissue of an earlier recording. The title track is one of the earliest pieces Gonzaléz wrote (which became a salsa hit for Celia Cruz), celebrating the Christian saint who is also venerated by those who follow Santería.

influences:

⏮ Afro-Cuban slave chants and songs

⏭ Campo Alegre, Celia Cruz, Reutillio Domiguez Jr., Gloria Estefan

Kerry Dexter

Rubén González

Son

Born 1920, in Havana, Cuba. Based in Havana, Cuba.

After a decades-long embargo on all things Cuban, America is opening its ears once again to the rumba, the son, and best of all, the talent of Havana's old guard. These musicians have decades of experience and instrumental virtuosity that has only recently been set to record. First among Havana's freshly discovered treasures is the agile piano playing of Rubén González . How many musicians make it big at age 78? Rubén González is one, and he owes this not simply to his immense talent, but also to recognition by Ry Cooder and to the current resurgence of classic Cuban son. In fact, compared to his guitarist, Compay Segundo, González is a spring chicken—Segundo is enjoying his revival at 90. González 's career began in 1943 when he recorded with Cuban legend Arsenio Rodriguez; he later played for over 25 years with Enrique Jorrin. Arthritis put his career on hold at the end of the 1970s until the landmark Afro-Cuban All Stars project in 1996 introduced a new generation to the island's musical riches, at the hands of many of its greatest living practitioners. Gourmet stylistic omnivore Ry Cooder was so impressed that he called on González for the Buena Vista Social Club album the following year, and Cooder singled González out for a solo recording soon afterwards. Astounded at the results, Cooder described González as the greatest piano soloist he had ever seen. "I felt I had trained all my life for this experience," he remarked at the time. "The best record I have ever been involved in."

what to buy: The 78-year-old's solo debut Introducing Rubén González ♪♪♪♪½ (World Circuit, 1997, prod. Nick Gold) features marvelous piano improvisation with tumbling scales on a par with Thelonious Monk, covering Cuban dance styles from son to rumba.

what to buy next: The best-selling brainchild of Cuba-phile Ry Cooder, Buena Vista Social Club ♪♪♪♪ (World Circuit, 1997, prod. Ry Cooder, Nick Gold) features all the septuagenarian greats of Havana kicking up danceable rhythms. The first such project was The Afro-Cuban All Stars: A Toda Cuba Le Gusta ♪♪♪½ (World Circuit, 1997, prod. Nick Gold, Juan de Marcos González), a scintillating recording of guarachas, sons, and guajiras. "La piano con Rubén González!" intones vocalist Manuel Licia as González sashays into his distinctive solo keywork.

influences:

⏮ Enrique Jorrin, Arsenio Rodriguez

⏭ Ry Cooder, generations of Cuban musicians

see also: Ry Cooder, Arsenio Rodriguez

David Poole

Jerry Gonzalez & the Fort Apache Band

Afro-Cuban, Afro-Caribbean, jazz

Formed 1980, in New York, NY, USA. Based in USA.

Jerry Gonzalez (born January 5, 1949), trumpet, flugelhorn, percussion; Andy Gonzalez, bass; John Stubblefield, tenor saxophone; Joe Ford, alto/soprano saxophones; Larry Willis, piano; Steve Berrios, percussion; Carter Jefferson, saxophone.

Trumpeter/percussionist Jerry Gonzalez leads one of today's most popular Afro-Cuban jazz outfits, the six-member Fort Apache Band. The multitalented Gonzalez and his brother, bassist Andy, grew up in the Bronx surrounded by eclectic musical influences. Jerry drew his earliest inspiration as a percussionist from Mongo Santamaria, and he began playing conga drums in contests in the parks and around the projects where he lived. Attending NYC's High School of Music and Art, Jerry met pianist Llewelyn Matthews and they both earned scholarships to New York City College of Music, where they met Kenny Dorham and formed a Latin jazz quintet. In addition to other gigs, Jerry played trumpet in Ray Barretto's band, and he occasionally subbed for the leader on congas. In 1970 he joined Dizzy Gillespie, playing congas and recording on the trumpeter's album Portrait of Jenny. Next, Jerry joined Eddie Palmieri's band for four years, applying his knowledge of Cuban music and developing a seasoned and unique conga style. The Gonzalez brothers joined with Manny Oquendo to cofound Conjunto Libre and the all-star Grupo Folklorico y Experimental Nuyorquino. Jerry continued to organize his own Latin jazz units with his brother and other top players, and with the musicians who would solidify into Fort Apache, he made his recording debut as a leader in 1980 with Ya Yo Me Cure.

While both brothers continued to work as sidemen with various sympathetic jazz players (such as Steve Turre), their 30 years of experience is best brought to fruition within the tight-yet-flexible Fort Apache Band. As one of the best-sounding ensembles arising from New York's Latin scene, the Fort Apache Band generates seamless, spontaneous shifts between scintillating Afro-Cuban rhythms and straight-ahead, bebop-influenced jazz. Starting out as a flexible entity of 10–15 pieces in the early 1980s, by the end of the decade the group had trimmed down to a quintet featuring the Gonzalez brothers with Steve Berrios (drums), Larry Willis (piano), and Carter Jefferson (saxophone). Their first two albums were recorded live at European jazz festivals. They gained wider notice in the United States after their 1989 recording Rumba Para Monk was cited as Jazz Record of the Year by the French Academie du Jazz. That recording consolidated their musical concept and led to a citation in the 55th Annual Down Beat magazine readers' poll as the top band in the "World Beat" category. In 1991 saxophonist Joe Ford joined the group; following Carter Jefferson's death in 1993, tenor saxman John Stubblefield, who'd previously guested, became a regular member. Gonzalez and his band, often augmented by guest soloists, have continued to build on their successes, releasing a stream of albums for Sunnyside, Milestone, and Enja. Originally launched with more salsa players, Fort Apache now contains musicians equally well versed in jazz, resulting in a nicely balanced sound that smoothly straddles the fence between the two musical genres and contributes to the band's uniqueness.

what to buy: To establish a reference point for Gonzalez's development, check out his debut recording, Ya Yo Me Cure ♪♪♪♪♪ (American Clavé, 1979/Sunnyside, 1996, prod. Jerry Gonzalez, Kip Hanrahan). Although this recording doesn't feature the band that became known as Fort Apache, Gonzalez plays trumpet, flugelhorn, and percussion instruments with an array of Latin-jazz all-stars, including brother Andy on bass, pianist Hilton Ruiz, trombonist Steve Turré, and tenor saxophonist Mario Rivera. Containing a mix of seven lively tunes by Frankie Rodriguez (who also sings lead vocals and plays percussion), Duke Ellington, Thelonious Monk, and others, this varied session is not quite as refined, densely textured, and tight-sounding as forthcoming Fort Apache dates. Still, it's an engaging Latinate listen that gives you a sense of where the leader is headed. This album was originally released on vinyl (AMCL 1001) and later as a CD on Sting's short-lived Pangea label. Recorded live in Berlin in 1982, The River Is Deep ♪♪♪♪♪ (Enja, 1982/1996) features Jerry Gonzalez & the Fort Apache Band as a 12-member unit that artfully connects musical influences from Africa, the Caribbean, South America, and North America. Heavily laden with percussion (from Steve Berrios, Gene Golden, Hector "Flaco" Hernandez, and Nicky Marrero), the seven tracks include a rousing version of the title tune—translated back into Spanish, that is—"Rio Esta Hondo," a rumba in the mid-paced, African-rooted guaguanco drum form, featuring vocals by Frankie Rodrigues. Pulsating hand drums predominate throughout the album, and splendid Latin-jazz tunes are earmarked by blazing horn-section playing, intelligent improvisation, and skillful solos from everyone. Making their Milestone debut on Crossroads ♪♪♪♪♪ (Milestone, 1994, prod. Todd Barkan), Gonzalez and Fort Apache perform mostly original music from band members on their boldest album to date. This well-produced 12-tune session best merges jazz with Afro-Cuban rhythms and features cutting-edge solos from all members. Tenor saxman Stubblefield, a former Fort Apache guest, returns to assume full-time duties.

what to buy next: Recorded live at the 1988 International Jazz Festival in Zurich, Obatalà ♪♪♪♪♪ (Enja, 1989, prod. Matthias Winckelmann) impresses the listener with how much Gonzalez is influenced by Dizzy Gillespie's small-ensemble Afro-Cuban jazz explorations. The balance leans more to the jazz side, but also prominently features a tantalizing percussion team (Berrios, Hernandez, Marrero, and Milton Cardona) backing the horns on exhilarating versions of Wayne Shorter's "Nefertiti," the Monk tunes "Evidence" and "Jackie-ing," and Cardona's title tune, plus four more numbers. If you like your Thelonious Monk with a Latin twist, you'll want to add Rumba Para Monk ♪♪♪♪ (Sunnyside, 1989/1995, prod. Jerry Gonzalez) to your CD collection. This cool-toned, tasteful Latin-jazz tribute to Monk finds Gonzalez's band pared down to the five members who would become the first Fort Apache—the Gonzalez brothers, percussionist Steve Berrios, tenor saxophonist Carter Jefferson, and pianist Larry Willis. Masterfully innovative yet faithful to Monk's pensive side (especially on the 10-minute version of "Misterioso"), this is the splendid eight-tune session that won the French equivalent of a Grammy. Jerry's horn playing had been seasoned to a new level by the time of this recording, and he delivers an especially tender improvised flugelhorn solo on the ballad "Ugly Beauty," accompanied only by Willis. Moliendo Café ♪♪♪♪ (Sunnyside, 1992, prod. Todd Barkan, Satoshi Harano) finds the group having achieved a well-balanced, cohesive Latin-jazz sound and bridging the divide between hard-bop and Latin grooves with great success on traditional songs such as "Obsession" and the title track, as well as on popular standards such as "Stardust" and "Summertime."

300 steve gorn

the rest:
Pensativo ♪♪♪♪ (Milestone, 1995)
Earth Dance ♪♪♪♪ (Sunnyside, 1996)
Fire Dance ♪♪♪♪½ (Milestone, 1996)

influences:
Mario Bauzà, John Coltrane, Miles Davis, Paquito D'Rivera, Dizzy Gillespie, Machito, Eddie Palmieri, Charlie Parker, Wayne Shorter

see also: Ray Barretto, Milton Cardona, Charlie Palmieri, Eddie Palmieri

Nancy Ann Lee

Steve Gorn

North Indian classical bansuri bamboo flute music, international ethno-jazz winds

Born May 23, 1944, in New York, NY, USA. Based in Kingston, NY, USA.

Steve Gorn is a New Yorker who has played bamboo flutes, clarinet, and soprano saxophone on five continents. Long recognized for his artistry on the Indian bansuri bamboo flute, his acceptance as a performer in India is rare for an American. But Gorn has transcended the ethnicity of his birth and has expressively embraced the ancient traditions of North Indian classical music. He is a disciple of the late Sri Gour Goswami. In addition to popularizing Indian music in the United States, Gorn has worked as a featured soloist with the New York City Ballet in Paris; with legendary jazz drummer Jack DeJohnette in Senegal; and as an arts coordinator in Bali. He has performed at an Indian music festival in Calcutta; at Mayan ruins in Mexico; and at a Maori long house in New Zealand. It's easy to see why David Amram calls him a "true world musician." Gorn mixes the vocabulary of Indian music with jazz and improvisation, creating a new globe-spanning aesthetic. He works with small ensembles and a variety of collaborators, including Tony Levin, Nana Vasconcelos, Peter Kater, and Glen Velez. Gorn has performed at such diverse venues as Lincoln Center, the Metropolitan Museum of Art, Ali Akbar College of Music, Naropa Institute, and a cave in upstate New York! He also composes for dance, theater, storytelling, performance art, television, and film. His scores are written for live instruments yet also explore "ethno-tech," the interface of world music with MIDI electronics.

what to buy: Steve Gorn has four primarily solo albums that feature North Indian classical music. He could charm humans or snakes with his unaccompanied Luminous Ragas ♪♪♪♪♪ (Interworld, 1994). The music—like its title—is translucent. It's also perfect for yoga or meditation. Gorn's newest release, Parampara! ♪♪♪½ (Haus der Kulturen der Velt/Wergo & Harmonia Mundi [distributors], 1998, prod. Peter Pannke) is accompanied by tabla drum virtuoso Samir Chatterjee. This album is a bit stiff and could use a better-balanced mix, but has excellent liners and musical notation of the scales.

what to buy next: A compilation on which Gorn is included, World Flutes 1 ♪♪♪♪ (EarthSea Records, 1997, prod. Peter Kater), is a treat for flute lovers. In addition to Gorn's bansuri solo accompanied by a Kurzweil K-2000, the cuts featuring Kazu Matsui on the Japanese shakuhachi, Joannie Madden on tin whistle, and R. Carlos Nakai on Native American flute are especially beautiful and contemplative. Gorn's other early Indian music albums include The Indian Bamboo Flute: Two Masters in Tradition ♪♪♪ (Lyrichord, 1992, prod. Steve Gorn) and The Bansuri Bamboo Flute ♪♪♪ (Music of the World/Latitudes, 1983/1997, prod. Bob Haddad).

what to avoid: The eclectic various-artists compilation Live at the Knitting Factory 2 ♪ (A&M, 1989, prod. Robert Appel) doesn't flow and is poorly recorded, with the flute sounding unnecessarily breathy.

the rest:
(With Badal Roy) Yantra ♪♪♪ (Music of the World, 1987/1997)
(With Glen Velez) Doctrine of Signatures ♪♪♪♪ (CMP, 1991)
(With Nana Simopoulos) Gai's Dream ♪♪½ (B&W, 1992)
(With Jai Uttal) Monkey ♪♪♪♪ (Triloka, 1992)

(With Layne Redmond) Since the Beginning ♫♫♫ (Interworld, 1992)
(With storyteller Laura Simms) Making Peace—Heart Rising ♫♫♫♫ (Earwig, 1993)
(With Nana Vasconcelos, Badal Roy, and Mike Richmond) Asian Journal ♫♫♫♫ (M.O.W., 1994)
(With Jai Uttal) Beggars and Saints ♫♫♫♫ (Triloka/Worldly, 1994)
(With Priscilla Herdman) Forever and Always ♫♫♫ (Flying Fish, 1994)
(With Natraj) Meet Me Anywhere ♫♫♫½ (Dorian, 1994)
(With I Giullari di Piazza) Earth, Sun, and Moon ♫♫♫ (Lyrichord, 1995)
(With Najma) Forbidden Kiss ♫♫ (Shanachie, 1996)
(With Noirin Ní Riain) Celtic Soul ♫♫♫½ (Living Music/Earth Music Productions, 1996)
(With Jack DeJohnette) Dancing with Nature Spirits ♫♫♫½ (ECM, 1996)
(With Randy Crafton) Duologue ♫♫♫ (Lyrichord, 1996)
(With Akira Sataki) Cooler Heads Prevail ♫♫♫ (Alula, 1997)
(With Tony Levin) From the Caves of the Iron Mountain ♫♫♫ (Papa Bear, 1997)
(With Badal Roy) One in the Pocket ♫♫♫½ (Music of the World, 1997)
(With Jai Uttal) Shiva Station ♫♫♫♫ (Triloka, 1997)
(With Ray Spiegel) Sum and Kali ♫♫♫ (Simla, 1997)
(With Warren Senders) Wings & Shadows ♫♫♫½ (Bamboo Ras Productions, 1997)
(With Deepak Chopra) A Gift of Love ♪ (Tommy Boy/RaSa, 1998)

worth searching for: Gorn's flute soars with lilting melodies above frame drum master Glen Velez on both Seven Heaven ♫♫♫♫ (CMP, 1987, prod. Kurt Renker, Walter Quintus) and Assyrian Rose ♫♫♫♫ (CMP, 1989, prod. Kurt Renker, Walter Quintus). It's not easy to find these early recordings on the now-defunct CMP label, but they are worth searching for to hear the inventive collaborations of Gorn and Velez on their original repertoire. Mail order is possible from Framedrum Music in New York at (800) 595-7415.

influences:
◀◀ John Coltrane, Pannalal Ghosh, Charles Lloyd

see also: Badal Roy, Jai Uttal, Nana Vasconcelos, Glen Velez

Iris Brooks

Eddy Grant

Worldbeat

Born 1948 in Guyana. Based in St. Philip, Barbados.

Eddy Grant, a Caribbean one-man band and record company head, has sold 20 million albums worldwide, had 21 hit singles (mostly in England and Europe), and produced and recorded more than 20 solo releases. Since the mid-1980s, when his interest in soca (modern-day calypso) led him to acquire the back catalogs of artists like Sparrow, Kitchener, and Melody and start getting involved in the yearly fray for Carnival King, he's also produced and co-written albums for Calypso Rose, Stalin, Sparrow, and Gabby.

Grant was born in Guyana, but he moved with his family to northern London when he was still a child. He formed his first band, the Equals, in the late 1960s. The Equals may have been the first integrated pop group in British history. They recorded a string of albums and singles and finally hit with "Baby Come Back," a smooth ska/rock hybrid that showed the direction Grant would follow for the rest of his career. The stress of "the Biz," however, led to a heart attack, despite Grant's alcohol-free vegetarian lifestyle. He retired from the Equals and built a house and recording studio, and after years of experimentation, Grant emerged with his first solo album, Message Man, which he released on his own label, Ice. His second effort, Walking on Sunshine, was picked up by Columbia U.K. for distribution, and its success put Grant and Ice on the map. His mixture of rock, reggae, and dance music made him an early worldbeat star, and he may have inspired the Police's tinkering with pop-reggae (it definitely influenced the earlier, more scholarly dabblings of the Clash, who recorded Grant's "Police on My Back" to no small notice). Grant moved to Barbados in 1981, where he built Blue Wave Studios and began another period of musical experimentation. Columbia finally provided American distribution for Killer on the Rampage, and its first single, "Electric Avenue," pushed the album to gold status. Grant's next, Going for Broke, included "Romancing the Stone," the theme from the hit Michael Douglas/Kathleen Turner/Danny DeVito movie, but it failed to match the sales of Killer. Columbia stopped distributing Grant, but he struck a deal with the indie label Enigma, which distributed two of his most musically adventurous albums to date, Barefoot Soldier and Paintings of the Soul.

As Grant's interest in soca intensified, he put his own career on the back burner. He opened an office in New Jersey and was about to embark on a campaign to reissue and market his back catalog, as well as the work of legends like Sparrow, Roaring Lion, and Kitchener, to world-music fans in the States. But just then he was blindsided by his former business manager, who attempted to wrest control of Ice Records and Ice Publishing away from Grant. After a nasty legal battle, the courts found in Grant's favor, but Ice hasn't yet recovered.

what to buy: Barefoot Soldier ♫♫♫♫ (Ice, 1990, prod. Eddy Grant) is one of Grant's strongest latter-day albums. There's a bit of soca in the mix now, which keeps Grant's pleasing blend of reggae, rock, and dance music sounding fresh. He's also more overtly political, and tunes like the anti-apartheid "Gimme Hope Jo'anna" and "Youth Tom Tom" show that he hasn't lost his touch for catchy, commercial melodies.

what to buy next: The record that introduced Grant to the rest of the world, Killer on the Rampage ♫♫♫½ (Epic, 1982, prod. Eddy Grant), still sounds tough, and in light of today's world-music boom, it's easy to see this as a harbinger of the intercultural music-making to follow.

best of the rest:
Walking on Sunshine ♪♪♪ (Epic, 1979)
Going for Broke ♪♪♪ (Epic, 1984)
Living on the Frontline ♪♪♪ (Epic, 1984)
File under Rock ♪♪♪ (Ice, 1988)
Paintings of the Soul ♪♪♪ (Ice, 1992)

influences:
◀◀ Bob Marley, the Rolling Stones, Sparrow ▶▶ Clash, Angélique Kidjo, Looters, the Police, UB40

j. poet

Grayhorse Singers

Powwow drum

Formed c. 1968, in the Kiowa Nation, OK, USA. Based in Oklahoma, USA.

Jack Anquoe, vocals, drums; Redcloud Anquoe, vocals, drums; Jim Anquoe, vocals, drums; Rick Anquoe, vocals, drums; Warren Anquoe, vocals, drums; Jimmy Anquoe, vocals, drums; Louis Sheridan, vocals, drums; Jason Good Blanket, vocals, drums; Jimmy Reeder, vocals, drums; La Verne Little Calf, vocals, drums. (All members are from USA.)

Jack Anquoe is considered one of the finest traditional singers and drummers on the powwow circuit. The Grayhorse Singers perform in the Southern Style, with deep, almost guttural vocals from the singers and a forceful drum attack. They are one of the most successful drum ensembles in their field.

what to buy: Shake It Up ♪♪♪♪½ (SOAR, 1993, prod. Tom Bee) is native "shake" music, as played during powwows. The drums accompany dancers, who get points every time their left feet hit the ground on the down beat, and part of the competition is the friendly rivalry between the dancers and drummers. Drums often shift tempo or add a beat, trying to literally trip up the dancers. The varied tempos and powerful singing make this album a bit more accessible to non-Indian ears.

the rest:
Gourd Talkers ♪♪♪♪ (SOAR, 1991)
Spirits Who Dance ♪♪♪♪ (SOAR, 1996)

influences:
◀◀ Haumpy and Gertie, O-ho-mah Lodge Singers

j. poet

Great Big Sea

Celtic pop

Formed 1991, in St. John's, Newfoundland, Canada. Based in St. John's, Newfoundland, Canada.

Alan Doyle, guitar, vocals, keyboard; Séan McCann, bodhrán, tin whistle, guitar, vocals; Darrell Power, bass, acoustic guitar, vocals; Bob Hallett, fiddle, accordion, mandolin, concertina, bouzouki, vocals. (All members are from Canada.)

Great Big Sea is the bastard child of Newfoundland folk music and modern pop radio. The group started with the sole purpose of taking the great old folk songs from the Newfoundland outports and melding them with the influences the band members grew up with watching cable television and listening to FM radio. Few bands boast a repertoire ranging from hundred-year-old folk songs to covers of Slade and R.E.M. Diverse though the sources may be, the band blends them into a pop-inflected folk music both infectious and substantial. On the heels of its highly successful indie debut in 1992, the band was signed to Warner Music Canada, leading to the inaugural major-label effort Up in 1995. Up was an instant best-seller in Canada, as was the 1996 follow-up, Play. Great Big Sea's success in Canada drew the attention of Sire records in the United States, which released what in essence is a greatest-hits collection of the band's two previous Canadian discs. The group's original compositions are less interesting than the traditional material at which it excels, but band members have shown steady growth as songwriters over the course of their recordings. Great Big Sea is really in its element in a live setting, and the group brings its Newfoundland kitchen party to more than 200 venues a year.

what to buy: Rant and Roar ♪♪♪♪ (Sire, 1998, prod. Danny Greenspoon) is Great Big Sea's U.S. debut and features tracks culled from two previous Canadian releases. It is a lively collection of traditional Newfoundland-inspired folk music with a pop sensibility. The Scottish traditional song "Mari-Mac" is given a frantic, almost punk treatment, while the cover of R.E.M.'s "It's the End of the World As We Know It" is fraught with a modern Celtic feel thanks to some sprightly mandolin.

what to buy next: Great Big Sea ♪♪♪♪½ (NRA Productions, 1992, prod. Pat Janes) is the independent debut that made Warner Music take notice and sign the group to a multi-album deal. Up ♪♪♪♪ (Warner Music, 1995, prod. Danny Greenspoon) and Play ♪♪♪½ (Warner Music, 1996, prod. Danny Greenspoon) are both easily available in the United States as imports, but due to the proportion of each culled on Rant and Roar, only diehard fans will want to seek them out.

worth searching for: Prior to joining forces in Great Big Sea, three of the members were in the group Rankin Street. That band recorded a live set at a local St. John's, Newfoundland, pub which was later released on cassette. It shows the early inklings of what would become Great Big Sea. The blending of traditional material like the sea chantey "General Taylor" with modern pop songs like Johnny Otis's "Willie and the Hand Jive" has become this band's trademark, and it all started here. More recently, the full-blown Great Big Sea gives one of many spirited performances on the Chieftains' all-star Canadian Celtic invitational collection Fire in the Kitchen ♪♪♪ (BMG, 1998).

influences:

◀◀ Emile Benoit, Figgy Duff, Spirit of the West, Van Halen

▶▶ The Punters

see also: Oyster Band

Cliff McGann

The Green Fields of America

See: Mick Moloney

Sylvan Grey

New age

Born in USA. Based in USA.

Grey plays the kantele, the Finnish national instrument, which looks like an autoharp without chord bars. Her kantele has 36 strings and has a sustain that allows individual notes to build up plenty of harmonic overtones.

what's available: Recurring Dream ♪♪♪♪ (Fortuna, 1989, prod. Sylvan Grey, Dan Hersch) is a soothing, new-age excursion, with enough virtuosity to keep you awake for the length of the performance. On Ice Flowers Melting ♪♪♪♪ (Fortuna, 1988, prod. Lou Judson), Grey sounds more folky, in the American sense, and less Finnish, but the album is still a low-key charmer. It's only available on cassette.

influences:

◀◀ Martti Pokela

j. poet

Marcia Griffiths

Ska, reggae, dancehall

Born 1954, in Kingston, Jamaica. Based in Kingston, Jamaica.

The queen of reggae music, Marcia Griffiths has prospered in a male-dominated industry since the 1960s and is still going strong. You have probably heard her voice as one of the I-Threes backing Bob Marley on any of his albums after Natty Dread, but her best work has been as a solo artist. Discovered singing in the street during her teens by star producer Clement Dodd, Griffiths recorded ska tunes for his Studio One records. She moved on to international success with rocksteady music and covers of soul classics for producer Sonia Pottinger in 1969. The collaboration with Pottinger yielded strong albums throughout the 1970s. Her partnership with singer Bob Andy, as half of Bob & Marcia, resulted in Young, Gifted and Black, a #5 album in the U.K. Griffiths has been the backing vocalist of choice in reggae, and her distinctive, sweet soprano can be the pygmies

It's strange and sad to think that a people who have influenced world-music stars from Zap Mama to Deep Forest to the Grateful Dead's Mickey Hart are themselves in danger of extinction thanks to bureaucracy, deforestation, and international ignorance. In some small compensation, the Pygmy culture scattered throughout Africa has been well documented on CD. Depicting a society that doesn't revolve around modern conveniences—you don't see Pygmy bands marching off into studios or on extravagant world tours—these albums are true windows on their lives, field recordings done in their villages. Recurring features are complex mass chants and, occasionally, homemade flutes and makeshift percussion—clapping hands, slapping water—from nomadic peoples who don't transport elaborate instruments. Since this music is recorded in the great outdoors, don't expect polished audio, but do expect fascinating glimpses into the Pygmy cultures, encompassing their initiation rituals, stories, and everyday casual songs. Though hunting is important to the tribes (and the basis of many songs), pygmies essentially lead a peaceful lifestyle with close-knit families and little private ownership. They see themselves as part of the nurturing forest they inhabit, and have little contact with the world outside it. The animals, the wind, and the rivers are all as much a part of their songs as their own vocals, which consist of phonetic sounds rather than words—the tribes see this as coming from spirits of the forest, which they channel. Recommended CDs and the countries they cover include Mbuti Pygmies of the Ituri Rainforest ♪♪♪♪ (Smithsonian/Folkways)—Congo; Heart of the Forest ♪♪♪♪ (Hannibal)—Cameroon; and Anthology of World Music, Africa: The BaBenzélé Pygmies ♪♪♪ (Rounder)—Central African Republic/Congo/Cameroon. Even more scholarly are two collections from the ellipsis arts . . . label, each of which includes extensive notes and photos: Echoes of the Forest ♪♪♪♪♪ compiles recordings of Central African Pygmies from several sources, and Louis Sarno's amazing Bayaka ♪♪♪♪♪ (also focused on the BaBenzélé tribe) comes with a comprehensive 93-page booklet.

see also: Baka Beyond, Zap Mama

Jason Gross

heard on hundreds of other people's records. She has moved with the times, from ska and soul, to Marley's roots reggae, to her current smooth dancehall love songs.

what to buy: Griffiths began her career at Studio One in the mid-1960s. To be present at the creation, check out The Original (at Studio One) Marcia Griffiths ♪♪♪♪ (Studio One, 1997, prod. Clement Dodd). Coming full circle, the diva recently revisited Studio One to cover her early hits on Truly ♪♪♪♪ (Studio One, 1999, prod. Clement Dodd). Not only does the new recording of "My Ambition," where Griffiths sings "something keeps pushing me on," sum up the stunning drive of this inimitable singer, but her voice is fuller, more assured, and the quality of her performance is even better than in the original. Griffiths's years with producer Sonia Pottinger produced outstanding work that compares favorably with Aretha Franklin's output during the same years. Check out Best of 1969–1974: Put a Little Love in Your Heart ♪♪♪♪♪ (Trojan, 1993, prod. Sonia Pottinger), with classic soul covers like Nina Simone's "Young, Gifted and Black" and Curtis Mayfield's "Gypsy Man." Two more strong albums followed with Pottinger: the esteemed Steppin' ♪♪♪ (High Note 1979/Shanachie 1991, prod. Sonia Pottinger) features roots originals; Naturally ♪♪♪♪½ (High Note JA/Sky Note U.K., 1978/Shanachie, 1992, prod. Sonia Pottinger) revisits earlier hits and is worth the price simply for her version of Bunny Wailer's "Dreamland," in which she wistfully lilts, "There is a land that I have heard about/so far across the sea."

what to buy next: Griffith's latest incarnation as a dancehall diva of smooth love songs is heard on Indomitable ♪♪♪½ (Penthouse, 1993).

the rest:
Marcia ♪♪ (RAS, 1989)
Carousel ♪♪♪½ (Mango, 1990)

influences:
◀◀ Bob Andy, Phyllis Dillon, Aretha Franklin, Miriam Makeba, Bob Marley, Nina Simone, Dionne Warwick

▶▶ Lady Saw, J.C. Lodge, Sister Carol

see also: Rita Marley, Judy Mowatt

David Poole

Groupa

Swedish folk music

Formed 1980 in Sweden. Based in Sweden.

Mats Edén, fiddle, viola, accordion, leader; Tina Johansson, percussion; Jonas Simonsson, flute, bass, sax; Rickard Åström, keyboards; Hållbus Totte Mattson, lute, guitars (1982–90); Bill McChesny, recorder, bass clarinet (1982–90); Lena Willemark, vocals (1989–90); Leif Stinnerbom, viola (1982–87). (All members are from Sweden.)

"In Sweden, formal study of folk music started at the beginning of the 19th Century, with the first folk festivals organized in 1906," says Mats Edén, the leader of Groupa, one of Sweden's most successful folk bands. "The union movement of the '40s used folk music to organize people, like in the U.S. In the '60s there was a split in the folk community; one faction wanted to play traditionally and explore old manuscripts and local traditions that had been forgotten; one went into folk/rock." That split still exists today, although Edén tries to reconcile it with Groupa, a band that plays "traditional music in a modern way." Groupa's music has echoes in the virtuosic fiddling of Ireland and the American South, and if ethnomusicologists are correct about European folk music traveling westward, Scandinavian music may be the root of America's mournful mountain ballads. During its 19-year history, some of Sweden's most famous musicians have passed through Groupa's ranks, including Totte Mattson (who went on to form Hedningarna, one of Sweden's most commercially successful folk bands), Lena Willemark (the singer and fiddler with Nordan Project), and Ale Möller (the band's producer and co-founder of Nordan Project).

what's available: The compilation 15 Years ♪♪♪♪ (NorthSide, 1998, prod. Ale Möller) collects tracks from five of the band's Swedish albums. Hear one of that country's most important folk outfits, one that tries to stay true to the traditional sources of the music without slavishly imitating the sounds of yesteryear.

influences:
◀◀ Hjort Anders, Jan Johansson

▶▶ Garmarna, Hedningarna, Hoven Droven

see also: Hedningarna, Nordan Project

j. poet

Gu-Achi Fiddlers

Tohono O'odham fiddle music

Formed late 1970s, in Gu-Achi, AZ, USA. Based in Gu-Achi, AZ, USA.

Gerald Leos Sr., snare drum; Lester Vavages, fiddle; Tommy Lopez, bass drum; Wilfred Mendoza, guitar; Elliot Johnson, fiddle. (All members are from USA.)

The Gu-Achi Fiddlers are members of the Tohono O'odham Nation of Arizona. The notion of fiddling Indians may seem odd, but this tradition dates back to the mid-19th century, when Spanish Catholic missionaries began teaching Indians to play European instruments so they could provide music for the mass. In their spare time, the Indians adapted polkas, schottishces, mazurkas, and other European dances to their own devices. Fiddle dances were popular in many Indian communities, and even when the style was updated with sax and electric instruments in the 1950s (à la Southern Scratch), the fiddle remained popular in many isolated communities. The Gu-Achi Fiddlers, the first Indian fiddle band to record, have been playing together for decades, and you can hear traces of norteño, mariachi, and other Latin forms in their unique brand of "Indian swing band music."

what's available: The tempos are laid back on Old Time O'odham Fiddle Music ♪♪♪♪ (Canyon, 1988/1997, prod. Ray Boley), but the swing's still the thing. The Library of Congress gave the original release a citation for Outstanding Album of Folk, Ethnic, and Traditional Music.

worth searching for: The cassette-only O'odham Fiddle Music, Vol. 2 ♪♪♪♪ (Canyon, 1989) offers more low-key charm from these old-timers.

influences:

- Bob Wills

if you like:

- El Conjunto Murrietta, Joaquin Brothers Band, Southern Scratch

see also: Bayou Seco, Southern Scratch

j. poet

Juan Luis Guerra

Merengue

Born September 8, 1961, in the Dominican Republic. Based in Santa Domingo, Dominican Republic.

Juan Luis Guerra and his band 4.40 sold more than five million copies of Bachata Rosa in the first three years of its release, figures that kept the album on the Latin charts for almost two years and earned a Grammy, not to mention a multimillion-dollar endorsement deal with Pepsi. Guerra's 1993 concert tour of the United States was one of the longest and most successful North American ventures ever undertaken by a Latin artist, and although he refuses to sing in English, many major labels are eager to take a chance on his successful combination of merengue, bachata, and salsa romantico.

Guerra may be the biggest international star in Latin music's history. He was born to a middle-class family in the Dominican Republic and graduated from Boston's prestigious Berklee College of Music. He formed his first version of 4.40 in 1984 (the number refers to the wavelength of standard concert pitch, A above middle C, the "perfect" note in the Western musical system). But their first album, a mixture of Latin jazz and big band music influenced by Ellington, Mingus, and Basie, proved unsatisfying both commercially and artistically. "Something was missing," Guerra told Miami's New Times. "I wanted to get back to the African roots of our music. Everyone here is brown or black; we can trace our roots back to Africa as well as Spain, and I wanted to work on this in all its aspects."

Guerra took the merengue—an indigenous rhythm that mixes faster-than-light African drumming, jazzy interlocking horn charts, and intricate vocal harmonies—and blended it with rock, romantic Latin pop, salsa, and bachata, another lesser-known Dominican rhythm. The bachata comes from the island nation's back country, a music that draws on Native as well as African and Spanish elements. Literally translated, it means "garbage" or "trash," and until Guerra revitalized it, it was considered too low-class, too untamed for polite consumption. By calling an album Bachata Rosa ("Trashy Rose" or "Pink Garbage"), Guerra made an ironic comment on the illusions of normalcy that the island's ruling class tries to maintain, since clean drinking water, electricity, and a living wage are impossible for most workers to attain. Guerra's other contribution was the addition of lyrics that deal with the day-to-day reality of the island's underclass. A follower of the Latin nueva canción movement, Guerra isn't afraid to write tunes that take the powers that be to task for their sins. On the title song of 1987's Ojala que Llueva Cafe (May It Rain Coffee), Guerra put himself in the place of a campesino trying to feed his family. "I heard a farmer in a small town say this. There are many who die without knowing they are poets, so I took his phrase and made a song about it. He was desperate when he wrote this; wishing it would rain coffee, bread, all the things he needed."

Guerra's social concerns, as well as his international vision, are in evidence on his most recent albums, Areíto and Fogaraté, where he collaborates with Congolese guitar ace Diblo Dibala for some sizzling Latin soukous. "I'm not going to sing in English," Guerra insists. "Spanish is the way I know, the way I feel. When I was young I loved the Beatles, even though I couldn't understand the words. People understand rhythm and harmony, even when they don't get anything else. Lyrics are important, but even if you don't understand, you can dance."

what to buy: While its sales figures are not as massive as those for Bachata Rosa, Fogaraté ♪♪♪♪½ (Karen, 1994, prod. Juan Luis Guerra) is another breakthrough album. There are two collaborations with Diblo, making explicit the African roots of merengue, and of Caribbean music in general; a traditional backwoods merengue composed by, and featuring, accordion master Francisco Ulloa; "La Crimosa," a love song with a melody lifted from Mozart's "Requiem"; and, despite his assurances to the contrary, a Beatle-esque pop tune sung in English.

what to buy next: Ojalá que Llueva Café ♪♪♪♪♪ (Karen, 1987, prod. Juan Luis Guerra) is the disc that made Juan Luis a star; it's more up-tempo and less slick than his later efforts, but no less exciting. Merengue, bachata, salsa romantico, a touch of soca, and Guerra's passionate political poetry add up to a perfect party album, one that moves your heart as well as your feet.

the rest:
El Original 4.40 ♫♫ (Karen, 1984)
Mudanza y Acarreo ♫♫ (Karen, 1986)
Mientras Más lo Pienso . . . Tú ♫♫♫ (Karen, 1988)
Bachata Rosa ♫♫♫♫½ (Karen, 1990)
Areito ♫♫♫♫½ (Karen, 1992)

influences:
⏮ Francisco Ulloa, Wilfrido Vargas, Johnny Ventura

⏭ Luis y Javier, Proyecto Uno

see also: Diblo Dibala

j. poet

The Guo Brothers & Shung Tian

Traditional Chinese folk and classical songs (the Chinese do not differentiate between these two genres)

Guo Brothers born in Beijing, China. Shung Tian formed in Beijing, China. Based in England.

Guo Yue, Chinese bamboo flutes; Guo Yi, sheng (hand-held mouth-blown organ); Wang Shun Xin, Chinese oboe; Guo Xiaun, vocals; Guo Liang, zheng (harp); Zhao Zheng Ren, yang qin (dulcimer), Chinese drums; Chang Gui Duo, da ruan (bass guitar); Pól Brennan (Ireland), keyboards and percussion (gongs, woodblock, Chinese hand cymbals, chimes). (All members are from China unless otherwise specified; note that the Chinese list their surname first.)

Their father being an established singer and erhu (Chinese two-stringed violin) player, the Guo Brothers seemed destined for music careers. Circumstances assured it, as the Cultural Revolution sent their mother away before their father's death landed them in what was then called the Peking Musician's Compound, where music professionals lived and worked together. Fighting extreme poverty, the brothers would pay for music lessons in cooking oil.

Yue was in the Army Orchestra of the People's Republic of China, traveling by train and on horseback to remote areas to play for troops. Yi became part of the Peking Film Orchestra at 15, and within three years he was on the soundtracks of over 200 films. Heading to England to further their studies, the brothers were asked by David Byrne (formerly of Talking Heads and an accomplished world-music producer and performer) to contribute to the soundtrack for The Last Emperor. Eventually, the members of Shung Tian (former colleagues of Yi's in the Peking Film Orchestra) were able to get to England—one of the few groups to leave China without state support. In the lineup was Guo sister Xiaun, a famous Chinese opera singer.

what's available: Yuan ♫♫♫♫½ (RealWorld Records, 1990, prod. Pól Brennan) translates as "to be far away," and that is the situation in which the Guo Brothers and the members of Shung Tian found themselves, as they were studying and recording worlds removed from China. Producer Brennan, a former member of Clannad, heard a tape of the Guo Brothers while working at RealWorld Studios and recognized that despite cultural differences, there was a musical affinity between himself and the Guos. Both brothers are masters of their instruments, breathing life into them as the songs of Yuan tell tales about the everyday experiences of villagers ("Step by Step"), soldiers ("Three Kingdoms"), royalty ("The Dream of the Red Mansion")—every kind of "folk." Songs are arranged by the brothers, and Shung Tian provides the balance of the magical instrumental potpourri that is Chinese classical/folk music. Guo Xiaun is gifted with a voice that is equally comfortable soloing in a simple folk song or soaring in arias over a full orchestra. Yuan can be pared down and focused at one moment and turn into a controlled traffic jam of sounds the next. These are consummate performers giving one of the best examples of Chinese music.

worth searching for: Of course, the soundtrack to The Last Emperor (EMD/Virgin, 1987) is a must-listen. Several compilations contain Guo Brothers tracks, along with a wealth of other fine world music: the four-CD box set Global Meditation ♫♫♫♫½ (ellipsis arts . . . , 1993), which is reviewed in this book's Compilations section; Imaginary Landscapes—A Brief History of Ambient, Vol. 2 ♫♫♫♫½ (EMD/Virgin, 1994), which is an excellent ambient starter kit; and the ultra-pleasant Bliss (EMD/RealWorld, 1998), which is also reviewed in this book's Compilations section.

influences:
⏮ Traditional Chinese music

Stacy Meyn

Trilok Gurtu

World-jazz fusion

Born 1951 in Bombay, India. Based in Hamburg, Germany.

Born into a highly musical family (his grandfather was a noted sitar player and his mother, Shobha, remains a popular classical singing star), percussionist Trilok Gurtu began studying tabla with Ahmed Jan Thirakwa at the age of six. By the mid-1960s, he and his brother were leading their own group in Bombay, and greatly influenced by the groundbreaking music of Miles Davis and John Coltrane, he soon turned to jazz, teaching himself to play drums, percussion, and congas. By 1973 he had left for Europe with an Indian jazz-rock group, and in 1976 he moved to America, where he began his longstanding association with jazz saxophonist Charlie Mariano. By the late 1970s and early 1980s, Gurtu was touring and recording with a veritable Who's Who in jazz fusion, including a two-year stint with multicultural trumpeter Don Cherry, a four-year association with Ralph Towner's group Oregon, and several years with Mahavishnu Orchestra founder John McLaughlin. In 1988 Gurtu recorded Usfret, his debut as a bandleader and the album that established his trademark sound—a seamless, highly improvisational blend of jazz, rock, and a variety of ethnic traditions. Since that time, he has alternated between appearing as a sideman with a diverse range of artists including Joe Zawinul, Pat Metheny, Bill Laswell's Material, and Pharoah Sanders, and creating his own multicultural masterpieces, many of which have featured these same stellar musicians. Now considered one of the world's finest master drummers in any musical genre, Gurtu won Down Beat magazine's critics poll for best percussionist in 1995, 1996, and 1997.

what to buy: Gurtu's latest album, The Glimpse ♪♪♪♪½ (Silva Screen, 1997, prod. Trilok Gurtu, Walter Quintus, Kurt Renker), is also easily his best—a brilliant blend of musical styles paying tribute to the drummer's dearly departed friend, Don Cherry. Guest musicians—including Morocco's Jaya Deva (who performed with Cherry), India's Geetha Ramanathan Bennett, and Bulgaria's Teodosii Spassov—make this Gurtu's most ethnically diverse album yet. Nearly every track is a standout, from the rollicking Moroccan groove of "Cherry Town" and the dazzling Indian konnakkol (spoken percussion) of "1-2 Beaucoup" to the melancholy blues balladry of Ornette Coleman's "Law Years." A must-have for fans of world-jazz fusion.

what to buy next: The Trilok Gurtu Collection ♪♪♪♪ (Silva Screen, 1997, prod. Trilok Gurtu, Walter Quintus, Kurt Renker) is a fine overview of the virtuosic drummer's career, with 10 tracks culled from his six albums, many of which are now very difficult to find. Gurtu's sound has remained surprisingly consistent over the years, from his work with Cherry, Ralph Towner, and L. Shankar on 1988's "Shobharock" up through his most recent efforts, although his excursions into jazz-funk fusion aren't quite as memorable as his more ethnically influenced compositions. Look for impressive appearances by Shobha Gurtu, Nana Vasconcelos, saxophonist Jan Garbarek, and even Pink Floyd guitarist David Gilmore (!), all of whom contribute to Gurtu's distinctive sound without overwhelming it with their own dynamic personalities.

the rest:
Usfret ♪♪♪♪ (CMP, 1988)
Living Magic ♪♪♪½ (CMP, 1991)
Crazy Saints ♪♪♪♪ (CMP, 1993)
Believe ♪♪♪ (CMP, 1994)
Bad Habits Die Hard ♪♪♪♪ (CMP, 1996)

influences:
◀◀ Don Cherry, John Coltrane, Shobha Gurtu, Pandit Kamalesh Maitra

▶▶ Cornershop, Talvin Singh

see also: Bill Laswell, Pandit Kamalesh Maitra, L. Shankar, Nana Vasconcelos

Bret Love

The Gyuto Monks

Buddhist chant

Formed 1474, in Lhasa, Tibet. Based in Bomdile (a.k.a. Bomdi-La or Bomdilla), India.

Rotating membership over the course of more than five centuries, recently including: Kalsang Dhundup; Kalden Tsering; Dakpa Gyaltsen; Lobsang Dhundup; Ngawang Sherab; Lobsang Jungney; Tenzin Norgyal; Tupten Jigme; Tashi Namgyal; Lobsang Tsering; Ken Rinpoche; Sonam Thargyal; Samten Tharchen; Tenzin Norbu; Tsering Norbu; Karma Phunstok; Tupten Chodak; Tupten Donyo; Tsultim Tashi; Tupten Sherap.

The Gyuto Tantric University is one of about a half-dozen colleges of advanced Buddhist studies that thrived in Tibet for hundreds of years before the 1949 Chinese invasion. After a particularly bloody purge of Buddhist culture in 1959, 90 of the Gyuto Monks fled with the Dalai Lama to the northern border of India, where they re-established the college. Every monk who attends the Gyuto college learns the unique style of multiphonic chanting that has been part of its rituals for 500 years, in which each participant produces a full chord, not just a single note. Until recently, outsiders weren't permitted to observe these rituals—they weren't hidden out of secrecy, but because of the conviction that one must be properly initiated to safely contend with the powers that are released. World-traveling ethnologists may have recorded the Gyuto Monks' chanting prior to World War II, but even if you could find the cylinder recordings or 78 rpm discs, their poor fidelity would obscure the monks' extraordinary voices. The earliest known recordings of the Gyuto Monks were made in Dalhousie, India, by religious scholar Huston Smith in 1964, followed by ethnomusicologist David Lewiston in 1972. Although these albums were well received in academic circles and among aficionados of psychophysical phenomena, they received little mainstream attention.

The monks were still largely unknown in 1985 when the Grateful Dead's Mickey Hart organized a benefit concert and recorded Tibetan Tantric Choir for Windham Hill Records. (Benefits remained the standard for subsequent tours, which were organized and supported by volunteer Grateful Dead technicians and staff. Over the years, these concerts have raised enough funds to construct a new monastery/school for the lineage in exile.) Although Windham Hill was busy with the new-age music boom and lacked the interest and experience to market the monks, the album reportedly sold more copies than all of Lewiston's releases combined. During a 1988 U.S. tour, Hart recorded Freedom Chants from the Roof of the World for Rykodisc, and the label enthusiastically promoted the album as part of its new Hart-produced series, The World. In the 1990s, the monks contributed to the critically acclaimed film soundtracks for Kundun and Seven Years in Tibet; toured as emissaries of the Tibetan culture, religion, and nation; and recorded little-known albums on obscure labels. Hart added samples of their chants to his albums and protested when the Beastie Boys used unauthorized samples, asking that they contribute to the monks' charitable fund as compensation.

what to buy: You can't go wrong with any of the Gyuto Monks' titles—their chanting is arguably the most profound sacred music on the planet. Even albums with less than ideal fidelity present uniquely powerful listening experiences. Tibetan Buddhism: Tantra of Gyuto: Sangwa Düpa and Mahakala ♪♪♪♪ (WEA/Elektra/Nonesuch, 1988, prod. David Lewiston) combines material from two LPs that David Lewiston recorded on his 1972 expedition: Tantras of Gyuto—Mahakala (Nonesuch, 1973) and Tantras of Gyuto—Sangua Düpa (Nonesuch, 1975). These are the oldest Gyuto Monks recordings readily available. The a cappella track "Sangwa Düpa" is a 41-minute portion of a 7 1/2-hour recitation that features the potent resonance of 40 monks—perhaps the largest assemblage of Gyuto Monks ever recorded. On the 18-minute "Mahakala," the chant of a dozen monks provides a background drone for the majestic bellowing of six-foot-long trumpets and the clattering of percussion instruments. The recordings were made nearly 30 years ago in a tin-roofed shed that served as a shrine room, which accounts for the brittle edginess in the soundscape. Tibetan Tantric Choir ♪♪♪♪½ (Windham Hill, 1987, prod. Mickey Hart) features two penetrating chants by the 11 monks who constituted the 1985 traveling troupe. "Guhyasamaja Tantra, Chapter II" is a recitation of Buddhist texts that is laden with overtone harmonics; "Melody for Mahakala" adds powerful drums, bells, cymbals, brass horns, and conch shells to the chanting. The sound quality is a bit hard and thin. At press date, Windham Hill could not confirm that this recording is still in print, but many distributors report having the title in stock. Freedom Chants from the Roof of the World ♪♪♪♪♪ (Rykodisc, 1989, prod. Mickey Hart) features similar chanting and instrumentation, but advances in recording technology, superior studio space, and the presence of almost double the number of monks produce a CD that is far more intense and clear than the Windham Hill volume. The finale, "#2 for Gaia," is a musical offering to the monks by Hart, Kitaro, and Philip Glass—which seems mundane and extraneous after two extended pieces of highly focused chanting. But then, the monks are a tough act to follow. Remarkable stereo separation, rich fidelity, and the 53-minute length of the only cut, "Sangwa Duepa," make Buddhist Chant II: Tibet ♪♪♪♪♪ (JVC World Sounds, 1990, prod. Soh Fujimoto) a riveting listen. The CD is part of a far-ranging series of world-music titles; beware of different covers on American and Japanese editions that feature the same material.

the rest:

Tibetan Gyuto Monks Live (Keytone Records, 1997)

Music for Meditation: The Gyuto Monks Live on Tour, Featuring Chris Hinze (Keytone Records, 1998)

(With Chris Hinze) Tibet Impressions Volume II (Keytone Records, 1998)

Voices of the World (Full Circle Music)

worth searching for: The Music of Tibet: The Tantric Rituals ♪♪♪♪♪ (Minuteman, 1968, prod. Huston Smith) is Smith's 1964 mono album that spawned all of the interest in the Gyuto Monks, and it remains a powerful, penetrating listen. The 13 short selections emphasize the variety of the Gyuto Monks' styles rather the absorbing quality of one or two long, stately tracks. When the Minuteman label folded long ago, Smith took possession of the master tapes, which he dubs and sells by mail order. This pivotal piece of music history may be purchased for $10 from Huston Smith, 1151 Colusa Avenue, Berkeley, CA 94707 USA. Proceeds benefit Tibetan relief efforts. Narrated by Francis Huxley, the 52-minute film Tantra of Gyuto: Sacred Rituals of Tibet (Mystic Fire Video, 1974) contains Tibetan Buddhist ceremonies performed by the Gyuto Monks, plus rare footage of Tibet from the 1920s to the 1950s. The video is available from Mystic Fire Video, P.O. Box 422, New York, NY 10012-0008 USA; (800) 292-9001. Also available on video, Requiem for a Faith (Hartley Productions, 1986) is Huston Smith's excellent survey of Tibetan Buddhism, featuring examples of Gyuto Monks chanting multiphonically. The film was shot mainly at the Gyuto Monastery in Dalhousie, India. Written by Robert Thurman and narrated by Martin Sheen, Margot Kidder, and Mickey Hart, the documentary Timeless Voices: The Gyuto Monks at St. John the Divine (Society for Gyuto Sacred Arts, 1989) features footage from assorted Gyuto Monks concerts, including the performance that concluded their 1988 tour. (All profits from videotapes purchased from Grateful Dead Merchandising, (800) 225-3323, support the Gyuto College.) Because, due to length considerations, only 18 minutes of the LP Tantras of Gyuto—Mahakala (Nonesuch, 1973) appear on the Tantra of Gyuto CD, the balance of the original album must be considered out of print, its entirety unheard by many and worth searching for by all. The sampler Around the World (for a Song) (Rykodisc, 1991) includes "Yamantaka (Edit)"—a fragment from the Freedom Chants CD. The Beastie Boys' Ill Communication (Grand Royal/Capitol, 1994) reportedly contains uncredited samples of the Gyuto Monks on "Shambala" and "Bodhisattva Vow." Authorized samples of the monks may be heard in "Only the Strange Remain" on Mickey Hart's Mystery Box (Rykodisc, 1996), and in "Angola" on Mickey Hart's Planet Drum: Supralingua (Rykodisc, 1998). In a single year, the Gyuto Monks appeared on two soundtrack albums that were nominated for Golden Globe Awards: John Williams's Seven Years in Tibet (Sony, 1997) and Philip Glass's Kundun (WEA/Atlantic/Nonesuch, 1997); naturally, the films themselves also feature the monks' performances.

influences:

- The Beastie Boys, Philip Glass, the Grateful Dead, Mickey Hart, Chris Hinze, David Hykes, Kitaro, Pauline Oliveros, Terry Riley, John Williams

see also: Mickey Hart, Yungchen Lhamo

Richard Price

Idjah Hadijah

Jaipongan

Born in Sunda, West Java, Indonesia. Based in Sunda, West Java, Indonesia.

Idjah Hadijah evokes visions of sweltering tropical days and steamy, languid nights, even as she cools and calms the listener with her low, gentle voice, and subtle, reserved presence. She sings in Sundanese, a language similar to but distinct in tone and style from her home island's dominant Javanese, and very different from Bahasa Indonesia, the common, national language that unites that sprawling country of 13,000-plus islands, 600-plus languages, and three time zones. Best known in the West for Tonggeret, her exquisite 1987 album on Icon/Nonesuch, and especially for its title track, Hadijah was famous early on as a singer in the traditional wayang golek Sundanese rod-puppet theater. Her performances with the famous puppeteer R. Cecep Supriadi, her husband, brought her to the attention of Gugum Gumbira Tirasonjaya, an important figure in the development of jaipongan (Indonesian popular music). Earlier Gugum had, like much of Indonesian youth, taken an intense interest in rock 'n' roll, but had to abandon it in the face of President Sukarno's early-1960s banning of things Western and "encouragement" of things Indonesian. Turning to the local culture of Sunda, Gugum and others developed jaipongan as a musical and dance style based on indigenous forms. In the 1970s they began to present a popular music and dance of far-reaching importance, one of a very few such genres worldwide with virtually no Western influence or instrumentation.

At Hadijah performances, one hears echoes of the very sophisticated and refined traditional court and folk theaters of Java and Sunda. Overlaid are the far earthier, sensual tones and movements of the older Sundanese village genre of ketuk tilu—gamelan (tuned percussion ensemble) performances that featured professional female singer/dancers, frequently prostitutes, who danced with local men for pay. Nowadays, the jaipongan gamelan is still composed of various gongs and drums, not to mention the ubiquitous, reedy-sounding rebab (a two-stringed upright spike-tip fiddle), but the singers and dancers have been relieved of their extracurricular activities. What remains are haunting, lyrical songs of love and money, regal gongs, the droning rebab, intervals of drumming and whooping by the band . . . and a style that became a nationwide dance craze, no electric guitars allowed.

what's available: You want all of Tonggeret ♪♪♪♪♪ (Icon/Nonesuch Explorer, 1987, prod. Gugum Gumbira Tirasonjaya) for an introduction to a unique style by an unforgettable practitioner, though the landmark title track is also included on the worthy compilation Global Divas ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1995, prod. Brooke Wentz). Probably the only other jaipongan recording easily available in the West is Jaipongan Java ♪♪♪♪♪ (GlobeStyle, 1990, prod. Gugum Gumbira Tirasonjaya) by the equally extraordinary Euis Komariah, with the Jugala Orchestra. For those willing to search the import bins or able to visit Indonesia itself, Hadijah recorded dozens of albums on Gugum's Jugala label in the 1980s.

influences:

- Traditional music and dance of Java and Sunda

Jack Vartoogian

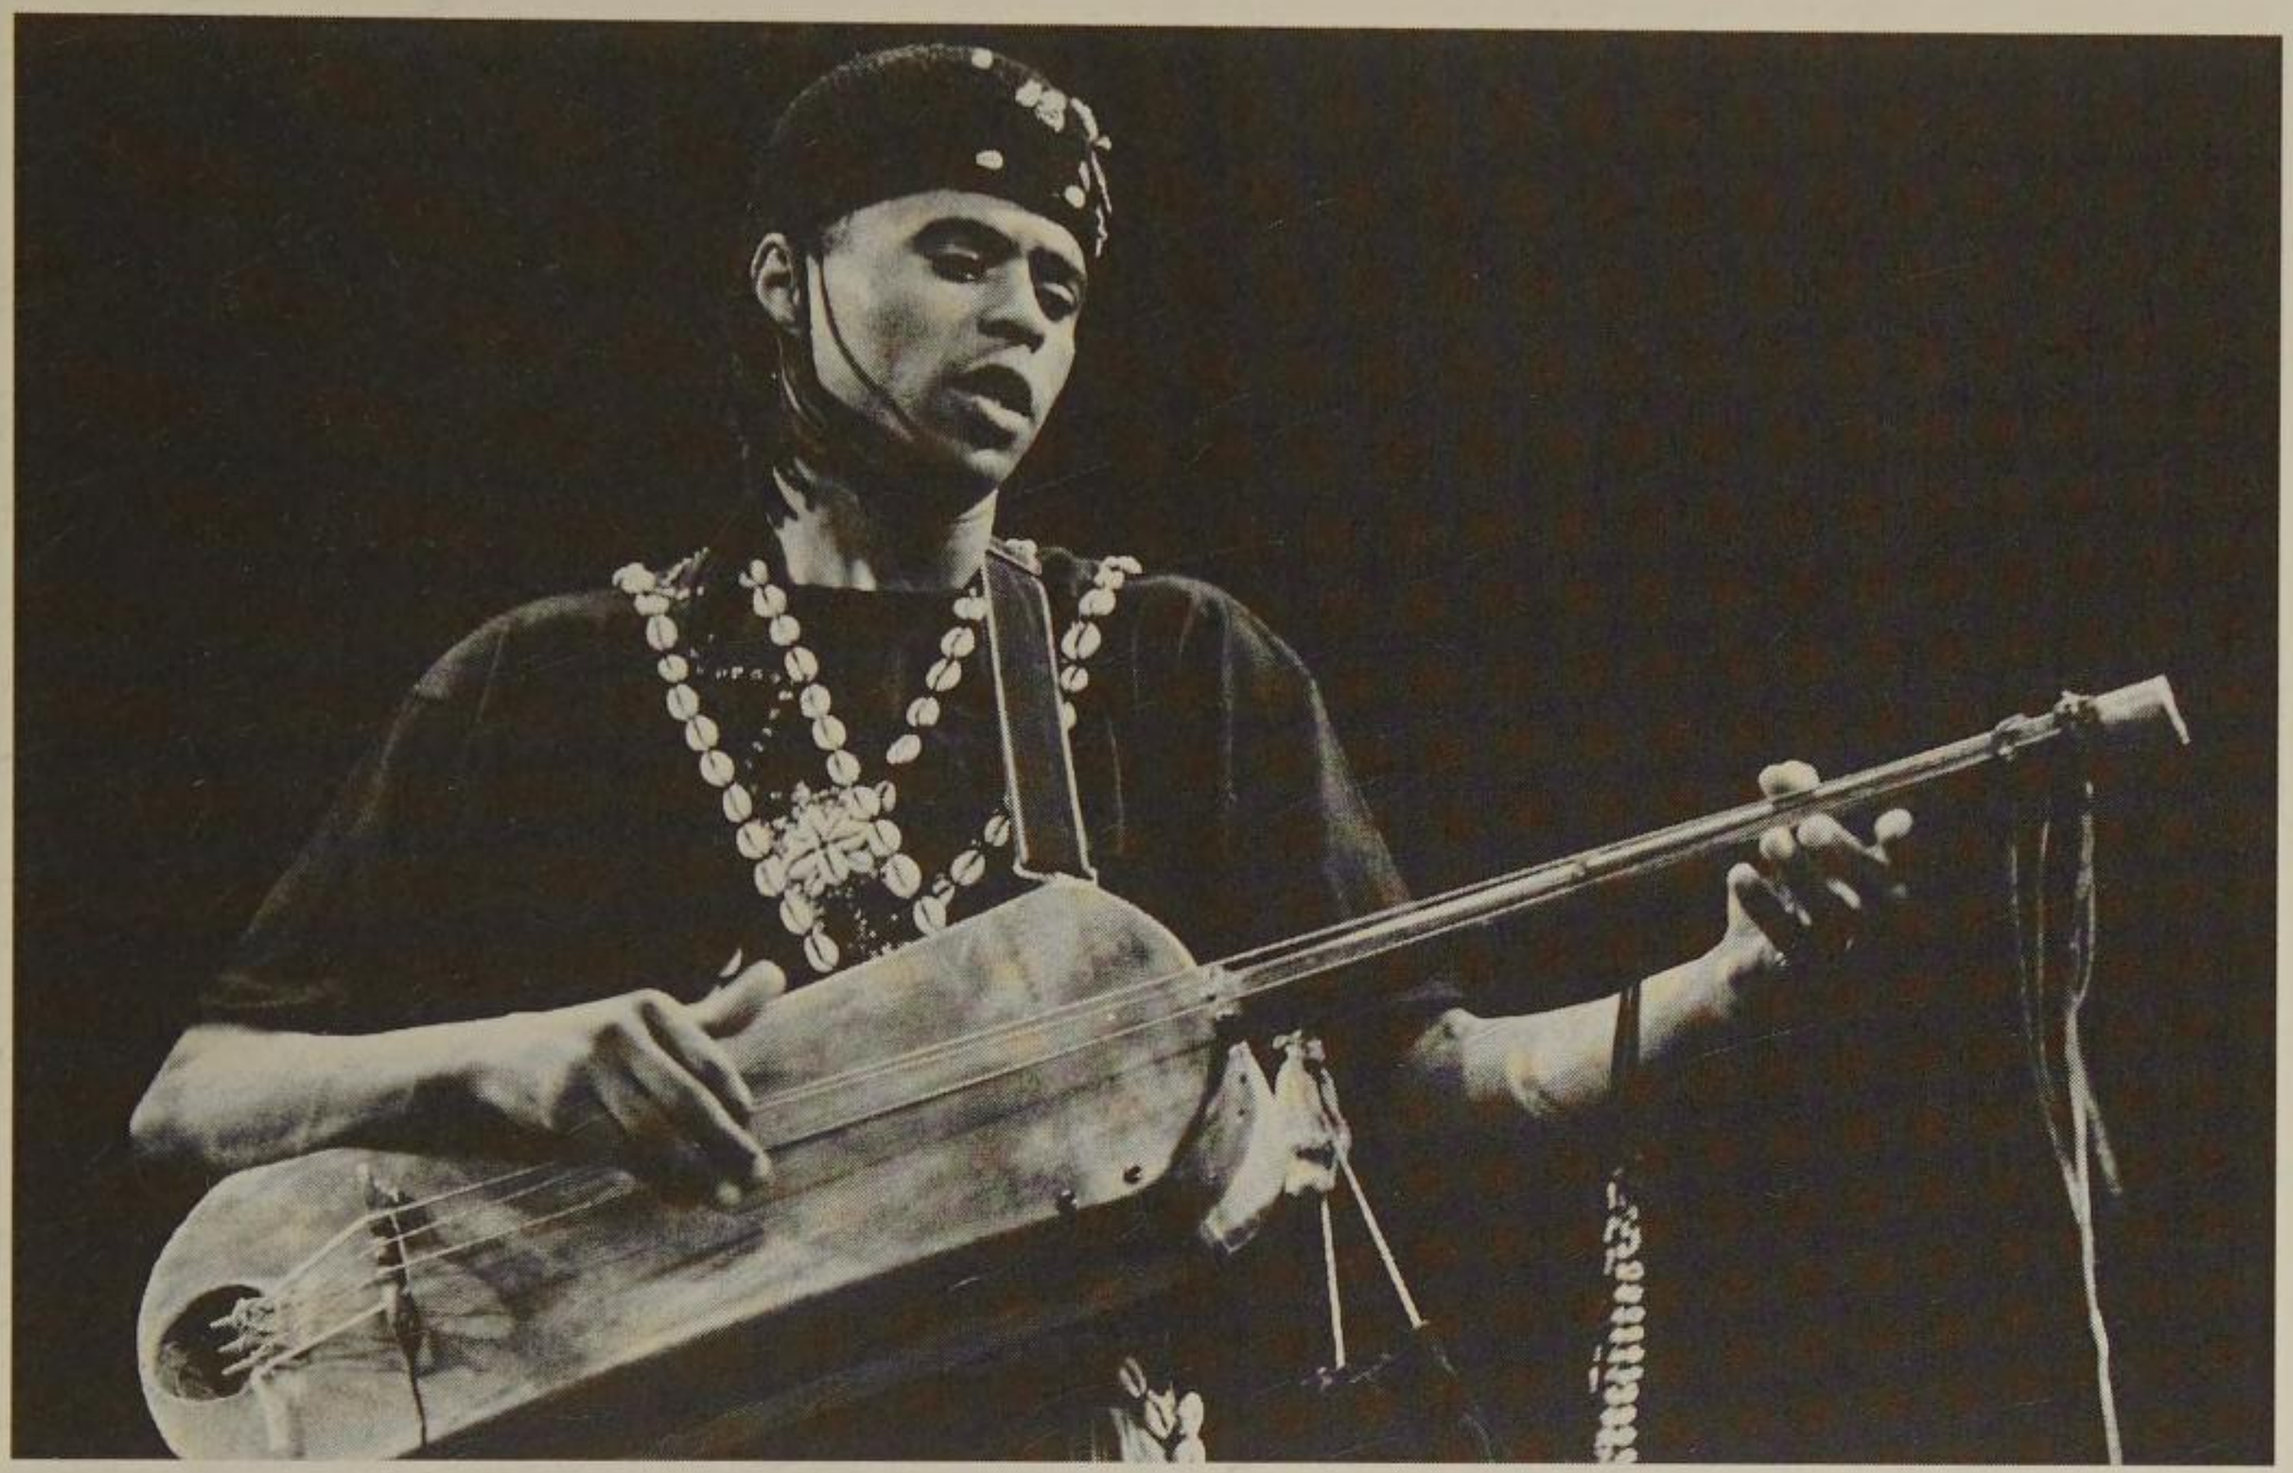
Richard Hagopian

Armenian folk and dance music

Born 1937, in Fowler, CA, USA. Based in Visalia, CA, USA.

The Fresno, California, area is home to one of the most important communities in the Armenian diaspora. It is here that oud (lute) virtuoso Richard Hagopian has spent his life learning the Armenian musical heritage from masters such as Kanuni Garbis Bakirgian and Udi Hrant, collecting traditional music and dances and preserving a style of Armenian/Anatolian-Turkish music that has died out in Armenia and Turkey. Following the murder of two million Armenians in the Turkish Genocide of 1915, hundreds of thousands of Armenians fled to the United States. Although Armenians had played a major role in classical and popular Ottoman music, many Armenians refused to listen to Turkish music from that point onward. But when

Idjah Hadijah



Hassan Hakmoun

Richard Hagopian began studying the oud in 1947, he was attracted to the older music. Originally, each area of the Anatolian plateau had a distinct style, all of them related by maqam (mode) and timing; historians believe the music's roots go back to the 13th-century Armenian church. Hagopian learned much of this repertoire from old vinyl recordings and still-living first-generation performers in the United States. Since the Hagopian family was at home in both the Turkish and Armenian languages, Richard embraced the full canon without prejudice—and regardless of the Turkish connection, Armenians' important contribution to that country's classical music made him unwilling to abandon both parts of his cultural identity. Hagopian has traveled to Armenian communities all over the United States playing this music. At a time when there was almost no interest in the old music and dance among Armenian Americans, Hagopian preserved the traditions. Now many young second- and third-generation Armenians (including his own children) have rediscovered their roots. Musicians and scholars from Turkey, where Ottoman traditions have been replaced by modern and popular Turkish music, have journeyed to California to hear Hagopian play the old repertoire they can only hear on recordings from early in the century. In recognition of such successes at sparing an entire culture's musical legacy from extinction, Hagopian received a National Heritage Fellowship from the National Endowment for the Arts in 1989.

what to buy: Although it is impossible to condense all of Armenian musical history in one volume, Armenian Music through the Ages ♪♪♪♪♪ (Smithsonian Folkways, 1993, prod. Harold Hagopian) contains a sprinkling of wedding, toasting, and love songs; dance music; a taksim (oud improvisation); and instrumentals from the Ottoman repertoire. The music has similarities to Turkish, Arab, Greek, and Persian forms, reflecting what ethnomusicologists refer to as "mixed traditions within a Pan-Islamic style."

what to buy next: Gypsy Fire ♪♪♪♪♪ (Traditional Crossroads, 1995, prod. Harold Hagopian) is a re-creation of the Eighth Avenue Middle Eastern club scene in New York in the 1950s. For the better part of that decade, Middle Eastern–themed nightclubs, with belly dancers and live bands playing a blend of Greek, Turkish, Israeli, Arab, and Armenian standards, were very popular in places like New York and Las Vegas. Hagopian is joined by a virtuoso band that includes Omar Faruk Tekbilek on the oboe-like zurna and ney (flute), and Yuri Yunakov on the saz (another form of lute) in a recreation of that repertoire.

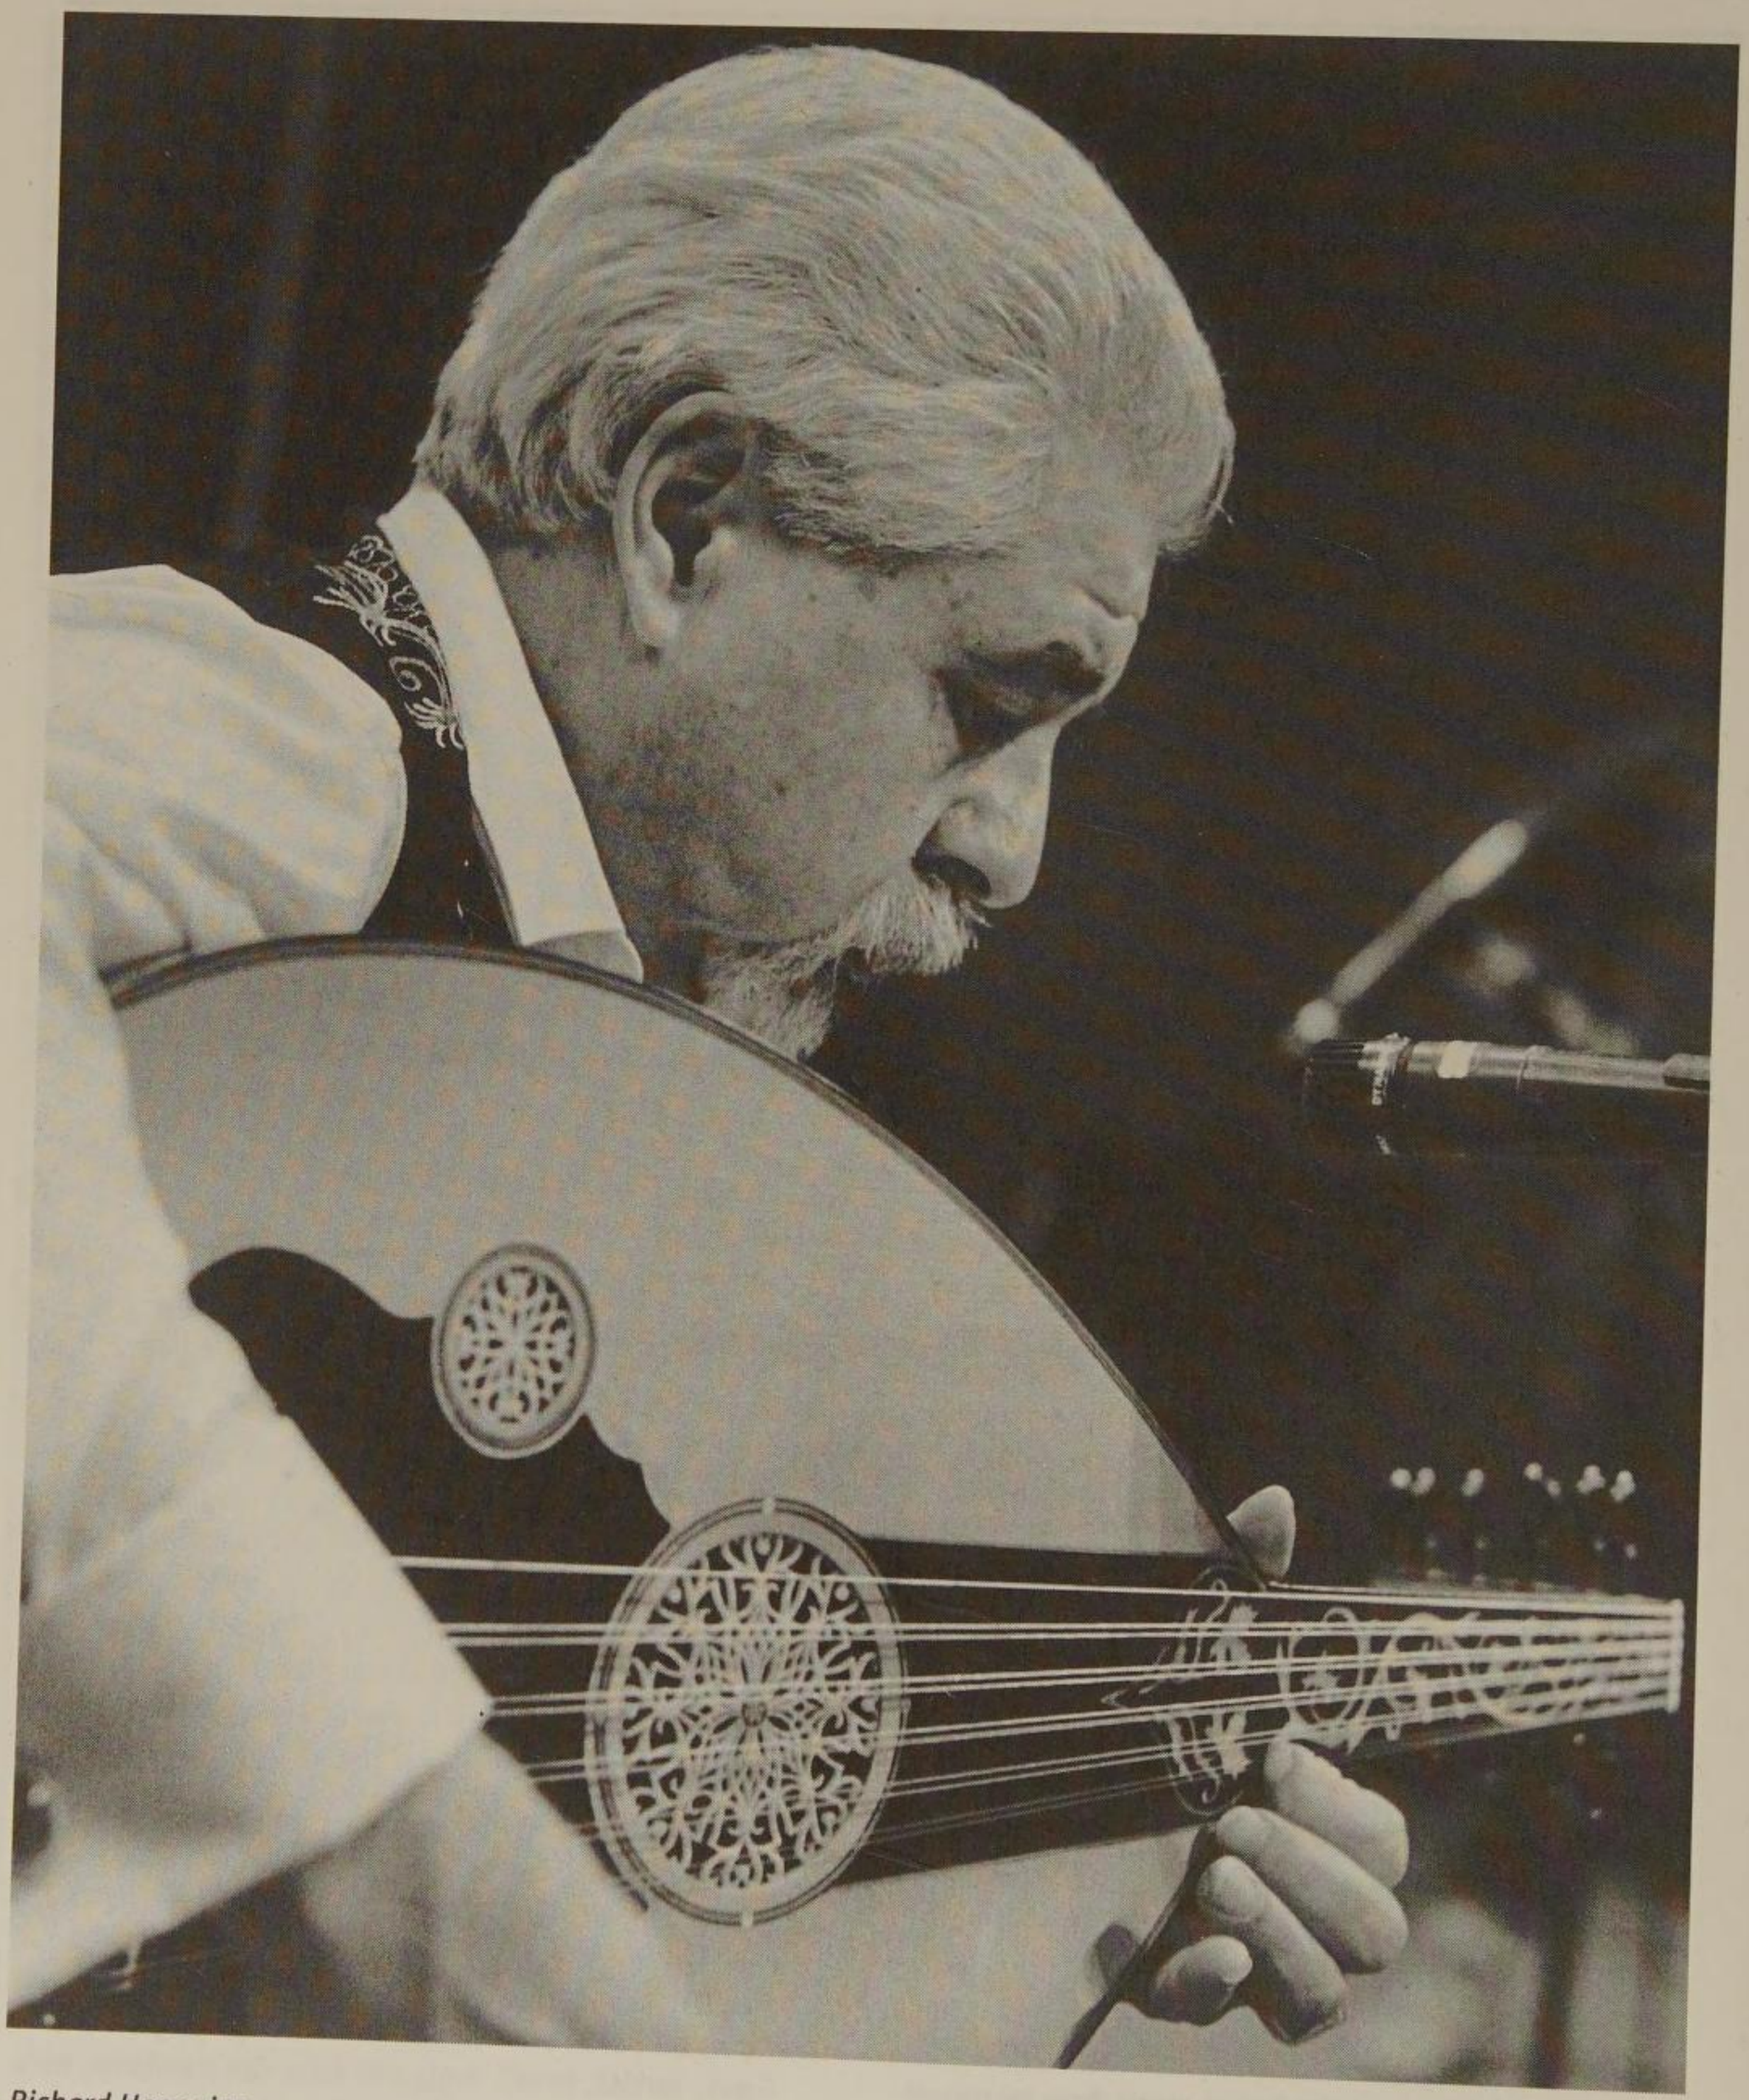
3 1 2 richard hagopian



Richard Hagopian

worth searching for: Kef Time ♪♪♪♪ (SaHa, 1968/Traditional Crossroads, 1994) is a collection of Armenian dance tunes from the repertoire of The Kef Time Band, the group Hagopian played with for five years in Las Vegas as part of the Cleopatra Review. Further exploration of these styles will be rewarded by the British import Best of Armenian Folk Music (Arc Music, 1992).

influences:

◀◀ Kanuni Garbis Bakirgian, Udi Hrant

▶▶ Harold Hagopian

see also: Udi Hrant, Omar Faruk Tekbilek

Aaron Howard

Hassan Hakmoun

Traditional Gnawa, worldbeat

Born 1963 in Marrakech, Morocco. Based in New York, NY, USA.

Although found in cities throughout North Africa, the Gnawa are a traditional people, probably originally from sub-Saharan Black Africa, known for their talents as entertainers and healers. Hakmoun began singing, dancing, and learning his people's healing traditions at the age of seven. While still a child he was accompanying master musicians to Spain and France and throughout Morocco. He was performing in his own group at 14, and made his American debut in 1987 as part of the Trio Gna, a folkloric ensemble. As in the rest of the world, rock 'n' roll swept over Morocco in the 1960s and ignited the youth with ideas of political freedom and social justice. Two rock bands that mixed traditional Islamic music with Western instruments and attitude became popular: Nass El Ghiwan and Jiljilala. Both were created by Gwana musicians who were friends and relations of Hakmoun, so it was natural for him to start his own band—Zahar—and try blending Arabic, Berber, Gnawa, funk, and rock into his own style. In 1986 he moved the band to New York, where he still resides.

what to buy: The Fire Within ♪♪♪♪½ (Music of the World, 1995, prod. Robert Browning, Bob Haddad) is a recording of traditional Gwana nugsha music, played during the dedication of ceremonial robes to induce a trance-like state that will please all participants, human and invisible. Hakmoun plays the sintir, a three-string bass/guitar that has a pleasing low-end sound. His vocals are impassioned, and have a deep, bluesy feel that effortlessly combines Arabic and Black African styles.

what to buy next: Hassan Hakmoun and Zakar ♪♪♪½ (Real-world, 1993, prod. Simon Emmerson) is a skillful worldbeat outing, but Hakmoun's Gwana impulses are mostly submerged under the Western influences.

the rest:

Gift of the Gwana ♪♪♪♪ (Flying Fish, 1987)

Life around the World ♪♪♪♪ (Alula, 1998)

influences:

◀◀ Master Musicians of Jajouka, Don Cherry, Nass El Ghiwan, Jiljilala

see also: Adam Rudolph

j. poet

Robbie Hannan

Irish traditional

Born in Holywood, County Down, Ireland. Based in County Down, Ireland.

Only in his 30s, Robbie Hannan has quickly become one of Ireland's finest exponents of the traditional bellows-blown uilleann pipes. His distinctive style of playing owes much to his deep love for the traditional music of Donegal, an area in the northwest of Ireland well known for its fiddling, which draws equally upon Scottish and Irish style and repertoire. While Donegal's fiddle tradition remains vibrant, its piping tradition had been on a downswing since the early 1900s. Hannan's innovation in adapting the Donegal fiddle style to the uilleann pipes has elevated both him and his chosen instrument to a more deserved prominence. Hannan continues to perform throughout Ireland, and is curator of musicology at the Ulster Folk and Transport Museum, where he has dedicated his life to his craft.

what to buy: The collaboration with Donegal fiddler Paddy Glackin The Whirlwind ♪♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1995, prod. Paddy Glackin, Robbie Hannan), originally released in Ireland under the title Séideán Sí, is one of the most brilliant recordings in either artist's oeuvre, or indeed in either instrument's canon. A stellar performance of solo and duo virtuosity, with an electrifying, unaccompanied immediacy. Traditional Irish Music Played on the Uilleann Pipes ♪♪♪♪½ (Claddagh, 1990) is Hannan's wonderful solo recording. It features such great lively tunes as the "Salamanca/Jenny's Welcome to Charlie" set, but also showcases his beautifully evocative playing of slow airs like "Dark Lochnagar."

what to buy next: The Drones & the Chanters, Vol. 2 ♪♪♪♪ (Claddagh, 1995) is a magnificent collection of uilleann piping from seven of the most talented Irish pipers you will find anywhere. Hannan's performances are spirited and, coupled with great sets by Ronan Browne, Gay McKeon, Joseph McLaughlin, Micheal O Briain, Liam O'Flynn, and Sean Potts, make this recording well worth seeking.

worth searching for: The Piper's Rock ♪♪♪♪ (Mulligan Records) is a sprightly collection of uilleann piping that features Hannan as well as Riverdance piper Davy Spillane, Eoin Ó Riabhaigh, Mícheál Ó Briain, Gay McKeon, Máire Ní Ghráda, and James O'Brien-Moran. While a little harder to locate than some of the other recordings of Hannan, true diehard fans of his work, and of piping and Irish music in general, will want to seek it out.

influences:

◀◀ John Doherty, Liam O'Flynn, Seumas Ennis, Willie Clancy, Tommy Reck

see also: Paddy Glackin, Liam O'Flynn

Cliff McGann

Joy Harjo & Poetic Justice

Spoken-word Native American Latin jazz-reggae

Formed 1990, in Albuquerque, NM, USA. Based in Albuquerque, NM, USA.

Joy Harjo (born May 9, 1951, in Tulsa, OK, USA), poetry, alto sax, soprano sax; John L. Williams, bass, guitar, keyboards, strings, congas, bongos, woodblock, sequencing/synthesizer; Susan M. Williams, drums, percussion; William Bluehouse Johnson, guitar, drums, percussion; Frank Poocha, drums, percussion, keyboards, tribal singing; Richard Carbajal, guitar, effects; Shkeme, vocals (1998); Charlie Baca, guitar (1998). (All members are from USA.)

A standout in both the long tradition of poets-turned-performers (Leonard Cohen, Patti Smith, John Trudell) and the burgeoning genre of "spoken word" (Henry Rollins, Maggie Estep, Me'Shell Ndegéocello), Joy Harjo has also achieved one of the most seamless syntheses of disparate world-music sounds with her band Poetic Justice. Harjo was already perhaps the hardest-working woman in American letters (and Native American advocacy) when she took up the saxophone and began her collaborations with the future members of Poetic Justice. It was a leap for which her previous progression from a painting and theater education to a writing career had well prepared her, and which would serve as a model and metaphor for the culture-bridging the band was after in its music. Finding connections between sometimes far-flung dialects in the worldwide musical language of rhythm and resistance, the band's sophisticated but dynamic style successfully melds Native American ceremonial songs and beats, reggae rhythm, occasional Latin melodic and percussive inflections, and Harjo's supple jazz sax. Though Poetic Justice's 1996 debut album Letter from the End of the Twentieth Century remains its only one, a followup is being recorded at this writing, and the band's tours are perpetually booked two years in advance (between Harjo's much-in-demand poetry readings and educational work, and other members' day jobs as teachers, tribal officials, and high-powered Native-rights lawyers). Meanwhile, an increasing number of compilation appearances both reflects and fuels the demand for this exceptional and far-from-over band.

what's available: Letter from the End of the Twentieth Century ♪♪♪♪♪ (Red Horses/Silverwave, 1996, prod. Joy Harjo, Susan M. Williams, John L. Williams) is that rare album that is at once endlessly experimental and instantly catchy. Harjo's lyrics possess a fascinating insight into the construction of myth—both the sustaining cultural and misleading political varieties—and her delivery is the music's perfect rhythmic foil, at times declaiming with an arresting but quiet drama, at times downright New Wave in its swooping, dissociative intonation. Highlights (on an album of them) include the incantatory, empowering "Fear Poem"; the languid, Latinized "The Real Revolution Is Love"; the title track's poignant, politicized ghost story; and the moving Native-jazz hybrid, "The Myth of Blackbirds."

worth searching for: The one Poetic Justice compilation track not yet available elsewhere ("The Musician Who Became a Bear: A Tribute to Pepper") can be found on Smithsonian Folkways' Heartbeat 2: More Voices of First Nations Women, the second in a comprehensive and engrossing series reviewed in this book's Compilations section. The band is featured in the film documentary Rockin' Warriors, which is unfortunately not known to have a video distributor at this time. Keep track of Harjo's prolific literary and academic undertakings (and the band's next whereabouts in person and on disc) at the Joy Harjo & Poetic Justice Web site, http://www.hanksville.org/PJ/.

influences:

◀◀ Jim Pepper, John Coltrane, Bob Marley, John Trudell

Adam McGovern

Larry Harlow

Salsa

Born Lawrence Ira Kahn, March 20, 1939, in USA. Based in Brooklyn, NY, USA.

Larry Harlow is recognized as one of the leading figures in the popular Latin music field of salsa. Though born in the USA, he moved to Cuba in the mid-1950s to study the forms that inspired his adopted genre. Working primarily as a keyboardist, Harlow also plays the oboe, flute, English horn, bass, vibraphone, and percussion, and is noted for helping to create the internationally known group Fania All Stars, of which he was a member and producer for 15 years. He also composed the first salsa opera, Hommy. In 1994 he collaborated with another giant in the field, percussionist Ray Bar-retto, to form the Latin Legends Band, who recorded an album of the same name.

what to buy: Hommy: A Latin Opera ♪♪♪♪♪ (Fania, 1972, prod. Larry Harlow) is a fine example of Harlow's ambitious stretching of salsa into other music realms while not straying too far from the Latin base. Live in Quad ♪♪♪♪ (Fania, 1974, prod. Larry Harlow) shows that for all the studio proficiency associated with the genre, nothing beats the sound of salsa musicians interacting in a live setting. La Raza Latina: A Salsa Suite ♪♪♪♪♪ (Fania, 1977, prod. Larry Harlow) was nominated for a Grammy, and is another prime example of Harlow bringing salsa music into other compositional formats. All three of these albums were released on the Fania label, a legendary salsa standard-bearer where Harlow has done much of his best work.

what to buy next: Harlow's second recording period for Fania lasted two years and two albums: Our Latin Feeling ♪♪♪ (Fania, 1981, prod. Larry Harlow) and Yo Soy Latino ♪♪♪ (Fania, 1982, prod. Larry Harlow), each of which tries to revive the Fania spirit of the 1960s and '70s while catching the modern verve, all with good success.

best of the rest:
Heavy Smokin' ♪♪♪♪ (Fania, 1966)
Bajandote ♪♪♪♪ (Fania, 1966)
El Exigente ♪♪♪♪ (Fania, 1967)
Harlow Presents Miranda ♪♪♪♪ (Fania, 1968)
Me and My Monkey ♪♪♪♪ (Fania, 1969)
Electric Harlow ♪♪♪♪ (Fania, 1969)
Abram Paso ♪♪♪♪ (Fania, 1970)
Arsenio ♪♪♪♪ (Fania, 1971)
Harlow's Harem ♪♪♪♪ (Fania, 1972)
La Oportunidad ♪♪♪♪ (Fania, 1972)
Salsa ♪♪♪♪ (Fania, 1973)
El Judío Maravilloso ♪♪♪♪ (Fania, 1975)
Con Mi Viejo Amigo ♪♪♪♪ (Fania, 1976)
Best of Harlow and Miranda ♪♪♪♪ (Fania, 1976)
New York Latin All Stars ♪♪♪ (Nippon Phonogram, 1976)
Belmonte ♪♪♪ (Nippon Phonogram, 1976)
El Jardinero del Amor ♪♪♪♪ (Fania, 1977)
Latin Fever ♪♪♪♪ (Fania, 1977)
El Alvino Divino ♪♪♪♪ (Fania, 1978)
Rumbambola ♪♪♪♪ (Fania, 1978)
La Responsabilidad ♪♪♪♪ (Fania, 1979)
The Sweet Smell of Success ♪♪♪♪ (Fania, 1979)
Asi Soy Latino ♪♪♪ (Coco, 1980)
Senor Salsa ♪♪♪ (Tropical Buddah, 1985)
Flamingo Rouge ♪♪♪ (Razmataz, 1987)
Salsa Brothers ♪♪♪ (Songo, 1989)
My Time Is Now ♪♪♪ (Cache, 1991)
Los Tres ♪♪♪ (Caiman, 1997)

influences:
◀◀ The Afro-Cuban tradition

see also: Ray Barretto, Yomo Toro

Steven Stancell

George Harrison

Rock

Born February 25, 1943, in Liverpool, England. Based in England.

George Harrison has had an illustrious career; in addition to playing lead guitar, singing, and writing songs as the youngest member of the Beatles, Harrison has been on the cutting edge of world music. The first musician to play sitar on a pop record—"Norwegian Wood"—Harrison, who studied the complex Indian stringed instrument under Ravi Shankar, later played it on his own Beatles compositions, including "Within You Without You" and "Love You To." At Shankar's urging, Harrison produced and performed at two benefit all-star concerts for famine relief in Bangladesh at New York's Madison Square Garden in 1971. The second show was later released as a million-selling triple album and documentary film. Harrison's self-penned single "Bangladesh" became a Top-20 pop hit. A devotee of the Hari Krishna movement, Harrison was responsible for the Beatles' 1967 trip to India to study under the Maharishi Mahesh Yogi, and although the other Beatles became disenchanted, Harrison has remained spiritually connected to Eastern thought.

what to buy: Harrison's greatest moment may have come with the Concert for Bangladesh. In addition to performing songs from the three-disc post-Beatles masterwork All Things Must Pass and a memorable version of "Something," Harrison made major contributions to sets by Bob Dylan and Billy Preston. Harrison's Indian-music mentor Ravi Shankar was along for the occasion. The resulting document, Concert for Bangladesh ♪♪♪♪ (Apple, 1972, prod. Phil Spector, George Harrison), another three-album set, captures the historic evening. "Norwegian Wood" from the Beatles' Rubber Soul ♪♪♪♪½ (Parlophone, 1965), is inescapable, but the harder Harrison went into Indian music, the less well-known the results become. That doesn't mean they're not worthy of discovery; the epic "Within You Without You" from Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band ♪♪♪♪♪ (Parlophone, 1967, prod. George Martin) and especially the driving "Love You To" from Revolver ♪♪♪♪½ (Parlophone, 1966, prod. George Martin) are prime examples of a Westerner who blazed trails into world music earlier than most—and approached it with a deference that would be emulated by few.

influences:
◀◀ Carl Perkins, Chuck Berry, Ravi Shankar
▶▶ Eric Clapton, Ashwan Batish

see also: Ali Akbar Khan, Ravi Shankar

Craig Harris and Adam McGovern

Mickey Hart

Rock, world fusion

Born September 11, 1943, in Long Island, NY, USA. Based in Marin County, CA, USA.

Grateful Dead percussionist/drummer Mickey Hart has had a major influence on world music over the past decade. After more than 20 years of visiting, recording, and studying with percussionists and ethnic musicians in nearly every corner of the globe, he began sharing what he'd learned. Since signing a distribution deal with Rykodisc in 1983, Hart has released a series of albums recorded during his ethnomusicological trips abroad, and another, Drums of Passion: The Invocation, that he produced for world-renowned Nigerian master drummer Babatunde Olatunji. Hart has simultaneously served as a music director at Smithsonian/Folkways and has been instrumental in the release of many new folk and ethnic recordings. His own albums have ranged from the pre-natal sound study Music to Be Born By, to multicultural collaborations like the Diga Rhythm Band's eponymous album and Planet Drum, recorded with a band he assembled from some of the world's best percussionists.

Hart was the son of a drummer, but was raised by his mother on New York's Long Island. By the time he was reunited with his father on the West Coast in the mid-1960s, Hart was already on his way to becoming a master percussionist, soon acquiring a solid reputation as a drum instructor and innovative player. When one of his students, Bill Kreutzmann, became a founding member of the Grateful Dead, Hart began to frequent the band's shows, often jamming with them onstage. He "officially" joined the band in 1967, and on his debut solo album Rolling Thunder Jerry Garcia and Kreutzmann made guest appearances, along with Indian percussionist Allha Rakha and members of the Jefferson Airplane and Quicksilver Messenger Service. In 1975 Hart joined the Diga Rhythm Band, which featured such world-music luminaries as Zakir Hussain and Vince Delgado, and which released one legendary album the following year. Hart has written two books; while Drumming at the Edge of Magic is an insightful autobiography, Planet Drum is a scholarly study on the history and use of percussion around the world.

what to buy: Hart's collaboration with some of the world's greatest drummers including Babatunde Olatunji and Sikiri Adepoju of Nigeria, Airto Moreira of Brazil, Zakir Hussain of India, and Giovanni Hidalgo of Puerto Rico, Planet Drum ♪♪♪♪ (Rykodisc, 1996, prod. Mickey Hart) is an essential summit meeting of percussive virtuosity. Hart resurrected the concept for the double CD Supralingua ♪♪♪♪ (Rykodisc, 1998, prod. Mickey Hart), featuring a percussion ensemble composed of Adepoju, Hidalgo, Hussain, Bakithi Kumalo, and David Garibaldi, and numerous vocalists including the Gyuto Monks Tantric Choir, Rebeca Mauleon, and Bobi Cespedes.

best of the rest:

Rolling Thunder ♪♪♪ (Grateful Dead, 1976)
(With Diga Rhythm Band) Diga ♪♪♪ (Round, 1976/Rykodisc, 1988)
Rhythm Devils: The Apocalypse Now Sessions ♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1983)
(With Airto Moreira and Flora Purim) Däfos ♪♪♪ (Reference, 1985/Rykodisc, 1988)
(With Taro Hart) Music to Be Born By ♪♪♪½ (Rykodisc, 1990)
At the Edge ♪♪♪½ (Rykodisc, 1991)
Mickey Hart's Mystery Box ♪♪♪♪½ (Rykodisc, 1996)

influences:

◀◀ Buddy Rich, Airto Moreira, Babatunde Olatunji

▶▶ Billy Cobham, Ginger Baker

see also: Diga Rhythm Band, Gyuto Monks, Zakir Hussain, Ali Akbar Khan, Airto Moreira, Babatunde Olatunji, Flora Purim, T.H. "Vikku" Vinayakram

Craig Harris

Hawk Project

Jazz, Native American

Formed 1994 in Woodstock, NY, USA. Based in Shandaken, NY, USA.

Dennis Yerry, flute, trumpet, piano, Native percussion; Ken Littlehawk, flute, percussion, vocals; Gus Mancini, bass clarinet, sax, synthesizer; Steve Rust, bass; Ken Lovelett, trap drums, percussion. (All members are from USA.)

"Mixing traditional Native music with contemporary jazz can be difficult at times," says Hawk Project's leader and spokesman Dennis Yerry. "But this band creates music as an evolving group improvisation, with traditional rhythms in mind." The idea for the band came to Yerry, a Haudenosaunee (Iroquois), while he was working with filmmaker Ken Burns on the music for the PBS documentary The West. Yerry was musical director for a theater piece called Black Elk Speaks and took the drummers from that show, as well as Ken Littlehawk, to record the music for The West. Burns also asked Yerry and company to do incidental music for his Lewis and Clark documentary. After those projects they decided to make the collaboration an ongoing project, and recorded Let Us Put Our Minds Together. They're also the house band for Woodstock Roundtable, a radio show that also uses their music for its opening and closing themes. The band is working on its second album.

what's available: On Let Us Put Our Minds Together ♪♪♪ (Hawk, 1997, prod. Dennis Yerry, Gus Mancini), the music ranges from traditional jazz like "May You Walk in Balance," a lovely ballad played by Yerry on acoustic piano, to "Creator of Hearts," a stormy free-jazz excursion that incorporates a traditional Lakota encouragement song sung in both Lakota and English. Most of the music was recorded "live," although some traditional vocal parts were later overdubbed.

influences:

- Jim Pepper, Black Elk, Don Cherry, R. Carlos Nakai, Thelonious Monk, Wilma Mankiller, Paul Robeson

j. poet

Ofra Haza

Ethnic, world-disco, Yemenite dance music

Born late 1960s, in Halika, Israel. Based in Israel.

The ancient musical traditions of the Jewish Yemenite community in Israel are updated by Ofra Haza. With her songs sung in Hebrew, Arabic, and English and set to danceable Euro-tech arrangements, Haza has brought the sounds of her homeland to the contemporary pop charts. Haza, who grew up in Tel Aviv, first attracted attention as a teenager in the early 1980s. Her international debut, Fifty Gates of Wisdom: Yemenite Songs, became the first Israeli album to sell a million copies in Europe and included Haza's hit "Galbi," which was later sampled by rap stars Eric B. and Rakim on their single "Paid in Full," and by M/A/R/R/S on "Pump Up the Volume." Haza has also sung on a lengthy list of albums by American and European artists including Paula Abdul and Thomas Dolby.

what to buy: The pop-minded production of Don Was inspired Haza to her greatest performance on Kirya ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1992, prod. Don Was). A successful blend of Yemenite traditions and modern dance rhythms, the album includes the percussive tune "Take 7/8," co-written with American multi-instrumentalist David Amram, and a unique rendition of the traditional American folksong "Do Not Forsake Me." Guest appearances range from saxophonist David McMurray and percussionist Itzha Levy to Iggy Pop and Lou Reed.

what to buy next: Desert Wind ♪♪♪½ (Sire, 1989, prod. Bezalel Aloni), though it included more songs sung in English, thematically continued to reflect Haza's Yemenite heritage.

the rest:

Fifty Gates of Wisdom: Yemenite Songs ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1988/Cleopatra, 1998)

Shaday ♪♪♪½ (Sire, 1988)

influences:

- Yemenite music, European techno-disco
- Paula Abdul, Natacha Atlas, Yosefa, modern ethno-techno

Craig Harris

scandinavian folk and beyond

The Scandinavian countries are currently experiencing a folk boom that is also revitalizing their pop and world-music scenes. Sweden's folk revival mirrors that of the United States during the 1960s. By the end of the 1950s, the Swedish folk tradition had almost been wiped out by the influence of European pop. Then the counterculture discovered folk music, leading to a rebirth of interest in traditional fiddling. The music got another jolt when Groupa began recording in the 1980s. They played traditionally, but promoted themselves like a pop band. Many of today's folkies started with Groupa, including Hallbus Totte Mattsson, founder of Hedningarna, whose electric approach brought folk music to the rock audience.

Finland's folk boom began in the 1970s with Konsta Jylha, a traditional fiddler from Kaustinen. In the mid-'70s, Piirpauke, arguably the world's first global fusion band, blended Finnish roots music with Arabic, Eastern European, Latin American, and African influences. Värttinä, the band that led the "Finnish Invasion" of the 1980s, came to their international fame almost by accident. The group's second album, Oi Dai, was one of the best-selling in the history of Finland—because the songs dealt with bawdy sex. Värttinä's success created worldwide interest in Finnish music; albums by Kaustinen fiddling group JPP, accordion ace Maria Kalaniemi, and mystical acoustic-rockers Gjallarhorn have all done well on the international market.

Norway's population is small, and the lack of nationwide commercial exploitation has allowed many unique regional styles to flourish. Traditional fiddler Annbjørg Lien uses Arabic and African beats in her compositions; Ym:Stammen play a dark, brooding kind of folk-rock that's perfectly suited to long winters and broken hearts; and Chateau Neuf Spelemannslag, billed as "Norway's biggest folk band," have a sprightly sound that should appeal to anyone who likes Värttinä.

j. poet

Hedningarna

Industrial Swedish-Finnish folk

Formed 1990s, in Sweden. Based in Sweden.

Core members: Anders Stake, hardingfele, electric violin, keyed harp, Swedish bagpipe, buckhorn, hurdy-gurdy, baseharp, stringharp, flutes, jew's harp, slide guitar, synthesizer; Björn Tollin, frame drums, keyed harp, stringdrum, percussion, programming, sampling; Hallbus Totte Mattson, teord, lute, electric violin, mashallute, hurdy-gurdy. (All members are from Sweden.)

It's as if someone, through the magic of time travel, found a place where the ideas of rave culture could happily co-exist with the creakiness of medieval music. That's really about the only way to describe Hedningarna (though for additional help, the name translates as "the heathens"). Whatever they've been putting in the water in Sweden has had an effect on its bands, who seem to be able to effortlessly mix past and future into some magical, mystical present. The core of Stake, Tollin, and Mattson got together in the early part of the '90s to mix up folk music, and that's what they succeeded in doing—so well that it's hard to tell the traditional material from their own compositions. After an eponymous debut album, they brought in two Finnish female vocalists, Sanna Kurki-Suonio and Tellu Paulasto, whose voices seemed to work in perfect harmony with the music. Then they took it all a step further with lots of sampling and programming on the follow-up Kaski!, a sort of 808 State meets early Fairport Convention in Macbeth's castle. One thing missing (but not missed) was the electric guitar, since guitar had never had much place in Swedish culture. Instead it was the fiddle, the keyed harp, and the hurdy-gurdy that lent instrumental textures. A third album, Tra, built on the second, with the quintet becoming a bit more electric though never losing its acoustic base. The year 1997 found Suonio and Paulasto back in Finland and Hedningarna recording as a trio again on Hippjokk, taking it all back to acoustic basics without ever losing the edge that electricity had given them. Joiker Wimme (an unearthly chant vocalist from the Northern Scandinavian Saami tradition) guested on the record. By 1998, vocalist Anita Lehtola had replaced Paulasto in yet another configuration of the band for its latest album.

what to buy: Tra ♪♪♪♪½ (NorthSide, 1997, prod. Dag Lundquist, Hedningarna) initiates you into the magic. As rustic as a wagon-wheel stuck in mud, but still as modern as lasers in a dance club, there was nothing wasted; every note means something, and usually a lot. Hippjokk ♪♪♪♪ (NorthSide, 1997, prod. Dag Lundquist, Hedningarna) is just the core trio, and while it misses the female singers, it burns as steadily as a candle in the winter night, never failing to find a groove.

what to avoid: The Heathens—Fire ♪♪½ (Sony, 1996) can hardly be terrible, as a compilation of Hedningarna's early work, but it does them little justice; stylistically mixed-up, with precious little information.

the rest:
Kaski! ♪♪♪½ (NorthSide, 1998)
Karelia Visa N/A (NorthSide, 1999)

worth searching for: Hedningarna ♪♪♪½ (Silence, 1990) is the first outing, newly hatched and curious.

influences:
Traditional Swedish and Finnish folk music

see also: Nordan Project, Wimme

Chris Nickson

Joe Higgs

Reggae

Born 1940, in Kingston, Jamaica. Based in Jamaica.

Joe Higgs was one of the greatest influences on the development of reggae. Despite releasing only six solo albums, Higgs was a direct inspiration on Bob Marley & the Wailers, Jimmy Cliff, and Toots & the Maytals as a vocal coach, arranger, and guitar instructor. Replacing Bunny Wailer in the Wailers in 1973, Higgs also toured throughout the United States and Europe in 1975 as opening act, band director, and percussionist for Jimmy Cliff, who later recorded a song that Higgs wrote during the tour, "Sons of Garvey."

Higgs inherited his love of singing from his mother, who sang in a church choir. In the late 1950s and early 1960s, Higgs performed in a duo with Delroy Wilson. In 1959 they scored a major hit, "Oh, Manny, Oh," produced by future Jamaican prime minister Edward Seaga. After Wilson emigrated to the United States Higgs continued to perform on his own, his first solo hit, "There's a Reward," being produced by the legendary Coxsone Dodd at his storied Studio One. Years later, Higgs brought the Wailers to Dodd's attention, and got him to produce the group's early singles.

A high school music teacher, Higgs devoted most of his attention to that profession, and to coaching young reggae singers. The music sessions that he hosted nightly in the yard of his Trenchtown home served as a training ground for such future artists as Bob Marley. In 1972 Higgs placed first in a song competition sponsored by the Jamaican Tourist Board with his original tune, "Invitation to Jamaica." One of the prizes—a trip to New York—resulted in his becoming one of the first reggae artists to perform in the United States. After the 1973 and '75 tours with Marley & the Wailers and Cliff, Higgs resumed his solo career. His debut album, Life of Contradiction, was released in 1976, and in 1980 he had a hit in Jamaica with his song "Talk to That Man," recorded for Bunny Wailer's Solomonic label. Higgs worked with influential reggae guitarist Earl "Chinna" Smith in 1983, by which time he had established a stature in the field that rivaled his famed protégés and collaborators.

what to buy: After releasing two memorable albums in Jamaica, Higgs showed American listeners what they had missed with his first United States release, Triumph! ♪♪♪♪ (Alligator, 1985, prod. Joe Higgs, Earl "Chinna" Smith). Higgs displays his soulful vocal approach and heartfelt lyricism, accompanied by stellar Jamaican musicians including bassist Family Man Barrett, guitarists Junior Murvin and "Chinna" Smith, keyboardist Augustus Pablo, saxophonist Dean Fraser, and harmony singers Janice Pendarvis and Sonia Higgs. The peak of the album comes with a remake of his tune "Sound of the City." Originally recorded as a duet with Jimmy Cliff, the song is redone with Higgs overdubbing all the vocals himself.

what to buy next: His second American release, Family ♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1988, prod. Edgy Lee, Lee Jaffe), is a further demonstration of Higgs's vocal mastery. Although the line-up of backing musicians is not as awe-inspiring as on Triumph!, the album sparkles with Rastafarian vision.

the rest:
Life of Contradiction ♪♪♪½ (Grounation, 1976)
Unity Is Power ♪♪♪½ (Elevation/Island, 1979)
Blackman Know Yourself ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1990)
Roots Combination ♪♪♪ (Macola, 1995)

influences:
- Count Ossie & His Mystic Revelers of Rastafari, King Tubby, the Skatalites
- Bob Marley & the Wailers, Jimmy Cliff, Toots & the Maytals

see also: Jimmy Cliff, Barrington Levy, Bob Marley, Junior Murvin, Augustus Pablo, Toots & the Maytals, Wailing Souls, Bunny Wailer

Craig Harris

Tish Hinojosa

Singer/songwriter, contemporary folk, Mexican-American Born December 6, 1955, in San Antonio, TX, USA. Based in Austin, TX, USA.

Tish Hinojosa is a woman of the frontera, the border region of the southwestern United States and northern Mexico. The daughter of immigrants, she began her journey in music listening to the radio of both countries in her mother's kitchen as a child in San Antonio, Texas. She started her performing career singing folk music along San Antonio's Riverwalk, but soon decided she needed a change to develop her music, and moved to northern New Mexico. While absorbing the different cultures of that area, she encountered people who exposed her to the country rock of musicians Chris Hillman and Rodney Crowell, as well as the heartfelt mountain music of singers like Hazel Dickens. As she played in dance bands and for tourists, Hinojosa began to put these elements together in songs of her own. "My whole career up until that time had been doing other people's music," she recalls. "I realized that I had this whole bag of experiences I'd dragged around with me, going back to that Mexican kitchen radio, that I'd never heard addressed in song." An award-winning songwriter soon after, Hinojosa toured nationally on the college and folk club circuit. After several years of that life she made a move to country music center Nashville, Tennessee, where she got a job as an in-house demo singer for several companies. But it wasn't long before she found that her style of songwriting didn't fit the needs of Music City. "They liked my voice, but when I played my songs for them they'd look at me like I was from Mars!" she says. "And I'd hear the kind of things they were tossing back and forth. . . . It's an art, I guess, but I thought, 'This is too easy. This is not a challenging kind of songwriting.' Pretty soon we knew it was time to leave."

With her husband and young family, she moved back to New Mexico. Sorting through her Nashville experience, Hinojosa realized that after 10 years as a performer she still didn't have a recording to call her own, so she set out to make one. Taos to Tennessee was her calling card both to audiences and record executives. After a move to Austin, Texas, Hinojosa was approached by two major record labels, one that wanted to market her as a singer and ignore her writing, and another that wanted her for a new singer/songwriter series. She made the difficult choice to take the less lucrative deal with the greater creative control. Though Hinojosa's contract was bought out in a corporate restructuring and only produced one album, Homeland, that recording did bring her to another level of national exposure, prompting media comparisons to Nanci Griffith, Emmylou Harris, and Joan Baez. Her next album, Culture Swing, though delayed by the need to find a new record label, won a number of awards in the folk music genre. Several well-received records on independent labels followed, giving Hinojosa the chance to produce her own work, and to record two roots-oriented projects she'd long wanted to explore: a bilingual children's album and an all-Spanish disc of traditional and original music of the border. Though these projects were satisfying to the artist, and she continued an active touring career, her determination was still to reach a wider mainstream audience with her unique perspective in song. That led her back to Nashville to sign with Warner Progressive, a division of the label that also handles such genre-crossing musicians as Take 6 and Beth Nielsen Chapman. There she has so far released two discs: Destiny's Gate, which displays the many sides of her musical talent from poetic bilingual love songs to themes of social justice to up-tempo country shuffles; and a more introspective collection, Dreaming from the Labyrinth/Soñar del Laberinto, which explores the search for life's meaning.

what to buy: Tish Hinojosa is a multifaceted artist, an iconoclast like Bob Dylan and Emmylou Harris, unafraid to take risks with her music and to venture into new areas with each recording. "The light and dark colors of the border, the whole panorama of where I'm from, that's what I want to show in my music," she says. Dreaming from the Labyrinth/Soñar del Laberinto ♪♪♪♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1996, prod. Tish Hinojosa, Jim Ed Norman, Craig Barker) is a thought-provoking collection of songs exploring loss, love, and spiritual growth framed in the southwestern landscape images of Hinojosa's imagination. All the songs but one are bilingual, yet the words reference each other, rather than being translations. Both lyrically and musically it's a major creative achievement expressed in a group of very accessible and listenable songs—which seem to have missed everybody's radio playlist. There is an all-Spanish version as well, Soñar del Laberinto ♪♪♪♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1997, prod. Tish Hinojosa, Jim Ed Norman, Craig Barker). Though the songs are basically the same, it's intriguing to follow the progression of ideas laid out all in one language. A good introduction to Hinojosa's range of expression is Destiny's Gate ♪♪♪♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1993, prod. Tish Hinojosa, Jim Ed Norman), comprising English, Spanish, and bilingual love songs, country dance shuffles, and songs in the activist tradition. The title tune (which is reprised in an unlisted Spanish version at the end of the disc) is an example of Hinojosa's ability to write an economical and fresh love song, no matter what the style.

what to buy next: Frontejas ♪♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1995, prod. Tish Hinojosa) is a lively album containing original and traditional songs of the border, all in Spanish (except one guest appearance by Asleep at the Wheel's Ray Benson), which could find a home on the playlist of any progressive Tejano station. Culture Swing ♪♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1992, prod. Tish Hinojosa) delivers what the title promises, a trip through and between cultures, marked by a river journey ("By the Rio Grande"), a love song from a traveler ("Louisiana Road Song"), and a tribute to the last of the Spanish cowboys ("Chanate El Vaquero"). Cado Niño/Every Child ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1996, prod. Tish Hinojosa, Craig Barker) is a bilingual children's album with lyrics and stories in both languages for sharing with the next generation.

the rest:
Taos to Tennessee ♪♪♪♪ (Watermelon, 1987)
Memorabilia Navideña ♪♪♪ (Watermelon, 1991)
Aquella Noche ♪♪♪♪½ (Watermelon, 1991)
Best of the Sandia: Watermelon, 1991–1992 ♪♪♪♪ (Watermelon, 1997)

worth searching for: Hinojosa scored and narrates the television documentary Rio Grande: La Frontera, which shows up occasionally on U.S. public television stations, particularly in the southwest. She's seen performing several songs from Frontejas and one unrecorded song. She also done music and narration for a National Park Service film used at the San Antonio missions. She has appeared as guest vocalist on albums by many of her Austin/San Antonio/New Mexico musical friends, including Ray Wylie Hubbard, and Bill and Bonnie Hearne.

influences:
Linda Ronstadt, Joan Baez, Guy Clark

Kerry Dexter

Fred Ho

Afro-Asian jazz fusion

Born in USA. Based in New York, NY, USA.

Wind player and composer Fred Ho is one of the leading figures in the Asian-American jazz movement, along with pianist Jon Jang, violinist Jason Hwang, and bassist Mark Izu. As leader of the multi-ethnic Asian-American Art Ensemble/Afro-Asian Music Ensemble, Ho has made it his mission to unite the disparate legacies of jazz-based improvisation and East Asian traditional music, achieving mixed results. His compositions and arrangements owe a clear debt to Duke Ellington, and they work best when not attempting to force a marriage of Asian- and African-American musics. The inclusion of traditional Chinese instruments like the erhu (two-stringed fiddle) and the oboe-like suona is sometimes inspired, sometimes mere exotica, and frequently deflects attention from his considerable gifts as a jazzman. Ho is also highly politicized, favoring compositions that address issues of Asian-American identity. Unfortunately, his agitprop grows wearisome upon repeated listenings, and he should let his music speak for itself—for there is much to appreciate in his intelligent ensemble writing and tasty work on saxophones and flute.

what to buy: Tomorrow Is Now ♪♪♪½ (Soul Note, 1985) contains precision ensemble work and pithy soloing framed by Ho's finely crafted, wide-ranging charts.

what to avoid: As the title presages, on We Refuse to Be Used and Abused ♪½ (Soul Note, 1987, prod. Giovanni Bonandrini) Ho's preachy diatribe on identity politics smothers what is otherwise commendable music.

the rest:
Bamboo That Snaps Back ♪♪♪ (Finnadar, 1985)
The Underground Railroad to My Heart ♪♪♪ (Soul Note, 1993)
Fred Ho and the Monkey Orchestra: Monkey: Part One ♪♪ (Koch Jazz, 1996)
Fred Ho and the Monkey Orchestra: Monkey: Part Two ♪♪ (Koch Jazz, 1997)
Turn Pain into Power ♪♪½ (OO Discs, 1997)
Yes Means Yes No Means No (Koch Jazz, 1998)

influences:

- Duke Ellington, Charles Mingus, Charlie Haden's Liberation Music Orchestra
- Jon Jang, Jason Hwang, Francis Wong, Mark Izu

Dennis Rea

Hoelderlin Express /Hölderlin Express

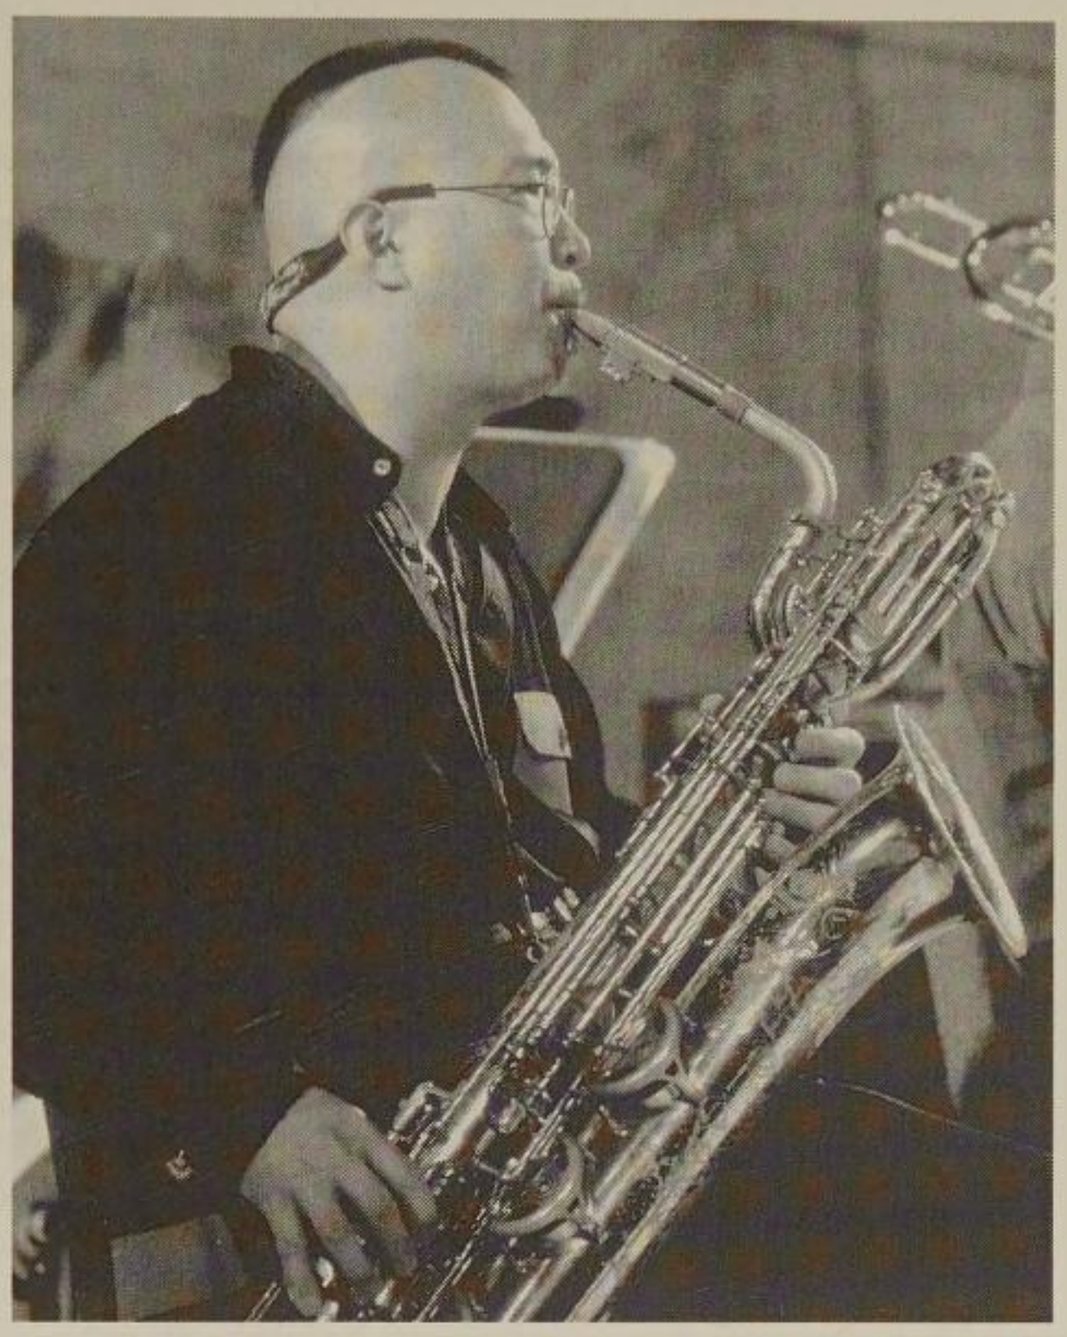
"Electric Body Folk"

Formed 1992, in Tuebingen, Germany. Based in Tuebingen, Germany.

Elke Rogge, hurdy-gurdy; Joergen W. Lang, guitar, low whistle; Johannes Mayr, accordion (1992–94); Olav Krauss, six-string electric violin (1992–97); Ralf Gottschald, percussion (1994–present); Guray Atalay (Austro-Turkish), bass (1998–present). (All members are from Germany unless otherwise noted.)

Hoelderlin Express blends German roots and other folk traditions with jazz and rock. The group has been through a series of personnel changes that affected its always-evolving sound, but the core of Elke Rogge and Joergen Lang has remained intact. Hoelderlin's first rush to fame came when it won the German Folk Newcomers Prize at the 1993 Tanz & Folkfest Rudolstdat. Since then, it has toured all over Europe and released two full-length CDs, Hölderlin Express (1994) and Electric Flies (1996).

what's available: Despite the band's folkloric bent, Hölderlin Express ♪♪♪♪♪ (akku disk, 1994, prod. Heinrich von Kalnein) consists entirely of original compositions written by band members. Many are mini-suites, containing passages with varying rhythms, textures, and melodies. Each player in this first incarnation of Hoelderlin Express was an able lead instrumentalist, and all got their chance to shine. For instance, the hurdy-gurdy and fiddle trade hot riffs over a pulsing jazzy rhythm, and there's some snarling electric guitar mixed in as well. Johannes Mayr cuts loose with hot accordion licks on his original composition "Für Moritz." When it came time to record Hoelderlin Express's second CD Electric Flies ♪♪♪♪♪ (akku disc, 1996, prod. Heinrich von Kalnein), the membership had changed. Mayr had left (first to join the one-off band the Rolling Drones and then to try his hand in a new duo) and was replaced by percussionist Ralf Gottschald (who'd served as a session guest on the first recording). So the textures morphed and the overall sound became more aggressively rhythmic. Also, Elke Rogge's hurdy-gurdy came more to the fore; Hoelderlin Express is now a band in which the buzzing instrument isn't just used to color the arrangements, but actually plays lead melodies! Another departure from the debut album is a Middle Eastern flavor that pops up on several tracks. This is really brought out by Gottschald's dynamic playing. Lang gets to show off his acoustic guitar talents on his composition "A Winter's Day," a quieter number whose arrangement recalls the pioneering folk/jazz blend of England's Pentangle.



Fred Ho

influences:

- Pentangle, Blowzabella, Pyewackett, Lo Jai
- Radio Tarifa, Shooglenifty, Tayfa

Ken Roseman

Home Service

English folk-rock

Formed 1981, in London, England. Disbanded early 1990s.

John Tams, vocals, guitar; Bill Caddick, vocals, dobro, guitar (1981–85); Jonathan Davie, bass guitar, chorus vocals; Howard Evans, trumpets, flugelhorn; Steve King, keyboards, accordion; Graeme Taylor, guitars, vocals; Roger Williams, trombone; Andy Findon, flutes, clarinets, tenor and soprano saxophones (1984–86). (All members are from England.)

Home Service, the most quintessentially English of all the major folk-rock bands, arose from one of genre pioneer Ashley Hutchings's Albion Band line-ups that had been providing music for stage productions at London's National Theatre. Ironically, Home Service wound up spending most of its all-too-

home service

brief career there as well. Home Service's first recording, a single featuring "Doing the Inglish" b/w "Bramsley," was released on August 7, 1981. No more recordings appeared until 1984, when The Home Service, the group's first full-length album, was released by Jigsaw. There had been occasional concert and festival appearances, and then, also in 1984, Home Service provided the music for The Mysteries, three contemporary adaptations of medieval plays based on the life of Jesus Christ. Band members also acted in the production, which was performed at the National Theatre and then moved to the Lyceum for a 12-week run the following year; an album featuring musical highlights from it was released at that time. Bill Caddick left Home Service in July 1985, and Alright Jack, the last of Home Service's trilogy of studio recordings, was issued in 1986. By then, the band had basically called it a day, though a slightly different line-up—Bill Caddick, Jonathan Davie, Alan Dunn (accordion, keyboards), Howard Evans, Andy Findon, Sebastian Guard (drums, percussion), Pete Murray (keyboards), Ralph Salmins (drums, percussion), Graeme Taylor, and Roger Williams—played a few live dates in 1992. Wild Life, released in 1995, features recordings of that incarnation, culled from gigs at the Half Moon in Putney, London; the Sidmouth Festival; and the Purcell Room (again at the National Theatre).

what to buy: Early Transmissions ♪♪♪♪½ (Jigsaw, 1984/Road Goes on Forever, 1996, prod. Robin Black, Home Service) contains some of John Tams and Bill Caddick's finest original songs. Tams specialized in hymn-like anthems such as "Don't Let Them Grind You Down," while Caddick compositions such as "She Moves among Men" (a trenchant description of a waitress's lot) and "Never Gonna Be a Cowboy Now" (an eloquent lament about dashed dreams) were more reflective. Also included is a distinctive arrangement of the traditional ballad "Peat Bog Soldiers," given added majesty by the Home Service brass section. As a bonus, this reissue of Home Service's first album (originally released eponymously) collects the two songs issued as a debut single in 1981: "Doing the Inglish," a jaunty reggae/skiffle tune listing all sorts of things associated with England; and the semi-medieval dance instrumental "Bramsley," with modern brass instruments playing the sort of melody line crumhorns and shawms would have done hundreds of years ago. The basic Home Service band was augmented by several guests including Linda Thompson (vocals), Phil Langham (fiddle, accordion, vocals), Eve Matheson (backing vocals), and Phil Pickett (recorders, shawm, rauschpfeife) to record the "soundtrack" album for The Mysteries ♪♪♪♪♪ (CODA, 1985/Fledg'ling, 1997, prod. David Roach, John Tams). It's unlikely that the show (at least with this cast) will ever be performed live again, so think of this recording as a magnificent souvenir. There's a stunning version of the traditional "Wondrous Love," arranged by Graeme Taylor and featuring choir-like vocals backed by the full electric band—an absolutely mesmerizing blend! You'll also a hear a powerful rendition of Richard Thompson's "We Sing Allelujah" and a fine Bill Caddick original, "Cain and Abel: Don't Be an Outlaw." For Linda Thompson fans, her a cappella styling of "All in the Morning" is a special treat. Last in the trilogy of Home Service studio recordings is Alright Jack ♪♪♪♪♪ (Making Waves/Hobson's Choice, 1986/Fledg'ling, 1997, prod. Home Service). A mini-suite of Home Service arrangements of traditional ballads set by Percy Grainger is this album's centerpiece. The instrumental passages really show what the brass section could do, and the inventive arrangements even sound like what George Gershwin might have done had he ever heard some English folk ballads. John Tams contributes two more of his stirring modern broadsides—the title song and "Scarecrow"—and his interpretation of "Rose of Allendale" is lovely. As a coda to Home Service's career (and a hint of what might have been), Wild Life ♪♪♪♪ (Fledg'ling, 1995) contains live recordings culled from performances by a short-lived '90s incarnation of the band. As might be expected Wild Life contains a few brassy march-like numbers, and there are live versions of such Home Service standards as "She Moves among Men," "Never Gonna Be a Cowboy Now," and "Scarecrow." But there are also songs not available on any other Home Service album, which is why completists will want this. Bill Caddick's "Lili Marlene Walks Away" has a Brecht-Weill mood, and "Rainbow Waistcoat" mixes a little rough bluesiness with the regal brass. The lads even try some honky-tonk on "One More Whiskey," a bit of a departure from the very English nature of most of Home Service's repertoire. To sum up, Home Service left us with only four full albums, but two were masterpieces and the others not far behind. The band was virtually unique in integrating brass into a solidly folk/traditional context, rivaled in this only by fellow Brits Brass Monkey—who were completely acoustic. And when John Tams sings one of his anthems, it's as if he personifies the spirit of England.

worth searching for: After he left Home Service, Tams concentrated on his acting career, appearing in films and television programs. Over the Hills & Far Away—The Music of Sharpe ♪♪♪♪ (Virgin, 1996, prod. John Tams, John McCusker, Dominic Muldowney), a soundtrack album for the Sharpe's Rifles television series (in which he also appeared as an actor), contains his latest studio recordings.

solo outings:

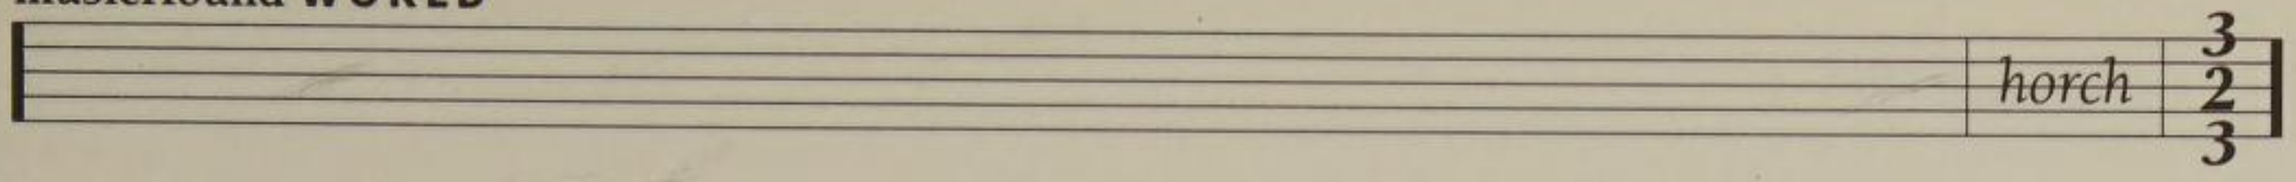
Bill Caddick:

Winter with Flowers (Fledg'ling)

The Wild West Show ♪♪♪♪½ (Topic, 1986)

influences:

The Copper Family, Steeleye Span, church hymns, silver bands, Percy Grainger, Ashley Hutchings/Albion Band, Susato, Ralph Vaughan Williams



influences:

John Kirkpatrick Band, Brass Monkey, Jennifer Cutting/The New St. George (U.S.), La Bottine Souriante

see also: Ashley Hutchings/Albion Band, Richard Thompson

Ken Roseman

Sol Hoopii

Hawaiian jazz, blues, swing

Born 1902 in Honolulu, HI (now USA); died 1953.

Although mostly unknown by non-musicians, Hoopii is one of the most influential guitarists of the 20th century. His combination of Hawaiian music and jazz created a new, almost one-man genre, and he wrote the book of licks on which most dobro (Hawaiian guitar) and pedal steel players still rely. His experiments with open tunings influenced a generation of pickers, and a variation on his C# minor tuning is still used by today's session players in Nashville. Hoopii was born in Honolulu, the youngest of 21 children. He played guitar from his early teens, and at 17 stowed away on a liner bound for San Francisco. Legend has it that he was discovered by the crew, but when he whipped out his guitar and played for the other passengers, they were so enchanted they paid his way to the mainland. Hoopii settled in Los Angeles and formed a trio—guitar, ukelele, and Hoopii on dobro—that performed jazz and blues tunes featuring Hoopii's hot improvisations, and sounded like a stripped-down Hawaiian version of the Quintet of the Hot Club of France. Hoopii began recording in 1925 and helped kick off a Hawaiian music craze that led to his appearance in motion pictures both as a musician and actor, including Bing Crosby's Waikiki Wedding and parts in the Charlie Chan series. He was a much in-demand musical director, session player, and band leader until 1938, when he became a born-again Christian. For the next 10 years he traveled the Gospel circuit preaching and playing religious music, some of which he recorded for various small labels. He returned to secular music briefly for a 1948 tour of Hawaii, but continued preaching until his death in 1953.

what's available: Hoopii is at his best in the 1926 to 1930 sessions collected for Master of the Hawaiian Guitar ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1977, prod Robert F. Gear). For years, early players "borrowed" these solos note for note, but Hoopii's sides remain as original as on the day they were cut. The tracks on Sol Hoopii, Volume 2 ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1987) from Hoopii's middle and late years are as cool, crisp, and inventive as his early work.

influences:

Leon McAulliffe (Texas Playboys), Jimmy Helms (Hank Williams Band)

j. poet

Horch

Medieval/Baroque folk-rock fusion

Formed 1981, in Halle, Germany. Based in Halle, Germany.

Andreas Fabian, flute, recorders, shawm, crumhorn, vocals; Klaus Adolphi, vocals, guitars, mandolin, mandolin-cello, recorders, percussion, crumhorn; Stefan Wieczorek, basses, guitars, mandolin, recorders, bombardon, crumhorn, vocals; Rainer Christoph Dietrich, violin, viola, violin cello, synthesizer, vocals; Ralph Schneider, drums, percussion, vocals. (All members are from Germany.)

Reminiscent of the English band Gryphon and French band Malicorne, Horch plays a fusion of medieval, folk, and rock styles. Often, band members compose new music for centuries-old texts they've discovered. Founded in 1981, Horch went professional in 1984 and has released six full-length albums, beginning with The Luteplayer in 1987. Horch has played at concert halls, nightclubs, and major festivals, including Fairport Convention's annual bash in Cropredy, Oxfordshire, England (1994), and Germany's Tanz & Folkfest Rudolstdat (1991 and 1997). Horch's latest CD, Schock Schwere Not, was released in late 1998.

what to buy: Schock Schwere Not ♪♪♪♪½ (Noise Art, 1998, prod. Adolphi, Ole, Horch) is the most forceful of Horch's recordings. Both the vocals and rhythm section are tougher and more aggressive than on earlier albums. "Das Testament," for example, uses a "heavy rock" beat and lead vocalist Klaus Adolphi adopts a gruff tone. The buzzing noises provided by crumhorns and other ancient instruments add to the distinctive sound. In fact, the crumhorn is played as a lead instrument on Andreas Fabian's composition "Jungfernsprung" and the bloody thing rocks as hard as any electric guitar! Like Steeleye Span, the Horch men are aces at singing full, precise harmonies over chugging electric "folk 'n' roll" instrumentals—check out "Die Dicke Margot" for proof. Schock Schwere Not closes with a surprising adaptation of Edgar Allan Poe's "The Raven." The band presents a grandiose version that starts off softly but, just a verse in, transforms Poe's lament into something verging on arena rock. I can hear the multitudes shouting along to the "Nevermore" chorus now. Those who'd prefer softer sounds might want to begin with Barbaren ♪♪♪♪½ (Noise Art, 1996, prod. Adolphi, Ole, Horch), in which flutes and recorders play a more prominent role and the rhythms are less rocky. There's also the completely acoustic Brantteweyn nebst Mägdeleyn ♪♪♪♪ (Noise Art, 1995), which has a more folksy, sing-along flavor.

the rest:

The Luteplayer (1987)
Maria durch ein Dornwald ging (Amiga, 1988/ BMG, 1992)
Mittelalternativ (1991)

solo outings:

Klaus Adolphi:

Adolphi & Amigos ♪♪♪♪ (Metrix, 1993)

3/2/4 horslips

influences:

◀◀ Steeleye Span, Gryphon, Malicorne, Jethro Tull

▶▶ Adaro, U.L.M.A.N.

Ken Roseman

Horslips

Celtic rock

Formed 1970, in Dublin, Ireland. Disbanded 1980.

Barry Devlin, vocal, bass; Charles O'Connor (England), vocal, concertina, fiddle, mandolin, guitar; Jim Lockhart, vocal, keyboards, flute, whistle, pipes; Eamon Carr, drums, bodhrán, percussion, vocal; Gus Guest, guitar (1970–71); Declan Sinnott, guitar (1971–72); Johnny Fean, guitar, banjo, vocal (1972–80). (All members are from Ireland unless otherwise noted.)

Horslips were the first Celtic-rock band to come out of Ireland, forging a unique brand of melodic modern music infused with traditional tunes. They also broke the mold by insisting on succeeding in Ireland first, on their own record label (Oats), rather than trying to get signed to a London major like their Irish rock contemporaries. Their place in the history books was guaranteed by their first two albums, Happy to Meet, Sorry to Part (1972) and The Táin (1973), which earned them considerable acclaim at home and across the Irish Sea in Britain. These utilized rocked-up Irish tunes—several learned from Chieftains albums—with traditional words in both English and Irish on Happy to Meet, and their own songs (based on a historical saga) on The Táin.

After two other less overtly traditional albums came Drive the Cold Winter Away (1975), an acoustic Christmas project, and The Book of Invasions—A Celtic Symphony (1976), another concept album based on ancient Irish history. For the remainder of their career the band opted for a decidedly rock-sounding approach, with Lockhart's flute unmistakably echoing Jethro Tull's Ian Anderson, and sole English member O'Connor largely forsaking his trademark mandolin, fiddle, and concertina for electric rhythm guitar. They toured North America to promote their last few albums, which explored themes of emigration and alienation, before calling it a day with a final fling at Whitla Hall in Belfast in 1980 (immortalized on The Belfast Gigs).

Horslips' music is all distinguished by tasteful, fluid guitar lines, inventive keyboards, a snappy rhythm section, sure-footed post-Beatles harmonies, and a great sense of humor. Their innovative use of Irish tunes—both plugged-in traditionals and brand-new rock songs about Irish history and legend—was way ahead of their time. The best of their work stands up surprisingly well after all these years; indeed much of what today's Celtic-rock bands are doing, Horslips did 20 years earlier. The secret of their success may have been that they never took themselves too seriously: after a night of rocked-up Irish historical epics they were known to emerge for the encore dressed like a cross between the Dubliners (identical long bushy beards) and the Clancy Brothers (white Aran sweaters) and tear into "Johnny B. Goode."

what to buy: The double-CD retrospective Horslips Collection ♪♪♪♪½ (Outlet, 1985, prod. various) provides two-and-a-half hours of album highlights and key non-LP singles. Belfast label Outlet is getting good distribution in North America now.

what to buy next: Happy to Meet, Sorry to Part ♪♪♪♪ (Oats, 1972/Outlet, 1995, prod. Alan O'Duffy, Horslips) was recorded at their own expense on the Rolling Stones' mobile studio, and showcases a clever mix of acoustic traditional music, dazzling electrified attacks on the same, and a style of original rock song that fits comfortably alongside the rest. The Táin ♪♪♪♪ (Oats, 1973/Outlet, 1989, prod. Alan O'Duffy, Horslips) is a rock setting of an ancient Irish legend, and works perfectly well as a tight progressive-rock album even if the listener is unaware of the tunes' traditional sources (which are acknowledged in the original sleevenotes). Like the Beatles' Sergeant Pepper, the first side is a flawless suite of songs, but the album loses focus on side two. The charming (if tentative-sounding) Drive the Cold Winter Away ♪♪♪ (Oats, 1975/Outlet, 1995) was an all-acoustic affair (their only such effort), and can claim to be one of the very earliest Celtic Christmas albums. It is notable for the incorporation of some English and Manx material. On The Book of Invasions—A Celtic Symphony ♪♪♪½ (Horslips, 1976/Outlet, 1995, prod. Alan O'Duffy, Horslips), the band tried to repeat the success of The Táin: a suite of rock songs (again based on Irish tunes) telling an ancient historical saga. It works quite well, and was their last clearly tradition-based album. Tracks from the Vaults ♪♪♪ (Horslips, 1977/Outlet, 1995, prod. various) rounds up early singles and other oddities, the best of which are also on Horslips Collection.

the rest:

Dancehall Sweethearts ♪♪♪ (Oats, 1974/Outlet, 1995)
The Unfortunate Cup of Tea! ♪♪♪ (Oats, 1975/Outlet, 1995)
Horslips Live ♪♪♪ (Horslips, 1976/Outlet, 1995)
Aliens ♪♪♪ (Horslips, 1977/Outlet, 1995)
The Man Who Built America ♪♪♪ (Horslips, 1978/Outlet, 1995)
Short Stories/Tall Tales ♪♪♪ (Horslips, 1979/Outlet, 1995)
The Belfast Gigs ♪♪♪ (Horslips, 1980/Outlet, 1989)

worth searching for: For completists only: Fean, O'Connor, and Carr joined forces (using the moniker "Host") for another concept album, Tryal (Changeling, 1982), based on the true story of a late-19th century "witch burning" in Ireland. Devlin issued Breaking Star Codes (Starcode, 1983), a suite of songs based on the 12 signs of the Zodiac, with the help of old pal Lockhart.

influences:

- The Chieftains, the Dubliners, the Beatles, Fairport Convention, Steeleye Span, Jethro Tull
- Alan Stivell, Moving Hearts, the Corrs, Leahy

see also: Moving Hearts

John C. Falstaff

The House Band

English/Celtic folk-pop fusion

Formed 1984, in England. Based in USA and England.

Ged Foley, vocals, acoustic and electric guitars, mandolin, Northumbrian pipes; Chris Parkinson, melodeons, keyboards, accordion, harmonica, vocals; Iain MacLeod, 10-string mandolin, guitar, vocals (1984–86); Jimmy Young, smallpipes, flute, whistles (1984–86); Brian Brooks, bouzouki, keyboards, whistle, vocals (1986–88); John Skelton, flutes, whistles, bombardes, bodhrán (1986–present); Roger Wilson, fiddle, guitar, viola, vocals (1995–present).

Ged Foley's trademark slow renditions of popular bar songs, Chris Parkinson's rhythmic accordion with a Cajun twist, and John Skelton's Breton (French Celtic) dance tunes on wooden flute—interspersed with shocking in-your-face bombarde (bagpipe) leads—make up the core of this unusual English/Celtic band. They have so much drive and variety in their arrangements it's easy to forget that for many years they were a three-piece. Foley played with both the Battlefield Band and Jez Lowe for several years before starting the House Band. Skelton played in London with an Irish band called Shegui, which also did Breton material. His driving flute-playing, European repertoire, and dry wit were a natural complement to Foley and Parkinson. Foley and Skelton have married Americans and now live in the States; Parkinson comes over to tour and teach with the band at least every other year. On more recent releases the House Band has added Mark Hellenberg on bodhrán and dumbek drums. Continually developing new material, they seem to come out with another CD every couple of years. In the musical chairs of the close-knit Irish-band scene, Foley can now also be found playing on and producing Patrick Street's latest endeavors.

what to buy: Another Setting ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1994, prod. House Band) has the addition of Roger Wilson on fiddle. "Jig-jazz," as the title implies, stretches the concept of "jig" into a lighthearted, contemporary context. In good humor, there are echoes of Jamaica's Jolly Boys on "African Marketplace." The CD would be remiss without Ged singing a mellow Irish bar song. In this case, "Rocky Road to Dublin" takes on an ominous overtone in a sober rendition.

what to buy next: Rockall ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1996) is named after a desolate island north of the Hebrides that is associated with the BBC Shipping Forecast. Much of the music is from the north of England and on maritime topics. The band includes two moving songs about dying industries. There is a brilliant transition from "The Flat Cap," an unusual 3/2 English piece, into "Sgean Dhu," an old Scots 6/8 jig. The album ends with a spirited, contemporary Breton bagad (pipe band) march. Stonetown ♪♪♪♪½ (Harbourtown/Green Linnet, 1991) received the British Retailers Association's award for Best Folk Album of 1992. Groundwork ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1993, prod. House Band, David Kenny) is a partial compilation of the House Band's first two recordings, The House Band ♪♪♪½ (Topic, 1985, prod. House Band, David Kenny) and Pacific ♪♪♪½ (Topic, 1987, prod. House Band, David Kenny); both of the original recordings are out of print.

the rest:

Word of Mouth ♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1989)
October Song ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1998)

worth searching for: John Skelton's recordings with the band Shegui, All Around the World (Green Linnet) and In the Wind (Highway, 1984), are worth seeking out. Chris Parkinson also has some obscure solo recordings he has produced himself.

influences:

- Battlefield Band, Shegui, Blowzabella, Kornog
- Rankin Family, Arcady

see also: Battlefield Band, Patrick Street

Karen Ashbrook

Hoven Droven

Swedish folk-rock

Formed 1989, in Östersund, Sweden. Based in Sweden.

Gustav Hylen, trumpet, flugelhorn, Härjedal-flute, congars (1989–97); Janne Strömstedt, organ (1997–present); Bo Lindberg, guitars; Björn Höglund, drums, percussion; Kjell-Eriok Eriksson, fiddle; Pedro Blom, bass; Jens Comén, saxophones. (All members are from Sweden.)

Hoven Droven is a Swedish folk-rock band with a mission to perform traditional material with a guitar-heavy sound.

what to buy: Groove ♪♪♪♪½ (NorthSide, 1997, prod. various) is an excellent, hard-hitting instrumental compilation of two of the band's best Swedish albums, Hia Hia and Grov. The music is hard folk-rock that veers between the extremes of almost-heavy-metal and pastoral Swedish folk.

influences:

- Groupa, Hedningarna, Urban Turban

j. poet

Ledward Kaapana of Hui Ohana

David Hudson

Australian Aboriginal

Born in North Queensland, Australia. Based in North Queensland, Australia.

A member of the Tjapukai tribe in Kurunda, northern Queensland, David Hudson mastered the didgeridoo (droning blown instrument) and interpretive dances of his people at an early age. Regarded as one of the world's finest "didg" players, Hudson first became known for his command of traditional styles and techniques, but eventually earned acclaim for his groundbreaking experiments in the instrument's creative possibilities—which included fitting one PVC pipe inside another to create a synthetic didg on which he could modulate the pitch, much like a trombone slide. Through his longstanding collaboration with American composer/producer Steve Roach, Hudson is credited with taking the art of the didgeridoo to a whole new level, using innovative techniques and modern compositional structures to move the ancient instrument boldly into the future. Helping to ensure that the original Australians' legacy is as long as their heritage is rich, in the late '80s Hudson co-founded the Tjapukai Dance Company, which has become one of Australia's premiere Aboriginal tourist attractions and recently developed the country's first Aboriginal theme park.

what to buy: If you're unfamiliar with Australian Aboriginal music in general or Hudson in particular, his greatest-hits collection The Art of the Didjeridu: Selected Pieces 1987–1997 ♪♪♪♪♪ (Black Sun, 1997, prod. Steve Roach) is a great place to start. With 11 cuts culled from a variety of solo and collaborative albums, plus two previously unreleased tracks, this fantastic compilation is both a brilliant overview of Hudson's artistic development, and a stunning how-to lesson from one of the world's greatest didg masters.

what to buy next: Gunyal ♪♪♪♪½ (Black Sun, 1998, prod. Steve Roach) is a fascinating concept album of sorts, transporting listeners back to a primordial time when Australia was an untamed land populated by an array of giant marsupials, reptiles, and birds. The vivid imagery of Roach's ambient textures combines organically with percussion, chants, and Hudson's hypnotically droning didg, producing a transcendental sound unlike anything you've ever heard.

the rest:
(With Steve Roach) Dreamtime Return ♪♪♪½ (Fortuna, 1988)
(With Steve Roach) Australia: Sound of the Earth ♪♪♪ (Fortuna, 1990)
Woolunda ♪♪♪♪ (Celestial Harmonies, 1993)
Rainbow Serpent ♪♪♪♪ (Celestial Harmonies, 1994)
(With Michael Askill) Free_Radicals (Black Sun, 1996)

influences:
Yothu Yindi, Gondwanaland, Blek Bela Mujik

see also: Steve Roach, Synergy

Bret Love

Hui Ohana /Ledward Kaapana

Hawaiian traditional and pop

Formed 1970s, in Hawaii, USA. Disbanded c. 1990.

Ledward Kaapana (born 1948, in Hawaii, USA), guitar, vocals; Nedward Kaapana, bass, vocals; Dennis Pavao, vocals, rhythm guitar. (All members are from USA.)

"Hui Ohana" is Hawaiian for "family group," a fitting name for a trio consisting of a set of twins and their cousin. This was one of the most successful of Hawaii's local groups during the 1970s and '80s. They recorded 14 albums before disbanding around 1990, though only a relative handful are still available—and mostly on local labels requiring a diligent search. When Hui Ohana broke up, guitarist Ledward Kaapana joined another group called I Kona, with which he recorded five albums. All three members of Hui Ohana have gone on to make solo albums as well, though Ledward's are the only ones to receive significant national distribution.

what to buy: Though it's atypical of the Hui Ohana sound, Ledward Kaapana's Led Live Solo ♪♪♪½ (Dancing Cat, 1994, prod. George Winston) is certainly one of the easiest albums by any member of this group to find on the mainland. Recorded at an intimate venue, the album features not only Kaapana's wonderful guitar playing, but also his yodeling and informative between-song patter. Kika Kila Meets Kihoalu ♪♪♪♪ (BMG/Windham Hill/Dancing Cat, 1997) is a tasteful traditional duo outing by Ledward and mainland Hawaiian music patron Bob Brozman.

what to buy next: Hui Ohana's sound is marked by Ledward's deft picking—usually on electric guitar—and his cousin Dennis Pavao's ethereal falsetto, and Hui Ohana ♪♪♪ (Paradise, 1987) serves as a fine introduction to the group's Hawaiian-pop style. Perhaps fittingly because of their falsetto trio harmonies, the title for Live—Tahiti Come On Over ♪♪♪ (Paradise, 1989, prod. Tom Moffatt) comes from a Bee Gees tune. The group also arranges "Stars and Stripes Forever" Hawaiian-style, though elsewhere they settle into a more traditional sound on this live date from 1988. Less traditional but still intriguing is Ledward's album of collaborations with country and western musicians, Waltz of the Wind ♪♪♪ (BMG/Windham Hill/Dancing Cat, 1998).

the rest:
Hui Ohana:
Volume I—Best of Hui Ohana ♪♪♪ (Lehua, 1997)
Volume II—Best of Hui Ohana ♪♪♪ (Lehua, 1997)
Hana Hou ♪♪♪ (Lehua, 1998)
Kalapana to Waikiki ♪♪♪ (Lehua, 1998)
Ke Kolu ♪♪♪ (Lehua, 1998)
Live at Sounds Hawai'i ♪♪♪ (Lehua, 1998)
Young Hawai'i Plays ♪♪♪ (Lehua, 1998)

sean-nós singing

Sean-nós, or "old-style," singing refers to a specifically Irish tradition, generally of songs performed solo, without accompaniment, and in a rhythmically free and melodically decorated style. Not surprisingly, sean-nós singing has survived mainly in those areas of Ireland, known as Gaeltacht, where Irish Gaelic is still spoken, the principal centers being Donegal, Connemara (County Galway), and the southwest (Kerry and Cork). Although the singing of each region exhibits subtle stylistic differences, particularly in the manner of ornamentation, one main characteristic remains: sean-nós singing is about telling a story, often one that has special significance for the singer's audience, as it may relate actual events that have affected persons present or their relatives. Therefore, the melodic material is typically altered, through the introduction of ornaments or the use of elongated notes, to express the story as it unfolds verse after verse and as each singer sees fit to "tell" it—the songs may be venerable and are certainly familiar; it is the way of singing in which the sean-nós practitioner is encouraged, differentiated, and prized. Sean-nós has an instrumental parallel in slow airs, melodies borrowed from the sean-nós repertoire and performed on folk instruments like the uilleann pipes, the fiddle, or the flute, in a style consistent with the vocal tradition.

Philippe Varlet

worth searching for: Hawaiian Style Guitars ♪♪♪ (Lehua, 1997, prod. Bill Murata, Charles Bud Dant) features alternating tracks by Hui Ohana and steel-guitar master Jerry Byrd.

influences:

⏮ Fred Punahoa, Gabby Pahinui, Sonny Chillingworth

⏭ George Kuo, Ozzie Kotani

Brian Mansfield

Zakir Hussain

Indian classical and popular music, world fusion

Born March 9, 1951, in Bombay, India. Based in India.

Zakir Hussain is not only a master of the tabla, an Indian hand drum capable of producing a range of tones, but he's acquired a full command of such older Indian percussion instruments as the dhol, kho, duggi, dholak, and nal. Best known for his work with the Grateful Dead's Mickey Hart in the Diga Rhythm Band and Planet Drum, and with jazz fusion guitarist John McLaughlin in Shakti, Hussain has consistently widened the musical traditions of his homeland. He inherited his musical aptitude from his father, Alla Rakha, a long-time tabla player for sitarist Ravi Shankar. Mastering the tabla as a youngster, Hussain made his U.S. debut as a sideman for Shankar during his concert at New York's Fillmore East in 1970. Three years later, Hussain took over the Tal Vadya Rhythm Band. The group evolved into the Diga Rhythm Band and, later, into Zakir Hussain and the Rhythm Experience. The Diga Rhythm Band's self-titled 1976 album marked Hussain's first recorded collaboration with Mickey Hart; he later performed on Hart's albums Rolling Thunder, At the Edge, and the Apocalypse Now! soundtrack. Hussain also toured and recorded with Hart's all-star percussion ensemble, Planet Drum, in 1991. In the mid-1970s, Hussain joined with Indian violinist L. Shankar and British guitarist John McLaughlin to form the acoustic world fusion band Shakti. Hussain was a featured musician on Ancient Future's 1990 album World without Walls. Since launching his own record label, Moment!, the same year, Hussain has collaborated with such Indian musicians as Pandit V.G. Jog, Ustad Sultan Kahn, Ustad Amjad Ali Kahn, and Girija Devi.

what to buy: Recorded during Hussain's concert with his father, Alla Rakha, at Ramkrishnan Mission Auditorium in Bombay, Memorable Tabla Duet ♪♪♪♪ (Chhanda Dhara, 1991, prod. Zakir Hussain) is a master class in Indian hand drumming.

what to buy next: The excitement of Hussain's performances with his band the Rhythm Experience is captured on In Concert, Vol. 1: Live in Vancouver ♪♪♪♪ (Eternal Music, 1997, prod. Zakir Hussain) and In Concert, Vol. 2: Live in Vancouver ♪♪♪♪ (Eternal Music, 1997, prod. Zakir Hussain).

the rest:

Tabla Duet ♪♪♪½ (Chhanda Dhara, 1986)
Girija Devi & Zakir Hussain ♪♪♪ (Moment, 1988)
Ustad Amjad Ali Khan & Zakir Hussain ♪♪♪ (Moment, 1989)
Pandit V.G. Jog & Zakir Hussain ♪♪♪ (Moment, 1990)
Ustad Sultan Khan & Zakir Hussain ♪♪♪ (Moment, 1990)
Zakir Hussain & the Rhythm Experience ♪♪♪½ (Moment, 1991)
Elements: Space ♪♪♪½ (Music Today, 1994)
Sambandh ♪♪♪ (Terrascape, 1996)
Making Music ♪♪♪½ (ECM, 1997)
Magical Moments of Rhythm ♪♪♪ (Eternal, 1998) Essence of Rhythm ♪♪♪ (PolyGram, 1998)

influences:

⏮ Alla Rakha, Ravi Shankar

⏭ John McLaughlin, Mickey Hart

see also: Hari Prasad Chaurasia, Diga Rhythm Band, Mickey Hart, Ali Akbar Khan, Bill Laswell, G.S. Sachdev, Shakti, L. Shankar, Ravi Shankar, Shiv Kumar Sharma, T.H. "Vikku" Vinayakram

Craig Harris

Ashley Hutchings /The Albion Band

English folk and folk-rock

Born January 26, 1945, in Southgate, Middlesex, England. Based in England.

Elton John was recently knighted. If the British are serious about honoring musical heroes, Ashley Hutchings's time is long overdue. No one person has done more to re-invigorate and popularize English folk traditions than "the Guv'nor." Like many teens of his generation, Hutchings fancied himself a rock 'n' roll star and even led a series of rock 'n' roll bands in the mid-1960s. But his initial claim to fame would come as a bassist with folk-rock pioneers Fairport Convention. It was during his later Fairport days that he discovered traditional music, and he was one of the driving forces behind Fairport's landmark Liege and Lief set, one of the first recordings to blend Anglo-Celtic folk music with rock. That project altered Hutchings's career forever. He left Fairport in 1969 to more seriously pursue the goal of revitalizing traditional music, and the first step on this career path was the formation of Steeleye Span, with whom he recorded three albums. Since leaving Steeleye in 1971, Hutchings has concentrated on expanding his vision of a specifically English-rooted contemporary music by leading numerous incarnations of the Albion Band (a.k.a. the Albion Country Band, the Albion Dance Band), and producing a series of one-time-only projects such as Morris On (new arrangements of tunes from the British morris folk dance tradition), The Compleat Dancing Master (new arrangements of different kinds of dance tunes with readings), and even a romantic song cycle (By Gloucester Docks I Sat Down and Wept—A Love Story). Hutchings went so far as to star in a one-man stage production called An Evening with Cecil Sharp and Ashley Hutchings, in which he portrayed himself and the famed song researcher. He has amassed quite a collection of tapes from all of his projects, and some of this fascinating archival material is now available for all to hear on the four-CD set The Guv'nor. At the 1997 Cropredy festival, Hutchings narrated the Fairport Convention "oldies" set and led the opening number: his song "Wings," which looks back fondly on the growth of English folk-rock. A full studio version of "Wings" appears on Happy Accident, the CD that marked the Albions' return to an electric format after several years as an acoustic band. The year 1999 saw the release of Before Us Stands Yesterday, the first Albion Band CD to feature vocalist Gillie Nichols as a full member. At presstime Huchings had begun recording music for a new television series, The Ridgeway Riders, with Phil Beer and Chris While, both of whom had participated in earlier Albion Band line-ups. With this ongoing legacy in all media, no traditionalist ever had his eyes more on the future.

Zakir Hussain

what to buy: Phil Pickett's collection of "early music" instruments added a distinctive color to the arrangements of traditional dance tunes featured on The Prospect Before Us ♪♪♪♪♪ (EMI/Harvest, 1976/Hannibal, 1996, prod. Ashley Hutchings, Simon Nicol). Rise Up Like the Sun ♪♪♪♪♪ (EMI/Harvest 1978, prod. Joe Boyd, John Tams), credited to the Albion Band, was not as dance-oriented, and John Tams's role in the band had become much more prominent. He served as co-producer, did a lot of the lead singing, and brought in many of the songs. Among the Albion classics included on this album are "Ragged Heroes" (a Tams composition), "Poor Old Horse," and Richard Thompson's "Time to Ring Some Changes."

what to buy next: Battle of the Field ♪♪♪♪♪ (Island, 1976, prod. John Wood) features a never-to-be-duplicated line-up: Hutchings, Martin Carthy, John Kirkpatrick, Sue Harris, and Roger Swallow. Twangin' n' a-Traddin ♪♪♪♪ (Wildcat, 1995, prod. Ashley Hutchings), something completely different, was credited to a unit called the Ashley Hutchings Big Beat Combo. It's an unlikely pairing of morris and surf music—but who could resist an album that (one) credits Richard Thompson with playing electric guitar and pennywhistle and (two) includes a swingin' little tune called "Twistin' Welsh Girls"? It's a fitting reminder that Hutchings, now revered as a traditionalist, started out as a rock and rollin' Duane Eddy fan. For a comprehensive overview, completists will want The Guv'nor ♪♪♪♪♪ (HTD, compilation prod. Ashley Hutchings, Tim Woodward), a four-CD set that includes previously unreleased material from all periods of Hutchings's career. The Albions' latest full-length recording, Before Us Stands Yesterday ♪♪♪♪♪ (HTD, 1999, prod. Albion Band), demonstrates that Ashley Hutchings and Ken Nicol have become an effective songwriting team, creating memorable nouveau folk ballads with a certain English stateliness. Gillie Nichols is the latest to join the long line of ace female vocalists who've recorded with the Albions, a distinguished list that includes Shirley Collins, Cathy Lesurf, Polly Bolton, Chris While, and Julie Matthews.

best of the rest:
(With the Albion Band) In Concert ♪♪♪♪ (Windsong, 1993)
(With the Albion Band) Acousticity ♪♪♪♪ (HTD, 1993)
(With the Ashley Hutchings Dance Band) A Batter Pudding for John Keats ♪♪♪♪ (HTD, 1996)
The Best of '89/'90 ♪♪♪♪ (HTD, 1998)

worth searching for: Lark Rise to Candleford (Charisma, 1979), credited to Keith Dewhurst and the Albion Band, contains music (and some spoken excerpts) from the stage production. The core of the Albion line-up involved—including John Tams—went on to form the magnificent Home Service.

influences:
◀◀ Fairport Convention, Steeleye Span, Cecil Sharp, Mr. Fox
▶▶ Home Service, Oyster Band, Jennifer Cutting/The New St. George (U.S.)

see also: Martin Carthy, Shirley Collins, Fairport Convention, Home Service, Trevor Lucas, Cecil Sharp (sidebar) Steeleye Span, Richard Thompson

Pamela Murray Winters and Ken Roseman

Huun-Huur-Tu

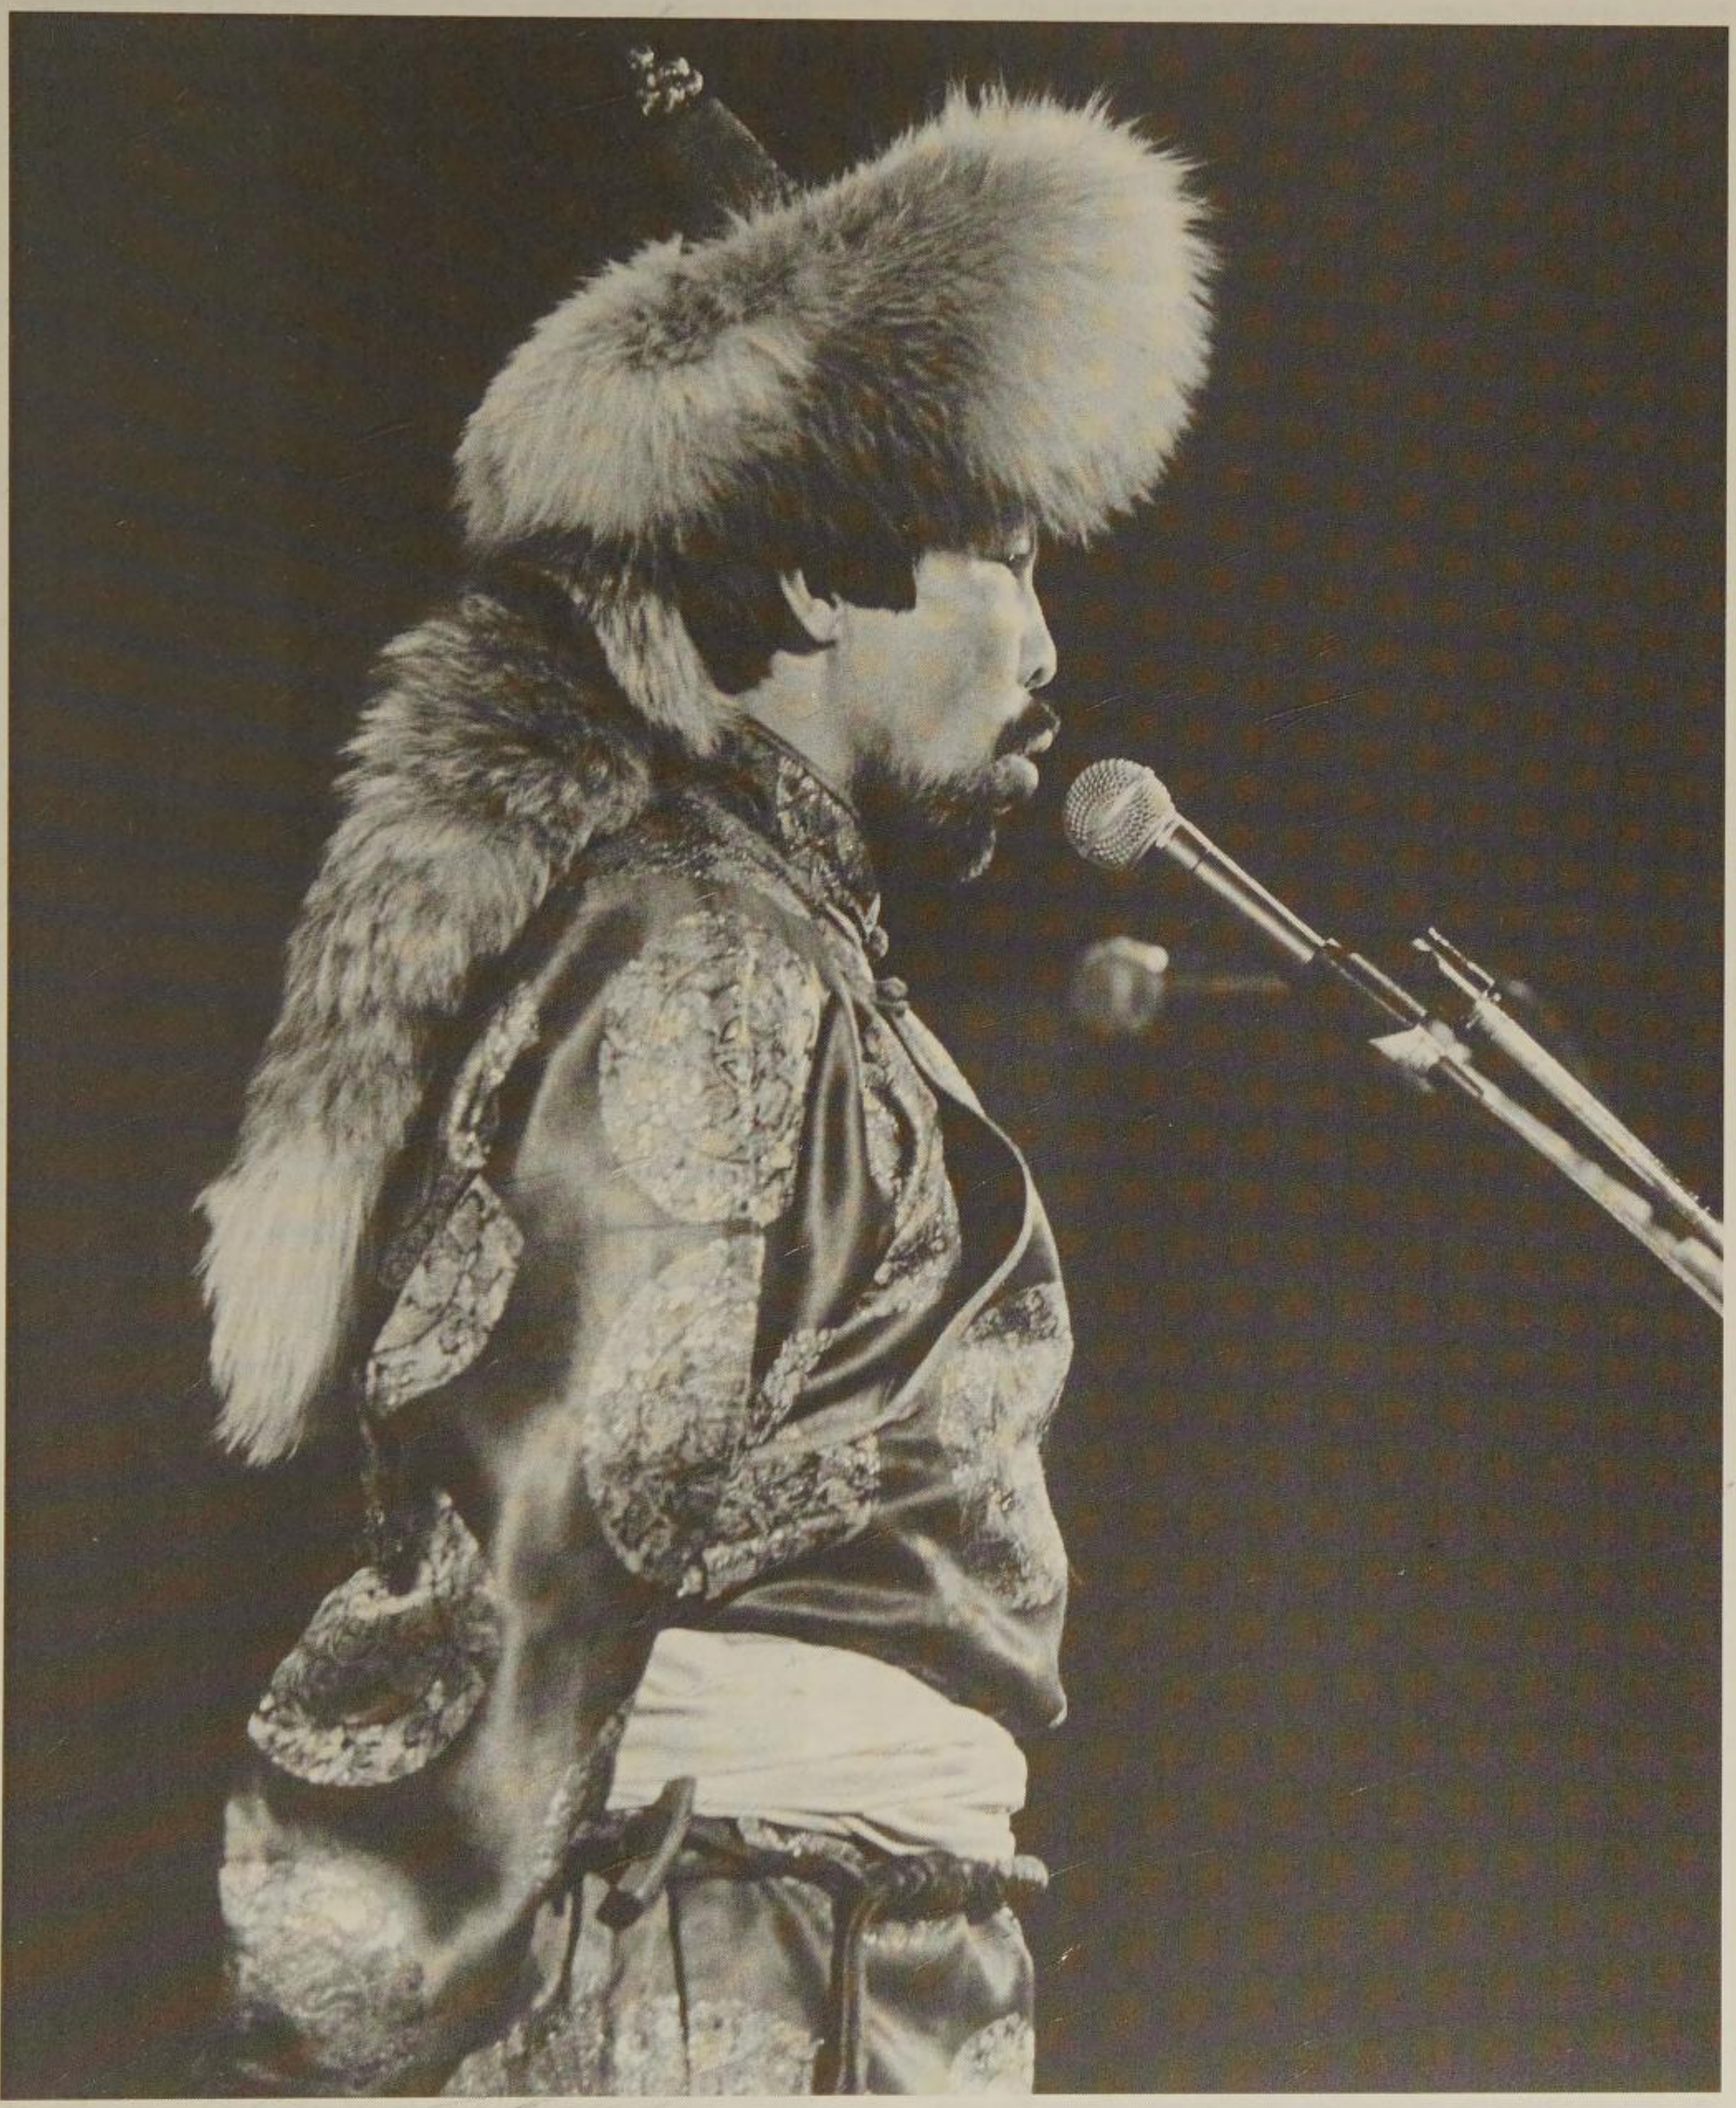
Tuvan traditional, khöömei (throat-singing)

Formed 1992, in Kyzyl, Tuva. Based in Kyzyl, Tuva.

Kaigal-ool Khovalyg, vocal, throat-singing (khöömei, sygyt, kargyraa), igil, khomuz; Anatoly Kuular, vocal, throat-singing (barbangnadyr), byzaanchi, khomuz, amyrga, ediski (birchbark reed); Sayan Bapa, vocal, throat-singing (kargyraa, khöömei), doshpuluur, marinhuur, guitar, synthesizer; Alexei Saryglar, vocal, throat-singing (sygyt), tuyug (horse hooves), xapchyk (bull testicles), tungur (shaman drum), igil, konguluur (1997–present); Albert Kuvezin, voice, guitar (1992–94); Alexander Bapa, tungur, dazhaanning khavy, amarga, bells (1993–96). (All members are from Tuva.)

The remote Siberian republic of Tuva boasts a unique musical tradition of overtone singing called khöömei, with obscure relations to Tibetan chant. This rustic singing of herders and hunters, accompanied on horse-hoof and bull-testicle percussion, horse-hair fiddles, Tuvan banjos, and other instruments, is best represented by Huun-Huur-Tu, the name depicting both the refraction of sunlight in the Tuvan countryside and the "re-

huun-huur-tu 3 3 1



Kaigal-ool Khovalyg of Huun-Huur-Tu

fraction of sound" in throat-singing. Khöömei is practiced by dividing the mouth into separate cavities and adjusting the harmonic resonance of each to produce a polytonal sound. Huun-Huur-Tu takes the style into new territory by using non-Tuvan instruments like guitar and synthesizer and collaborating with non-Tuvans, including performers from Scotland, Bulgaria, and Russia. Despite this flexibility, the integrity and power of their music somehow remains intact. Huun-Huur-Tu's style alternates equally between a mesmerizing shamanic drone sometimes resembling Native American music, and an easygoing, cantering folk melody sometimes reminiscent of cowboy music. One of the most interesting groups in world music, Huun-Huur-Tu must be heard to be believed.

what to buy: You might start with their first recording, 60 Horses in My Herd ♪♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1993, prod. Alexander Bapa), to get a sense of what Huun-Huur-Tu does. It contains the masterpiece "Fantasy on the Igil," an absolutely indispensable piece of music. The Orphan's Lament ♪♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1994, prod. Alexander Bapa) contains the amazing "Prayer," a Tibetan chant–like piece that can also be heard in various arrangements for mixed Tuvan and Bulgarian singers on Fly, Fly My Sadness and Deep in the Heart of Tuva ♪♪♪♪ (ellipsis arts . . , 1996, compilation prod. Ralph Leighton), which is reviewed in this book's Compilations section.

what to buy next: Fly, Fly My Sadness ♪♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1996, prod. Ulrich Balss, Mikhail Alperin) is a beautiful recording, and it shows the group's adaptability. Former members of the Bulgarian State Television Female Vocal Choir (perhaps better known as Le Mystère des Voix Bulgares) join Huun-Huur-Tu for a stunning combination of two of the world's most unique singing styles. Recorded in the Netherlands, If I'd Been Born an Eagle ♪♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1997, prod. Sayan Bapa) mixes pure Tuvan music with various influences. "Don't Frighten the Crane" is a particularly beautiful Tuvan folk song. Where Young Grass Grows ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1999, prod. Niall Macaulay, Alexander Bapa) shares some material with Tuva, Among the Spirits: Sound, Music and Nature in Sakha and Tuva ♪♪♪♪ (Smithsonian Folkways Recordings, 1999, prod. Ted Levin, Joel Gordon), and highlights their musical connection to animals and the Tuvan countryside.

the rest:
(With the Bulgarian Voices Angelite and Moscow Art Trio) Mountain Tale ♪♪½ (Zebra Acoustic Records, 1999)

worth searching for: Much Better ♪♪♪½ (GreenWave, 1998, prod. Vladimir Volkov) is an interesting recording by the jazzy Russian ensemble the Volkov Trio, assisted by Kaigal ool-Khovalyg and others, including sometime Huun-Huur-Tu collaborator Sergey Starostin on various instruments. Starostin and Arkady Shilkloper are from the Moscow Art Trio, which also appears on Mountain Tale. Other musicians on Much Better include Igor Butman, Mola Sylla, and Olivier Ker-ourio. Styles range from bluesy fusion to Tuvan drone. Khovalyg's igil (two-stringed fiddle) and khöömei are accompanied on one track by an Australian didgeridoo-like alphorn. Khovalyg and Anatoly Kuular also appear on Frank Zappa's Civilization Phaze III ♪♪♪½ (Barking Pumpkin Records, 1994), and the Kronos Quartet's Night Prayers ♪♪♪♪ (Nonesuch Records, 1994) and Early Music (Lachrymae Antiquae) ♪♪♪♪ (Nonesuch Records, 1997).

influences:
Indigenous Tuvan music

see also: Chirgilchin, Kronos Quartet, Le Mystère des Voix Bulgares, Yat-Kha

David Paul

Abdullah Ibrahim /Dollar Brand

Jazz

Born Adolph Johannes Brand, October 9, 1934, in Cape Town, South Africa. Based in New York, NY, USA.

The rhythms of Africa are combined with the improvisations of post-bop jazz by South Africa–born pianist, composer, and bandleader Abdullah Ibrahim. A disciple of Duke Ellington who initially recorded as "Dollar Brand," Ibrahim has been a major influence on modern jazz for more than three decades.

The son of a church choir leader and the grandson of a church pianist, Ibrahim began learning to play piano at the age of seven. In addition to being influenced by the music he heard in Cape Town—which included traditional African dance music, hymns, and carnival songs as well as American and British pop and R&B—Ibrahim was inspired by the playing of jazz pianists Meade Lux Lewis and Fats Waller.

Beginning his professional music career as a vocalist with the Streamline Brothers, Ibrahim switched to piano after joining the Tuxedo Slickers. In 1959 Ibrahim, along with saxophonist Kippie Moketsi and trumpet player Hugh Masekela (the first giant of African music with whom he would be associated), formed the Jazz Epistles. Although the group became popular in South Africa, Ibrahim and his wife-to-be, Sathima Bea Benjamin, left the continent in spring of 1962 to live in a variety of locales in Europe. Settling in Switzerland for a year, Ibrahim performed regularly in a coffeehouse in Zurich. A turning point came when Duke Ellington toured the country, and, at the urging of Benjamin, listened to Ibrahim's playing. Four days later, he was invited to record with Ellington in Paris.

Following successful appearances, with a trio, at the Antibes Jazz Festival in 1964, Ibrahim began composing arrangements for a large orchestra, including the five-part suite "Anatomy of a South African Village." Ibrahim continued to work in a small format as well, recording several trio albums with fellow expatriates Johnny Gertze and Makaya Ntshako. In 1965, Ibrahim performed his debut American concert at Carnegie Hall, and appeared at the Newport Jazz Festival. While in the United States, he played piano for five East Coast performances by the Ellington Orchestra. The following year, Ibrahim collaborated on albums with the Elvin Jones Band and saxophonist Gato Barbieri.

Converting to Islam and adopting his current name in 1968, Ibrahim recorded several free-jazz albums in Europe and Canada. Although he temporarily settled in Swaziland in 1971, he spent most of his time on tour throughout Europe and North America. In 1973, Ibrahim recorded a big-band album, African Space Program, in New York, featuring jazz musicians Sonny Fortune, Cecil McBee, and John Stubblefield. Returning to his homeland in 1974, Ibrahim recorded several tunes with South African musicians, including "Mannenburg" (a.k.a. "Soweto Is Where It's At"), which became a theme song of the post-Soweto uprising in 1976. Angered by the oppression of apartheid, Ibrahim again left South Africa in 1976 and moved to New York. After launching his own production company, Ekapa/RPM, he recorded duo albums with Archie Shepp, Max Roach, and Johnny Dyani. Ibrahim continued a prolific output, releasing more than two dozen albums between 1973 and 1983. In 1991, he returned to his country yet again and recorded with South African musicians for the first time in 15 years. The resulting album, Mantra Mode, remains one of his most expressive recordings.

what to buy: Recorded live during a trio concert at Copenhagen's Cafe Montmartre, Anatomy of a South African Village ♪♪♪♪½ (Black Lion, 1965, prod. Alan Bates) recalls Ibrahim's homeland with an expressive five-part suite. In addition to a six-tune suite dedicated to the influence of Fats Waller, Duke Ellington, and Thelonious Monk, Sangoma ♪♪♪♪ (Sackville, 1973, prod. Dollar Brand) features several compositions that capture the spirit and atmospheric sounds of South Africa.

best of the rest:

African Sketchbook ♪♪♪♪ (Enja, 1963)
Duke Ellington Presents the Dollar Brand Trio ♪♪♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1963)
Soweto ♪♪♪♪ (Chiaroscuro, 1965)
Cape Town Fringe ♪♪♪½ (Chiaroscuro, 1965)
Round Midnight at the Montmartre ♪♪♪½ (Black Lion, 1965)
African Piano ♪♪♪½ (ECM, 1969)
African Portraits ♪♪♪½ (Sackville, 1973)
Ancient Africa ♪♪♪♪ (Sackville, 1973)
Good News from Africa ♪♪♪½ (Enja, 1973)
African Space Program ♪♪♪♪ (Enja, 1973)
Echoes from Africa ♪♪♪♪ (Enja, 1979)
African Marketplace ♪♪♪½ (Elektra, 1979)
Montreux in '80 ♪♪♪♪ (Enja, 1980)
African Dawn ♪♪♪½ (Enja, 1982)
Zimbabwe ♪♪♪½ (Enja, 1983)
South Africa ♪♪♪♪ (Enja, 1986)
African Sun ♪♪♪♪ (Kaz, 1989)
Voice of Africa ♪♪♪½ (Kaz, 1989)
African River ♪♪♪½ (Enja, 1989)
Anthem for the New Nations ♪♪♪♪ (Denon, 1991)
Mantra Mode ♪♪♪♪ (Enja, 1991)
African Horns ♪♪♪♪ (Castle, 1994)
South African Ambassador ♪♪♪½ (Jazzfest, 1997)
Cape Town Flowers ♪♪♪½ (Tip Toe, 1997)

influences:

Duke Ellington, Fats Waller, Thelonious Monk

Hugh Masekela, Chris McGregor

see also: Hugh Masekela

Craig Harris

Immigrant Suns

Balkan-inspired rock

Formed 1992, in Detroit, MI, USA. Based in Detroit, MI, USA.

Doug Shimmin, strumstick, melodica, banjo, trumpet, bouzouki, baritone ukulele, mandolin, guitar, accordion, vocals; Ben Temkow, violin, balalaika, euphonium, accordion, pennywhistle, mbira, piano, vocals; Joel Peterson, bass, cello, clarinet, vocals; Mark Sawasky, doubek, tar, talking drum, riqq, bongos, conga, ghatam, traps, euphonium, vocals; Djeto Juncaj, qytelli, cello, guitar, accordion, tenor banjo, toy marimba, toy flute, vocals. (All members are from the USA.)

The Immigrant Suns met as members of various Detroit-area rock bands looking for other realms to explore. Djeto Juncaj, who was born in Montenegro, was seeking to experiment with the qytelli (a small, two-stringed lute native to Albania) in a rock context. Because the other folks in his regular band didn't want to blend Juncaj's qytelli into the mix, he ended up jamming with another ensemble that included Doug Shimmin and Mark Sawasky. The next member to join the budding group was Joel Peterson and he, in turn, brought Ben Temkow into the fold. This was the quintet that, in 1992, became the Immigrant Suns. His desire to create a hybrid form made Juncaj the initial focus of the band, but the other members contributed ideas from their own ethnic backgrounds. Greek and Polish elements crept into the music as did Armenian, Arabic, Hispanic, Hungarian, Gypsy, and klezmer influences. The results are reminiscent of the international esoterica that David Lindley's '60s-era rock group Kaleidoscope used to drench its tunes in.

what's available: Their first effort, Montenegro ♪♪♪ (Pho-net-ic Records, 1994, prod. Frank Pahl, the Immigrant Suns), still holds up to repeated listening, but the band was just developing an artistic identity and it was obvious that better things were possible if it could just stay together. The song titles tend toward youthful irreverence ("Blue Moons and Flying Pigs" and "Creamy Italian" being two memorable examples), but their musical vision adapts Balkan-oriented folk sounds to rock sensibilities with surprising success, foreshadowing the band's next release, Back from Durbecca ♪♪♪♪ (Pho-net-ic Records, 1996, prod. the Immigrant Suns). "Serpentine," the first song on the album, is a stunningly idiomatic instrumental draped in Balkanisms. The rest of the disc takes off from there to visit a wry lyricism upon space-age belly dance rhythms and the occasional Spanish tinge ("Muchacha" and "El Toro"). As a bit of inspired (yet directed) eclecticism, this set created a standard for their third album, More Than Food ♪♪♪♪½ (Pho-net-ic Records, 1998, prod. the Immigrant Suns). Although it was recorded at six different studios, More Than Food is surprisingly unified. On this disc, the Immigrant Suns are solidifying their aesthetic, converging on a style that lets them take a subversive approach to Lennon & McCartney's "Girl" without sacrificing the ethnic element. Hits here include the darkly dancing "Gifikás" and "Kafé Turké," with a bizarro Dick Dale-ish "Surfin' Albania" tossed in for good measure.

influences:

⏮ Kaleidoscope, Simon Shaheen, Muzikás

Garaud MacTaggart

Impact All Stars

Dub reggae

Active 1972–75, in Kingston, Jamaica.

The only permanent members of the Impact All Stars were: Errol "ET" Thompson, engineering, mixer; Clive Chin, producer, arranger. (Both members from Jamaica.)

Randy's Studio 17—run by Vincent "Randy" Chin—was open for business from 1968–77 and during its run hosted producers from Bunny Lee to Niney the Observer to Lee "Scratch" Perry to—most importantly for our story here—the great Clive Chin. The studio's resident engineer was Errol "ET" Thompson, considered one of the island's best-ever mixers. More than anything, the name "Impact All Stars" refers to Thompson's steady, inventive hand at the control board, for the Impact All Stars weren't a group so much as a name given to the various musicians who worked at Studio 17 during the 1972–75 period under Clive Chin's production. The tracks were dubbed up by ET and compiled first on the Impact! label's Randy's Dub in 1975—total pressing: 200—and then on Blood & Fire's 1998 reissue of that album (with bonus tracks), Forward the Bass: Dub from Randy's 1972–75.

what's available: Forward the Bass: Dub from Randy's 1972–1975 ♪♪♪♪♪ (Blood & Fire, 1998, reissue prod. Steve Barrow) is wonderful: although not as wild as the dub that King Tubby and Scratch were turning out at the time, it makes up for the kind of liberal sound-painting so beloved of dub freaks by concentrating its psychedelic efforts on drums and bass, which get blurry but never lose their way beneath single instruments dropping in and out of the mix. Following five tough, naked instrumentals utilizing almost no studio effects, the rhythms get blurrier while up top we're treated to rewinding tape solos, echoing vocals, and, on the best track, "Easy Come Dub," a pealing piano kneeling on your lobes and caressing your inner ear. Forward the Bass is a welcome addition to any dub collection, and a good place to begin one.

worth searching for: Although the Impact All Stars never recorded anything under that name until the songs compiled on Forward the Bass, fans of the album are urged to find a copy of Rebel Rock Reggae—This Is Augustus Pablo ♪♪♪♪♪ (Heartbeat, 1986), produced at Randy's by Clive Chin. Similarly basic and deceptively simple, this is one of the great reggae albums.

influences:

⏮ Upsetters, King Tubby, Skatalites

⏭ Spring Heel Jack, Mad Professor, Badawi

see also: King Tubby, Augustus Pablo, Lee "Scratch" Perry

Michaelangelo Matos

Indigenous

Blues rock

Formed 1994, on the Yankton reservation in SD, USA. Based in Marty, SD, USA.

Mato Nanji, guitars, vocals; Wanbdi, drums, vocals; Pte, bass, vocals; Horse, percussion, vocals. (All members are from USA.)

This Native American group—two brothers, a sister, and a cousin—grew up together on a South Dakota reservation. Nurtured by a father/uncle who played in a '60s and '70s band called the Vanishing Americans and who introduced them, via his extensive record collection, to blues and soul, the quartet began playing when its members were pre-teens and never stopped. After a couple of self-produced discs, they hit the rock circuit, sharing the stage with Jonny Lang, Keb' Mo', and Chris Duarte and crossing the country with their high-energy blues/rock stage show—heavy on the drums/percussion rhythm section and fronted by Nanji's explosive guitar pyrotechnics, which rarely stray from the Carlos Santana/Jimi Hendrix/Stevie Ray Vaughan axis.

what's available: Things We Do ♪♪♪ (Pachyderm, 1998, prod. Brent Sigmeth, Indigenous) is full of the same kind of Stratocaster braggadocio that underpins their stage show. Nanji's voice and guitar generally tend toward Vaughan-inspired excess, but the album is balanced by several songs that derive from the leaner, more economical approach of "Big Head" Todd Park Mohr.

influences:
⏮ Stevie Ray Vaughan, Carlos Santana, Buddy Guy, Albert King, Big Head Todd and the Monsters

Leland Rucker

Inkuyo

Andean fusion

Formed 1987, in USA. Based in USA.

Gonzalo Vargas (Bolivia), quena, quenacho, sikus, antara; Enrique Coria (Chile), guitar tiple; Salmon Perez (Bolivia), charango, bandurria, drums, vocals; Danile Zamorra (Chile), bass (1993–94); Pamela Darington (USA), vocals, guitar, percussion (1987–94).

The region of South America once inhabited by the Incas—the mountain areas of Peru, Ecuador, Bolivia, Chile, and Argentina—has its own distinct musical tradition, defined more by the culture of the highlands than by national boundaries. This flute-and-percussion-based music is the source of Inkuyo's compositions, and indeed they have recorded many songs based on traditional tunes while investigating other influences. The varied backgrounds of the group's members, and their residence in the United States, have exposed them to elements of nueva canción (the activist, folkloric "new song" movement), decima (a popular structure for often-improvised poetry), and rock 'n' roll which they've begun to incorporate into their music while maintaining strong identification with and respect for Andean folklore.

what to buy: Ancient Sun ♪♪♪♪ (Celestial Harmonies, 1996, prod. Gonzalo Vargas), which shows the strongest influences of musics beyond the Andes, is a good listen for the current direction of the group. Land of the Incas ♪♪♪♪½ (Fortuna, 1990, prod. Inkuyo) is a lively collection of originals which give the feeling of a journey though the mountains, stopping to share celebrations and insights along the way. Both include liner notes with useful information on the structure and background of the music.

the rest:
Temple of the Sun ♪♪♪♪½ (Fortuna, 1990)
Double Headed Serpent ♪♪♪♪½ (Celestial Harmonies, 1993)
Art from Sacred Landscapes ♪♪♪♪ (Celestial Harmonies, 1995) Window to the Andes N/A (Celestial Harmonies, 1998)

influences:
⏭ Sukay

Kerry Dexter

Inti-Illimani

Andean, Latin American, folklorico, nueva canción

Formed 1967, in Santiago, Chile. Based in Chile.

Horacio Salinas, music director, guitar, cuatro, tiple, charango, percussion, vocals; Jose Seves, guitar, quena, sikis, rondador, Mexican guitarron, congas, Peruvian cajon, vocals; Jorge Coulon, guitar, tiple, harp, hammered dulcimer, rondador, vocals; Marcelo Coulon, guitar, quena, piccolo, bass, flute, Mexican guitarron, vocals; Horacio Duran, charagno, cuatro, violin, percussion, vocals; Max Berru, bombo, caja, maracas, clave, bongo, guiro, guitar, vocals (1967–96); Pedro Villagra, saxophone, flute, piccolo, congas, sikis, clarinet, mandolin, vocals; Efren Manuel Viera, congas, bongo, timbales, baritone saxophone, clarinet. (All members are from Chile.)

The musical traditions of Chile's Andes Mountains are resurrected through the vocal harmonies and virtuoso musicianship of Inti-Illimani. Although the group continues to be rooted in venerable sounds, its enthusiastic approach adds a new dimension to its music. Formed by students at the Technical University in Santiago, Chile, the group's name translates as "Sun God" in the Aymaran Indian language of the Andean highlands. During the 1970s Inti-Illimani became leaders of the folkloric, activist nueva canción (new song) movement. Their outspoken lyrics made them targets of Chile's political oppression, and they were exiled from their homeland from 1973 to 1988. Although it was based in Rome for that time, the band toured practically non-stop and spread its musical message throughout the world. In addition to performing with such artists as Pete Seeger, Mikis Theodorakis, Mercedes Sosa, and John Williams, Inti-Illimani participated in the Amnesty International tour of 1988 and appeared with Sting, Bruce Springsteen, Tracy Chapman, and Peter Gabriel. Since returning to Chile that same year, Inti-Illimani has remained among the country's best-regarded performers. With the retirement of Max Berru in 1996, the band has continued to perform as a septet. The group was honored with a Human Rights award from U.C. Berkeley in 1997. Unfortunately, though the band has recorded more than 30 albums, only a few are available in the United States.

what to buy: Recorded during a 1990 concert in Germany, Leyenda (Legend) ♪♪♪♪ (CBS-Sony, 1990, prod. Inti-Illimani) reprises tunes spanning the band's first 23 years. Flamenco guitarist Paco Peña and classical guitarist John Williams add a further dimension to the band's tradition-rooted sound. Inti-Illimani reflected on its exile with the powerful album Arriesgare La Piel (I Will Risk My Skin) ♪♪♪♪ (Xenophile, 1996, prod. Inti-Illimani), which focuses on the sorrow of lovers and families torn apart by political repression.

the rest:
Fragmento De Un Sueno ♪♪♪½ (CBS-Sony, 1987)
Andadas (Wanderings) ♪♪♪½ (Xenophile, 1993)
Lejania ♪♪♪½ (Xenophile, 1998)

worth searching for: Released in Italy and available in the United States only as an import, The Best of Inti-Illimani ♪♪♪♪ (Inti-Illimani, 1994, prod. Inti-Illimani) is a thorough sampling of its most influential tunes.

influences:
◀◀ Traditional music of Latin America
▶▶ Flor De Cana, Forteleza

see also: Paco Peña, Mikis Theodorakis, Mercedes Sosa

Craig Harris

Irakere

Afro-Cuban jazz

Formed 1973, in Havana, Cuba. Based in Havana, Cuba.

Jesus "Chucho" Valdes, arranger, composer, keyboards; Arturo Sandoval, trumpet, flugelhorn, valve trombone, vocals (1973–81); Paquito D'Rivera, saxophones (1973–80); Carlos Emilio Morales, electric guitar; Enrique Pla, drums; Jorge Varona, trumpet, flugelhorn (1973–96); Oscar Valdes, vocals, percussion (1973–96); Armando Cuervo, vocals, percussion (1973–96); Carlos Averhoff, saxophones, piccolo, flute (1973–96); Carlos del Puerto, bass; Jorge "El Nino" Alfonso, congas; Jose Luis Cortez, flute (1981–88); Juan Munguia, trumpet, flugelhorn (1987–95); Miguel Diaz, percussion (1995–96); Mayra Caridad Valdes, vocals (1993–present); Mario Fernandez, trumpet (1995–present); César López, alto saxophone (1995–present); Alfredo Thompson, tenor saxophone (1995–present); Andres Miranda, congas (1995–present); Jose Miguel Melendez, timbales (1998–present); Orlando Valle, flute, keyboards (1995–96); Adalberto Ore Lara, trumpet (1995–96). (All members are from Cuba.)

Cuba has always played a part in the evolution of jazz, with pre-embargo American band leaders borrowing liberally from Afro-Cuban sounds like rumba, mambo, and cha-cha-cha. After more than a decade of Cuba's ongoing political and cultural isolation had passed, musical innovations once again began to percolate up from the island courtesy of Irakere. Born out of Orquesta Cubana de Musica Moderna, a state-sponsored collective of musicians that included Chucho Valdes, Arturo Sandoval, and Paquito D'Rivera, Irakere is credited with being in the forefront of the Latin-jazz sound's development. The group blends songo sounds—rhythmic structures centered around congas, bata drums, and checkeré shakers, supplemented by electric bass, keyboards, and piano—with a tight be-bop style reminiscent of Dizzy Gillespie and Charlie Parker. Before Sandoval and D'Rivera defected to the United States in the beginning of the '80s, Irakere enjoyed international acclaim as the first Castro-era Cuban band to tour and record abroad. (Their 1978 U.S. debut album won a Grammy—which they even got to collect, 15 years later.) "Irakere" means "the forest" in Yoruba, the language of Cuban slaves in the 19th century. It's a term that best describes the group's sound in its heyday (before Sandoval and D'Rivera's defections). The dense polyrhythms served as an underbrush teeming with a million different lifeforms, and the frenetic explorations of Sandoval's trumpet, Valdes's piano, D'Rivera's saxophone, and Morales's guitar evoked visions of powerful but invisible beasts calling out from behind the timber. But Irakere was more an ensemble than a showcase for individual talent, and its real niche lay in its ability to never let listeners miss "Irakere"—the forest—for the trees.

what to buy: Recorded during a brief break in the Cuban embargo, The Best of Irakere ♪♪♪½ (Columbia, recorded 1979, released 1994) is a 75-minute snapshot of the band's repertoire at that time. Two high points of this record are a mind-blowing live version of the 17-minute "Misa Negra" (The Black Mass) with its three distinct movements, and the delightful Afro-Cuban treatment of "Adagio on a Mozart Theme." On the downside, The Best contains a touch of disco/fusion to mark the times.

what to buy next: Yemaya ♪♪ (Blue Note, 1999) might as well be a Chucho Valdes solo record. There are some ensemble passages, but the meat of the album—and possibly the only visceral element that pokes through all the slick production—is Chucho's fiery piano lines.

worth searching for: Irakere (CBS, 1979) and Live at Ronnie Scott's (World Pacific, 1993) are two must-have live albums that are out of print. Most of the core had left by the time Tierra En Trance (EGREM, 1985) was released, but it's still one of the group's more consistent and sizzling works. Bialando Asi (Babacan, 1987) is chock-full of salsa merengue stylings. Misa Negra (Messidor, 1992) is a classic mostly due to the title track. Irakere is as inconsistent as it is innovative, so don't fret too much if you are unable to track down any of its many other out-of-print recordings.

influences:
◀◀ Dizzy Gillespie, Charlie Parker, Rahsaan Roland Kirk, Machito, Los Van Van, Eddie Palmieri, Silvio Rodriguez

⏭ NG La Banda, Arturo Sandoval, Paquito D'Rivera, Chucho Valdes

see also: Paquito D'Rivera, Arsenio Rodriguez, Arturo Sandoval, Chucho Valdes

Isaac Josephson

Irish Rovers

Celtic folk

Formed 1964, in Calgary, Alberta, Canada. Based in Dublin, Ireland.

Jimmy Ferguson (died October 8, 1997), vocals; Joe Millar, accordion, bass; Wilcil McDowell, accordion; Will Millar, vocals, guitar, banjo (1964–present); Wallace Hood, banjo, mandolin, whistle, vocals; John Reynolds, banjo; George Millar, guitar; Kevin McKeown, percussion. (All members are from Ireland.)

The Irish Rovers have been entertaining audiences for more than 30 years with their blend of Celtic folk, barroom novelties, and poignant parables. The Rovers' exuberant, untutored sound bolsters their image as a group of friends who travel the countryside sharing stories, jokes, and songs with their extended family of fans and admirers. The Rovers allow each individual member a moment in the spotlight, and their live show is a guaranteed good time for young and old alike. After moving to Canada from Northern Ireland, brothers George and Will Millar saw the Clancy Brothers with Tommy Makem on The Ed Sullivan Show and were inspired to start their own group. They scuffled in the nascent Celtic scene for a few years before signing with Decca Records in 1967. The following year they scored their lone Top 10 U.S. hit with the Shel Silverstein–penned classic "The Unicorn," a mythical novelty that remains popular to this day. Several lesser hits followed, such as "Whiskey on a Sunday," "The Puppet Song," "The Biplane Evermore," "Lily the Pink," and "Did She Mention My Name"—which were more popular in Canada than in the States, and led to the Rovers starring in their own weekly TV variety show on CBC from 1971 through 1974. The group switched to Epic Records in 1980, where their ode to alcoholic excess "Wasn't That a Party" reached #37 on the pop charts and the country music Top 10, followed by their last chart records "Mexican Girl," "Pain in My Past," and "No More Bread and Butter." Will Millar eventually left the group to be replaced by Wallace Hood from Pat's People and Kevin McKeown of Emerald Express. In recent years, the Celtic music boom combined with the Riverdance craze has revived interest in the Irish Rovers, and the group have formed their own label, releasing new material as well as fresh versions of their classic hits. When Jimmy Ferguson (whose powerful vocal illuminates "Wasn't That a Party") died, the Rovers dedicated their entire 1998 world tour to their beloved late partner.

what to buy: All their early hits plus several fan favorites reside happily on Irish Rovers' Greatest Hits ♪♪♪♪ (MCA, 1981/1997, prod. various), a 20-track compilation, though some may prefer the digitally remastered The Best of the Irish Rovers ♪♪♪♪ (MCA, 1999, prod. various), which features extensive notes and interviews with the band's members.

what to buy next: The two-LPs-on-one-tape reissue The First of the Irish Rovers/The Unicorn ♪♪♪½ (MCA, 1980/1991, prod. various) gives you a lot of prime Rovers material in one budget offering. Nice.

what to avoid: The guys are in good voice and the production values are top-notch, but be forewarned: The Irish Rovers Celebrate Their First 30 years ♪♪½ (Spinner/Rovers Records, 1996, prod. Irish Rovers) features re-recordings of their best-known songs. Seek out the original classics whenever possible.

the rest:

On the Shores of Americay ♪♪♪ (MCA, 1971/1991)
The Unicorn ♪♪♪ (MCA, 1971/1991)
The First of the Irish Rovers ♪♪♪ (MCA, 1971/1991)
Years May Come & Years May Go ♪♪½ (MCA, 1985/1993)
Celtic Collection: The Next 30 Years ♪♪½ (Rovers Records, 1995)
Ramblers & Gamblers ♪♪♪ (Carlton Sounds, 1997)

worth searching for: For a jaunty good time seek out Irish Rovers Live ♪♪♪½ (MCA, 1972, prod. various), a solid set of laughs and great tunes in front of an enthusiastic live audience.

influences:

⏮ Clancy Brothers & Tommy Makem, Dubliners

⏭ Scaffold, Chieftains

Ken Burke

The Irish Tradition /Brendan Mulvihill & Billy McComiskey

Celtic

Formed 1975, in Washington, DC, USA. Disbanded 1987.

Brendan Mulvihill (born July 12, 1954, in Northampton, England), fiddle; Billy McComiskey (born December 21, 1951, in New York, NY, USA), button accordion; Andy O'Brien (Ireland), guitar, vocals.

Both as individuals and collectively, the members of the Irish Tradition stand out as some of the most talented and influential artists in the recent history of Irish music. From its first appearance in 1975, the trio's technical virtuosity and great musical rapport created a surge of interest in Irish music in the Washington, D.C., area, and led to the development of an outstanding local music scene. Some of the D.C.-area artists influenced, inspired, or taught by the Irish Tradition include Celtic Thunder, Maggie Sansone, Lisa Moscatiello, Grace Griffith, and Ceoltoiri, among many others. The group's two albums on Green Linnet,

andy irvine

both classics, were consistently that label's biggest sellers during its early years and provided a base from which the now-mighty label could expand to its present lofty heights. Finally, Brendan Mulvihill and Billy McComiskey, as teachers, have introduced new musicians to playing of the highest caliber, and have kept the standards for traditional music high in both Washington, D.C., and New York City.

Mulvihill is an explosive fiddler with tremendous power, grace, and sensitivity in his playing. Growing up in England and New York City, he learned his music from his father, legendary fiddler and music teacher Martin Mulvihill, as well as from the many outstanding musicians he met in both New York and Birmingham, England. Mulvihill won the All-Ireland senior fiddle title in 1974, and moved to Washington, D.C., the following year. He has appeared all over the world, and has influenced many of today's top young musicians, including Eileen Ivers, Joannie Madden, and Natalie MacMaster. McComiskey is an incredibly talented accordionist with a deep sense of what makes traditional music work and an incredible virtuosity on his instrument. While growing up in New York City, he learned his music from family members and from the great local box player Sean McGlynn. McComiskey won the All-Ireland in 1986 and has appeared throughout the United States and Ireland as a solo performer and with his current group, Trian. He is a prolific composer of tunes and an outstanding teacher, having instructed or influenced performers as diverse as Celtic harpist Sue Richards, box players John Nolan, Colm Gannon, and Mary Rafferty, and piper Jerry O'Sullivan.

what to buy: The Irish Tradition's The Corner House ♪♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1978, prod. Mick Moloney) features some of the most beautiful note-for-note playing of Irish dance music ever recorded. Billy and Brendan had been performing together every night for years when they recorded this album, and it shows in their tight, tasty duet playing. In addition to backing the other two on their virtuoso flights, Andy O'Brien contributes four sweet songs. Finally, the trio's setting of "The Dark-Eyed Sailor" shows how powerful and moving a simple song arrangement can be in the hands of master musicians.

what to buy next: McComiskey's Mąkin' the Rounds ♪♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1981 prod. Mick Moloney, Billy McComiskey) makes a very convincing case that the button accordion, in the right hands, can be as beautiful, expressive, and moving as any other instrument in traditional Irish music. Moving from tunes he learned in his youth from friends and heroes to his own compositions, many of which are now standards, Billy shows the past and present of Irish music. He rocks with the best of them on sets like "Leave My Way" and "The Chicago Reel," and brings a classical refinement to the slow set dance "Planxty Davis." This album is a tour de force of box playing. Mulvihill and Donna Long's The Morning Dew ♪♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1992, prod. Joe Wilson, Julia Olin) allows the musical genius to strut his stuff, ably backed by one of the finest piano players around today. Mulvihill's playing ranges from the ferocious to the elegant, and the sound is as good as any in Green Linnet's history.

the rest:
The Times We've Had ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1985)

worth searching for: Mulvihill and Long's self-produced cassette The SteepleChase ♪♪♪ (SteepleChase, 1990, prod. Donna Long, Brendan Mulvihill) was the first recording for the pair. The Irish Tradition's first recording, Catchin' the Tune (self-released, 1976, prod. Irish Tradition), is long out of print.

solo outings:
Brendan Mulvihill:
The Flax in Bloom ♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1979)

influences:
⏮ Martin Mulvihill, Paddy O'Brien, Andy McGann, Jack Coen

⏭ Cherish the Ladies, Jerry O'Sullivan

see also: Ceoltoiri, Eileen Ivers, Joannie Madden, Natalie MacMaster, Maggie Sansone, Trian

Tony Ziselberger

Andy Irvine

Celtic

Born June 14, 1942, in London, England. Based in Dublin, Ireland.

Andy Irvine has the most bittersweet voice in Celtic music. It has that feel of Irish whiskey poured into a glass of hot tea with a couple large dollops of sugar to sweeten it up—whether he's singing his own compositions or his arrangements of traditional pieces, it just washes over you hot and sweet and then you feel that bite that lurks underneath. After you get past that voice you notice that he is an instrumental perfectionist, whether playing harmonica, mandolin, or the Irish bouzouki. Finally you'll notice that he is also an excellent songwriter, and has produced several tunes which have become standards of Irish repertoire, most notably "West Coast of Clare." His impeccable taste and talent have made him the core of three important Irish groups, Sweeney's Men, Planxty, and Patrick Street.

Born in London, Irvine was a child actor before developing an interest in jazz and classical music. Like many other musicians in the British Isles, it was through the skiffle craze that he got interested in traditional music, particularly Woody Guthrie. By the early 1960s he was playing in the folk scene in Dublin, where his first group, Sweeney's Men, was formed in 1966. They made several recordings and lasted until he left for Eastern Europe in the turbulent summer of 1968. He spent over a year and half there, busking and absorbing the local music. The influence of that experience began to surface in the music of his next group, Planxty. That band first came together in 1972 while recording an album under Christy Moore's name. They rapidly became extremely popular both in Ireland and elsewhere in Europe, and lasted in one form or another until 1975, making several excellent recordings along the way. After Planxty Irvine worked for a while with Paul Brady, making one highly acclaimed album and touring Europe and the States with him. Shortly after that he began to work with the musicians who comprise his most current group, Patrick Street. While nowhere near the groundbreaking group Planxty was, Patrick Street instead makes its mark with the extremely high quality of craftsmanship it brings to traditional Irish music. Irvine's more adventurous side can be found in his solo efforts and his collaborations with Dick Gaughan, Davy Spillane, and others.

what to buy: Andy Irvine and Paul Brady ♪♪♪♪♪ (Mulligan/Green Linnet, 1976, prod. Dónal Lunny) is perhaps the finest single record of Irish music available. These recordings were made after the demise of the groundbreaking Planxty, with Christy Moore's replacement in that band, Brady. The arrangements here are grittier than the earlier band, with Kevin Burke's fiddle replacing the role piper Liam O'Flynn played in the Planxty sound. There are more of the Balkan elements that Irvine had begun to introduce in Planxty, like the 7/8 break that transforms the middle of "The Plains of Kildare." Brady's innovative open-tuned guitar work is highlighted throughout, nowhere more than on his show-stopping "Arthur McBride." But the real magic of this record is the contrast between the voices of the two men. Irvine's bittersweet voice curls around songs like a fog, while Brady's full-throated charge never sounded better than on these recordings.

what to buy next: Rude Awakening ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1991, prod. Bill Whelan) spotlights Irvine's songwriting—a sometimes-rare treat given the focus on his instrumental prowess and traditional singing in settings like Patrick Street. This is a concept album, with Irvine selecting his favorite heroes and anti-heroes to write about. His talent at putting traditional words and music into a contemporary context are still here, both in "James Connolly" and "Allan Mclean"—though on the whole, his heroes are of a more international lot: "Woody Guthrie," "Raoul Wallenberg," "Zapata." The combination of the topical and traditional is reminiscent of Dick Gaughan, someone with whom Irvine had recorded several years earlier.

the rest:

Andy Irvine and Dick Gaughan: Parallel Lines ♪♪♪♪½ (1983, Green Linnet)
Andy Irvine/Davy Spillane: East Wind ♪♪♪♪ (1991, Tara)
Andy Irvine and Dick Gaughan ♪♪♪♪½ (1997, Appleseed)
Rainy Sundays Windy Dreams ♪♪♪♪ (1997, Wundertüte)

shibuya: the japanese underground

Despite an early-'80s fashion craze, a growing cult of manga and anime (Japanese comics and cartoons), and a national love-hate relationship with Yoko Ono (a spiritual godmother of the bands discussed in this essay), Japanese artists haven't fared too well on the U.S. record charts (1963's "Sukiyaki," by Kyu Sakamoto, is their lone #1 hit). However, American and European influences abound in Japan. Most would point to the avant-garde electronic stew of the 1970s' Yellow Magic Orchestra as the starting point of whatever awareness the States had of contemporary Japanese music, but in Japan itself the most popular genre would remain J-Pop, a bland form of balladry fronted by teen idols and TV stars. Since the '80s, though, a steady string of cosmopolitan artists has emerged from the hip quarter of Tokyo known as Shibuya. The best-known include Pizzicato Five, United Future Organization, and Towa Tei, all of whose sounds blend lounge, jazz, and club music into an immediately consumable cocktail that, in its mix if not its ingredients, is uniquely Japanese. The cuddly, infectious pop of Shonen Knife made them the first of the underground bands to make waves Stateside when a string of their albums connected with the college crowd. In the mid-'90s U.S. audiences got their first steady taste of the burgeoning scene when domestic labels like Grand Royal and Matador began releasing the music en masse. The sights and sounds of Shibuya now encompass a vast landscape. From the Phil Spector–esque genius of Cornelius, to the crunchy loud guitars of Buffalo Daughter, to the breezy bossa-rock of Kahimi Karie and Cibo Matto, the Japanese underground is continually making the world its own.

Sam Wick

solo outings:

Sweeneys Men:

Rattlin' & Roarin' Willy ♪♪♪ (Transatlantic, 1968)
Sweeneys Men ♪♪♪½ (Transatlantic, 1968)
Tracks of Sweeney ♪♪♪½ (Transatlantic, 1969)

Legend of Sweeney's Men ♪♪♪♪ (Demon, 1988)

Planxty:
Planxty ♪♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1972)
Well below the Valley ♪♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1973)
Cold Blow and the Rainy Night ♪♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1974)
After the Break ♪♪♪½ (Tara, 1979)
Woman I Loved So Well ♪♪♪½ (Tara, 1980)
Words & Music ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1983)
Planxty Collection ♪♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1986)

Patrick Street:
All in Good Time . . . ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1986)
Patrick Street ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1986)
No. 2 Patrick Street ♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1988)
3 Irish Times 3 ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1990)
Corner Boys ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1996)
Made in Cork ♪♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1997)
Live from Patrick Street ♪♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1999)

influences:
◀◀ Woody Guthrie, Davey Graham, Seamus Ennis
▶▶ The Pogues, Eileen Ivers, Seamus Egan

see also: Kevin Burke, Dick Gaughan, Frankie Gavin, Dónal Lunny, Liam O'Flynn, Patrick Street, Planxty, Maddy Prior, Sweeney's Men, Bill Whelan

Jared Snyder

Gregory Isaacs

Reggae, lovers' rock

Born 1948, in Kingston, Jamaica. Based in Jamaica.

Silken vocals, romantic lyrics, and irresistible reggae rhythms have combined to make Gregory Isaacs the king of "lovers' rock." One of reggae's most prolific artists, Isaacs has recorded over 500 songs and more than 70 albums. According to the St. Louis Dispatch, Isaacs's music "practically massages your whole body into a state of total relaxation." Isaacs cut his first singles as a member of Jamaica-based band the Concords in the late 1960s. Although his debut solo single, "Another Heartache," was on Wirl, a small label owned by former Jamaican prime minister Edward Seaga, Isaacs released most of his 1970s singles on his own labels, African Museum and Cash & Carry. Isaacs's first hints of success came with a series of Alvin Ranglin–produced singles including "My Number One" and the politically edged "The Border." Isaacs's two-volume retrospective, Best Of, features some of these tracks. Following the release of his third album, Extra Classics, which included the minor hits "Rasta Business" and "Loving Pauper," Isaacs joined forces with top-ranked reggae rhythm section/production team Sly (Dunbar) and Robbie (Shakespeare). Over the next few years, the collaboration yielded a string of groundbreaking albums including Sly & Robbie Present Gregory Isaacs and Call Me Collect. After releasing his most commercially successful album, The Night Nurse, in 1987, Isaacs signed with the RAS label and hooked up with producer Gussie Clarke.

what to buy: Isaacs reached his creative apex with the recordings produced by Sly and Robbie for their Taxi label. Several of these tracks, along with Isaacs's 1987 single "I'm Coming Home," are included on Sly & Robbie Present Gregory Isaacs ♪♪♪♪½ (RAS, 1988, prod. Sly Dunbar, Robbie Shakespeare). Spanning Isaacs's recording career, Looking Back ♪♪♪♪ (RAS, 1996, prod. various) features 14 tunes including "Write Myself a Letter," "Loneliness," and "Conversation."

best of the rest:
The Night Nurse ♪♪♪♪ (PGD/Mango, 1987)
The Best of Gregory Isaacs ♪♪♪½ (Music Club, 1988)
Private Beach Party ♪♪♪½ (RAS, 1988)
Call Me Collect ♪♪♪½ (RAS, 1990)
State of Shock ♪♪♪½ (RAS,1992)
Classic Hits, Vol. 2 ♪♪♪½ (Sonic Sound, 1994)
Live in France ♪♪♪½ (Sonic Sound, 1994)
20 Classic Hits ♪♪♪½ (Sonic Sound, 1994)
One Man against the World: The Best of Gregory Isaacs ♪♪♪½ (VP, 1996)
Hard Core Hits ♪♪♪½ (Multimedia, 1997)
Greatest & Latest ♪♪♪½ (Cleopatra, 1998) Live at Maritime Hall ♪♪♪½ (2BL, 1998)

influences:
◀◀ Jackie Edwards, Bob Marley, Toots & the Maytals ▶▶ UB40, Third World

see also: The Congos, Sly & Robbie

Craig Harris

Israel Vibration

Roots reggae

Formed 1976, in Kingston, Jamaica. Based in Kingston, Jamaica.

Cecil "Skeleton" Spence, vocals; Albert "Apple" Craig, vocals; Lascelles "Wiss" Bulgrin, vocals. (All members are from Jamaica.)

The deeply spiritual roots-reggae trio Israel Vibration is still together playing its individualistic Rastafarian take on ghetto life more than 20 years after its debut. Few institutions are this reliable in Jamaica's tradition of one-hit wonders. What is more remarkable is that Israel Vibration's music is as strong today as in reggae's golden age of the '70s.

The story of how Israel Vibration formed is an extraordinary one. At the age of three, Albert Craig woke one day to find his lower body paralyzed. In hospital they told him he had polio—and it was in polio rehab that Craig met his future partners in Israel Vibration. Their paths crossed as they were shuffled between various institutions. At 14 Craig left the confines of Alpha Boys School for a grueling life on the streets where he refused to steal, and got by on scraps of food. Rastafarian Baba Douse provided shelter for Craig in the form of a dray cart in his back yard, and bought the boy his first pair of pants and shoes. Craig's Rasta lyrics were no doubt inspired by Bible readings with the elder.

Meanwhile, as a teen, Cecil Spence was a member of the Jamaican wheelchair basketball team, traveling as far as Germany to represent his country. When Spence grew dreadlocks and adopted the Rasta lifestyle, he was thrown off the team and out of school along with colleague Lascelles Bulgrin. They gathered with Craig where he had holed up in the bush beside a football field on the campus of the University of the West Indies. The trio smoked herb, read from the Bible, and sang in harmony where crowds gathered to hear it, encouraging the as-yet unnamed group to set its singing to record.

The name Israel Vibration was devised by Craig. As he explains, "One day we sit together alongside a building near the bush we lived in, and I say, 'We never hear of a group that disclose the children of God, which is Israel.'" The name stuck, and the trio still records with long-time backing band the Roots Radics. Despite a temporary break-up in the '80s, they have been generating positive vibrations ever since.

what to buy: The best starting point is their now-classic debut The Same Song ♪♪♪♪½ (Talent, 1978/RAS, 1996, prod. Tommy Cowan). An edition on Pressure Sounds adds the rare single "Crisis." For a career overview, check out RAS Portraits ♪♪♪♪ (RAS, 1997, prod. Doctor Dread, Israel Vibration). The band has remained consistently strong long enough to see its rootsical vibe come back into fashion; its latest, Free to Move ♪♪♪♪ (RAS, 1996, prod. Doctor Dread, Israel Vibration), features vivid social messages like "System Not Working" and "Livity in the Hood."

what to buy next: Israel Vibration is a great live band, as is evident on Live Again! ♪♪♪♪ (RAS, 1997, prod. Doctor Dread, Israel Vibration), which features tracks from all but its latest album, recorded at stellar shows in California and Arizona.

what to avoid: Israel Vibration's first two albums are available in reasonably good dub versions by Errol Brown and Paul Davidson. They can be found on one CD as Israel Dub ♪♪♪½ (RAS, 1996, prod. Tommy Cowan). However, the rest of the catalog was remixed by the band's engineer, Jim Fox, whose weak dub skills make the original studio albums a safer bet. Fox's most recent effort to steer clear of is Dub the Rock ♪♪ (RAS, 1995, prod. Doctor Dread, Israel Vibration); earlier ones are Dub Vibration ♪♪ (RAS, 1990, prod. Doctor Dread, Israel Vibration) and I.V.D.U.B. ♪♪ (RAS, 1994, prod. Doctor Dread, Israel Vibration).

best of the rest:
Why You So Craven ♪♪♪ (RAS, 1991)
Vibes Alive ♪♪♪ (RAS, 1993)
Feeling Irie ♪♪♪½ (RAS, 1996)

worth searching for: The Israel Vibration video Reggae in Hollywood (RAS) is worth a look.

influences:
Bob Marley
Buju Banton

see also: The Roots Radics

David Poole

The Itals

Roots reggae

Formed 1976, in Jamaica. Based in Jamaica.

Keith Porter, vocals; Ronnie Davis, vocals (1976–95); Lloyd Ricketts, vocals (1976–85); Donovan Brisset, vocals (1985); Kada, vocals (1997–present). (All members are from Jamaica.)

Rastafarian-inspired lyrics are set to complex but soulful vocal harmonies by roots reggae band the Itals. Although lead singer and songwriter Keith Porter is the only original member still with the group, its vision has remained consistent.

The spark of the Itals was kindled when Porter and vocalist Ronnie Davis sang together in the early-'70s reggae band the Westmorlites. Although the group recorded a single, "Hitey Titey," Davis left to perform with the Tennors, while Porter launched a solo career on Jamaica's rural hotel and small club circuit. Planning to record again, Porter returned to Kingston and fortuitously ran into Davis. Two days later, the duo recorded a single, "In A Dis Ya Time." Encouraged by the results, they agreed to pool their resources. With the addition of a third singer, Lloyd Ricketts, Porter and Davis formed the first incarnation of the Itals (taken from a Jamaican term for "purity" or "lack of pollution"). After recording several singles, the Itals hooked up with the renowned Roots Radics as their backing band (an association which would become frequent throughout their career). Their debut album, Brutal Out Deh, released in 1981, is still their strongest recording.

The Itals hit some legal difficulties when they were sued by a similarly named band from Cleveland, Indiana. After a lengthy court battle, the Jamaican trio was granted ownership of the name, with the Cleveland band morphing into the "Itals U.S.A." In 1985, the Itals underwent their first personnel change when Rickets ran afoul of the law and was arrested and jailed. His replacement, Donovan Brisset, only remained with the group for two months before emigrating to the United States. Porter and what to buy: The Itals' debut album, Brutal Out Deh ♪♪♪♪♪ (Nighthawk, 1982, prod. the Itals, Jodie Pierson), is a harmonic roots reggae masterpiece. In addition to Rastafarian-influenced original songs including "Rastafari Chariot," "Herbs Pirate," and "Smile Knotty Dread," the album includes a unique rendition of Bob Marley's "Time Will Tell." Early Recordings: 1971–1979 ♪♪♪½ (Nighthawk, 1984, prod. the Itals, Lloyd Campbell) surveys the band's groundbreaking singles including "Don't Wake the Lion," "Brutal," "Living in the Ghetto," and the original recording of "Smile Knotty Dread."

Davis continued to perform temporarily as a duo before adding harmony singer Kada in 1997. Although Easy to Catch, released in 1991, and Modern Age, released in 1998, incorporated electric instruments and modern production techniques, the Itals' musical roots remained intact.

the rest:
Give Me Power! ♪♪♪ (Nighthawk, 1983)
Coal & Dread ♪♪♪ (Nighthawk, 1984)
Rasta Philosophy ♪♪♪½ (Nighthawk, 1987)
Easy to Catch ♪♪♪ (Priority, 1991)
Modern Age ♪♪♪½ (RAS, 1998)

influences:
Bob Marley, Peter Tosh

see also: The Roots Radics

Craig Harris

Eileen Ivers

Celtic traditional and experimental

Born 1965, in the Bronx, NY, USA. Based in USA.

No sooner had Eileen Ivers established herself as one of the finest traditional Irish fiddlers of her generation than she transcended that circumscribed field to tour the world, first with Hall & Oates and then with the Riverdance stage musical. Ivers grew up in the Bronx, where she studied with the legendary Irish fiddler Martin Mulvihill; she was only 14 when she first recorded, on an anthology of Mulvihill's students. She went on to win seven All-Ireland Championships on the fiddle, including the coveted Senior Championship in 1984. She was a member of the all-female Irish folk band Cherish the Ladies, and accompanied many of the top Irish-American folk musicians, including Mick Moloney and Seamus Egan. She recorded a duet album with accordionist John Whelan in 1987. In 1990 she was recruited to play on Hall & Oates's Change of Season album, and to accompany them on the subsequent tour. She released her debut solo album in 1993; collaborated with composer Mícheál Ó Sáilleabháin on his Irish TV series River of Sound; joined the New York Celtic rap-rock band Paddy a Go-Go; and became a featured soloist in Riverdance. In every venture, Ivers's trad-fiddle virtuosity has been evident, but she has not been reluctant about combining her Irish roots with African drums, hip-hop rhythms, Broadway orchestration, and anything else that might catch her fancy.

what to buy: The best introduction to Ivers's work is the single-CD anthology So Far: The Eileen Ivers Collection, 1979–1995 ♪♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1997, prod. Kevin Yatarola), which features tracks from both solo albums, the duo album with Whelan, and the Mulvihill School album, as well as her appearances on the Riverdance soundtrack, a Cherish the Ladies album, a multiple-artist concert recording, and Jerry O'Sullivan's The Invasion. It's a wonderfully diverse assemblage of music, but Ivers's surpassing technique and fearless chance-taking are evident throughout. The debut album Eileen Ivers ♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1994, prod. Gabriel Donohue, Eileen Ivers) finds the fiddler in transition between her traditional training and her bold experiments into the future of the Celtic fiddle, and she excels at both.

To hear the experimentation part in full bloom, catch up with Ivers's latest, Crossing the Bridge ♪♪♪½ (Sony Classical, 1999, prod. Brian Keane), on which she realizes much of the Celtic/world fusion she's been hinting at. The huge cast includes regulars John Doyle, Seamus Egan, Jerry O'Sullivan, Joanie Madden, and Tommy Hayes alongside jazz guitarist Al Di Meola, trumpeter Randy Brecker, South African bassist Bakithi Kumalo, drummer Steve Gadd, percussionist Alex Acuña, and many more. There are some exciting tracks here, convincingly mixing Irish music with salsa, hip-hop, jazz, and Spanish forms. Ivers also reunites with Riverdancers Colin Dunne, Maria Pagés, and Tarik Winston—themselves representing three distinct cultures—but like Riverdance composer Bill Whelan, somehow she makes it all work. In addition to the impressive Irish chops she's most famous for, Ivers displays an equal fondness for the fiddle stylings of jazz-fusion pioneer Jean-Luc Ponty and folk-rock veteran/Fairport Convention stalwart Dave Swarbrick in his electric wah-wah peddle mode. On the down side, consistency still isn't her strong suit, and some of the cuts here do meander a bit.

what to buy next: Wild Blue ♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1996, prod. Tom "T-Bone" Wolk, Eileen Ivers) is named after the varnished color and uninhibited sound of Ivers's violin. Ivers experiments with all sorts of drums, bass, and keyboards, but she never loses her foundation in traditional Celtic forms and pure violin tone. Fresh Takes ♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1987, prod. Mick Moloney) is a lovely, all-instrumental album built around the musical dialogues between Ivers's fiddle and John Whelan's button accordion, though the Bothy Band's Triona Ní Dhomhnaill adds synthesizer and clavinet to half the cuts.

Eileen Ivers

3/4/4 jaguares

influences:

◀◀ Martin Mulvihill, Brendan Mulvihill, Eugene O'Donnell

▶▶ Natalie MacMaster

see also: Bothy Band, Máire Breatnach, Cherish the Ladies, Felix Dolan, the Irish Tradition, Joanie Madden, Mick Moloney, Triona Ní Dhomhnaill, Bill Whelan, Paul Winter

Geoffrey Himes

J

Jaguares

See: Caifanes

Jon Jang

Chinese/jazz fusion

Born March 11, 1954, in Los Angeles, CA. Based in USA.

Jon Jang didn't begin playing piano until he was 19, but he must've known where he was headed right from the start. By the time his initial Soul Note recording was released in 1992, he'd done five independently produced albums, and the ideas and/or material for the next two projects were already in place.

what to buy: Of the readily available offerings—that is, those on Soul Note—it's the thematic Tiananmen! ♪♪♪♪♪ (Soul Note, 1993, prod. Jon Jang) that's Jang's towering achievement as of yet. Featuring his medium-sized Pan-Asian Arkestra (named after Horace Tapscott's Pan-Afrikan People's Ark, but spiritually connected to Sun Ra's Arkestra as well), this concert-length piece is a moving tone poem–cum-meditation on the 1989 Chinese student uprising. Instruments drawn from China's folk and classical heritage blend with the more usual Western assortment in creating a rich, earthy, and truly international musical language, with fabulous playing all around.

what to buy next: Self Defense! ♪♪♪♪½ (Soul Note, 1992, prod. Jon Jang), recorded during a 1991 Arkestra recital, is nearly as good as the above recording, with a heaven-storming "Night in Tunisia" and Jang's lengthy, layered "Concerto for Jazz Ensemble and Taiko" as bookended high points. Two Flowers on a Stem ♪♪♪♪½ (Soul Note, 1996, prod. Jon Jang) is a sextet with James Newton, David Murray, Jie-Bing Chen (on erhu or Chinese fiddle), Santi Debriano, and Jabali Billy Hart that's as dense and beautiful as its predecessors; it's centered around "Meditations on Integration" by Charles Mingus, with Newton's flute and Murray's bass clarinet taking the parts of Roland Kirk and Eric Dolphy, respectively. As always, a version of the popular Chinese ballad "Butterfly Lovers Song" is also included.

the rest:

Jang ♪♪♪½ (RPM, 1982)
Are You Chinese or Charlie Chan? ♪♪♪♪ (RPM, 1984)
Island: The Immigrant Suite Number I ♪♪♪½ (Soul Note, 1997)

worth searching for: Jang's albums on the AsianImprov label, which he helped start, have to be searched out. Adding the most to the overall picture are The Ballad or the Bullet ♪♪♪½ (AsianImprov, 1987, prod. Jon Jang, Francis Wong), which is credited to Jon Jang and the 4-in-One Quartet; Jangle Bells ♪♪♪½ (AsianImprov, 1988, prod. Jon Jang); and Never Give Up! ♪♪♪♪ (AsianImprov, 1989, prod. Jon Jang). It may not be an unfair characterization to say these albums are looser and more fun than the increasingly serious Soul Note releases.

influences:

◀◀ Duke Ellington, Charles Mingus, Horace Tapscott's Pan-Afrikan People's Arkestra

▶▶ Fred Ho's Afro-Asian Music Ensemble

see also: Jie-Bing Chen

David Prince

The Japanese Koto Consort

Sankyoku

Formed in Japan. Based in Japan.

Kofu Kikusui (Japan), shakuhachi; Noriko Noda (Japan), kotos, shamisen; Yayoi Nishimura (Japan), kotos.

The Japanese Koto Consort play sankyoku or "music for three instruments"—ensemble pieces for shamisen (a three-stringed banjo-like instrument), koto (a 13-string flat harp), and shakuhachi (bamboo flute). They are students of the Ikuta-ryu, one of the three schools of koto playing, this one using square picks and kotos longer than the usual six-foot size. The songs are of the late-17th-century Edo Period, when the koto began to be played in concert with the shamisen and shakuhachi. Kotos were originally the domain of well-bred, marriage-seeking Japanese girls. All the sankyoku instruments have Chinese prototypes.

what's available: Japanese Koto Consort ♪♪♪♪½ (Lyrichord) features sankyoku and solos of the three instruments. In sankyoku, the shamisen is the dominant part, known as the "bone" of the performance; the koto is the "meat"; and the shakuhachi the "skin." The seven tracks are regal performances, each instrument complementing the others and standing alone as needed. Songs include famous classical pieces such as "Yachiyo Jishi" (also adapted for Kabuki music), the children's song "Kyo No Warabeuta," and several folk songs, among them the well-known folk melody "Kojo No Tsuki." worth searching for: If you enjoy this music, related collections include Gagaku (Lyrichord), title translation: "elegant music," which includes koto performances played the way they were at the Japanese Imperial Court; Japanese Koto Orchestra (Lyrichord); Japanese Masterpieces for Shakuhachi (Lyrichord); and The Soul of the Koto, Vols. 1 and 2 (Lyrichord).

influences:

⏮ Ikuta Kengyo (founder of sankyoku), Kengyo Fujinaga, Kengyo Yoshizawa, Katsuko Tsukushi, Tsutomu Sakamoto, Rentaro Taki

Stacy Meyn

Victor Jara

Chilean nueva canción

Born in Loquen, Chile. Died September 14, 1973, in Santiago, Chile.

At first a seminary student, then a soldier, then an actor and theater director—and before that a young man growing up with a mother who taught him guitar and the folksongs of Chile—Victor Jara became a political songwriter in a time and place when politics was a matter of life and death. The Chile of the late '60s and early '70s was the scene of struggle and change. Jara used his songwriting talent and gentle voice to express concerns of the left-wing people's movement. For this he was brutally murdered by the right-wing military in 1973. The courage shown in his music has gone on to inspire many writers and workers for change since that time.

what's available: It isn't easy to find Jara's music in the United States, though the Plane label is reported to be in the process of issuing a four-disc retrospective to be called Victor Jara Complete that will contain music from many currently scarce albums. The Monitor label has several thematic compilations, some only on tape. On CD there are Te Recuerdo Amanda ♪♪♪½ (Dom, 1998) and Unfinished Song ♪♪♪½ (Redwood, 1990).

influences:

⏮ Violetta Parra, Mercedes Sosa, Armando Tejado Gomez

⏭ Daniel Vigletti, Silvio Rodriguez, Joan Baez, Tish Hinojosa

Kerry Dexter

Wyclef Jean

Hip-hop

Born Nelust Wyclef Jean, 1970, outside Croix-des-Bouquets, Haiti. Based in USA.

When the Fugees dropped The Score in 1996, alternative hip-hop finally got the breakthrough album it had been looking for. But it also got much more. A native of Haiti who grew up in Brooklyn and now operates out of New Jersey, Wyclef Jean burst onto the scene as the architect of the Fugees' sound—as well as of their concept. The band's very name is short for "refugees"; a reference to Haiti's blighted culture, but also to anyone who's ever been cast adrift in the search for hearth and home, literally or figuratively. Each of the group's members has released a solo album, and while Lauryn Hill's hit the biggest and Prakazrel Michael spun his off into a movie project, Jean turned his abilities into a cottage industry. In recent times he's worked as a producer, songwriter, performer, and/or remixer for the likes of Whitney Houston, Canibus, the Neville Brothers, Sparkle, Gloria Estefan, Earth, Wind & Fire, Simply Red, and Carlos Santana, and worked on the South Park soundtrack. Under his own billing, he's also toured his guest-heavy solo album as a kind of world-music impresario. All of a sudden, he seems to be everywhere, and that's not a bad thing.

what's available: Wyclef Jean Presents the Carnival Featuring Refugee Allstars ♪♪♪♪ (Ruffhouse/Columbia, 1997, prod. various) is a straight-up hip-hop album, but the island rhythms of Clef's youth and the highly politicized sentiments of his refugee program weave themselves sinuously throughout. Jean emphasizes street rhymes on "We Tryin' to Stay Alive," but on tracks like "Sang Fézi," "Yelé," and "Jaspora" he raps and sings in the French patois of his homeland. "Gunpowder" addresses the rising tide of violence, and is strongly reminiscent of the work of Jean's hero Bob Marley. There's plenty of nonsense on the album—the skits, and the vapid "To All the Girls"—but there's also the heart-tugging "Gone till November" and "Guantanemera," which features the legendary salsa diva Celia Cruz. Indeed, there's something here for almost everyone.

worth searching for: The Fugees' The Score (Ruffhouse/Columbia, 1996, prod. various) took hip-hop to another level, even as it looked back to heroes such as Bob Marley, whose "No Woman No Cry" the group covers here. Original tracks such as "Fu-Gee-La," "Family Business," and "Ready or Not" show that Jean & Co. learned their lessons well, but have plenty of ideas of their own to offer.

influences:

⏮ Bob Marley, De La Soul, Arrested Development

Daniel Durchholz

Nemours Jean-Baptiste /Ensemble Nemours Jean-Baptiste

Compas direct

Born 1918, in Haiti. Based in Port-au-Prince, Haiti.

With his ardent fans, the founder of the modern compas style (which he called "compas direct"), sax player Nemours Jean-

Baptiste, engaged in a vicious rivalry throughout the 1960s with Webert Sicot, the founder of another French Antillean pop sound, cadence rampa. (By sheerest coincidence, Sicot was a former bandmate of Jean-Baptiste in Conjunto International). This rivalry rose to the level of a national obsession in Haiti and made the Beatles/Stones competition of the same period seem like a gentlemanly squabble. Jean-Baptiste had come up through the orchestras of Port-au-Prince. In 1953 he gathered his own octet for the opening of Aux Calebasses, the newest nightclub of the day in Carrefour (the "red-light district" just outside the city proper). They enjoyed a huge audience, toured America, and opened another club in Port-au-Prince, the Palladium, at which point they took the name Super Ensemble Compas Direct de Nemours Jean-Baptiste, or ENJD for short. By the '80s Jean-Baptiste was blind, broke, and bandless, though a late-decade revival of his so-seminal music helped his fortunes a mite.

what to buy: Musical Tour of Haiti ♪♪♪♪ (Ansonia, prod. Nemours Jean-Baptiste) is, appallingly, the only title available in the United States by this groundbreaking Caribbean artist. That's sort of like citing Shakespeare as a seminal writer, but only having Titus Andronicus as evidence. Like many Caribbean albums from the '60s, the spirit outweighs the sonic niceties like recording balance or horns being in tune, but these songs represent a major revolution in Haitian music. They took the hotel big bands and brought them home, with big rhythms from both Haiti and Cuba. What is most evident are the mind-bending, ultra-catchy hooks built into the horn parts.

what to buy next: Fanatiques Compas (The Mini All-Stars) ♪♪♪♪ (Earthworks/Sterns, 1997, prod. Fred Paul) is not strictly a Nemours Jean-Baptiste album, as the Mini All-Stars—some of Haiti's finest expatriates, led by Fred Paul, co-producer of the groundbreaking Stateside compilation Konbit: Burning Rhythms of Haiti—play the tunes, but Baptiste composed everything. The band is fronted by ENJD vocalists Carlo Claudin and Willy Lacroix, it must be noted, and features the prodigious accordion work of Richard Duroseau ("The Charlie Parker of the Accordion," if you believe the back of the jewel box). Compared to earlier recordings the horns are punchier, the overall sonics worlds better, and the players genuinely sound as if they love this music.

influences:

⏮ Septentrional, Les Jazz des Jeunes, Jazz Guignard, Tipico Cibaeño

⏭ Nearly every band from the Francophone Caribbean in his wake.

Hank Bordowitz

Don Santiago Jimenez

Norteño, conjunto, Tex-Mex

Born April 25, 1919, in San Antonio, TX, USA. Died December 18, 1984, in San Antonio, TX, USA.

Simply put, Don Santiago Jimenez, along with Narciso Martinez, virtually invented the style of conjunto music popular today. Indigenous to South Texas, this conjunto combines elements of the European music enjoyed by early Texas immigrants with native Mexican rancheras (urban songs) and other norteño (Northern Mexican) forms. Jimenez started playing the accordion at the age of 10, learning from his father, Patricio, a popular accordionist around San Antonio. Santiago accompanied his father when he played at dances and parties throughout South Texas. To please his fans—descendants of German and Moravian immigrants—Patricio performed the waltzes, mazurkas, and polkas they loved from their homeland. The exposure to this variety of music helped form the basis of the style and sound Santiago was to later develop.

A quick read on the two-button accordion, Santiago, nicknamed "El Flaco" (the skinny one), began playing professionally by the 1930s, cutting records and performing live on the radio in South Texas; by the 1940s, he was famous throughout the Southwest. Because of his success, other conjunto accordionists throughout the region began to copy his unique style. Not content to just play the classic tunes from his father's era, Santiago became a gifted songwriter as well, the first to combine classic ranchera duet singing with the polka beat of his two-button accordion. Most of his own compositions are considered classics today. They include "La Dueña de la Llave," "El Primer Beso," "Ay Te Dejo en San Antonio," and "Margarita, Margarita," among others. This blending of old and new became the foundation of present-day conjunto. Another element that set Santiago's style apart was his very use of the old-fashioned two-button; even later on, when most of his contemporaries and younger players were using the three-button version, Santiago continued with the trusty model he'd used to revolutionize the music.

Throughout the 1940s and 1950s Santiago recorded and performed extensively. In the 1970s he went into semi-retirement and moved to Dallas, playing music only occasionally. In 1978 he moved back to San Antonio, playing a regular weekly gig until his death in 1984. Santiago passed down his estimable musical gifts to his two sons, both influential and talented in their own right. Flaco Jimenez is perhaps the most famous of all contemporary conjunto accordion players today, updating the sound to include rock, country, R&B, and blues. His list of collaborators is extensive and includes Ry Cooder, Linda Ronstadt, Stephen Stills, and Los Lobos. Today he is a member of the Tex-Mex band the Texas Tornados, which includes Freddie Fender, Doug Sahm, and Augie Meyers. Santiago Jimenez Jr. is the more traditional of the two siblings. His playing is more reminiscent of his father, with a repertoire leaning toward the classic style.

what to buy: Don Santiago Jimenez, His First and Last Recordings: 1937 & 1979 ♪♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1994, prod. Chris Strachwitz) is a must for fans of classic Tex-Mex music. The first dozen cuts of this 25-song disc were recorded in 1979 in San Antonio, and, indeed, ended up being Santiago's last recordings. He plays accordion and sings, and is accompanied by son Flaco on bajo sexto (12-string bass guitar) and vocals, and by Juan Viesca on string bass. The exuberance here is evident as father and son play and sing classics like "La Dueña De La Llave," "Ere Un Encanto," "Los Gallineros" and "Antonia De Mis Amores." The second half of the disc is composed of songs culled from Don Santiago's early recordings, circa 1937–38. Although the selections were pulled from old 78s, the music sounds as vital and energetic as that recorded 40 years later. (It's interesting to note that like most accordion players of the time, Don Santiago did not sing: the music was played for dancing.) Mostly polkas, the early cuts include "Dices Pescao," "La Tunas," "Marfa, Gran Polka Moderna," and "Las Madera."

worth searching for: Once again, since he did most of his recording more than 40 years ago on now-defunct small labels, you'll have do some digging to find records by this master. Aside from First and Last Recordings, Arhoolie offers several excellent compilations of artists from the early accordionists to the conjuntos popular today. Two featuring Don Santiago Jimenez, Narciso Martinez, and other seminal figures are Mexican American Border Music Volume III: Norteño & Tejano Accordion Pioneers (reviewed in this book's Compilations section), and Tex-Mex Fiesta.

influences:

- Patricio Jimenez

- Flaco Jimenez, Santiago Jimenez Jr., Esteban "Steve" Jordon, Los Lobos, countless others.

see also: Flaco Jimenez, Santiago Jimenez Jr., Los Lobos, Narciso Martinez, Texas Tornados

Andrew BeDell

Flaco Jimenez

Conjunto, norteño, Tex-Mex fusion

Born March 11, 1939, in San Antonio, TX, USA. Based in Texas, USA.

The undisputed king of conjunto music and son of the influential Don Santiago Jimenez, Flaco Jimenez is a squeezebox master who plays a rousing mix of American folk and country and Mexican rancheras and polkas. In addition to his own records, his colorful accordion work and straightforward vocals have graced albums by Ry Cooder (who helped introduce Jimenez to the rest of America), the Mavericks, Dwight Yoakam, and the Rolling Stones. A Tex-Mex music veteran of more than three decades, Jimenez has branched out into American country both as a solo act and as a member of the Texas Tornados alongside Freddy Fender, Doug Sahm, and Augie Meyers. Some of Jimenez's many Grammys have been with that outfit, all four members of which were also involved in 1998's instant-sensation Latin-rock all-star project Los Super Seven—which, in turn, snagged Jimenez one of two additional Grammys in 1999 alone.

what to buy: Jimenez's most accessible solo work has been with Arista Texas, which released his best Tex-Mex album, Flaco Jimenez ♪♪♪ (Arista Texas, 1994, prod. Bill Halverson). It includes the Grammy-winning "Cat Walk" and features contributions from the Mavericks' Raul Malo, as well as from country music stars Lee Roy Parnell and Radney Foster.

what to buy next: Buena Suerte, Senorita ♪♪♪ (Arista, 1996, prod. Cameron Riddle, Flaco Jimenez) leans more heavily toward updating the Mexican side of his music. The rollicking Partners ♪♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1992, prod. Bill Halverson) features some big-name friends, including Linda Ronstadt, Emmylou Harris, Dwight Yoakam, and Los Lobos.

the rest:

El Senido de San Antonio ♪♪½ (Arhoolie, 1980)
Ay Te Dejo en San Antonio y Mas ♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1986)
Flaco's Amigos ♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1987)
Arriba el Norte ♪♪½ (Rounder, 1988)
Entre Humor & Batellas ♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1989)
San Antonio Soul ♪♪½ (Rounder, 1991)
Un Mojado sin Licencia (A Wetback without a Green Card) ♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1993)
Flaco's First ♪♪½ (Arhoolie, 1995)
One Night at Joey's N/A (Sony Discos, 1999)

influences:

- Don Santiago Jimenez

- Ry Cooder, Doug Sahm

see also: Ry Cooder, Don Santiago Jimenez, Los Fabulosos Cadillacs, Los Super Seven, Texas Tornados

Doug Pullen

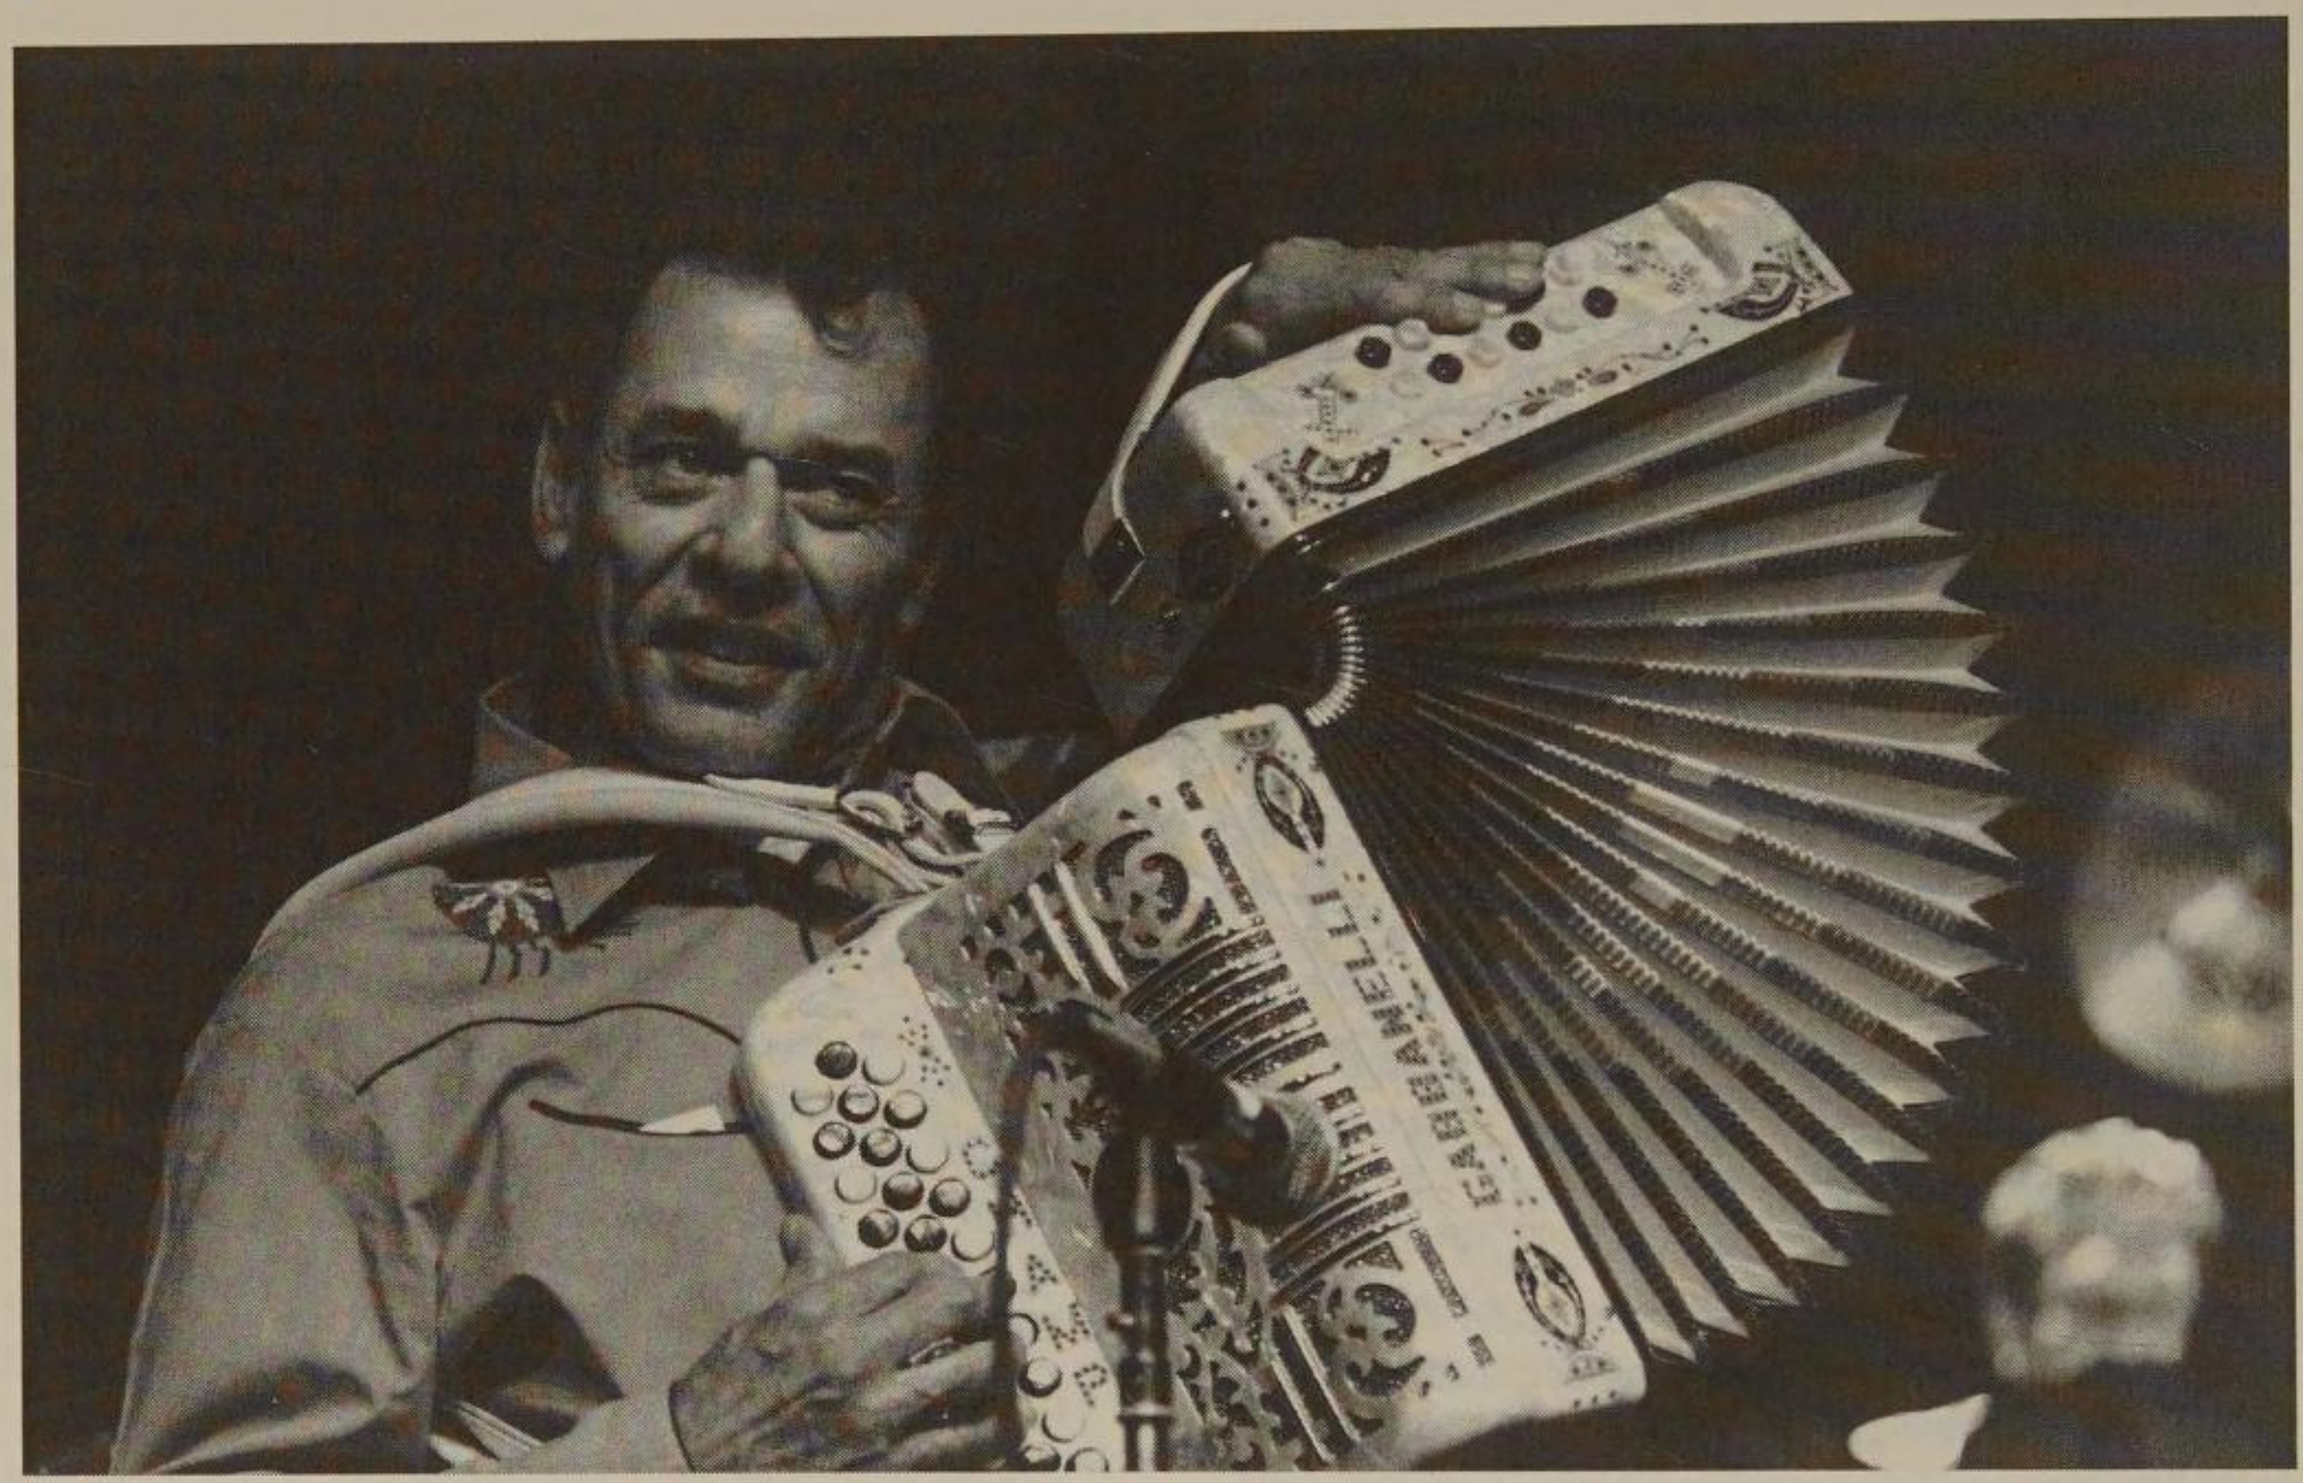
Santiago Jimenez Jr.

Conjunto, norteño

Born April 8, 1944, in San Antonio, TX, USA. Based in San Antonio, TX, USA.

Santiago Jimenez Jr. is surrounded by greatness on the family tree. First there's his father, Don Santiago Jimenez, one of the greatest conjunto (Tex-Mex) accordionists in San Antonio's history and the person for whom the younger Jimenez was named. Then there's his older brother, Leonardo "Flaco" Jimenez, a world-renowned accordionist who has played with everyone from Ry Cooder to the Texas Tornados. While Flaco is considered an innovator within the genre, bringing rock and blues elements to a conjunto setting, Santiago Jr. (also an accordionist) upholds the tradition by playing his father's compositions and advocating for the rancheras, polkas, and huapangos of an earlier era. Santiago started his recording career in the early 1960s, cutting 45 rpm discs for regional companies like Corona, Lira, Del Bravo, Discos Grandes, and D.L.B. He also worked as a school janitor before jumping into the music profession full-time in 1981. He has since toured North America and Europe, been nominated for two Grammy Awards, and received funding from the National Endowment for the Arts and the Texas Folklife Resources organization, enabling him to pass on his experiences and love for the music he plays to yet another generation.

santiago jimenez jr.



Santiago Jimenez Jr.

what to buy: El Mero, Mero de San Antonio ♪♪♪♪½ (Arhoolie, 1990, compilation prod. Chris Strachwitz) should be on the shortlist of classic, "old-style" conjunto recordings. Jimenez's vocals are strong throughout and his playing on the two-row accordion is fluid, rolling over the songs' bones like a river of chords and single-note runs. Juan Viesca, the tololoche (string bass guitar) player who used to perform with the senior Jimenez and in the Trio San Antonio alongside the great accordionist Fred Zimmerle, adds just the right mix of virtuosity and authenticity to Jimenez Jr.'s recording. "California Polka" is a case in point, as accordion flurries swirl over popping basslines and a steady, rhythmic underpinning from the unnamed bajo sexto (12-string bass guitar) player.

what to buy next: Most of Jimenez's albums feature his singing over his playing, but Purely Instrumental ♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1998, prod. Chris Strachwitz) puts Jimenez the accordionist at center stage, where he acquits himself well. Bassist Mark Rubin (of the Bad Livers) anchors the record, while Hugo Gonzalez (bajo sexto) and Rufus Martinez (drums) help make up one of the best bands Jimenez has had since the Viesca days. The junior Jimenez's most direct tribute to Jimenez senior, Canciones de Mi Padre ♪♪♪♪ (Watermelon, 1994, prod. Santiago Jimenez Jr.) is an old-fashioned trio date with accordion, bajo sexto, and tololoche playing tunes written by his father. It's also his very first self-produced album.

best of the rest:
Familia y Tradicíon ♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1989)
El Gato Negro ♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1990)
Corazón de Piedra ♪♪♪½ (Watermelon, 1992)
Musica de Tiempos Pasados, del Presente, y Futuro ♪♪♪½ (Watermelon, 1995)
Al Mirar Tu Cara ♪♪♪½ (Hacienda, 1998)
Corridos de La Frontera ♪♪♪½ (Watermelon, 1998)

influences:
◀◀ Don Santiago Jimenez, Fred Zimmerle, Juan Lopez, Narciso Martinez

▶▶ Ben Tavera King, Carl Finch

see also: Don Santiago Jimenez, Flaco Jimenez

Garaud MacTaggart

Antonio Carlos Jobim

Bossa nova

Born January 25, 1927, in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. Died December 8, 1994, in New York, NY, USA.

Antonio Carlos Jobim has had a tremendous influence on the development of Brazilian jazz both in the United States and around the globe. Classically trained and a musician since childhood, Jobim started recording in 1954 with a 78 rpm release on Brazil's Continental label. Gifted as a composer and proficient as a guitarist, pianist, and vocalist, Jobim—originally bound for a career as an architect—gained a high profile in his home country when singer João Gilberto released a single of Jobim's "Chega de Saudade" in 1958. By the early 1960s, collaborating with Gilberto and others—like Luiz Bonfá and Vinicius de Moraes, with whom he earned an international reputation in 1959 for the soundtrack to Orfeo Negro (Black Orpheus)—Jobim became the leading force of a new trend in music. Not content to simply reiterate the sounds of the popular samba, Jobim distilled the style, toning down its loud and brash qualities and adding harmonic and melodic complexity. One of his main inspirations at the time came from America's West Coast cool-jazz sounds being created by musicians like Chet Baker and Gerry Mulligan. Jobim's music was also augmented by the harmonic sensibilities of French classical composer Claude Debussy, and from this hybrid of influences came what was called the bossa nova or "new wave." As the growing Brazilian record industry began to export to the United States, Jobim's music started attracting the attention of jazz artists like Charlie Byrd, who first heard the bossa nova sound while on tour in Brazil in 1961 and upon his return recorded an album with Stan Getz that included Jobim's "Desafinado." Although Jobim included "The Girl from Ipanema" on his own 1963 Verve album The Composer of Desafinado Plays, it is the vocal version featuring Astrud Gilberto on the 1964 Stan Getz/João Gilberto record Getz/Gilberto that remains the most popular rendition. Jobim's invitation to be included in a showcase of Brazilian musicians in New York City in 1962 gained him international recognition and helped catapult him to stardom as the leader of the new musical movement. Byrd and Getz became big fans of the musical style and recorded many of Jobim's compositions in the early 1960s. Countless other jazz artists continue to perform and record Jobim compositions, and his ineradicable contributions continue even after his death.

what to buy: The Man from Ipanema ♪♪♪♪♪ (Verve, 1995, prod. Creed Taylor) is a deluxe three-CD set that covers the best of Jobim's career, especially such classics as "Desafinado," "Corcovado," "The Girl from Ipanema," "Dindi," and others. The first disc is made up of vocal works, the second features instrumentals, and the third contains numerous alternate takes on many of his most popular tunes. This is an essential collection that includes a 60-page booklet with biographical information as well as an interview with the artist. Lovingly assembled, it's a treat for both the ears and eyes. Volume 13: Verve Jazz Masters ♪♪♪♪ (Verve, 1993, prod. various) is a briefer introduction to Jobim's oeuvre distilled onto one CD, yet provides another excellent introduction to his music.

what to buy next: The Composer of Desafinado Plays ♪♪♪ (Verve, 1963, prod. Creed Taylor) is Jobim's original album featuring "The Girl from Ipanema" (sans Astrud Gilberto's vocals). Smooth, slick, and brimming with the hallmarks of Jobim's ideas, Wave ♪♪♪♪ (A&M, 1967/1989, prod. Creed Taylor) and Tide ♪♪♪♪ (A&M, 1970/1996, prod. Creed Taylor) are two albums almost always considered as a pair. Urubu ♪♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1976/1996, prod. Claus Ogerman) is an often-overlooked album, yet it's a showcase for Jobim's more serious music, featuring arrangements by producer Ogerman.

best of the rest:
Stone Flower ♪♪♪½ (CTI, 1971/Sony, 1990)
Terra Brasilis ♪♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1980/1996)
Passarim ♪♪♪½ (Verve, 1987)
Personalidade ♪♪♪½ (Verve, 1987/1993)
Antonio Carlos Jobim: Composer ♪♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1996)

worth searching for: Francis Albert Sinatra & Antonio Carlos Jobim ♪♪♪♪♪½ (Reprise, 1967/1988, prod. Sonny Burke) pairs Jobim with the Chairman of the Board. It's a divine album, falling short of perfection only because it clocks in at a measly 28:33.

influences:

⏮ Gerry Mulligan, Chet Baker

⏭ Stan Getz, Charlie Byrd, Cal Tjader, Sergio Mendes, Herbie Mann, Flora Purim, Airto Moreira

see also: Luiz Bonfá, Astrud Gilberto, João Gilberto, Herbie Mann

Chris Meloche and Nancy Ann Lee

Beau Jocque

Zydeco

Born Andrus Espre, 1956, in Kinder, LA, USA. Died September 10, 1999, in Kinder, LA, USA.

Beau Jocque was a big man with a big voice and a taste for tight, funky music. When an industrial accident left him partially paralyzed in 1987, he learned to play his father's button accordion during his 10-month recovery. He found himself drawn to the hypnotic music of Boozoo Chavis. Jocque used Chavis's one-chord vamps as the launchpad for a more modern style with a more contemporary beat. This combination of the most primitive Creole sounds with the most up-to-date rhythms created a sensation that is still reverberating in Louisiana and beyond. Dance floors were filled to overflowing when Beau Jocque played, and every other band jumped in to try and create their version of his sound. The Beau Jocque revolution cut as wide a swath across the zydeco landscape as Sherman's army burning their way to the sea—only this march met with no resistance.

what to buy: Pick Up on This! ♪♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1994, prod. Scott Billington) gives the full effect of the Beau Jocque style without too much of his more current rock and hip-hop influences. Those qualities are here, but so is a real Creole Louisiana sound. Imagine a van carrying the old Sugar Hill rhythm section of Keith LeBlanc and Doug Wimbish getting lost on their way to the jazz festival and ending up at Beau Jocque's door as he's preparing to put his band together. Whether Jocque was responsible for the double bass beat that became his trademark, or the super-deep slinky bass of Chuck Bush, both are clearly identified as part of the patented sound. Producer Billington understands this and jacks up Chuck Bush's five-string bass unlike any zydeco record made before that time. "Give It to Me" starts with the band deep in the minor-key, double-clutched groove and Beau Jocque sounding like he and Mahlathini have genetically identical vocal chords. The process repeats itself song after song, even on the relatively straight blues of "Do Right Sometime" and the waltz "Chere Migonne." This record will leave the dancers completely worn out and ready to put their feet up. Beau Jocque Boogie ♪♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1993, prod. Scott Billington) is the groundbreaking record that started the Beau Jocque phenom in zydeco country. From the opening beat of "Richard's Club," this record just sounded different from what had been around before. "Give Me Cornbread" was the first big Beau Jocque hit and lead to him being obligingly pelted with the golden snack at some of the local festivals. "Damballah" may be the first zydeco tribute to a Haitian Vodou god ever recorded—okay, maybe just the best-known! And then there's Check It Out, Lock It Up, Crank It Out ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1998, prod. Scott Billington). Yeah, he's portrayed as a dancehall superhero on the cover and he's playing the kind of five-row button accordion normally reserved for romantic Russian music—he's still Beau Jocque, so look out! His penchant for covering oldies continues with South Louisiana jukebox favorites like "Tequila" and "Tighten Up," but yesterday or today this may be the tightest band in the whole country, and the disc is just packed with groove-filled music.

the rest:

My Name Is Beau Jocque ♪♪♪ (Paula/Flyright, 1995)
Nursery Rhyme ♪♪♪ (Beau Jocque, 1995)
Get It, Beau Jocque ♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1995)
Gonna Take You Downtown ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1996)
Beau Jocque & the Zydeco Hi-Rollers ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1997)

influences:

⏮ Amédée Ardoin, Alphonse "Bois Sec" Ardoin, Boozoo Chavis

⏭ Keith Frank, Chris Ardoin, Geno Delafose

see also: Boozoo Chavis

Jared Snyder

Linton Kwesi Johnson

Dub poetry

Born August 24, 1952, in Chapelton, Jamaica. Based in Brixton, England.

Linton Kwesi Johnson, or "LKJ" as he is more familiarly known to his fans, was born poor and grew up on his grandmother's farm in the Jamaican countryside. He learned how to read by studying the Bible with his grandmother, and had his heart set on becoming a writer from an early age. When he was 11 years old he went to live with his mother in the ghetto of Brixton, where he still lives and works. In 1963 Britain was in upheaval with labor strikes, the advent of the fascist National Front and the Black Power movement, and the first rumblings of worldwide youth uprising. Johnson dropped out of high school because of the racism that surrounded him, although later in life he returned to the University of London and earned a degree in sociology.

"I experimented with prose, but verse seemed more powerful," Johnson explained. "I discovered The Souls of Black Folk by W. E. B. DuBois and, through John Leroux (a Trinidadian publisher and radical political thinker), black writers from all over the world. That made me want to explore the experiences of my generation, black youths who were growing up in racist British society." Johnson joined the British Black Panther Youth League and organized a writer's workshop. When he performed his poems, people told him they were powerfully rhythmic and suggested that he put them to music. Inspired by the Last Poets, he began working with a Rasta drum group calling themselves Rasta Love.

In 1974 Johnson published his first book of poetry, Voices of the Living and the Dead. His second book, Dread Beat and Blood, got rave reviews that praised him as an important new voice. Since he was describing the experiences of the black West Indian underclass, Johnson used their own language, a patois that had little to do with the King's English, but was undeniably powerful. The crowds at his readings began to grow rapidly; Johnson also read his poems on BBC-TV to further raves. In the late 1970s Johnson started working with Dennis Bovell, already a force in British reggae due to his work with his band Matumbi. Matumbi had provided backing tracks for a number of lover's rock and roots reggae artists, and scored several hits on its own. After some original members split, Bovell reconfigured the group as Dennis Bovell & the Dub Band and began an ongoing partnership with Johnson. Their first collaboration, also titled Dread Beat and Blood, virtually created a new genre—dub poetry—by matching Johnson's revolutionary rhetoric with Bovell's equally inventive rhythms. "I first called it dub poetry during a newspaper interview," Johnson recalled. "What the DJs [rappers] were doing was improvised poetry, spontaneous expressions of culture." Since Bovell was born in Barbados, his reggae visions were not limited by traditional Jamaican notions of what the music should sound like, and he brought many international flourishes to the settings he and Johnson created for Johnson's poems, including jazz, ska, calypso, blues, and rock.

Bovell and Johnson's second collaboration, Forces of Victory, was a quantum leap forward, both musically and lyrically, a blistering attack on British racism that galvanized the new generation of white punks as well as the new generation of militant black youth. Johnson followed Forces of Victory with three more hard-hitting albums, but as dancehall reggae slowly began to gain dominance he cut back his touring and recording to produce and promote new artists on his LKJ label and self-publish his poetry.

what to buy: Independent Intavenshan: The Island Anthology ♪♪♪♪ (Island, 1998, prod. Dennis Bovell, LKJ) is a solid anthology of Johnson's best work for Island, including most of Forces of Victory and Bass Culture as well as tracks from LKJ in Dub and Making History.

what to buy next: Dread Beat and Blood ♪♪♪♪ (Heartbeat, 1981, prod. LKJ, Dennis Bovell), first released in Great Britain in 1978, created dub poetry and is still a chilling musical and political statement almost 20 years later.

the rest:
Forces of Victory ♪♪♪♪ (Island, 1979)
Bass Culture ♪♪♪½ (Island, 1980)
LKJ in Dub ♪♪♪ (Island, 1980)
Making History ♪♪♪♪ (Island, 1984)

influences:
Dillinger, U Roy, I Roy

Mutabaraka, Michael Smith, Jean Binta Breeze

see also: Oku Onuora, Benjamin Zephaniah

j. poet

The Johnstons

See: Mick Moloney

Jolly Boys

Mento, calypso

Formed 1935, in Port Antonio, Jamaica. Based in Port Antonio, Jamaica.

Moses Deans (Jamaica), banjo, vocals; Noel Howard (Jamaica), guitar, vocals; Joseph Bennet (Jamaica), rumba box, vocals; Allan Swymmer (Jamaica), lead vocals, bongos.

If they ever give a Grammy for longevity and perseverance, Jamaica's Jolly Boys will win it without a contest. They play a rootsy brand of folk music called mento, and they've been at it since even before the late '40s (when they first became world-famous as the house band at the extravagant parties Errol Flynn threw in their hometown of Port Antonio). Mento refers not only to the music, but also to the dance that is done with it, and the lyrical style of dealing with topical situations in a satirical or humorous way. (Many folkloric scholars are looking for the common root that they feel links mento with Trinidad's calypso tradition.) Although they're not "boys" (guitarist Noel Howard is the youngest at 49, while the surviving original member of the band, banjo player Moses Deans, admits to 72), the Jolly Boys' sound is youthful, or more accurately, timeless. The music, a mix of calypso, Jamaican folk, and the jazz and R&B sounds the band has picked up from the recordings of tourists, is anchored by booming funde drumming and the African percussion of the group's rumba box—a suitcase-sized kalimba, or thumb piano—and driven by the band's tinkling Jamaican folk guitar and banjo licks, as well as Allan Swymmer's rum and honey vocals. For the past 20 years or so, the Jolly Boys have played six nights a week at the Trident Hotel in Port Antonio for the amusement of the international jet set. This exposure has honed the band's music to a fine edge; they play like a single entity with a seamless professionalism that's slick and funky at the same time.

In 1986 singer/songwriter Jules Shear was vacationing in Port Antonio; he heard the Jolly Boys and was blown away. A few months later he was back with a two-track DAT machine in hand to record the tapes that became Pop 'n' Mento. The album did unexpectedly well and by the time Shear went back to the island to talk about a second one, the Jolly Boys could even afford new guitar strings. "They make a living," Shear says, "and have the respect of the community, but by our standards they're not wealthy by any means. When I was down there they showed me a technique they have for tying broken guitar strings together, 'cause, as they say, 'Strings are very dear, mon.'" This time Shear brought the band to New York City, and while the sound of their second album Sunshine 'n' Water may be 'cleaner,' it's no less funky. "We did 20 tunes in four hours," Shear said, "all on the first take, so the spontaneity is still there."

Esteban "Steve" Jordan

what's available: The Jolly Boys make a living playing for tourists, so although the music is down-home funky and steeped in tradition, it's also bright and user-friendly. Many of the tunes on Pop 'n' Mento ♪♪♪♪ (First Warning, 1989, prod. Jules Shear) will be familiar to lovers of calypso and Caribbean folk, with most of the material heavy on the double entendres. Sunshine 'n' Water ♪♪♪ (First Warning, 1991, prod. Jules Shear) is another worthwhile purchase.

influences:

⏮ Blind Blake, Growling Tiger, Attila the Hun

⏭ Sparrow, Explainer, Ras Michael & the Sons of Negus, Lord Melody

j. poet

Esteban "Steve" Jordan

Conjunto, Tejano

Born 1938, in Elson, TX, USA. Based in South Texas, USA.

Among modern accordionists performing in the major Tex-Mex styles of conjunto and Tejano, perhaps none have been more innovative or accomplished than Esteban Jordan. While in his teens in the late 1950s, Jordan made traditional conjunto music with his brothers, Bonnie and Silver. Throughout the 1960s Los Hermanos Jordan cut several singles for regional labels such as Cima and Falcon. Once called the Jimi Hendrix of the accordion, Jordan freely improvised, introducing phase-shifters and other guitar-oriented electronica previously unused in Tex-Mex music, let alone on the button accordion. Nicknamed "El Parche" for the patch he wears over one eye, Jordan, with his shaggy hair flying, looks the part of the rocker, flailing away on his keyboard. With his respect for the traditional music of the border and his innovations in the modern realm, you might better compare Jordan to Keith Richards of the Rolling Stones—who, like Jordan, returns to his roots (in Richards's case, the blues) to find new inspiration. Today, Jordan remains wildly popular on the conjunto circuit and at festivals throughout the Southwest.

what to buy: The Many Sounds of Steve Jordan ♪♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1990, prod. Chris Strachwitz) captures El Parche and his conjunto (which is also Spanish for "group") at their best. The CD covers Jordan's career from his traditional treatment of rancheras and polkas of the early '60s to his more rocking cuts of the '70s and beyond. Among the 20 cuts is Jordan's classic "El Corrido de Jhonny El Pachuco," as well as "Midnight Blues," "Las Coronelas," and a wild cover of Buck Owens's "Together Again." Jordan's then-wife Virginia Martinez joins on vocals for many of the early cuts.

what to buy next: Both El Huracan ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1989) and Return of El Parche ♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1984) offer about a dozen cuts apiece culled from recordings made by Jordan during the late '70s and into the mid-'80s. Both offer many tunes not included on The Many Sounds of Steve Jordan.

worth searching for: Jordan has cut many, many records throughout his long career, recording on at least seven labels. Fans in the Southwest, especially in South Texas and Southern California, should have no trouble finding Jordan's 45s and LPs in mainstream Latin record shops. Others may have to dig a little deeper.

influences:

⏮ Narciso Martinez, Don Santiago Jimenez, Valerio Longoria

⏭ La Mafia, Los Palominos, Los Lobos, Emilio Navaira

Andrew BeDell

slack-key guitar

Slack-key is an indigenous Hawaiian style of finger-picking solo acoustic guitar, the name of which refers to the instrument's open tunings (in the native Hawaiian tongue, slack-key is called ki ho' alu, literally, "loosen the key"). The tunings, though usually based in major chords, vary from player to player and may be kept secret. Slack-key developed from the Hawaiian cowboy tradition, after other cowboys (or "vaqueros") from Mexico, California, Spain, Portugal, and many South American countries introduced the guitar—and the Western concept of melody—to the islands during the 1830s. The guitar as a solo instrument came into its own in Hawaii in the 1940s and '50s with the recordings of such artists as Gabby Pahinui and Sonny Chillingworth, and gained further prominence in the '70s as those guitarists influenced a new generation of players. The selection of slack-key albums available on the mainland is still limited, with the easiest to find coming from pianist George Winston's Dancing Cat label, which began recording some of the best contemporary practitioners, including Keola Beamer and George Kuo, in 1994.

see also: Keola Beamer, Sonny Chillingworth, George Kahumoku, Moses Kahumoku, Rev. Dennis Kamakahi, Ray Kane, George Kuo, Leonard Kwan, Gabby Pahinui, the Pahinui Brothers

Brian Mansfield

Joyce

Brazilian jazz

Born January 31, 1948, in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. Based in Brazil.

The Brazilian jazz vocalist/guitarist widely known only as Joyce has been thrilling audiences in her native country for 30 years. She's also a composer whose more than 200 original jazz/samba songs have been recorded by popular countrymen and women such as Milton Nascimento, Flora Purim, and the late Elis Regina. Joyce began her career in the late 1960s with a self-titled debut album for Philips. Writing songs from a feminist perspective in Brazil's repressive political climate probably slowed her growing popularity in the 1970s, but still she prevailed during two decades of stifling military dictatorship, when every recording had to be reviewed and approved by government censors. After a couple of albums she left Philips to front the short-lived group "A Tribo" with Nelson Angelo, Toninho Horta, Novelli, and Nana Vasconcelos, releasing one album for EMI. In 1975 a European tour with Vinicius de Moraes (co-composer with Antonio Carlos Jobim of the Brazilian classic "Girl from Ipanema") led to extended stays in Europe and the United States before Joyce returned to Brazil in 1978. She signed a new contract with EMI in 1980, releasing her personal favorite album, Feminina, which contained the hit lullaby "Clareana," a dedication to her daughters that has become a national classic in her native country. The album was released 15 years later in England and Japan, where Joyce retains popularity among jazz/dance club fans. Throughout the 1980s and 1990s Joyce continued to record, including the self-produced 1984 album Tardes Cariocas, which was chosen as "Album of the Year" in Brazil and was later reissued worldwide in 1997. Her popularity in Brazil led to a record contract with Verve USA in 1990. Her first release for them, Music Inside, brought Joyce wider recognition up north, as did the follow-up Language and Love, while tours of Europe, Japan, and the States in 1994 heightened her international profile even further. Ilha Brasil followed; like many musicians who believe that recording with a string orchestra somehow elevates their original compositions, Joyce considers this 1996 album one of her best works. In 1997 the U.K.-based Mr. Bongo Records released a retrospective, The Essential Joyce: 1970–1996. Her 20th album as leader, Astronauta: Songs of Elis was recorded in New York for Blue Jackel in 1998. Like predecessors such as Astrud Gilberto, Purim, and Regina, Joyce is one of the few contemporary Brazilian singers who possess natural jazz sensibilities. It's unfortunate for fans that only about half of her albums are available in the United States.

what to buy: For the best introduction to Joyce, the chronological compilation The Essential Joyce 1970–1996 ♪♪♪♪½ (Mr. Bongo, 1997, compilation prod. Bongo) is a most fulfilling listen. The 23 tracks, recorded for EMI-U.K., Pointer, and other labels, span Joyce's career from the age of 19, demonstrating her versatility in beautiful melodies, catchy rhythms, and tantalizing original songs (including her lullaby classic "Clareana" and her spirited "Samba de Gago"). With various (unlisted) accompanists, the more than 76 minutes of music provide an appealing overview of one of Brazil's favorite divas. This is a must-own import CD and if you can't find it in your local record store, you'll find it online at several CD-sales Web sites. Joyce's label debut for the Huntington, New York–based Blue Jackel, Astronauta: Songs of Elis ♪♪♪♪½ (Blue Jackel, 1998, prod. Kazuo Yoshida, Rodolfo Stroeter) is a graceful dedication to the late Elis Regina. On the 14 songs, Joyce embraces the singer's memory with tender, velvety vocals and roşy-toned acoustic guitar accompaniment. Ranging from traditional bossa nova to pop-oriented Musica Popular Brasileira ("Brazilian Popular Music" or "MPB"), the tunes highlight lively, swaying Brazilian classics by composers Milton Nascimento, Ary Barroso, Dori Caymmi, Nelson Motta, and Gilberto Gil as well as two Joyce originals and more songs Regina made famous during the '60s and '70s. Among the featured instrumentalists are Romero Lubambo (guitar), Rodolfo Stroeter (bass), Tutty Moreno (drums), Joe Lovano (saxophone), and pianists Mulgrew Miller and Renee Rosnes. The album is a more somber affair than Joyce's others, yet a heartwarming listen nonetheless.

what to buy next: A buoyant 14-song session and among Joyce's most jazzy, Ilha Brasil ♪♪♪♪ (Capitol, 1996, prod. Kazuo Yoshida) finds the singer backed by an array of talented Brazilian musicians in settings that include full orchestra and (usually) her Quarteto Livre, a modern group highly conversant in both jazz and Brazilian music. Featuring pianist Mozar Terra, drummer Tutty Moreno, bassist Sizão Machado, and Teco Cardoso playing reeds and flutes, the Livre (and various guests) support Joyce with innovative flair on this album, which straddles the fence between improvised jazz and Brazilian themes. In fact, but for Joyce singing in Portuguese, the straight-ahead jazz piece "Sexy Silvia" is reminiscent of a chic, swinging tune by Diane Schuur. One of the prettiest songs, "Viola de Prata," features Joyce with only piano and guitar accompaniment. This CD is a widely diverse, satisfying showcase for Joyce's original music, and a hip affair that blends the best of both worlds.

best of the rest:
Music Inside ♪♪♪½ (Verve Forecast, 1990)
Language & Love ♪♪♪½ (Verve Forecast, 1991)
Sings Jobim & Moraes ♪♪♪½ (Iris, 1996)

influences:
⏮ Elis Regina, Astrud Gilberto, Flora Purim
⏭ Badi Assad, Lani Hall, Milton Nascimento

Nancy Ann Lee

JPP /Järvelän Pikkupelimannit

Finnish folk, tango

Formed 1980, in Järvelä, Kaustinen, Finland. Based in Finland.

Arto Järvelä, fiddle (1980–present); Jouni Järvelä, string bass, fiddle (1980–93); Mauno Järvelä, fiddle (1984–present); Jarmo Varila, fiddle (1980–93); Juha Varila, fiddle (1980–93); Timo Alakotila, harmonium (1980–present); Janne Virkkala, string bass (1984–97); Matti Mäkelä, fiddle (1992–present); Tommi Pyykönen, fiddle (1992–present); Timo Myllykangas, string bass (1997–present); JPP String Orchestra: Anni Järvelä, Antti Järvelä, Riikka Järvelä, Siiri Järvelä, Ville Kangas, Tuija Myllykangas, Turo Myllykangas, Jarmo Varila, and Mika Virkkala, fiddles. (All members are from Finland.)

Järvelän Pikkupelimannit means "Little Folk Musicians of Järvelä," and it was the original name for JPP, who would soon show themselves to be not so little at all. Their current moniker was acquired in 1988 when the leading daily newspaper in Finland, Helsingin Sanomat, shortened their name. That was the year they received Album of the Year honors from that very newspaper, in addition to carting home the "Tunnustus Prize" from the Finnish Radio Corporation. The group's first recorded project was Laitisen Mankeliska, a 1986 EP that featured traditional Finnish melodies in addition to works written by Finnish folk legends Konsta Jylhä and Viljami Niittykoski, as well as the band's own Timo Alakotila and Arto Järvelä. The group's mix of exciting polkas, waltzes, and tangos made an impact with their audiences, both on the dance floor and on the festival stage. By 1989 the buzz about JPP was formidable and they began touring Europe. They also made their first domestic television appearance that year, while their international reputation was further solidified in 1992 with their inaugural North American tour and the release of their first video, an eight-minute clip called "Puikkoristikko."

Arto Järvelä, who was only 17 when the group first started, is a graduate of the illustrious Folk Music Department at the Sibelius Academy in Helsinki. It was there that he met and performed with accordion virtuoso Maria Kalaniemi in a variety of groups, including the legendary Niekku. Their association continues to this day, with mutual guest appearances on disc. Järvelä has also become a lecturer at his alma mater, in addition to playing fiddle, mandolin, and kantele (the Finnish zither) with a variety of other ad hoc or formal groups—including the Helsinki Mandoliners, Koinurit, Salamakannel, Ampron Prunni, and Pinnin Pojat—and releasing his own solo album, Polska Differente. His uncle and fellow JPP member Mauno Järvelä passes on the fiddle tradition of their native Kaustinen by (in conjunction with Alakotila) teaching young musicians in a variety of ensembles including Järvelän Näppärit and Mulukka. The elder Järvelä once worked with Kankaan Pelimannit, another pioneering fiddle group that released the album Suvitunnelma while JPP was still in its infancy. Alakotila, the other major force behind JPP, also teaches harmonium and improvisation at the Sibelius Academy's Folk Music Department, but still finds time to play in a variety of non-JPP settings.

what to buy: String Tease ♪♪♪♪♪ (NorthSide, 1998, prod. Timo Alakotila, Arto Järvelä) is exemplary of how JPP keep adding to the folk tradition even as they pay homage to it. The pioneering Swedish folkies of Väsen arranged a waltz and a polka for this album and mesh their instrumental talents with JPP on those two tunes, but—with the exception of Erik Hokkanen's "Finnish Gypsies"—everything else on the album was either written or arranged by band members, chiefly Timo Alakotila and Arto Järvelä. The album preceding String Tease was Kaustinen Rhapsody ♪♪♪♪ (Olarin Musikki Oy/Green Linnet, 1994, prod. Timo Alakotila, Arto Järvelä), which introduced JPP's musical adjuncts, the JVPP (JPP String Orchestra), on three tunes. Kaustinen Rhapsody proves that just because JPP's string section is, at times, almost as massive as one would find in a classical ensemble, doesn't mean that it can't turn on a metaphysical dime. Rhythms sparkle and the tune selection can amaze (as it does on "Texas Blues") and get feet moving (as it does on "Kalmari Special" and "Tango for Marsha").

what to buy next: Unleashing the power of dance, JPP's third album, I've Found a New Tango ♪♪♪½ (Olarin Musiikki Oy, 1990, prod. JPP), gave a whole 'nother treatment to the jazz-age standard "I've Found a New Baby" and meshed that with waltzes, polkas, and a batch of tangos that could have Argentines working up a sweat.

the rest:
Devil's Polska ♪♪♪½ (Olarin Musiikki Oy/Green Linnet, 1992/1994)

worth searching for: JPP's first full-length album, the self-titled JPP ♪♪♪½ (Olarin Musiikki Oy, 1988, prod. JPP), holds up pretty well over time. Blending traditional melodies with original tunes from Timo Alakotila and Arto and Mauno Järvelä, this project provided the essential blueprint that all future JPP albums would be built on.

influences:
◀◀ Konsta Jylhä, Viljami Niittykoski

▶▶ Järvelän Näppärit, Mulukka

see also: Maria Kalaniemi, Väsen

Garaud MacTaggart

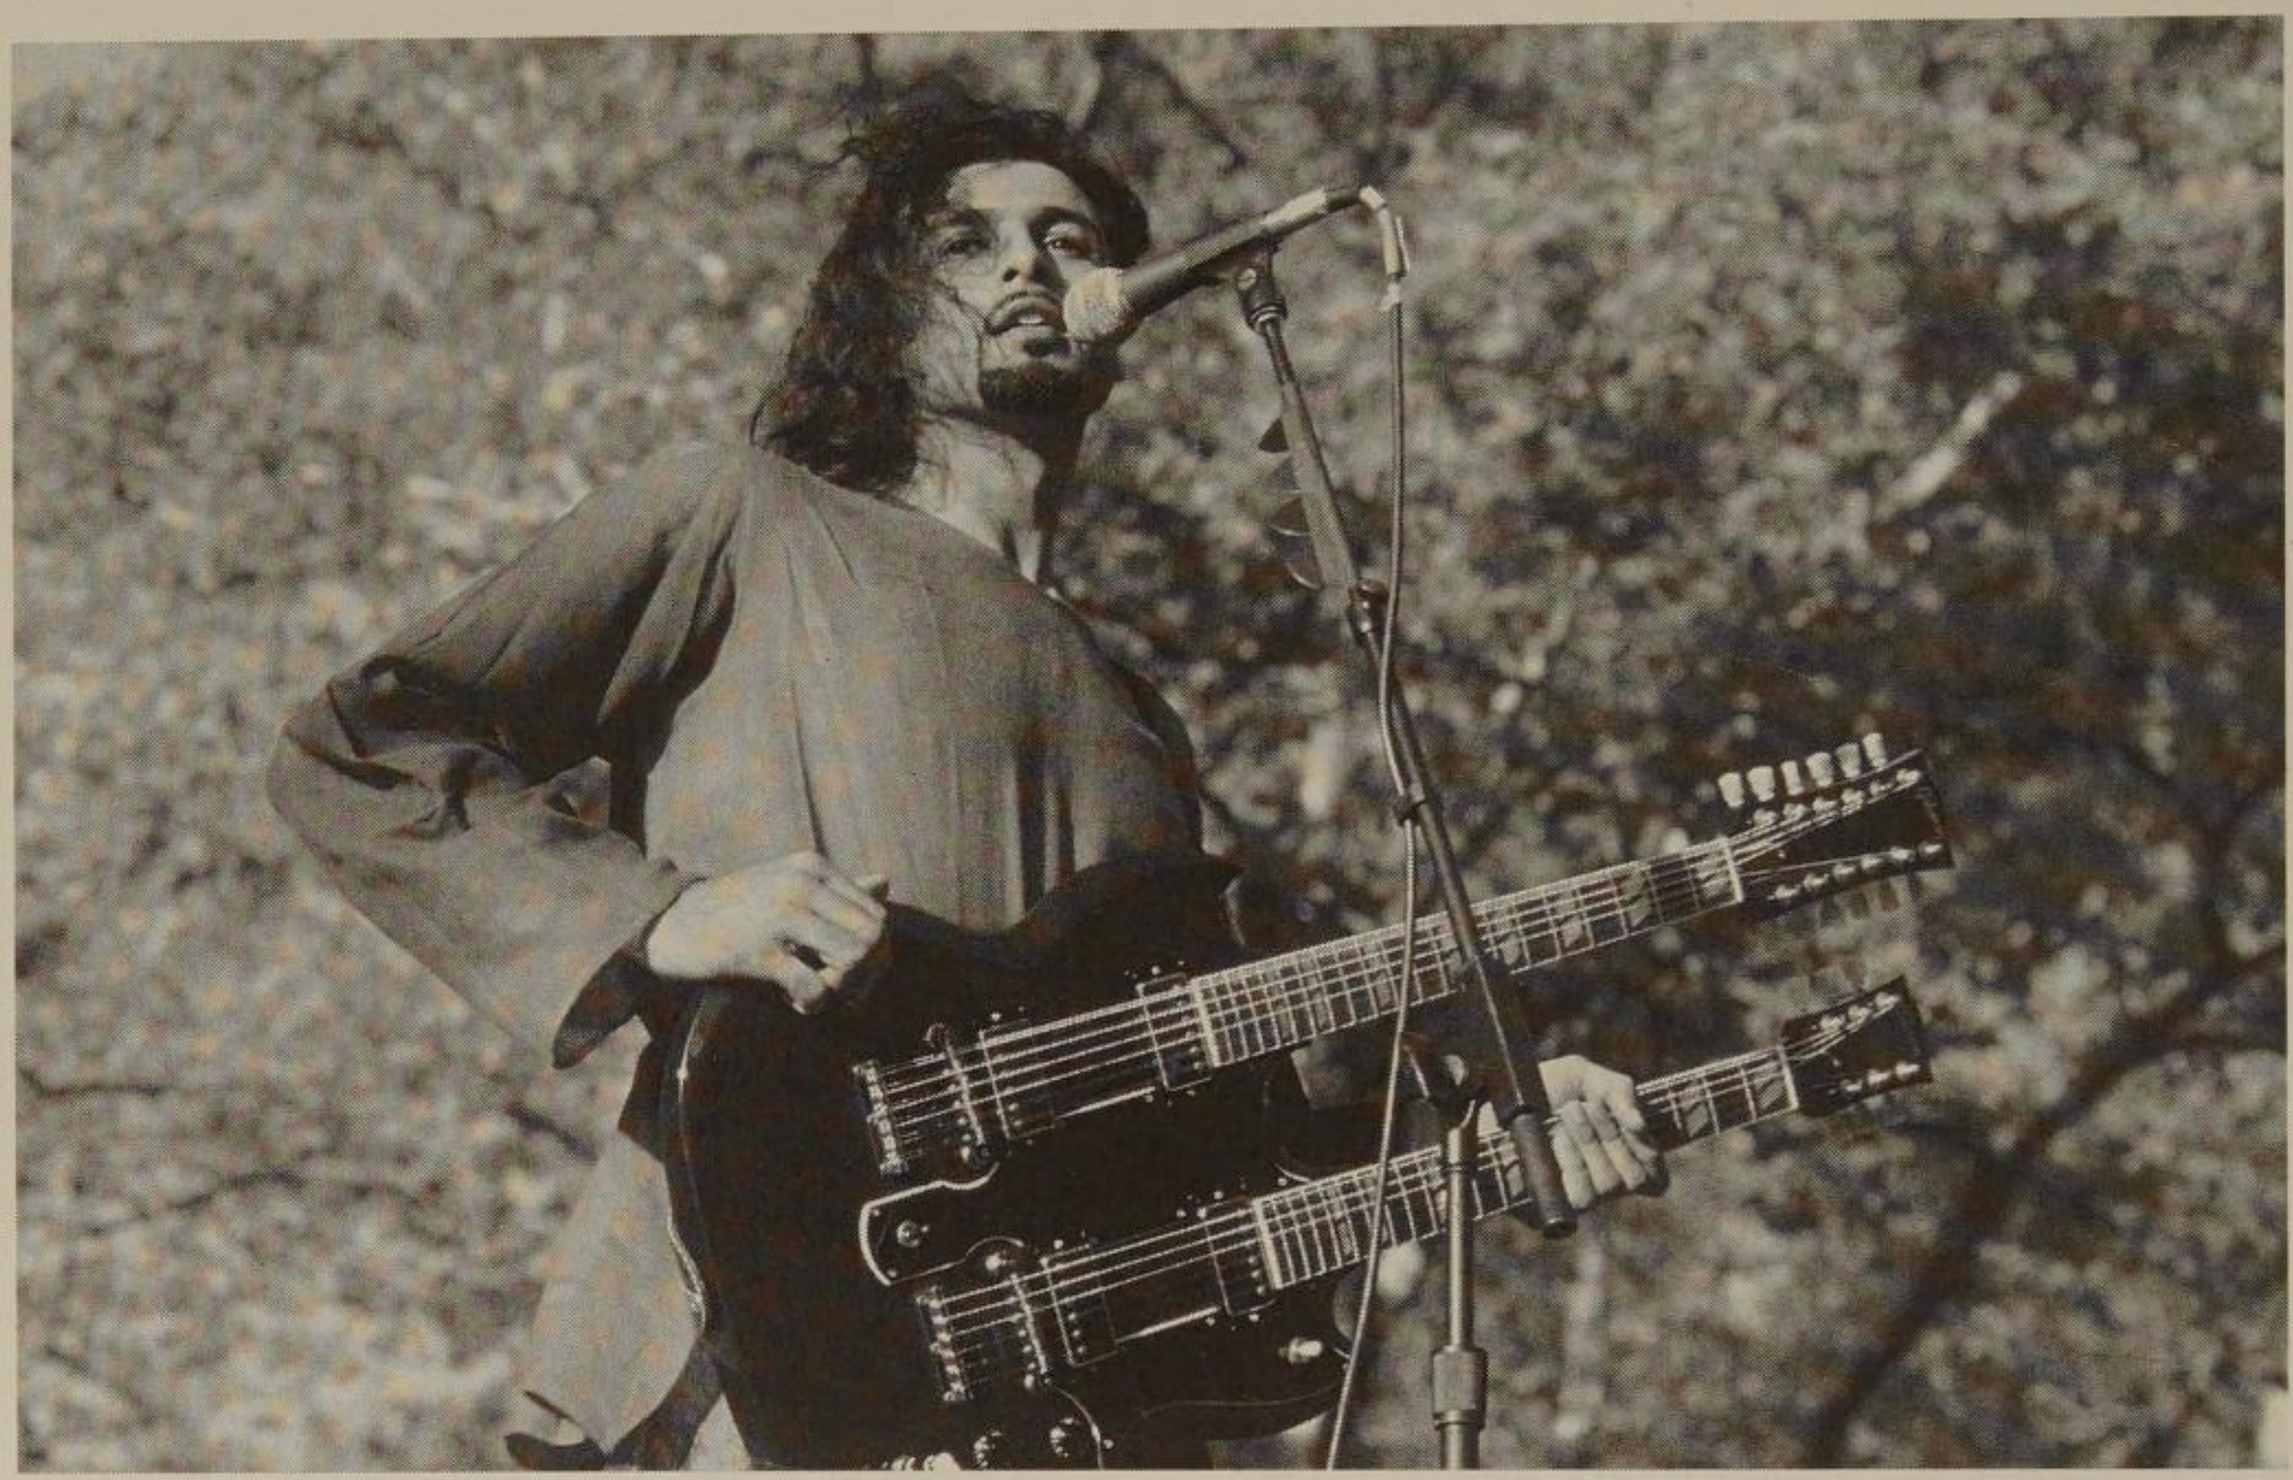
Jungular Grooves

Worldbeat

Formed 1987, in Oakland, CA, USA. Based in Oakland, CA, USA.

Reggie Benn, vocals, guitar; Holly Elder, steel drums; Robert James Haven, saxophone; Michael Corbett, drums; Wendell Rand, bass. (All members are from USA.)

Reggie Benn's Jungular Grooves is an aptly named organization. The band digs deep into the international roots of the African Diaspora to create a sound that blends strains of jazzy improvisation, hot Latin rhythms, languid reggae skanks, sharp R&B horn lines, rippling steel-pan melodies, and various West African and North American guitar styles into a seamless whole that defies categorization. Like the San Francisco Bay Area bands in the first worldbeat wave of the late '70s and early '80s, Jungular Grooves bases its sound on a wide variety of African and Afro-Caribbean styles, but they've succeeded where others have failed. They may, especially on their original compositions, conjure up enticing memory traces of half a dozen cultures, but they're impossible to pin down. "What we play now goes back to my childhood," Benn says. "I had a heavy dose of West Indian–flavored music from my father, who was originally from Barbados. The family played and sang calypsos on holidays, as well as that straight-up choral harmony thing we got from church. [My family] gave me a broad understanding of music, but at the time I just thought of [it all] as records, same as what I heard on the radio. I went by tunes, not by the styles."



Salman Ahmad of Junoon

"There was a bunch of 14-, 15-year-olds who used to do the doo-wop thing outside my house," Benn continues. "They'd sing 'Silhouettes,' or whatever, and it had a romantic aspect, going to sleep at 8 p.m., hearing these kids singing and talking outside my window. It made me associate music with freedom and the wildness that's out there in the dark under the street lights." Although he'd always loved music, Benn didn't think about picking up a guitar until he landed at Stanford University in the early '70s. "I'm a big guy, and the guitar was so small, and you have to play the strings one at a time, but I got captured by B. B. King and Marv Tarplin, the cat that played behind Smokey. Once I could play, I couldn't avoid getting work." At Stanford Benn hooked up with Tuck Andress, later of Tuck & Patti fame, and played with him for several years in various jazz and soul bands. After Benn finished with school, he migrated to the Bay Area and played with a variety of Cuban, African, and worldbeat acts including Hedzoleh Soundz, Sooliman Rogie, Cool Breeze, and Karma Kanics, a short-lived but musically exciting East Bay worldbeat organization. As Benn was honing his international chops, he was also writing tunes and thinking about starting his own band. "Since nobody who makes a living as a musician has time to rehearse, I got into a folkloric thing, and built tunes around a sing-song hook or a simple bass line, the kind of tunes you can play instantly. Worldbeat should flow, which is a quality that was lacking in most of the bands." Benn feels that some African musicians are too rigid in their approach, while Americans who try playing Afro-Caribbean styles often sound rhythmically stilted. Somehow, perhaps because of Benn's lifelong familiarity with both African American and Afro-Caribbean music, Jungular Grooves is able to avoid both extremes to present a driving, danceable multicultural sound that stretches listeners' musical imaginations, rather than aiming for the least common denominator. In a perfect world the Jungulars would have a major label deal and be traveling the globe playing their unique hybrid. Until that happens, you can dance along by tracking down their two excellent independent CDs.

what's available: Benn's gruff vocals have a unique quality, and the band includes some of the Bay Area's best world-music players. J. Grooves ♪♪♪♪♪ (International Soul, 1996, prod. Reggie Benn) has solid songwriting, with plenty of hooks and a groove that's as deep and steamy as the band's name implies. Why they aren't better known is a mystery. The debut Jungular Grooves ♪♪♪♪♪ (International Soul, 1992, prod. Reggie Benn) has a rougher edge than J. Grooves, but is still a charmer. "Magic," an ode to a certain basketball player, could be a big hit with a little bit of promo muscle behind it.

influences:

◀◀ Karma Kanicks, Looters, Sparrow, doo-wop

▶▶ Henri Dikongué, Alpha Yaya Diallo

j. poet

Junoon

Rock

Formed 1990, in Karachi, Pakistan. Based in Karachi, Pakistan.

Ali Azmat (Pakistan), vocals; Salman Ahmad (Pakistan), guitar; Brian O'Connell (USA), bass.

Pakistan is seldom thought of as a rock 'n' roll capital. But Junoon has blended the rich traditions of their native land, a passionate political stance, and the instrumental power and broad appeal of Western arena rock to become Pakistan's first superstars in the genre. The long-haired, hard-rocking trio was founded by guitarist and songwriter Salman Ahmad, vocalist Ali Azmat, and bassist Nusrat Hussain. When Hussain's full-time job as a pilot caused him to leave, the group was rounded out by bassist Brian O'Connell, whom Ahmad had met when living for a time in New York as a teenager. Junoon's sound was unique in the Pakistani/Indian music scene of the early '90s, and its pointedly partisan lyrics immediately won fans and severe critics. "Junoon" means passion in Pakistani, and the group is aptly named. Wildly popular at home and in India, Junoon has offended the governments of both countries by advocating cooperation rather than the stockpiling of arms. The trio's criticism of Pakistan's nuclear tests resulted in tapped phones and canceled concerts. Relatively unknown in the West, Junoon nonetheless has enough commercial clout that its most recent recording, Azadi, went platinum in only four weeks, despite—and in part probably because of—being banned by Pakistani television. Earlier, its song "Ehtesaab" ("Accountability") and the accompanying video were instrumental in removing former Pakistani leader Benazir Bhutto from office.

what to buy: The group's breakthrough fifth album, Azadi ♪♪♪♪ (EMI, 1997, prod. Alec Raubeson, Salman Ahmad, Brian O'Connell), was the highest-selling pop album in both India and Pakistan in 1998. It includes the trio's scorching single "Sayonee," which topped the charts in Asia and the Middle East and features Azmat's deep, passionate vocal over O'Connell's burbling bass and driving hand percussion. Other tracks, such as the haunting "Saeen," feature Ahmad's unique blend of fiery acoustic and electric guitar textures (imagine a cross between Ravi Shankar and Jimmy Page).

worth searching for: Junoon's first four albums, despite being released on EMI and racking up impressive sales, are not readily available outside of Pakistan. Kashmakash (EMI, 1997, prod. Salman Ahmad, Brian O'Connell) contains the group's groundbreaking political commentary "Ehtesaab"; others worth hearing are Inquilaab (EMI, 1996, prod. Salman Ahmad, Brian O'Connell), Talash (EMI, 1992, prod. Salman Ahmad, Brian O'Connell, T.G), and Junoon I (1990, prod. Salman Ahmad).

influences:

◀◀ Led Zeppelin, U2

Michael Parrish

K

Ledward Kaapana

See: Hui Ohana

George Kahumoku Jr.

Slack-key guitar

Born early 1950s, in HI, USA. Based in Honolulu, HI, USA.

Like many of Hawaii's slack-key guitarists (practitioners of a distinctive open-tuned style), George Kahumoku Jr. comes from a family of pickers, most notably his father, George Sr., and younger brother, Moses. Also like many slack-key guitarists, music isn't his only profession: Kahumoku doubles as a self-employed farmer with degrees in sculpture and agriculture. A player, singer, and composer, Kahumoku began his professional career at age 13 with Hawaiian singer-songwriter Kui Lee; he also performed with Moses as the Kahumoku Brothers during the 1970s and '80s.

what's available: The 12-string guitar that Kahumoku uses throughout Drenched by Music ♪♪♪♪ (Dancing Cat, 1997, prod. George Winston, George Kahumoku Jr.) gives this album a fuller guitar sound than most of the other releases on the same label. The occasional vocal is sung in Hawaiian. Steel guitarist Bob Brozman joins Kahumoku on the duet "Hanohano Hawai'i," and Hawaiian singer Diana Aki contributes vocals to "Kaulana O Kawaihae (Famous Is Kawaihae)," a song also performed by Ledward Kaapana and his group Hui Ohana.

influences:

◀◀ Sonny Chillingworth, Gabby Pahinui, Ledward Kaapana, Leonard Kwan, Ray Kane

⏩ Moses Kahumoku

see also: Hui Ohana, Moses Kahumoku

Brian Mansfield

Moses Kahumoku

Slack-key guitar

Born 1953, in Honolulu, HI, USA. Based in HI, USA.

Moses Kahumoku is known in his home region for more than just his music. True, he's noted as a guitarist in the unique open-tuned "slack-key" style, and as one half of the popular Kahumoku Brothers with older sibling George Kahumoku Jr. But he's also a prominent activist working for Hawaiian sovereignty, as well as a fisherman and farmer. Though he does compose, he's more highly regarded as an interpreter and improviser on his instrument.

what's available: Kahumoku sings on only four of the 14 tracks on Ho'okupu (The Gift) ♪♪♪½ (Dancing Cat, 1995, prod. George Winston), freeing up the rest of the album to focus on his singular instrumental style, which is marked by its arpeggiated melodies, single-note runs, and flamenco influence. This collection includes a couple of familiar Hawaiian songs, "Hawai'i Aloha" and "Kaula 'Ili," the latter associated with the great Sonny Chillingworth, who died shortly before the album's release.

influences:

⏪ Sonny Chillingworth, Gabby Pahinui, Ledward Kaapana, Leonard Kwan, Ray Kane

⏩ George Kahumoku Jr.

see also: Sonny Chillingworth, George Kahumoku Jr.

Brian Mansfield

Kalama's Quartet

Hawaiian quartet with steel guitars

Formed 1927. Disbanded 1932. Based in New York, NY, USA.

Mike Hanapi (died 1959), tenor and falsetto voice, steel guitar; William Kalama, tenor voice, ukulele; Bob Nawahine, bass voice, harp-guitar; Dave Kaleipua Munson, baritone voice, guitar; Bob Matsu, voice, steel guitar. (All members are from Hawaii.)

Although Kalama's Quartet only cut records for five years, their songs contain some of the most beautiful Hawaiian falsetto singing and steel duets ever recorded. There is a deep, almost eerie spiritual quality to their unforgettable four-part harmonies, and no other group has ever come close to sounding like them. Their songs are so full of musical inventiveness, humor, and intense emotion that they are truly in a class by themselves, singing about the balmy trade winds, beautiful women, and places that they love. This is what the Hawaiians call "chicken skin" music, with a down-home, soulful sound that really makes you swoon. The group's leader, Mike Hanapi, moved from Honolulu to the mainland in 1912, and at age 14 he and his brother worked the Chicago Exposition. Hanapi probably learned to play the steel guitar around that time. Later he got vocal training at the New York Conservatory of Music. In 1938, he moved back to Hawaii and became a member of the Royal Hawaiian Band, playing saxophone until his death in 1959.

what's available: The original 78 rpm recordings of this group on the OKeh and Victor labels are extremely rare, and Kalama's Quartet: Early Hawaiian Classics, 1927–1932 ♪♪♪♪♪ (Arhoolie Folklyric, 1993, prod. Chris Strachwitz, Bob Brozman) contains almost everything that remains of those gorgeous songs recorded seven decades ago. Some of the tunes, like "Medley of Hulas" and "Mama E," contain lyrics that date back to the 1800s. The oldest piece, "Kawika," is an accurate example of pre–European contact Hawaiian chant. Although the recording is very interesting historically, the sheer emotion of the music is what's important here. The state-of-the-art sound restoration of the old 78s on this release is outstanding, and several of the records "cleaned up" for the project are the only copies in existence. This one is essential for anyone interested in the roots of Hawaiian music.

worth searching for: Several releases, though not Kalama's albums as such, are not hard to find, and are essential to the band's surviving oeuvre. Hawaiian Steel Guitar Classics, 1927–1938 ♪♪♪♪½ (Arhoolie, 1993, prod. Chris Strachwitz) has two more cuts by Kalama's Quartet, and is a treasure trove of other early island gems. Na Leo Hawai'i Kahiko: The Master Chanters of Hawai'i/Songs of Old Hawai'i ♪♪♪½ (Mountain Apple, 1997, prod. Bishop Museum) contains a 1927 recording of Kalama's Quartet's sex chant for King Kalakaua, along with some other early 20th century recordings from the archives of the Bishop Museum in Honolulu. Vintage Hawaiian Music: The Great Singers, 1928–1934 ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1989, prod. Bob Brozman, Chris Strachwitz) contains three Kalama's tracks, and other classics by Mme. Riviere's Hawaiians (featuring Tau Moe), Sol Hoopii Trio, Sol K. Bright Hollywaiians, and others.

influences:

⏪ Richard Tully's Bird of Paradise Review (1904), Tau Moe Family, King Bennie Nawahi, Sol Hoopii, Sol K. Bright

⏩ Bob Brozman, Ry Cooder, Ledward Kaapana, George Kahumoku Jr.

Sandy Miranda

Maria Kalaniemi

Finnish folk

Born May 27, 1964, in Helsinki, Finland. Based in Finland.

In most people's minds, the accordion is not an instrument synonymous with cutting-edge music. But a few artists can change that perception in one sitting—Pauline Oliveros, Astor Piazzola, Guy Klusevsek, and, don't forget, Maria Kalaniemi. Kalaniemi is a versatile technical sorceress with the five-row button accordion, capable of improvising sonic wonders for the avant-garde and then playing tradition-minded polkas, waltzes, and tangos for folk dancers. When she was 19 Kalaniemi won the "Golden Accordion" at a national contest, and this led to the recording of her first album (a batch of traditional Finnish dance tunes) under the auspices of the Accordion Institute of Ikaalinen. She also joined the fledgling folk music department at the Sibelius Academy as a student, studying not only the accordion but the mandolin, violin, and kantele (a Finnish member of the zither family). Excited by instructor Heikki Laitinen's teaching methods, Kalaniemi and four other female students formed the first of the academy's important folk groups, Niekku. This group—made a quintet with the inclusion of fiddler Arto Järvelä, later of JPP—played traditional tunes and original songs using a variety of arrangements that pointed toward a new direction in Finnish folk music. Before finally graduating in 1990, Kalaniemi spent some time in France studying with the renowned jazz and musette accordionist Marcel Azzola. She also started examining the classical technique of using her left hand to play free-bass melody lines. These experiences helped make her next album—the one that most people regard as her first—a significant advance in both composition and performance. Kalaniemi started touring Europe and North America along with JPP and other members of the New Finnish Folk movement. In 1996 the accordionist and her band Aldargaz were the first folk musicians to win the Prize of Finland, given by its minister of education for artistic excellence. In these and many other ways, Kalaniemi has proven to be a persuasive advocate for her instrument. Not only has she returned to the Sibelius Academy in the role of an accordion lecturer, she has played with other accordionists in such outfits as Andetagen (alongside Lars Hollmer and Kimmo Pohjonen), the Helsinki Melodeon Ladies (a quintet that also features Riitta Kossi of Värtinnä), and, perhaps most notoriously, the Accordion Tribe with Guy Klucevsek, Lars Hollmer, Bratko Bibic, and Otto Lechner. In addition, she organized and performed in 1998's Harmonikka accordion festival, which featured players from around the world, further confirming her global status as a musician.

what to buy: While not technically her first album, Maria Kalaniemi ♪♪♪♪♪ (Olarin Musiikki Oy, 1992/Green Linnet, 1994, prod. Timo Alakotila) is the first release associated with Kalaniemi to make an impact with international audiences. Produced by JPP's Alakotila, this album bounces out of the gate with "Hermannin Riili" and continues on through polkas and tangos, aided by the cream of the New Finnish Folk movement. This is an absolutely stunning disc and deserves to be on the shelves of every world-music aficionado.

what to buy next: Kalaniemi's next release, Iho ♪♪♪♪½ (Olarin Musiikki Oy, 1995/Hannibal, 1997, prod. Timo Alakotila), is more of a band affair, with Kalaniemi leading Aldargaz (basically the same musicians on another fine recital), but with a little more room for the supporting cast to make notable contributions. In addition to a solid handful of Kalaniemi compositions there are three tunes from Alakotila's pen, a few traditional Finnish songs in new arrangements, and a stunning take on Carlos Gardel's classic tango "Sus Ojos Se Cerraron," in which the accordionist does her best approximation of an Argentine virtuoso.

worth searching for: The only full-length representation of the groundbreaking Niekku that can be found on CD is a Finnish import, Niekku 3 ♪♪♪♪ (Olarin Musiikki Oy, 1989, prod. Timo Tuovinen). Kalaniemi contributes one song, the atmospheric "Mene Myöten Myöty Neiti," with swirling kantele chords forming the backdrop for her minor-key musings and, near the end, her discordant, experimental riffing. Her most intriguing work for Niekku 3, however, can be found on "Kymmenellä Rivillä," an avant-garde, classically oriented piece for multi-tracked, free-bass button accordion composed by her mentor at the Sibelius Academy, Heikki Laitinen. She also contributes her accordion playing to five cuts on Oi Miksi ♪♪♪♪ (Riverboat/Olarin Musiikki Oy, 1994, prod. Heiki Laitinen), a superb project by her Niekku cohort, vocalist/kantele player Anna-Kaisa Leides. A more traditional outing by Kalaniemi can be heard on the album by Finnish fiddler Jussi Tarkkanen, Ameriikan polkka ♪♪♪ (Teosto, 1996, prod. Jussi Tarkkanen).

influences:

⏮ Heikki Laitinen, Marcel Azzola

⏭ Petri Ikkelä, Minna Luoma, Pale Saarinen, Riitta Potinoja

see also: JPP, Värttinä

Garaud MacTaggart

Kayhan Kalhor

See: Ghazal

Pépé Kallé

Soukous

Born 1951, in Kinshasa, Congo. Died 1998, in Kinshasa, Congo.

Pépé Kallé and his band Empire Bakuba used to divide their time between Paris and Kinshasa, regularly topping both the

360 pépé kallé

Maria Kalaniemi

African and world-music charts with a high-octane sound driven by lead guitarists Boeing Kananga and Doris Ebuya, and Kallé's own distinctive vocals. With his multi-octave range and unmistakable rumble, Kallé showed himself to be one of Congo's most powerful and innovative vocalists and songwriters.

Pépé Kallé was born in Kinshasa in 1951, and went to a Catholic grade school and high school. Like many singers, he got his start in the church choir. Kallé said that the bittersweet, almost bluesy quality of his vocals was partly a result of years of hymn singing. In high school Kallé sang with small vocal groups, usually local youths like himself playing homemade instruments. In the mid-'60s Kallé met Joseph Kabasele, a.k.a. Le Grande Kalle. Le Grande Kalle turned the Congolese music scene on its head in the late '50s by playing a re-Africanized version of the rumba and samba. His bands were a proving ground for musicians like Manu Dibango, Dr. Nico, and Rochereau. Pépé Kallé never actually played with Le Grande Kalle, but he lived and worked at Kabasele's house for several years, in exchange for vocal and music lessons. Kallé began writing his own songs at this time, and Kabasele recorded several of them, which gave Kallé some credibility when he started his own career. He would credit his sense of melody and a large part of his vocal style to the training he received from Kabasele.

Pépé Kallé's professional career began in the '70s with the band Bella Bella, where he shared singing chores with Nyboma, who went on to fame with Sam Magwana's African All Stars. Their twin lead vocals created some of the most memorable moments in Congo's musical history. Zaiko Langa Langa, the nation's leading "new wave" soukous (African rumba) band, was introducing the guitar pyrotechnics and galloping rhythms that have marked the music ever since, and Pépé Kallé wanted to be part of this revolution. He created Empire Bakuba, which became one of the most popular and long-lived bands in Congo. In an ever-shifting musical scene, Empire Bakuba (named after one of Congo's great warrior tribes) was also one of the few bands to remain stable, introducing several new dance crazes and winning over African, European, Japanese, and North American audiences along the way. At the time of his death in November of 1998, Kallé was collaborating with guitar giant Rigo Star on a new album and preparing another extensive North American tour.

what to buy: Gigant-Afrique ♪♪♪♪♪ (Globestyle, 1990), a compilation of Kallé's singles from the late 1980s, was put together by Ben Mandelson (a.k.a. Hijaz Mustapha of 3 Mustaphas 3) and offers a connoisseur's selection of Empire Bakuba at the height of their popularity, the legendary Diblo Dibala sitting in on three tracks.

what to buy next: Pon Moun Paka Bouge ♪♪♪♪♪ (Celluloid, 1991, prod. Pépé Kallé) is a short (30 minutes) but solid set featuring the chiming guitar of Diblo and a real drummer, which is increasingly rare on the slick soukous albums coming out of Paris.

the rest:
Larger Than Life ♪♪♪♪½ (Stern's, 1992)

worth searching for: Many of Kallé's best singles, available on cassette and various European compilation CDs, are also collected under the name of his band, Empire Bakuba. Titles include La Belle Étoile ♪♪♪♪ (Rhythmes y Musique, 1985), Trop C'est Trop ♪♪♪♪ (Rhythmes y Musique, 1985), Adieu Dr. Nico ♪♪♪♪ (Syllart 1986), and Cherie Ondi ♪♪♪♪ (Rhythmes y Musique).

influences:
- Franco, Le Grande Kallé, Tabu Ley Rochereau, Zaiko Langa Langa
- Rigo Star

see also: Diblo Dibala, Manu Dibango, Dr. Nico, Sam Mangwana, Tabu Ley Rochereau, Rigo Star, 3 Mustaphas 3, Zaiko Langa Langa

j. poet

Rev. Dennis Kamakahi

Slack-key guitar

Born 1953, in Honolulu, HI, USA. Based in HI, USA.

A popular and prolific Hawaiian songwriter, the Rev. Dennis Kamakahi has recorded only rarely as a frontman or solo performer. The son and grandson of slack-key guitarists (players in his homeland's singular open-tuned style) and a direct descendant of Maui's last chief, Kamakahi grew up with a deep love and respect for Hawaiian musical history, which remains evident in his own work. He formed the popular group Na Paniolo during the 1960s, and in 1973 replaced Gabby Pahinui as the slack-key guitarist in the Sons of Hawaii, a group with which he continues to play. He is an ordained, but rarely practicing, Episcopalian minister.

what's available: When Pua'ena (Glow Brightly) ♪♪♪½ (Dancing Cat, 1996, prod. George Winston) came out, it marked Kamakahi's first recording session in more than a decade and his first ever as a solo slack-key artist. Sung mostly in Hawaiian, the music is soothing and often romantic in nature, with tracks split between Kamakahi's originals and songs by 19th-century Hawaiian royalty. Kamakahi's stylistic and literal legacy is carried forth on Ohana (Family) ♪♪♪½ (BMG/Windham Hill/Dancing Cat, 1999), an unassuming but affecting set with his son, vocalist and ukulele player David Kamakahi.

influences:
- Sons of Hawaii, Gabby Pahinui, Sonny Chillingworth, Leonard Kwan, Raymond Kane

ini kamoze

George Kuo, Hawaiian Style Band

see also: Gabby Pahinui

Brian Mansfield

Ini Kamoze

Dancehall, ragga

Born Cecil Campbell, October 9, 1957, in Port Maria, Jamaica. Based in Kingston, Jamaica.

Unlike most successful singers and deejays in Jamaica today, Ini Kamoze established himself by eschewing live, improvised dancehall performances for solitary, studied songwriting. Kamoze's witty and astute lyrics are often inextricably coiled with his mission to challenge ghetto youth to bolster their self-respect and culture-respect by resisting the diversions powerful outsiders use to divide them—easily accessible guns, politically instigated "tribal" factionalism, and the territorial, predatory drug trade. For a then-relative unknown, it's no wonder that Kamoze's first singles in the early '80s—"World of Fears" and "Trainers Choice" on the Mogho Naba imprint—were ignored by dancehall patrons. Luckily, his subsequent six-song demo tape fell into the hands of reggae legend Jimmy Cliff, who immediately passed it on to drummer-extraordinaire—and, with bassist Robbie Shakespeare, studio miracle-worker—Sly Dunbar, emphatically praising Kamoze's strangely commanding, pinched tenor; odd, zig-zagging timbre; and simultaneously useful and museful songwriting. Sly & Robbie, as they are better known, whisked Kamoze into a recording session, eventually issued in 1983 as the Ini Kamoze mini-album. Backed by Dunbar's complex, metallic syn-drum patterns and Shakespeare's solar-plexus-rumbling bass, the six-song EP is one of the finest and most influential dancehall records of that decade. Yet Kamoze's proclamation of the beginning of "Operation Roots & Culture" in the terrific "General" fell on deaf ears, as the dancehall was quickly mutating into a more party-hardy space where patrons' everyday misery was checked at the door for the night. Kamoze was in essence an island of conscious reality in a choppy sea of unconscious escapism. As a result, his follow-up albums, Statement and Pirate, were met with indifference, though Kamoze's galvanizing performance at 1984's Reggae Sunsplash festival did much to enhance his reputation as a live performer. After Shocking Out was released in 1988, the title cut—riding a savagely punchy rhythm churned by digital visionaries Steely & Clevie—became a hit single in Jamaica. Kamoze next created the Selekta label, soon releasing the popular sampler Selekta Showcase '89, which included another hit of his own, "Stress." In the early '90s his releases were few and far between, but always interesting and fresh. Then in late '94, Kamoze struck gold with a recut of his 1990 Jamaican hit "Here Comes the Hotstepper." Featured in Robert Altman's movie Ready to Wear and on MTV with a heavy-rotation video, "Hotstepper" rose to #1 on the Billboard pop charts and led to a recording contract with Elektra. While his first major-label release, Lyrical Gangsta, kowtowed to the rap crowd, back in Jamaica Kamoze released a series of singles with Philip "Fatis" Burrell (producer of the original "Hotstepper") that were as singular and riveting as his early dancehall work, including "Jah Never Fail I" (1995) and "No Watch No Face" (1996), both on the Sounds Klik label. The question remains: will Kamoze try to transform himself into the dreadlocked rapper that Elektra seems to want, or will he stay true to himself and continue tapping his deep reservoir of cultural sounds and concerns? Here's hoping for the latter.

what to buy: Here Comes the Hotstepper ♪♪♪♪ (Columbia, 1995, prod. Sly Dunbar, Robbie Shakespeare) is a fine compilation of Kamoze's early singles on Sly & Robbie's Taxi label, along with Salaam Remi's combustible remix of "Hotstepper," which includes a healthy sample of Chris Kenner's rollicking 1963 New Orleans R&B hit "Land of a 1,000 Dances" and a raw, fonky, old-school hip-hop rhythm that would make Fab 5 Freddy beam. That said, the highlight is the presence of three of the six cuts from Kamoze's debut EP, Ini Kamoze ♪♪♪♪½ (Island JA, 1983, prod. Sly Dunbar, Robbie Shakespeare), including the uniquely empathetic and provocative "Trouble You a Trouble Me"; the profound, conscience-agitating "General" ("Listen keenly . . . if you hurt one, you hurt yourself too"); and "World-a-Music," a loving tribute to the crescendoing dancehall-reggae vibe, which at its peak is a pressure-cooker of adrenaline, guts, and euphoria. The entire brazen Ini Kamoze EP—including the rare "Hail Mi Idren," a must-have for fans—is available as an import from Ernie B's Reggae, PO Box 5019, El Dorado Hills, CA 95762 (Phone: (916) 939-0691; e-mail: ErnieB@calweb.com).

what to buy next: His first foray into computer-generated rhythms, Shocking Out ♪♪♪½ (RAS, 1988, prod. Ini Kamoze, the One Two Crew) represents Kamoze's daring attempt to bring flesh-and-blood passion into the digital realm—with surprising success. He and good-friend Mutaburuka collaborate on "Revolution," a groovesome gasp of word-and-sound poetry that, despite its title, is devoid of wrathfulness and instead brimming with nyahbingi (Rasta ritual) mystic power. "Cool It Off" is a cogent plea to end the "arms race" from the common "sufferah"'s perspective, and ironically, over a decade later, is again ablaze with relevance as the U.S. seems primed to spend billions on a missile defense system while millions of its citizens can't afford health care.

the rest:

Statement ♪♪♪ (Island, 1984)

Pirate ♪♪♪ (Island, 1986)
16 Vibes of Ini Kamoze ♪♪♪½ (Sonic Sounds, 1992)
Lyrical Gangsta ♪♪ (East West, 1995)

influences:

⏮ Sly Dunbar, Robbie Shakespeare, Bob Marley, Horace Andy, Philip "Fatis" Burrell, Mikey Dread, Mutaburuka

⏭ Buju Banton, Mutaburuka, Ninjaman, Super Cat, Tony Rebel

see also: Mutaburuka, Sly & Robbie

Todd Shanker

Kanda Bongo Man

Soukous

Born 1955, in Inongo, Zaire (now Congo). Based in Paris, France.

A unique, dance-inspiring style of Congo's soukous (African rumba) was created by Paris-based vocalist and showman Kanda Bongo Man. Incorporating elements of Cuban salsa, American R&B, and traditional African music into his turbo-charged, groove-filled sound, he has continued to allow his music to evolve. Describing one of his performances, the New York Times wrote, "music that couldn't seem more infectious subtly gathers a force, then leaps into a new groove that's even catchier." Kanda Bongo Man developed his distinctive style as a sideman for numerous soukous bands in Congo. Upon emigrating to Paris in 1979, he hooked up with guitarists Diblo Dibala and Rigo Star to create his enthusiastic musical hybrid. At least three legends were enlarged in the process, all of which are adding new chapters to this day.

what to buy: Originally recorded for a broadcast of Ned Sublette and Sean Barlow's NPR/BBC Radio 5 program Afropop Worldwide, Soukous in Central Park ♪♪♪♪ (Hannibal/Carthage, 1993, prod. Ned Sublette, Sean Barlow) captures the excitement and hypnotic grooves of Kanda Bongo Man's concerts.

what to buy next: Kwassa Kwassa ♪♪♪½ (Hannibal, 1988, prod. Kanda Bongo Man) was Kanda Bongo Man's last album with guitarist Diblo Dibala, who embarked on his own landmark band projects afterwards. It combines two prized Paris releases, Lela Lela and Sai.

the rest:

Amou Fou/Crazy Love ♪♪♪½ (Hannibal/Carthage, 1987)
Sai-Liza ♪♪♪ (Melodie, 1988)
Kanda Bongo Man ♪♪♪ (Globestyle, 1990)
Isambe-Monie ♪♪♪ (Melodie, 1990)
Zing Zong ♪♪♪ (Hannibal/Carthage, 1991)
Songo ♪♪♪ (Melodie, 1992)
Les Rendez-vous Des Stades ♪♪♪ (Melodie, 1993)
Non Stop, Non Stop ♪♪♪ (Globe Style, 1994)
Welcome to South Africa ♪♪♪ (B. Mas Productions, 1995)

influences:

⏮ Dr. Nico, Franco, Joseph Kabasele

⏭ Papa Wemba, Tabu Ley Rochereau

see also: Diblo Dibala, Rigo Star

Craig Harris

Ray Kane /Raymond Kane

Slack-key guitar

Born 1925, in 'Ele'ele, Kaua'i, HI, USA. Based in HI, USA.

One of the oldest slack-key guitarists still performing regularly, Ray Kane grew up the son of a fisherman and traded fish for guitar lessons as a youngster. He didn't begin playing seriously until after a stint in the armed services, making his first recordings in 1961 and his first full-length album more than a dozen years later. Though he was the first player in this distinctive indigenous style to give a full-length solo recital, he made his living as a welder through most of his career. In 1987 Kane received a National Endowment for the Arts National Heritage Fellowship award for his preservation and advancement of traditional music, which he continues with frequent recording and tours.

what's available: Kane relishes his role as one of the elder statesmen of slack-key, and half the charm of the live Master of the Slack Key Guitar ♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1988, prod. Robert Mugge) is the history lessons Kane offers with the performance. For a more purely musical experience, there's Punahele ♪♪♪½ (Dancing Cat, 1994, prod. George Winston). It features a version of Kane's most popular tune, the title one (written in 1938), and vocals on four tracks, including "Hawai'i Aloha." Still making history, Kane's Wa'ahila ♪♪♪ (BMG/Windham Hill/Dancing Cat, 1998) finds him in fine instrumental and vocal form, in early-'90s sessions of his rich solo turns and sweet duets with his wife, Elodia, here making her recording debut.

worth searching for: Kane recorded two albums for the Hawaiian Tradewinds label: Nanakuli's Raymond Kane (Tradewinds, 1974), which featured a backing band, and Slack Key (Tradewinds), which contained a half-dozen tracks recorded by Kane in 1961, along with six cuts from the legendary Leonard Kwan.

influences:

⏮ Sonny Chillingworth, Gabby Pahinui

⏭ Rev. Dennis Kamakahi, George Kuo

see also: George Kuo, Leonard Kwan, Richard Thompson

Brian Mansfield

cisse diamba kanoute

Kanda Bongo Man

Cisse Diamba Kanoute

See: Baaba Maal

Mory Kanté

Traditional Manding, worldbeat

Born c. 1950, in Kissidougou, Guinea. Based in Paris, France.

Kanté grew up in a family of griots, traditional praise singers and holders of historic songs and stories. His first instrument was the balafon, the West African marimba, but he was sent to Mali at age seven to study kora (harp-lute) at the School of Oral Tradition. When Salif Keita left the Super Rail Band for a solo career as legendary as that outfit's, Kanté was hired to replace him. When Kanté was exposed to Western music, it set off a creative explosion for the young player. He was soon incorporating funk, salsa, and other dance beats into his compositions, and the Rail Band's popularity soared. But despite this success, making ends meet was hard, so Kanté moved to Côte d'Ivoire, where he put together a troupe of more than 30 musicians and dancers to play his own brand of international pop. His singular kora style meshed perfectly with the hand drumming and synth lines of the band, and they went on to wide acclaim all across West Africa. In 1980 Kanté moved to Paris and created a new group, Les Milieus Branches, to play all African-based music, be it hip-hop, salsa, rock, samba, funk, or traditional. He has since released a series of amazingly successful worldbeat albums, including 1987's Akwaba Beach, which spawned the hit single "Yé Ké Yé Ké," one of the first African tunes to crack the French pop charts.

what to buy: On Tatebola ♪♪♪♪½ (Misslin, 1996, prod. Mory Kanté), Kanté's music is slick and funky, but retains a sharp African edge. His unique kora style and propulsive balafon lines fit perfectly into the funk, house, and even techno beats that sometime drive his music. If exploring African pop is still a daunting idea, Kanté will blow away your preconceptions and rock your world.

what to buy next: It's not as slick as Tatebola, but Kanté's first hit album, Akwaba Beach ♪♪♪♪½ (PolyGram, 1987, prod. Mory Kanté), stands up well and sets a shining example for those who would integrate traditional African rhythms into a global pop format.

best of the rest:
Touma ♪♪♪♪ (Island, 1991)
N'Diarabi ♪♪♪ (Island, 1991)
10 Cola Nuts ♪♪♪ (Island, 1991)

influences:
⏮ Super Rail Band, Bembeya Jazz
⏭ Ibro Diabate, Camera Aboubacar

see also: Kante Manfila, Rail Band, Talking Heads

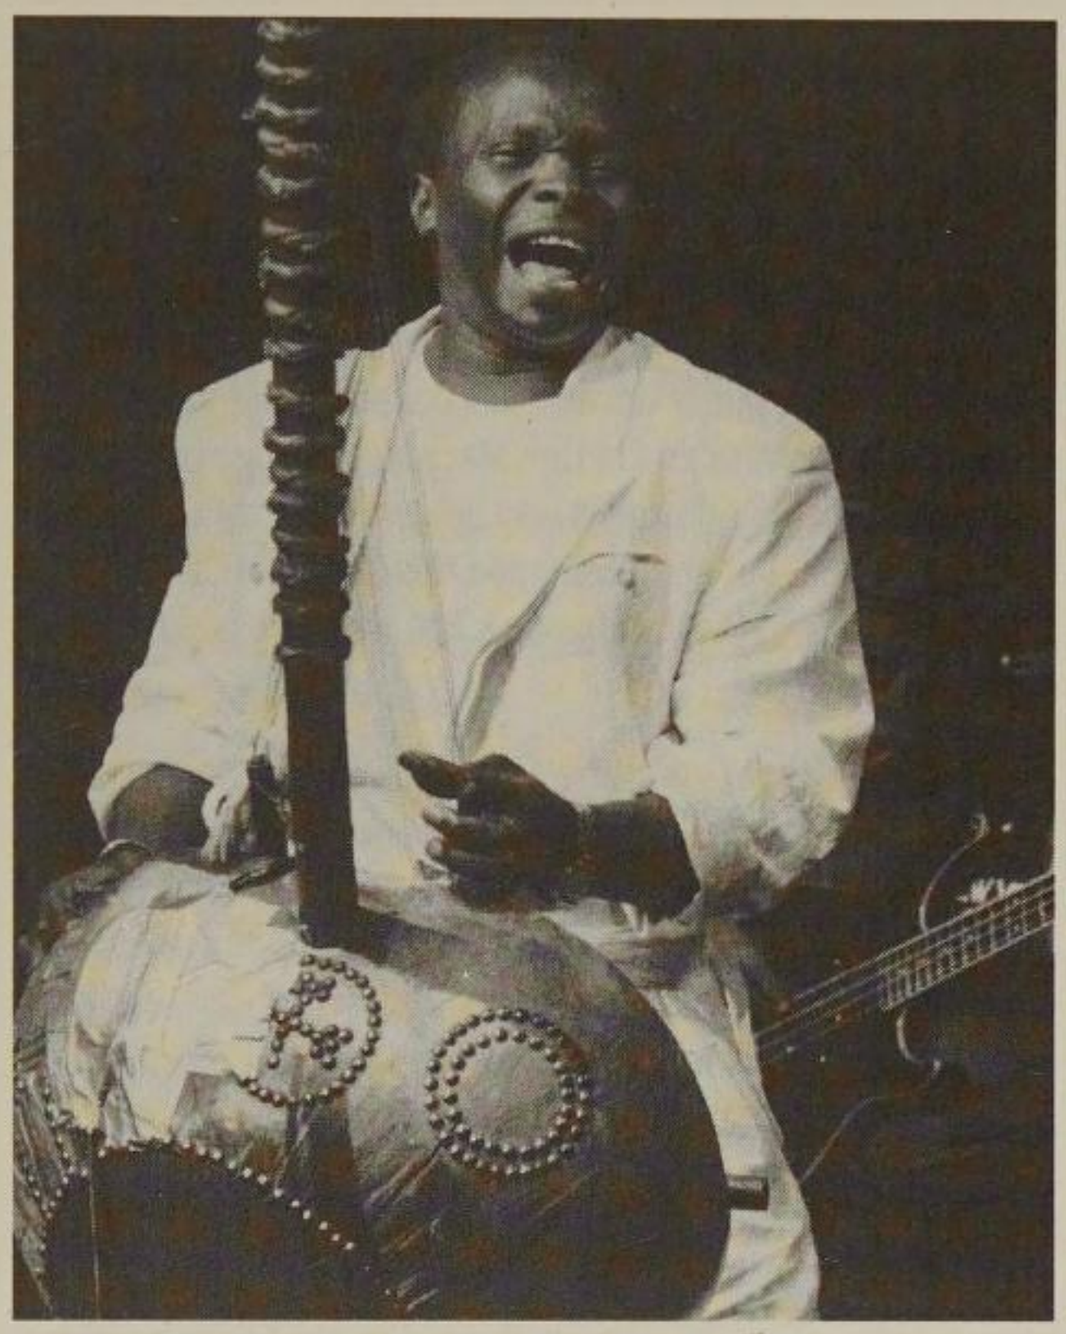
j. poet



Mory Kanté

Dominic Kanza & the African Rhythm Machine

Hybrid soukous

Formed 1990, in New York, NY, USA. Based in Brooklyn, NY, USA.

Dominic Kanza (born 1964, in Zaire [now Congo]), guitar, vocals; Fernand Tchikounzi (Congo), vocals; Maggie Tchikounzi (Congo), vocals; Jojo Kuo (Ghana), drums; Urban Sanchez (Puerto Rico), percussion; Mbuyiselo Mgwandi (South Africa), bass; Mark Adams (USA), keyboards.

One of world music's most distinguished behind-the-scenes talents, Dominic Kanza has recently stepped into the spotlight with pleasing results. A sought-after sideman with top-shelf international artists from Papa Wemba to Paul Simon, and the composer of one of The Oprah Winfrey Show's theme songs, he released his first album as a headliner in 1999, thereby letting more of the world in on what concert throngs in his adoptive hometown of Brooklyn have long known. Born in Congo, bred in England, resident in the U.S., and at home across the world, Kanza's globalist tastes are reflected in his multi-influenced music (from Congo's bubbly, skipping soukous style—a variant of rumba—to rap and jazz), and his international band, whom he takes glee in introducing as various heads of state—and by the end of a typical concert, they can count on every audience member's vote.

what's available: Congo! ♪♪♪♪ (DKMusic, 1999, prod. Dominic Kanza) is the kind of sheer delight for the listener that belies painstaking craft on the part of the musicians. But judging from the jubilance of the end product, they seem happy to do it. Kanza's ebullient guitar work makes no fuss about his agile virtuosity, and the African Rhythm Machine's energy befits their name while their fluidity goes way beyond it. Kanza's lyrics may lack distinction, but hardly dampen this party. On CD you can't see the unit's impressive dancing, but you'll be busy enough doing your own.

influences:
◀◀ Papa Wemba, Carlos Santana

Adam McGovern

Kaoma

Worldbeat

Formed 1987, in Paris, France. Based in Paris, France.

Jean-Claude Bonaventure, keyboards, leader; Michel Abhissira, drums; Jacky Arconte, guitar; Chico Roger Dru, bass, percussion; Loalwa Braz, lead vocals; Monica Nogueira, vocals; Fania Niang, vocals.

World-music fans tend to be a serious lot, so it's good that every so often an act like Kaoma comes along to break the balloon. Kaoma, simply put, was an Afropop version of the Monkees. In 1986 Jean Krakos, then head of Celluloid Records, got wind of a new rhythm from Brazil. "Llorando se fue," a hit by a Bolivian folk band called K'Jarkas, had been "samba-ized" and the result was dubbed the lambada. Krakos sold Celluloid and used the money to acquire the copyrights of hundreds of tunes that used the lambada rhythm. Back in Paris, Krakos put together Kaoma from a group of African and Brazilian session players. The band's recording of "Lambada," actually a watered-down version of "Llorando se fue," was used for an Orangina commercial and the single exploded, sparking a worldwide phenomenon that died out as fast as it started. Epic picked up the single, and later the album, for U.S. release, but the fad was already over before the album hit American record bins. Check out the Creadores de Lambada compilation (Rodven, 1989) if you want a sample of the real thing.

what to avoid: Happily, Kaoma's counterfeit World Beat woof! (Epic, 1989, Prod. Jean-Claude Bonaventure) didn't catch on, proving that consumers are capable of exhibiting bouts of good taste. File it with your old Milli Vanilli album.

influences:
◀◀ The Monkees, new-age mush

see also: Touré Kunda

j. poet

Kapelye

Klezmer

Formed 1979, in Brooklyn, NY, USA. Based in NY, USA.

Henry Sapoznik, banjo, vocals; Eric Berman, tuba; Lauren Brody, accordion, vocals; Adrienne Cooper, vocals; Pete Sokolow, keyboards, vocals. (All members are from USA.)

Led by banjo player, vocalist, and folklorist Henry Sapoznik, Kapelye is one of the spearheads of the revival of klezmer, the traditional music of Eastern European Jews. The founder and director of both the YIVO Max and Frieda Weinstein Archives of Recorded Sound and the Yiddish Folk Arts Institute, and a music critic for National Public Radio, Sapoznik has used Kapelye as an outlet for the Yiddish songs he's researched and collected. While Sapoznik remains the guiding force of the band, Kapelye is a group effort with each member contributing years of experience. Lead vocalist Adrienne Cooper has been singing all her life. The latest of four generations of singers, Cooper holds degrees in history from Hebrew University and the University of Chicago, and acquired her musical training at the Rubin Academy of Music in Israel. A cofounder of the Yiddish folk arts program KlezKamp (on the faculty of which Sapoznik and Sokolow serve) and the Joseph Papp Yiddish Theater, Cooper appeared in the off-Broadway show Song of Paradise and has sung on numerous albums, including the Grammy-nominated soundtrack to the documentary Partisans of Vilna and recordings by the Klezmatics and the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band. She also recorded a duo album, Dreaming in Yiddish, with Joyce Rosenzweig. Accordionist and vocalist Lauren Brody has been singing and playing traditional Yiddish—as well as Bulgarian and Macedonian—music since the late 1970s. She has performed with such groups as Pitu Guli, Aman, Trio Svetlana, Novo Selo, and the Joel Rubin Klezmer Band. Tuba player Eric Berman is a veteran of numerous orchestras, including the San Antonio Symphony, not to mention having operated a successful practice as an entertainment lawyer. Clarinetist Ken Maltz holds degrees in music education, theory, composition, and performance from Hofstra University, C.W. Post College, and Yale University. Keyboard player and vocalist Pete Sokolow has performed with such klezmer legends as Dave Tarras, Sid Beckerman, and the Epstein Brothers, in addition to the Klezmer Plus! band with Sapoznik. He also orchestrated eight albums for Chaba (Lubavitch) Nigunim, two albums for Shlomo Carlebach, the off-Broadway show The Golden Land, and the Partisans of Vilná score.

what to buy: Combining archival radio transcripts and new recordings, On the Air: Old Time Jewish American Radio ♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1995, prod. Henry Sapoznik) recreates the old-world charm of Yiddish radio shows from the 1930s and '40s.

what to buy next: Kapelye's debut album, Future and Past ♪♪♪ (Flying Fish, 1983, prod. Kapelye), set the framework for the band's subsequent recordings, with its combination of traditional Yiddish music and contemporary-minded instrumental virtuosity.

the rest:
Kapelye's Chicken ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1987)
Levine & His Flying Machine ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1987)

influences:
⏮ Eastern European Jewish musical tradition, Dave Tarras ⏭ Klezmer Conservatory Band, Don Byron's Bug Music, Klezmorim

see also: The Klezmatics, Klezmer Plus!, Dave Tarras

Craig Harris

Karnataka College of Percussion

South Indian classical music

Formed c. 1965, in Bangalore, India. Based in Bangalore, India.

K. Raghavendra, vina; T.A.S. Mani, mridangam; Mrs. R.A. Ramamani, vocals, konnakkol (rhythmic speaking); R.A. Rajagopal, konnakkol, mridangam, ghatam; T.N. Shashikumar, konnakkol, mridangam, kanjira, tavil; M.V. Sampathkumar, morsing, tambora; M.S. Govindaswamy, violin; V.K. Raman, flute. (All members are from India.)

Dr. Krishna Raghavendra, who also teaches at his own school in Bridgewater, Massachusetts, U.S., has been playing music all his life, and is a senior member of the faculty at Karnataka College of Percussion. The school trains people in percussion and music, and has fielded a touring performing troupe since the late 1970s. When you listen to South Indian classical music the last thing you expect is a jew's-harp, but an Indian jaw harp called the morsing is one of the featured instruments on KCP's one album to date, River Yamuna, a collection of classical and traditional pieces. For this album, Raghavendra "wanted to present as many percussion instruments as I could. There is ghatam, a cylindrical clay pot open at one end; kanjira, a lizard-skin tambourine; dholak, a folkloric drum with a distinctive ringing sound; and more. The drums play solo, in ensemble, and accompany the music and singing." Discovering new sounds is always a kick, and hearing the morsing and kanjira, either solo or supporting Raghavendra's sharp, subtle, sitar-like veena playing, is a treat.

what's available: The drummers and singers on River Yamuna ♪♪♪½ (Music of the World, 1997, prod. K. Raghavendra, Bob Haddad) take us into many areas of Indian folk and classical music that have been largely unrecorded in the West. The frame drum and jew's-harp duets are especially unique and inventive.

influences:
⏮ Alla Rakha, Ali Akbar Khan

see also: Dissidenten

j. poet

Kashtin

Innu pop, singer/songwriter

Formed 1989, in Maliotenam Reserve, Quebec, Canada. Based in Maliotenam Reserve, Quebec, Canada.

Claude McKenzie, guitar, vocals; Florent Vollant, guitar, vocals. (Both members are from Canada.)

Claude McKenzie and Florent Vollant are Montagnais Indians from the Maliotenam Reserve on Quebec's North Shore. They speak and sing in Innu, a language spoken by less than 12,000 people, but their music, a melodic jangle of electric guitars and straightforward rock rhythms with a hint of Cajun and Canadian folk music, struck a chord with the Canadian public. When McKenzie and Vollant met, they were already in other bands, but when they began playing together, the sparks flew. "It was like a tornado," Vollant says in retrospect, and indeed "kashtin" is Innu for "tornado." Innu, the band's debut album, went gold and led to sold-out tours all across Canada and western Europe, including a week at the St-Denis Theater in Paris. The band's second album, Akua Luta, went gold in six weeks; then disaster struck. McKenzie, who'd been living the expected irresponsible rock-star life, had a car accident on the Maliotenam reserve that seriously injured an 11-year-old girl. He pleaded guilty to drunk driving and spent nine months in jail. After his release, he went solo and recorded Innu Town, an album full of brooding ballads (including one in English, "I Got a Taste of Tears," that some think relates directly to the accident). McKenzie and Vollant recently put together a new version of Kashtin, and are touring with McKenzie as opening act.

what's available: Innu ♪♪♪½ (Tristar/Sony, 1991, prod. Guy Trépanier, Claude Ranger) is a low-key charmer that mixes Native music, pop, blues, and folk into a smooth package. The duo share satisfyingly contrasting lead vocal chores, with Vollant having a smooth country tenor and McKenzie a darker, John Fogerty–esque rasp. As befits a second album after a mega-selling debut, the production values on Akua Luta ♪♪♪½ (Tristar/Sony, 1994, prod. Kashtin, Toby Gendron) are much higher, which is especially noticeable on the rhythm tracks. That said, the duo's pleasing mix of Native, blues, singer/songwriter, and bright 1960s pop influences remains intact. On his solo outing, Innu Town ♪♪♪♪ (Groupe Concept, 1996, prod. Guy Trépanier), McKenzie trys a simpler, folkier sound. The album has a "young country" polish, which supplies a good counterbalance to McKenzie's tortured vocals.

Kassav'

influences:

The Louvin Brothers, Gordon Lightfoot, Ian & Sylvia, Creedence Clearwater Revival, R.E.M.

see also: Robbie Robertson

j. poet

Kassav'

Zouk

Formed 1979, in Paris, France. Based in Paris, France.

Pierre-Edouard Decimus, bass, founder; Georges Decimus, bass; Jacob Desvarieux, guitar; Jean-Claude Naimro, keyboards, vocals; Jocelyn Beroard, vocals; Patrick Saint-Eloi, vocals; Jean Philippe Marthely, vocals; Claude Vamur, drums; Jacques Douglas Mbida, keyboards; César Durcin, percussion; Freddy Havsepian, trumpet; Jean-Pierre Ramirez, trumpet; Claude Thiurifays, sax; Hamid Belhocine, trombone. (All members are from Guadeloupe.)

From the late 1950s to the advent of Kassav', the music of Guadeloupe and Martinique had been dominated by Haitian forms, especially cadance and compas. With the exception of a few bands like Exile One and Vikings de Guadeloupe, the Antillean music scene consisted of groups doing covers of Haitian hits. "Until the 1970s, the Haitians dominated our music," explains Jocelyn Beroard, Kassav's lead female vocalist. "Many Haitians lived and recorded in New York, and the studio sound they had was very slick. The studios back home weren't as technologically advanced, so the local albums didn't sound so good." In 1978 Pierre-Edouard Decimus, one of the founders of the Vikings, had grown disillusioned with the struggle to establish credibility for his band and decided to leave the music business. He moved to Paris, where many African and Caribbean expatriates were beginning to experiment with the kind of intercultural music that would soon make that city one of the planet's most important world-music hubs. Before calling it quits, Decimus wanted to put out one last record, a disc that would draw on the traditional gwo ka drum styles of Guadeloupe, American funk, French folk music, and Haitian pop. For the project he enlisted the help of his brother George, guitar ace Jacob F. Desvarieux, and an 11-piece percussion section. They called the project

Kassav', in honor of the cassava, the Antillian tuber that's a staple of the Caribbean diet.

The first Kassav' LP, Love and Ka Dance ("Ka Dance" is a play on "cadance," a friendly jibe at Haitian music's then-dominance on the Antillian charts), was a sensation and made Decimus rethink his decision to leave the music business. "At first Kassav' was a studio band," said Beroard. "Edouard had certain ideas about the music; everything was written down, the musicians came in and played what he had written." But after a few studio efforts, Kassav' was so popular that a touring band became a necessity. Decimus called up the best players he could find—from Paris and back home—and asked them to join the band. "At first we were reluctant," Beroard said. "We all had solo careers, but we realized we could help our own careers by joining this band. And since many of us wrote songs, Kassav' became more democratic, and more improvisational."

Kassav' was so popular that it spawned a new genre, zouk—a Creole word that means both "party" and "sweat," an apt description of Kassav"s high-voltage sound. Their mix of soukous, cadance, compas, highlife, reggae, and rock, combined with a theatrical performance style, revolutionized Caribbean dance music, and had such an impact on Congo that many bands there incorporated zouk into their own soukous music and called the new fusion "zoukous." Until 1982 Kassav' commuted between Guadeloupe and Paris, but since the studios were better in Europe, the band finally relocated to Paris en masse. From their Parisian base, Kassav' redefined the music of the Antilles, spawning dozens of imitators, both good and bad. "Before Kassav' most bands didn't play live," Beroard explained. "The scene was small, and many bands were made up of different combinations of the same musicians. Since our success, many new musicians have come along to play zouk. Also, before Kassav', there were not many women in music. Today many women are making a career of performing." During their 15-odd years on stage (the band went on what seems to be a permanent hiatus in 1994), Kassav' evolved at a rapid pace. "We had musicians from all over the world," Beroard says. "Algeria, Cameroon, Martinique, Guadeloupe, France—all over the world, and we always kept our sound fresh. And in most bands, you have at most two or three people who write songs. In Kassav' we have eight or nine, so if you get a song on an album, you're really lucky. But it also keeps the quality high."

Over the course of their career, the core of Kassav' (listed above) was fairly stable, but many artists passed through their ranks on the way to becoming stars in their own right. And when Beroard or Patrick Saint-Eloi put out a solo album, they usually recorded with their Kassav' compatriots, and with Desvarieux or one of the Decimus brothers producing. At their height, the band was cranking out close to a dozen albums a year under

tuvan throat-singing

In 1921, in the ring of mountains where Siberia meets Outer Mongolia, a group of nomadic herdsmen founded a new country: the Shepherd's Republic of Tannu Tuva. Aside from being the region where Genghis Khan once came to recruit his horsemen, the country is best known for its primary musical form, Tuvan throat-singing. This distinctive sound comes from a tightening of the singer's throat, which screens out all but a few overtones and amplifies those that remain, resulting in as many as four distinctly audible notes at once. There are three basic styles of throat-singing: sygyt, which is said to be an imitation of the gentle breezes of summer and the songs of birds; höömeï, which evokes the sound of wind swirling among rocks; and kargyraa, which sounds like the howling winds of winter. There are also four common embellishments of these styles: borbangnadyr, a trilling of the lips or tongue; ezenggileer, a pulsating sound that evokes images of horseback riding; chylandyk, which is a cricket-like combination of sygyt and kargyraa; and dymzhuktaar, which produces overtones with the mouth closed via throat-humming. The most noteworthy current practitioner of the genre is Kongar-ool Ondar, who holds the title of "People's Throat-Singer" in Tuva and was awarded the title "National Artist of Russia" by Boris Yeltsin after serenading the Russian president in 1994. Throat-singing is historically associated with adult males, but recent years have seen the form growing in popularity among Tuvan women and children. Even outside cultures are beginning to catch on: in 1995, American bluesman Paul "Earthquake" Pena went to Tuva to learn the throat-singing technique, and wound up winning first place in the kargyraa division at the second International Throat-Singing Festival, "Höömeï '95." A film about Pena's Tuvan adventures, Genghis Blues, won the Sundance Film Festival's Audience Award for Best Documentary in early 1999.

see also: Chirgilchin, Huun-Huur-Tu, Kongar-ool Ondar, Sainkho, Shu-De, Yat-Kha various names, all crammed with their trademark rhythms and punchy horn charts. Their first concert album, Live au Zenith, recorded right after they signed with CBS International, is one of the greatest live sets ever released. Although they're still relatively unknown in the U.S., the international success of Kassav' laid the groundwork for today's world-music explosion.

Bret Love

what to buy: Zouk Is the Only Medicine We Have ♪♪♪♪♪ (Greensleeves U.K., 1988, prod. Jacob Desvarieux, Pierre-Edouard Decimus), a compilation of Kassav"s early hits, is one of the most satisfying world-music albums extant, a non-stop orgy of rhythm and melody accented by the band's incredible lead singers. Kassav"s first album under the international CBS deal, Vini Pou ♪♪♪♪♪ (Columbia, 1987, prod. Jacob Desvarieux), captures them at the height of their creative powers. There isn't a weak track, and the balance between raw rhythm and studio polish is at its apex.

best of the rest:
Kassav' ♪♪♪½ (Celluloid, 1980)
Passeport ♪♪♪½ (Polydor France, 1983)
Live au Zenith ♪♪♪♪♪ (Columbia, 1986)
Tekit Izi ♪♪♪♪ (Columbia, 1987)
Majestik Zouk ♪♪♪♪ (Columbia, 1989)

worth searching for: Jocelyne Beroard's two "solo" albums, Siwo ♪♪♪♪♪ (Sonodisc, 1986, prod. Jacob Desvarieux) and Milans ♪♪♪♪½ (Columbia, 1991, prod. Jacob Desvarieux), were recorded at the creative height of Kassav', and they're both killers.

influences:
◀◀ Vikings de Guadeloupe, Exile One

▶▶ Experience 7, Zouk Machine, Simon Jurad, Zouk Allstars, Francky Vincent

j. poet

Dolores Keane

Celtic

Born in Caherlistrane, County Galway, Ireland. Based in County Galway, Ireland.

Keane's family has lived at Caherlistrane in County Galway for generations and are justifiably famous for their singing and musicianship. Her own talent blossomed early: "Learning songs and tunes was like learning to walk," she says. A neighbor of fiddle master Frankie Gavin, she appeared with him on Irish-folk supergroup De Dannan's first album. By that time she was already a mesmerizing presence on the Irish traditional music scene. She left the band to perform with her husband, John Faulkner, reunited with De Dannan for a time (including a memorable performance of "Let It Be" dueting with Mary Black), and then eventually began to pursue a solo career. She is, as folk great Nanci Griffith describes her, "the voice of Ireland."

what to buy: The Best of Dolores Keane ♪♪♪♪ (Dara, 1997, prod. various) compiles 16 of the finest songs in Keane's catalog. In addition to selections from her previous solo albums, it includes collaborations with Emmylou Harris, De Dannan, Liam Bradley, and Mick Hanly. Keane's best material is traditional and she can be compelling at it, as her work with De Dannan and husband John Faulkner attests. Her last several solo albums have been more contemporary in nature, as she tries to follow in the commercially successful footsteps of Mary Black and others. Fortunately this retrospective stays primarily in a traditional vein, with only a nod toward these more recent efforts.

what to buy next: Keane's solo album There Was a Maid ♪♪♪½ (Claddagh, 1978) and her collaborations with John Faulkner contain some great material; any of several releases are worthwhile. Try Farewell to Eirinn ♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1981, prod. various), Broken Hearted I'll Wander ♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1981, prod. P.J. Curtis), or Sail Óg Rua ♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1984, prod. Dolores Keane, John Faulkner). You can't miss with any of them.

the rest:
Dolores Keane ♪♪♪ (self-released)
Lion in a Cage ♪♪♪½ (Rings End Road, 1989)
Solid Ground ♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1993)

influences:
◀◀ Sarah Keane, Rita Keane

▶▶ Niamh Parsons, Eleanor McEvoy, Karan Casey

see also: The Chieftains, De Dannan, John Faulkner, Frankie Gavin

Neal Walters

James Keane

Irish traditional

Born February 7, 1948, in Drimnagh, Dublin, Ireland. Based in New York, NY, USA.

While James Keane's achievements may have been somewhat overshadowed by those of his older fiddle-playing brother, Chieftains member Seán Keane, they are impressive nevertheless, and Keane must be counted among Ireland's top exponents of the B/C button accordion. Keane is first and foremost a "reel man": he can play reel after reel for hours with the same great drive and energy, a penchant which one can undoubtedly trace back to his days with the Castle Ceili Band of Dublin. Keane was born into a musical family. His mother and father were both fiddle players, from Longford and Clare respectively, and they made sure to expose Seán and James to as much traditional music as they could find, taking them to the Dublin Pipers' Club and to the many local and national fleadhs (music festivals). Being a bit of a rebel, James went against the family tradition and became interested in the accordion, starting at age six when he began toying with a small instrument his uncle Mick Keane had left at his parents' house. As soon as he started showing promise, his father got him his own instrument. When asked about his early influences, Keane names musicians like Clare piper Willie Clancy and accordion players Joe Cooley (whom he met again years later in San Francisco), Sonny Brogan, and Bill Hart. By age 11 Keane was entering competitions, and by the time he was 16 was a member of the famous Castle Ceili Band alongside such performers as Clare fiddle players John Kelly and Joe Ryan, flute players Michael Tubridy and Mick O'Connor, and piano player Bridie Lafferty. It was during the mid-1960s that Keane accomplished the unprecedented feat of winning three consecutive All-Ireland senior titles on the accordion: in 1964, 1965, and 1966.

In 1967 he came to the United States on a three-week tour with the Loughrea Ceili Band, composed of Joe Burke (accordion), Kathleen Collins (fiddle), and Paddy Carty (flute). As soon as he returned to Ireland, Keane began making plans for another trip. He was back in New York the very next year to start performing at the John Barleycorn, a well-known Manhattan "ballad pub," with Dublin-born singer Michael "Jesse" Owens. This was a quite a change of pace for Keane, who could no longer just play the traditional jigs and reels but mostly had to accompany songs. However, in the early 1970s he recorded two instrumental albums, one of them the 1971 release Sweet and Traditional Music of Ireland, which also featured Longford fiddler Paddy Reynolds and New York–born accordionist Charlie Mulvihill. (The album has now been partially reissued as Atlantic Wave, with newly recorded tracks by Keane.) Before he left Dublin, Keane had shared an apartment with two members of the famous Johnstons, Paul Brady and Mick Moloney, both of whom credit Keane with their introduction to traditional Irish music. During the 1970s Moloney would also find himself in the United States, working towards a Ph.D. in folklore and producing recordings of Irish traditional music. Keane was one of the artists recorded for Irish Traditional Instrumental Music from the East Coast of America, Volume I, an anthology Moloney produced for Rounder Records in 1977. In 1980, soon after Keane moved to Canada to join the band Ryan's Fancy, he was invited by Moloney to record for Green Linnet. The result was Keane's powerful Roll Away the Reel World, with brother Seán playing fiddle on a few tracks. Settling back in New York in 1983, Keane resumed his musical activities in the city and renewed his collaboration with Moloney, touring with the Green Fields of America and appearing on Moloney's 1984 duet album Uncommon Bonds alongside fiddler Eugene O'Donnell. In 1991 Keane appeared with many other Irish performers at an event organized to bring attention to the plight of Joseph Doherty, an Irish patriot held in a U.S. jail, a recording of which was released as The Rights of Man. Keane's long-awaited second solo album, That's the Spirit, finally came out in 1994, with a little surprise for his fans—the preceding year, Keane had switched from his trademark Paolo Soprani accordion to a Castagnari box, the difference in sound being quite noticeable on the recording. Keane's most recent release is With Friends Like These. It features legendary musicians like Tommy Peoples, Matt Molloy, Liam O'Flynn, Paddy Glackin, and Kevin Conneff, all of whom Keane met around 1962 and 1963, when traditional music sessions were taking off in Dublin. For his latest project, tentatively called Sweeter As the Years Roll By and soon to be released on the Shanachie label, Keane has come full circle, collaborating with younger artists—particularly members of the group Turas, who are the children of musicians with whom he performed in the Castle Ceili Band in the 1960s.

what to buy: Roll Away the Reel World ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1980, prod. Mick Moloney) is the classic James Keane recording. The duets of the two Keane brothers are especially good, as on the reels "The Tempest/Sean Frank," but Keane's accordion playing is nowhere better than on the opening reel medley "Crossing the Shannon" or on "Master Crowley's," one of his favorite sets. That's the Spirit ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1994, prod. Gabriel Donahue, James Keane) is Keane's first album recorded with his new Castagnari accordion. This, as well as the aggressive guitar and bodhrán (Irish frame drum) accompaniments, account for the album's somewhat different sound. However, the gain in precision that the new instrument allows, as Keane explains in the notes, well serves his energetic style and easily makes up for whatever raw edge from the old Paolo Soprani may have been lost in the transition. Listen to him play Martin Mulhaire's reel "Carmel Mahoney Mulhaire," which he had recorded as "O'Mahoney's" on the previous album, and you'll be convinced. With Friends Like These ♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1998, prod. Garry O'Briain, Greg Anderson) is Keane's "going home" album, recorded with the musicians with whom Keane used to play back in Dublin when a teenager. They also happen to constitute a virtual "who's who" of Irish traditional players: Tommy Peoples and Paddy Glackin (fiddles), Matt Molloy (flute), Liam O'Flynn (uilleann pipes), and Kevin Conneff (bodhrán, vocals), with Garry O'Briain (keyboards, guitar, mandocello) providing the accompaniments.

what to buy next: Although Atlantic Wave ♪♪♪♪½ (Kells Music, 1997, prod. Tom Horan, Paddy Noonan) is a reissue of sorts, half of it being from Sweet and Traditional Music of Ireland ♪♪♪♪ (Rego, 1971, prod. Paddy Noonan), Keane's tracks are brand new. The producers and performers were uncomfortable with the electric bass part on the original recordings, and Keane, who already had re-recorded some of his original tunes for later solo albums, asked to redo his tracks entirely, although still with piano great Felix Dolan as the accompanist. Keane's accordion would be easy to miss in the ensemble sound of The Rights of Man: The Concert for Joseph Doherty ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1991, prod. Mick Moloney), but he plays a long and fiery solo on the excellent Gaelic Roots ♪♪♪♪½ (Kells Music, 1997, prod. Séamus Connolly), recorded live at Boston College during the festival of the same name.

worth searching for: Keane's great solo on the reels "Within a Mile of Dublin/The Spike Island Lassies" is only one of 22 reasons to look for Irish Traditional Instrumental Music from the East Coast of America, Volume I ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1977, prod. Mick Moloney), an anthology of some of the best Irish musicians in contemporary America.

influences:

◀◀ Willie Clancy, Joe Cooley, Sonny Brogan, Bill Harte

▶▶ Joe Burke, Bobby Gardiner, Billy McComiskey, John Whelan

see also: Liz Carroll, the Chieftains, Felix Dolan, Paddy Glackin, Matt Molloy, Mick Moloney, Liam O'Flynn, Tommy Peoples

Philippe Varlet

Salif Keita

Afropop

Born 1949, in Djoliba, Mali. Based in Paris, France.

The singing styles of Mali are set to a blend of traditional West African music, jazz, and pop by Salif Keita. A member of Mali's popular Rail Band in the early 1970s, Keita has continued to evolve his complex dance music as a soloist and a bandleader in his own right. Keita's 1992 album, Amen, was an international success that led to his becoming the first African bandleader nominated for a Grammy. The third of 13 children, the artist is descended from 13th-century emperor Soundiata Keita. Despite the occupational obstacle of limited eyesight and the cultural stigma of albino skin, Keita showed an aptitude for music since childhood. His family, however, had little regard for his talents, entertainment careers being considered unacceptably beneath someone of his lineage. Nonetheless, Keita left home for Mali's capital city, Bamako, where he performed as a street singer. His break came when he joined the Rail Band, a government-sponsored ensemble that fused Cuban, Congolese, and Malian influences. In 1972, with Guinean guitar great Kanté Manfila, Keita left the Rail Band for Les Ambassadeurs and an inter-band rivalry that riveted the region for some years to follow. His second band's great success notwithstanding, Keita set off on a solo career in the 1980s. Shortly after relocating to Paris in 1987, he released his debut solo album, Soro, produced by respected West African hitmaker Ibrahim Sylla. After paying homage to the jazz-fusion band Weather Report on his second album, 1989's Ko-Yan, Keita teamed with Weather Report keyboardist Josef Zawinul, who produced his third recording, Amen. Keita's 1995 release, Folon . . . The Past, was rated one of the year's 10 best albums by Tower Pulse! In 1999 he finally released Papa, another groundbreaking (but long delayed) album with a top-flight African/American band and production by avant-rocker Vernon Reid. He previewed this music on the well-received 1998 edition of the Africa Fête touring revue, all-the-more confirming his stature and building anticipation for his next move.

what to buy: The Mansa of Mali: A Retrospective ♪♪♪♪½ (Mango, 1994, prod. various) samples tunes from Keita's first three albums—Soro, Ko-Yan, and Amen —and includes a previously unreleased live version of Keita and Les Ambassadeurs' hit "Mandjou," as well as three songs from the soundtrack of L'Enfant Lion, a French film in which Keita performs.

what to buy next: Amen ♪♪♪♪ (Mango, 1992, prod. Josef Zawinul) is Keita's most creatively successful recording. An acoustic album, Amen remains rooted in the folkloric sounds of Keita's native country. Complementary guest performers from beyond it include Carlos Santana and Wayne Shorter. The next millennium of Pan-African music begins a year or two early on the entrancing Papa ♪♪♪♪ (Metro Blue, 1999, prod. Salif Keita, Vernon Reid, Souleymane Doumbia), where the innovators of two continents meet.

the rest:

Soro ♪♪♪½ (Mango, 1987)
Ko-Yan ♪♪♪ (Mango, 1989)
Les Ambassadeurs International ♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1992)
Folon . . . The Past ♪♪♪½ (Mango, 1995)
Seydou Bathili ♪♪♪ (Sonodisc, 1997)

influences:

◀◀ Fanta Damba, Mory Kanté

▶▶ Oumou Sangare, Boukman Eksperyans

see also: Kanté Manfila, the Rail Band

Craig Harris

Doug Kershaw /Rusty & Doug

Cajun

Doug Kershaw born January 24, 1936, in Tiel Ridge, LA, USA. Rusty Kershaw born February 2, 1938, in Tiel Ridge, LA, USA. Rusty & Doug formed 1954. Disbanded 1964.

Rusty Kershaw, guitar, vocals; Doug Kershaw, fiddle, vocals.

With his fancy fiddling and on-stage flamboyance, Doug Kershaw was the first major artist to provide Cajun music with exposure to a wide audience that included college students and mainstream country fans. In 1948 Doug and his younger brothers Rusty and Pee Wee became part of the Continental Playboys, and in 1953 they hosted their own regional TV show. Rusty and Doug had their first hit record in 1955 with "So Lovely Baby," and in 1957 they cracked the charts again with "Love Me to Pieces." Their watershed year was 1961, when Doug's composition "Louisiana Man" exploded onto the regional and national charts. To this day, the song remains a Cajun and country standard. The duo split up in 1964, and Doug recorded a few mildly interesting albums for Warner Bros.

Salif Keita

what to buy: The Best of Doug Kershaw & Rusty Kershaw ♪♪♪½ (Curb, 1991) comes from the recordings the duo made for Roy Acuff's Hickory label during the 1950s and '60s. The album contains the hit versions of "Louisiana Man" and "Diggy Diggy Lo," which Doug Kershaw would re-record throughout his career. There are also versions of Hank Williams's "Kaw-Liga" and "Why Don't You Love Me" that the sparse instrumentation, sibling harmonies, and heavy slapback turn into an odd Cajun hillbilly rock. Strangely, the album doesn't include two of the duet's biggest hits from that time, "So Lovely Baby" and "Love Me to Pieces," but it's still a heck of a lot of fun.

what to buy next: The Best of Doug Kershaw ♪♪♪½ (Warner Bros., 1989, prod. various) contains versions of Doug's breakthrough hits from the 1960s, including "Louisiana Man" and "Diggy Diggy Lo," as well as spicy remakes of Hank Williams's "Jambalaya (On the Bayou)" and Fats Domino's "I'm Walkin'."

the rest:
The Cajun Way ♪♪½ (Warner Bros., 1969)
Alive & Pickin' ♪♪½ (Warner Bros., 1975)
The Louisiana Man ♪♪½ (Warner Bros., 1978)
(With Rusty Kershaw) Now and Then ♪♪ (Domino, 1992)

worth searching for: The Ragin' Cajun ♪♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1976) doesn't let up for a second. A great party album.

influences:
⏮ Iry LeJeune
⏭ Charlie Daniels, Beausoleil, Wayne Toups, Zachary Richard

Rick Petreycik and Brian Mansfield

Khac Chi Ensemble

Vietnamese folk music

Formed 1982, in Vietnam. Based in Vancouver, British Columbia, Canada.

Ho Khac Chi, dan bau; Hoang Ngoc Bich, k'longput, t'rung, tam thap; Le To Quyen, vocals; Nguyen Hoai Chau, percussion; Randy Raine-Reusch, ken be, vocal, senh tien. (All members are from Vietnam.)

Ho Khac Chi was born in 1950 in Nghe An, Vietnam. His parents were both musicians, and he entered the National School of Music when he was eight and studied dan bau (one-string box zither) for 10 years. After graduation he became an instructor and traveled throughout the country playing and collecting folk music. When the school reorganized he became one of the first recognized master folk musicians and conductor of the Traditional Music Orchestra. In 1982 he formed his ensemble, one of the first groups to feature the traditional instruments of Vietnam's highlands. In 1992, after an international tour, Ho Khac Chi and his wife Hoang Ngoc Bich settled in Vancouver, British Columbia. Hoang Ngoc Bich was born in 1964 and studied dan bau at the Hanoi School of Arts. At the Hanoi Music Conservatory she also studied k'longput (clapping tubes), t'rung (marimba), and tam thap (hammered dulcimer). She was the first woman to perform on the ko ni (fiddle), and has toured internationally on her own and as a member of the Khac Chi Ensemble.

what's available: Vietnamese music is incredibly diverse and, in some instances, strangely familiar to Western ears. The dan bau, for example, sounds like a pedal steel guitar, and on "Highland Dance" from Moonlight in Vietnam ♪♪♪½ (Henry St., 1997, prod. Randy Raine-Reusch) you wouldn't be surprised if Bob Wills popped up saying "Get it boy." The t'rung on "Forest Love" supplies a beat that would be at home in any disco, while the ve (percussive buzzers) and khen be (16-reed bamboo mouth harp) make "Mountain Cave" sound like a frolic for a gang of cartoon ghosts. The music is all acoustic and has a mellow, dreamlike quality that listeners should find instantly appealing.

influences:
⏮ Quy Bon Family Vietnamese Folk Theater

j. poet

Khaled /Cheb Khaled

Rai

Born February 29, 1960, in Sidi-El-Houri, Oran, Algeria. Based in Paris, France.

With his rugged tenor, charismatic stage presence, and thousand-watt smile, Khaled is King of Rai, a title he may have adopted in homage to Elvis Presley, one of his early idols. Since he burst out of Algeria in 1988, Khaled has kept himself on the leading edge of the rai revolution, ever expanding his stylistic horizons while keeping his music firmly based on the Bedouin traditions that give it its vitality. It's no wonder that EarthWorks chose a photo of Khaled to grace the cover of its 1988 compilation Rai Rebels. To many people, rai is Khaled.

Rai in Arabic means "opinion," and in the current Algerian political climate, having an opinion is dangerous. Rai is based on a combination of Bedouin traditional music and the more secular influences of the cities, in particular Oran, a port town where Spanish, Moroccan, French, and black Arabic traditions have a long history of cross-pollination. Cheikha Remitti, one of the earliest rai singers and still a powerful performing force at age 75, combined Bedouin music with a more modern attack, including the use of brass, electric guitars, and accordions in place of flutes and violins. In the 1960s, as rock culture swept the world, funk and rock began seeping into the music, and in the 1970s reggae also made an impact. By the late 1970s, rai had become Algeria's rock, with parents and clerics denouncing it for its Westernized energy and raw lyrics—singing about smoking, drinking, and sex in an Islamic country caused a sensation. The singers started calling themselves Chebs and Chabas—the masculine and feminine of a term meaning "youth" or "kid," a send-up of the traditional Cheikh and Cheikha title won by being a respected elder.

Khaled

Khaled himself began singing as a youth and was drawn to the freedom of rai and its implied lifestyle while still a teenager. A local producer heard the young singer at a wedding and asked him to make a record; "Trigh Lycée," a song about cutting class and chasing girls, became a smash. Khaled left his parents' home for the life of a musician, and with a band he called the Five Stars began playing parties, weddings, and clubs. In order to further his career, Khaled made a batch of hastily recorded cassettes, which expanded his reputation as a top singer. In the mid-1980s Khaled met Rachid Baba Ahmed, the man who became the Phil Spector of rai, and together they cut a stunning succession of tunes that laid the foundation of modern "pop rai."

In 1985 Khaled relocated to Paris, partially to escape Algeria's growing sectarian violence. (Rachid, Cheb Hasni, and other singers and producers have been murdered for their pop-music "blasphemy.") Khaled's first Western album was Kutche, a jazz/rock take on rai that did nothing to convey the singer's forceful vocal style. Since then, Khaled has returned to a more traditional form of rai, although not without Western influences. His last two albums, N'ssi N'ssi and Sahra, have both launched singles into the French pop—not world—charts, making him Algeria's first true international pop star.

what to buy: On N'ssi N'ssi ♪♪♪♪♪ (Mango, 1993, prod. Don Was, Philippe Eidel), Khaled's voice rides a wave of Arabic funk, backed by an Egyptian string orchestra, hot rock guitar, Latin keyboards, honkin' R&B sax, and juju-style pedal steel guitar. Happily, the international touches serve to magnify Khaled's Algerian soul, making this the best possible kind of crossover music.

what to buy next: About half the tracks on Sahra ♪♪♪♪♪ (Island, 1996, prod. Don Was, Philippe Eidel, Clive Hunt, Jean-Jacques Goldman) were recorded in Jamaica at Groove Yard studios with the island's top session players, and their reggae/rai fusion is smooth and satisfying.

the rest:
Kutchie ♪♪♪ (Intuition, 1989)
Khaled ♪♪♪♪ (Barclay, 1992)

worth searching for: The European albums above are all polished studio efforts, but Khaled put out dozens of cassettes before the move to France. Some of this material can be found on various compilations, including Young Khaled ♪♪♪½ (Buda, 1993), Best of Cheb Khaled ♪♪♪½ (Blue Silver), El Marsem ♪♪♪½ (Editions Bouarfa), and Serbi Serbi ♪♪♪½ (Editions Bouarfa).

influences:
◀◀ Cheikha Remitti, Cheikh Hamada, Cheikh Madani, Cheb Hamid

▶▶ Cheb Mami

see also: Cheikha Remitti, Alan Stivell

j. poet

Ali Akbar Khan

North Indian classical, Indian fusion

Born April 14, 1922, in Shibpur (a.k.a. Shivpur), East Bengal (Bangladesh). Based in San Anselmo, CA, USA.

Ali Akbar Khan is routinely acclaimed as a genius and the greatest living performer on the sarod, a 25-string, lute-like Indian instrument. The celebrated violinist Lord Yehudi Menuhin has called him "the greatest musician in the world." He has been designated a National Living Treasure in India, where he has been awarded the nation's highest honors: the President of India in 1963 and the Padma Vibhusan (Lotus Jewel) in 1988. In America, Khansahib (as he is respectfully called) has been recognized with a MacArthur Foundation "Genius Grant" in 1991, the Bill Graham Lifetime Achievement Award in 1993, a National Heritage Fellowship from the National Endowment for the Arts in 1997, and five Grammy Award nominations. And yet, beyond these material measures of success, it's the passion to teach his beloved music that has directed and defined his life.

Born in 1922 in East Bengal (now Bangladesh), Khansahib was the only son of Allauddin Khan, a multi-instrumentalist who traced his lineage through Mian Tansen, a legendary court musician of the 16th-century Moghul Emperor Akbar. The senior Khan—who lived to be 110—defied the rigid conventions of his day by integrating the techniques and styles of many instruments and regions; today, he is widely revered as India's greatest musician of the 20th century. Khansahib's father trained him from the age of three and, for the next 20 years, increased his regimen until he was studying and practicing 18 hours a day. Allauddin Khan withheld food if the young musician didn't live up to expectations, and forbade his son to waste precious energy in ordinary conversation. "During my childhood," Khansahib reflects, "up to age 16 or 17, I had not been allowed to say anything except 'yes' and 'no.' And if I said 'no,' my father would beat me." While abusive, the senior Khan's methods were effective—he imparted his instinct, passion, and desire to spread the family's musical heritage to the rest of the world.

Ali Akbar Khan performed his first concert at the age of 14 and became a court musician for the Maharaja of Jodhpur when he was still in his early 20s. In 1955, Yehudi Menuhin invited Khansahib and his brother-in-law, Ravi Shankar, to Europe and the United States to introduce Indian music to Western audiences. When Shankar canceled at the last minute, Khansahib embarked upon the journey only because his friends literally pushed him onto the plane. During the trip, Khansahib made the first American television performance of Indian music (on Alistair Cooke's Omnibus program) and the first Indian music recording ever on a long-playing record. In 1956, he established the Ali Akbar College of Music (AACM) in Calcutta. In the following years, Khansahib returned to Europe and America many times to perform and teach. At the invitation of the American Society of Eastern Art, Khansahib taught courses in Berkeley, California, in 1965 and 1966. Encouraged by the students' interest and sincerity, he founded an American Ali Akbar College of Music in Berkeley in 1967—the same year that Ravi Shankar enthralled flower children at the Monterey International Pop Festival. (Four years later, the two gave perhaps the West's most famous Indian music performances during George Harrison's Concert for Bangla Desh benefit at Madison Square Garden.) In small classroom settings, Khansahib has personally taught between 7,000 and 10,000 students, including Mickey Hart, Carlos Santana, Darby Slick, Lisa Moskow, Matthew Montfort, and Jai Uttal. Eminent tabla drum player Pandit Swapan Chaudhuri is AACM's Director of Percussion, the position that was previously held by tabla wizard Zakir Hussain. Guest faculty members—including Ravi Shankar, V.G. Jog, Vilayat Khan, Hussain and his father Alla Rakha, G.S. Sachdev, and Laxmi (a.k.a. Lakshmi) Shankar—have taught master classes and helped students with technique on a one-on-one basis. AACM also has established branches in Basel, Switzerland, and Fremont, California.

In addition to his classroom, performance, and recording activities, Khansahib is still transcribing his father's notes, which only he can decipher. He has also archived 30 years of his classroom lessons and thousands of performances on audio tape. As this book goes to press he is engaged in a stunning orchestral composition for Indian and Western instruments, which may be recorded and released in the next year or two. You may contact the Ali Akbar College of Music at 215 West End Avenue, San Rafael, CA 94901; (415) 454-6264; http://www.nbn.com/~aacm/. (If you are interested in purchasing Indian music or instruments, the College Store—(415) 454-0581—is a fabulous resource.) You may contact Khansahib's family-run record label, Alam Madina Music Productions, at 74 Broadmoor Avenue, San Anselmo, CA 94960; (415) 456-5963; http://www.ammp.com/records.html.

what to buy: Ali Akbar Khan has either released or appeared on more than 120 recordings on LP, 45 rpm, cassette, and CD—and there were probably EPs and 8-track tapes along the way—so there is much to find, but the following surveys are the most essential. The Grammy-nominated Then and Now ♪♪♪♪♪ (AMMP, 1995, prod. Mary J. Khan) is an ideal introduction to the sarod maestro. Disc one includes the entirety of Khansahib's landmark 1955 recording Music of India: Morning & Evening Ragas (Angel, 1955), complete with spoken introductions by Yehudi Menuhin. Disc two features a stellar 1994 concert of Khansahib and tabla virtuoso Zakir Hussain. Contrasting performances four decades apart underscore Khansahib's fundamental brilliance for melody and timing, demonstrate how his picking style has become more aggressive, and showcase the maturation of both his emotional focus and his interplay with his accompanist. Also nominated for a Grammy, Passing on the Tradition ♪♪♪♪♪ (AMMP, 1996, prod. Mary J. Khan) features two classical ragas that are all the more breathtaking for their challenging natures. "Raga Marwa" presents an eloquent alap (contemplative, expressive introduction to a raga) that ranges in emotion from devotional yearning to epic heroism. This heartfelt passion continues in the improvisations of Khansahib and tabla master Pandit Swapan Chaudhuri in a 45-minute excerpt of the late-night raga "Puriya Kalyan" (pieces in this classical form are composed in synch with specific times of day and their associated moods). Ustad Ali Akbar Khan Plays Alap ♪♪♪♪♪ (AMMP, 1993, prod. Mary J. Khan) is Khansahib's solo exploration of the raga—without either accompaniment or the finale that he sometimes calls "Coca Cola": that is, fast-paced and flashy. Khansahib's meditative probing reaches within while longing for God—and is all conveyed with conviction and great artistry. Yet another Grammy nominee, Legacy ♪♪♪♪♪ (AMMP, 1996, prod. Ali Akbar Khan, Mary J. Khan, Tim White) pairs Khansahib with vocalist Asha Bhosle (best known as the definitive diva of Indian movie music, but committed to classicism as well) on 16th–18th century songs from the court of the Moghul Emperor Akbar. Vocal, sarod, sitar, sarangi (bowed string instrument), harmonium, and cello timbres coalesce magnificently, balanced by brief but breathtaking solos. The vision, skillful performances, and careful attention to detail make this recording a gem.

ali akbar khan

what to buy next: The four-volume Signature Series presents Connoisseur Society recordings of Ali Akbar Khan (sarod) and Pandit Mahapurush Misra (tabla) from the 1960s, which Alam Madina Music Productions (AMMP) remastered with great care for CD release. Volume 1 ♪♪♪♪ (Connoisseur Society, 1966/AMMP, 1990), originally released under the title Master Musician of India, is known as the Ali Akbar Khan record that everyone bought and wore out in the '60s. It contrasts the much-beloved "Raga Chandranandan" with "Raga Gaur Manjari" (which includes a leisurely exploration of the alap's melodic pattern) and an evocation of heart-breaking yearning, "Raga Jogia Kalingra." Volume 2 ♪♪♪♪ (Connoisseur Society, 1960s/AMMP, 1990) showcases Khansahib's command of a variety of styles: the meditative serenity of "Raga Medhavi" is complemented by the subdued rhythmic accompaniment of Misra's tabla; they give the very traditional "Khammaj" a rather surprisingly lyrical treatment; and "Rag Bhairavi Bhatiyar" interweaves two contrasting ragas to achieve a tonal robustness not heard in either composition individually. Volume 3 ♪♪♪♪½ (Connoisseur Society, 1960s/AMMP, 1994, prod. Mary J. Khan) is the high-water mark of the series. "Raga Marwa" is a marvelous exposition (with an extended alap) of the Rajput dynasty's princely valor in all its rich and grave complexity. Khansahib curves notes around one another to elicit a palpable serenity in "Raga Misra Shivaranjani," his adaptation of a traditional piece, with tabla accompaniment from Pandit Shankar Gosh. Khansahib's student Pandit Nikhil Banerjee was one of the foremost sitar players of India. The clarity of his technique is quite unmatched and is well revealed on Volume 4 ♪♪♪½ (Connoisseur Society, 1960s/AMMP, 1994, prod. Mary J. Khan). "Raga Manj Khammaj" and "Raga Misra Mand" are both "light" classical ragas, displaying the freedom and playfulness usually associated with them. Before Khansahib established his own label, Artistic Sound of the Sarod ♪♪♪♪½ (Chhanda Dhara, 1985) was the recording that he would give as a present, feeling that it was a good example of his work. Although not representative of Khansahib's music, Journey ♪♪♪½ (Triloka, 1990, prod. Jai Uttal) is an engaging worldbeat recording. Taking a cue from producer Uttal's East/West hybrids, the album blends Indian classical and Western pop instruments and styles in short, catchy songs. For years, National Public Radio used an excerpt from "Come Back My Love" for news program segues.

what to avoid: The eight volumes of All India Radio Archival Releases ♪♪ (All India Radio, 1997) feature excellent performances from 1956 to 1965 and can be found for about half the price of Khansahib's classic releases. The rub is that the CDs were slapped together to make a quick rupee, without any attempt to deliver high fidelity. This is particularly galling since All India Radio issued quite decent LPs in the past. Volume 5 woof! is virtually unlistenable. With so much sonically superior material available, these should be the last Ali Akbar Khan CDs you consider. A three-minute fragment of "Rag Chandranandan" was licensed from AMMP's Signature Series, Vol. 1 for the score to Bernardo Bertolucci's 1994 film Little Buddha. But the soundtrack album's label (BMG/Milan) cut, pasted, and overdubbed the original 22-minute rag into an 11-minute cut which it re-used without AMMP's knowledge or permission in a "unique collection of Tibetan music," Wisdom & Compassion woof! (BMG/Milan, 1997). The results are predictably deplorable. Perhaps its for the best that Khansahib's and Mahapurush Misra's names are mangled in the credits.

worth searching for: The two-volume Live in Amsterdam ♪♪♪♪♪ (Mozes and Aaronchurch, 1985, prod. John Eijlers) was one of the first attempts to extend playing time beyond LP constraints and deliver high fidelity via real-time copying onto audio cassettes. These performances of Khansahib (sarod) and Swapan Chaudhuri (tabla) sent their audience reeling with delight over the nuances of their playing, their repartee, and their exchange of musical challenges. At last word, Water Lily Acoustics still had not released its audiophile-caliber Ali Akbar Khan titles on CD, but the LPs of Ustad Ali Akbar Khan ♪♪♪♪½ (Water Lily Acoustics, 1984, prod. Kavi Alexander), Maihar ♪♪♪♪½ (Water Lily Acoustics, 1989, prod. Kavi Alexander), and Indian Archetexture ♪♪♪♪♪ (Water Lily Acoustics, 1992, prod. Kavi Alexander) are worth searching out. Khansahib's Book One: Introduction to the Classical Music of North India, Volume One—The First Year's Study is based upon a typical first-year program of study at the Ali Akbar College of Music. The three-volume Book Two: Evening Ragas of Asawari That introduces the reader to the theoretical basis of ragas and includes compositions for several instruments. These books, as well as the 1988 concert video The Summer Solstice, are available from AMMP (415-456-5963) and the AACM store (415-454-0581).

influences:

- Acharya Baba Allauddin Khansahib, Aftabuddin Khan

» Asha Bhosle, Swapan Chaudhuri, Pandit Hariprasad Chaurasia, Ry Cooder, the Grateful Dead, John Handy, Mickey Hart, Ustad Zakir Hussain, Pandit V.G. Jog, Henry Kaiser, Yehudi Menuhin, Matthew Montfort (of Ancient Future), Lisa Moskow, Ustad Alla Rakha, G.S. Sachdev, Carlos Santana, L. Subramanian, Jai Uttal

see also: Asha Bhosle, Mickey Hart, Zakir Hussain, Ustad Vilayat Khan, G.S. Sachdev, Santana, Lakshmi Shankar, Ravi Shankar, Jai Uttal

Richard Price

Ali Akbar Khan

Badar Ali Khan

Qawwali

Born March 1964, in Pakistan. Based in Pakistan.

The younger cousin of the late Nusrat Fateh Ali Khan (the man who introduced the devotional song form qawwali to the Western world), Badar has already released 22 albums in Pakistan. His voice is formidable, and he is an early and major contender for Nusrat's vacated crown.

what to buy: Badar takes a giant leap of faith by leading off his Western debut album, Lost in Qawwali ♪♪♪♪ (Triloka, 1997, prod. Baba Varma), with a shredding version of "Qalander Mast Mast," a tune memorably associated with one of Nusrat's acclaimed collaborations with Michael Brook. Badar buries Nusrat's laid-back version with his big, booming vocals and the fierce attack of his party. His scat improvisations rival his cousin's for their forceful invention. This is an impressive debut.

what to buy next: Lost in Qawwali II ♪♪♪♪ (Triloka, 1998, prod. Baba Varma) is another solid set from Badar and his band; the man sounds like a contenda. He also borrows a page from the Nusrat/Bally Sagoo playbook by presenting a funky, club-ready remix of "Qalander Mast Mast."

worth searching for: Good Karma 1 ♪♪♪♪♪ (Baba, 1997) is the album that made Badar a superstar in Pakistan, and was credited with modernizing qawwali and taking it to a younger, more secular audience. It may be available in your local Indian cassette shop.

influences:

⏮ Nusrat Fateh Ali Khan, the Sabri Brothers

see also: Michael Brook, Nusrat Fateh Ali Khan, Bally Sagoo

j. poet

Nusrat Fateh Ali Khan

Qawwali

Born 1948, in Pakistan. Died August 16, 1997.

Nusrat Fateh Ali Khan made qawwali—a Sufi devotional music that sings the praises of Allah and was almost unknown outside the Pakistani community—into one of the most exciting genres of world music. A qawwal is known for his vast knowledge of mystic poetry and his ability to weave these texts into a trance-inducing performance. Like Native American and African shamans, qawwals often use repetition and vocables—meaningless syllables and shouts of joy—to express the inexpressible ecstasy of communion with Allah. Nusrat was one of the great qawwals, and perhaps the most impressive singer, in any genre, of the late 20th century. He regularly moved audiences to tears, even those who spoke no Arabic or Farsi, with the sheer emotional power of his voice. The West discovered Nusrat after Peter Gabriel invited him to sing on the soundtrack for The Last Temptation of Christ. Nusrat has hundreds of cassettes available on numerous labels, but it was his work for Gabriel's RealWorld imprint that brought him world acclaim, especially Musst Musst and Night Song, collaborations with Canadian ambient guitarist Michael Brook. The combination of dance beats and religious poetry struck many traditionalists as sacrilegious, but Nusrat's abiding faith in Allah shines through even his most secular compositions. Nusrat suffered from diabetes, and was on his was to the States for a kidney transplant when he died of renal failure.

what to buy: Hailed by fans and critics as one of 1996's best world-music albums, the Nusrat Fateh Ali Khan/Michael Brook collaboration Night Song ♪♪♪♪♪ (RealWorld, 1996, prod. Michael Brook) proves that crossover music can still preserve its integrity in the hands of a master. Nustrat's always breathtaking vocals are complemented by Brook's lush yet understated orchestrations. If you've never heard Nusrat before, this is a good place to start, and if you're a fan you won't be disappointed.

what to buy next: When you're ready for the real deal, the five-disc En Concert a Paris ♪♪♪♪♪ (Ocora Radio France, 1995, prod. Jean-Pierre Lunkner, Pascal Besnard) delivers in spades. Almost six hours of transcendental music from Nusrat and his party. The import price is hefty, but worth it. If you can't afford the whole box, Vol. 1 and Vol. 2 are sold separately.

best of the rest:

Qawwali: The Vocal Art of the Sufis I ♪♪♪♪♪ (JVC Japan, 1987)
Qawwali: The Vocal Art of the Sufis II ♪♪♪♪♪ (JVC Japan, 1987)
Devotional & Love Songs ♪♪♪♪♪ (RealWorld, 1988)
Shahen-Shah ♪♪♪♪♪ (RealWorld, 1989)
Mustt Mustt ♪♪♪♪♪ (RealWorld, 1990)
The Last Prophet ♪♪♪♪♪ (RealWorld, 1994)
Shabaaz ♪♪♪♪♪ (RealWorld, 1995)
The Supreme Collection, Vol. I ♪♪♪♪♪ (Caroline, 1997)
The Greatest Hits ♪♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1997)
The Greatest Hits, Vol. 2 ♪♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1998)

worth searching for: Nusrat has more than 200 cassettes, CDs, and albums in print, many of which can be found in the Hindi delis and music shops you'll find in most major cities. Many are pure qawwali, but his crossover albums with Hindi producers, like Magic Touch ♪♪♪♪♪ (Oriental Star, 1989, prod. Bally Sagoo) and Must Must II ♪♪♪♪♪ (Oriental Star, 1995, prod. Noor Jehan), are every bit as good as his better-known Night Song.

influences:

⏮ The Sabri Brothers

⏭ Badar Ali Khan

see also: Michael Brook, Badar Ali Khan, Bally Sagoo

j. poet

Nusrat Fateh Ali Khan

Salamat Ali Khan

Updated Indian classical vocal music

Born 1934, in the Punjab, India. Based in the Punjab, India.

Salamat Ali Khan is one of the most recognized of classical Indian vocalists. Since he began performing in the 1960s with his brother Nazakat as the Ali Brothers, Salamat has been one of the few artists in his particular genre to break through to a popular international audience. His diverse recordings include world-music fusions and very traditional classical pieces recorded with his sons.

what to buy: On Voices of Spheres ♪♪♪ (Xdat, 1997, prod. Richard Michos), Salamat Ali Khan and his sons, Shaqfat Ali Khan and Sharafat Ali Khan, layer Western and Eastern instrumental textures over traditional ragas to form a hybrid of purist Indian classical music and contemporary trance sounds, augmented by the contributions of didgeridoo (Aboriginal Australian drone instrument) master Stephen Kent and santur (hammered zither) player Alan Kushan.

what to buy next: The Khans (in this case Salamat and Shaqfat) join noted Bay Area vocalist Lakshmi C. Saxena for a program of classical ragas on Aina: Reflections ♪♪♪ (SD, 1994). Breath of the Rose ♪♪♪♪ (Water Lily Acoustics, 1994) is a pristine audiophile recording featuring Khan performing the ragas "Rageshwari," "Bhupali," and "Mishra Khamaj" with sons Sharafat and Shaqfat. A moving tribute to his late brother, the classical program of Salamat Remembers Nazakat ♪♪♪♪ (Omi, 1997) emphasizes material from the pair's duet work of the 1960s and '70s.

influences:

◀◀ Nazakat Ali Khan

▶▶ Shaqfat Ali Khan

Michael Parrish

Ustad Imrat Khan

North Indian classical, Hindustani

Born 1935, in Calcutta, India. Based in St. Louis, MO, USA.

Ustad Imrat Khan, primary exponent of the bass sitar known as the surbahar, comes from an illustrious family of sitar players who trace their roots from the Ustads ("maestros") of the 16th-century Mughal courts. With his older brother Vilayat Khan, Imrat, who sang as a child, introduced the gayeki ang or "vocal style" of instrumental playing to North Indian classical music. This style involves a great deal of pitch-bending—up to an octave on the surbahar—to produce fluid, note-to-note continuity. The surbahar's deep resonance is ideal for slower, introspective music (the dhrupad style in general, and the arrhythmic alap section of the lengthy and complex classical pieces known as ragas), and Imrat Khan records this material without accompaniment. He showcases his virtuoso sitar technique in more up-tempo, extroverted movements accompanied by one or more of his sons on tabla drum, sitar, surbahar, and sarod (north Indian lute).

what to buy: It's hard to go wrong with Imrat Khan—all the U.S. recordings are first-rate. Rag Darbari, Rag Chandra Kanhra ♪♪♪♪½ (Nimbus Records Inc., 1988, prod. Robin Broadbank) is a good place to start, with the dignified, courtly "Rag Darbari" credited to Tansen, the 16th-century Emperor Akbar's leading musician. Imrat plays surbahar on this raga, and on "Rag Chandra" he plays sitar accompanied by his son Shafaatullah on tabla. Raga Puriya Dhanashri ♪♪♪♪½ (India Archive Music, Ltd., 1991, prod. Lyle Wachovsky) is a demanding 72-minute raga, with the introductory slow section played on solo surbahar, the instrument invented by Imrat's great-grandfather Sahibdad Khan. Imrat picks up the sitar for the second half, and Shafaatullah Khan joins him on tabla. Rag Madhur Ranjani ♪♪♪♪½ (Music of the World, 1992, prod. Bob Haddad) is a minor-key raga composed by Imrat Khan himself and performed on sitar with Shafaatullah Khan playing tabla. Irshad Khan plays tamboura (four-stringed drone instrument) only intermittently, allowing the silence between notes to be heard. Ajmer ♪♪♪♪½ (Water Lily Acoustics, 1991, prod. Khavichandran Alexander, Jayant Shah) features a slow 27-minute surbahar solo in the major-scale morning raga "Alhaiya Bilaval," followed by a sitar raga of Imrat Khan's invention with tabla accompaniment.

what to buy next: The two pieces featured on Rag Miya ki Todi, Rag Bilaskhani Todi ♪♪♪♪ (Nimbus Records Inc., 1989, prod. Robin Broadbank) are morning ragas. "Miya ki Todi" shows the surprising speed and intensity that can build in a solo surbahar performance. Raga Marwa ♪♪♪♪ (Nimbus Records Inc., 1992, prod. Robin Broadbank) is a complex sunset raga featuring 40 minutes of surbahar introduction followed by a sitar and tabla with two tambouras. Rag Jhinjoti, Rag Pilu ♪♪♪♪ (Nimbus Records Inc., 1989, prod. Robin Broadbank) presents Imrat's sitar in jugalbandi (duet) with sarod played by Vajahat Khan, accompanied by tabla and tamboura drone.

the rest:

Indian Music for Sitar and Surbahar for Meditation and Love ♪♪♪ (Lyrichord)

influences:

◀◀ Ustad Vilayat Khan

▶▶ Nishat Khan, Irshad Khan, Vajahat Khan, Shafaatullah Khan

see also: Ustad Vilayat Khan

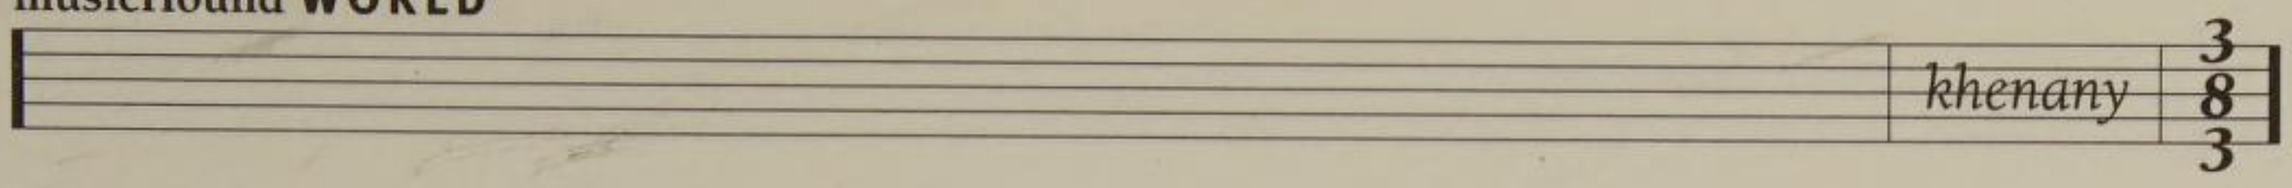
David Paul



Ustad Vilayat Khan

North Indian classical, Hindustani

Born 1926, in Gauripur, now Bangladesh. Based in Princeton, NJ, USA.

Sitarist Ustad Vilayat Khan was born into a distinguished line of legendary musicians, the Imdadkhani gharana (or regional school), tracing their lineage back centuries to the great Mughal courts, out of whose patronage much Hindustani music developed. Older brother and mentor to Imrat Khan, Vilayat is known for initiating an instrumental style of playing called gayaki ang, which emulates the human voice. Generally speaking, gayaki ang involves bending the string several times after plucking it, allowing for note-to-note continuity. Already well known as a child prodigy by the age of 10, the widely imitated Vilayat Khan has influenced sitar design and playing styles by conceiving new tunings and construction materials for greater resonance and volume. An incorruptible spirit, he claims he has never compromised or diluted his artistic ideals and once refused an award, claiming that the judges were unfit arbiters!

what to buy: Raga Bhairavi ♪♪♪♪ (India Archive Music, Ltd., 1991, prod. Lyle Wachovsky) is a thrilling performance accompanied by his son Hidayat Khan on tamboura (four-stringed drone instrument). Instead of producing a characteristically continuous drone, though, Hidayat plays behind the sitar in an extremely quiet, four-note pattern. Raga Bhankar ♪♪♪♪ (India Archive Music, Ltd., 1997, prod. Lyle Wachovsky) is a rarely heard dawn raga (the extensive classical pieces tailored to different temporal atmospheres). Hidayat Khan accompanies on a very quiet tamboura during the 38-minute free-form introductory alap movement. Akram Khan then joins on tabla drum for an extended 16-beat gat movement. As always with this label, very informative liner notes (three essays on Vilayat's interpretation, one on the raga itself, and one on Vilayat) are great if you want to thoroughly explore the origins and structure of the artist's music. Raga Jaijaivanti ♪♪♪♪½ (India Archive Music, Ltd., 1991, prod. Lyle Wachovsky) is a substantial evening raga, brimming with ideas that Vilayat develops masterfully over the course of 74 minutes. This is a very rich, very exciting piece.

worth searching for: You won't be disappointed by Vilayat and others' skillful performances on the compilation The Rough Guide to the Music of India and Pakistan ♪♪♪½ (World Music Network, 1996).

influences:

⏮ Ustad Inayat Khan, Imdad Khan, Barkatullah Khan, Hyderhusain Khan, Alagh Khan, Hamid Khan, Rameshwar Pathak, Balram Pathak, Waliullah Khan, Faiyaz Khan, Alladiya Khan, Abdul Karim Khan, Bhaskarbua, Baba Allaudin Khan, Amir Khan, Bade Ghulam Ali Khan, Samta Prasad.

⏭ Shujaat Khan, Hidayat Khan, Budhaditya Mukherjee, Shahid Pervez, Ustad Imrat Khan, Nishat Khan, Irshad Khan, Vajahat Khan, Shafaatullah Khan

see also: Ali Akbar Khan, Ustad Imrat Khan

David Paul

Khenany

Traditional Central and South American folk

Formed 1981, in Mexico. Based in Ciudad Obregon, Sonora, Mexico.

Alberto Luna, woodwinds, stringed instruments, percussion, vocals; Guspavo Hernandez, woodwinds, stringed instruments; Rafael Covarrubio Soto, vocals, stringed instruments, percussion; Hector Ramirez G., percussion, fretted instruments; David Espinoza Morales, fretted instruments, woodwinds, percussion; Concepcion Garcia L. ("Conchita"), vocals, stringed instruments, percussion; Antonio Hernandez Mosqueda ("Tono"), vocals, percussion, stringed instruments, woodwinds. (All members are from Mexico.)

Khenany, a lively septet from Sonora, Mexico, started out in 1981 as teenagers playing traditional music of the Andes. As their popularity and virtuosity grew, the band expanded their horizons to incorporate a variety of Latin American styles and rhythms, including the music of their native region. A particular interest is reviving South American music that predates the Spanish invasion. They now tour throughout North America and have developed a devoted following, particularly among Andean music fanatics. The group's name, indeed, comes from a folk tale of that culture about an ill-fated romance between Andean princess Khenany and a Spanish conquistador. To avoid being killed, the pair were transformed by the bird god Lambayeque into musical instruments—Khenany into a bamboo shoot and her lover into an armadillo shell—which then continued their romance through the ages literally making music together. The group members themselves play over 30 traditional instruments. In addition to an extensive Spanish-language repertoire, they also sing selections in Quechua, the language of the ancient Incas, and Yaqui, which is a familiar language in their home province. They have three self-distributed CDs, which can be obtained by mail-order or on the web, and which have led to a successful Stateside debut.

what to buy: Volume IV ♪♪♪ (Celestial Harmonies, 1998) is the group's most polished effort to date as well as its U.S. label debut. In addition to the traditional sounds and ancient themes of the band's previous releases, this recording incorporates contemporary influences including jazz, salsa, and bossa nova.

worth searching for: The group has three independently produced recordings that can be ordered online at http://www.khenany.com. A standout is Volume I ♪♪♪ (Khenany, 1986), the

3/8/4 khenany

Ustad Vilayat Khan

group's debut, which mixes familiar numbers like "El Condor Pasa" with rewarding yet less-known ancient Andean pieces.

influences:
⏮ Inti Illimani, Malka de los Andes

Michael Parrish

Kid Creole & the Coconuts /Dr. Buzzard's Original Savannah Band

Latin and Caribbean disco and swing

Kid Creole & the Coconuts formed 1980, in New York, NY, USA. Dr. Buzzard's Original Savannah Band formed 1974, in New York, NY, USA. Based in New York, NY, USA.

Kid Creole: Thomas August "Kid Creole" Darnell Browder, vocals; Andy "Coati Mundi" Hernandez, vibes, percussion (1980–87); Peter Schott, keyboards; Cheryl Poirier, vocals. Dr. Buzzard's Original Savannah Band: Stoney Browder Jr., guitar, piano (1974–79, 1984); Thomas August "Kid Creole" Darnell Browder, bass (1974–79); Mickey Sevilla, drums (1974–79, 1984); "Sugar Coated" Andy Hernandez, vibes, marimba, accordion (1974–79); Corey Daye, vocals (1974–79, 1984); Don Armando Bonilla, percussion (1974–76); Mark Josephsberg, vibes (1984); Michael Almo, horns (1984); Roland Prince, guitars (1984); Michael Boone, bass (1984); Mark Radice, bass (1984).

Decades before swing music became hip again in the late 1990s, Dr. Buzzard's Original Savannah Band brought '30s big band sounds to the disco era with a witty edge, scoring a hit with "Cherchez La Femme" on 1976's Dr. Buzzard's Original Savannah Band and enjoying moderate success for a few years. The group broke up in 1980, though it resurfaced in 1984, minus August Darnell and Andy Hernandez, for the badly conceived Calling All Beatniks. Kid Creole, on the other hand, based its sound in disco, with Latin and Caribbean rhythms added. That unique mixture was enhanced by Darnell's often tongue-in-cheek lyrics and his Caribbean Cab Calloway image, as well as the party-hearty stage show featuring the beautiful Coconuts as backup singers and break dancing by Coati Mundi. With a sound that defies categorization, Kid Creole has more of a cult following than a widespread appeal, although the music itself presaged salsa's popularity in U.S. pop circles. The band achieved some greater exposure when it backed Barry Manilow on a cut from his 1987 release Swing Street, and it has been featured in the films Against All Odds, Car 54 Where Are You?, and The Forbidden Dance. Darnell has also distinguished himself as a producer.

what to buy: In Praise of Older Women and Other Crimes ♪♪♪♪♪ (Sire, 1985, prod. August Darnell) finds the band in funky and fun form with "Endicott," a cry of independence from a henpecked husband and the group's best-known tune Stateside. The cry becomes the coo of doo-wop on "Particul'y Interested" and soulful on "Name It." The band even takes a break from its usual party mode for musically successful stabs at social concerns on "Caroline Was a Dropout" and "Dowop-

vodou

One of the most misunderstood, and irrationally feared, of cultural institutions is the Haitian Vodou religion (known by such other names as voudun, voudou, and voodoo). A hybrid of the West African Yoruba culture brought to the islands by the slaves and the French Catholic traditions brought there by the colonizers, Vodou involves polytheistic worship (camouflaged within the personae of Western saints), animal sacrifice, and a belief that practitioners can be possessed by the various deities. Although established in Haiti, Vodou has spread up to the southern United States, down to South America, and back to Benin in Africa, where the spiritual culture originated. An important part of Vodou ceremonies is the percussion-heavy music—once, as with slaves in the U.S., a coded means of master-evading mass communication—and accompanying dance. Key to any type of Vodou music are hand drums, and these vary in size and construction throughout Haiti. The percussion figures and call-and-response songs common to the religion have been adopted by many popular Haitian groups, none more visible than the internationally renowned Boukman Eksperyans, who take their name from the Vodou priest prominent in Haiti's independence struggle at the beginning of the 19th century. Horn-and-guitar-driven dance bands like Tabou Combo and Rara Machine have brought their Vodou-based sound to the U.S., largely through Haitian immigrant communities in New York. Several fine anthologies of Vodou music are available, perhaps most notably Rhythms of Rapture: Sacred Music of Haitian Voudou ♪♪♪♪ (Smithsonian Folkways, 1995).

see also: Boukan Ginen, Boukman Eksperyans, RAM, Rara Machine, Tabou Combo

Michael Parrish

salsaboprock (We're Fighting Back)." In an earlier Caribbean party mode, Wise Guy ♪♪♪♪ (Sire, 1982, prod. August Darnell) landed Top 10 hits in the U.K. with "Annie, I'm Not Your Daddy" and "I'm a Wonderful Thing, Baby."

what to buy next: Both of these bands feature strong musicianship and production, and Dr. Buzzard's Original Savannah Band ♪♪♪♪ (RCA, 1976, prod. Sandy Linzer) is a well-played, disco-style delight.

what to avoid: Calling All Beatniks woof! (Passport, 1984, prod. Sandy Linzer) features bad 1950s-style rock by Dr. Buzzard minus Darnell and Hernandez. It proves the fire in this group really came from Darnell.

the rest:

Kid Creole & the Coconuts:

Fresh Fruit in Foreign Places ♪♪♪ (Sire, 1981)
Doppelganger ♪♪♪½ (Sire, 1983)
I, Too, Have Seen the Woods ♪♪♪½ (Sire, 1987)
You Should Have Told Me You Were . . . ♪♪♪ (Columbia, 1991)
Kid Creole Redux ♪♪♪♪ (Sire, 1992)
To Travel Sideways ♪♪♪½ (Atoll, 1994)

Dr. Buzzard's Original Savannah Band:

Dr. Buzzard's Original Savannah Band Meets King Penett ♪♪♪ (RCA, 1978)

worth searching for: Off the Coast of Me (Antilles, 1980, prod. August Darnell) is the transitional album from Dr. Buzzard to the Coconuts. The Kid steps out front with his humor, but he hasn't dropped the big-band feel yet.

solo outings:

The Coconuts:

Don't Steal My Coconuts ♪♪♪ (EMI, 1983)

influences:

◀◀ Machito & His Afro-Cubans, Cab Calloway, Desi Arnaz

▶▶ Gloria Estefan, Buster Poindexter, Squirrel Nut Zippers

Lawrence Gabriel

Angélique Kidjo

Worldbeat

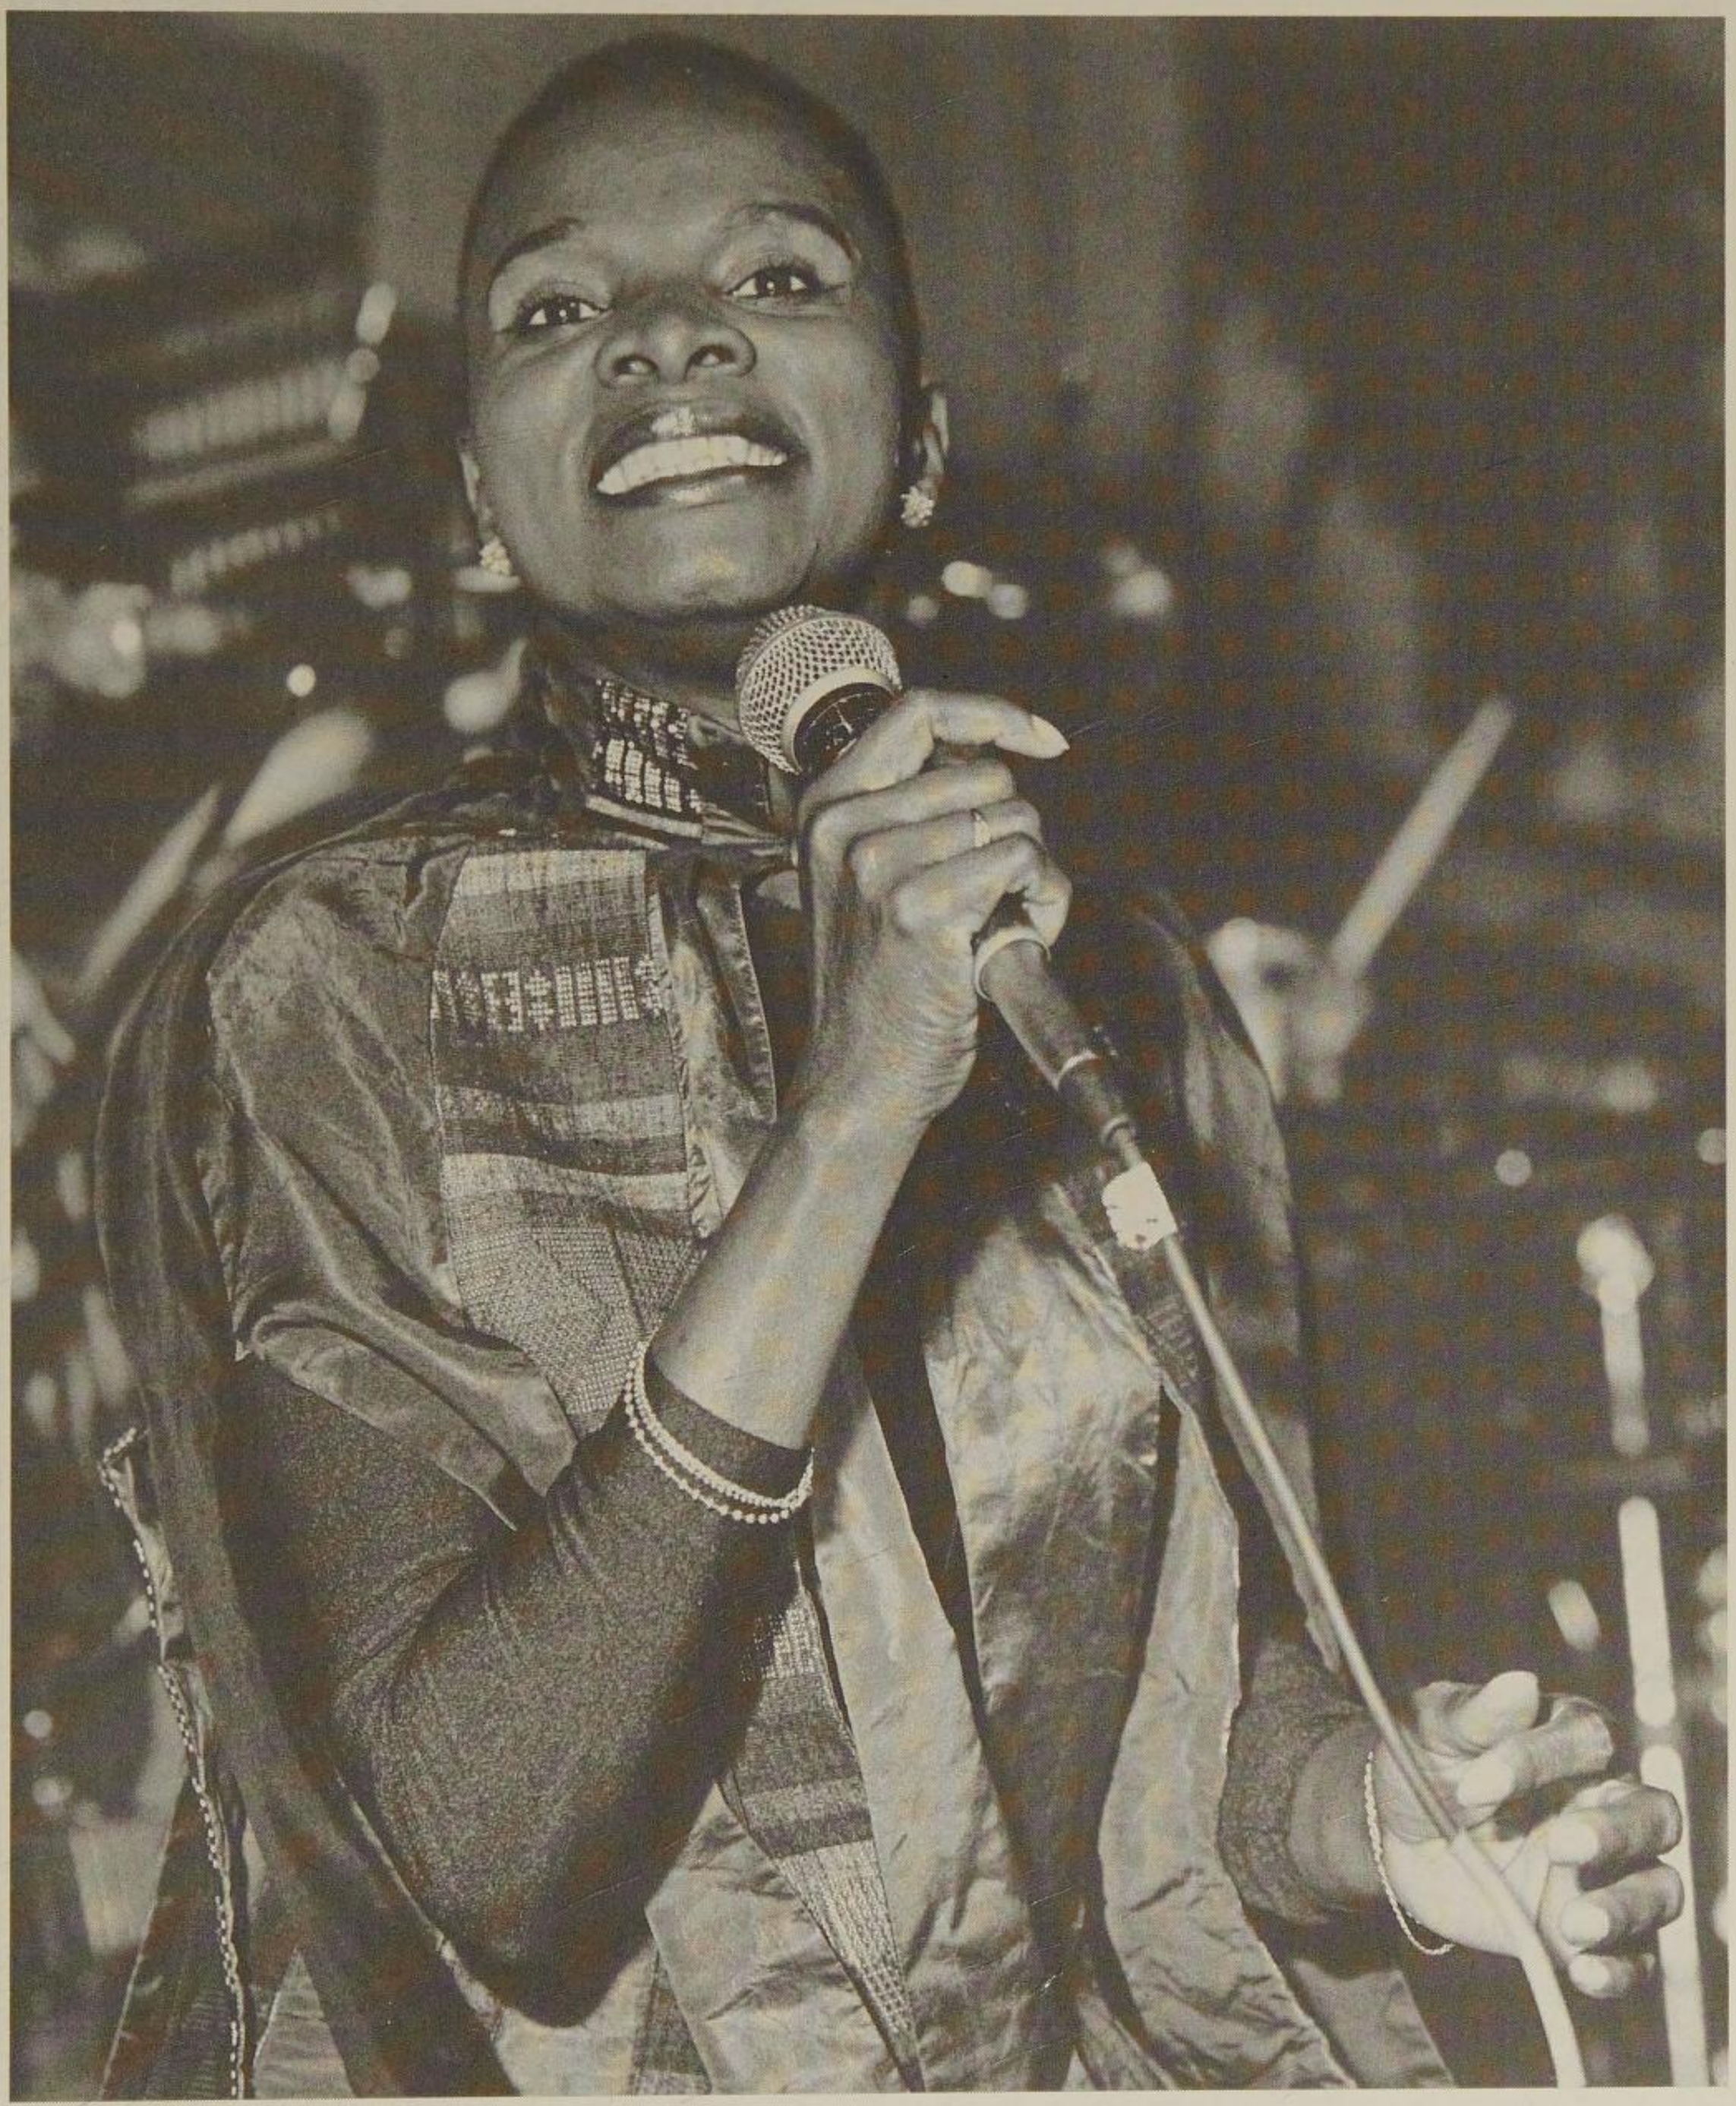
Born 1960, in Ouidah, Benin. Based in Paris, France.

Angélique Kidjo is one of world music's most popular and controversial figures. Her hard-edged hybrid of Beninese tribal sources and funk-rock inflections has landed her on the high-profile Lilith Fair tour and, even more important, in the coveted "general rock" bins of some major U.S. record chains. Kidjo first came to prominence with the 1991 Afro-dance hit "Batonga." But she really started turning American heads the following year on the original Stateside version of Paris-based entrepreneur Mamadou Konte's Africa Fête package tour (where, in a particularly triumphant moment, Peter Gabriel came onstage as her guest). Kidjo's following has grown from the start, as has the criticism that she dilutes African culture (interestingly, a complaint that seems to be leveled at her more forcefully than at figures like Gabriel himself). What the critics are missing is the uncompliant way in which all Kidjo's "crossovers" are made into the least ingratiating areas of modern music (heavy rock, driving electronica), and the way in which elliptical, chant-based tribal melodies recur in her work, their unsuppressibility all the more accentuated for the contrast to her Euro-club instrumental settings. Not to mention the fact that her unlikely hit albums are almost exclusively sung not in the English of the global marketplace or even the French of her adoptive country, but the Fon of her homeland. Whether critics get it or not, Kidjo seems primed to be speaking the language of the listening public for years to come.

what to buy: Logozo ♪♪♪♪♪ (Mango, 1991, prod. Joe Galdo) is the one that made her a star, with remarkably sensual techno-pop surrounding acoustic and a cappella gems of a rootsier nature—plus some sizzling sax by Branford Marsalis for you Americans. The sunny but substantive Ayé ♪♪♪♪♪ (Mango, 1994, prod. D.A. "Jumbo" Vanrenen, David Z, Will Mowat) went a step beyond Logozo's singles-collection feel, with inventive compositions extended in structure but no-ways dissipated in impact—especially the striding Afro-jazz of "Lon Lon Vadjro." Kidjo made her most triumphant march on the mainstream yet with Oremi ♪♪♪♪♪ (Island, 1998, prod. Peter Mokran), a well-received repositioning of the artist as an international pop giant who happens to be from Benin. With the hybrid music she'd helped pioneer now a household marketing term, Kidjo's time had come, and even the critics were kind to this rock 'n' soul 'n' jazz 'n' electronica–flavored tribal testament. A deft Jimi Hendrix cover ("Voodoo Child") and guest spots by Marsalis and Cassandra Wilson place Kidjo in a prestige pantheon she vaults into with seeming ease.

what to buy next: Kidjo rose to fame in Benin despite a traditional low tolerance for women performers; she then practically fled the country in the days of an authoritarian regime. But now she returns regularly, gathering musical ideas from the countryside. This process is most directly evident on Fifa ♪♪♪♪ (Mango, 1996, prod. Jean Hebrail), where field recordings are woven into Kidjo's high-tech studio mix. Surprisingly, that mix was her most standard-radio-friendly one yet, with compact tunes that might seem slight but are nonetheless cleverly infectious—and were an impressively early premonition of the Western world's Hanson-era pop resurgence.

worth searching for: Kidjo's major-label debut, the import-only Parakou ♪♪♪♪ (Mango U.K., 1989), blueprints the ambition and imagination the world would soon be ready for.



Angélique Kidjo

influences:

- Miriam Makeba, James Brown, Santana, Jimi Hendrix, Rick James, folkloric music of Benin
- Mary Jane Lamond

Adam McGovern

Kíla

Irish traditional and fusion

Formed 1994, in Dublin, Ireland. Based in Dublin, Ireland.

Rónán O Snodaigh, vocals, bodhrán, percussion; Rossa O Snodaigh, bouzouki, mandolin, low whistle, percussion; Colm O Snodaigh, flute, tin whistle, saxophone, clarinet, acoustic guitar, vocals; Eoin Dillon, uilleann pipes, low whistle; Dee Armstrong, fiddle, accordion, hammer dulcimer; Lance Hogan, guitars, bass, hammer dulcimer, percussion; Brian Hogan, bass, guitars. (All members are from Ireland.)

This Dublin septet of trendy upstarts has succeeded in making a tradition-based musical stew hip for a young audience back home in Ireland, where they've just issued their third album in five years. Having already earned a reputation as a formidable live act, they're finally getting a chance to make an impression across the Atlantic with the recent North American release of their second album. Often hailed as a belt of fresh air in the Celtic crossover market, it doesn't take a musicologist to realize that Kíla owes a considerable debt to the pioneering Moving Hearts from the early '80s, not to mention the Andy Irvine/Bill Whelan/Davy Spillane East Wind project from a decade later, and the Riverdance phenomenon that grew out of that. Swirling pipes and mournful low whistle; horns and demonic cross-rhythms borrowed from jazz, the Balkans, the Caribbean, and Dónal Lunny; slithery, sensuous bass guitar; and great big gobs of percussion everywhere, all unashamedly echo Moving Hearts. Still, the group has more than that to offer, in particular a quirky style of song, mostly in Irish, which defies categorization but has managed to get them into the old sod's singles charts. What Kíla lacks in originality, it seems to make up for in street credibility with an audience too young or uninformed to know where they get half their ideas. More power to them—if Tory Amos can take Kate Bush's career to the arenas, Kíla deserves a bit of action too.

what's available: Kíla's second album, Tóg é go bog é ♪♪♪♪ (Key, 1997/Green Linnet, 1999, prod. Lance Hogan, Kíla)—in superior remixed and resequenced form for its American version—leads off with "Gwerzy," an energetic instrumental that unmistakably conjures the ghost of Moving Hearts, thanks to Spillane-drenched pipes and low whistle and an abundance of diverse rhythms. The album moves on to the band's funky and charming Irish chart hit "Ón taobh tuathail amach" ("Inside Out") and then stretches out with the lengthy "Rusty Nails," which starts with a gentle Eastern European Gypsy feel (and odd hints of Zorba the Greek!) before dissolving into a frenzied Altan/Hearts hybrid and then quietly going out as it came in. On "Oh to Kiss Katie," "Jasmine," and "Ríl a Dó," we are firmly back in Moving Hearts territory, while the eight-minute "Dusty Wine Bottle" has some lovely fiddle and tin whistle. Dillon plays it straight (and solo) on the pipes on "The Siege of Carrickfinn International Airport," the only piece that (its title notwithstanding) sounds truly traditional. Despite a lack of accordion, "Double Knuckle Shuffle" recalls Sharon Shannon and Dónal Lunny ("Cavan Potholes," anyone?). The a cappella "Leanfaidh Mé" ("Follow Me") has a distinctively South African flavor.

influences:

- Moving Hearts, Davy Spillane, Dónal Lunny, Sharon Shannon, Altan, Bill Whelan

John C. Falstaff

Jin Hi Kim

Korean, avant-garde

Born February 6, 1957, in Inchon, Korea. Based in Connecticut, USA.

Kim, though also a composer, is most noted as a player of the komungo. Supposedly the oldest Korean instrument—it dates back to the fourth century—the komungo is a five-foot-long, six-stringed zither with 16 frets, played by striking the twisted silk strings with a bamboo stick. Kim got a degree in traditional Korean music at Seoul National University, then moved to the U.S. and added an MFA in electronic music and composition from Mills College. She has consistently stretched the contexts available to her, combining traditional Korean music with the avant-garde—a strategy that works well since, in their emphasis on pure sound rather than harmony, the two genres are fairly close to begin with. Her adventurous streak has not only led her to play with jazz and avant-garde improvisers—ranging from guitarists Derek Bailey, Bill Frisell, Elliott Sharp, and Eugene Chadbourne; to wind players Oliver Lake, James Newton, and partner Joseph Celli; to the experimental chamber group Kronos Quartet—but also inspired her to help design the world's only electric komungo.

what to buy: Kim and partner Joseph Celli, who plays oboe, English horn, piri (Korean oboe-like instrument), and MIDI breath controller, go the serial collaboration route on No World (Trio) Improvisations ♪♪♪♪½ (O.O. Discs, 1992, prod. Joseph Celli), with Adam Plack (Aboriginal Australian didgeridoo), Shelley Hirsch (voice), Alvin Curran (synthesizer and computer samplers), Mor Thiam (African percussion), and Malcolm Goldstein (violin) joining for one track each. Plack and Thiam come from the world-music scene, while Hirsch, Curran, and Goldstein are avant-gardists, giving the disc a nice balance. In a way it's the epitome of Kim's approach; certainly it offers a good cross-section of her creative impulses, featuring her on both traditional and electric komungo. The free improvisations on KomunGuitar ♪♪♪♪ (Nonsequitur, 1993, prod. Jin Hi Kim, Steve Peters) pair Kim with a series of guitarists from the avant-garde: Elliott Sharp (doubling on saxophone), Derek Bailey, Henry Kaiser, Eugene Chadbourne (playing banjo, actually), Hans Reichel, and David First. Sometimes her louder collaborators steal the spotlight from the softer komungo, but usually the pieces are effective studies in timbral contrast.

Jin Hi Kim

what to buy next: Living Tones ♪♪♪♪ (O.O. Discs, 1995, prod. Joseph Celli, Jin Hi Kim) again offers differing contexts, but emphasizes Kim the composer. The four long pieces here—none shorter than 11 minutes—construct lean sonic sculptures in which every gesture is multiply nuanced and fraught with meaning. "Nong Rock" is for komungo and string quartet, but Kim doesn't play on her compositions "Tchong," for daegum (bamboo flute, by Hong Jong-Jin) and flutes (by Robert Dick); "Yoeum," for traditional Korean kagok singer (Whang Kyu-Nam) and baritone vocalist (Thomas Buckner); and "Piri Quartet," for three piri players and oboe/English horn (Celli).

the rest:
No World Improvisations ♪♪♪♪ (O.O. Discs, 1990)
Komungo Permutations ♪♪♪ (Nonsequitur, 1990)

worth searching for: The rare Komungo 'Round the World ♪♪♪♪ (Korean Music Source cassette/Seoul Records CD, 1994, prod. Jin Hi Kim) is another album with rotating duet partners, getting its name from their international character: Adam Plack playing the didgeridoo, Rahul Sariputura of India on sitar, Hideaki Kuribayashi of Japan on bass koto (Japanese zither), and Mor Thiam on djembe and dogodrum (West African hand drums). Kim appears on Celli's Video Ears Music Eyes ♪♪♪♪ (O.O. Discs, 1995, prod. Joseph Celli), on the substantial 15:41-long track "36 Strings" for komungo and five channels of video. With the video obviously absent from the CD listening experience, this ironically is Kim heard in the most traditional mode of any of her recorded work, the piece building from spareness to density in the manner of classical Korean court music.

influences:
◀◀ Kim Su-chol

Steve Holtje

Shoukichi Kina

Okinawan folk-rock, worldbeat

Born 1948, in Koza, Okinawa. Based in Koza, Okinawa.

Kina, the son of famous songwriter/singer Shoei Kina and a player of the shamisen (three-string guitar/banjo), formed his band Champloose in 1973. The U.S. military had controlled Okinawa since the end of WWII, and American culture had dominated most of the island's commercial music. Kina changed that by singing in Uchinaguchi (Okinawan) and basing his playing on traditional katcharsee rhythms, the folk dance forms that remained popular despite the American influence. The band's first single, "Haisai Ojisan," was a hit both at home and, more surprisingly, in Japan, which still considers Okinawa something of a cultural backwater. Its success inspired some Japanese musicians to investigate Okinawan culture and eventually led to a rebirth of interest in that culture by the island's own younger generation, which now tends to incorporate traditional folksongs into rock 'n' roll. The U.S. military still owns 30 percent of Okinawa, and since they left the rest of it Japan has been reasserting its ownership and trying to eradicate the Okinawan language, which they consider a dialect of Japanese. By singing in Okinawan, Kina has been helping to keep his homeland's unique culture vital. But Kina has an international musical vision as well. In 1980 he invited Ry Cooder to help out on his Blood Line album, was the leader of a large Earth Day celebration on Okinawa in 1990, played at John Lennon's 50th birthday bash at the Tokyo Stadium in 1991, and in 1993 hosted and organized the Miraikanai Festival, a congress of indigenous people from around the world that featured four days of political meetings and concerts. Kina is also something of a loose cannon. At one point he was known to be a fearsome drinker and drug taker, and a near OD led him to a breakdown that caused him to retire from music for seven years. During his time off he traveled the world. He met with and explored the folklore of the Ainu, Japan's indigenous people, lived with guerrillas in the Philippines, studied with spiritual seekers in India, and hung out with ecological activists in the U.S. In 1990 he returned home and resumed touring and recording, adding touches of zouk, calypso, and African music to his already eclectic style.

what to buy: The Music Power from Okinawa ♪♪♪♪♪ (Globestyle, 1991, prod. Koki Miura) is a reissue of a 1977 live album recorded at Kina's Mikado club in Koza. The katcharsee rhythms sound amazingly similar to Texas swing, making this extremely easy on Western ears. The music is bouncy, bright, and energetic; translations and cultural notes are included in the enclosed booklet.

what to buy next: The Peppermint Tea House ♪♪♪♪½ (Luaka Bop, 1994, prod. Koki Miura) compilation was put together by David Byrne and features half of the Blood Line album with Ry Cooder, as well as recent singles and album cuts. The tracks that hew closest to Okinawan tradition are the most interesting, but there are also credible excursions into American country and western, Celtic folk, modern rock, Asian reggae, and R&B. Kina's shamisen can sound like a koto (Japanese zither), electric guitar, or banjo, and the female backing vocals always add unexpected flourishes.

Shoukichi Kina (seated rear) and Champloose

worth searching for: Kina's Okinawan albums may be available at local world-music stores. Titles include Celebration (Nichion, 1982), Earth Spirit (Nichion, 1991), Blood Line (1980), Nirai Kanai (1990), and Rainbow Movement (1993).

influences:
⏮ Shoei Kina
⏭ Rinken Teruya, Rinkenband, Shang Shang Typhoon

see also: Ry Cooder

j. poet

Diana King

R&B/hip-hop/dancehall reggae

Born 1972, in Spanish Town, Jamaica. Based in Jamaica.

Diana King is one of reggae's hottest crossover stars, owing in no small part to the stylistic crossover she innovated. Bred both on the riddims of her homeland and the sweet soul wafting down the airwaves from America, King decided to try the vocal style of the latter with the instrumental sound of the former and quickly became a sensation. Determined to crack the not all-male, but, in her view, too-male realm of reggae, and with a new musical twist to spin, she perceived an open niche and leapt into it—and don't think it wasn't a daredevil jump. Her mother refused the teenaged King a singing career, so the precocious diva snuck away to the clubs of Kingston, conveniently 10 miles away, and secretively sang for two years. King notes a broader acceptance of performers on the basis of talent rather than age in Jamaica as opposed to the U.S.—but has stressed to interviewers that the bar owners "had no idea I was 13"! Mature session work would follow, starting in 1990 with Junior Tucker on his song "Stop to Start" from his Don't Test album. King began to get stand-alone notice with her own single "Change of Heart," before nabbing the honor of touring with the high-profile Shabba Ranks in 1994. After this, she covered Bob Marley's "Stir It Up" as heard on the soundtrack Cool Runnings, signing on for the related Stir It Up/Cool Runnings Tour with a Jamaican-music who's-who including Jimmy Cliff, Worl-A-Girl, and others. What really helped her bomb her way into the Stateside mainstream, though, was a reggae-fied cover of Bacharach and David's "I Say a Little Prayer" from the soundtrack to My Best Friend's Wedding. While still perhaps best known for this and other sturdy remakes, King's strongest material is inventive originals like "Shy Guy" and "Love Triangle," also deserving hits. Her continuing knack with them shows that, though to most Yankees she probably seemed to come from nowhere, she's here to stay.

what's available: Tougher Than Love ♪♪♪♪ (Columbia/Chaos, 1994, prod. Handel Tucker, Andy Marvel, Matthew Scott Noble) best displays King's vocal style and was certified gold in 1995 along with its single "Shy Guy." Also included is the follow-up single "Ain't Nobody," originally by Chaka Khan. Think Like a Girl ♪♪♪ (Work Group, 1997, prod. Andy Marvel, Handel Tucker), a kind of womanist concept album, sustains King's savvy for recognizing and deploying pop hooks and keeps the hits coming back with covers like "I Say a Little Prayer" and Culture Club's "Do You Really Want to Hurt Me."

influences:
◀◀ Junior Tucker

Adam McGovern and Steven Stancell

King Changó

Latin ska

Formed 1995, in New York, NY, USA. Based in New York, NY, USA.

Mike Wagner, trombone, guitars; Glenda Lee, bass; Luís Jésus Ruíz, drums, percussion; Miguel Oldenburg, guitars, backing vocals; Blanquito Man (born Andrew Blanco), vocals, percussion, moves; Fernando Vélez, percussion; Martín Adrian Cunningham, tenor saxophone; Luís Eduardo Blanco, keyboards, accordion, cuatro, percussion, backing vocals. (Members are from Venezuela and USA.)

Like Haiti's Boukman Eksperyans and the U.S.'s Spearhead, the Venezuelan/American King Changó's style is an exhilarating cultural whirlwind that sweeps from Argentina to the Arctic, recognizing no national or musical borders along the way. The path it carved in the English-only wasteland of U.S. rock was wide enough to let Ozomatli, Los Amigos Invisibles, Bloque, and a gathering host of others charge through, prying open the cracks made by Santana and Los Lobos on previous attempts. Changó's music switches from Latin ska to African funk to bluesy rock and beyond like a stuck satellite channel-changer, on a wavelength scrambled to none: If you don't understand the often-Spanish lyrics, you will, as Boukman's Lôlô Beaubrun once remarked to this writer, "understand the music with your body." Changó has a sophisticated but spontaneous sense of what makes people jump the world over, and unlike the Anglo-dance flavor of the minute, their arsenal includes something other than inebriation and volume. After mightily bringing forth much of the mid-'90s AlterLatino revolution, even they needed a day of rest, studio-wise—but at presstime the three years they gave everyone else to catch up was about to end with the summer-'99 Return of El Santo. Consider yourself warned—and be there early.

what to buy: The neon/anime/carnival/wrestling-ring graphics and genre-fissioning music of King Changó ♪♪♪♪ (Luaka Bop, 1996, prod. José Andrés Blanco, King Changó) marks one of those historic pop moments when you don't know what hit you and are too dazzled to care. And listening back, the effect of "God Damn Killers" and "Don't Drop Your Pants"' political punch, "Melting Pot" and "Revolution/Cumbia Reggae"'s lilting multicultural overtures, and "Latin Ska" and "Melting Pot Intro"'s poly-jazz workouts doesn't wear off. The band runs such an idea surplus that even the end-of-disc "secret" tracks—some kickin' low-tech basic chants—have a rare reason for existing, with only the stalker-y "So Sweet" to threaten their Best New Band of '96 status. An album that put "Alter-Latino" not just on the map, but all over it.

the rest:
Return of El Santo N/A (Luaka Bop, 1999)

worth searching for: The Latin-ska masters honor some Anglo-reggae precursors with "Venezuelan in New York" on Outlandos D'Americas: A Rock en Español Tribute to the Police (EMD/Ark 21, 1998).

influences:
◀◀ Los Fabulosos Cadillacs, Tropicalia, Bad Brains

▶▶ Bloque

Adam McGovern

King Tubby

Reggae, dub

Born Osbourne Ruddock, 1941, in Kingston, Jamaica. Died February 1989, in St. Andrew, Jamaica.

Producer and engineer King Tubby is credited with inventing dub music, the instrumental mix featured on the flip side of any reggae single. These mixes have become a genre unto themselves and are regularly collected on CD. Casual listeners could find the repetitive beats and lack of vocals irritating; fans of dub, however, are transported, even mesmerized, by the deep bass and mind-bending reverb. In the 1950s, Tubby was already noodling with audio equipment, repairing radios and DJ sound systems. As an engineer at Duke Reid's Treasure Isle label, Tubby began experimenting with remixes—a totally new concept at the time—in which he dropped the vocal track and boosted the rhythm, adding effects like echo and delay. Thus dub was born. Songs had a second life when released in a dub version. Crowds became ecstatic at heavier rhythms than they had ever heard. Throughout the '70s and '80s Tubby ran his own studio, releasing some of the most psychedelic reggae mixes Jamaica has known. King Tubby was murdered in 1989, cutting short the life if not the legend of one of Jamaican music's greatest icons. His legacy has been well preserved on countless collections and through a host of faithfully adventurous protégés.

Blanquito Man (Andrew Blanco, left) & Glenda Lee of King Changó

what to buy: Tubby hit his stride as mixer for Bunny Lee's in-house band, the Aggrovators. His mixes of their ska rhythms are documented on King Tubby's Special, 1973–1976 ♪♪♪♪½ (Trojan, 1991). With Augustus Pablo, Tubby recorded his most recognizable mix, the title track to the impeccable King Tubby Meets Rockers Uptown ♪♪♪♪♪ (Clocktower, 1977).

what to buy next: As suggested by the above, most of the 100 or so collections of Tubby's dubs focus on his mixes of a particular artist. The eight available on Blood & Fire Records are beautifully presented and are generally a safe bet. The Dreads at King Tubby's, 1974–1977: If Deejay Was Your Trade ♪♪♪♪½ (Blood and Fire, 1994) features deejays toasting over hit songs brought in and out of the mix by Tubby. Tappa Zukie's "Jah Is My Shining Star" is heartbreaking, with Zukie virtually crying the lyrics over snippets of "You Are My Shining Star." These are proto-dancehall tracks, a harbinger of the trend that later ruled the Jamaican charts. While not strictly a Tubby record, as only five of the 22 tracks are his mixes, Dub Explosion ♪♪♪♪ (Trojan, 1996, prod. Chris Prete) is a great compilation with heavy dubs of roots-reggae classics. In general, there is a lot of confusing overlap in Tubby's catalog, with the same material released under different names. The most important thing to watch for when buying a King Tubby compilation is what original material he uses. If you like Yabby You, then you will probably enjoy King Tubby's remixes of Yabby You (or, perhaps more precisely, if you like a particular rhythm section used by Yabby You, since the rhythmic elements are often all that's left once a song is stripped down for a dub mix).

what to avoid: Not so much a specific warning as a helpful rule of thumb: There is a surfeit of material attributed to King Tubby, with his nom de dub tacked on like a familiar brand name to any number of compilations that often bear only a loose connection to his work at the mixing desk. As noted above, Tubby had many excellent engineers and protégés active in his studio, including

Prince Jammy, Prince Phillip, and Scientist, so often a "King Tubby" mix only means that he supervised its creation.

best of the rest:

Glen Brown and King Tubby: Termination Dub, 1973–1979 ♪♪♪♪ (Glenmore Brown, 1973–79/Blood and Fire, 1996)

Morwell Unlimited Meet King Tubby's: Dub Me ♪♪♪½ (Morwell, 1975/Blood and Fire, 1997)

King Tubby and Prince Jammy in Fine Style: Dub Gone 2 Crazy ♪♪♪♪ (Bunny Lee, 1975–1979/Blood and Fire, 1996)

Yabby U: King Tubby's Prophecy of Dub ♪♪♪ (Prophet, 1976/Blood and Fire, 1995)

King Tubby & Soul Syndicate: Freedom Sounds in Dub ♪♪♪½ (Freedom Sounds, 1976–1979/Blood and Fire, 1996)

Dub Gone Crazy: The Evolution of Dub at King Tubby's, 1975–1979 ♪♪♪½ (Blood and Fire, 1994)

Yah Congo Meets King Tubby and Professor at Dub Table ♪♪♪ (ROIR, 1995)

Greenwich Farm Rub-A-Dub ♪♪♪½ (Blood & Fire, 1996)

worth searching for: These selections are only the tip of the iceberg. Rare dubs by King Tubby are being unearthed and compiled every week to sate an ongoing demand. Companies that have been active in this field are the French label Lagoon, with collections including Roots & Society, Shining Dub, and Creation Dub. Greensleeves, Clocktower, Burning Sounds, Munich, Musicrama, and Shanachie have also all released King Tubby compilations.

influences:

⏮ Duke Reid

⏭ Prince Jammy, Scientist, Aphex Twin, Bill Laswell, Teo Macero, Mad Professor

see also: Oku Onuora, Augustus Pablo, Roots Radics, Tappa Zukie, Yabby You

David Poole

Alison Kinnaird

Scottish harp

Born April 30, 1949, in Edinburgh, Scotland. Based in Scotland.

Young Alison Kinnaird seemed on track to pursue a career as a cellist until, at age 14, she discovered the clarsach—the small, diatonic, traditional knee-harp or folk harp of Scotland. A protégé of the late Jean Campbell, she learned enthusiastically and quickly, and played well enough to start winning competitions, including Scotland's National Mod and the first-ever Pan-Celtic Festival in Killarney, Ireland. But Kinnaird soon grew dissatisfied with what was then the standard repertoire. In the absence of a current tradition, much Scottish harp music was scavenged from the repertoires of other instruments or culled from printed collections, which were themselves often edited by pianists or concert harpists. She undertook the task that was to suffuse her musical career from then on: to resurrect (or, if necessary, reinvent) a truly traditional, Scottish repertoire and performance style for the Scottish harp—a process that was to culminate in the beginning of her recording career in 1978 with the release of her first LP, The Harp Key.

what to buy: If you're going to get just one, the obvious choice is The Scottish Harp ♪♪♪♪½ (Temple, 1988, prod. Robin Morton), which is a compendium of her first two solo albums, a splendid duet album with U.S.-born wire-strung harper Ann Heymann, a couple of National Trust folk archive projects she did with the Battlefield Band, and three newly recorded tracks. The 52-plus minutes herein represent the very best of an awfully good batch of recordings.

what to buy next: Kinnaird and Christine Primrose's The Quiet Tradition ♪♪♪½ (Temple, 1990, prod. Robin Morton) is a duet album with one of Scotland's premier traditional singers and represents the culmination of many years of touring and making music together. Rarely do a singer and an instrumentalist seem so well matched; it's a tribute to Kinnaird's success in rekindling the clàrsach heritage that her playing blends so adeptly with a rigorous traditionalist like Primrose.

the rest:

The Harp Key ♪♪♪♪ (Temple, 1978)

(With the Battlefield Band and Robin Morton) Music in Trust ♪♪♪ (Temple, 1986)

(With the Battlefield Band) Music in Trust 2 ♪♪♪ (Temple, 1988)

(With Ann Heymann) The Harper's Land ♪♪♪♪ (Temple, 1992)

The Harper's Gallery ♪♪ (Temple, 1992)

influences:

⏮ Jean Campbell

⏭ Wendy Stewart, Sileas, Cheryl Ann Fulton, Robin Williamson

see also: Battlefield Band

Chris Rietz

The Klezmatics

Klezmer

Formed 1986, in New York, NY, USA. Based in New York, NY, USA.

Alicia Svigals, violin; Lorin Sklamberg, accordion, keyboards, vocals; Paul Morrissett, bass, tsimbl; Frank London, trumpet, keyboards; David Licht, drums; Matt Darriau, clarinet, saxophone. Other members have included: David Krakauer, clarinet. (All members are from USA.)

The Klezmatics play radical Jewish roots music for the 21st century, combining their identity as Jews with a postmodern mysticism and progressive politics. This innovative ensemble has shared stage and studio with classical superstar Itzhak Perlman, avant garde dude John Zorn, alternative rock band Ben Folds Five, transsexual cabaret singers, the Moroccan Master Musicians of Jajouka, and most recently Israeli folk icon Chava Alberstein. Their collaboration with virtuoso violinist Itzhak Perlman, In the Fiddler's House, topped both world music and classical music charts internationally, becoming one of the top-selling folk albums of all time. The Klezmatics' music is by turns ecstatic, angry, elegiac, frenetic, and exquisite. Standout musicians in the group include violinist Alicia Svigals, whose mesmerizing fiddling swirls with echoes of ancient Greek and Turkish modes (combined with judicious use of MIDI, jazz stylings, and classical technique); and the compelling vocalist Lorin Sklamberg, who infuses all his songs with intense emotion. But every musician in the Klezmatics is a wizard, able to switch gears instantly between the scholarly approach of re-creating an older traditional sound, and an innovative modern perspective often informed by jazz, rock, and avant-garde influences.

The Klezmatics

what to buy: Possessed ♫♫♫♫½ (Xenophile, 1997, prod. Robert Musso) reaffirms the Klezmatics' position as the premier post-modern klezmer band, as they march into the new millennium with a progressive agenda encompassing Jewish mysticism, gay rights, racial equality, and legalization of marijuana, all of which are given the celebratory treatment formerly reserved for sacraments such as weddings. The album starts in straightforward fashion, with Lorin Sklamberg's emotion-dripping vocals on the gypsy song "Shprayz Ikh Mir" lavishly backed by an expanded ensemble including the members of the Canadian group Moxy Früvous. The album soon veers from the traditional into the exotic with the clamorous "Moroccan Game," featuring a jazzy, skittering group improvisation. "Mizmor Shir Lehanef (Reefer Song)" reflects the Klezmatics' involvement in the struggle to create honest public discourse about drugs in the U.S. Unlike their earlier work, Possessed includes numerous songs in English, drawn from the Klezmatics' score for playwright Tony Kushner's A Dybbuk: Between Two Worlds (an adaptation of the classic turn-of-the-century Yiddish drama The Dybbuk).

what to buy next: A collaboration with the dusky-voiced Israeli folk diva Chava Alberstein, The Well ♫♫♫♫ (Xenophile, 1998, prod. Ben Mink) features Yiddish poems set to music by Alberstein, with luscious arrangements by the Klezmatics and producer Ben Mink (of k.d. lang fame). The provocatively titled Jews with Horns ♪♪♪♪ (Xenophile, 1995, prod. Hijaz Hirsh-leyb Mustapha, the Klezmatics) is another fine example of how the Klezmatics use their virtuosity to seamlessly integrate traditional Yiddish and avant-garde influences. Transcendent tenor singing, mind-boggling displays of violin technique, modernistic clarinet, and jazz-drenched horn playing are used to update arrangements of traditional material, including the 19th-century Yiddish labor song "In Kamf"; the rushing, tumbling "Man in a Hat"; and the heart-wrenching vocal harmonies of "Es Vilt Zikh Mir Zen."

the rest:

Shvaygn = Toyt (Silence = Death) ♪♪♪♪ (Piranha, 1988)
Rhythm & Jews ♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1992)
(With Itzhak Perlman) In the Fiddler's House ♪♪♪½ (EMI Classics/Angel, 1995)
(With Itzhak Perlman) Live in the Fiddler's House ♪♪♪♪ (EMI Classics/Angel, 1996)

worth searching for: The Klezmatics appear on the following compilations (the first three of which are also reviewed in this book's Compilations section): Klezmer: A Marriage of Heaven & Earth ♪♪♪ (ellipsis arts . . . , 1996), Festival of Light ♪♪♪ (Six Degrees/Island, 1996, prod. Robert Duskis, Bob Appel), Klezmania: Klezmer for the New Millennium ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1997, prod. Henry Sapoznik), and A Tribute to the Skatalites ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1997). Fidl ♪♪♪♪½ (Traditional Crossroads, 1997, prod. Hugo Dwyer) is Alicia Svigals's amazing solo album, a truly stunning showcase for her talents.

solo outings:

Matt Darriau's Paradox Trio:
Matt Darriau's Paradox Trio ♪♪♪♪ (Knitting Factory, 1995)
Flying at a Slant ♪♪♪♪ (Knitting Factory, 1997)
Source ♪♪♪♪ (Knitting Factory/Jam, 1999)

influences:

◀◀ Schloimke Beckerman, Naftule Brandwein, Dave Tarras

▶▶ Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, Brave Old World, Budowitz, Kapelye, Don Byron

see also: Chava Alberstein, Margareta Paslaru, Itzhak Perlman

Suzy Rothfield Thompson

Klezmer Conservatory Band

Klezmer

Formed 1980, in Boston, MA, USA. Based in Boston, MA, USA.

Hankus Netsky, alto saxophone, accordion, piano; Judy Bressler, vocals, tambourine, poyk; Gary Bohan, cornet; James Guttmann, bass; Mark Hamilton, trombone; Robin Miller, flute, piccolo; Miriam Rabson, violin; Javier Perez Saco, piano; Grant Smith, drums, percussion; Ilene Stahl, clarinet; Jeff Warschauer, mandolin, guitar, tenor banjo, background vocals. Other members have included: Don Byron, clarinet; David Brody, violin; Merryl Goldberg, soprano, alto, and baritone saxophones; Evan Harlan, piano, accordion; Frank London, cornet, alto horn; Ingrid Monson, cornet; Steve Netsky, tenor banjo, guitar, mandolin; Marvin Weinberger, violin.

Known for their shimmering performances of traditional and contemporary-tinged Yiddish music, the members of the Klezmer Conservatory Band have been international ambassadors of their high-spirited and infectious dance music since Hankus Netsky assembled the group in 1980. Multi-instrumentalist and composer Netsky, who is chairman of the jazz studies department at the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston, got his introduction to Yiddish music from an uncle and a grandfather who played in Philadelphia klezmer bands during the '20s and '30s. Although klezmer music, also dubbed "Jewish jazz," faded in popularity in the United States after the 1940s, when immigrant Jews tended to want to blend into American culture, recent years have seen a strong renaissance, thanks in part to the efforts of Netsky and the KCB. The 11-piece powerhouse breathes new life into this passionate music, which dates back to medieval Europe and incorporates a gumbo of Greek and Romanian dance rhythms, Dixieland swing, ragtime, and classical elements. The band was featured in 1988's A Jumpin' Night in the Garden of Eden, a documentary about Yiddish music, and in the acclaimed film Enemies, a Love Story. The KCB, which now regularly tours Europe, made its debut abroad in the spring of 1990 when it played several concerts in Germany and brought down the house at the first International Yiddish Festival in Krakow, Poland. The group has also been featured in Joel Gray's Yiddish music revue Borschtcapades '94, and in the PBS special In the Fiddler's House with violinist Itzhak Perlman. Recorded in New York and Krakow, the latter traced the klezmer roots of Perlman's brilliant career. Besides the ever-present high-octane spirit in their songs, the KCB's album notes include translations and/or transliterations, giving an added dimension to this life-affirming, irresistibly toe-tapping music.

what to buy: The band calls Live! The 13th Anniversary Album ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1993, prod. Hankus Netsky, George B. Hicks) its Bar Mitzvah album, and like that joyous coming-of-age milestone, this record, recorded at the Berklee Performance Center in Boston on May 2, 1993, teems with celebration, energy, and excitement. Highlights include "Lena from Palesteena," an "early oriental fox-trot" first recorded by the Original Dixieland Jazz Band in 1921; "The Epsteins," a raucous, cascading, traditional New York–style wedding dance originally recorded by the Epstein Brothers Orchestra in the mid-'50s; and "Rumenye, Rumenye (Romania, Romania)," which shows off singer Judy Bressler's vocal gymnastics in a multilingual rendition of a song that's been sung by Billy Crystal and danced to by John Belushi.

Throughout the album, the energy level is just short of delirious, and the concert setting notches things up even tighter than usual. With its songs and stories, Oy Chanukah! ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1987, prod. Martin Miller) bristles with the spirit of one of the most joyous celebrations of the Jewish year. The added "Oy" in the title—the liner notes describe this multi-purpose exclamation as "a lament, a protest, a cry of dismay, a reflex of delight"—is indicative of the band's omnipresent spunk and the record's historic reflections.

what to buy next: Dancing in the Aisles ♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1997, prod. Hankus Netsky, George B. Hicks) is guaranteed to whisk all but the most lead-footed on a tour of show tunes, swing tunes, wedding music, and more. In addition to the group's instrumental savvy, vocalist Bressler has never sounded better. One of the album's most unusual tracks is "Freylekh Fantastique," which features excerpts from Beethoven, Mozart, Tchaikovsky, Grieg, and Mendelssohn. Roll back the rug!

the rest:
Klez! ♪♪♪½ (Vanguard, 1988)
A Jumpin' Night in the Garden of Eden ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1988)
Old World Beat ♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1991)
Yiddishe Renaissance ♪♪♪½ (Vanguard, 1992)
A Touch of Klez! ♪♪♪½ (Vanguard, 1998)

influences:
◀◀ Jewish tradition, Seymour Rechtzeit, Miriam Kressyn
▶▶ The Klezmatics, Brave Old World

see also: Epstein Brothers Band, Itzhak Perlman

David Sokol

Klezmer Plus!

Klezmer

Formed 1984, in New York, NY, USA. Based in New York, NY, USA.

Sid Beckerman, clarinet; Howie Leess, tenor sax; Pete Sokolow, piano; Ken Gross, trumpet; Tommy Abruzzo, bass; Si Salzburg, drums; Henry Sapoznik, tenor banjo. (All members are from USA.)

This is one of the few American klezmer bands that can boast an actual physical connection to the genre's old Eastern European tradition: clarinetist Sid Beckerman is the son of klezmer trailblazer Shloimke Beckerman, one of the three great pioneer clarinet players in the form (along with Dave Tarras and Naftule Brandwein). Sid started playing with his father at age 14 and made a living as a full-time musician until 1954. But after taking a full-time postal job, he played only sporadically at weddings and bar mitzvahs and for shtetl (Jewish community) associations for several years, before stopping entirely. In 1984, as he was retiring from the post office, Beckerman was recruited by Pete Sokolow and Henry Sapoznik solely on the strength of his father's name. What the band got was a first-class musician, a teacher to more than 100 students, and a mentor to an entire generation of young players. Actually, the other members of the band aren't slackers either! Saxophonist Howie Leess played with several big-name regional swing bands and the Rudy Tepel Hassidic Orchestra, the most important traditional Jewish band in New York in the 1950s. Pete Sokolow and Henry Sapoznik are in the vanguard of klezmer music research and are on the faculty of the YIVO Institute's Yiddish folk arts program, KlezKamp. Although the band has made just one recording, Klezmer Plus! and its individual members are a major influence in a venerable and—thanks largely to them—ongoing tradition.

what to buy: One of the few examples of pre-revival klezmer music, Klezmer Plus! ♪♪♪♪½ (Flying Fish/Rounder, 1991, prod. Henry Sapoznik) features a clarinet, saxophone, and trumpet front line. The combination produces a very dance-oriented, big band–influenced sound, typical of the klezmer outfits that played this music in the Orthodox community during the 1950s.

worth searching for: Band members have produced two important songbooks for would-be klezmer musicians. The Klezmer Plus! Folio features transcriptions from the band's CD. The Compleat Klezmer by Henry Sapoznik and Pete Sokolow is probably one of the most important books on the subject. In addition to 23 tunes from the classic klezmer repertoire, the book features history, discography, bibliography, and performance tips.

influences:
◀◀ Shloimke Beckerman, Dave Tarras, Naftule Brandwein, Rudy Tepel Hassidic Orchestra
▶▶ The Klezmatics, Kapelye, Mazeltones, Metropolitan Klezmer

see also: Kapelye, Dave Tarras

Aaron Howard

The Klezmorim

Klezmer

Formed 1975, in Berkeley, CA, USA. Disbanded 1994.

David Julian Gray, B-flat & E-flat clarinets, piano, mandolin, mandocello, lauto, violin, harmonica (1975–86); Lev Liberman, flute, alto and soprano saxophones (1975–88); Kevin Linscott, trombone (1978–88); John Raskin, percussion, xylophone (1978–83); Donald Thornton, tuba (1978–95); Brian Wishnefsky, trumpet (1977–84); Ben Goldberg, B-flat clarinet (1986–88); Christopher Leaf, trumpet (1985–94); Ken Bergmann, percussion (1985–87); Tom Stamper, drums, percussion (1983–85); Steve Saxon, trumpet (1984–85); David Skuse, violin (1975–80); Greg Carageorge, double bass (1975–77); Laurie Chastain, violin (1975–76); Rick Elmore, bass trombone, tuba,

the klezmorim

bass drum, cymbals (1976–78); Nada Lewis, tsambal mik, baraban, accordion (1977–78); Susie Rothfield (Germany), violin (1976–78); Miriam Dvorin, violin, vocals (1978). (All members are from USA except where noted otherwise.)

The Klezmorim occupy a pivotal place in the overall history of klezmer music, for it was their first album that ushered in the currently burgeoning klezmer revival. The Klezmorim described their music as "the rollicking, vodka-soaked sound of a steam calliope gone mad." They blended the group improvisation of Dixieland jazz with the rougher sounds of the unschooled ensembles that once roamed the villages of Eastern Europe, and added a good measure of New Vaudeville theatrics. The result was a loose, roaring, funky brass sound, different from the more classical approach of the Klezmer Conservatory Band or the modern technical virtuosity of the Klezmatics.

Today klezmer is enjoying a renaissance, with active ensembles in every city. Sometimes dubbed "Jewish jazz," klezmer first became popular in America during the 1920s, when musicians were in the midst of merging the Russian and Romanian dance music of their homelands with the newer sounds of early jazz. However, by the mid-1970s, the form had been practically defunct for decades, a casualty of immigrant Jews' desire to assimilate into American mainstream culture.

The resurrection of klezmer began in 1975 in an unlikely spot: Berkeley, California, where flutist Lev Liberman had unearthed a cache of 78 rpm discs in a Jewish museum, fell in love with this Yiddish soul music, and plunged into an exhaustive study of klezmer (a mind-boggling task at the time, since none of the source material was readily available). Clearly the next step was to form a band in order to revive this all-but-moribund musical genre. At first, that band was string-based, with violinist David Skuse playing a key role in choosing repertoire and arrangements. By 1978 the string players had dropped out, and the Klezmorim became a horn ensemble, which they remained until disbanding in 1994. Encouraged by new Klezmorim member Rick Elmore (also a member of roots-pranksters the Cheap Suit Serenaders and a seasoned street musician in his one-man-band alter-ego, Professor Gizmo), the Klezmorim began to move away from their previous scholarly approach, incorporating elements from the New Vaudeville movement into their stage show. The band toured incessantly, both nationally and internationally, and their success inspired other musicians in other cities to take up the banner of klezmer, with bands first emerging in Boston (the Klezmer Conservatory Band) and New York (Kapelye). In 1983–84, the Klezmorim collaborated on a theatrical production with superstar jugglers the Flying Karamazov Brothers, whose bizarre humor left a permanent mark; the band went on to develop their own theatrical presentation combining slapstick comedy, melodrama, and, oh yes, klezmer, which became very successful—especially in Europe, where Jazz Babies of the Ukraine, the audio document of this you-had-to-be-there spectacle, was recorded. But as a rich body of recorded work shows, there was more to the Klezmorim than met the eye.

what to buy: Recorded live at the Great American Music Hall, Metropolis ♪♪♪½ (Flying Fish, 1981/1993, prod. Stuart Brotman) captures the stirring, celebratory, and occasionally maniacal energy of the Klezmorim at their peak. "Constantinople," "Hot Dishes," and "The Good Soldier" showcase the Klezmorim's evocative re-creation of a Russian military marching band from the turn of the century; the outfit is rhythmically relaxed yet cohesive, sounding as if they have been playing together for decades. David Julian Gray's frenzied clarinet solos on "Kramtweiss Steps Out" and "Heyser Bulgar" feature the laughs, whoops, and swoops associated with klezmer, giving the pieces an authentic village flavor. Not all the tunes are as frenetic; the sinuous "Moldovanke" is more contemplative, and the beautiful "Tuba Doina" creates a unique texture, combining a slow, Middle Eastern–sounding tuba solo by Donald Thornton with the tinkling delicacy of the xylophone. For a look at the very earliest stirrings of the klezmer revival, First Recordings ♪♪♪ (Arhoolie, 1977–78/1988, prod. Chris Strachwitz, the Klezmorim) contains highlights of the Klezmorim's original two albums, including gems from their short-lived opening era as a string-based ensemble. "Fidl Volach," featuring David Skuse's exotic violin, and "Cintec De Dragoste/Hora Lui Damian," with Lev Liberman's lovely flute playing, both serve as reminders of the connection between Balkan folk-dance music and klezmer. Another high point is what the liner notes dub "The 'Turkey in the Straw' of Eastern Europe," "Yoshke Yoshke." From the Klezmorim's second album come the sprightly "Firen Di Mekhutonim Aheym" and one of the band's greatest hits, "Di Zilberne Khasene." First Recordings also boasts a charming cover (originally from the second album, Streets of Gold) by the comic-book genius Robert Crumb, which pictures the band on the deck of a ship, with the Statue of Liberty in the background. Jazz Babies of the Ukraine ♪♪♪ (Flying Fish, 1987, prod. Gilles Hugo) gives a sampling of the music from the stage show for which the Klezmorim became best known. It is unfortunately incomplete without the visuals: picture six dark-haired bearded men performing in fezzes, tossing rubber chickens into the crowd, leaping about like circus acrobats, and conducting a mock Socialist rally, a holy-roller revivalist meeting, and kabuki drama onstage. Lev Liberman sums it up by saying, "It's true that Ken Bergmann used plastic Halloween bones as drumsticks. Yes, I did solo on the HarpoMarxophone. And it is indisputable that we stole our moves from Betty Boop." worth searching for: Notes from the Underground ♪♪♪ (Flying Fish, 1984, prod. Bernie Krause) is a clear evolutionary step toward Jazz Babies of the Ukraine and a precursor to later modern klezmer groups like the Klezmatics, Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, and New Orleans Klezmer All Stars. The excellent incarnation recorded here includes Tom Stamper on drums/percussion and Steve Saxon on trumpet, both experienced jazz players who bump the general musicianship of the group up considerably. Highlights include Duke Ellington's "The Mooche" and the "oriental foxtrot" "Egyptian Ella," based on a late-'20s Ted Lewis recording with a teenage Benny Goodman on clarinet. Another standout is the brilliant tuba solo on "Stambul Tants," originally recorded by the Ukrainian accordion player and bandleader Kornienko.

influences:

⏮ Naftule Brandwein, Abe Schwartz Orchestra, Dave Tarras, Danny Elfman's "Mystic Knights of the Oingo Boingo," Duke Ellington, Fleischman Brothers cartoon music

⏭ Kapelye, the Klezmatics, Brave Old World

see also: Ben Goldberg

Suzy Rothfield Thompson

Kodo

Japanese taiko drumming

Formed 1981, on Sado Island, Japan. Based on Sado Island, Japan.

Motofumi Yamaguchi, artistic director, flute; Ryutaro Kaneko, musical director, percussion; Yoshikazu Fujimoto, O-daiko drum; Takeshi Arai, drums, percussion; Yoko Fujimoto, drums, percussion; Kazuki Imagai, drums, percussion; Sachiko Inoue, drums, percussion; Yasukazu Kano, drums, percussion; Tomohiro Mitome, drums, percussion; Tetsuro Naito, drums, percussion; Akira Nanjo, drums, percussion; Ayako Onizawa, drums, percussion; Eiichi Saito, drums, percussion; Hideyuki Saito, drums, percussion; Takuro Susaki, drums, percussion; Michiko Yanagi, drums, percussion. (All members are from Japan.)

The Japanese characters for Kodo mean "heartbeat," and that's the perfect analogy for the primal pulse of this dynamic ensemble's percussion-heavy compositions. The group was founded in 1981 by a community of people who'd come together 10 years earlier to dedicate themselves to the study of the traditional Japanese taiko drum, and have since gone on to worldwide acclaim thanks to their seemingly endless "One Earth Tour." Indeed, it's in a live context that Kodo is at its best, with an artful approach to performance that lends a fantastic visual element to devastating drum assault. Just imagine: 15 drummers in traditional Japanese regalia, many of them stripped to the waist, sinewy muscles bulging as they pound out monstrous rhythms on drums weighing up to 1,000 pounds with sticks the size of a small tree branch. It's mighty powerful stuff, but while the ritualistic approach may be rooted in Japanese tradition, Kodo has always been open to experimentation and has collaborated with artists ranging from American fusionist Bill Laswell to Peruvian folk group Kusillaqta. Dedicated to promoting international artistic exchange, in 1988 Kodo established the "Earth Celebration," an annual three-day percussion

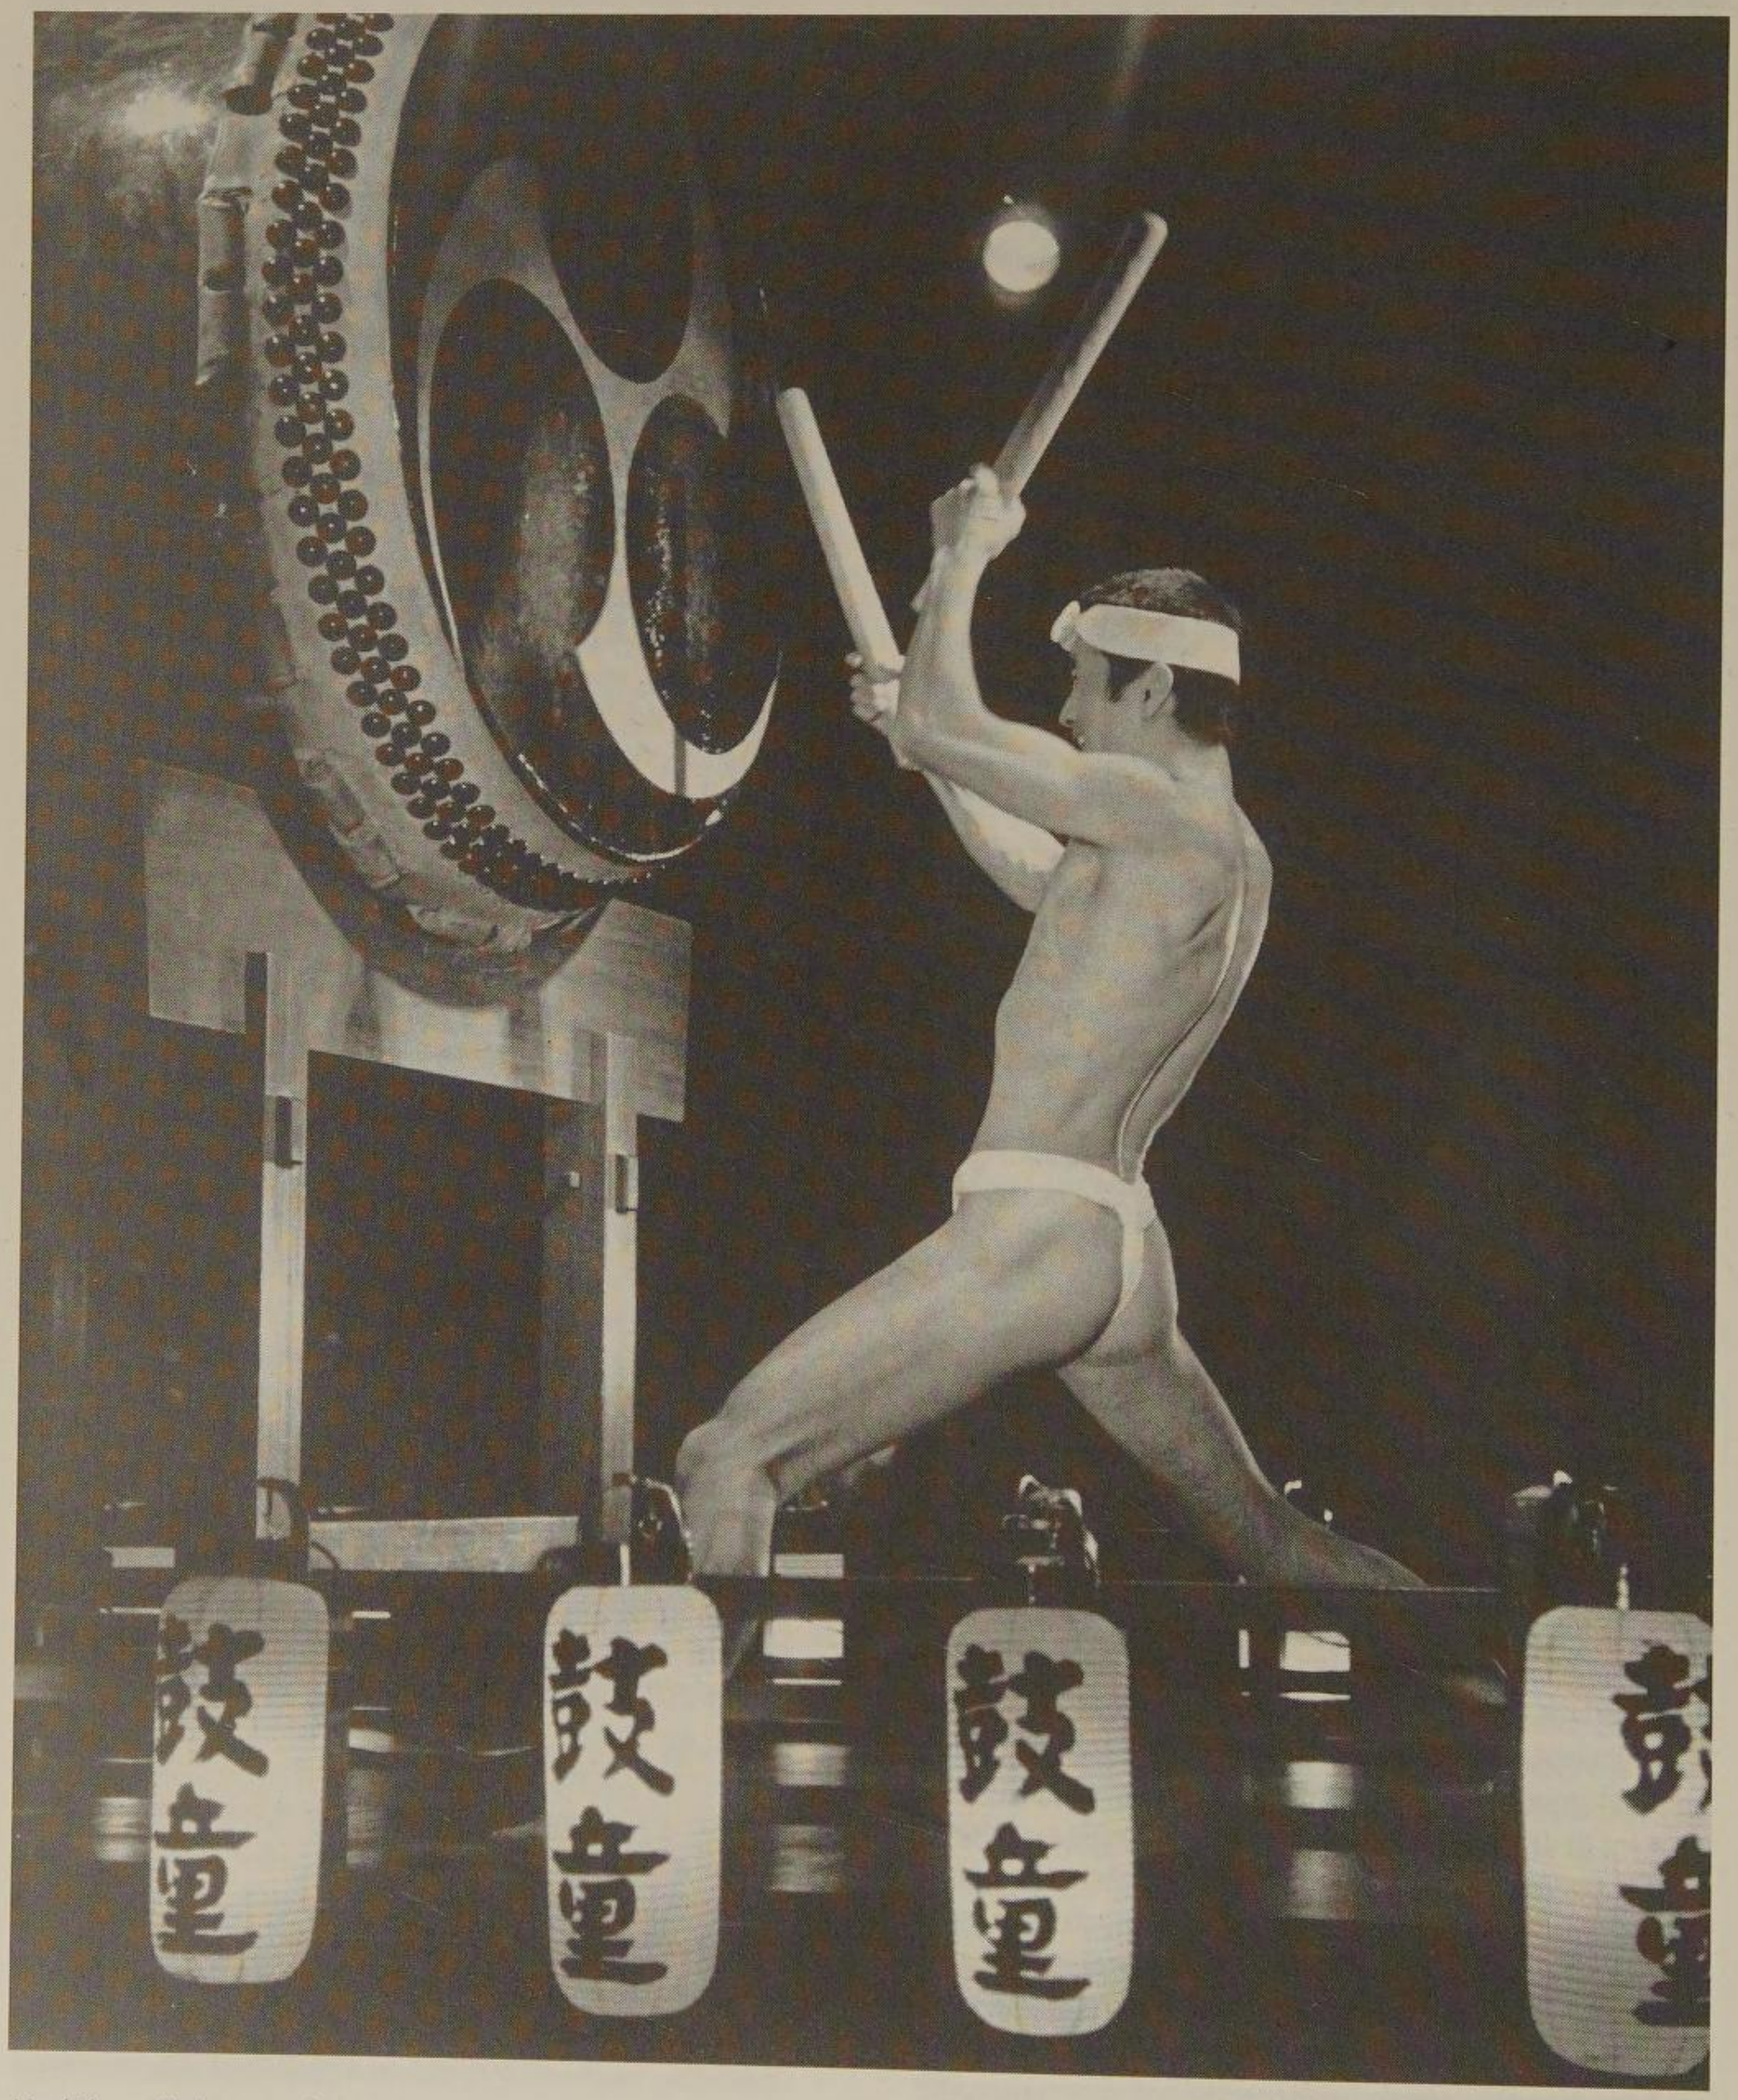
world music in film

Because world music suffers from a lack of commercial radio exposure, the movie industry has long been one of the premier ways for it to reach new audiences—from the bossa nova craze stirred by Black Orpheus (1958) to the increased profile of French rap generated by La Haine (1995). Indeed, world music has been a part of the movies almost from the start. The "Chiquita Banana" girl Carmen Miranda and the "Sparrow of Paris" Edith Piaf were just two of the early world-music stars whose fame increased with their film careers. Much later, Pakistani devotional singer Nusrat Fateh Ali Khan solidified his growing overseas renown through his duet with multi-platinum rocker Eddie Vedder for Dead Man Walking (1995). And it isn't just artists who have benefited from movies, but entire genres. For example, the samba owes at least part of its Stateside success to Walt Disney, whose studio's short film Watercolor of Brazil introduced a nation to the samba-ing parrot Jose Carioca. Instrumental film scores provided another outlet for world music, though typically it was "sanitized" for American consumption. Composers like Henry Mancini drew on the Third World to pepper soundtracks like that of the John Wayne safari film Hatari (1962). World music can be integral to a film's storyline, as with the Gypsy tale Latcho Drom (1993), or solely window dressing, as with Les Negresses Vertes in the Parisian romantic comedy French Kiss (1995). America is a mecca for world music in film, and wealths of material come from abroad, including the yearly 1,000-plus films—most of them musicals—from India alone. Sometimes compromises are involved in transit to the States. Still, with the studios' power and audiences' thirst for new sounds, budding world artists and the movies can make beautiful music together.

see also: Bollywood (sidebar)

Sam Wick

400 kodo



Yoshikazu Fujimoto of Kodo

and arts festival that brings performers from all around the world to the group's home base on Sado Island.

what to buy: Most of the group's previous material had essentially been self-produced and financed, but with the help of producer Bill Laswell, Ibuki ♪♪♪♪♪ (TriStar Music, 1997, prod. Bill Laswell) is their most impressive and accessible outing to date. It's an impeccable recording, with Laswell's crystalline mix putting the listener right at the heart of Kodo's thunderous beats and prominent usage of kakegoe, or shouts of encouragement, adding even more of a visceral thrill to 10 already powerful compositions.

what to buy next: For evidence of the gripping drama inherent in Kodo's dynamic sound, check out The Hunted—Original Motion Picture Soundtrack ♪♪♪♪ (TriStar Music, 1995, prod. Kei-ichi Nakamura), which features 15 imagery-filled songs, many of which were specifically composed for the Japanese-themed thriller. Motofumi Yamaguchi's serene flute strains provide nice counterpoint to the group's often overpowering percussive attack. With most of their earlier recordings now long out of print, Best of Kodo ♪♪♪♪ (TriStar Music, 1993, prod. Kei-ichi Nakamura) is a valuable document of the group's 1988–92 recorded output, primarily focused on capturing the energetic essence of Kodo's live sound.

what to avoid: Although its bold attempts to match Kodo's throbbing rhythms with the beat-happy trance of the techno scene are somewhat interesting, Sai-So—The Remix Project ♪♪ (Red Ink, 1999, prod. Archie Meguro, Paul DeGooyer) is a flawed experiment that loses too much of Kodo's heart and soul, despite the best efforts of remixers including Laswell, Strobe, and DJ Krush.

the rest:
(With Isao Tomita) Nasca Fantasy ♪♪♪½ (TriStar Music, 1994)
Live at ACROPOLIS, Athens, Greece ♪♪♪♪ (TriStar Music, 1995)

worth searching for: Kodo released six albums between 1988 and 1992, all of which are well worth owning but are currently out of print in the United States. If you see them in your local record shop (or, more likely, in the group's native Japan), snatch 'em up, then send me a copy! If the group's appearances in films like The Hunted and Rising Sun have whetted your appetite for a full-on Kodo concert experience, but you don't want to wait for the next leg of their ongoing One Earth Tour, check out the live performance video Kodo (TriStar Music Video, 1992) for a sumptuous documentation.

influences:
⏮ The taiko drumming tradition
⏭ Askill, Cleworth, Lagos & Piper

see also: Bill Laswell

Bret Love

Habib Koité & Bamada

Pop danssa

Formed 1988, in Mali. Based in Mali.

Habib Koité (born 1958, in Mali), guitar, vocals; Baba Sissoko, tama, ngoni, balafon, caragnan; Boubacar Sidibé, guitar, harmonica, vocals; Souleymane Ann, drums, calebasse, vocals; Abdoul Wahab Berthé, bass guitar, kamalengoni. (All members are from Mali.)

Raised among griots (musical oral historians) in Mali, Koité taught himself the guitar to accompany his mother. He sometimes plays in Western tunings, and sometimes tunes his instrument like traditional Malian ones such as the ngoni (proto-banjo) or kamalengoni (six-stringed harp). Schooled at the Malian National Institute of Arts, he stayed on after graduation as a guitar instructor. He brought together Bamada in 1988 as a fusion of Malian sensibilities and instruments like the balafon (xylophone) and ngoni with Western sensibilities and instruments like the guitar, bass, and drum kit. The group won the Voxpole Festival in France, allowing them to record two songs, one of which became a West African hit. Another prize from French radio made it possible to tour. Through it all, Koité has been slowly building up to international acceptance and acclaim. Ma Ya, his second album and American debut, has fulfilled both.

what's available: Ma Ya ♪♪♪♪ (Putamayo, 1999, prod. Habib Koité), finds Koité consciously working to build a contemporary world music. His sound speaks to Western consciousness with its clean sound and middle-of-the-road rhythm section of electric bass and kit drum. It speaks to world consciousness with its polyglot of languages spoken in Mali, a continental crossroads. It speaks to African consciousness as only a griot can.

influences:
⏮ The griot tradition, Khalilou Traore

Hank Bordowitz

Alhaji Bai Konteh

Manding traditional

Born 1920, in West Gambia. Died 1983, in Gambia.

Most Americans have seen the late Alhaji Bai Konteh, they just don't know it. The popular TV mini-series Roots II introduced the world to Konteh, who played the village elder who tells author Alex Haley the story of his ancestor Kunta Kinte. Konteh was from a caste of musicians in Manding society called jalis, similar to West Africa's other well-known oral historians, the griots. He was also a master of the 21-string kora, an African harp-lute. It is said to have originated in the Mandinka kingdom of Kaba about six centuries ago. Konteh's ancestors were from what is now Mali, but followed the fortunes of the empire, moving first to Kaabu in present-day Guinea-Bissau, then to Casamance in southern Senegal, before finally settling in Gambia. Because of his diverse background Konteh was equally at home with the stately, intricate Malian style of kora playing and the more dance-oriented rhythms of the Gambian style. Gambian music allowed for more individualistic expression, and Konteh's mastery of his instrument led him to create virtuoso performances. Konteh, with members of his family including son Dembo, toured Europe, Russia, and the U.S., bringing much of the world its first taste of the dignity and beauty of Manding music.

what's available: Kora Melodies from the Republic of Gambia, West Africa ♪♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1979, prod. Marc D. Pevar) is the only readily available recording, and it is a classic. In the early 1970s there were few commercial albums of African music to be found in the U.S. Most were compilations of field recordings or drum ensembles that had toured with national dance companies; when Rounder released this, it was the first full-length record of a solo traditional performer. Konteh's enormous talent is shown in a fine light throughout, on a record of beauty and clarity.

worth searching for: Pierre Dørge went to Gambia and studied with Konteh, learning much about concepts of time in Sahel African music. You'll hear the influence on Brikama ♪♪♪♪ (SteepleChase, 1984, prod. Pierre Dørge), credited to Pierre Dørge & New Jungle Orchestra—particularly on Dørge's tribute to his teacher, "To Alihaji Bai Konteh."

influences:

⏩ Dembo Konteh, Malamini Jobarteh, Kausu Kouyate

Jared Snyder

Kornog

French Celtic

Formed 1981, in Brittany, France. Disbanded 1987.

Christian Lemaître, fiddle; Jean-Michel Veillon, flute, bombard, whistle; Söig Sibéril, guitar; Jamie McMenemy (Scotland), mandolin, bouzouki, cittern, vocals. (All members are from France except where otherwise noted.)

After helping to found the Battlefield Band and making three albums with them, Jamie McMenemy moved to France, where he joined with guitarist Söig Sibéril, fiddler Christian Lemaître, and flautist Jean-Michel Veillon to form Kornog. This quartet of musicians all had experience within the Celtic boomlet begun by Irish trendsetters the Chieftains, but the French trio could also look to Alan Stivell for inspiration when adapting Breton traditions to the larger Celtic blueprint. Kornog's first, eponymous album was released in 1983, and the mix of McMenemy's broad Scottish brogue with stellar musicianship from the rest of the band made them a force to be reckoned with on the Breton music scene. Their next album, Premiére, was recorded while on tour in North America and remains the high point of their catalog. By the time they broke up they'd made a total of four albums, including the finale, IV, eccentrically released only on vinyl. Since the demise of the band McMenemy has gone on to perform with Mauve Taxi and Orion, while Sibéril, Veillon, and Lemaître helped start another fine (and influential) Breton-based band, Pennou Skoulm. Sibéril and Veillon next performed in yet another group, Den, while Lemaître joined Barzaz. Lemaître is also one of the three principals (along with Johnny Cunningham and Kevin Burke) in the Celtic Fiddle Festival.

what's available: Most of Kornog's first American release, Premiére ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1984, prod. Herschel Freeman), was recorded in one night at the Coffehouse Extempore in Minneapolis, Minnesota, during a U.S. tour. It may very well be the definitive Kornog album because the performances have the excitement of a live concert without any of the glitches. "Dans An Dro" reveals Sibéril to be the finest Breton guitarist since Dan Ar Braz of Malicorne. There are some nice things to be heard on Ar Seizh Avel (On Seven Winds) ♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1985), especially "Ronds de St. Vincent," which shows off Veillon's skill on the wooden flute, and "Dans Plinn," with superb interplay between McMenemy's bouzouki (Greek lute) and Sibéril's guitar. McMenemy's work on a Bulgarian dance piece, "Varbishka Tarchenitza," foreshadows some of the material he would later perform with the Belgian Baltic/Celtic hybrid group Orion.

worth searching for: Christian Lemaître is an extremely talented fiddler who can stand up to the inter-band competition he finds in The Celtic Fiddle Festival ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1995, prod. Johnny Cunningham). His awesome work alongside fellow fiddlers Johnny Cunningham and Kevin Burke (as well as guitarist John McGann) is the kind of thing that causes jaws to drop. This group's Kornog quotient doubled when McGann was replaced by Söig Sibéril in their follow-up release, Encore ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1998, prod. Johnny Cunningham). A series of British concerts provided the material for the album, which really shows off all the players in duets and group settings. Lemaître and Sibéril's two duets amply display the long-standing empathy between these superb musicians.

influences:

⏪ Alan Stivell, Gwerz, Battlefield Band

⏩ Pennou Skoulm, Den, Kemia, Orion

see also: Dan Ar Braz, the Battlefield Band, Kevin Burke, Johnny Cunningham, Alan Stivell

Garaud MacTaggart

Kotoja /Ken Okulolo

Afropop

Formed 1985, in Oakland, CA, USA. Based in Oakland, CA, USA.

Ken Okulolo (Nigeria), bass, vocals, drum programs, leader; Babatunde Williams (Nigeria), trumpet; Avi Bortnick (USA), guitar; Jeff Essex (USA), keyboards; Peck Allmond (USA), sax, trumpet; Ken Brooks (USA), tenor sax; Marty Wehner (USA), trombone; Paul Henson (USA), tenor and alto sax; Danjuma Adamu (Nigeria), percussion; Sikiru Adepoju (Nigeria), talking drum; Lemul Barrow (USA), drums; Joe Brigandi (USA), drums; Jasmine Walker (USA), vocals; Chisa Tayari (USA), vocals; Elouise Burrell (USA), vocals.

Kotoja, loosely translated, means "let us be friends," a fitting name for a band that has the vibe of an extended family. Kotoja was founded by bass player Ken Okulolo, who once played in Joni Haastrup's Monomono, a Nigerian rock band that was legendary in its homeland. Okulolo also has played with King Sunny Adé and Victor Olaiya's Highlife Band; produced records for other artists; and put out his own album for EMI Nigeria, Talking Bass Experience. In the early 1980s Okulolo was recruited by O.J. Ekemode for his Nigerian All Stars. Ekemode, an Afro-Beat pioneer, had relocated to California and was putting together a band of Nigeria's top players for a proposed American tour. When they reached Oakland, the tour fell apart and Okulolo and several other All Stars jumped ship to form Kotoja. The band picked up many of the Bay Area's best young jazz and funk players, as well as several expatriate Nigerians with impressive credentials. Kotoja was an immediate favorite with the worldbeat fans who were jamming clubs for the Looters, Big City, Mapenzi, Zulu Spear, and other like-minded bands. But while most of these outfits played music closer to the rock side of the equation, Kotoja was able to mix and match styles with an authentic African vibe. They could jump from juju to highlife to Afro-Beat (all popular Nigerian dance-music forms), often dropping in a bit of funk, Trinidadian/Barbadian soca, Cuban son, Antillean zouk, or other Afro-Caribbean textures to keep dancers, and listeners, guessing. As the first wave of interest in worldbeat began subsiding, Okulolo diversified into three simultaneously operating units, including Kotoja. He put together the West African Highlife Band with four other Nigerian expatriates, all of whom got their first professional experience in the highlife bands of the early '60s. He is also one half of the Nigerian Brothers, a duo that performs traditional and contemporary Nigerian acoustic guitar music.

what to buy: Sawalé ♪♪♪♪ (Mesa, 1992, prod. Ken Okulolo, Patrick Coughlin) is a non-stop dance party; the band combines juju, highlife, and Afro-beat with funk, soca, son, and other Caribbean textures for an intoxicating brew.

what to buy next: Freedom Is What Everybody Needs ♪♪♪♪ (Mesa, 1991, prod. Ken Okulolo, Jim Dean) was an impressive debut from a band already known for packing dance floors and inspiring boogie-mania with their solid Afro-funk groove.

the rest:

Super Sawalé Collection ♪♪♪♪ (Mesa, 1992)

influences:

- O.J. Ekemode, Sunny Adé, Sunny Okosuns, Fela Kuti, Monomono
- West African Highlife Band, Nigerian Brothers

j. poet

The Kronos Quartet

Classical, new age, world, jazz, chamber music, string quartet

Formed 1973, in San Francisco, CA, USA. Based in San Francisco, CA, USA.

David Harrington, violin; John Sherba, violin; Hank Dutt, viola; Joan Jeanrenaud, cello. (All members are from USA.)

David Harrington was inspired to form the Kronos Quartet by the joy he felt in discovering and playing new music. True to this calling, in recent years the Quartet has made a specialty of discovering and commissioning works from composers around the globe, including Foday Musa Suso, Tan Dun, Philip Glass, and Sofia Gubaidulina. Though all of the members are classically trained, they often favor avant garde and dissonant pieces over the melodic work usually associated with classical string quartets. They've received a Best Contemporary Composition Grammy for Winter Was Hard and several nominations in other categories, and have made a trademark of performing before equally diverse audiences. "That's not only fun, but it's challenging, and I like to hear our work in different settings," Harrington once told an interviewer, in reflection on a week that had included Kronos appearances at a jazz festival, a rock concert, and an opera house. More truly than for many outfits, to the Kronos Quartet, all the world's a stage.

what to buy: The Quartet's most outstanding contribution to world music thus far is Pieces of Africa ♪♪♪♪½ (Elektra/Nonesuch, 1992, prod. Richard Horowitz), a fascinating combination of chamber music with a variety of songs and stories by African composers. The liner notes are illuminating, too. Venturing in another direction, they explored the music of tango great Astor Piazzolla in Tango Sensations ♪♪♪♪ (Elektra/Nonesuch, 1991, prod. Judith Sherman). Released 1985–1995 ♪♪♪♪ (Elektra/Nonesuch, 1995, prod. Judith Sherman) is a two-disc retrospective that includes excerpts from the group's distinctive explorations in rock, classical, early

krosfyah

The Kronos Quartet with guest Foday Musa Suso (center)

music, and avant garde compositions. They have an extensive discography, all on Elektra/Nonesuch, of work more concerned with classical, rock, and jazz experiments than with world music. Because this oeuvre is so diverse, there's not really one disc that could be said to be representative (the wide-ranging Released 1985–1995 comes closest), but Winter Was Hard ♪♪♪♪ (Elektra/Nonesuch, 1988, prod. Judith Sherman) is a good choice for understanding their non-world-music interests.

what to avoid: Ghost Opera ♪ (Elektra/Nonesuch, 1997, prod. Judith Sherman) is the Kronos Quartet's take on Chinese operatic style in compositions by Tan Dun. Yes, they like dissonance, and yes, they're good at it, but some of the music on this record takes it in painful—or worse, boring—directions.

influences:
⏮ George Crumb, Steve Reich

see also: Obo Addy, Huun-Huur-Tu, Pandit Pran Nath, Astor Piazzolla, Foday Musa Suso, Wu Man

Kerry Dexter

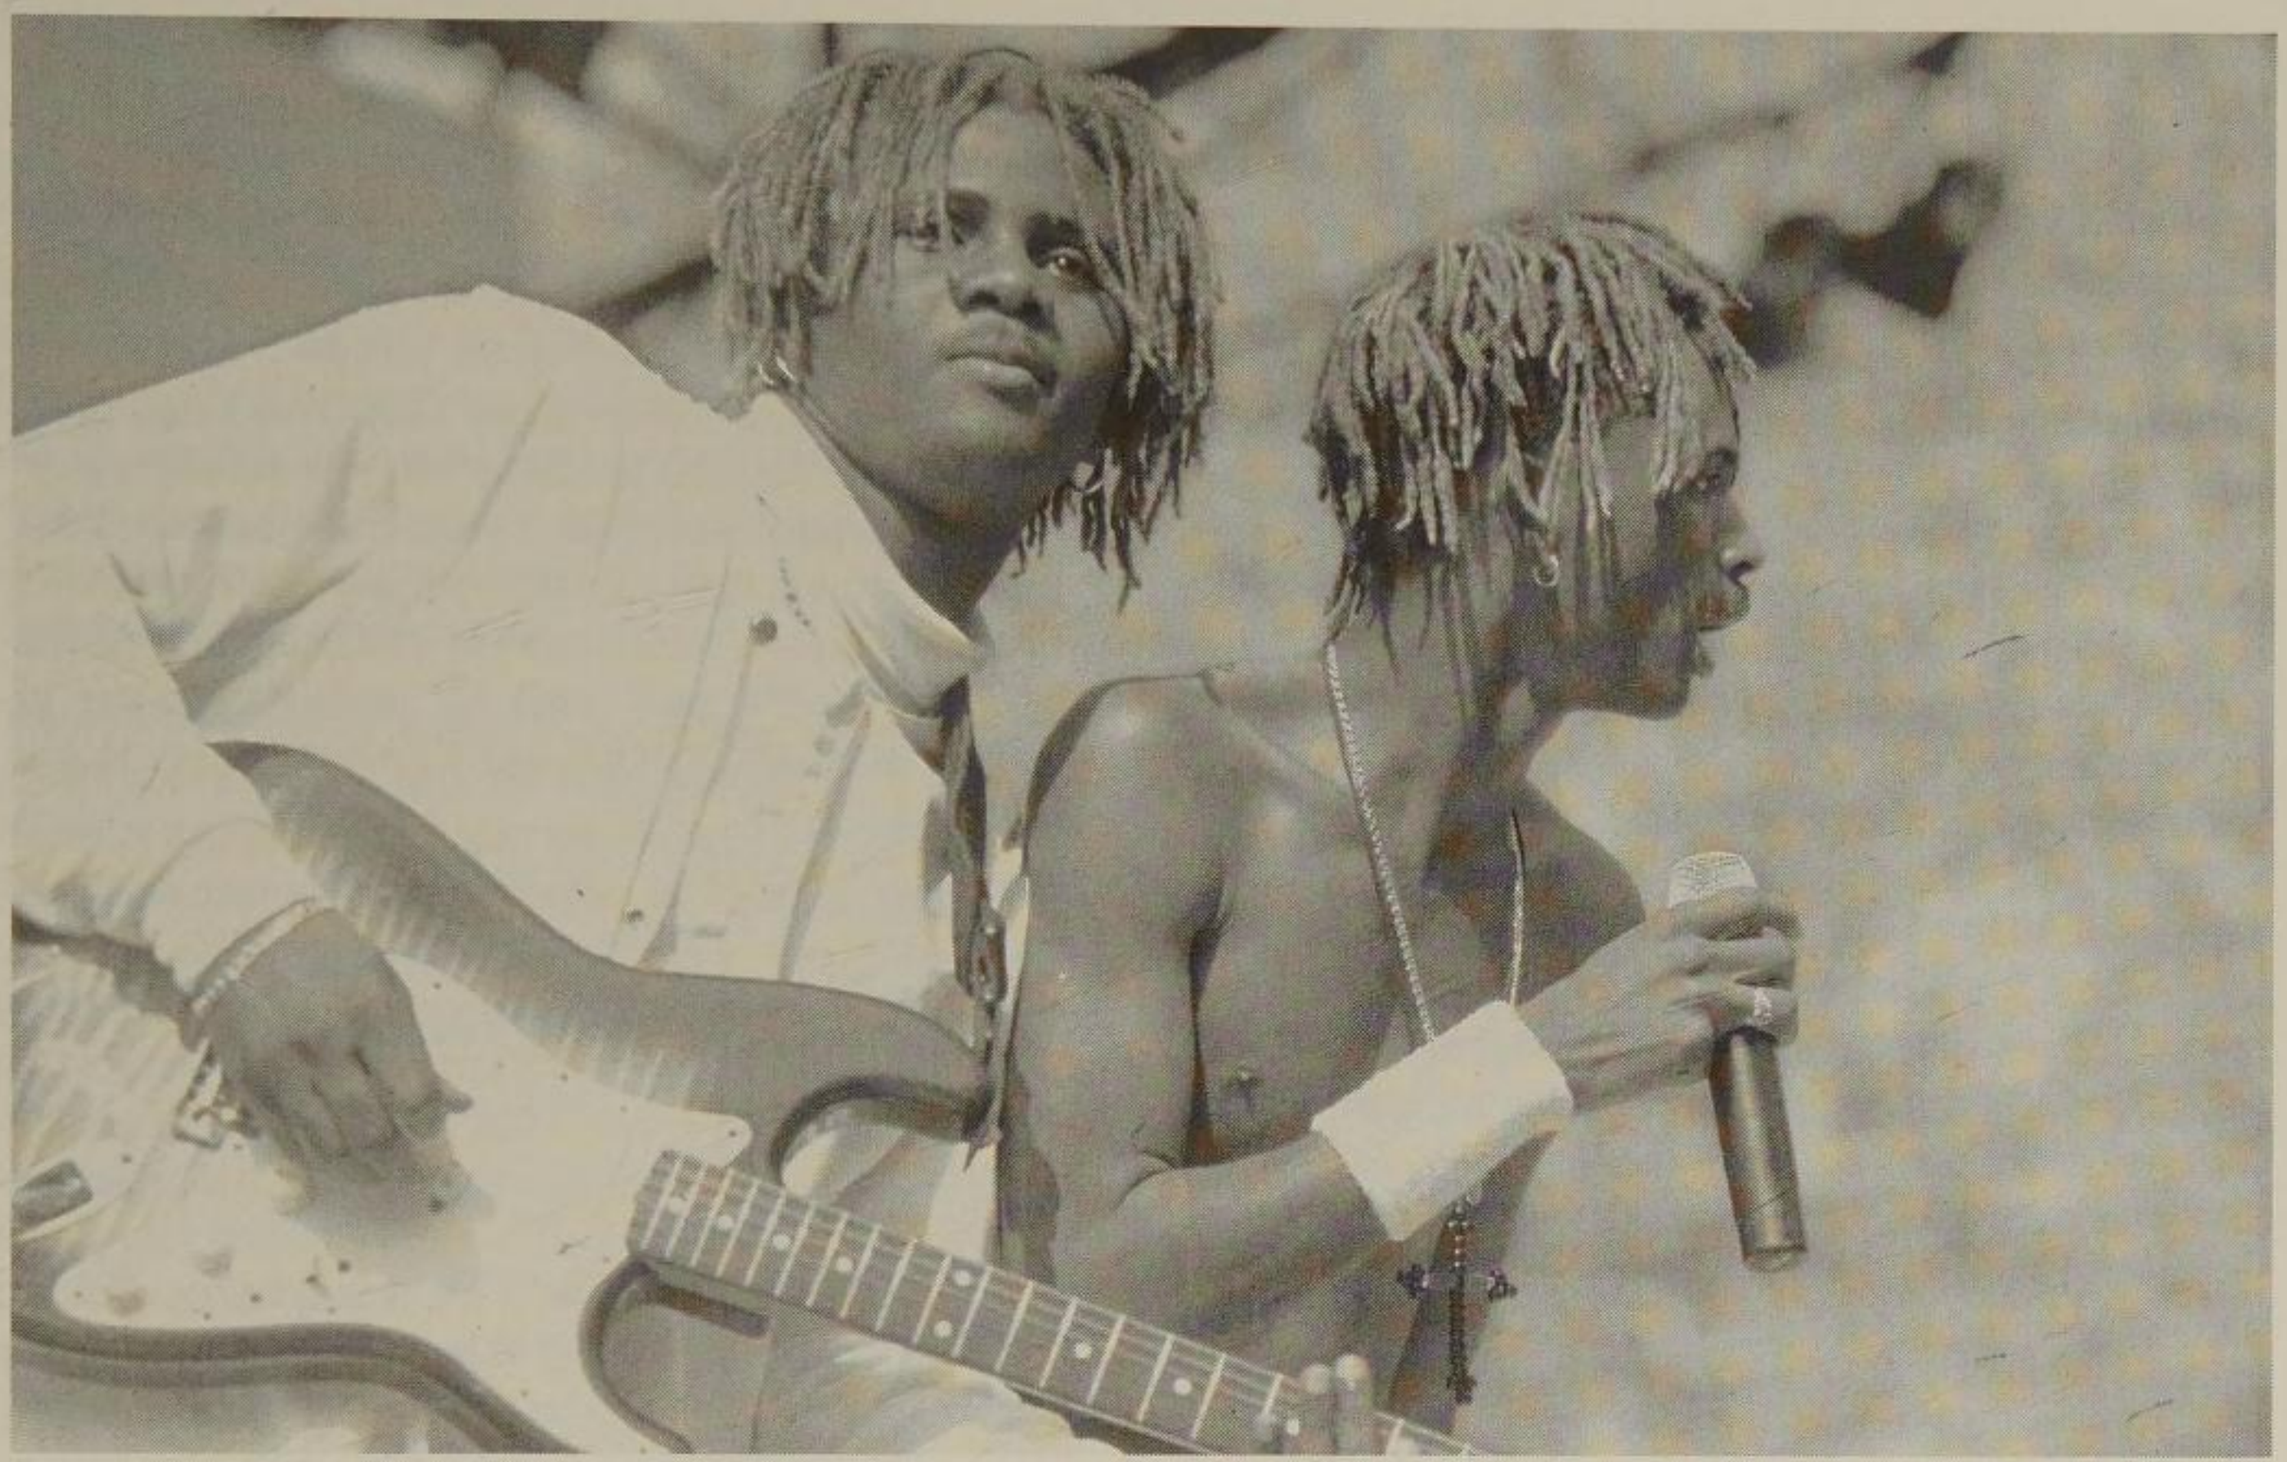
krosfyah

Soca

Formed (as Crossfire) December 1989, in Barbados. Based in Barbados.

Edwin Yearwood, lead vocals; Anthony Bailey, guitar, vocals; Michael Agard, keyboards, vocals; Felix Forde, bass; Sherwin King, drums (1993–present); Leslie Lett (Antigua), keyboards, vocals (1993–present); Henderson Quimby, vocals (1993–97); Margaret Bovell ("Miss B"), vocals (1995); Cameron Quintyne, trumpet (1996–present); Mark Husbands, trombone (1997–present); Leonard Griffith, keyboards, vocals (1998–present); Ray Armstrong, vocals (1998–present). (All members are from Barbados unless otherwise noted.)

At the forefront of a new Bajan (Barbadian) generation including Coalishun and Square One, krosfyah is currently the hottest—not to mention the most musically talented and lyrically accomplished—young soca ("SOul" + "CAlypso") band recording in the Caribbean. After cutting their teeth for several years as a ho-hum hotel band, "Crossfire" gave themselves a conceptual facelift and memorable misspelling, and re-emerged rather quickly as regional superstars. The fireworks started in 1995, when lead singer and



krosfyah, with lead singer Edwin Yearwood (r)

composer Edwin Yearwood turned a hat trick, taking all three crowns (Party Monarch, Road March Monarch, and Pic-O-De-Crop) on the Barbados calypso festival scene—and thereby earning inevitable comparisons with his illustrious Trinidadian role model, David Rudder. After being named "Band of the Year" in Barbados's Nation Entertainment Awards, krosfyah then steamrollered through the rest of the Caribbean, stopping to conquer Trinidad carnival (as part of the "Bajan Invasion") the following year. Since then, there have been fresh triumphs throughout the world: pop charts in Australia, gold records in Canada, Road March crowns in Holland, Summerstage in Central Park. (Yearwood was also named "World Soca Monarch" of 1998.) krosfyah is first and foremost a tightly wound soca band renowned for its high-energy stage shows, but part of the group's crossover appeal is its largely unstudied eclecticism. Principal songwriters Yearwood and Tony Bailey manage to bend the soca genre without breaking it, skillfully incorporating elements of Antillean zouk, Jamaican dancehall, and American soul. On stage and disc, krosfyah can heat it up with white-hot, whistle-blowing road marches, then cool it down with mellow, smoldering dance tunes—and still casually toss in a traditional-sounding ballad or protest calypso for seasoning.

what to buy: Ultimate Party—Pump Me Up ♪♪♪♪♪ (Crossfire Entertainment, 1995/Kalinago, 1997, prod. Nicholas Brancker) is unavoidable. It's the album that made krosfyah's reputation, a near-perfect collection that in terms of songcraft, production values, and arrangements far transcends standard soca fare. A monster hit both in and out of the Caribbean—it currently holds the all-time album-sales record for the genre—Ultimate Party is chock-full of frenzied party socas and other superb songs like the exuberant "Obadele," a lively, melodic tribute to Barbadian champion sprinter Obadele Thompson. But its centerpiece is what's become the band's signature tune, "Pump Me Up," whose much-imitated formula mixes an infectious guitar riff; a loping, laid-back tempo (underlaid with an Indian-influenced chutney-tassa groove); "positive" lyrics; and liberal doses of Yearwood's winsome, trademark interjection, "Oh Gawsh!"

what to buy next: Hot Zone ♪♪♪ (Kalinago, 1998, prod. Nicholas Brancker, Chris Allman), the band's latest release, is a collection of mainly solid but (by krosfyah standards) unexceptional tunes, with a preponderance of pared-down, bass-heavy dancehall socas and by-the-numbers entries in the "Pump Me Up" mode. The Haitian cadence-flavored "Calor" really is hot, and the single-entendre ragga (deejay) soca "Woody Wood Pecker" is both catchy and witty.

worth searching for: Aim High ♪♪♪♪ (Crossfire Entertainment, 1996/Kalinago, 1996, prod. Nicholas Brancker) is nominally a "various artists" compilation, but the lion's share of the efforts are by krosfyah and its members. In the manner of Hot Zone, it's slightly marred by one ill-begotten foray into drecky, Boyz-II-Men–style '90s soul, but other tunes like the exhilarating peace anthem "Down de Road" and the euphorically sexy "Wet Me" more than compensate. Aim High has recently gone out of print, as has the splendid EP Fyuh Riddums ♪♪♪♪½ (Kalinago, 1997, prod. Nicholas Brancker), which features the Road March winner "Highway Robbery" and the gospelly "Redemption of Me" in addition to several more songs in krosfyah's feel-good strong suit. Happily, both albums are soon to be combined and reissued under the title Aim and Fyuh, also on the Kalinago label. Truly dedicated fans will want to find the 1997 holiday album Fyahside Christmas (Kalinago, 1997, prod. Nicholas Brancker) and the 1994 cassette version of Ultimate Party (for the three tunes that didn't make it onto the similarly named '95 CD).

influences:
⏮ David Rudder

Michael Eldridge

Ali Hassan Kuban

Nubian Pop

Born 1929, in Gotha, Egypt. Based in Cairo, Egypt.

Nubia, the kingdom once called "The Gateway to Africa" by Westerners, today lies underwater in Southern Egypt and Northern Sudan, flooded by the Aswan High Dam, but Nubian musical and cultural traditions can be traced back at least 5,000 years. Ali Hassan Kuban first sang for bargemen plying the Nile at age seven, later played in traditional bands at weddings and other social functions, and finally became one of the first to synthesize Nubian folk with Sudanese and Egyptian music, creating a modern urban style that is both folkloric and progressive. It is said that he decided to add brass to his band after standing outside a Cairo jazz club. Although he turns 70 this year, Kuban still leads the band and sings the hits that have made him famous.

what to buy: Many of Kuban's early hits were released on cassettes recorded in one take, into one mike, the whole band in one room. The tunes on From Nubia to Cairo ♪♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1991, prod. Delta Sound), including "Sukker, Sukker, Sukker" and "Amira," were mega hits in the Arabic world, selling millions. The music features electric guitars, organs, and sax, as well as oud, tar, and darabouka (Arabic tabla). The recording quality is not the best, but the irresistible groove carries the day.

what to buy next: Nubian Magic ♪♪♪♪♪ (Mercator, 1994, prod. Bibi Hammond) is a recent album with incredible playing and top-notch production. The 65-year-old Kuban is still kicking serious butt, with a funky bass player and horn charts that sound like an Arabic version of the Famous Flames. The album includes a disco remix of "Maria-Maria," one of Kuban's latest hits, that will cause serious damage to any dance floor.

influences:
⏮ Umm Kulthum

⏭ Hamza El Din, Hussein Bashir, Bahr Abu Greisha

see also: Salamat

j. poet

Kukuruza

Bluegrass

Formed 1990s, in the former Soviet Union. Based in USA.

Irina Surina, vocals; Michael Venikov, guitar; George Palmov, mandolin, harmonica, vocals; Sergei Moslov, fiddle, vocals; Alexeui Aboltynsh, bass; Dmitri Krichevsky, drums. (All members are from the former Soviet Union.)

Kukuruza is a group of Russian musicians who fell in love with the high-lonesome sound of American bluegrass. They play familiar English-language bluegrass songs and Russian-language originals in the style. True to the heartland that drew them from their homeland, the group's name is derived from the Russian word for "corn"—no double entendre intended!

what's available: Endless Story ♪♪♪ (Gadfly, 1998, prod. Andrei Zachesov) is the group's furthest venture into mainstream repertoire, with tracks including "Red Haired Boy," "Crazy," and "Bird on the Wire." Crossing Borders ♪♪♪½ (Sugar Hill, 1993, prod. Keith Case, Chris Cioffi) shows a bit more of the Russian version of high-energy bluegrass and includes guest appearances by Maura O'Connell and Jerry Douglas. Their first release, Kukuruza: A Russian Bluegrass Band, is out of print.

influences:
⏮ Bill Monroe, Jerry Douglas

see also: Maura O'Connell

Kerry Dexter

Umm Kulthum

Arabic and Egyptian modern and traditional

Born May 4, 1904, in Tammay al Zahayrah, Egypt. Died February 3, 1975, in Cairo, Egypt.

Imagine if Bessie Smith hadn't been killed in that car crash in Mississippi, but rose to be the type of symbol of American culture that Louis Armstrong became. Combine that with the continuous musical growth that Armstrong's contemporaries Coleman Hawkins or Earl Hines maintained, and you have some idea of the incredibly pervasive influence of Umm Kulthum on almost 50 years of Egypt's history.

She arose from humble beginnings, the daughter of the imam of a small town in the Nile delta. Her father, who supplemented his income at the mosque by singing at weddings and other celebrations in the community, taught his sons his songs, but it was his daughter, eavesdropping on the sessions, who learned the lessons best. At one performance, when her brother Khalid fell ill, she stood in, and it was clear from then on that she was gifted with an exceptionally strong and vibrant voice. She became the lead singer, accompanied by the chorus of her brothers and father. In 1923 the family relocated to Cairo to capitalize on her increasing popularity. When she got there she was initially viewed as talented but unschooled in the skills that a great singer needed. To rectify this she studied Arabic poetry and began to perform with more accomplished musicians. Her repertoire moved from the religious songs of her father to new love songs composed for her. Her clothes changed to match the manners and dress of the sophisticated upper-class women of the city. She began to make recordings and perform on the radio. Eventually she broadcast every Thursday night, bringing much of the Arab world to a halt for "Umm Kulthum Night." Her popularity was so great that it allowed her the freedom to have complete control of her career. Throughout most of that career she would act as her own agent and producer. Eventually she was also elected the president of the Egyptian Musicians' Union.

The 1940s through 1950s are said to be her "golden age," when her artistic vision had reached full maturity. She commissioned composers to write for her in the style of the day, moving from an Egyptian sound, to a more classical Arabic sound, to the heady times after the 1952 revolution when she championed the modern compositions of Mohamed Abdel Wahab, which utilized Western instruments and musical concepts. By the 1960s she had moved past stardom to become "the voice and face of Egypt." This was especially true after the 1967 war, when she traveled throughout the Arab and Muslim world on behalf of her country. Her death literally brought Egypt to a halt. Millions filled the streets of Cairo to mourn her passing. Her fame had become so great that it in some ways overshadowed the magnificence of her voice, but it is the power of that voice that still sells recordings around the world. Though even in death Kulthum continues to have an impact on much of the globe comparable to Caruso, Elvis, Streisand, and Madonna all in one, you'll have to scout the import bins and Arab American shops for her material in this country. Each release is "worth searching for"; this entry covers some of the best and easiest to find.

what to buy: If you haven't heard Umm Kulthum before, nothing can quite prepare you for the music on Al Atlaal ♪♪♪♪♪ (Sono Cairo). Kulthum's voice in its prime is beyond compare, but picture the power of Aretha Franklin with the total control of Maria Callas. A sonic banquet for connoisseurs of the human voice.

what to buy next: Vol. 2: 1926–1927–1928 ♪♪♪♪ (Artistes Arabes) is an excellent compilation of the great early recordings. Though remastered from old 78 rpm discs, the sound is pretty good. The selection chronicles the slow movement from a religious repertoire into a more popular form, from the world of her father into the almost art-song world of Cairo. The singing is full of youth and soul, backed with small traditional ensembles.

the rest:

Umm Kulthum, Vol. 1: 1926 ♪♪♪♪ (Artistes Arabes)
Hajrik ♪♪ (Sono Cairo)
Rubayeat el-Khayyam ♪♪♪½ (Sono Cairo)
Faat el-Mi'ad ♪ (Sono Cairo)
The Twinkling Star ♪♪♪ (Voix De L'orie)
In the Old Tradition ♪♪ (Sono Cairo)
Hakam Alena Al-Hawa ♪♪♪♪ (Sono Cairo)
Loilit Hob ♪ (Sono Cairo)
Zalamouni El-Nass ♪♪♪ (Cairophone)
Ana Fi Intizarak ♪♪♪♪♪ (Sono Cairo)
Shams Al-Aseel ♪♪♪♪♪ (Sono Cairo)
Nasheed Al-Amal ♪♪♪♪♪ (Sono Cairo)
Sahran Lewahdi ♪♪♪♪♪ (Sono Cairo)
Zalamouni Ennas/Ya Ein Ya Ein ♪♪♪♪♪ (Sono Cairo)

worth searching for: The 1997 film documentary Umm Kulthum, A Voice Like Egypt is an uneven but extremely interesting look at the singer and her career. The performance snippets are not long enough and some of the interviews are too perfunctory, but still there is nothing else like it to give you an initial idea of the power and sway of this great woman.

influences:

- Ahmad Adaweer, Hassan el Asmar, Shabaan Adul Raheem, Shaabeeni an Talaat, Sami Ali

see also: Mohamed Abdel Wahab

Jared Snyder

George Kuo

Slack-key guitar

Born November 17, 1955, in Hawaii, USA. Based in Hawaii, USA.

Hawaii's unique open-tuned slack-key guitar style is not only a national treasure, but, usually, a family affair: George Kuo comes from a distinguished line of practitioners. For example, his grand-uncle Albert Kawelo taught slack-key great Ray Kane during the 1930s. With all that history behind him, Kuo developed a very traditional style of playing. He has recorded on his own, with steel-guitar player Barney Isaacs, and as a member of the Kipapa Rush Band and Eddie Kamae's Sons of Hawaii, which he joined in 1986.

what's available: Aloha No Na Kupuna—"Love for the Elders" ♪♪♪♪ (Dancing Cat, 1996, prod. George Winston) is a beautiful example of traditional slack-key playing. The influence of seminal acts Sonny Chillingworth and the Sons of Hawaii is readily heard here: two of the songs Kuo plays appear on a 1971 Sons album. Carrying forth such legacies in fine form, Aloha No Na Kupuna won a "Kuo a Nâ Hôkû Hanohano" award for Instrumental Album of the Year from the Hawaiian Academy of Recording Arts in 1997. Barney Isaacs's masterful steel-guitar playing gives his and Kuo's Hawaiian Touch ♪♪♪½ (Dancing Cat, 1995, prod. George Winston) a more easily distinguishable Hawaiian sound (for mainlanders). The liner notes claim that this is the first album of acoustic-guitar/steel-guitar duets in Hawaiian history. Whether or not that's true, it's a prime collection for aficionados of the music or the instruments.

influences:

Rev. Dennis Kamakahi, Ray Kane, Gabby Pahinui

see also: Sonny Chillingworth, Ray Kane

Brian Mansfield

Fela Kuti

Afro-Beat

Born Fela Anikulapo Ransome-Kuti, October 15, 1938, in Abeokuta, Nigeria. Died August 2, 1997, in Lagos, Nigeria.

In Africa and worldwide, Fela Kuti is renowned as a musician, political irritant, and supporter of Pan-Africanism. Afro-Beat, the musical hybrid he created, combines elements of dance-band highlife (via Ghana), soul (à la James Brown), and jazz for a potent rhythmic force, to which he adds lyrics decrying government corruption sung in either Yoruba or pidgin English. He got his performance baptism as a vocalist with trumpeter and highlife superstar Victor Olaiya. In 1958 Fela (as he is known to a world of fans) went to London and studied at Trinity College of Music. While there he formed a highlife band known as Koola Lobitos. After studying trumpet and music theory for four years, he returned to Nigeria, where he re-formed Koola Lobitos. Between 1963 and '68 Fela unveiled the first version of "Afro-Beat," but it was his trip to the United States in 1969 that helped crystallize his musical ideas. He lived and recorded in Los Angeles for most of the year, absorbing lessons in black history and Black Power through an impressive reading regimen that helped develop his political consciousness. He also rethought his approach to music, telling an interviewer that he had been "using Jazz to play African music, when really I should be using African music to play Jazz." The horn-section work from James Brown's funk band also made an impression on Fela at this time. In 1970 he was back in Nigeria with a newly minted evolution of Afro-Beat, a band (Africa 70), and a vision of social justice that endeared him to much of the African populace while marking him as a gadfly to the ruling establishment. From that time forward Fela released more than 40 albums; was harassed, beaten up, and imprisoned by Nigerian governments; renamed his band Egypt 80; and through it all remained as popular with the African masses as ever. Fela was rumored to be ill months before his actual death, and some of the local newspapers reported his passing prematurely. One of his brothers, Olikoye Ransome-Kuti, later announced that Fela had died due to heart failure and complications from AIDS. His transparent casket was displayed at a funeral attended by thousands of fans and dignitaries. At this writing the sprawling recorded legacy he left behind was set to become easier for Americans to discover with an extensive reissue program on MCA Records, beginning with a "Best Best Best Of" retrospective (and that's no typo!) in 2000.

what to buy: After his release from prison in 1986 (he had been falsely charged with money-laundering by the ruling Nigerian junta), Fela reclaimed his band, enlarged it to 40 pieces, and jumped back into the musical fray. O.D.O.O. (Overtake Don Overtake Overtake) ♪♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1990, prod. Fela Anikulapo-Kuti, Sodi) shows a strengthening of his composing, arranging, and playing skills. There are only two tracks on the album, each hovering around the half-hour mark, and both contain fiery solos within the context of Fela's rhythm and polemic. Black Man's Cry ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1992, compilation prod. Fela Anikulapo-Kuti) is probably the best single-volume Fela sampler now available, binding together six of his most popular performances from the mid-to-late '70s. The version of "Black Man's Cry" comes from a 1975 recording that Kuti made with rock drummer Ginger Baker, while "Zombie," with its constantly moving rhythm accents, post-Masekela trumpet, and Maceo Parker–inspired sax playing, is a true Afro-Beat classic.

what to buy next: In the early days of Afro-Beat, drummer Tony Allen defined the jazz-oriented rhythm that would drive Fela's music. The songs on Open & Close ♪♪♪♪ (Stern's African Classics, 1971, prod. Fela Ransome Kuti) were breaking the five-minute barrier that many of Fela's pre-Africa 70 songs had hovered near, and Allen's flexible stick work and sophisticated cymbal splashing provided the constant push needed to enhance the leader's horn charts. "Gbagada Gbagada Gbogodo Gbogodo" gives ample evidence of Allen's importance to this edition of the band, while the title tune, purporting to provide instruction for a brand new dance, is one of the last apolitical works Fela recorded.

Fela Kuti

best of the rest:
Original Sufferhead ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1981)
Beasts of No Nation ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1989) Volumes 1 & 2 ♪♪♪♪♪ (M.I.L. Multimedia, 1996)

worth searching for: A biography of Fela written by Carlos Moore, Fela: This Bitch of a Life (Allison & Busby), maintains a similar contact with reality to that of Charles Mingus's autobiography, Beneath the Underdog. In other words, there are fantasy sequences woven through the text that may or may not illuminate episodes in the subject's life. Included are interviews with the musician and some of his many wives (who numbered 27 at that time).

influences:
⏮ Victor Olaiya, Guy Warren, Miles Davis, John Coltrane, Thad Jones, James Brown

⏭ Femi Kuti, Sonny Okosun

see also: Femi Anikulapo Kuti, Bill Laswell

Garaud MacTaggart

Femi Anikulapo Kuti

Afro-Beat

Born 1962, in Great Britain. Based in Nigeria.

Femi Kuti is one of Fela Kuti's numerous children from countless liaisons, but he is also the first (and so far only) one to score a recording contract. He was born in Great Britain but grew up in Nigeria. Femi (like his father, known to fans by his first name) quit school when he was 16 and joined Fela's band Egypt '80, in which he played alto saxophone. By the time the dissident Fela was imprisoned on spurious money-laundering charges in 1984, Femi was accomplished enough to lead the band in the interim. After his father's release in 1986, Femi formed his own group, the Positive Force. Show-biz legend holds that Femi got the chance to record when a team of Motown executives came to Lagos in hopes of negotiating a contract with the senior Kuti. Exasperated by a recalcitrant Fela, the record company folks went off to his club, the Shrine, where they caught Femi leading his own band in a torrid set. They ended up signing Femi and left town just before Fela changed his mind. Since that time, the young saxophonist has also led his band in a series of international tours that hit Africa, Europe, and North America.

worth searching for: Femi's one domestically available solo album, the eponymous Femi Kuti ♪♪♪½ (Tabu/Motown, 1995, prod. Andy Lyden, Femi Anikulapo Kuti), is currently out of print. The songs, arrangements, and performances owe an awful lot to his father but the production values are relatively lean and clear, something that could rarely be ascribed to the old man. Femi is a pretty interesting alto soloist, even considering his lineage, with a lighter tone but more technical chops than the better-known Kuti. "Survival" seems to be the most individual cut on the album. Even though the massed horns of the Positive Force are prominent à la Fela, the intro and "B" sections experiment with lighter textures than Fela probably would have attempted, including a jazzy Korg solo that sounds like a vibraphone. Drummer Jude Amarikowa, the other major player on the album, is a find. For completists there is also the various-artists collection Africa Fête 3 ♪♪♪ (Mango, 1995), which includes "No Place," a tune not found on Femi's full-length debut.

influences:
⏮ Fela Kuti

see also: Fela Kuti

Garaud MacTaggart

Leonard Kwan

Slack-key guitar

Born 1931, in Honolulu, HI, USA. Based in Hawaii, USA.

Along with Sonny Chillingworth and Gabby Pahinui, Leonard Kwan is widely considered to be one of history's three most influential artists in Hawaii's signature open-tuned slack-key guitar style. He began around age 10, and by the end of the 1940s was playing the Hawaiian style of ki ho'alu (or slack-key) on the mainland. A talented musician who could play a bit of piano, ukulele, bass, and saxophone as well as guitar, Kwan worked in dance and big bands as well as in Hawaiian combos with Chillingworth and others. He made his first single in 1957 and recorded occasionally for the next two decades, retiring temporarily from public life during the '80s. Shortly before his return to recording with George Winston's Dancing Cat label, Kwan was given the Bank of Hawaii Ki Ho'alu Award from the Hawaii Academy of Recording Arts, and named a Living Treasure of Honolulu.

what's available: Kwan hadn't recorded in 20 years when he made Ke'ala's Mele ♪♪♪♪ (Dancing Cat, 1995, prod. George Winston), but he obviously hadn't lost any of his touch. His goal was to document the music of his whole career, so the album contains many Kwan originals, including "Ki Ho'alu Chimes," a song from his first single. Recorded acoustic and solo (for the only time in Kwan's oeuvre), this album of instrumentals reveals a player with a confident style and a deep, resonant sound.

influences:
⏮ Sonny Chillingworth

⏭ Rev. Dennis Kamakahi, Ledward Kaapana, George Kuo

see also: Sonny Chillingworth, Gabby Pahinui

Brian Mansfield

Forward Kwenda

Traditional Shona mbira music

Born 1969, in Buhera, Zimbabwe. Based in Berkeley, CA, USA.

Kwenda was born in rural Zimbabwe, and began playing drums and gourd rattles at age 10. He picked up the mbira (thumb piano) at 14, and taught himself how to play by listening to music on the radio. He moved to Harare, the capital of Zimbabwe, in 1984, and soon formed his own group to play gigs and Shona (traditional Zimbabwean) ceremonies. In 1985, Kwenda began exploring new ways of playing and improvising that astounded the older, more traditional practitioners. In 1991 he met Erica Azim, an American who had traveled to Zimbabwe to study traditional Shona music. They began playing together and have since formed a strong musical partnership.

what's available: Kwenda's debut, Svikiro ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1997, prod. Erica Azim, Forward Kwenda), features meditative pieces from Shona tradition as well as his own compositions. Traditionally the music is used for healing, and for soothing the relationships between humans and nature. Shona music almost sounds baroque, with an endless series of evolving melodic and rhythmic improvisations that slowly lead listeners into a deeply spiritual space. Kwenda's soothing vocals add another serene element to the already dreamy ambiance.

influences:
⏮ Thomas Mapfumo, Ephat Mujuru

j. poet

La India

Salsa nueva

Born Linda Caballero, Bronx, NY, USA. Based in Manhattan, NY, USA.

As salsa new-jacks Marc Anthony, Ricky Martin, and DLG (Dark Latin Groove) pull the music into the light of the new millennium, it's hard to believe that, not even nine years ago, the youngbloods just didn't want to hear that "old-folks music." The script was flipped in 1992 the moment a Latin House diva named India hooked up with salsa piano genius Eddie Palmieri to record Llegó La India via Eddie Palmieri. A fervid collection of some of Palmieri's freshest arrangements and most exuberant playing in years, Llegó La India got its real rush from India's raw, aggressive soprano. At first the old-schoolers dissed her—she was too loud; trampled all over the groove—but their kids heard one of their own, heard their groove. They bought her records and packed her shows. Egged on by a backing band of young Latin all-stars (like Jimmy Bosch and Alfredo Valdes Jr.), India's lung power could overload the house PA one minute and spray soft wet soul kisses over the dance floor the next. Part Latina soul shake and part salsa caliente, India revealed herself to be the next incarnation of Celia Cruz and La Lupe. Thanks to remixes by her husband "Little" Louie Vega—and the old schoolers finally checking in—India became the first salsera since back in the day to gain commercial parity with the men, and 1994's near-platinum Dicen Que Soy made her a bona fide superstar. She faltered for a second with an ill-advised Tito Puente big-band swing album, but came back strong in 1997–98 with her tour de force vocal hit "Runaway" on the Nuyorican Soul compilation, once again making the future what it used to be.

what to buy: Years after it shook Latin music, Llegó La India via Eddie Palmieri ♪♪♪♪½ (Sony Discos, 1992, prod. Eddie Palmieri, "Little" Louie Vega) still feels wickedly brand new. Given a crash course in "old-folks music" by Palmieri and then thrown into the fire, India goes for the jugular on every song—fighting the rhythm ("Vivir sin Ti"), seducing the clave ("Soledad"), deep-housing a rumba ("Mi Primera Rumba"). It's the sound of youthful arrogance, innocence, and exuberance. It's the sound of the prodigal daughter, home at last.

what to buy next: Chock full of radio/club hits ("Nunca Voy a Olvidarte," "I Just Want to Hang around You," "Vivir Lo Nuestro," and the title track), Dicen Que Soy ♪♪♪♪♪ (Soho Latino, 1994, prod. Sergio George) was a stylistic quantum leap for India. Produced and arranged by the most influential names in salsa nueva (DLG, Anthony, Martin), Dicen Que Soy's hip-hop/R&B-ified salsa was tailor-made for India's vocal free-for-all-ing. This is the New Style.

the rest:

India Mega Mix ♪♪♪½ (RMM, 1996)

Sobre el Fuego ♪♪♪½ (RMM, 1997)

worth searching for: "Runaway" on the various-artists Nuyorican Soul (GRP/Blue Thumb, 1998) rejoins the La India saga in advanced progress.

influences:

⏮ Celia Cruz, La Lupe, Jocelyn Brown, Lisa Lisa

⏭ Brenda K. Starr, Marc Anthony

see also: Jimmy Bosch, Eddie Palmieri

Tom Terrell

zydeco

The essential core of any zydeco band is the combination of accordion and rubboard (a.k.a. washboard, or, locally, frattoir). The accordionist pumps out the melody and is typically the leader and singer. The rubboard acts as the foil, providing the steady scraping rhythm that also makes for zydeco's distinctive sound. During any night's performance, the band will "drop out," leaving just the accordion and rubboard to hold up the rhythm and keep the dancers moving—the true litmus test of all zydeco bands. The genre's lyrics are still often sung in the French of its home region, though more and more commonly in English as well. The repertoire consists of Creole tunes, waltzes, and two-steps shared with the neighboring Cajun canon; Louisiana R&B standards; "swamp pop" hits; blues; and whatever else can help a band win popularity on the dance floor. Zydeco, a music indeed for and about dancing, often sounds like it's coming more from the north end of the Caribbean than from the deep South of the United States. With flourishing national visibility, zydeco has become a source of pride in the Creole community, its unique contribution to the American musical landscape.

Jared Snyder

lá lugh

La India

Lá Lugh

Celtic

Formed 1991 in Dublin, Ireland. Based in Dublin, Ireland.

Gerry O'Connor, fiddle; Eithne Ní Uallacháin, voice, flute, whistle. (Both members are from Ireland.)

Historically, County Louth took its name from the pre-Christian god Lugh Lámfhada, or "Long-handed Lugh." Lugh was the grandson of Balor of the Evil Eye from Tory Island, Country Donegal, and father of Cúchulainn, the central figure in the great Ulster epic Táin Bó Cuailnge (The Cattle Raid of Cooley)—the setting for which was the Cooley Mountains of north County Louth, where Gerry O'Connor and Eithne Ní Uallacháin live. O'Connor was born in Dundalk, the principal town in County Louth, while Ní Uallacháin moved there as a child. Historically, most of the county was part of Old Ulster. North Louth and the adjacent parts of South Armagh and County Monaghan were Irish-speaking areas within living memory. Ní Uallacháin, whose first language is Irish, draws her singing from that tradition. O'Connor's people have been fiddle players for generations and he first made his mark as the fiddler in the group Skylark, which released two fine albums on the Claddagh label (and on Green Linnet and Shanachie in the States). He was also part of the band Kinvara. He was taught by his mother, Rose, and was fortunate to be in close contact with older players still alive during the 1960s, notably great Sligo fiddler John Joe Gardiner. Ní Uallacháin is an exceptional flute and whistle player but is perhaps best known for her outstanding voice, which London's Time Out magazine described as "clear and brittle as hand-blown crystal."

what to buy: Lá Lugh ♪♪♪♪ (Claddagh, 1991, prod. various) is a stunning debut album filled primarily with sparkling instrumentals, although Ní Uallacháin's singing stands out. "The Emigrant's Song" is the most beautiful and haunting, and is alone worth the price of the CD.

what to buy next: Brighid's Kiss ♪♪♪♪ (Claddagh, 1996, prod. Eithne Ní Uallacháin, Gerry O'Connor, Shaun Wallace) is dedicated to Brighid, whose name means "high or exalted one" and who was the most powerful female religious figure in Irish history. She was a triple goddess—a virgin mother, a lawmaker, a saint—and a folk image whose shadows still move over Ireland. On Brighid's Day, February 1, she is said to breathe life into the mouth of the dead winter. Lá Lugh celebrates this folk tale with another solid album of hot fiddle and flute instrumentals and songs. The only thing wrong with this one is that it doesn't have "The Emigrant's Song" on it!

the rest:
Senex Puer N/A (Sony, 1999)

worth searching for: Cosa Gan Bhróga ♪♪♪ (Gael-Linn, 1987) is the earliest recorded effort by the duo, who are joined by Belfast flute player Dessie Wilkinson, but it's long out of print and exceptionally hard to find.

influences:

⏮ Altan, Arcady

⏭ John Joe Gardiner, Kevin Burke

Neal Walters

La Mafia

Tejano

Formed 1980, in Houston, TX, USA. Disbanded December 1998.

Oscar De la Rosa, vocals; Leonard Gonzales, guitar; David de la Garza, keyboards; Tim Ruiz, bass; Michael Aguilar, drums; Mando Lichtenberger Jr., accordion, keyboards. (All members are from USA.)

Before Selena, most Americans had never heard of Tejano music—but before Selena there was La Mafia. Think of Tejano as a kind of Tex-Mex country music, folding in Mexican ranchera balladry and European polka styles, all electrified for the modern pop market's sonic tastes. Until La Mafia's breakout, Tejano was confined to the ethnic neighborhoods of Houston, San Antonio, and the Rio Grande River Valley, too country for the salsa markets of New York and Miami, too cowboy for California tastes, and too provincial for the Mexican and Latin American markets. But then La Mafia made it to the top of Tejano music—and for their next trick, did something no other U.S. band has done. La Mafia set out to conquer the huge Spanish-speaking audience outside the United States—which they did, with their sure-fire, roots-based, market-savvy pop. As a top Tejano band, La Mafia's albums sold 50,000 units; as an international pop band, the formula was good enough to boost that figure to two million units per title. At the top of their game in December 1998, the band suddenly announced they were breaking up to pursue solo projects. It's hard to imagine any of the current Tejano bands succeeding at such a level, but then nobody expected La Mafia could do it a decade ago.

what to buy: La Mafia's Estas Tocando Fuego ♪♪♪♪ (Sony, 1991, prod. Mando Lichtenberger Jr.) successfully combines Tejano tracks with cumbia dance music and pop ballads to reach a Spanish-speaking audience in Mexico and Central America. Purists in Texas gave the band heat for selling out. On the other hand, this was the album that demonstrated how to transcend Spanish musical ghettos.

what to buy next: Eufora ♪♪♪♪ (Sony, 1998, prod. Mando Lichtenberger Jr.) is full of power-pop tunes and lush bolero ballads, a state-of-the-art Pan-Spanish musical spectrum. Like it says, La Mafia: Hits de Coleccion ♪♪♪♪ (Sony, 1998, prod. Mando Lichtenberger Jr.) is a collection of the group's more recent hits, heavy on the pop side.

the rest:
1986 ♪♪♪½ (CBS International, 1986)
A Todo Color ♪♪♪½ (CBS International, 1986)
La Mafia Live ♪♪½ (CBS International, 1987)
Amame ♪♪♪ (CBS International, 1987)
Xplosiv ♪♪½ (CBS International, 1989)
Enter the Future ♪♪♪ (CBS International, 1990)
Con Tanto Amor ♪♪♪♪ (CBS International, 1990)
Ahora y Siempre ♪♪♪½ (Sony, 1992)
Vida ♪♪♪½ (Sony, 1994)
Exitos en Vivo ♪♪♪½ (Sony, 1995)
Un Million de Rosas ♪♪♪♪ (Sony, 1996)
En Tu Manos ♪♪♪♪ (Sony, 1997)

worth searching for: La Mafia's early material is not available on CD. However, EMI is reportedly planning to release some of the group's albums originally recorded for the Discos Cara label. In the meantime, search out the cassette-only Carino if you want to hear the group's R&B- and rock-influenced Tejano phase, or 15 Hits if you want to know how La Mafia first got to the top of the Tejano genre.

influences:
⏮ Rod Stewart, the Eagles, Freddy Fender

⏭ Los Palominos, La Differencia

see also: Selena

Aaron Howard

La Muscagña

Spanish folk

Formed 1986, in Castile, Spain. Based in Spain.

José Mari Clement, fiddle, Spanish bagpipes (1986–93); Rafa Martín, hurdy-gurdy (1986–93); Enrique Almendros, gaita charra y tamboril (three-holed flute and drum), Spanish bagpipes, percussion (1986–present); Carlos Beceiro, bass, cittern, guittara, hurdy-gurdy (1987–present); Jamie Muñoz, flutes, clarinet, accordion, percussion (1987–present); Luis Delgado, percussion, hammered dulcimer, oud, keyboards (1993–96). (All members are from Spain.)

Spanish folk music is far more diverse than many people might think. Images of quick-picked guitars, rolling castanets, and flamboyant, heel-stomping dances are not the only evidence of roots music in Spain. Looking beyond flamenco and its gypsy beginnings, past the Gaelic influences of the northern provinces, and away from the Arabic colors found in the southern region leaves one with the music of the Castillan heartland, the birthplace of the band La Muscagña. Enrique Almendros, Rafa Martín, and José Mari Clement were all interested in Castillan music, but they came to it by way of the Irish roots-music boom of the early '80s. Almendros (whose first instrument was the dulcimer) was turned on to Castillan tradition when he heard a radio broadcast of gaita charra y tamboril (three-holed flute and drum) that he thought was Irish pennywhistle and bodhrán. His liking for the latter led him to explore the music of the Spanish heartland once he realized that was what he was hearing. Martín and Clement had similar experiences, and eventually the three got together to play music influenced by Castillan traditions. Through field research—partially inspired by the example of folklorist Joaquin Diaz—and by working with indigenous musicians, the nascent band became well versed in traditional performance styles. In 1987 they added flautist Jamie Muñoz and bassist Carlos Beceiro and started working on their first album. That album, El Diablo Cojuelo, was released in 1988, but its dulcimer-and-flute-laden songs had more of a new age tincture than the rootsy, explosive style La Muscagña favored in concert. Still, they won the Spanish National Folk Award for Young Performers and forged on to a second release, El paso de la estantigua, which began to present a truer picture of their musical identity.

what's available: La Muscagña have released only two albums in the United States. Like the Chieftains, this band is essentially an instrumental ensemble with vocals usually provided by a variety of guest artists. Lubicán ♪♪♪♪ (Green Linnet, 1993), their third album overall and their first U.S. issue, was a wonderful introduction to the band that never took off saleswise. Even though the songs were meticulously researched, the boring taint of academia was well obscured by Beceiro's funkified bass lines and Almendros' spunky presence on the gaita charra y tamboril. Las Seis Tentaciones ♪♪♪½ (Green Linnet, 1995, prod. La Muscagña) is a solid effort made up of 13 dance tunes with nary a vocal to deflect attention from the band's wonderful musicianship, though it's not quite as exciting overall as Lubicán.

worth searching for: La Muscagña's finest album is not yet available as a U.S. release. Compiled from three days' worth of concerts in Madrid and Barakaldo, Spain, En Concierto ♪♪♪♪♪ (Resistencia, 1997, prod. Johnny Cunningham) features the basic trio of Almendros, Beceiro, and Muñoz plus former members Delgado and Martín, producer Cunningham on fiddle, and a small crowd of vocalists and other instrumentalists. The results are simply stunning.

influences:
⏮ The Chieftains, Joaquin Diaz, José Ramón Cid, Isidra Camacho, Ismael Álvarez

Candeal, Aljibe

see also: Johnny Cunningham

Garaud MacTaggart

La Sonora Dinamita

Cumbia

Formed 1960, in Colombia. Disbanded 1963. Re-formed 1975, in Colombia. Based in Colombia.

Julio Ernesto Estrada "Fruko" Rincon, bandleader; various additional performers.

Sonora Dinamita is one of the definitive Colombian cumbia groups. Its current version was created in 1975 by Julio Ernesto Estrada Rincon, a.k.a. "Fruko," musical director for the Discos Fuentes label. Fruko was asked by Discos Fuentes to resuscitate the group, which had run its course between 1960 and 1963 playing horn-heavy cumbias. With its moderate tempo and straightforward steps, cumbia—an African-rooted style from the Atlantic coast of Colombia—is the most popular dance throughout Central America and Mexico. For the Sonora Dinamita records Fruko uses mainly members of his own group Frukos y Sus Tesos—Colombia's most popular salsa band and the house band for Discos Fuentes. The dominant characteristics of this new, 10-piece incarnation are the trumpets and the high, girlish female vocal parts. The band has remained popular in Colombia's interior even though cumbia has clearly been challenged by the rural-styled vallenata as the most popular Colombian music. Perhaps this is due to the current Dinamita line-up's own rootsy approach.

worth searching for: If you live where you can buy Latin records you'll be able pick up some of Dinamita's classic albums; otherwise some easier-to-find various-artists anthologies will provide a good first taste of both the band and its genre. Cumbia, Cumbia: Cumbias de Oro de Colombia ♪♪♪♪♪ (World Circuit, 1989, prod. Nick Gold) is a superb compilation featuring a prime track by Sonora Dinaminta, "Se Me Perdio La Cadenita." This is one of the greatest dance compilations of all time, with excellent fidelity—and Cumbia, Cumbia, Vol. 2 ♪♪♪♪♪ (World Circuit, 1993, prod. Nick Gold) may be even better. Same great variety of tunes, same high-fidelity remixes of classic cumbias. This one features "Ritmo de Tambo" by the group.

influences:

Joe Arroyo, Carlos Vives

see also: La Sonora Meliyara

Jared Snyder

La Sonora Matancera

See: Celia Cruz

La Sonora Meliyara

Cumbia

Formed 1991, in Colombia.

La India Meliyara, lead vocals; Hugo Fernandez, trumpet; Nestor Agudelo, trombone; Ismael Gomez, trombone; Enrique Carrillo, keyboards; Hugo Molinares, guitars, keyboards; Rodrigo Morales, guitars; Neil Benitez, percussion; Rafel Benitez, percussion; Enrique Cuao, percussion; Alvaro "Macondo" Pava, backing vocals. (All members are from Colombia.)

Melinda Yara Yanguma, a.k.a. La India Meliyara because of her Native American features, has a booming voice full of spunk and fire. She has been singing since she was eight, at first with her father's trio doing traditional music—porro, paseo, vallenato, and cumbia—and later as the first woman singer with La Sonora Dinamita, the supergroup that has made the cumbia one of the best-known Latin rhythms. Meliyara left Dinamita in 1991 to form La Sonora Meliyara.

what's available: La India Meliyara ♪♪♪♪♪ (Riverboat, 1992, prod. Yemab) proves that with more exposure La India Meliyara would be known as one of world-music's top divas. Her larger-than-life voice is full of emotion—she can purr like a kitten and roar like a lioness—and her backing band cuts a deep, syncopated groove. Her lyrics tend to have a feminist slant and often poke fun at the macho posturing affected by most male artists.

influences:

Peregoyo y su Combo Vacuna, Los Corraleros de Majagual, La Sonora Dinamita

see also: La Sonora Dinamita

j. poet

Ladysmith Black Mambazo

Zulu a cappella

Formed 1965, in Ladysmith, South Africa. Based in South Africa.

Variable membership, including: Joseph Shabalala, lead vocals; Abedrigo Mazibuko; Albert Mazibuko; Geophrey Mdletshe; Russell Methembu; Jabulane Mwelase; Inos Phungula; Ben Shabalala; Headman Shabalala (died 1992); Jockey Shabalala. (All members are from South Africa.)

The a cappella tones of one alto, one tenor, and seven bass vocalists with lead singer Joseph Shabalala are set to well-choreographed dancing by Ladysmith Black Mambazo. Although the South Africa-based outfit attracted international attention when its was chosen to sing on Paul Simon's Grammy-winning album Graceland and on Simon's subsequent world tour, it was already South Africa's leading singing group, with more than 25 albums to its credit. As one of the group's producers puts it, Ladysmith's music is like "a mixture of Stephen Foster meeting doo-wop at the roots of Soweto."

The group's unique style of voice and dance was first conceived in a dream by Joseph Shabalala in 1964. A native of the poor South African village of Ladysmith, Shabalala had traveled to the city of Durban as a teenager to work six days a week in a factory. While there, he discovered iscathamiya, the traditional singing style of South Africa's miners. After joining a local singing group, the Blacks, Shabalala became one of South Africa's most promising performers. His dream coincided with his conversion to Christianity, which would be as persistent an influence on his music as its Zulu roots. Although Shabalala attempted to teach his style to the Blacks, his efforts proved futile. After the Blacks disbanded he assembled several of his brothers and cousins to form Ladysmith Black Mambazo (Zulu translation: "The Black Axe of Ladysmith"). After winning nearly every local singing competition and appearing on an influential South African radio show in 1970, the group signed its first recording contract in 1973. Ladysmith's debut, Amabutho, was Africa's first gold record with 25,000 copies sold—and many times that since. It was 10 years later that the group's first internationally distributed album, Induku Zethru, was released, soon after which its collaboration with Simon made it one of the success stories of the 1980s. The group's Simon-produced Shaka Zulu went on to win the Grammy for best traditional folk recording in 1987.

On the world stage, Ladysmith Black Mambazo provided a musical accompaniment to the changes in South Africa during the twilight of apartheid and the dawn of freedom. In 1993 the group appeared in Oslo, Norway, as outgoing South African President F. W. de Klerk and African National Congress leader Nelson Mandela received a joint Nobel Peace Prize. The following year Ladysmith performed at the inauguration of Mandela as South Africa's first black president. It gained its largest audience ever during the opening ceremonies of the Olympic Games in Atlanta in 1996. In addition to appearing on the perennial TV favorite Sesame Street, Ladysmith has performed in a romantic musical, Nomathema, written by Shabalala, director Eric Simonson, and U.S. playwright Ntozake Shange, and in a morality play, The Song of Jacob Zulu, as well as being featured on the soundtracks of such films as Moonwalker, A Dry White Season, and Coming to America, and singing on albums by such diverse artists as Stevie Wonder, the Wynans, and Dolly Parton. Ladysmith Black Mambazo continues to spread its inclusive musical message in as many ways as there are listeners to hear it.

what to buy: Classic Tracks ♪♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1992, prod. various) compiles 14 songs from Ladysmith's South Africa-released albums of the 1970s. Following the group's participation on Simon's Graceland album and world tour, it showed its new global audience it could stand on its own with Shaka Zulu ♪♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1987, prod. Paul Simon). A high-spirited recording, the album features several songs, including "Hello My Baby" and "How Long?" sung in English.

the rest:
Induku Kethu ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1983)
Ulwandle Oluncgwele ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1984)
Inala ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1985)
Journey of Dreams ♪♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1987)
Two Worlds One Heart ♪♪♪ (Warner Bros., 1988)
Umthombo Wamanzi ♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1988)
How the Leopard Got His Stripes ♪♪♪ (Windham Hill, 1989)
The Best of Ladysmith Black Mambazo ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1990)
Inkanyezi Nezazi ♪♪♪ (FLTRCD, 1991)
Liph' Iqiniso ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1992)
Gift of the Tortoise ♪♪♪ (Earthbeat!, 1994)
Star and the Wiseman ♪♪♪ (Flame Tree, 1994)
Thuthukani Ngoxolo (Let's Develop in Peace) ♪♪♪ (Shanachie, 1994) Heavenly ♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1996)

influences:
◀◀ Reuben Caluza's Double Quartet, Solomon Linda's Original Evening Birds
▶▶ Paul Simon, Mahotella Queens

see also: Black Umfulosi, Manu Dibango

Craig Harris

Mary Jane Lamond

Traditional and technofied Cape Breton Celtic

Born November 5, 1960, in Kingston, Ontario, Canada. Based in Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, Canada.

Nova Scotia's Mary Jane Lamond is one of the young artists turning traditional music on its head. On Suas e! her vocals are layered over rhythms and electric guitar samples, backing tracks and synth effects. None of these detract from the essential purity of her songs (all well-researched and rediscovered classics of Canadian Celtic folklore) or voice (she sings in a pretty historical style, albeit with a contemporary soulfulness and bite); it's the settings that are shaking traditionalists. Fellow northern renegade Ashley MacIsaac, who's dubbed Lamond "Cape Breton's disco diva," guests on both of her albums; Lamond returned the favor by providing vocals for "Sleepy Maggie" on MacIsaac's superhit Hi How Are You Today?

Lamond grew up in Quebec and Ontario but traveled often to Cape Breton to visit her grandparents. The teenage punk fan ultimately enrolled in the Celtic studies program at Saint Francis Xavier University in Antigonish, Nova Scotia. She sings exclusively in Gaelic these days and is one of a relative few who are keeping the language alive.

Joseph Shabalala (l) with Ladysmith Black Mambazo

what's available: From the Land of the Trees (Bho Thír Nan Craobh) ♪♪♪♪ (B&R, 1994, prod. Al Bennett) reveals a sweet-voiced young woman singing traditional Gaelic songs from Canada. The emphasis on rhythm in the milling songs might have prepared listeners for what was to follow, but her next album is still surprising. Suas e! ♪♪♪♪♪ (A&M, 1997/Wicklow, 1998, prod. Philip Strong, Laurel MacDonald) slips across centuries on fleet and graceful feet. One minute Lamond is singing against synthesizers; the next, she's duetting with the craggy voice of an elderly woman, Margaret Maclean. "Suas e!" roughly translates as "Go for it!"

worth searching for: On the Chieftains' who's-who showcase for Cape Breton musicians, Fire in the Kitchen ♪♪♪♪ (BMG Classics, 1998, prod. Paddy Moloney), Lamond brings over a cup of gasoline with a simmering "A Mháiri Bhóidheach" that bursts into a traditionally arranged "Dhòmhnall mac'ic lain" as scorching as Suas e! 's computerized version. And no folkloric futurist's collection is complete without Lamond's one-song Celt-funk coming-out party, "Sleepy Maggie," on Ashley MacIsaac's sensational Hi How Are You Today? ♪♪♪♪½ (A&M, 1995).

influences:

⏮ Ashley MacIsaac, Mouth Music, Sex Pistols

see also: Ashley MacIsaac

Pamela Murray Winters

Daniel Lanois

Art-rock/roots-rock hybrid

Born September 19, 1951, in Gaineau, Quebec, Canada. Based in Canada.

Daniel Lanois is an artist of exceptional ambition, musical vision, and lyrical depth. He also produced some of the most important albums of the 1980s and 1990s. While foremost a musician, he began his professional career as a producer/recording engineer at Grant Avenue Studio, which he owns with his brother. While there Lanois met ambient rock pioneer Brian Eno and the two struck up a long personal and working relationship. Eno brought Lanois to the attention of a number of prominent artists, most notably U2, who hired him to co-produce (with Eno) their landmark 1984 album The Unforgettable Fire. From there, Lanois collaborated with Peter Gabriel, the Neville Brothers, and Bob Dylan (including Dylan's critically acclaimed Oh Mercy and Grammy-winning Time out of Mind). During the late 1980s Lanois turned his attention to an artist of utmost importance: himself. Drawing on his French-Canadian ancestry and his love of blues and rock, he forged a unique sound that is the sum of his knowledge and a hallmark of his prodigious talents.

what's available: Lanois's second album, For the Beauty of Wynona ♪♪♪♪½ (Warner Bros., 1993, prod. Daniel Lanois), is a work of stunning majesty and emotional complexity. Drawing on elements as diverse as Cajun music, guitar-rock, blues, and traditional French-Canadian balladry, Lanois crafts a sound that is greater than the sum of its parts, a style that transcends musical alchemy in its seamless fusion. Lanois's debut, Acadie ♪♪♪♪ (Opal/Warner Bros., 1989, prod. Daniel Lanois), is a quiet work that showcases his dedication to his French-Canadian roots, with songs populated by characters who seem to have sprung directly from history.

influences:

⏮ Brian Eno, Nils Lofgren, Lindsey Buckingham, Clifton Chenier

⏭ U2, Don Was, Peter Gabriel, Morphine

see also: Michael Brook

David Galens

Bill Laswell /Material

Multi-genre fusion

Born February 12, 1955, in Salem, IL, USA. Based in West Orange, NJ, USA.

An incredibly prolific producer, bassist, composer, and multiple-label entrepreneur, Bill Laswell has made an astonishing career out of juggling roles, responsibilities, and musical genres. Although he remains almost invisible on the mainstream music radar, Laswell nonetheless seems capable of being everywhere at once, experimenting in jazz, funk, rock, hip-hop, noise, spoken-word, dub, ambient, drum 'n' bass, and a broad variety of world-music forms—sometimes all within the same album. He is perhaps best known as a producer, having worked with an intriguingly diverse variety of artists ranging from the Ramones, Mick Jagger, and White Zombie to Herbie Hancock, the Last Poets, and Yellowman. But he began his career as a formidable jazz/funk fusion bassist, co-founding the chameleon-like ensemble Material with drummer Fred Maher and keyboardist Michael Beinhorn in the late '70s. When a diverse cast of guest musicians was brought in for 1982's Memory Serves the group's future modus operandi was set, and with the exception of Laswell, the lineup has been in a state of constant evolution ever since. In the mid-'80s, Laswell was working with the creme de la creme of New York's avant garde jazz scene, producing and playing bass on Herbie Hancock's influential fusion album Future Shock and forming Last Exit with Sonny Sharrock, Peter Brötzmann, and Ronald Shannon Jackson. By the late '80s, Laswell had developed a fascination with a variety of world-music forms, and Material's groundbreaking 1989 album Seven Souls featured a number of influential artists who would go on to become regular collaborators, including L. Shankar, Sly Dunbar, Aiyb Dieng, Simon Shaheen, and Foday Musa Suso. In fact, this may be among Laswell's most admirable skills—the ability to find, nurture, and foster ongoing working relationships with some of the world's most remarkable musical talents. In 1990 Laswell formed the first of his many independent labels, Axiom Records, devoted to being "the ultimate vehicle and outlet for projects that consistently challenge beliefs in various networks and levels of the status quo." Although he would go on to form the Black Arc label for funk and rock projects, the Subharmonic/Submeta label for experimental electronic music, and the Meta label for spoken-word recordings, Axiom provides a home for Laswell's most personal explorations, including albums by world-music luminaries ranging from Shankar, Shaheen, and Talip Ozkan to the Master Musicians of Jajouka and Suso's Mandingo. Aside from Peter Gabriel, few people have done so much to expose the exceptional music of artists like these to Western audiences. The early and mid-'90s saw Laswell establishing himself as a trailblazing force in hip-hop, ambient music, and drum 'n' bass, with albums of varying quality featuring his name in one role or another seemingly released every other week. Eventually, however, a distinctive, genre-bending Bill Laswell "sound" began to emerge: as the late, great music critic Robert Palmer once wrote, "In contrast to the kind of reductionist thinking that separates music into discreet categories with their own record-store bins, Laswell hears the music whole, as a complex, dynamic system in which the components are distinct but always subtly related." As we move into the new millennium, Laswell—artistically rejuvenated thanks to Axiom's new distribution deal through Chris Blackwell's Palm Pictures label—remains light-years ahead, and with a broad variety of projects constantly being juggled in his capable hands, he shows no signs of slowing down to let the rest of the world catch up.

what to buy: For a glimpse of world-music fusion at its finest, it simply doesn't get any better than Nicky Skopelitis's Ekstasis ♪♪♪♪♪ (Axiom, 1993, prod. Bill Laswell, Nicky Skopelitis), an outstanding ensemble effort featuring the Meters' Ziggy Modeliste, Can's Jaki Liebezeit, Jah Wobble, Zakir Hussain, Bachir Attar, Simon Shaheen, and Foday Musa Suso, among others. It may be guitarist Skopelitis's name above the title, but this is truly a masterful group effort combining elements of jazz, rock, funk, dub, and ambient music with an emphasis on transcendent world-music textures. Don't think your mainstream-music-lovin' buddies can get down with world music's exotic sounds? Put on hypnotic tracks like "Heretic" and "One Eye Open" at your next party and count the conversions. Slightly more traditional in nature is the equally mesmerizing Nagual Site ♪♪♪♪½ (Wicklow, 1998, prod. Bill Laswell), one of the first releases from head Chieftan Paddy Moloney's new label. A breathtakingly original Indian/ambient fusion, this gorgeously textured album prominently features the stunning vocal talents of Gulam Mohamed Khan and Sussan Deyhim, as well as subtle contributions from frequent Laswell co-conspirators like Skopelitis, Wobble, Hussain, Badal Roy, and Bernie Worrell. Remarkably seamless and organic, this is one of Laswell's most heady stylistic brews.

what to buy next: One of Laswell's most interesting fusion experiments, Possession + African Dub's Off World One ♪♪♪♪ (Submeta, 1996, prod. Bill Laswell) is a deliciously hallucinogenic excursion into the outer limits of dub experimentation pairing Laswell's subterranean bass lines and hypnotic ambient textures with African sounds supplied by Gambia's Foday Musa Suso, Mali's Fousseny Kouyate, and Senegal's Aiyb Dieng. Even in the seemingly endless canon of dub reggae, there's nothing else that sounds quite like this. Although it's far less about world music than otherworld music, the two-CD set Axiom Ambient: Lost in the Translation ♪♪♪♪½ (Axiom, 1994, prod. Bill Laswell) is a must-have for anyone who appreciates the spirituality inherent in meditative forms. With input from all of the usual suspects, as well as contributions from ambient knob-twiddlers like the Orb, Terre Thaemlitz, and Tetsu Inoue, Laswell creates a contemplative epic blending a number of the label's finest compositions into a seamless flow that touches on funk, electronic, Indian, Moroccan, and Asian music, as well as jazz. Especially moving is the tender ballad "Peace," a loving tribute to Laswell's late friends Sonny Sharrock and Eddie Hazel, featuring saxophonist Pharoah Sanders. For an in-depth retrospective of Laswell's early career, check out Deconstruction: The Celluloid Recordings ♪♪♪♪ (Metronome/Restless, 1993, prod. Bill Laswell), another two-disc compilation featuring radically disparate tracks by Material, Massacre, Last Exit, Timezone, the Last Poets, Fab Five Freddy, Fela Kuti, Ginger Baker, and Touré Kunda, among others.

what to avoid: In any body of work as extensive as Laswell's there's bound to be a few stinkers, and this musical jack-of-all-trades has certainly had his fair share. Material's Live from Soundscape ♪ (DIW, 1991, prod. Verna Gillis) is rambling, free-form improvisation that offers little more than brief, sporadic moments of relatively soulless instrumental wizardry. And staying far, far away from the mindlessly repetitive, monolithically pounding noise of Chaos Face's Doom Ride ♪ (Subharmonic, 1994, prod. Bill Laswell) is strongly recommend.

the rest:

Baselines ♪♪♪ (Celluloid/Elektra Musician, 1983)
(With Peter Brötzmann) Lowlife ♪♪♪½ (Celluloid, 1987)
Hear No Evil ♪♪½ (Venture/Virgin, 1988)

420 bill laswell

(With Ryuichi Sakamoto and Yosuke Yamashita) Asian Games ♪♪♪½ (Verve, 1994)
(With Tetsu Inoue) Cymatic Scan ♪♪♪ (Subharmonic, 1994)
(With Pete Namlook) Psychonavigation ♪♪♪♪ (Subharmonic, 1994)
(With M.J. Harris) Somnific Flux ♪♪♪♪ (Subharmonic, 1995)
(With Terre Thaemlitz) Web ♪♪♪ (Subharmonic, 1995)
Axiom Funk: Funkronomicon ♪♪♪♪ (Axiom, 1995)
(With Nicholas James Bullen) Bass Terror ♪♪♪½ (Sub Rosa, 1995)
Silent Recoil: Dub System One ♪♪♪ (Low, 1996)
Oscillations ♪♪½ (Subharmonic, 1996)
(With Klaus Schulze and Pete Namlook) Dark Side of the Moog IV ♪♪♪♪ (Ger. Fax, 1996)
Sacred System Chapter One: Book of Entrance ♪♪♪½ (ROIR, 1996)
Dark Massive/Disengage: Ambient Compendium ♪♪♪ (M.I.L. Multimedia, 1996)
Altered Beats: Assassin Knowledges of the Remanipulated ♪♪♪♪ (Axiom, 1996)
(With Jonah Sharp) Visitation ♪♪♪♪ (Subharmonic, 1996)
(With Style Scott) Dub Meltdown ♪♪♪½ (WordSound, 1997)
Sacred System Chapter Two ♪♪♪♪ (ROIR, 1997)
City of Light ♪♪♪♪ (Sub Rosa, 1997)
Dreams of Freedom: Ambient Translations of Bob Marley in Dub ♪♪♪♪ (Axiom, 1997)
Panthalassa: The Music of Miles Davis ♪♪♪♪½ (Columbia, 1998)
Oscillations 2 ♪♪♪½ (Sub Rosa, 1998)
(With Sacred System) Imaginary Cuba: Deconstructing Havana N/A (Wicklow, 1999)

Material:
Temporary Music ♪♪♪ (Celluloid, 1981/Restless 1993)
Memory Serves ♪♪♪♪ (Celluloid/Elektra Musician, 1981/Restless, 1992)
One Down ♪♪♪½ (Celluloid/Elektra, 1982/Restless, 1992)
Red Tracks ♪♪♪ (Red, 1985)
Seven Souls ♪♪♪ (Virgin, 1989)
The Third Power ♪♪♪½ (Axiom, 1991)
Live in Japan ♪♪½ (Restless, 1993)
Hallucination Engine ♪♪♪♪ (Axiom, 1994)
Intonarumori ♪♪♪ (Axiom, 1999)

Massacre:
Killing Time ♪♪♪♪ (Celluloid, 1982)

Shango:
Shango Funk Theology ♪♪♪♪ (Celluloid, 1984)

Deadline:
Down by Law ♪♪♪ (Celluloid, 1985)

Last Exit:
Last Exit ♪♪ (Enemy, 1986)
The Noise of Trouble: Live in Tokyo ♪♪♪♪ (Enemy, 1987)
From the Board a.k.a Cassette Recordings '87 ♪♪♪ (Celluloid, 1988/Enemy, 1995)
Headfirst into Flames ♪♪♪½ (MuWorks, 1993)

SXL:
Live in Japan ♪♪♪ (CBS/Sony Japan, 1987)
Outlands ♪♪½ (Celluloid/Pipeline, 1988)

Painkiller:
The Guts of a Virgin ♪♪♪½ (Earache, 1991)
Buried Secrets ♪♪♪½ (Earache, 1993)
Execution Ground ♪♪♪♪ (Subharmonic, 1994)
Complete Studio Recordings ♪♪♪♪ (Tzadik, 1998)

Praxis:
Transmutation (Mutatis Mutandis) ♪♪♪♪ (Axiom, 1992)
Sacrifist ♪♪♪½ (Subharmonic, 1993)
Metatron ♪♪♪♪ (Subharmonic, 1994)

Divination:
Ambient Dub Vol. I ♪♪♪♪ (Subharmonic, 1993)
Ambient Dub Vol. II: Dead Slow ♪♪♪♪ (Subharmonic, 1994)
Akasha ♪♪♪½ (Subharmonic, 1995)
Distill ♪♪♪½ (Sub Meta, 1996)

Third Rail:
South Delta Space Age ♪♪♪½ (Verve/Antilles, 1995)

Arcana:
The Last Wave ♪♪♪♪ (DIW, 1996)
Arc of the Testimony ♪♪♪½ (Axiom, 1997)

Somma:
Hooked Light Rays ♪♪½ (Low, 1996)

Equations of Eternity:
Equations of Eternity ♪♪♪ (WordSound, 1996)
Vevé ♪♪♪½ (WordSound, 1998)

Ekstasis:
Wake Up and Dream ♪♪♪♪ (CyberOctave, 1998)

worth searching for: Because Laswell's extensive discography has him frequently recording for labels that seem to pop up out of nowhere and then vanish without a trace, a number of his albums are especially difficult to track down . . . some of them deservedly so. But well worth the effort are Automaton's Jihad and Dub Terror Exhaust, two intriguing dub experiments with Gabe Katz and Sly Dunbar, and Death Cube K's Dreamatorium, an outlandish guitar noise-fest pairing Laswell with enigmatic axe-grinder Buckethead; all three albums were on Laswell's now-defunct Strata label. Also worth a listen is Second Nature, a lushly layered ambient excursion with Tetsu Inoue and Atom Heart released on the defunct Submeta label.

influences:
⏮ John Coltrane, Jimi Hendrix, Can, Brian Eno, Miles Davis, Lee "Scratch" Perry, Parliament-Funkadelic
⏭ John Zorn, the Orb, Buckethead, DJ Spooky, Golden Palominos, Talvin Singh, Transglobal Underground

see also: Trilok Gurtu, Zakir Hussain, Kodo, Fela Kuti, Master Musicians of Jajouka, Talip Ozkan, Shabba Ranks, Badal Roy, Ryuichi Sakamoto, Simon Shaheen, L. Shankar, Sly & Robbie, Liu Sola, Foday Musa Suso, Touré Kunda, T.H. "Vikku" Vinayakram, Wu Man

Bret Love

Latin Playboys

Rock

Formed 1994, in Los Angeles, CA, USA. Based in USA.

David Hidalgo, guitar, vocals; Louie Perez, drums; Mitchell Froom, keyboards; Tchad Blake, bass. (All members are from the USA.)

An East L.A. group that combined vital bar-band rock with the traditional tunes of their Mexican American upbringing, Los Lobos took a sonic side trip with 1992's Kiko, an album of inspired experimentation that turned out to be their masterpiece. Rather than doom the band commercially, guitarist/vocalist/songwriter David Hidalgo and drummer/lyricist Louie Perez decided to reserve their more outré tendencies for a side project. As the Latin Playboys, the pair joined with Kiko's aural architects, producer/keyboardist Mitchell Froom and sound engineer/bassist Tchad Blake. The results have been spectacular, if sporadic—the debut album graced many critics' year-end Top 10 lists, but the follow-up was delayed by a Lobos/Playboys label switch. In the stolen moments between band projects and his own production work (Sheryl Crow, Richard Thompson, Suzanne Vega) Froom recorded a "solo" album, which provided avant-garde musical settings for guest performers—including usual suspects Hidalgo, Crow, and Vega—to write lyrics for and sing over.

what to buy: An album that exists in some netherworld where phantom movie music, Latin pop, soul, and avant-rock come together in secret and slip off into the night, Latin Playboys ♪♪♪♪½ (Slash/Warner Bros., 1994, prod. Latin Playboys) astonishes in a different way every time you hear it. The culture clash of so many different styles, found sounds, and collage techniques is transporting on tracks such as "Viva La Raza," "Lagoon," and "Manifold de Amour," while "Ten Believers" operates more or less like a conventional rock song (albeit a terrific one) and "Chinese Surprize" and "New Zandu" charge forward atop excoriatingly raw guitar riffs. Elsewhere, "Rudy's Party" sounds like an ancient field recording; "If," a menacing blues; and "Same Brown Earth," a honking R&B number from outer space. This is music from dreams, but ones that are half-remembered and unsettling.

what to buy next: Picking up where they'd left off five years before, Dose ♪♪♪♪ (Atlantic, 1999, prod. Latin Playboys) contains similarly brilliant inventions, though the element of surprise has worn off. The Playboys attempt to push their sonic experiments even further, making some of these pieces enticingly (or forbiddingly) raw, depending on your point of view. Still, tracks like "Fiesta Erotica" dazzle with Hidalgo's soaring guitar solos, and "Locoman" is deliciously disturbing.

worth searching for: If you're intrigued by the Playboys' unusual sound, you might as well check out the album that started the bandmembers down this twisted path. Los Lobos' Kiko (Slash/Warner Bros., 1992, prod. Mitchell Froom) was their break with the conventional post-Santana-ism they'd been cultivating for many years. But it was also their first brush with genius. Industrial rhythms, found sounds, and dreamy sonic landscapes take this album to a level that few bands ever achieve.

solo outings:

Mitchell Froom:

Dopamine ♪♪♪ (Atlantic, 1998)

influences:

◀◀ The Band, Jimi Hendrix, Ry Cooder, Tom Waits

see also: Los Lobos, Los Super Seven

Daniel Durchholz

Le Mystère des Voix Bulgares /Bulgarian State Radio and Television Female Vocal Choir /Bulgarian State Female Vocal Choir /Bulgarian State Vocal Choir /Ensemble Trakia /Ensemble Pirin

Modern Bulgarian folk music

Bulgarian State Radio and Television Female Vocal Choir formed 1952, in Sofia, Bulgaria. Based in Sofia, Bulgaria.

Various uncredited members; all from Bulgaria.

The saga of the Mystère des Voix Bulgares is partially a tale of record-company hype and partially an example of the unlikely triumph of traditional music. The original Bulgarian State Radio and Television Female Vocal Choir was created in 1952, following the lead of Philip Koutev, who founded the State Ensemble for Folk Music and Dance. At that time, many folk traditions were dying out and in response Koutev began collecting folk tunes and arranging them for female choirs by adding counterpoint, additional vocal lines, and shifts in tempo and timbre. Other composers followed suit, and many female choirs blossomed. Recordings of various choirs and trios made their way to the States as early as 1960, but the tidal wave began when the 4AD label picked up a recording of various folkloric groups under the title Le Mystère des Voix Bulgares for British distribution in 1987. Nonesuch grabbed the U.S. rights, and the album became a surprise best-seller, leading to Le Mystère des Voix Bulgares, Vol. 2 a year later. At least one of the groups touring under the name Le Mystère des Voix Bulgares has no connection at all to the Nonesuch album, which is itself a compilation of work by the original Bulgarian State Radio and Television Female Vocal Choir as well as Ensemble Trakia, Ensemble Pirin, and various soloists and quartets. The liner notes on all the albums are skimpy, with individual singers getting little if any credit.

Le Mystère des Voix Bulgares

what to buy: Le Mystère des Voix Bulgares ♫♫♫♫♫ (Nonesuch, 1987, prod. Marcel Cellier) is a classic recording that shows the incredible range of the unaccompanied human voice. The choir's trills, octave swoops, shouts, and soaring harmonies are completely captivating.

what to buy next: Le Mystère des Voix Bulgares, Vol. 2 ♫♫♫♫½ (Nonesuch, 1988, prod. Marcel Cellier) is another fine sampling of Bulgarian vocal music.

what to avoid: From Bulgaria with Love ♫♫ (Mesa, 1992) is credited to "Le Mystère des Voix Bulgares," although the small print says it's the Bulgarian State Vocal Choir. The singing is first rate, but TranceFormation, Steve the B., and other dance-crazy producers are along for the ride to add assorted beats to the recordings. Some of the experiments work better than others, but if you really want ethno/techno trash, you're better off plunking down your money for Deep Forest or Tulku, who don't make any pretense about being "authentic."

influences:
Bisserov Sisters

see also: Bŭlgari, Huun-Huur-Tu

j. poet

Leahy

Celtic folk-rock

Formed 1997, in Lakefield, Ontario, Canada. Based in Lakefield, Ontario, Canada.

Donnell Leahy, fiddle; Erin Leahy, piano, keyboards; Siobheann Leahy, bass; Maria Leahy, acoustic guitar, mandolin; Frank Leahy, drums; Agnes Leahy, stepdancing; Doug Leahy, fiddle; Angus Leahy, fiddle. (All members are from Canada.)

The story of Leahy is definitely a family affair. Frank and Julie Leahy, the clan's Ontario- and Cape Breton-born father and mother, taught their children fiddle music and step-dancing, respectively. The lessons took root in this talented bunch, who went on to perform part-time as the Leahy Family and, even at this early stage, saw a film documentary about them, titled The Leahys: Music Most of All, win a 1985 Oscar for Best Foreign Student Film. After some of the siblings dropped out, the remaining brothers and sisters revamped the act as Leahy. Their eponymous debut CD was released in the States in 1998; they appeared in the half-hour PBS special Leahy in Concert; and, in the most decisive case of their rising star being hitched to an even bigger one, country-pop phenom Shania Twain invited them to be the opening act on her first U.S tour. And whenever a wider audience gets a look at them, the band's in-concert magic does the rest; the exuberant stepdancing and infectious fiddle tunes make a fantastic combination that resembles a scaled-down yet equally effective version of the Riverdance spectacular.

what's available: Leahy ♪♪♪♪½ (Narada, 1998, prod. Lance Anderson), the band's auspicious debut, is entirely instrumental, and focuses mostly on their original arrangements of traditional dance tunes from Ireland, Cape Breton, Scotland, and French Canada. Donnell's fiddle takes the leads on most selections and he's definitely a dynamic player. Piano adds some funky counterpoints on a few others, and the rhythm section gives everything an energetic, syncopated swing—on several cuts augmented by the sounds of stepdancing for an added "kick." Leahy's stompin' Celtic grooves will get even the most hardened "I can't dance" types out of their chairs, guaranteed.

influences:

- Frank Leahy, Julie Leahy, Moving Hearts, Jean Carignan, Denis Lanctot
- Shooglenifty, Riverdance, Natalie MacMaster, La Bottine Souriante

Ken Roseman

Eddie LeJeune

Cajun

Born August 20, 1951, in Lacassine, LA, USA. Based in Louisiana, USA.

Although Iry LeJeune died too young to have much direct influence on his son, the music of Eddie LeJeune deeply echoes that of his father. The younger LeJeune has the same virtuoso quality about his accordion playing and the high-lonesome LeJeune tinge in his singing. You can hear it most when he launches into tunes associated with his father, like "Lacassine Special." The accordion runs spill over the bar lines, almost capsizing the band, and the vocals make you imagine the singer with tears streaming down his face. LeJeune is an ardent traditionalist and records with all acoustic instruments and no drums. Not that the loss of a drum matters much; there is plenty of rhythm in his singing and playing.

what to buy: It's in the Blood ♪♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1991, prod. Ken Irwin) may be the most traditional Cajun album recorded in the last 20 years. LeJeune's deeply rootsy singing and playing is accompanied by late great Cajun fiddler Lionel Leleux, who started playing with Nathan Abshire in the early 1930s. LeJeune and Leleux are in turn accompanied by the "freight train" guitar playing of Hubert Maitre and the steady triangle of Eddie LeJeune Jr. The whole album is beautifully recorded and beautifully played.

what to buy next: Cajun Soul ♪♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1988, prod. Ken Irwin) is LeJeune in the stellar company of D.L. Menard on guitar and the great Ken Smith on fiddle. This was Eddie's first recording, and he squeezes every ounce of soul from his old accordions that he can get. As beautiful and sincere an acoustic-music experience as you'll find anywhere.

the rest:

Cajun Spirit ♪♪♪♪ (Rounder, 1998)

worth searching for: Le Trio Cadien ♪♪♪♪½ (Rounder, 1992, prod. Ken Irwin) finds the same three musicians who played on Cajun Soul brought together as equals. With the vocals split between D.L. and Eddie, the result is two great Cajun singers and instrumentalists accompanied by the most tasteful Cajun fiddler around.

influences:

- Nathan Abshire, Amédée Ardoin, Iry LeJeune
- Steve Riley, Tasso, Balfa Toujours, Horace Trahan

see also: Nathan Abshire, Iry LeJeune, D.L. Menard

Jared Snyder

Iry LeJeune

Cajun

Born October 28, 1928, in Church Point, LA, USA. Died October 8, 1955, near Eunice, LA, USA.

Young Cajuns had pretty much lost interest in the old-fashioned, accordion-based music by the time World War II rolled around. The airwaves were dominated by the western swing–influenced sounds of Harry Choates and Leo Soileau. But when the G.I.s returned after the war they wanted the comfort of those good old-time tunes, and they found it in a nearly blind farm boy who sang his heart out. Iry LeJeune was too sight-impaired to work, and spent much of his youth hanging out at his uncle Angelas's home. The older LeJeune was a superb accordionist who let his nephew listen and learn from his recordings of the great Amédée Ardoin. Iry was mightily influenced by Ardoin's virtuoso accordion and high, passionate singing. He eventually recorded his interpretations of many of Ardoin's songs, as well as those of his uncle. He in turn had enormous influence on a whole generation of Cajun musicians who learned Ardoin's songs from LeJeune's recordings.

ray lema

what to buy: Cajun's Greatest: The Definitive Collection ♪♪♪♪♪ (Ace, 1994, prod. Eddie Shuler, John Broven) is the one and only record to get. The people at Ace have tried valiantly to clean up the sound as much as possible; LeJeune was often taped at home on a primitive portable recorder, and the studio mixing techniques of the originals did little to enhance these documents and much to muddle them. But it is all here: the heartbreaking vocals, the breathtaking fast accordion runs overwhelming the music. If they listen to Cajun music in heaven, this is it.

what to avoid: The Legendary Iry LeJeune ♪♪ (Goldband, 1991, prod. Eddie Shuler) has much of the same music as the Ace CD, except that there's an electric bass dubbed onto the original recordings, mixed to sound as if the bassist is accompanying a record player in the studio. Stick with the warts-and-all version; it actually has less warts than this.

influences:

⏮ Nathan Abshire, Amédée Ardoin

⏭ Steve Riley, Marc & Ann Savoy

see also: Amédée Ardoin, Harry Choates, Eddie LeJeune, Leo Soileau

Jared Snyder

Ray Lema

Afropop, worldbeat

Born in 1946, in Kinshasa, Congo. Based in Paris, France.

Rebels are a dime a dozen in the rock world, even if the appellation is usually self-applied and extremely self-aggrandizing. Not so with Ray Lema, who has been one of Africa's most innovative and controversial musicians since he broke on the international scene in the late '70s with his band Ya Tupas, a jazz/rock/soukous fusion project that garnered equal proportions of praise and hate mail.

Lema was born in Kinshasa in 1946 and began a classical music education in a Catholic seminary, where he seriously considered studying for the priesthood. His first public appearance took place in church, where he played Beethoven's "Moonlight Sonata" on the organ. Music called ever more insistently, and he quit the seminary and began playing soukous (the popular Congolese adaptation of rumba) in the bands of legends like Tabu Ley, Abeti, and Papa Wemba. But Lema also loved rock 'n' roll, and eventually surprised everyone—and infuriated some—by forming a band that combined it with Congolese music. In 1974 the government asked Lema to organize a national ballet company. For the next few years he traveled throughout Congo collecting folk music and dance styles from the country's 250 ethnic groups. He chose Congo's best singers and dancers to form the National Ballet of Zaire (as the country was then called), and in the process became an expert on Zairian music. Lema's next project was Ya Tupas, and while touring to support their debut album, Lema decided to settle in Washington, D.C., to explore the R&B, jazz, funk, and soul music he'd always loved. In 1982 he dropped the band and recorded his first solo album, Koteja, released on the Paris-based Celluloid label. This was followed by Kinshasa—Washington, D.C.—Paris and another move, this time to the last-named city. Lema continued to explore his cross-cultural vision in the '80s with a series of albums for Celluloid, and later for Island's world-music imprint Mango. He also lent his considerable chops and musical expertise to projects by Manu Dibango, the Mahotella Queens, and Stewart Copeland, former drummer of the Police. During the '90s Lema put his stamp on what could be called concept albums—the most notable being his work with Congolese pygmy music on Un Touarag S'est Marié avec une Pygmée and with members of a Bulgarian women's choir on Ray Lema & Professor Stefanov.

what to buy: When Ray Lema & Professor Stefanov ♪♪♪♪½ (Buda, 1992/Tinder Gold, 1997, prod. Ray Lema, Philippe Jupin) was released in France in 1992 it became an instant classic. Lema and Stefanov, the leader and composer for a woman's vocal troupe called L'Ensemble Pirin, collaborate on tunes that feature the choir's soaring harmonies backed by Lema's deeply funky music, a mixture of African, Jamaican, and North American rhythms.

what to buy next: If you're expecting the usual Afropop product, Gaia ♪♪♪½ (Mango, 1990, prod. Ray Lema, Paul "Groucho" Smykle) isn't the place to start. Lema's idiosyncratic work sounds unlike anything else you've ever heard. There's pop, rock, African and American folk, techno, zouk, reggae, and more, all held together by Lema's broad musical vision and some of the most inventive rhythm tracks in his field.

best of the rest:

Kinshasa—Washington, D.C.—Paris ♪♪♪ (Celluloid, 1983)
Medecine ♪♪♪ (Celluloid, 1985)
Nangadeef ♪♪♪ (Mango, 1989)

Euro-African Styles ♪♪♪½ (Buda, 1992)
Un Touarag S'eet Marié avec une Pygmée ♪♪♪♪ (Celluloid, 1993)

influences:

⏮ Franco, Tabu Ley Rochereau, Dr. Nico

⏭ Kotoja, Henri Dikonque, Zap Mama

see also: Le Mystère des Voix Bulgares

j. poet

Ricardo Lemvo & Makina Loca

African rumba

Formed 1990, in Los Angeles, CA, USA. Based in Los Angeles, CA, USA.

Ricardo Lemvo (Congo), vocals, leader; Niño Jésus Alejandro Pérez (Cuba), tres, flute, maracas, vocals; Louis Wasson (USA), guitar; Charlie Biggs (USA), trumpet; Nengue Hernández (USA), percussion.

Ricardo Lemvo was born and raised in Kinshasa, the capital city of Zaire (now Congo) and the hotbed of soukous, a Zairian-style rumba that swept Africa in the '60s to become a mainstay of Africa's musical vocabulary from Kenya to Capetown. As John Storm Roberts explains in his book Black Music in Two Worlds, the rhythms African slaves brought with them to Cuba mixed with Spanish and indigenous music to create the rumba, one of the most influential rhythms ever created. Cuban records—mostly 78 rpm discs carried back to the Motherland by sailors and traders—caused a sensation in Africa in the late '50s and heavily influenced the popular music of Mali, Senegal, and what was then also called the Congo. Africans may have heard the echoes of their own music in those Cuban records, and created soukous to reply to this strangely familiar message from their cousins in the New World. But as Lemvo pointed out in a recent interview, "Zairian rumba is not Cuban rumba. In Cuba, rumba is the drum; in Zaire there is an almost waltz-like feeling. And there were no horns in Africa, so the horn lines got translated into electric guitar lines."

In Kinshasa, Lemvo got his musical start in an R&B cover band, singing in phonetic English, but Cuban music was always in the back of his mind. He had a cousin with an extensive collection of Cuban records, and he soaked up the Cuban sounds blasting out of the local radio stations, along with those of soukous giants like Grand Kalle, who incorporated the pure rumba. Lemvo moved with his father to Los Angeles when he was 12, and by the time he was 22 he had met keyboardist/vocalist/arranger Niño Jésus Pérez and was singing in Cuban bands. (He taught himself Spanish, and also speaks English, French, and Lingala.) With Jésus and Cameroonian guitarist Louis Wasson, Lemvo finally began working on his long-time dream, a fusion of soukous and Cuban music. Makina Loca, a conscious misspelling of the Cuban words "maquina loco"—crazy machine—got going

the kora and west african griot

A hybrid type of instrument sometimes called a "harp-lute"—because it combines the neck and body of a lute with the playing technique of a harp—the kora is made by stretching animal skin across a large calabash gourd resonator, with 21 to 23 nylon strings divided into two parallel rows and attached at varying lengths to a long, round neck mounted perpendicular to the sound table. The main instrument of the griot tradition of West Africa (known in some ethnicities as jali culture; griotte or jalimuso in the feminine), the kora is said to date back to the 13th century, but it came into its own internationally in the 20th century. Griots are artisans responsible for keeping the time-honored traditions of the past alive through music and storytelling, creating narratives that may be passed down orally to future generations. Accompanying themselves on the kora (or the less-popular balafon xylophone or koni 4- or 5-stringed lute), the griots spin songs praising friends, recalling epic battles, or relating important historical moments. In many ways, the griot tradition can be seen as the most ancient roots of rap: while the beautiful, harp-like sounds of the kora and the buoyant vocal melodies of the griots may seem to have little in common with the rhythm-heavy beats of modern hip-hop on the surface, the lyrical lineage connecting the two is undeniable. Thanks to modern adaptations like tuning pegs and contact pick-ups for electric amplification, artists like Toumani Diabaté, Amadu Bansang Jobarteh, and Foday Musa Suso have successfully introduced the kora to Western audiences (Suso, in particular, has collaborated with a variety of artists ranging from fusionists Bill Laswell and Don Cherry to avant-classicists the Kronos Quartet), ensuring that the griot legacy will continue to evolve and thrive for centuries to come.

see also: The Talking Drum (sidebar), West African Drumming and the Soul of Rock 'n' Roll (sidebar) about seven years ago, and includes L.A. players with Cuban, African, and Chicano backgrounds. Their monthly Luna Park gigs have created quite a buzz, and their first album, Tata Masambo, with prestigious guests like Sam Mangwana and Bopol Mansiamina, catapulted them into the international spotlight.

Bret Love

what's available: Lemvo's desire to fuse the rumba of Cuba and Congo comes one step closer to fruition on his second album, Mambo Yoyo ♪♪♪♪ (Putumayo, 1998, prod. Niño Jésus Pérez). The styles flow freely, with the aggressive Cuban edge a perfect foil for the mellow Congolese-style singing and guitar playing. The music kicks and Lemvo is an impressive singer, but the tunes on Tata Masamba ♪♪♪½ (Mopiato, 1996, prod. Niño Jésus Alejandro Pérez) sound Cuban or Congolese, not Cuban and Congolese as they do on the second album. The record can be ordered from the Mopiato label through P.O. Box 3503, South Pasadena, California 91031.

influences:

◀◀ Franco, Pepe Kalle, Tabu Ley Rochereau, Africando

j. poet

Les Go de Koteba

Mandingo and Pan-African pop, worldbeat

Formed 1991, in Abidjan, Côte d'Ivoire. Based in Abidjan, Côte d'Ivoire.

Maate Keita (Guinea), vocals; Awa Sango (Mali), vocals; Naima Kante (Guinea), vocals.

Les Go de Koteba are marketed as an African Spice Girls, which just gives Ginger, Posh, Blitzen, and Dopey one more band to suffer in comparison to, 'cuz this spice is no flavor of the month. In a way, it's the flavor of at least 25 years, which is how long L'Ensemble Koteba d'Abidjan, the internationally revered performance troupe of which Les Go is a branch, has been receiving acclaim. The Ensemble was formed by Souleymane Koly in 1974 with the aim of preserving the culture of the Mandingo ethnic group among immigrants from Mali, Guinea, and Burkina Faso in the major metropolis of Abidjan in Côte d'Ivoire. Since then it's become a world-respected institution by carrying forth tradition and forging bold cultural syntheses in music, dance, and theater. In 1991 three talented young women who had been with the troupe since childhood, learning not only performance skills but also reading, writing, and their own proud history, branched off as a unique ambassadorial cell of Koteba, gaining converts through the international language of irresistible pop. "Koteba" translates roughly as "knowledge" (with a connotation of ongoing heritage and future legacy); "Go" is Côte d'Ivoire slang for "girl" (with a connotation of hip trendiness). And on their debut disc these "girls" show they know a lot, with a savvy sound sturdily rooted in African tradition but open and attentive to what clicks around the world. It's a delicate but taut style spun from the crystalline notes of the kora (African harp-lute), the driving djembe drum, hard-pop guitar and keyboards, and the super sax of Cameroonian jazz giant Manu Dibango. Their high-energy shows were already the stuff of budding legend when their first disc was cut, and after, they became increasingly in demand as on-stage guests of roots-music powerhouses like Sweet Honey in the Rock, and as collaborators with buzz-binned choreographers like Ron Brown. It can't be long 'til they make it to your local record store and concert hall—and by then they won't have to tell you what you really, really, really want.

what's available: Les Go's first album, alternately known as Les Go de Koteba and simply Les Go ♪♪♪♪½ (Juna/Stern's, 1997), is a blast of fresh air from world-music's next superstars. Dip in anywhere and be delighted, from "Wari"'s Latin tinge, to "Kalabante"'s striking Islamic melisma, to "ABCD"'s intriguing meld of Salif Keita's driving sound with that of relaxed jazz fusion, to the sultry sax-pop and marvelously moody, Baaba Maal-esque vocal of "Nanibali." The girls' voices are assured and versatile and rivet the attention throughout, with the multi-textured "Bara" giving a particularly good showcase for their unique yet compatible solo stylings.

influences:

◀◀ Mahotella Queens, Zap Mama, Souleymane Koly

Adam McGovern

Les Têtes Brulées

Bikutsi rock

Formed 1986, in Yaoundé, Cameroon. Based in Yaoundé, Cameroon.

Jean-Marie Ahanda, vocals; Theodore Epeme (died 1988), lead guitar, vocals; André Afata, drums, vocals; Martin Maah, bass; Roger Bekongo, rhythm guitar; Georges Essono, keyboards. (All members are from Cameroon.)

Because of their rock 'n' roll energy, body paint, shaved heads, and wild on-stage costumes, critics dubbed Cameroon's Les Têtes Brulées ("Hot Heads") the first African punk band. According to the band's founder, Jean-Marie Ahanda, that judgment isn't far from the mark. "The cultural establishment in Cameroon is very conservative," he says. "When we appeared on TV in 1987 kids went out and shaved their heads, which hardly pleased their parents and the authorities. There was a reaction against us that was very violent." Ahanda and Les Têtes play in a highly complex, multi-rhythmic, aggressive guitar-band style that's based on bikutsi, the traditional music of the Beti tribe from Cameroon's western rainforests. "Bikutsi is roots music—ignored in Cameroon for being peasant music. It's not chic, so it was the perfect style to use against the overly slick makossa [Cameroon's main pop form] musicians.

Les Têtes Brulées

4/2/8 dan levenson & kim murley

Cameroon doesn't have a strong musical tradition like Mali or Senegal. Rock, salsa, and pop have been part of makossa for 20 years. The problem is not one of the past, it's in the present; the same artists keep making the same records over and over again. That's what we were rebelling against."

Their new approach made Les Têtes a sensation. A few days after their first, electrifying TV appearance, Laurent Viguíe, Salif Keita's manager, sent Ahanda a ticket to Paris in preparation for a European tour and an album. On the first date of their European tour, Les Têtes met film director Claire Denis, who decided to take a crew along and document the Têtes tour. "We got some idea of what was in store when she asked us to get back on a plane and get off again, because she hadn't got the shot of us coming down right." By late '88, Les Têtes had a feature film, Man No Run, and an LP in the can, but then disaster struck. Théodore "Zanzibar" Epeme, the band's amazing lead guitarist, committed suicide. "Zanzibar was very ill when we were recording. He had many complex personal problems, and he had to have injections every day," Ahanda says. "He was very depressed when he came home, and his death hit us all very hard. Luckily, the record company was understanding and held back the release of the record so it wouldn't seem like we were cashing in on his death, which was headline news all over France." After a year of soul searching, Les Têtes decided to go on. The record Hot Heads was released to unanimous raves, and auditions began for a new guitarist. "We couldn't replace Zanzibar, so we chose Georges Essono [a well-known local bandleader and master keyboard player]. He was not our first choice, but we tried out several guitarists and none of them worked out. Bringing in keyboards was a risk, but he brought new color and melody into the band." On the Hot Heads disc, Epeme's guitar crackles like lightening, and the rolling thunder of the bass and drums have a definite rock 'n' roll edge. While Ahanda expected his music to go over well among non-Africans, the thumbs-up he received from his fellow Africans came as a surprise. Unhappily, as good as Essono was on keyboards, he couldn't match the manic creative energy of Epeme's guitar, and the group never lived up to its potential. They still tour, but the torch has been passed to younger, hungrier bikutsi groups.

what's available: Hot Heads ♫♫♫♫♫ (Shanachie, 1990, prod. Andy Lyden, Jean-Marie Ahanda) is perhaps the greatest African rock 'n' roll album ever made, crammed with fierce guitar playing and a relentless rhythmic drive. There are still moments of inspiration on Bikutsi Rock ♫♫ (Shanachie, 1991), but without Epeme's guitar it comes off sounding rather generic.

influences:

⏮ Anne-Marie Nzie, Los Camaroes

⏭ Mbarga Soukous, Jimmy Mvondo Mvelé

j. poet

Dan Levenson & Kim Murley /Blue Rose

Old-time string-band/bluegrass/Chinese fusion

Formed 1995, in Evart, MI, USA. Disbanded 1997.

Dan Levenson, banjo; Kim Murley, yang qin. (Both members are from USA.)

The son of an old-time square-dance caller from the Midwest, Dan Levenson heard U.S. folk music from an early age. He went on to learn guitar, banjo, and fiddle, as well as becoming a dancer with a clogging group, and a national magazine poll voted him one of the country's best banjo players in the traditional "clawhammer" style. Meanwhile, Kim Murley had taken up hammered dulcimer at the age of 13, and after graduating from college in Colorado moved to Taiwan and later Shanghai, where she spent several years studying Chinese versions of the instrument. Levenson and Murley met at a folk festival in the Midwest and later teamed up after Murley challenged Levenson to play one of her Chinese compositions. They liked the result, and banded together for about a year of touring and presenting workshops.

what's available: During their year together Levenson and Murley made one recording, New Frontier ♫♫♫♫ (Blue Rose, 1996, prod. Dan Levenson, Kim Murley), which may be the only yang qin (Chinese dulcimer) and clawhammer banjo album to date. The unlikely combination of influences and instruments almost demands a fresh approach to the tunes they cover, and the original music is strong as well. Like Navajo flutist R. Carlos Nakai's project with a Japanese string ensemble, Island of Bows, Levenson and Murley's collaboration shows that unexpected meetings of traditions can produce more than the sum of their parts. (Help in locating this self-released album may be found at Levenson's website, http://www.folknet.org/dan.)

influences:

⏮ Wade Ward, Tommy Jarrell, the Chicken Chokers, Kevin Enoch, Richie Sterns, the Silk and Bamboo Players of Shanghai

Kerry Dexter

Barrington Levy

Dancehall reggae, ragga

Born in 1964, in Kingston, Jamaica. Based in Clarendon, Jamaica.

In the early '80s, as the dancehall music craze swept Jamaica, deejays exceeded singers in popularity for the first time. Live performance over rhythm-track acetates or "dub plates," as amplified through powerful sound systems, became the preference of the "massive"—the downtown, working-class crowds that packed the venues ("dancehalls") that showcased the new sound. One of the few exceptions to the preeminence of the deejay was Barrington Levy, a gripping, edgy-voiced singer who began his career with a few forgettable singles as a member of the Mighty Multitudes. However, like the Mighty Diamonds' "rockers" sound debut with the Revolutionaries five years earlier, Levy's 1979 debut LP Bounty Hunter was the first shot in a genre coup d'etat. Providing the template for the coming dancehall era in Jamaica, the record introduced the world to the tenacious Levy and the phenomenally heavy Roots Radics band. The 15-year-old Levy scored big with "Shaolin Temple," "Shine Eye Gal," and "Looking My Love" (a.k.a. "It's Not Easy"), and quickly became the favorite of Jamaican youth.

After a few rushed, substandard records created only to cash in on Levy's popularity, he came back in 1985 with the rootsy "Prison Oval Rock" (driven by the Wailing Souls' "Firehouse Rock" rhythm) and "Hammer," a cut that smartly played off of Johnny Osbourne's "Lend Me the 16." Bolstered by the killer rhythm section of Sly Dunbar and Robbie Shakespeare, singles like "Suffer the Little Children" (a.k.a. "Praise His Name") and "Money Move" (over the international-hit "One Step Beyond" riddim) further established Levy's name. With the help of producer Jah Screw, Levy reached a global audience when Here I Come was licensed by London Records and both the title cut and the ganja-praising chant "Under Mi Sensi" blew up charts around the world. In the early '90s Levy revisited the songcraft of one of his strongest influences, the great Bob Andy. Exhilarating covers of Andy's Studio One hits "Too Experienced" and "My Time" reignited interest in Levy. But he really revived his career a few years later by recutting some of his biggest hits in "combo" style with the premier ragga (digital) deejays. These collaborations were collected on Duets along with a new song, the huge hit "Living Dangerously" with Bounty Hunter. A wild British remix of Levy's version of "Under Mi Sensi" with Beenie Man—"Under Mi Sensi X Project Jungle Spliff"—savaged the U.K. charts and was one of the first songs to ignite the post-techno jungle craze in London. Levy then released the unique and funky single "Work" with Jigsy King, which became a celebratory anthem for the East Indian population and an instant floor-filler at bhangra (Indian-folk-based electronic pop) dances. Levy continues to write and record in Jamaica and seems destined to "mash down" the dancehall for years to come.

what to buy: RAS Portraits ♪♪♪♪ (RAS, 1997, prod. various) provides an excellent overview of Levy's sterling career and includes the wicked and wild "Living Dangerously," the rare, early dancehall classic "Robber Man," and the spliff-launching anthem "Under Mi Sensi." Bounty Hunter Wanted ♪♪♪♪ (Jah Life, 1983, prod. Myron "Jah Life" Wright) compiles many of the finest singles from Levy's powerhouse debut Bounty Hunter along with some riveting lesser-known material from the same era. Englishman/Robin Hood ♪♪♪½ (Greensleeves, 1980, prod. Henry "Junjo" Lawes) combines Levy's two excellent 1980 LPs, both of which are fortified with the tremendous rhythms and creative arrangements of the Roots Radics. The songs from Englishman later provided the musical structure for the Scientist v. Prince Jammy LP, a colossal example of '80s dub.

what to buy next: Duets ♪♪♪ (RAS, 1995, prod. Jah Screw) features the aforementioned "Living Dangerously" along with pumped-up versions of previous hits, performed by Levy in tandem with the live deejay jive of Beenie Man ("Under Mi Sensi"), Mega Banton ("Here I Come"), and many others of the ragga royalty. Reggae Vibes ♪♪♪ (Rocky One, 1983, prod. Joe Gibbs) features all of Levy's finest work for producer Gibbs, including "Wife and Sweetheart a Friend" and "My Woman," both mixed with bravado by engineering maestro Errol Thompson.

the rest:

21 Girls Salute ♪♪ (Jah Life, 1983)
Poor Man Style ♪♪½ (Trojan U.K., 1983)
Making Tracks (a.k.a. Lifestyle) ♪♪½ (Rhino U.K., 1983)
Teach Me Culture ♪♪½ (Live & Learn, 1983)
Barrington Levy Meets Frankie Paul ♪♪♪ (Ariwa U.K., 1984)
Barrington Levy ♪♪♪ (Clocktower, 1984)
Here I Come ♪♪♪ (RAS, 1985)
Hunter Man ♪♪ (Burning Sounds U.K., 1988)
Love the Life You Live ♪♪½ (VP, 1988)
Open Book ♪♪ (Tuff Gong, 1988)
Prison Oval Rock ♪♪♪ (RAS, 1989)
Broader than Broadway: Best Of ♪♪♪ (Profile, 1990)
Divine ♪♪ (RAS, 1991)
The Collection ♪♪♪½ (Greensleeves U.K., 1991)
Turning Point ♪♪ (Greensleeves U.K., 1992)
Twenty Vintage Hits ♪♪♪ (Sonic Sounds, 1992)
Barrington ♪♪ (MCA, 1993)
Time Capsule ♪♪½ (RAS, 1996)
Too Experienced: Best Of ♪♪♪½ (V.P. 1997) Living Dangerously ♪♪♪ (Breakaway, 1998) worth searching for: Shine Eye Girl ♪♪♪ (Burning Sounds U.K., 1979, prod. Henry "Junjo" Lawes) contains the much-sought-after early Levy singles "Ah Yah Weh Deh" and "Collie Weed."

influences:

- Bob Andy, Wailing Souls, Jacob Miller, Morwells

see also: Beenie Man, Joe Gibbs, Mighty Diamonds, the Roots Radics, Sly & Robbie, Wailing Souls

Todd Shanker

Yungchen Lhamo

Tibetan devotional song

Born in Lhasa, Tibet. Based in Australia.

Tibetan soprano and songwriter Yungchen Lhamo is far more than a public relations tool of the chic Free Tibet crowd. She is an outstanding performer and artist. The soaring tones of her voice are delightfully exotic to the ear. Her name means "Goddess of melody and song," yet she is modest on stage, in her tidy traditional pink and black brocade: "When I sing I am visualizing that I am making an offering of song to all the highest spiritual beings, and, pleased by it, they shower down blessings on everyone who actively listens to the songs. I hope that the blessings can inspire people to think of their own spirituality—something that many people tend to forget about and ignore. That is why I sing."

Lhamo suffered the brutality that followed the Chinese Cultural Revolution, as her wealthy family was punished and forced to endure poverty. Working in a factory until the age of 19, Lhamo fled Tibet in 1989, the same year the Dalai Lama received the Nobel Peace Prize. With a few friends she trekked perilously through the Himalayas to India, driven by her resolve to meet him. "To Tibetans, His Holiness is a living Buddha. There is no greater experience in life than to meet him and receive his blessings. I thought even if I was to die trying to see him, my life would have meaning." Having fulfilled her dream, Lhamo migrated to Australia, where she established the Yungchen Lhamo Foundation to build women's health centers and venues for adult education, targeting women suffering the same hardships she herself faced while growing up. As much a success in the world-music field as in life, Lhamo is a sought-after recording guest of top mainstream artists like Natalie Merchant, and a marquee performer at high-profile events like New York's Tibetan Freedom Concerts.

what's available: Tibet Tibet ♪♪♪♪ (RealWorld, 1996, prod. Richard Evans, Sam Doherty) is a delight. Lhamo describes the desired effect of her music when she sings, "I weave each note into a chain of flowers for you/I'll offer this in the hope that it will soothe and ease both body and mind." And so it does. The recording features mandolin, dranyem (a Tibetan stringed instrument), and the distinctive chants of the monks of both Drepung Ngakpa Monastery and the Gyuto Tantric College. On Coming Home ♪♪♪½ (RealWorld, 1998, prod. Hector Zazou) Lhamo ditches the monks in favor of a new-age studio treatment. Unfortunately, the poignancy of her a cappella performances is lost amidst the string section, looped samples, and multi-tracked vocal effects. The exotic element in new-age music is often little more than spice on a bland dish. In this case Lhamo's voice and her singing in Tibetan spice up producer Hector Zazou's familiar, meditative string arrangements. But notwithstanding its production, the music is above par, and playfully experimental—Daniel Yvinec hints at the bassline to the Bond theme on "Per Rig Chog Sum"—while Lhamo's voice is becoming increasingly confident.

worth searching for: Look for her hard-to-find first album Tibetan Prayer (1994), winner of Australia's equivalent of the Grammy. For a live version of Tibet Tibet 's "Lama Dorje Chang" check out Lilith Fair (Arista, 1998).

influences:

◀◀ The Tibetan devotional tradition

▶▶ Dadawa

see also: Gyuto Monks

David Poole

Lhasa

Mexican, Spanish, Gypsy

Born Lhasa de Sela, 1972, in Big Indian, NY, USA. Based in Paris, France, and Montreal, Canada.

Born in the Catskills to a U.S. actress-photographer mother and a Mexican professor father, Lhasa lived a nomadic, close-knit family life as a youngster, but one filled with art, letters, and music. Because her father was a traveling teacher of Spanish and literature of the conquest, the family roamed between the United States and Mexico in a converted school bus. Growing up without TV, Lhasa and her sisters read a lot, listened to music, and sang and entertained each other in nightly performances. Lhasa lived in Mexico for eight years as a young girl, and eventually settled in Montreal (which she still considers home) in 1992 after a visit there the previous year, during which she met multi-instrumentalist Yves Desrosiers. They began working together, ultimately performing throughout Canada with bassist Mario Légaré. By 1996 Lhasa and Yves had started to work on the music that would become her debut album, La Llorona. The group then toured steadily for two years, performing their original music at Lilith Fair '97 and '98, where they gained wider appeal before their album came out in the States. At this writing, Lhasa is on extended stay outside of Paris, France, where she is working with her sisters, European circus entertainers, on developing a new act. Lhasa's powerfully intimate, passionate singing style draws on the influence of Billie Holiday, Chavela Vargas, Tom Waits, Bratsch, and Jacques Brel. Though she sings in Spanish on her debut, she is equally fluent in French and English. Critics worldwide have hailed that debut, already a top-seller in Canada and Europe before its U.S. release, as the work of world-music's next destined diva.

what's available: Belying her age, Lhasa's flowing Spanish lyrics—part whispered, part sung—sound ancient and dark on her stunning debut recording, La Llorona ♪♪♪♪♪ (Atlantic, 1998, prod. Yves Desrosiers), titled after the mythological Mexican figure who seduces men with sad melodies and turns them into stone with a kiss. Though she sometimes sounds like the grandmotherly Cape Verdean morna singer Cesaria Evora, Lhasa's voice and perspective are uniquely original for her generation. Her alto has a dusky quality that oozes raw emotion in 11 songs about love and loss, enhanced with sparse, Gypsy-flavored accompaniment from Desrosiers (guitars, lap steel bass, accordion, banjo, percussion), Légaré (bass), Francois Lalonde (drums and percussion), and various guest artists playing clarinet, accordion, violin, and sousaphone. From the first, violin-laden notes of their lilting original "La Celestina," the songs by Lhasa and her musical companions are totally captivating. Lhasa's stated goal was to make the most beautiful music possible, and it's been achieved; there's not a dull track on the album.

Annbjørg Lien

influences:

Billie Holiday, Chavela Vargas, Tom Waits, Bratsch, Jacques Brel

Nancy Ann Lee

Annbjørg Lien /Bukken Bruse

Modern Norwegian folk music

Lien born 1971, in Norway. Bukken Bruse formed 1993, in Oslo, Norway. Lien and Bukken Bruse based in Oslo, Norway.

Bukken Bruse: Annbjørg Lien, hardanger fiddle, nyckelharpa, vocals; Arve Moen Bergset, fiddle, hardanger fiddle, vocals; Steinar Ofsdal, flutes, jew's-harp, vocals; Bjørn Ole Rasch, keyboards. (All members are from Norway.)

Annbjørg Lien was introduced to the world-music community by her work on Sweet Sunny North, the compilation/adventure put together by Henry Kaiser and David Lindley to explore the folk music of Norway. She is a talented multi-instrumentalist—playing Swedish bagpipes, mandolin, flute, organ, and Swedish bouzouki in addition to the hardanger fiddle—and composes tunes that draw on a variety of international styles ranging from the Middle East to Ireland. Lien began playing a conventional violin, switching to the hardanger fiddle as soon as she was big enough to hold it. The instrument is larger than the regular violin, and has a set of sympathetic strings under the fretboard

arto lindsay

that give it its distinctive sound. Lien's father played hardanger fiddle and teaches folk music, so she was surrounded by a traditional repertoire from an early age. She began playing professionally at 13, and has won numerous prizes at folk festivals. She plays regularly with her own band, as a solo artist, and as a member of Bukken Bruse, a Norwegian folk supergroup.

what to buy: The hardanger fiddle's sympathetic strings give its high end a bright, treble-filled sound that's quite unique. On Prisme ♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1997, prod. Annbjørg Lien, Bjørn Ole Rasch), Lien's band includes Swedish bagpipes, percussion and Bukken Bruse keyboard player Bjørn Ole Rasch. The material ranges from traditional hallings (dance tunes that sound quite Celtic), to her own brand of Arabic music and achingly beautiful solo pieces.

what to buy next: Felefeber: Norwegian Fiddle Magic ♪♪♪½ (Shanachie, 1995), another solid collection, won wide praise from the Norwegian folk community for its innovative treatment of traditional material as well as Lien's original compositions. Norse folk music can sound Celtic, but there's an even deeper sense of melancholy, perhaps due to the fact that the sun vanishes for a long stretch every winter. On the Bukken Bruse album Steinstolen ♪♪♪♪ (Grappa, 1998, prod. Bukken Bruse), the blue feeling is almost overwhelming. Even the up-tempo tunes produce an unsettling sense of sadness. Lien's fiddle moans, Rasch fills the background with dark, unsettling chords, and Bergset's forlorn vocals can break your heart.

influences:

⏮ Hans W. Brimi, Andris Dahle

⏭ Chateau Neuf Spellmannslag

j. poet

Arto Lindsay

Tropicalismo, no wave

Born May 28, 1953, in Richmond, VA, USA. Based in New York, NY, USA.

Though born in Virginia, guitarist and producer Arto Lindsay spent his childhood in Brazil which gave him a lifelong passion for the samba and Tropicalismo styles of that country. The contagious rhythm of samba percolates through all of Lindsay's guitar work, from his noisy beginnings in New York's no-wave scene, to his heady periods of experimental jazz, to his more blatantly Brazilian-influenced recent oeuvre. Over a trilogy of albums with the Ambitious Lovers, Lindsay mixed the dense, discordant improvisation standard among Lower East Side noise bands with his love of samba. He also contributed to the faux jazz of the Lounge Lizards and the eclectic pop of the Golden Palominos. Lindsay's latest recordings are a trilogy of lyrical albums embracing Brazilian music more wholeheartedly than at any time in his career, with an international band from that land and others, and much singing in Portuguese. It's the fruition of a lifetime love and a thriving dual career which has seen Lindsay produce records by giants of Brazilian music like Caetano Veloso and Tom Zé, while remaining a fixture of the Downtown New York art-music scene, equal in influence and output to David Byrne and John Zorn, if not yet in name-recognition.

what to buy: Lindsay's most recent trilogy is also his strongest, with songs in Portuguese where Lindsay's voice recalls a young Antonio Carlos Jobim, snippets of drum 'n' bass, and lush guitar. The best of the best is the poetic musings of Mundo Civilizado ♪♪♪♪ (Bar/None, 1997, prod. Arto Lindsay, Andres Levin, Camus Celi), which was reimagined by DJ Spooky, DJ Mutamassik, and other Downtown mixologists on Hyper Civilizado (Remixes) ♪♪♪♪½ (Gramavision, 1997, prod. Andres Levin, Camus Celi) and is bookended beautifully by O Corpo Sutil/Subtle Body ♪♪♪½ (Bar/None, 1996, prod. Arto Lindsay, Patrick Dillett, Vinicius Cantuaria) and Noon Chill ♪♪♪½ (Bar/None, 1998, prod. Arto Lindsay, Andres Levin, Melvin Gibbs).

what to buy next: Lindsay found a balance between the skronk of his first band, DNA, and the Brazilian pop of his youth with the Ambitious Lovers' thematic trilogy of Envy ♪♪♪ (Editions EG, 1984), Greed ♪♪♪½ (Virgin, 1988), and Lust ♪♪♪ (Elektra, 1991). Most effective is Greed. . . but, er, who are we to judge?

worth searching for: Another long-time Lindsay collaborator is jazz and improvisation guru John Zorn, whose Big Gundown ♪♪♪♪♪ (Nonesuch, 1984, prod. Yale Evelev) is an excellent riff on Ennio Morricone's Spaghetti Western soundtracks—listen for Lindsay's Spanish guitar. In addition, Lindsay's Aggregates 1–26 ♪♪♪½ (Knitting Factory, 1995, prod. Arto Lindsay) reveals his strong skills as a jazz guitarist.

influences:

⏮ Antonio Carlos Jobim, Caetano Veloso, Jorge Ben, Gilberto Gil, Tom Zé, João Gilberto, Squarepusher, the Stooges, MC5, Pere Ubu

⏭ Gastr Del Sol, DJ Spooky, Marisa Monte

see also: Antonio Carlos Jobim, Masada, Marisa Monte, Caetano Veloso, Tom Zé

David Poole

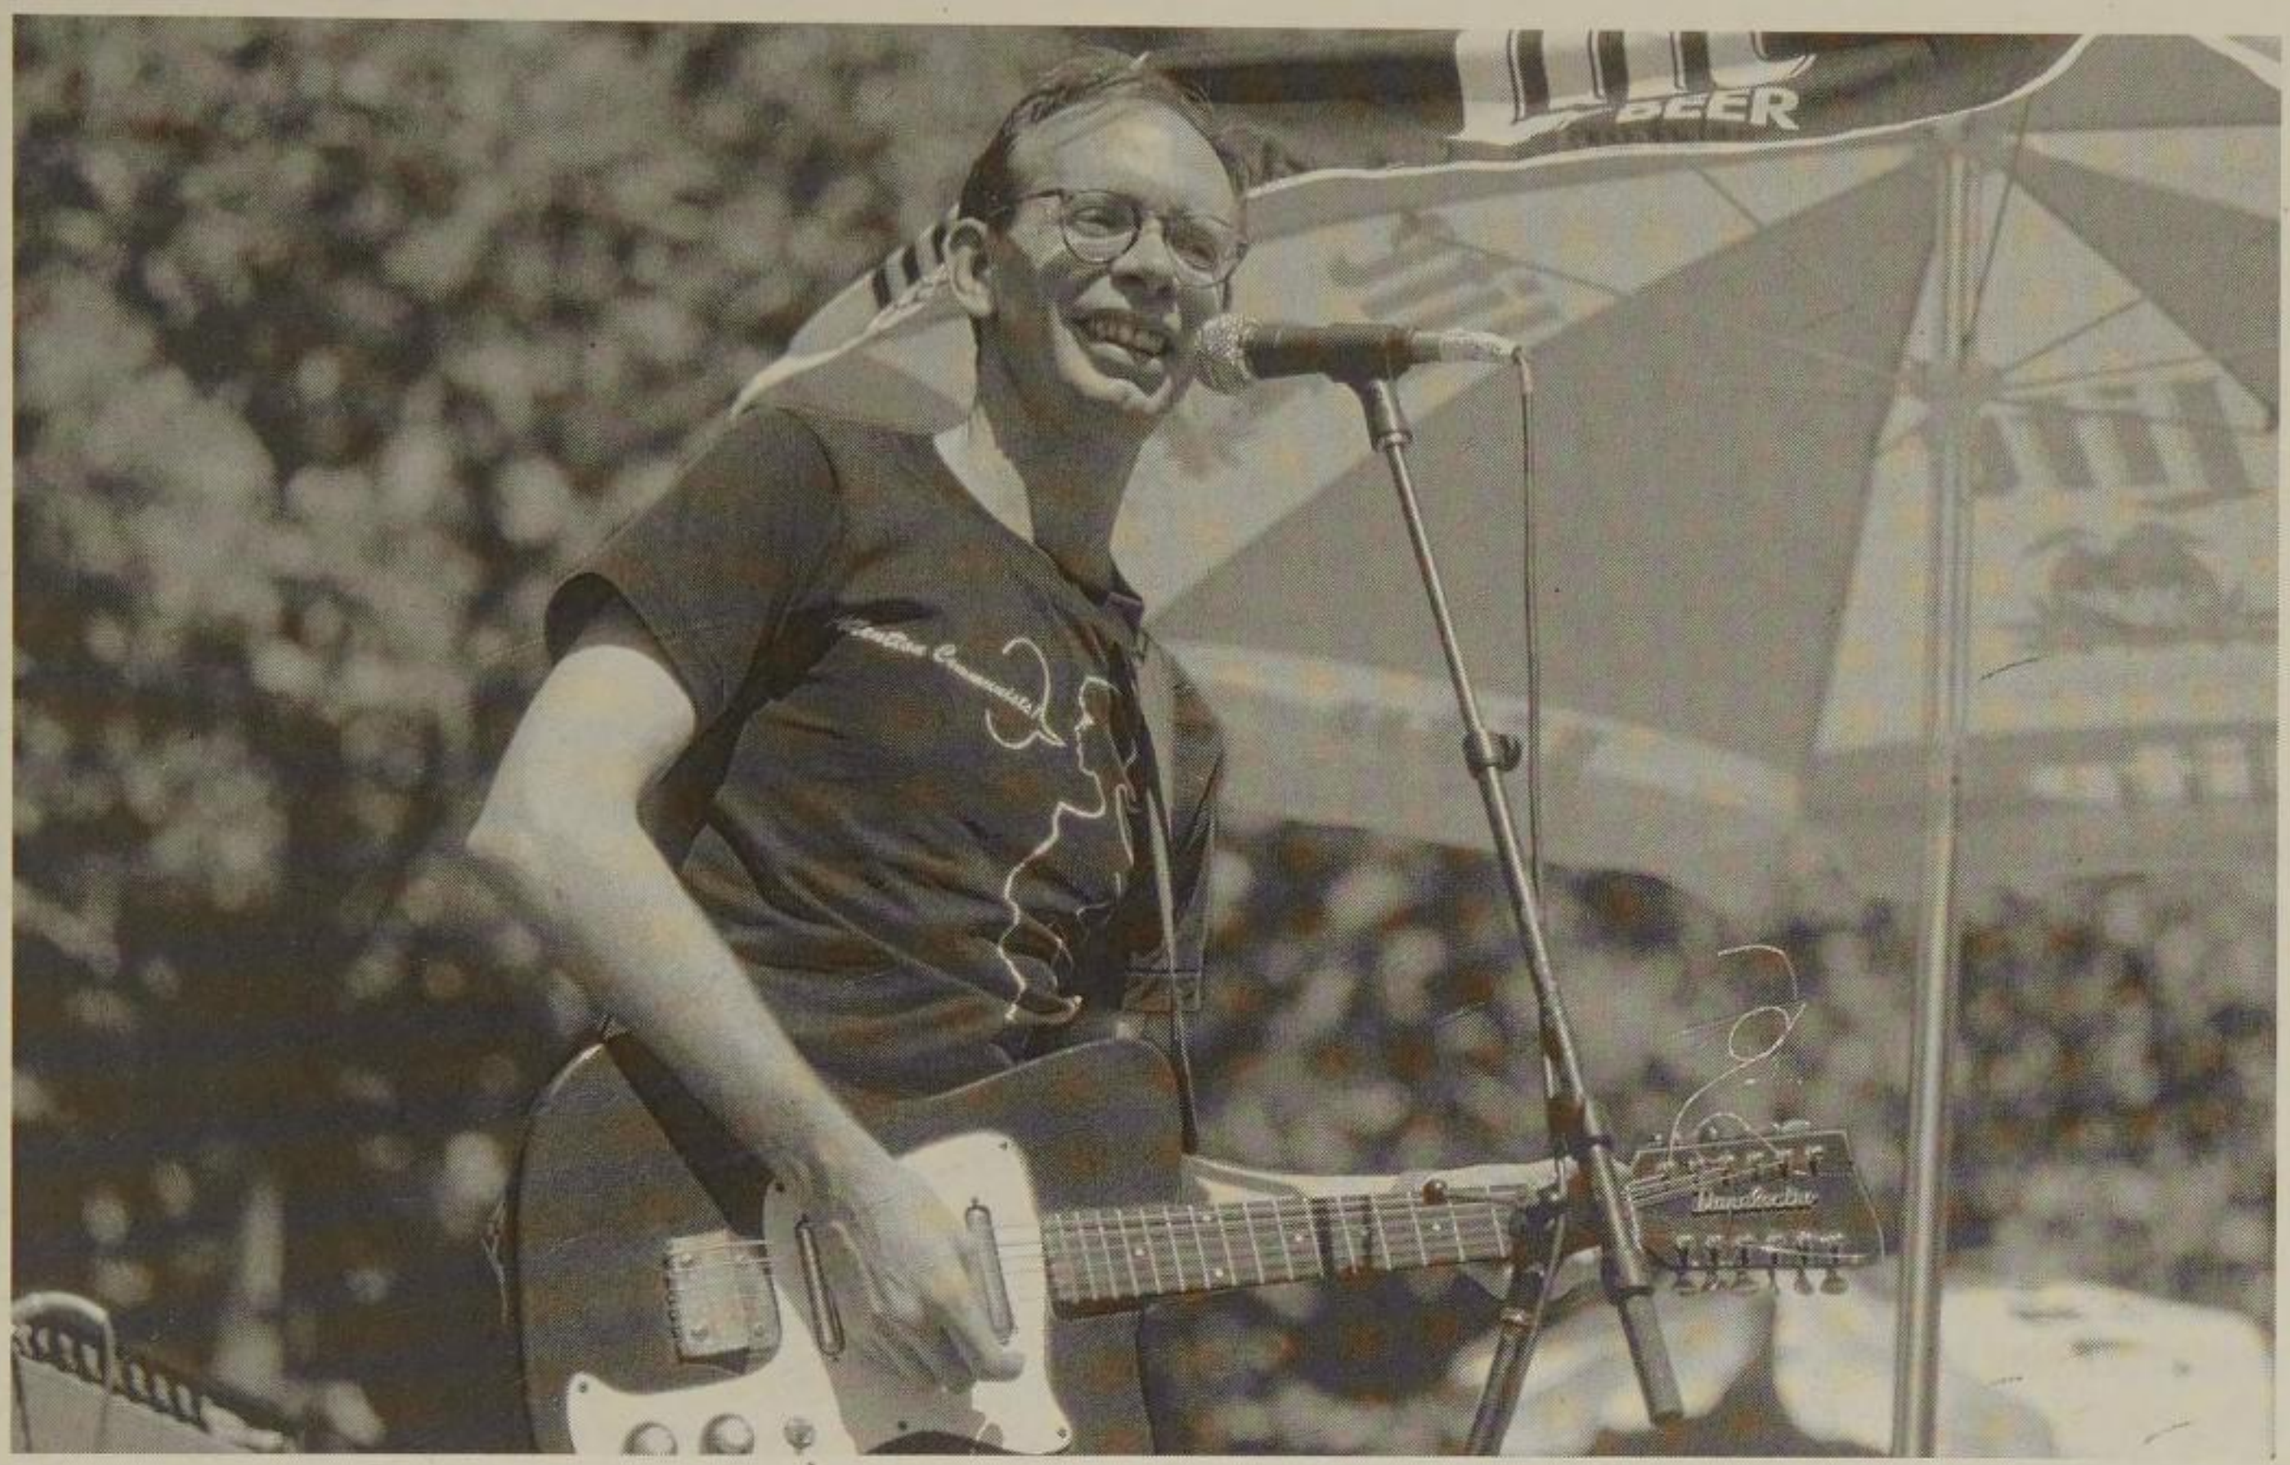
Little Joe

Tejano

Born, October 17, 1940, in Temple, Texas, USA. Based in Temple, Texas, USA.

Jose Maria de Leon Hernandez, the man known to millions of Tejano fans by his stage name, Little Joe, was born in 1940 in Temple, a West Texas town rich in Hispanic culture. Since 1956,

little joe



Arto Lindsay

when Joe and his brothers Jesse and Johnny joined their cousin David Coronado to form their first group, David Coronado & the Latinairres, Hernandez has been at the forefront of popular Chicano music in Texas. Joe, the seventh of 13 children, grew up in a strong family unit, but in the '50s Texas held few opportunities for Mexican Americans. "I'd see my mom out pulling a cotton sack along, pregnant, with my brothers and sisters," Hernandez recalled in a recent interview. Joe's father worked odd jobs, including smuggling jars of liquor into dry counties like Lubbock; he also had a small marijuana dealership that got him a four-year stretch in prison. At the time his father was busted, Joe was 15 and he became the man of the house. It was while his father was away that Joe asked his mother for the money to buy a guitar. She gave him 15 dollars for his first instrument. The next year he was in the Latinairres. The band cut its first album in 1964, and as Joe's importance as a singer and writer grew, the name became Little Joe & the Latinairres, later Little Joe y La Familia. The band called their sound "La Onda Chicana," the Chicano Wave, a genre-breaking blend of traditional norteño ballads and polkas, big-band swing a la Bob Wills, rock 'n' roll, blues, and hard C&W honky-tonk, seasoned with lyrics that give listeners realistic insights into daily Chicano life. The mix was a hit, and Hernandez has never looked back except to celebrate anniversaries of his decades in the music business. He's cut more than 40 LPs (including Timeless, a record that stayed on Billboard's Latin chart for more than a year); had several Grammy nominations; and crusades tirelessly for causes including AIDS education, ecology, Vietnam vets and the National Hispanic Scholarship Fund.

Most recently Little Joe has been concentrating on expanding his share of the Anglo market. He's recorded Tu Amigo, an English-language album that featured several duets with Texas pal Willie Nelson; gotten onto the country charts with "You Belong to My Heart" (an English version of the Mexican ballad "Solamente Una Vez"); and been scoring large gigs outside the Hispanic market, including Farm Aid II and a series of co-headlining shows with Nelson. In 1991 he became the first Tejano artist to win a Grammy, when 16 de Septiembre won the award for Best Latin Album. In 1992 he started his own label, Tejano Records. "Minorities are in a difficult position in this country," Hernandez has said. "When I play in Mexico, they call me an American artist, but because I sing in Spanish people [in the States] consider me Mexican. There are lots of Mexican influences in cowboy and country music; if people listen to our stuff they'll recognize it once they get past the language problem."

what to buy: If the English-language tunes on Timeless ♪♪♪♪♪ (Sony Discos, 1986, prod. Robert Gallarza Jr.), like "Redneck Meskin' Boy" and the cryin'-in-yer-beer honky tonk classic "To Kill a Memory," hook listeners, the Mexican stuff will reel them in. "Siempre Mi Heroe," a tune Joe wrote in honor of his father, is guaranteed to tear your heart out, even if you speak no Spanish.

what to buy next: The collection of early hits 15 Exitos de Oro, Vol. II ♪♪♪♪♪ (SRP, 1984) will knock you out with its '50s low-fi feel and its gritty garage-band energy.

best of the rest:
25th Silver Anniversary ♪♪♪♪ (Freddy, 1984)
25th Silver Anniversary—Live in Concert ♪♪♪♪ (Sony, 1985)
Aunque Pasen Los Años ♪♪♪♪ (Sony, 1988)
Tu Amigo ♪♪♪♪½ (Sony, 1990)
16 de Septiembre ♪♪♪♪♪ (Sony, 1991)
Que Paso ♪♪♪♪ (Tejano, 1992)

worth searching for: Joe recorded at least 40 cassettes and LPs—excluding greatest hits repackages—for Tejano labels like Freddy, Scorpio and others. Your local Latino record store should have enough midline titles to keep you rocking till the millennium.

influences:
⏩ Los Lobos, the Blazers

j. poet

Little Steven

International pop, classic rock

Born Steven Van Zandt, November 22, 1950, in Boston, MA, USA. Based in USA.

Known mostly as the ex-Springsteen guitarist with the ridiculous wardrobe, "Little Steven" Van Zandt also authored some of the '80s' sharpest and catchiest political pop (at a time when any pop without the politics of Rambo was in for rough going), and made a concerted stab at the international hybrid-rock movement well before there was much of one to join. In the early '80s Van Zandt broke away from guaranteed legend status with the E Street Band to be a way-too-young classic rocker of moderate interest and success. But soon he was stretching himself with socially conscious tunes that didn't draw much attention on his sophomore solo album Voice of America, but got everyone's notice when he organized the anti-Apartheid all-star benefit anthem "Sun City," the least feel-good of an often smarmy mid-'80s genre. Thematically if not sonically, it would lead to his crowning achievement to date, the multicultural Freedom—No Compromise album, on which he consciously set out (as he explained in interviews at the time) to address the non-Anglo markets then usually written off by the U.S. music-industry monolith. His world-ly leanings were enough to attract African reggae star Majek Fashek to enlist him as producer on the latter's 1991 Spirit of Love album, and though Van Zandt's own output has been sporadic since, Freedom remains one of the most listenable and least ulterior of the whiteguy worldbeat albums that were beginning to proliferate at the time.

worth searching for: Recently revived as an import, Freedom—No Compromise ♪♪♪♪½ (EMI/Manhattan, 1987/Conn, 1998, prod. Little Steven) is a rollickin' good relic of parallel-universe revolution-pop from a repressive era, one of many blows against the empire that didn't connect back when only Ronald Reagan and (luckily) U2 could speak their minds freely. That doesn't mean it wasn't well aimed, and this relatively clever and definitely danceable collection shoulda been a conscious-rock contenda. Its draws for world-music fans are the songs integrating styles of the African and Latin diasporas and Stevie Wonder-esque stretches of lyrics in South African and Native American languages. "Pretoria" is an affecting apartheid testimony with a pick-up South African choir; "Bitter Fruit" a Latinized lament of U.S. military intervention duetted with Ruben Blades, who also released a Spanish-language version; "Native American" a skankin' ethnic-pride anthem (this was rather early for a white guy to recognize reggae's popularity on the rez). Round it out with some more lyrical bulletins from the Central American and Native-rights fronts, and some then-vanguard integration of hip-hop technique that doesn't unduly muscle into its source's territory, and your search is rewarded well.

influences:
⏪ Southside Johnny, Bruce Springsteen, Bob Marley, Ruben Blades

see also: Ruben Blades, Majek Fashek

Adam McGovern

A.L. Lloyd

English, Australian, Scottish, and international folklore

Born February 29, 1908, in London, England. Died 1982.

A.L. Lloyd was born into a working-class London family. By the time he was 15, most of that family had died of tuberculosis. Unable to find work in London, he arranged passage to Australia to work on sheep stations. It was during his nine years there that Lloyd first became interested in traditional songs. He began to sing, and he kept the words of the songs he knew in composition books; unfortunately, he lost the books, which would have been an invaluable document of Australian song in the 1920s. During these years, Lloyd also began a program of self-education that would last the rest of his life; he discovered a system whereby bush workers could borrow library books by mail, and devoured as many as he could. When he returned to England in the early 1930s, he was a budding intellectual and a confirmed Marxist. He had several jobs, but also spent part of the decade unemployed. Rather than remain idle, he visited the British Museum reading room where he began to study folk music seriously. Finally, his financial situation became so bad that he signed onto the factory ship Southern Empress, and spent a season as a whaler. As always, he took the opportunity to learn whatever songs he could, and he later traced some of his seafaring songs to his season at sea. Upon returning to land Lloyd had the idea of writing a radio documentary about sailors' lives. The piece, which made Lloyd's Marxist beliefs obvious, was well received. He followed it with several more radio programs for the BBC, including their first folk-song field recordings, but was ultimately let go because of his communist beliefs; ironically, it was an anti-Hitler documentary, broadcast in 1938, that probably did him in. After leaving the BBC he worked as a journalist, but by 1950 the cold war had made self-avowed communists into pariahs in the journalism trade. Lloyd decided to become a freelance folklorist.

Lloyd's activities in the 1950s were diverse, but always came back to folk songs. He became one of the editors of the Folk Music Journal, joined the English Folk Dance and Song Society, and founded a band called the Ramblers with Ewan MacColl and Alan Lomax. He compiled a book of coal-mining songs, founded folk clubs, collaborated with singer/activist MacColl on recording and performing projects, and generally established himself as Britain's leading expert on folk songs. He appeared in John Huston's 1956 film Moby Dick, playing the part of the ship's singer or shantyman. Most importantly, he was appointed artistic director of Topic Records, a company dedicated both to folklore and to Marxist causes. Although he had already recorded for many labels in Britain and Australia, most of Lloyd's recording projects from that time on would be for Topic. During the 1960s and 1970s, politics were less of a problem for him, and his status as an authority on folk music made him once again desirable to the BBC. He continued making radio documentaries on folk music, and later made the transition to television. At the same time he was in demand as a scholar. He toured many of the world's universities as a visiting lecturer, and wrote folk music articles for the Encyclopedia Britannica. He published his most important book, Folk Song in England, in 1967. During the folk boom, when many younger singers and groups began performing professionally, Lloyd became an elder statesman and teacher, providing advice, encouragement, and songs to all the important artists of the younger generation. More than anything else, that influence has been his legacy.

what to buy: Although he never considered himself a performer, Lloyd did leave behind many recordings. A few compilations have been released on CD. Classic A.L. Lloyd ♪♪♪♪♪ (Fellside, 1994, prod. Paul Adams) was collected from 11 records in the Topic catalog, as well as several unreleased tapes. It includes 24 songs representing a cross-section of Lloyd's recorded work. From his several albums of Australian songs, the compilation includes "The Cockies of Bungaree" and "Flash Jack from Gundagai," the latter of which features Fairport Convention/Fotheringay/Redgum singer Trevor Lucas on concertina. From Lloyd's forays into maritime music, Classic A.L. Lloyd features several fine sea chanteys and "fo'c's'le" songs (referring to the "forecastle" structure of a merchant ship, in which the crew is housed). The rest of the tracks on Classic A.L. Lloyd were selected from some of his general albums of English folk songs. It is here that his influence on the folk revival is most apparent. If you want to hear versions of "The Weaver and the Factory Maid," "John Barleycorn," "Skewball," "Jack Orion," "Byker Hill," "The Widow of Westmoreland's Daughter," "Two Magicians," and "Reynardine" that are curiously reminiscent of those recorded by such groups as Steeleye Span and Fairport Convention, this is the place. It's particularly interesting to hear Dave Swarbrick's fiddle accompanying Lloyd on "Jack Orion," a song that Swarbrick would later sing and play with Fairport Convention. For the most part, though, it's simply enjoyable to hear Lloyd's voice, once described as "unmistakably creaky," interpreting a slew of magnificent songs. Although Lloyd was not gifted with a strong, clear voice, he had an unaffected, often tender delivery that makes each song delightful, each ballad an instance of masterful storytelling. Lloyd is accompanied on some tracks by Swarbrick on fiddle, Alf Edwards on concertina, Steve Benbow on guitar, and several other musicians and vocalists. The recording quality is inconsistent, due to the different sources used, but the singer and the songs are uniformly excellent.

what to buy next: The Bird in the Bush ♪♪♪♪½ (Topic, 1996, prod. Tony Engle) is a reissue of a 1966 compilation LP that focused on the theme of "erotic songs." The performers on the original release included Lloyd, Anne Briggs, and Frankie Armstrong; the CD version contains several cuts by Armstrong that were not on the original LP, as well as material from Louis Killen and Norman Kennedy. First and foremost, this is an excellent recording of brilliant singers and great songs. Armstrong and Briggs were two of the revival's most sublime voices and their contributions are outstanding. In particular, Armstrong's rendition of the title track is a masterful performance of a rarely heard song with a haunting and unusual melody, and Briggs's version of the comic "Stonecutter Boy" is a gentle tale of seduction sung to a richly ornamented tune. Killen sings three songs, including a beautiful reading of "The Cock" and a lively, jocular piece called "One May Morning." Kennedy's one number is the well-known Scottish "Night Visiting Song" that begins, "I must away, love, I can no longer tarry." Almost half of the songs are sung by Lloyd. On some tracks he is joined by Swarbrick on fiddle and Edwards on concertina, but several are unaccompanied. Due to his influence on a whole generation of English singers, many of Lloyd's versions were featured on well-known albums by other artists; his "Widow of Westmoreland's Daughter" and "Bonny Black Hare," both on this disc, made it into Fairport Convention's repertoire via Swarbrick. As on Classic A.L. Lloyd, listening to the master here will be a revelation to anyone with an interest in tracing the English folksong revival. The intellectual impetus for this recording also came from Lloyd, and he edited the original album. In the liner notes, he disguises his personal preferences as academic judgments, justifying his own choice of tender, loving erotic songs over bawdy or sexually explicit material by the principle that a "downright pornographic song with its proliferation of gross sexual detail is very rare in folk tradition proper." His reasoning here is unsound, based first and foremost on a romantic idea of "the folk" as happy peasants busy communing with nature and with the delights and fruitfulness of their own bodies; in the notes to individual songs, he makes facile arguments connecting sexual lyrics to ancient fertility rituals. But despite the specious commentary (which he himself came to view as outdated and naive by the time he died), The Bird in the Bush remains an essential album. English and Scottish Folk Ballads ♪♪♪♪ (Topic, 1996, prod. Tony Engle) is also a classic that deserved its CD release. Like The Bird in the Bush, this 1964 LP was beefed up with new tracks for its digital debut. The new version features many of the same performers as The Bird in the Bush, including Lloyd, Briggs, Killen, and Kennedy. In addition, it includes tracks by Mike Waterson and the late great Ewan MacColl. The accompanists are also mostly the same as on Bird : Edwards on concertina and Swarbrick on fiddle, with the addition of Briggs and Johnny Moynihan, who both play bouzouki on one track. The Scottish material, sung by MacColl and Kennedy, includes stories of warfare among clans ("The Baron o' Brackley" and "Hughie Graeme," both sung by MacColl) and bothy (itinerant farmworker) songs (Kennedy's "Drumdelgie"), as well as various broadside ballads and the great old "Lord Randall," delivered superbly by MacColl. Once again, Lloyd's distinctive voice dominates the English material, providing a third of the CD's tracks. Among them is the classic "Jack Orion," which Lloyd re-wrote from seminal folksong collector Francis Child's ballad "Glasgerion." This too would later be performed, much as Lloyd wrote it, by Fairport Convention, the link again being Swarbrick, who accompanies Lloyd on the track. "The Bitter Withy," another of Lloyd's ballads, could potentially offend Christians (which was why it was left out of Child's canon); it's about the child Jesus causing serious mischief and getting punished with a serious spanking. More English ballad material is provided by Briggs ("Reynardine," "Willy O' Winsbury"), Waterson ("The Cruel Ship's Carpenter"), and Killen ("The Bramble Briar," "Young Edwin in the Lowlands"). The Old Bush Songs ♪♪♪♪ (Larrikin, 1994, prod. Warren Fahey) is a compilation of Lloyd's Australian songs and the only CD besides Classic A.L. Lloyd filled entirely with Lloyd's charmingly tentative singing. On it, Lloyd interprets a variety of songs, from the quintessentially Australian "Waltzing Matilda," "Bold Jack Donahue," and "The Kelly Gang" to Australian versions of older British folk songs like "Rocking the Cradle" and "The Derby Ram." Accompanists vary; on some tracks Edwards's concertina and Swarbrick's fiddle are the main instruments, while others feature Peggy Seeger's guitar and Ralph Rinzler's mandolin. In general, the experienced and professional musicians who back Lloyd do a fine job of providing the mostly upbeat and light environments in which his singing flourishes. Unfortunately, at 48 minutes, the CD is too short; it could easily have held five or six more songs. Lloyd did record a number of other fascinating and funny bush ballads, notably an outback version of "Seven Drunken Nights." For the sake of both interest and posterity, more of such recordings could have been included. Blow Boys Blow ♪♪♪ (Tradition, 1996, prod. Patrick Clancy) is a reissue of an old LP of sea chanteys recorded by Lloyd and MacColl. The dramatic interpretations of seafaring material are stirring, and backing is once again provided by Edwards, Rinzler, and other instrumentalists. The only drawback is, once again, the length; since this was originally a single LP, it clocks in at only 35 minutes. Still, priced low, it's definitely worth the purchase. Interestingly, Frank Zappa once commented on how much he liked this album; unfortunately, he loaned it to Captain Beefheart, who never returned it!

influences:

◀◀ Ernest Lloyd, Harry Cook, Phil Lumpkin

▶▶ Sandy Denny, Dave Swarbrick, Trevor Lucas, Martyn Wyndham-Read, Warren Fahey, Martin Carthy, Maddy Prior, Roy Harris, Frankie Armstrong, Ashley Hutchings, John Kirkpatrick, Louis Killen, Anne Briggs, Watersons, Shirley Collins, Fairport Convention, Steeleye Span, Albion Band, New St. George

see also: Frankie Armstrong, Fairport Convention, Trevor Lucas, Ewan MacColl, Steeleye Span, Dave Swarbrick

Steve Winick

Cheikh Lô

African pop

Born in 1955, in Bobo Dioulasso, Burkina Faso. Based in Dakar, Senegal.

When Cheikh Lô's international debut release appeared in 1996, he became one of the hottest commodities in African pop virtually overnight. Though he was born and spent his boyhood in the West African interior, in Burkina Faso, Lô is Senegalese, and he developed his highly original sound in the teeming cultural crossroads of Dakar. Mostly singing in the Senegalese language of Wolof, his sound is readily identifiable with that country, but like the best modern African musicians he transcends any simple classification. Lô's professional career started in his hometown with Orchestre Volta Jazz, a kind of variety band that did Cuban and Congolese hits and a few pop adaptations of Burkinabe folklore. After moving to Senegal in 1978 Lô played drums and percussion with Ouza, a progressive singer in the mbalax style popularized by Youssou N'Dour (itself an Afro-Caribbean fusion heavily influenced by Wolof tradition, though in an electrified setting), and then with the house band at the Hotel Savana. Once again, he found himself immersed in international variety. By then the Zairian sound was in full flower, Cameroonian makossa was coming on strong, and reggae had entered the mix. Lô absorbed everything. In 1985 he was given his first guitar, and began writing songs. He soon released his first cassette, which lead to well-received appearances on Senegalese television. Lô then spent two years in Paris working with a variety of groups and artists, including Zaire's Papa Wemba, whom Lô admired and recognized as a singer in the tradition of his boyhood idol, Tabu Ley. With all this experience under his belt, Lô returned to Dakar and began to concentrate on his solo career again. He wanted to create his own take on the tough Senegalese mbalax sound, make it softer, more acoustic, and accentuate the Latin rhythms and feeling in the music. In 1995, with the help of Senegal's preeminent pop star N'Dour himself, Lô got his chance; together they produced his international debut, Ne La Thiass.

To the many critics and listeners worldwide who acclaimed it at first listen, the phenomenon seemed sudden, but it was an outgrowth of a deeply held dedication that's second nature to Lô. For Lô is a Baye Fall, a member of a mystical brotherhood within the larger Islamic sect of the Mourides. The Mourides' founder, Cheikh Amadu Bamba, helped Senegal to embrace Islam by putting its teachings into terms that Wolof and other Senegalese peoples could accept. "His philosophy enveloped everything," says Lô. "He said, 'Pray to God as if you were going to die tomorrow, because if you think you are going to die tomorrow, you will pray a lot today.' Then he said, 'Work as if you were never going to die.'" In the summer of 1998 Lô had a chance to do just that as part of Africa Fête, a showcase of top African groups that made an extensive and grueling tour of the United States and Canada. With the success of these appearances still resonating, he set to work on his second international release.

what's available: Ne La Tiasse ♪♪♪♪♪ (World Circuit/Nonesuch, 1997, prod. Youssou N'Dour, Cheikh Lô) is a landmark for African pop. Lô's voice is rougher than that of his superstar producer N'Dour, but his sound is light and sensuous, an inspired reinterpretation of the African-Latin connection.

influences:

◀◀ Youssou N'Dour, Papa Wemba, Orchestre Baobob

see also: Tabu Ley Rochereau, Youssou N'Dour, Papa Wemba

Banning Eyre

Ismaël Lô

Afropop

Born in 1956, in Niger. Based in Dakar, Senegal, and Paris, France.

Like many Africans who got their first Western exposure during the early worldbeat wave of the late 1970s, Ismaël Lô's career has been plagued by misunderstandings, the greatest of which may be his tag as the "Bob Dylan of Africa"—a label Lô finds laughable. "I was the first African to play harmonica and guitar at the same time, like Bob Dylan once did, so that was an easy label for those who were unfamiliar with my music," he says. Lô's enthusiasms don't really lie in the singer/songwriter area, but rather in exploring new ways of blending traditional Afropop (i.e., music made for the African market before the 1980s) with more recent Western pop forms.

Lô was born in Niger to Senegalese parents who moved back to Dakar when he was two months old. Like many teens he drove his parents crazy with his stereo, mixing the sounds of James Brown, Otis Redding, and Johnny Halliday with more African fare like the kora playing of Soudioulou Cissoksho, a Senegalese griot. Lô's mother says he was born singing, but the family wanted him to pursue a more academic course, so Lô's first guitar was an instrument he built for himself out of fishing line, an oil can, and some scrap wood. In order to learn the guitar, Lô would sneak into town and stand outside the clubs he was too young to get in to. "Sometimes I'd find empty crates and stack them up under a window, so I could climb up and see what the guitarists were doing with their fingers," Lô recalled. "It was 10 years before I had enough money to buy a real guitar." Lô learned by borrowing the instruments of friends, and put together his first band, Ngalam ("Gold"), while still a teen. After appearing on local TV, Lô was approached by Omar Pene, who was just starting Super Diamono. Lô joined the fledgling band and stayed with them during their meteoric climb to the top of the Senegalese charts. "People often ask why I joined them, and one reason was because I know the limits of one person and one guitar. I wanted to be in a band and play with other musicians."

During his time with Super Diamono Lô learned to play drums, percussion, and keyboards, and honed his electric guitar chops. Eventually, Lô's vision of his own brand of international pop made him leave Diamono and start a new group. Lô went on to record 16 albums with his own band, including hits like Xalat, Natt, Xunbeul, and Waliour. In 1990 he signed with Mango and his first release was an eponymous collection of Senegalese hits revamped for the international market. In 1996 Triloka picked up his option and his first album for the label was Jammu Africa, which added even more Western touches to his sound. The single "Without Blame," a duet with Marianne Faithful, got airplay on some modern rock stations, but Lô's crossover dreams have yet to some true. "All music comes from Africa, and returns to Africa," Lô says. "Most people don't know [the history of the music], but most Western music has the African feeling in it. It may be called soul, rumba or funk, but it's African. Music is a universal language, and the different rhythms are like different dialects, but the root of the rhythm is from Africa. For me music has no frontiers. I don't want to make African, or French, or American music, I just want to make music."

what's available: Jammu Africa ♪♪♪♪ (Triloka, 1996, prod. Bouya Ndoye, Nicolas Gautier) is the easiest album to find, and a fairly good representation of where Lô wants to take his music. The set includes songs from his two Mango albums Ismaël Lô and Iso, further refined and polished. Natt ♪♪♪♪ (Melodie, 1987, prod. Ibrahima Sylla) includes selections from Lô's first three albums, Natt, Xiif, and Xalat, and proves that he can make pop music without loosing the harder edge present in his Senagalese albums but missing from his more recent work. This is Afropop with its roots intact, full of grit and fire.

influences:
◀◀ Youssou N'Dour, Xalam, Mory Kante, Baaba Maal

j. poet

Kevin Locke

Native American flute and hoop dancing

Born in 1954, in South Dakota, USA. Based in Standing Rock Reservation, SD, USA.

Among Native North American performers, none is more acclaimed than Kevin Locke, a Lakota dancer and indigenous flute player. A member of the Standing Rock Sioux Nation (Hunkpapa Band of Lakotas) and resident of the sovereign Standing Rock Reservation in South Dakota, he spent his teen years with an elderly uncle whose first language was Lakota. It was from this uncle, Abraham End of Horn, that Kevin received his first training in the traditions of his culture, though he is quick to point out that he learned much from many others in the community. Among those teachers were Arlo Good Bear, Ben Black Bear Sr., Charles Wise Spirit, William Horn Cloud, and Margaret One Bull. Locke also holds a master's degree in educational administration from the University of South Dakota, where he was admitted to law school before realizing that music and dance were his destiny. Locke is an exquisite player of the indigenous cedarwood flute. Many older Lakota say he is even better than those they remember from long ago. He is certainly a musical hero and role model to indigenous youth across North America, and younger players are frequently waiting backstage, eager to ask questions. Befitting this guiding role, Locke's Lakota name is Tokeya Inajin, "The First to Arise."

That a musician of such skill could also be a famous dancer may seem improbable, but it is so. Locke originally came to national attention as a hoop dancer, a brilliant performer in another ancient and honorable Lakota tradition. In this amazingly complex and acrobatic dance, the dancer whirls within twirling hoops, explicating the Native view of the world as hoops intersect and grow into ever more revealing designs that show the way of life. Locke was awarded a National Heritage fellowship by the National Endowment for the Arts in 1990. His performances draw from a rich repertoire of story, song, flute music, and dance. Prominent are his songs and stories of the eagle because of the qualities it is seen to possess: nobility, loftiness, and serenity. In Locke's words, "These are qualities that each one of us has by our birthright. The power we have, on our wings, is much more powerful than that of the eagle. We have the wings of our minds and thoughts. We have the wings of our heart. As we exercise them, they will carry us upward. How often do we send our children into the world with only one wing? We must exercise our hearts as well. Young eagles must have two strong wings."

Locke's performances conclude with the hoop dance which reflects his belief in the unity of humankind. Using 28 hoops to tell a story, Locke depicts such things as flowers, butterflies, stars, the sun, and an eagle. The hoops represent unity, while the four colors of the hoops—black, red, yellow, and white—represent the four directions, four seasons, four winds, and four complexions of people's skin. At the end of the dance all 28 hoops have been interlocked in a spherical shape as fragile as the balance he works for in human affairs.

what to buy: Open Circle ♪♪♪♪ (Makoché, 1996), one of Locke's most recent releases, is a fine introduction to the power in his performances.

what to buy next: Dream Catcher ♪♪♪ (EarthBeat!/Warner Bros., 1992) and Love Songs of the Lakota ♪♪♪ (Indian House, 1982/1995) are calming collections of natural sounds and flute songs of the Lakota, Dakota, and Meskwaki peoples that portray Locke's subtle artistry. Included are ancient and contemporary love songs and laments, including a selection by famed Indian leader Chief Sitting Bull, who was renowned within his tribe as an honored composer and singer.

the rest:
Wopile, the Giveaway ♪♪♪ (Yellow Moon Press, 1993)
The Flood ♪♪♪ (Parabola Books, 1993) (storybook & tape)
Keepers of the Dream ♪♪♪ (EarthBeat!/Warner Bros., 1994)

Kevin Locke

The Flash of the Mirror ♪♪ (Meyer Creative Productions/Makoché, 1996)

worth searching for: Several of Locke's releases are either available on cassette only or are currently out of print entirely, including Lullaby ♪♪♪ (Music for Little People, 1994), Lakota Wiikijo Olowan, Vol. II ♪♪♪ (Featherstone, 1986), Journey to the Spirit World ♪♪♪ (Tatanka, 1983), Lakota Wilkijo Olowan, Vol. I ♪♪♪ (Featherstone, 1983), "make me a hollow reed . . ." ♪♪♪ (Kevin Locke/Meyer Creative Productions, 1990), Lakota Love Songs & Stories ♪♪♪ (Kevin Locke/Meyer Creative Productions, 1990), and The Seventh Direction ♪♪♪ (Kevin Locke/Meyer Creative Productions, 1990), the latter three of which are cassette-only releases. He has also appeared on the various-artists compilations Tribal Voices ♪♪♪ (EarthBeat!/Rhino, 1996) and Tribal Winds ♪♪♪ (EarthBeat!/Warner Bros., 1995).

influences:
⏮ Richard Fool Bull, Arlo Good Bear, Ben Black Bear

Neal Walters

The Looters

Worldbeat

Formed 1984, in San Francisco, CA, USA. Disbanded 1993.

Mat Callahan, guitar, lead vocals; Joe Johnson, guitar, vocals; Jim Johnson, bass, vocals; Fred Cirillo, keyboards, vocals; Ahaguna G. Sun, drums, vocals; Akal Fillinger, keyboards (1984–87). (All members are from USA.)

The foundation of the Looters can be traced back to late-night conversations between Mat Callahan and Akal Fillinger. One night, while Fillinger played Callahan some tunes by his favorite reggae and calypso artists, an idea formed. They envisioned a band that could perform the same kind of journalistic function in this country that calypso and reggae play in the Caribbean. A band that could create exciting dance music with challenging lyrics; songs designed to raise the important social questions. "I don't buy that line that goes 'Hey, I'm only a musician, I'm not a politician,'" Callahan says. "In a manner of speaking everything is political, and we have a duty to confront the issues that effect our lives. I may not have all the answers, or any of the answers for that matter, but I have a lotta questions, and I'm gonna keep bringing 'em up." The Looters were as good as their word and built a hard-hitting international sound with elements of African, Caribbean and North American styles, gaining a reputation as one of the Bay Area's most exciting live bands.

On the business side, however, things were different. The band was turned down by the majors because their songs were too political, too controversial, and too in-your-face. Undaunted, they put out an eponymous EP on Jello Biafra's Alternative Tentacles label. Chris Blackwell, then head of Island Records, heard the EP in London's Rough Trade record shop, called the number on the back of the record, and signed the band. Blackwell gave the Looters total artistic control, and the result was Flashpoint, a collection of the agitprop dance tunes the band had been playing live for the past five years. Despite rave reviews from the rock press, and a sold-out tour to support the LP, the album sank without a trace and the Looters returned home a sadder but wiser band. Happily, they'd used their Island advance to build their own recording studio, so when the major-label deal went belly-up they returned home to cut Jericho Down, another powerful collection of tunes. The Looters' studio became the focus of Komotion International, a communal effort run by a collective of poets, musicians, and activists; in return for free studio time people would trade off on the floor-sweeping, postering, painting, and other jobs essential to keep the operation running smoothly. Although eventually closed by the police, who objected to the crowds of young, politically active people the space attracted, Komotion was a major focus for San Francisco's new bohemian generation for years. After another album, Imago Mundi, the Looters fell apart. Callahan went back to driving a cab, although he often surfaces with his new Gospel/R&B project the Wild Bouquet.

what to buy: Flashpoint ♪♪♪♪♪ (Island, 1988, prod. Ken Kesse) is an amazing explosion that melds hard rock with calypso, reggae, and other Caribbean beats without sounding forced or derivative. The Looters are the great lost worldbeat band.

what to buy next: A slight change of direction found the band producing an album that could be the soundtrack for a worldbeat noir flick, Jericho Down ♪♪♪♪♪ (Monster Music, 1991, prod. Mat Callahan, Fred Cirillo). The disc is full of tough playing and tunes that cut deep, both poetically and politically.

the rest:
Imago Mundi ♪♪♪♪ (Monster Music, 1992)

influences:
⏮ Sparrow, Bob Dylan, Victor Jara, Groupo Mancotal
⏭ Angélique Kidjo

j. poet

Jennifer Lopez

Latin pop

Born July 24, 1970, in the Bronx, NY, USA. Based in USA.

Well before her 30th birthday, Jennifer Lopez had established herself as an actor of talent and presence—working with such prestigious directors as Oliver Stone, Francis Ford Coppola, and Steven Soderburgh—and, with her Latin heritage, she is considered by many to be the face of the 21st century. It was her portrayal of one of the leading Latin faces of the 20th that inspired Lopez to revive a childhood interest in singing: her starring role in the biopic about slain Tejano icon Selena Quintanilla. Though she lip-synched to Selena's own vocals in the film, the experience of being involved with music again led Lopez to pursue releasing her own album. At this writing, she still intends to make acting her first focus but is enjoying the fact that her debut album is climbing both the Latin and rock charts.

what's available: On the 6 ♪♪♪½ (WORK, 1999, prod. Corey Rooney, Jennifer Lopez) is a group of tunes that seem to hit all the pop/Latin dance genres, from techno-influenced to tropical to ballad. Lopez's Puerto Rican heritage comes through with Latin guitar riffs and tropical percussion patterns in many of the songs, as well as two mixes of a Spanish-language duet with salsa prince Marc Anthony. But can she sing? Yes, and quite well. She also makes tasteful if not wildly original use of Latin musical motifs in her English-language tunes. The songs themselves are clearly meant more for dancing than listening, and at that they succeed; now it would be interesting to see what Lopez could do with more substantial material, in English or Spanish.

worth searching for: Though she doesn't sing in the film Selena! Lopez gives a convincing and powerful performance that provides insight into the life of this lost phenomenon.

influences:
⏮ Rita Moreno, Madonna

see also: Marc Anthony, Selena

Kerry Dexter

the talking drum

The "talking drum," also known as the tama, is one of the three primary drums of the Manding people of West Africa (along with the djembe and the doundoun, or "djun djun"). The smallest of the three, the tama is an hourglass-shaped drum with strings or leather thongs stretched from the rim of one head to the other. Usually holding the tama between one arm and the body, the player can squeeze its strings to increase or decrease the tension of the drumhead as he strikes it with an L-shaped stick, allowing for distinctive bent-tone percussive sounds with melodic ranges that can exceed one octave. In the hands of masters like Material's Aiyb Dieng and Mickey Hart's Planet Drum ensemble's Sikiru Adepoju, the instrument not only "talks" but seems to sing in a rhythmic language all its own. Although most commonly identified with West African music, the tama has counterparts in a variety of cultures around the world, including the dundun of Ghana (no relation to the doundoun mentioned above); the udukkai of Kerala in India; and the chang go, which is virtually the national drum of Korea.

see also: The Kora and West African Griot (sidebar), West African Drumming and the Soul of Rock 'n' Roll (sidebar)

Bret Love

Lord Kitchener /Kitch

Calypso, soca

Born April 18, 1922, in Arima, Trinidad. Based in Port of Spain, Trinidad, and Brooklyn, NY, USA.

Aldwyn Roberts, a.k.a. Lord Kitchener (or "Kitch" as he is commonly called today), is one of the greatest living calypso singers, a man who can trace his career back to the earliest days of the genre. Kitch was just 14 when both his parents died, and although he was an excellent student, he was forced to neglect his studies and work to support himself. Luckily, his father, who was a blacksmith by trade, was also an amateur musician, and he'd taught Kitch the basics of guitar playing and composition. His first gig was singing for roadside laborers, and the songs he made up about their economic plight were so well received that he decided to try calypso as a full-time career. In 1938, one of his early tunes, "Shops Close Too Early," became a local hit, and in 1943 he moved down to Port of Spain where he sang with the Roving Brigade. In 1944 he was invited to join the Victory Tent, a top calypso venue, and he met Growling Tiger, one of the music's early legends. One of his first tunes thereafter, "Green Fig," a double entendre about a man who knows his wife is cheating on him, became a sensation, and Growling Tiger dubbed the young Aldwyn Lord Kitchener, after Field Marshal Lord Kitchener, England's former secretary of war.

In 1947 Kitch started his own tent, with a number of the younger singers like Lord Melody, Spoiler, Viking, and Lord Pretender. They had a more progressive sound and introduced a stronger horn section as well as Latin, Brazilian, and North American rhythms. This "Young Brigade" was quite popular with the American troops stationed on the island during WWII, and their approval inspired the singers to drop some of the political lyrics and go for a sexier, dance-happy style. Soon after, Kitch left Trinidad for England. He wanted to take his music to the international market and make records. His albums for Parlophone and Melodisc continued to explore new musical ground, and he experimented with a jazzier arranging style. When his records appeared back home they were big hits, although they didn't do as well internationally as Kitch had hoped. He also experienced the racism of England first-hand and returned to political lyrics, penning the classics "Africa My Home" and "Black and White (If You're Not White You're Considered Black)."

lord melody

After a decade in Europe Kitch returned to Trinidad, where he began to win Road March and Calypso King Crowns regularly. In the 1970s when calypso turned into soca by incorporating funk, rock, and reggae into its rhythms and accelerating its tempo, Kitch was one of the first oldtimers to jump on the bandwagon; at one point he even claimed to have invented the form. At 77, Kitch still maintains a hectic touring schedule and his yearly releases are full of spunk and fire.

what to buy: The solid survey Klassic Kitchener, Volume One ♪♪♪♪♪ (Ice, 1992, reissue prod. Eddy Grant) starts with Kitch's early British sides from the 1950s and continues through his steel-pan-driven hits of the mid-1960s. Includes "Tie Tongue Mopsy," one of his earliest double-entendre hits, and "Steel Band Music," a swinging tribute to one of Trinidad's unique contributions to the musical world.

what to buy next: Klassic Kitchener, Volume Three ♪♪♪♪♪ (Ice, 1993, reissue prod. Eddy Grant) covers hits from the mid-to-late 1970s, just as calypso was transforming itself into soca. Lyrics deal mostly with sex and good times; the rhythms are simpler and the tempos faster, but Kitch is still in excellent voice.

best of the rest:
Lord Kitchener ♪♪♪♪♪ (Melodisc Reissue)
Kitch—King of Calypso ♪♪♪♪♪ (Melodisc Reissue)
Kitchener Goes Soca ♪♪♪♪♪ (Charlie's, 1980)
Roots of Soca ♪♪♪♪♪ (Charlie's, 1983)
Master at Work ♪♪♪♪♪ (Kalico, 1987)
100% Kitch ♪♪♪♪½ (B's, 1988)
Klassic Kitchener, Volume Two ♪♪♪♪♪ (Ice, 1993)

influences:
◀◀ Growling Tiger, Roaring Lion, Atilla
▶▶ Sparrow, Swallow, Arrow

j. poet

Lord Melody /Melody

Calypso

Born 1926, in Trinidad. Died 1988, in Trinidad.

Although best known to many listeners for writing "Mama Look a Boo Boo" and "Juanita," which both became hits for Harry Belafonte, Melody had a long and varied career, both before and after the North American calypso craze of the 1950s. Like calypso legend Kitchener, who was a friend and mentor, Melody's parents died while he was young and he partially grew up in an orphanage. He began building his name during the war years with tunes like "Berlin on a Donkey" (a scathing look at Hitler and his policies), and "Boo Boo Man" and "Creature from the Black Lagoon" (in both of which he poked self-effacing fun at his own ugliness). When Belafonte rearranged "Boo Boo Man" as "Mama Look a Boo Boo," the song became an international smash and gave Melody a degree of financial security. He even toured with Belafonte briefly. In the 1970s he had a few more hits, but his cancer cut down his touring and recording activity. He died in 1988 at the age of 62.

